THE TRIBUNAL

Composed as above,
After deliberation,
Made the following Award:

1. On July 8, 1987, the International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes (hereinafter called "the Centre" or "ICSID") received a Request for Arbitration from Asian Agricultural Products Ltd. (Hereinafter called "AAPL" or "the claimant"), a Hong Kong corporation.

The Request stated that AAPL wished to institute arbitration proceedings against the Democratic Socialist Republic of Sri Lanka (hereinafter called "Sri Lanka" or "the Respondent") under the terms of the ICSID Convention to which Sri Lanka is a contracting Party, and in reliance upon Article 8.(1) of the Agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern-Ireland and the Government of Sri Lanka for the Promotion and Protection of Investments of February 13, 1980 (hereinafter called "the Bilateral Investment Treaty") which entered into force on December 18, and was extended to Hong Kong by virtue of an Exchange of Notes with effect as of January 14, 1981.

2. Article 8.(1) of the Bilateral Investment Treaty, invoked as expressing Sri Lanka's consent to ICSID Arbitration, reads as follows:

Each contracting Party hereby consents to submit to the International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes (...) for settlement by conciliation or arbitration under the Convention on the settlement of Investment Dispute between States and Nationals of the Other States opened for signature at Washington on 18 March, 1965 any legal disputes arising between that Contracting Party and national or company of the other Contracting Party concerning an investment of the latter in the territory of the former.

3. The Claimant indicated in the Request for Arbitration that a dispute arose directly out of an officially approved investment by AAPL in Sri Lanka that took place in 1983 under the form of participating in the equity capital of SERENDIB SEA-FOODS LTD. (hereinafter called "the Company" or "Serendib") a Sri Lankan public company established for the purpose of undertaking shrimp culture in Sri Lanka.

According to the Claimant, the Company's farm, which was its main producing center, was destroyed on January 28, 1987, during a military operation conducted by the security forces of Sri Lanka against installations reported to be used by local rebels. As a direct consequence of said action, AAPL alleged having suffered a total loss of its investment, and claimed from the Government of Sri Lanka compensation for the damages incurred as a result thereof. The claims submitted on March 9, 1987, remained outstanding without reply for more than the three months period provided for in Article 8.(3) of the Bilateral Investment Treaty to reach an amicable settlement, and hence AAPL became entitled to institute the ICSID arbitration proceedings.

4. On July 9, 1987, the Secretary General of ICSID sent an acknowledgment of the Request to AAPL and transmitted a copy of the Request to Sri Lanka. On July 20, 1987, the Secretary General registered the Request in the Arbitration Register and notified the Parties accordingly.

5. On September 30, 1987, the Centre received a communication from AAPL to the effect that Professor Berthold Goldman has been appointed as member of the Tribunal in conformity with Rule 5.(1) of the Arbitration Rules. He accepted his appointment as arbitrator on October 8, 1987.

The Republic of Sri Lanka appointed Dr. Samuel K. B. Asante by a letter dated October 20, 1987. He accepted his appointment on October 28, 1987.

Dr. Ahmed S. EL-Kosheri was appointed as the third arbitrator and President of the Tribunal on December 24, 1987, by the Chairman of the Administrative Council of ICSID in consultation with the Parties. He accepted his appointment on January 4, 1988.

Accordingly, the Tribunal became constituted as of January 5, 1988, and the declaration provided for under Arbitration Rule 6 was signed by each arbitrator.

6. At the first session of the Tribunal, held on February 23, 1988 at the Offices of the World Bank in Washington, D.C., the Parties declared that they were satisfied that the Tribunal had been properly constituted in accordance with the provisions of Section 2, Chapter IV of the Convention and of Chapter I of the Arbitration Rules (Minutes of said Session, Item I,(c)).

The Parties and the Tribunal established the framework within which the pleadings have to take place, comprising two consecutive rounds of written submissions followed by oral hearings to be electronically recorded without requiring the production of verbatim transcripts (Items 10-12 of the Minutes).

It was also agreed upon in that First Session that the Arbitration Rules in effect after September 26, 1984, shall apply (Item 2); that the language of the proceeding would be English (Item 8); and that the place of the proceedings will be Washington, D.C. at the seat of the Centre (Item 9).

7. The Claimant's Memorial, submitted on April 13, 1988, focused mainly on the "bases for the claim", consisting of:

- (i) - the unconditional obligation of "full protection and security" provided for in Article 2 of the Bilateral Investment Treaty;
- (ii) - the more specific and clearly defined obligation stated in Article 4(2) of that Treaty requiring adequate compensation of the destruction of the Claimant's property under circumstances not justified by combat action or necessities of the situation; and
- (iii) - finally, the Claimant indicated that the Government's liability extends to cover "damage caused under customary rules of international law on State responsibility" (lines 9 and 10 on page 6 of the Claimant's Memorial).

The remedy required was expressed by the Claimant in terms of evaluating "the market value of the undertaking on the basis of discounted cash flow (DCF) theory", in order to establish the "going concern value" of Serendib Seafoods Ltd on January 28, 1978, the date of the destruction of its property.

8. The Respondent's Counter-Memorial, submitted on June 18, 1988, placed the emphasis on different aspects; mainly to illustrate that the Serendib venture "was a failure from the outset", and its "fitful efforts to restructure was overtaken in January 1987, by the civil war between Tamil separatists and the Sri Lankan Government". Thus, the large majority of AAPL's claimed damages should be denied since they are based on "the illusion of expected profitability."

Moreover, according to the Respondent's account of the facts, the destruction of Serendib's property was due to intense combat action between the Tamil rebels known as the "Tigers", who were allegedly operating out of Serendib's farm and reported by Governmental sources as having violently resisted the counter-insurgency operation conducted by the Special Task Force (STF), and which aimed to drive the Tiger rebels out of the area, Equally, with regard to the relevant dispositions of the Bilateral Investment Treaty, the Respondent's Counter-Memorial gave the Treaty an interpretation different from that advanced by the Claimant. Particularly, the expression "full protection and security" used in Article 2 has to be construed as simply incorporating the standard which requires "due diligence" on the part of the States, and does not impose strict liability. As to Article 4.(2), the Government's liability thereunder would not arise except in case the Claimant succeeds in providing the proof that the counter-insurgency actions were not reasonably necessary or that the governmental security forces caused excessive destruction during their combat against the Tamil rebels.

9. The Claimant's Reply to the Respondent's Counter-Memorial was duly submitted on August 18, 1988. The first part of the Reply contained an elaboration of the factual aspects of the case from the Claimant's point of view, especially those related to the events of January 28, 1987. According to Claimant, there was no "battle" at the farm site, but rather "a murderous over-reaction by the STF which led to the destruction and civilian deaths".

Furthermore, no access to the farm was permitted before February 10, 1987, either by the Batticaloa Citizens's Committee for National Harmony or by Serendib's staff, in order that "all evidence of the brutal actions in area could be obliterated".

In the second part of the Reply, the Claimant started by indicating that the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty "should be considered tantamount to" an agreement between the two Parties as to the applicable rules of law, within the context of Article 42 of the ICSID Convention. Nevertheless, it has to be understood that the Treaty itself is not limited to the explicit statement of certain substantive rules, but renders applicable additional rules incorporated therein, either by reference or by implication. Moreover, the Claimant's Reply states that the "rules of customary international law", as well as the "Law of Sri Lanka as the host country", may be regarded as supplementary "alternative source of applicable law" (p. 29 of the Reply).

With regard to the specific issue of the Standard of Liability under the general pattern followed by Bilateral Investment Treaties, the basic argument developed by the Claimant amounts to an assertion that the traditional "due diligence" criterion applicable under the minimum standard of customary international law had been replaced by a new type of "strict or absolute liability not mitigated by concepts of due diligence" (p. 54 of the Claimant's Reply).

In case the strict liability argument based on Article 2 and on the most-favoured nation clause contained in the Bilateral Investment Treaty, would not be assisted by the Tribunal, the Claimant presented "as an alternative submission only" another argument based on Article 4.(2) (p. 56 of the Claimant's Reply), and ultimately on article 4.(1) "which remains the fall-back provision in cases of war destruction" (Ibid, p. 57).

Under this alternative argument, the applicability of Article 4.(2) cannot be avoided except in case Sri Lanka would succeed in carrying out its onus probandi by providing convincing proof that the destruction of January 28, 1987 was caused "in combat action", and was required by "the necessity of the situation".

At the end of the Claimant's reply, AAPL's submissions were formulated as requesting the Tribunal to:

1. Determine the liability of the Government of Sri Lanka to compensate AAPL for the unlawful requisition and destruction of its investments;
2. Award to AAPL restitution or adequate compensation in the amount of freely transferable U.S. Dollars of not less than $ 8,067,368 (eight million sixty-seven thousand three hundred sixty-eight) on account of the requisition and destruction of its investment, increased by the additional costs, including all direct and indirect costs of the present proceedings, as well as interest at commercial rates;
3. Order the Respondent to assume the guarantee which AAPL had accepted for the loan by EAB/Deutsche Bank to SSL, or to pay in escrow the additional amount of U.S. $ 888,000 (eight hundred-eighty thousand), representing the principal of the outstanding loan amount to be paid by AAPL if and when Deutsche Bank prevails in a call on the guarantor for the guarantee subscribed on September 15, 1984;
4. Deny the Counter-claim by the Respondent for costs and attorneys-fees.

10. On October 20, 1988 the Government of Sri Lanka submitted its Rejoinder mainly devoted to emphasizing two issues: (i)—on the one hand, the incorrectness of AAPL's construction of the interrelation between Article 2.(2) and Article 4.(2) of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty; and (ii)—on the other hand, the refutation of AAPL's claimed damages.

According to the Respondent's Rejoinder, Article 4.(2) is not an exemption from the rule contained in Article 2.(2), since both articles "share a common standard of liability (that of governmental negligence)", but "the two provisions concern damages arising in distinct situations and caused by distinct parties" (p. 6 of the Rejoinder). Moreover, Article 4.(2) could not be considered superseded by operation of Article 3 (the most-favoured-nation clause) as a result of the subsequent conclusion of the Sri Lanka/Switzerland Investment Treaty. In the Respondent's own words, such convention "meets the same problem as AAPL's absolute liability theory; because Article 4 of the Treaty creates potential liability, and does not limit liability, its exclusion from a subsequent treaty could not increase U.K. investor's rights under the Treaty" (p. 10 of the Rejoinder).

The Respondent's propositions concerning the claimed damages are composed of three elements:

- (a) - Serendib's desperate financial situation as reflected in the Memorandum of Understanding dated December 22, 1986 could hardly become reversed to evidence future expected profitability;
- (b) - the inclusion of assets and other elements which were never touched by the destruction, such as the hatchery on the west coast;
- (c) - the speculative nature of the projections concerning any possible future profitability.

The Respondent's position on the various legal and factual issues led to the following conclusions:

- (i) - that the STF operation on January 28, 1987, was a legitimate exercise of sovereignty;
- (ii) - that any damage which occurred at the Serendib shrimp farm on that date was either necessary under the circumstances or not caused by the Government;
- (iii) - that AAPL's financial loss due to destruction of assets remains unproven; and
- (iv) - that AAPL suffered no loss of any reasonably foreseeable future profits (p. 39 of the Rejoinder).

11. The oral phase of the proceedings took place from April 17 to April 20, 1989 at the seat of the Centre in Washington, D.C.

As indicated in the Summary Minutes of the Hearing of the Arbitral Tribunal, oral presentations were made by counsels to both Parties, and counsel to each party was given the opportunity to respond to the presentation made by the other.

The Tribunal heard also an oral presentation from Mr. Deva Rodrigo, advisor to the Claimant, and Mr. Victor Santiapillai, Managing Director of Serendib Seafoods Ltd., appeared before the Tribunal as witness called by AAPL. After giving his evidence, he was examined, and cross-examined by Counsel to each Party, and responded to the questions put to him by the members of the Arbitral Tribunal.

Before declaring the hearing adjourned on April 20, 1989, the Tribunal requested the Parties to submit certain additional documents and information, together with their respective comments thereon.

12. In compliance with the Tribunal's oral order fixing the dates for filing the requested submissions, the first exchange took place on May 22, 1989, and the second exchange on May 29, 1989.

13. The Arbitral Tribunal having met for deliberation in Paris on Monday 26 and Tuesday 27 June 1989, and having considered the various issues pending before it, felt necessary to request further clarifications from both Parties about certain important points deemed not sufficiently pleaded during the previous hearing. A procedural Order was issued consequently on June 27, 1989, inviting both Parties to provide the Arbitral Tribunal with their considered points of view, together with all supporting documents, on the following:

(A) - Within the context of Article 4.1 of the Sri Lanka/United Kingdom Bilateral Agreement of February 13th, 1980, for the Promotion and Protection of Investments, is there any existing precedent or established practice concerning restitution, indemnification, compensation or other settlement allocated to Sri Lanka nationals and companies, or to nationals and companies of any Third State in the circumstances specified in said Article 4.(1)? If so how was the quantum calculated?

(B) - Even if there is no precedent or established practice what are the applicable rules and standards under the Sri Lanka domestic legal system with regard to investment losses suffered by private persons owing to any of the circumstances mentioned in the said Article 4.(1)?

(c) - What are the legal obligations of Sri Lanka under international law with regard to investment losses suffered owing to any of the circumstances mentioned in Article 4.(1) by nationals of companies of Third States, whether these States have or have not concluded Bilateral Investment Agreements with Sri Lanka?

14. In compliance with the Tribunal's Order of June 27, 1989, both Parties submitted their answers to the above-stated questions by September 15, 1989, and Claimant commented on the Memorandum of the Respondent on October 27, 1989.

15. At a later stage, and as a result of consultations undertaken between the members of the Tribunal, a new invitation was addressed on December 26, 1989, to Counsel to both Parties in the following terms:

Taking into consideration that the members of the Tribunal deem appropriate receiving from Counsels of both Parties their reflections and comments about the Decision rendered in July 1989 by the International Court of Justice in the case between the U.S.A. and Italy related to the scope of protection extended to a foreign investor under bilateral treaty;

Therefore, both Counsels are kindly invited to submit within the coming four weeks their comments about the legal reasoning stated in said Decision and the what extent they deem said reasoning relevant in adjudicating the pending Arbitration Case.

Counsel to the Respondent dispatched his comments in a letter dated January 26, 1990, and Counsel to the Claimant expressed his comments in a faxed letter dated January 29, 1990.

16. Subsequent consultations undertaken between the members of the Tribunal indicated that there was no need to convene a new oral hearing, and the Tribunal held its final meeting on March 26-27, 1990.

17. As a result of said deliberations, the Tribunal is of the opinion that the pending arbitration has to be adjudicated taking into account the following:

I - Concerning the Applicable Law

18. The present case is the first instance in which the Centre has been seized by an arbitration request exclusively based on a treaty provision and not in implementation of a freely negotiated arbitration agreement directly concluded between the Parties among whom the dispute has arisen.

19. Consequently, the Parties in dispute have had no opportunity to exercise their right to choose in advance the applicable law determining the rules governing the various aspects of their eventual disputes.

In more concrete terms, the prior choice-of-law referred to in the first part of Article 42 of the ICSID Convention could hardly be envisaged in the context of an arbitration case directly instituted in implementation of an international obligation undertaken between two States in favour of their respective nationals investing within the territory of the other Contracting State.

20. Under these special circumstances, the choice-of-law process would normally materialize after the emergence of the dispute, by observing and construing the conduct of the Parties throughout the arbitration proceedings.

Effectively, in the present case, both Parties acted in a manner that demonstrates their mutual agreement to consider the provisions of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty as being the primary source of the applicable legal rules.

This basic premise relied upon heavily by the Claimant acquired full acceptance from the Respondent, who, not only based his main arguments on the provisions of the Treaty in question, but also invoked Article 157 of the Constitution of Sri Lanka emphasizing that the Treaty became applicable as part of the Sri Lankan Law.

21. Furthermore, it should be noted that the Bilateral Investment Treaty is not a self-contained closed legal system limited to provide for substantive material rules of direct applicability, but it has to be envisaged within a wider juridical context in which rules from other sources are integrated through implied incorporation methods, or by direct reference to certain supplementary rules, whether of international law character or of domestic law nature. Such extension of the applicable legal system resorts clearly from Article 3.(1), Article 3.(2), and Article 4 of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty.

22. In fact, the submissions of both Parties (supra, § 7, iii, § 10) clearly demonstrate that they are in agreement about admitting the supplementary role of the recourse—regarding certain issues—to general customary international law, other specific international rules rendered applicable in implementation of the most-favored-nation clause, as well as to Sri Lankan domestic legal rules.

23. In spite of the Claimant's hostility to the general applicability of customary international law rules and his reluctance to admit Sri Lankan domestic law as the basic governing law under the last part of Article 42 of the ICSID Convention covering the absence of choice of law by the Parties, AAPL arrived from a practical point of view to a position similar to that adopted by the Respondent throughout the arbitral proceedings. This is particularly seen from what has been quoted in § 7, iii and § 9 herein-above.

24. Accordingly, the Tribunal is of the opinion that the “false problem” related to the preliminary determination in principle of the applicable law has no relevance within the context of the present arbitration, since both Parties agreed during their respective pleading to invoke primarily the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty as lex specialis, and to apply, within the limits required, the international or domestic legal relevant rules referred to as a supplementary source by virtue of Articles 3 and 4 of the Treaty itself.

II – The legal grounds on which the Respondent’s responsibility could be sustained

25. As indicated herein-above, both Parties invoked the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty as the primary applicable law. However, each Party construed the Treaty’s relevant provisions in a manner which led to basically different conclusions.

(I). The Claimant’s Case

26. The main point of view relied upon by AAPL to substantiate its submissions can be summarized as follows:

(A) – By providing that the investments of one contracting Party “shall enjoy full protection and security in the territory of the other Contracting Party”, Article 2 of the Treaty went beyond the minimum standard of customary international law through the creation of an unconditional obligation to be borne by the host country. According to the Claimant, “the ordinary meaning of the words ‘full protection and security’ points to an acceptance by the host State of strict or absolute liability” (Reply of Claimant to Respondent’s counter-Memorial, op. cit., p. 46);

(B) – Within the “context” of the entire Treaty’s “object and purpose”, and taking into account the “identical or very similar” language used in most of the Bilateral Investment Treaties concluded between Sri Lanka, and Third States, the comparative analysis with the different other patterns followed elsewhere indicates that the term “full protection and security” has to be considered “autonomous in character and independent of any link to customary international law” (Ibid., p. 49);

(C) – By abandoning the “diplomatic protection” theory largely based on the United States’ “Friendship, Commerce and Navigation” (FCN) pattern of indirect protection, the foreign investor “enjoys” under the “Bilateral Investment Treaties” (BIT’s) a different method of direct protection.

According to the Claimant, “the right to protection is vested in the holder of the investment with immediate effect upon the simple coming into force of the treaty”

(Ibid., p. 52). Thus, a deliberate choice is reflected to follow a new pattern in matters of protection different from that which prevailed under traditional International Law.

(D) – In implementation of the most-favoured-nation clause contained in Article 3 of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty, and in the light of the fact that the Treaty concluded between Sri Lanka and Switzerland does not provide for a “war clause” or “civil disturbance” exemption from the protection and security standard, the Claimant asserts that: “the standard of treatment under the Swiss Treaty, which is obviously more favourable than the provision of the SL/UK Treaty, applies to British investments. This means that a standard of unmitigated strict liability has to be assured by Sri Lanka in favour of British Investments” (Ibid., P. 56).

27. As an “alternative submission only”, the Claimant envisaged a supplementary argument based on Article 4.(2) of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty which could be relied upon in case the Tribunal “unexpectedly” would deem that Article applicable.

The Claimant’s position in this respect was clearly stated at page 57 of his Reply to the Respondent’s Counter-Memorial, which reads as follows:

As stated above, Article 4(2) of the SL/UK Treaty provides for an exemption from the strict liability rule of Article 2(2). Article 4(2) provides for restitution and freely transferable compensation if the destruction of property in situation of war or civil disturbances was not required by the necessity of the situation. This standard of compensation goes beyond the duty of granting “restitution”, “indemnification”, or “compensation” or “other settlement” provided for by Art 4(1) of the Treaty, which remains the fall-back provision in cases of war destruction.

It is clear from the above quotation that the Claimant invokes Article 4 of the Treaty in its entirety, but considers the present case falling within the scope of the specific rule contained in Article 4.(2), which evidently provides a better type of remedy than due under Article 4.(1).

28. The reasons sustaining that alternative as to the applicability of Article 4.(2) are explained as follows:

(A) – The act complained of was “not caused in combat action”, but amounts to what the Claimant describes as “the wanton destruction of AAPL’s property and the cold-blooded killing of the farm manager and the permanent staff members” which was “clearly not planned pursuant to any combat action” (page 8 of the Claimant’s Memorial);

(B) – The property was “requisitioned” by Sri Lankan forces and was “destroyed by those same forces” under circumstances suggesting that the wanton use of force was “not required by the exigencies of the situation” (Ibid., same page 8);

(C) – Moreover, the Claimant ascertains that: “the complete destruction and cold-blooded killings by the Government’s security forces were completely out of proportion to what was necessary to meet the specific exigencies of the situation which actually existed at the SSL facility” (Ibid., p. 9); and

(D) - In reliance upon the language of Article 4.(2), the Claimant is of the opinion that said language: "places the burden on the Respondent to demonstrate that the destruction of Claimant's property was required by the necessity of the situation" (Ibid., p. 11).

Invoking what is considered "a general principle of international judicial and arbitral practice" the Claimant submitted at a later stage that:

the burden of proof shifts from the claimant to the defendant if the former has advanced some evidence which prima facie supports his allegation. This is particularly appropriate if the defendant wishes to derive a benefit from an interpretation or rule operating in his favor as does Sri Lanka in this case. It is submitted that rules justifying conduct which would otherwise be unlawful (such as military necessity) fall into the category of norms operating in favor of the defendant for which the defendant carries the onus probandi (Reply to Respondent's Counter-claim, at p. 58).

29. During the written phase of the procedures, the Claimant deemed sufficient to formulate his claims for "adequate compensation" on the basis of said Article 4.(2) without suggesting what could be the ultimate remedy available if the Tribunal—contrary to his submissions—would arrive to the conclusion that conditions required for the applicability of the paragraph in question are missing in the present case, and accordingly the rules referred to in paragraph (1) of Article 4 constitute the proper legal framework within which the pending issues have to be adjudicated.

The only indications provided for in the Claimant's written pleadings with regard to such alternative are limited to what was previously mentioned in two reported passages:

(i) - the short reference on page 6 of the Claimant's Memorial to the Government's liability "under customary rules of international law on State responsibility" (supra, § 7. (iii));

and

(ii) - the closing sentence on page 57 of the Reply to the Respondent's Counter-Memorial containing a precise reference to the remedies "provided for by Article 4.(1) of the Treaty, which remains the fall-back provision in cases of war destruction" (supra, § 27 at the end of the quotation).

30. In order to obtain certain necessary clarifications about the Claimant's position a question was put to the Claimant's Counsel by the President of the Tribunal at the Oral Hearing held in Washington D.C. from April 17 to April 20, 1989. According to the transcript of the tape containing Dr. Golsong's Closing Statement on April 20, 1989, the latter responded by saying:

we were told that we had not based our claim on 4(1) which therefore has to be deleted from the discussions. We have in our Memorial and in our Reply generally based our contention on the Bilateral Investment Treaty of the United Kingdom extended to Hong Kong and improved eventually by way of incorporation by reference of most-favoured-nation provisions deriving from other Investment Treaties. And we maintain this position. We have started by saying that 2. paragraph 2 enshrines an absolute or strict standard of liability and certainly more than due diligence. And that there are some exceptions in the UK Treaty, namely the specific war situation in Article 4 in general, without making a distinction between 4(1) and 4(2). And in any way, if I refer to 4(2), I have implicitly to bring into discussion 4(1). (Text provided by ICSID's Secretariat, as enclosure to a letter dated April 10, 1990, in response to an earlier request from the President of the Arbitral Tribunal to check the electronically recorded tapes of the hearing.)

31. At a later stage of the proceedings, the Arbitral Tribunal issued the above-mentioned Order of June 27, 1989 (supra, § 130), which invited both Parties to provide the Tribunal with their considered points of view about certain aspects related to Article 4.(1) and the results that could be obtained through its implementation.

By his letter dated September 14, 1989, the Claimant's Counsel provided the Tribunal with answers to the questions put to both Parties without raising any objection to the eventual adjudication of the case under Article 4.(1). Moreover, the last sentence of said letter explicitly emphasized that:

...there can be no doubt that in the present case the provisions of Article 4(1) of the Sri Lanka/UK Agreement are applicable, and being lex specialis, supersede any general principle of International Law which otherwise may govern the issues at stake.

(II). The Respondent's Case

32. In Sri Lanka's Counter-Memorial, the Respondent adopted arguments aimed to contradict the Claimant's initial submissions. The Government's main arguments at that phase of the proceedings can be summarized as follows:

(A) - "The language 'full protection and security' is common in bilateral investment treaties, and it incorporates, rather than overrides, the customary international legal standard of responsibility. This international legal standard requires due diligence on the part of the States and reasonable justification for any destruction of property, but does not impose strict liability" (Government's Counter-Memorial, p. 27);

(B) - The "standards for liability under Articles 2.(2) and 4.(2) are essentially identical. In both instances, a requirement of reasonableness is imposed on Government action. Under the international law standard embodied in Article 2.(2), the Government incurs liability if it fails to act with due diligence. Under Article 4.(2), the Government incurs liability if its actions are not reasonably necessary" (Ibid., p. 28);

(C) - "Article 4.(2) sets forth the standard for compensation in the event the Government is found to have violated its obligations under Article 2.(2). That is, if the Government could have prevented the destruction of the farm through due diligence". In case it has been proven that the Government's lack of due diligence caused "unnecessary destruction, then the Government would both have violated its obligation under 2.(2) and owe restitution or compensation under Article 4.(2)" (Ibid., p. 28-29);

(D) - The burden of proof has to be assumed by the Claimant, by proving "that through due diligence, the Government could have prevented Batticaloa from falling under terrorist control, thus obviating the need for counter-insurgency action. If AAPL fails to prove that the security action itself was avoidable, then its burden is to prove that the Government caused excessive destruction during the operation of January 28, 1987" (Ibid., p. 29);

(E) - "To the extent there was excessive destruction, the Government of Sri Lanka is ready to compensate AAPL for its proportionate ownership". But, it is questionable "whether the Tribunal may determine that there was excessive destruction, without second-guessing tactical decisions made by commanders during the heat of combat" (ibid., p. 41).

(F) - "By investing in an area which it knew contained a vehement, and potentially violent, separatist presence, AAPL assumed the risk that its investment would be caught up in the Sri Lankan civil war" (Ibid., p. 41).

33. The Government's Rejoinder focused essentially on the arguments developed in the Claimant's Reply, by ascertaining that:

(A) - AAPL's alleged "absolute liability theory" based on Article 2.(2) concerns damages arising in situations and caused by parties other than those concerned by Article 4.(2). In essence, according to the Respondent, Article 2.(2) "establishes the general standard of protection owed to foreign investors against damage caused by third parties"; but Article 4.(2) "applies to damages caused by the Government itself" (Respondent's Rejoinder, p. 6);

(B) - Contrary to the Claimant's assertion that Article 4.(2) establishes an "exemption" to the strict liability standard of Article 2.(2), Article 4.(2) "creates rather than limits liability" (Ibid., p. 8);

(C) - There are no "authorities" suggesting that "full protection and security" clauses are "among the innovative provisions of modern BITs", and there is "no historical support for AAPL's absolute liability theory" (Ibid., p. 8-9); and

(D) - "The absence of liability-creating provisions analogous to Article 4 of the Treaty in other Sri Lanka BITs, such as the treaty with Switzerland, means only that under those treaties investment losses due to destruction caused by the Government in response to civil strife, whether necessary or not, are covered by the general "fair and equitable treatment" standard found in virtually every BIT, or that investors are left to their traditional remedies under customary international law" (Ibid., p. 10-11).

34. Finally, it has to be noted that throughout the arbitration proceedings, the Government of Sri Lanka maintained that:

- (i) - the destruction was not attributable to the governmental security forces but caused by the rebels;
- (ii) - there was effectively a "combat" between the Government's Special Task Force (STF) and the Tigers insurgents; and
- (iii) - there is no proof that the destruction of the property was "not required by the necessity of the situation".

Therefore, from the Respondent's point of view the liability provided for in Article 4.(2) can not be sustained due to the absence of all three of its sine qua non conditions. Hence, the applicability of Article 4.(1) could have been logically envisaged.

Nevertheless, the Government of Sri Lanka refrained from dwelling upon its interpretation of said Article 4.(1), its scope of application, as well as the extent of the responsibility that may emerge thereunder.

The reasons for such silence became perfectly clear during the oral phase of the arbitral proceedings, since Mr. Hornick, Counsel of the Respondent, indicated during his oral argument on April 19, 1989, that there was no need to elaborate upon Article 4.(1), since in his understanding "AAPL is not claiming" thereunder (Transcript of the electronic taping provided on April 12, 1990 by ICSID Secretariat upon request from the Tribunal's President).

35. Only at a later stage, and in response to the Tribunal's Order of June 27th, 1989, the Respondent expressed the Government of Sri Lanka's views on the three issues related to the remedies that could be available under Article 4.(1) of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty.

36. With regard to the "applicable rules and standards under the Sri Lankan domestic legal system", the letter dated September 13, 1989, addressed by the Respondent's Counsel in response to the Tribunal's Order stated the following:

1. If a Sri Lankan individual or company wished to make a claim against the Sri Lankan Government for any losses suffered owing to the war, etc., it may file an action in a district court in Sri Lanka for compensation. The action will have to be based on a cause of action arising in delict (tort). The law relating to delict is based on Roman Dutch Law which provides a remedy under lex aquiliana principles, namely, for intentional or negligent wrongdoing. There is no special legislation or other basis whereby liability is incurred in the absence of fault. Any person making a claim against the Government would have to file an action in the district court. The prescription ordinance of Sri Lanka, which may be availed of by the Government as any other defendant, states (Sections 9):

No action shall be maintainable for any losses, injury or damage, unless the same shall be commenced within two years from the time when the cause of action shall have arisen.

2. It may also be relevant to note that the State (Liability in Delict) Act of 1969 based on the English Crown Liability in Delict Act permits an individual to file an action against the Government in respect of delicts committed by its officers or agents. Under this Act, vicarious liability attaches to the State for the wrongful acts of its servants.

37. Regarding Sri Lanka's legal obligations under international law, the last part of the Respondent's letter dated September 13, 1989 emphasized that:

with regard to investment losses suffered owing to any of the circumstances mentioned in said Article 4.1 by nationals or companies of third States, whether these States have or have not concluded bilateral investment agreements with Sri Lanka, the government refers to Appendix A of its Counter-Memorial (at 7-8) in which it is explained that Government's obligation in such circumstances under customary international law is to exercise due diligence to protect alien individuals or companies from investment losses (references deleted).

Thus, the mere occurrence of investment losses by an alien, such as AAPL, does not render the Government responsible to compensate the alien for the losses. Rather, the Government is obliged to compensate the alien only in the event the alien demonstrates that the Government failed to act reasonably under the circumstances.

III. The Tribunal's Findings

38. From the above-stated summary of the arguments advanced by each of the two Parties to sustain his position, it becomes clear that the only point on which they agree is the applicability of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty as the primary source of law. Beyond that preliminary point, the two Parties are in disagreement, since each Party construes the relevant provisions of the Treaty in a manner fundamentally in conflict with the interpretation given by the other Party to the same provisions.

Therefore, the first task of the Tribunal is to rule on the controversies existing in this respect by indicating what constitutes the true construction of the Treaty's relevant provisions in conformity with the sound universally accepted rules of treaty interpretation as established in practice, adequately formulated by l'Institut de Droit International in its General Session in 1956, and as codified in Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

39. The basic rule to be followed by the Tribunal in undertaking its task with regard to the pending controversial interpretation issue has been formulated since 1888 in the Award rendered in the Van Bokkelen case (Haiti/USA), where it was stated that:

for the interpretation of treaty language and intention, whenever controversy arises, reference must be made to the law of nations and to international jurisprudence (Repertory of International Arbitral Jurisprudence, Volume I: 1794-1918, Edited by; Vincent COUSSIRAT-COUSTÈRE and Pierre Michel EISEMANN, Nijhoff, Dordrecht/Boston/London, 1989, § 1015, p. 13).

In essence, the requirement that treaty provisions "must be interpreted according to the Law of Nations, and not according to any municipal code", emerges from the basic premise expressed by Mr. WEBSTER, in the following terms:

When two nations speak to each other, they use the language of nations (Quoted by the Germany/Venezuela Mixed Claims Commission in the Christem Case, as reproduced in the Repertory referred to herein-above, § 1017, p. 27).

40. The other rules that should guide the Tribunal in adjudicating the interpretation issues raised in the present arbitration case may be formulated as follows:

Rule (A) - "The first general maxim of interpretation is that it is not allowed to interpret what has no need of interpretation. When a deed is worded in a clear and precise terms, when its meaning is evident and leads to no absurd conclusion, there can be no reason for refusing to admit the meaning which such deed naturally presents" (passage from VATTEL'S Chapter on Interpretation of Treaties—Book 2, chapter 17, relied upon in 1890 as expressing "universally recognized law" by the U.S.A./Venezuela Mixed Commission in the Howland case, Repertory, op. cit., § 1016, p. 16), and the Mixed Commission did not hesitate in declaring: "to attempt interpretation of plain words.... would be violative of Vattel's first rule" (Ibid., p. 26). -cf. A. Ch. KISS, Répertoire de la Pratique Française en Matière de Droit International Public, Tome I, 1962, p. 399, on p. 402 § 810-Text of Prof. GROS's Pleading in the ICJ on July 15-16, 1952 in the Morocco case, and § 811-Text of Prof. BASDEVANT's Pleading in of the PICJ on July 5, 1923 in the Wimbledon case; S.BASTID, Les Traités Dans la Vie Internationale, 1985, p. 129, footnote no. 1—reproducing the text of the Résolution adopted by l'Institut de Droit International, Grenada Session, Annuaire de l'Institut, vol. 46, 1956, underlining that the rules adopted are only applicable "lorsqu'il y a lieu d'interpréter un traité" -; and I.M. SINCLAIR, "The Principles of Treaty Interpretation and Their Application By the English Courts", International and Comparative Law Quarterly, vol. 12, (1963), p. 536—referring to the decisions pronouncing that if the meaning intended to be expressed is clear the Courts are "not at liberty to go further").

Rule (B) - "In the interpretation of treaties... we ought not to deviate from the common use of the language unless we have very strong reasons for it (...) words are only designed to express the thoughts; thus the true signification of an expression in common use is the idea which custom has affixed to that expression" (another passage from VATTEL relied upon by the U.S.A./Venezuela Mixed Commission in the Howland case, op.cit., p. 16—cf. Award of the Mexico/U.S.A. Mixed Commission of 1871 in the William Barron case, Ibid., § 1023, p. 30, emphasizing that: "interpretation means finding in good faith that meaning of certain words, if they are doubtful, which those who used the words must have desired to convey, according to the usage of speech (usus loquendi)"; ALEXANDER's award of 1899 in the Treaty of Limits case between Costa Rica and Nicaragua Ibid., § 1025, p. 31, declaring that: "words are to be taken as far as possible in their first and simplest meanings", "in their natural and obvious sense, according to the general use of the same words", "in the usual sense, and not in any extraordinary or unused acceptation"; S. BASTID, op.cit., p. 129, reproducing the Résolution adopted in 1956 by l'Institut de droit International according to which: "L'accord des parties s'étant réalisé sur le texte, il y a lieu de prendre le sens naturel et ordinaire de ce texte comme base d'interprétation"; and I.M. SINCLAIR, op. cit., p. 537, reporting that: "the Court .... is bound to construe them (the words) according to their natural and fair meaning").

Rule (C) - In cases where the linguistic interpretation of a given text seems inadequate or the wording thereof is ambiguous, there should be recourse to the integral context of the Treaty in order to provide an interpretation that takes into consideration what is normally called: "le sens général, l'esprit du Traité", or "son écon-omie générale” (Award rendered in 1914 by the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Timor Island case between the Netherlands and Portugal, Repertory, op. cit., § 1019, p. 28; decision of the Bulgarian/Greek Mixed Arbitration Tribunal rendered in 1927 in the Sarrapoulos case, Repertory, vol. II: 1919-1945, § 2020, p. 21-22; The 1926 Paula Mendel case where the Germany/U.S.A. Mixed Claims Commission disregarded “a literal construction of the language” since it “finds no support in the other provisions of the Treaty as a whole”. Hence, “it cannot stand alone and must fall” Repertory vol. II, § 2025, p. 25; and the Decision of the Germany/Venezuela Mixed Claims Commission of 1903 in the Kummerow case which stated that: “it is a uniform rule of construction that effect should be given to every clause and sentence of an agreement”, Repertory, op. cit., vol. I, § 1031, p. 38).

Rule (D) - In addition to the “integral context”, “object and intent”, “spirit”, “objectives”, “comprehensive construction of the treaty as a whole”, recourse to the rules and principles of international law has to be considered a necessary factor providing guidance within the process of treaty interpretation. (Resolution of l’Institut de Droit International, op. cit., Article 1.(2) which stipulates: “les termes des dispositions du traité doivent être interprétés dans le contexte entier, selon la bonne foi et à la lumière des principes du droit international”; Paragraph 3.(c), of Article 31 of Vienna convention on the Law of Treaties, containing reference to: “all relevant rule of international law applicable in the relations between the parties”, and the Award rendered in 1928 by the France/Mexico Claims Commission in the Georges Pinson case, which stated among “les principes généraux d’interprétation”: “Toute convention internationale doit être réputée s’en référer tacitement au droit international commun, pour toutes les questions qu’elle ne résout pas elle-même en termes exprès et d’une façon différente” Repertory, op. cit., vol. II, § 2023, p. 24).

Rule (E) - Nothing is better settled, as a canon of interpretation in all systems of law, than that a clause must be so interpreted as to give it a meaning rather than so as to deprive it of meaning (Award of the UK/USA Arbitral Tribunal of 1926 in the Cayuga Indians case, Repertory, vol. II, § 2036, p. 35-36). This is simply an application of the more wider legal principle of “effectiveness” which requires favouring the interpretation that gives to each treaty provision “effet utile”.

Rule (F) - When there is need of interpretation of a treaty it is proper to consider stipulations of earlier or later treaties in relation to subjects similar to those treated in the treaty under consideration” (Award of the Mexico/USA General Claims Commission of 1929 rendered in the Elton case, Repertory, vol. II, § 2033, p. 35). Thus, establishing the practice followed through comparative law survey of all relevant precedents becomes an extremely useful tool to provide an authoritative interpretation.

41. In the light of the above mentioned canons of interpretation, the relevant provisions of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty have to be identified, each provision construed separately, examined within the global context of the Treaty, in order to determine the proper interpretation of each text, as well as its scope of application in relation to the other treaty provisions and with regard to the various general rules and principles of international law not specifically referred to in the Treaty itself.

In more precise terms, all appropriate measures should be undertaken in view of establishing the legal regime created by the Treaty for the protection of those investors covered by the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty in case their investments suffer destruction owing to activities related to the Government’s counter-insurgency actions.

42. The construction of the Treaty’s comprehensive system governing all aspects related to the extent of the special protection conferred upon the investors in question would permit the evaluation of the Treaty’s effective contribution in this respect; i.e. in view of determining with regard to each issue whether the Sri Lanka/U.K. Treaty intended, merely, to consolidate the pre-existing rules of international law, or, on the contrary, it tended to innovate by imposing on the host state a higher standard of international responsibility.

Essentially, said evaluation is required, not as a conceptual doctrinal exercise, but for a practical reason related to the adjudication of the case, since in accordance therewith the following question could be adequately answered: what are the limits within which the classical international law based on the judicial and arbitral precedents could be of relevance in adjudicating the present case?

43. Taking the above-mentioned remarks into consideration, the Tribunal agrees with the Parties in considering that there are four fundamental texts in the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty that should be carefully considered for the purpose of determining the host State’s responsibility for investment losses suffered as a result of property destruction:

First: The general obligation imposed by virtue of Article 2.(2), by which the host State undertook that foreign investments “shall enjoy full protection and security in the territory”, since violation thereof entails a certain degree of international responsibility;

Second: The most-favoured-nation provision contained in Article 3, which may be invoked to increase the host State’s liability in case a higher standard of international protection becomes granted to investments pertaining to nationals of a Third State;

Third: The special provision of Article 4.(1) which envisages the legal consequences of losses suffered by foreign investments “owing to war or other armed conflict, revolution, a state of national emergency, revolt, insurrection or riot” in the territory of the host State; and

Fourth: “without prejudice to” the rules applicable under the previous text (Article 4.(1), the Treaty introduced a more specific rule tailored particularly to cover two types of “losses”, which are “suffered” in any of the situations enumerated in Article 4.(1). These two categories are:

- (a) requisitioning of their property by its forces or authorities; or
- (b) destruction of their property by its forces or authorities which was not caused in combat action or was not required by the necessity of the situation.

Whenever either case is established, the Treaty provided in the concluding sentence of Article 4.(2) for a certain remedy: “restitution or adequate compensation”, and that the “resulting payments shall be freely transferable”.

44. Accordingly, the treaty envisaged different situations under which protection could be invoked in case of destruction of investments, and different remedies are provided for in order to meet the particularity of each situation.

The various categories of such situations that could be encountered may be classified as follows:

- (i) - Situations in which the foreign investor claims that the destruction of the property was unnecessarily caused by the governmental security forces acting out of combat, and in such case the Treaty provides for a special rule in Article 4.(2), which was tailored particularly to fit the requirements of such serious wrongful action directly attributable to the State organs;
- (ii) - In case the foreign investor fails to establish that the destruction was attributable to the governmental security forces, or in case there was effectively a “combat” during which the property was destroyed under conditions that could hardly permit assessing the unnecessary character of the destruction in a convincing manner, the type of remedy envisaged under Article 4.(2) of the Sri Lanka /U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty has to be considered excluded. Consequently, the other provisions of the treaty become relevant;
- (iii) - In presence of such situation not possibly governed by Article 4.(2), the search has to be first directed towards investigating the existence of certain rules more favourable to the foreign investor than those provided for under Articles 2.(2) and 4.(1), since the better treatment accorded to investors of the Third State could be extended to apply by virtue of the most-favoured-nation clause stipulated in Article 3 of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Treaty;
- (iv) - In the absence of a more favourable system applicable by virtue of Article 3, the applicable rules become necessarily those governing the liability of the Host State under Article 4.(1) and Article 2.(2), whether taken together or separately as the case may be.

45. The Claimant’s primary submission—as previously explained (supra, § 26)—is based on the assumption that the “full protection and security” provision of Article 2.(2) created a “strict liability” which renders the Sri Lankan Government liable for any destruction of the investment even if caused by persons whose acts are not attributable to the Government and under circumstances beyond the State’s control.

For sustaining said construction introducing a new type of objective absolute responsibility called “without fault”, the Claimant’s main argument relies on the existence in the text of the Treaty of two terms: “enjoy” and “full”, a combination which sustains, according to the Claimant, that the Parties intended to provide the investor with a “guarantee” against all losses suffered due to the destruction of the investment for whatever reason and without any need to establish who was the person that caused said damage. In other words, the Parties substituted the “due diligence” standard of general international law by a new obligation creating an obligation to achieve a result (“obligation de résultat”) providing the foreign investor with a sort of “insurance” against the risk of having his investment destroyed under whatever circumstances.

46. The Tribunal is of the opinion that the Claimant’s construction of Article 2.(2) as explained herein-above cannot be justified under any of the canons of interpretation previously stated (supra, § 40).

47. In conformity with Rule (B), the words “shall enjoy full protection and security” have to be construed according to the “common use which custom has affixed” to them, their “usus loquendi”, “natural and obvious sense”, and “fair meaning.”

In fact, similar expressions, or even stronger wordings like the “most constant protection”, were utilized since last century in a number of bilateral treaties concluded to encourage the flow of international economic exchanges and to provide the citizens and national companies established on the territory of the other Contracting Party with adequate treatment for them as well as to their property (“Traité d’Amitié, de Commerce et Navigation”, concluded between France and Mexico on November 27, 1886—cf. A Ch.KISS, Répertoire de la Pratique Française ..., op. cit., Tome III, 1965 § 1002, p. 637; The Treaty concluded in 1861 between Italy and Venezuela, the interpretation of which became the central issue in the Sambiaggio case adjudicated in 1903 by the Italy/Venezuela Mixed Claims Commission—U.N. Reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol. X, p. 512 ss.).

48. The arbitral Tribunal is not aware of any case in which the obligation assumed by the host State to provide the nationals of the other Contracting State with “full protection and security” was construed as absolute obligation which guarantees that no damages will be suffered, in the sense that any violation thereof creates automatically a “strict liability” on behalf of the host State.

Sambiaggio case seems to be the only reported case in which such argument was voiced, but without success. The Italian Commissioner AGNOLI, referred in his Report to:

The protection and security...which the Venezuelan Government explicitly guarantees by Article 4 of the Treaty of 1861 to Italians residing in Venezuela (U.N. Reports, op.cit., p. 502—underlining added).

The Venezuelan Commissioner ZULOAGA responded by indicating that:

Governments are constituted to afford protection, not to guarantee it (Ibid., p. 511).

The Umpire RALSTON put an end to the Italian allegation by emphasizing that:

If it had been the contract between Italy and Venezuela, understood and consented by both, that the latter should be held liable for the acts of revolutionists—something in derogation of the general principles of international law—this agreement would naturally have found direct expression in the protocol itself and would not have been left to doubtful interpretation (Ibid., p. 521).

49. In the recent case concerning Electronica Sicula S.P.A. (ELSI) between the U.S.A. and Italy adjudicated by a Chamber of the International Court of Justice, the U.S.A. Government invoked Article V.(1) of the Bilateral Treaty which established an obligation to provide “the most constant protection and security”, but without claiming that this obligation constitutes a “guarantee” involving the emergence of a “strict liability” (Section 2—Chapter V of the U.S.A. Memorial dated May 15, 1987, where reference is made, on the contrary at page 135 to the : “One well-established aspect of the international standard of treatment... that States must use “due diligence” to prevent wrongful injuries to the person or property of aliens within their territory”).

In its Judgment of July 20, 1989, the ICJ Chamber clearly stated that:

The reference in Article V to the provision of “constant protection and security” cannot be construed as the giving of a warranty that property shall never in any circumstances be occupied or disturbed (C.I.J., Recueil, 1989, § 108, p. 65).

Consequently, both the oldest reported arbitral precedent and the latest I.C.J. ruling confirms that the language imposing on the host State an obligation to provide “protection and security” or “full protection and security required by international law” (the other expression included in the same Article V) could not be construed according to the natural and ordinary sense of the words as creating a “strict liability”. The rule remains that:

The State into which an alien has entered ... is not an insurer or a guarantor of his security... It does not, and could hardly be asked to, accept an absolute responsibility for all injuries to foreigners (Alwyn V. FREEMAN, Responsibility of States for Unlawful Acts of Their Armed Forces, Sijthoff, Leiden, 1957, p. 14).

This conclusion, arrived at more than three decades ago, still reflects—in the Tribunal’s opinion—the present status of International Law Investment Standards as reflected in “the worldwide BIT network” (cf. K.S. GUDGEON, “Valuation of Nationalized Property Under United States and other Bilateral Investment Treaties”. Chapter III, in the Valuation of Nationalized Property in International Law, Ed. by Richard B. LILLICH, vol. IV, (1987), p. 120).

50. In the opinion of the present Arbitral Tribunal, the addition of words like “constant” or “full” to strengthen the required standards of “protection and security” could justifiably indicate the Parties’ intention to require within their treaty relationship a standard of “due diligence” higher than the “minimum standard” of general international law. But, the nature of both the obligation and ensuing responsibility remain unchanged, since the added words “constant” or “full” are by themselves not sufficient to establish that the Parties intended to transform their mutual obligation into a “strict liability”.

51. The Tribunal’s opinion arrived at in applying the established rule, according to which the words contained in a treaty provision have to be given the natural and fair meaning affixed to them by the common usage, is further supported by recourse to the other canons of interpretation.

According to Rule (C) (supra, § 40), proper interpretation has to take into account the realization of the Treaty’s general spirit and objectives, which is clearly in the present case the encouragement of investments through securing an adequate environment of legal protection. But, in the absence of travaux préparatoires in the proper sense, it would be almost impossible to ascertain whether Sri Lanka and the United Kingdom had contemplated during their negotiations the necessity of disregarding the common habitual pattern adopted by the previous treaties, and to establish a “strict liability” in favour of the foreign investor as one of the objectives of their treaty protection. Equally, none among the authors referred to by the Parties claimed in his commentary that the Sri Lanka/U.K. Treaty or similar Bilateral Investment Treaties had the effect of increasing the customary international law standards of protection to the extent of imposing “strict liability” on the host State in cases where the investment suffers losses due to property destruction.

Accordingly, recourse to the spirit of the Treaty and its objectives would not alter the conclusion arrived at by the Tribunal in refusing to consider that the Sri Lanka/U.K. Treaty imposed by Article 2.(2) a “strict liability” in the event of failure to provide “full protection and security”.

52. Moreover, both Rules (D) and (E) confirm the Tribunal’s opinion, as Article 2.(2) should not be taken separately out of the Treaty’s global context.

The Claimant’s contention that Article 2.(2) adopted a standard of “strict liability” would lead logically to the inevitable conclusion that Article 4 in its entirety becomes superfluous, in the sense that according to the Claimant’s interpretation the Parties were not serious in adding to their Treaty two provisions which are not susceptible of getting any application in practice. Such an interpretation has to be rejected in application of Rule (E) which requires that Article 2.(2) be interpreted in a manner that does not deprive Article 4 from having any meaning or scope of applicability.

Such an unaccepted result could have been easily avoided if the Claimant had not disregarded Rule (D) according to which the rules of general international law have to be taken into consideration by necessary implication, and not to be deemed totally excluded as alleged by the Claimant.

In the Tribunal’s opinion the non-reference to international law in Article 2.(2) of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Treaty should not be taken as implying the Parties’ intention to avoid its application under any aspect, including its role as supplementary source providing guidance in the process of interpretation.

The Tribunal's conclusion in this respect, is not only based on Rule (D) as previously indicated, but it is supported furthermore by what was expressed by an informed author who stated that:

the U.K. BIT's normally make no international law reference... This drafting device could be argued to cloud reliance on external sources of law and precedent during the life of the treaty, although this is undoubtedly not the intent. (K. Scott GUDGEON, "Valuation of Nationalized Property..." op.cit., at p. 119-120).

53. Finally, it has to be recalled that in reliance upon Rule (F) the precedents established by the Arbitral Tribunal in the Sambiaggio case (1903) and by the ICJ Chamber in the Eletronica Sicula case (1989), both previously referred to (supra, § 48-49), are categoric in supporting the Tribunal's refusal to construe the words "full protection and security" as imposing a "strict liability" on the host State for whatever losses suffered due to the destruction of the investment protected under the treaty.

Therefore, and taking into consideration all the reasons stated in the previous paragraphs (supra, § 45-52), the Tribunal declares unfounded the Claimant's main plea aiming to consider the Government of Sri Lanka assuming strict liability under Article 2.(2) of the Bilateral Investment Treaty, without any need to prove that the damages suffered were attributable to the State or its agents, and to establish the State's responsibility for not acting with "due diligence".

54. For the same reasons, the Tribunal rejects the Claimant's argument based on the most-favoured-nation clause contained in Article 3 of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty.

By invoking the absence in the Sri Lanka/Switzerland Treaty of a text similar to Article 4 providing for a "war clause" or "civil disturbance" exemption from the full protection and security standard, the Claimant based his argument on two implicit assumptions:

- (i) - that the Sri Lanka/Switzerland Treaty provides equally for a "strict liability" standard of protection in case of losses suffered due to property destruction; and
- (ii) - that the rules of general international law are totally excluded and replaced exclusively by the Treaty's "strict liability" standard.

Both assumptions are unfounded, as the Tribunal has no reasons to believe that the Sri Lanka/Switzerland Treaty adopted a "strict liability" standard, and the Tribunal is convinced that, in the absence of a specific rule provided for in the Treaty itself as lex specialis, the general international law rules have to assume their role as lex generalis.

Accordingly, it is not proven that the Sri Lanka/Switzerland Treaty contains rules more favourable than those provided for under the Sri Lanka/U.K. Treaty, and hence, Article 3 of the latter Treaty cannot be justifiably invoked in the present case.

55. Faced with the task of adjudicating the Claimant's "alternative submission", the Tribunal has to provide an answer to the various arguments raised by both Parties with regard to the interpretation of Article 4, the inter-relation between 4.(1) and 4.(2), their respective scope of application, as well as the burden of proof assumed by each Party in evidencing the existence or non-existence of the conditions required for the applicability of the rules and standards referred to in both paragraphs of Article 4.

56. In determining the applicability of either paragraph of Article 4, the Tribunal shall be guided by the same rules of interpretation previously prescribed from (A) to (F) (supra, § 40).

Nevertheless, in order to handle the legal issues related to evidence, the above-stated canons have to be complemented by taking into consideration the following established international law rules:

Rule (G)- "There exists a general principle of law placing the burden of proof upon the claimant" (Bin CHENG, General Principles of Law as Applied by International Courts and Tribunals, Grotius Publications, Cambridge, (1987), p. 327, and the supporting authorities referred to therein).

Rule (H)- "The term actor in the principle onus probandi actori incumbit is not to be taken to mean the plaintiff from the procedural standpoint, but the real claimant in view of the issues involved" (Ibid., p. 332). Hence, with regard to "proof of individual allegations advanced by the parties in the course of proceedings, the burden of proof rests upon the party alleging the fact" (Ibid., p. 334; and Durward V. SANDIFER, Evidence before International Tribunals, University Press of Virginia, Charlottesville, (1975), p. 127, footnote 101).

Rule (I)- "A Party having the burden of proof must not only bring evidence in support of his allegations, but must also convince the Tribunal of their truth, lest they be disregarded for want, or insufficiency, of proof" (CHENG, op.cit., p. 329- 331, with quotations from the supporting authorities).

Rule (J)- "The international responsibility of the State is not to be presumed. The party alleging a violation of international law giving rise to international responsibility has the burden of proving the assertion" (The Tanager Horses case (1924); the Corfu Channel case (1949), and the Belgium Claims case (1930) referred to by CHENG, at p. 305-306).

Rule (K)- "International tribunals are "not bound to adhere to strict judicial rules of evidence". As a general principle "the probative force of the evidence presented is for the Tribunal to determine" (SANDIFER, op. cit. pp. 9 and 17; Award of 1896 rendered in the Fabiani case between France and Venezuela, Repertory, op. cit., Vol; I, p. 412-413; and the 1903 Award rendered in the Franqui case by the Spain/Venezuela Mixed Claims Commission, which considered this rule as expressing "the unanimous conviction of the most conspicuous writers upon international law" and relying inter alia on Article 15 of the Rules for Arbitration between Nations adopted in 1875 by l'Institut de Droit International, and what

Rule (L)- In exercising the "free evaluation of evidence" provided for under the previous Rule, the international tribunals "decided the case on the strength of the evidence produced by both parties", and in case a party "adduces some evidence which prima facie supports his allegation, the burden of proof shifts to his opponent (SANDIFER, op. cit., pp. 125, 129, 130, 170-173, relying upon the Parker case of 1962 adjudicated by the Mexico/U.S.A. General Claims Commission, U.N. Reports, op.cit., Vol. IV, p. 36-41; the ICJ's Ambatielos and Asylum cases).

Rule (M)- Finally, "In cases where proof of a fact presents extreme difficulty, a tribunal may thus be satisfied with less conclusive proof, i.e., prima facie evidence" (CHENG, op.cit. p. 323-325, with quotations from the supporting authorities and cited with approval by SANDIFER, at p. 173).

57. In the light of all the legal Rules from (A) to (M) stated herein above (§ 40 and 56), it becomes clear that Article 4.(2) regulated a specific situation by adopting a standard of responsibility representing a certain degree of particularity, and which becomes applicable only in cases characterized by the cumulative existence of three factors:

- (a) - that the destruction of property not only occurred during hostilities, but more precisely such destruction has been proven to be committed by the governmental forces or authorities themselves;
- (b) - that the destruction was not caused in combat action, since the higher standard of liability ("adequate compensation" payable in "freely transferable" currency) is linked with the assumption of unjustified destruction committed out of combat; and
- (c) - that the destruction was not required by the necessity of the situation, as the existence of a combat would not be sufficient per se to alleviate the responsibility of the governmental forces and authorities, once it has been proven that the security forces bypassed the reasonable limits by undertaking unnecessary destruction.

58. Moreover, it has to be noted that the foreign investor who invokes the applicability of said Article 4.(2) assumes a heavy burden of proof, since he has, in conformity with Rules (G) and (J), to establish:

- (i) - that the governmental forces and not the rebels caused the destruction;
- (ii) - that this destruction occurred out of "combat";
- (iii) - that there was no "necessity", in the sense that the destruction could have been reasonably avoided due to its unnecessary character under the prevailing circumstances.

59. Exercizing its discretionary power in evaluating the evidence produced by both Parties during the proceedings of the present case in conformity with the above-stated Rules (K) and (I), the Arbitral Tribunal considers that:

- (a) - There is no doubt that the destruction of the premises which existed in Serendib's Farm took place during the hostilities of January 28, 1987, and the loss of the shrimps harvest occurred during the period in which the governmental security forces occupied the Farm's fields;
- (b) - Nevertheless, there is no convincing evidence produced which sufficiently sustains the Claimant's allegation that the firing which caused the property destruction came from the governmental troops, and no reliable evidence was adduced to prove that the shrimps were lost due to acts committed by the security forces;
- (c) - Equally, no convincing evidence was produced which sufficiently sustains the Respondent's allegation that the firing which caused the destruction of the property came from the insurgents resisting the security forces.

60. Therefore, the Arbitral Tribunal finds that the first condition required under Article 4.(2) cannot be considered fulfilled in the present case, due to the lack of convincing evidence proving that the losses were incurred due to acts committed by the governmental forces.

At the same time, the Tribunal cannot proceed in this respect on the basis of prima facie evidence adduced in function of Rules (H) or (M) since the existence of a legal condition as important as the attributability of the damage should, in the Tribunal's opinion, be proven in a conclusive manner.

61. Regarding the second condition which excluded from the scope of Article 4.(2) the losses suffered "in combat action", it requires first the determination of what is meant by "combat action" and subsequently whether the investment losses were effectively caused in "combat action".

In implementation of the above-stated Rule (B) (supra, § 40), the term "combat action" has to be understood according to its natural and fair meaning as commonly used under prevailing circumstances, i.e. within the context of guerrilla warfare which characterizes the modern civil wars conducted by insurgents.

Rarely, in contemporary history actions undertaken during civil wars would take the classical form of a regular military confrontation between two opposing armed groups on a battle field where the adversaries engage simultaneously in fighting each other on the spot. In most cases, the opponents in current civil war situations would resort to sporadic surprise attacks as far as possible from their home bases, trying to avoid direct military confrontation through retreat to places where pursuit could be extremely difficult.

Hence, a "combat action" undertaken against insurgents could be envisaged comprising vast areas extending over the several square miles covering all the localities in which the hit and run operations as well as the governmental counter-insurgency activities could take place.

62. In the light of the fore-mentioned remarks, and taking into consideration the evidence submitted by both Parties throughout the arbitration proceedings, the Tribunal is of the opinion that the operation "Day Break" undertaken on January 28, 1987, against the "Tiger" fighters belonging to the movement known as LLTE, in order to regain control of the Manmunai area, qualifies as "combat action".

Accordingly, the losses caused as a result of said "combat action" are not covered by Article 4.(2) of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty, since they fall within the explicitly excluded category.

63. The third and final condition provided for in Article 4.(2) relates to the "necessity of the situation", in the sense that the State responsibility under said disposition can only be engaged if it has been proven that the losses incurred were not due to "the necessity of the situation".

The term in question follows a pattern long established in practice, as a number of arbitral precedents refused to allocate compensation for destructions that took place during hostilities on the assumption that these destructions "were compelled by the imperious necessity of war" (cf. the 1903 Award rendered by the Netherlands/Venezuela Mixed Claims Commission in the Dania Bembelish case, Repertory...op.cit., vol. I, § 297-280; and the Special Ad Hoc Arbitral Tribunal adjudicating the Hardman case between the U.K. and the U.S.A.). The doctrinal authorities approved that reasoning mainly justified by the extreme difficulty, described as "next to impossible", of obtaining the reconstruction in front of the arbitral tribunal of all the conditions under which the "combat action" took place with an adequate reporting of all the accompanying circumstances (cf. RALSTON, The Law and Procedure of International Tribunals, (1926), p. 391; and C. EAGLETON, The Responsibility of States in International Law, (1928), p. 155).

64. In the present case, neither Party was able to provide reliable evidence explaining with precision the conditions under which the destructions and other losses, mainly of the shrimps crop, took place. Under these circumstances, it would be extremely difficult to determine whether the destruction and losses were caused as an inevitable result of the "necessity of the situation", or, on the contrary, were avoidable if the governmental security forces would have been keen to act with due diligence.

Therefore, the Tribunal deems appropriate to rely on the above-stated Rule (I), according to which "the international responsibility of the State is not to be presumed" (supra, § 56).

Consequently, all three conditions necessary for the applicability of Article 4.(2) are proven to be non-existent in the present case, and Article 4.(1) becomes the only part of Article 4 providing remedy that could be available for the Claimant to base his claims thereunder.

65. For the applicability of Article 4.(1), the only condition required is the presence of "losses suffered".

These two key words are so clear that they do not call for interpretation in conformity with VATTEL's Rule (A) which renders any attempted departure from the plain meaning of the words a violation of international law rules on treaty interpretation.

Undoubtedly, the term "losses suffered" includes all property destruction which materializes due to any type of hostilities enumerated in the text ("owing to war or other armed conflict, revolution, a state of national emergency, revolt, insurrection or riot in the territory").

Equally, the mere fact that such "losses suffered" do exist is by itself sufficient to render the provision of Article 4.(1) applicable, without any need to prove which side was responsible for said destruction, or to question whether the destruction was necessary or not.

In essence, the scope of applicability of Article 4.(1) is not subject to any legal restrictions. Hence, it extends as lex generalis to all situations not covered by the special rule of Article 4.(2), including necessarily cases where no proof has been established to determine whether the governmental forces or the insurgents caused the property destruction.

66. The only difficulty encountered under Article 4.(1) does not relate to its interpretation or conditions of applicability, but to the type of remedy provided for thereunder.

Precisely, Article 4.(1) does not include any substantive rules establishing direct solutions; i.e. material rules providing remedies expressed in fixed and definitive terms. Like conflict-of-law rules, Article 4.(1) contains simply an indirect rule whose function is limited to effecting a reference (renvoi) towards other sources which indicate the solution to be followed.

According to the undisputed plain language of Article 4.(1), the investor—already enjoying the "full security" under Article 2.(2) of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Treaty—has to be accorded treatment no less favourable than:

- (i) - that which the host State accords to its own nationals and companies; or
- (ii) - that accorded to nationals and companies of any Third State.

Taking into account the absence of restrictions, whether explicit or implied, and the generality of the text, the "no less favourable treatment" granted thereunder covers all possible cases in which the investments suffer losses owing to events identified as including "a state of national emergency, revolt, insurrection, or riot", with regard to remedies enumerated in the text itself: "restitution, indemnification, compensation or other settlement".

67. Consequently, it could be safely ascertained that the Bilateral Investment Treaty, through the above-stated renvoi technique, had not left the host State totally immune from any responsibility in case the foreign investor suffers losses due to the destruction of his investment which occurs during a counter-insurgency action undertaken by the governmental security forces.

In implementation of Article 4.(1), the host State could find itself in such a situation bound to bear a certain degree of responsibility to be determined in implementation of the renvoi contained in that Article 4.(1).

Once failure to provide "full protection and security" has been proven (under Article 2.(2) of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Treaty or under a similar provision existing in other bilateral Investment Treaties extending the same standard to nationals of a third State), the host State's responsibility is established, and compensation is due according to the general international law rules and standards previously developed with regard to the State's failure to comply with its "due diligence" obligation under the minumum standard of customary international law.

68. It should be noted in this respect that in the Government of Sri Lanka's own words, its international responsibility could be engaged "if it fails to act with due diligence" (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, at p. 28, second paragraph).

If the government's lack of due diligence caused otherwise unnecessary destruction, then the government would ... have violated its obligation under Article 2.(2)....

The reference to the "lack of due diligence" emerges from the Government's basic assumption, according to which:

the language "full protection and security" is common in bilateral investment treaties, and it incorporates rather than overrides, the customary international legal standard of responsibility. This international legal standard requires due diligence on the part of the states, and reasonable justification for any destruction of property (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, at p. 27).

69. Hence, any foreign investor, even if his national State has not concluded with Sri Lanka a Bilateral Investment Treaty containing a provision similar to that of Article 2.(2), would be entitled to a protection which requires "due diligence" from the host State, i.e. Sri Lanka. Failure to comply with this obligation imposed by customary international law entails the host State's responsibility.

The Letter of September 13, 1989, containing the Government of Sri Lanka's response to the Tribunal's Order dated June 27, 1989, confirmed that:

The Government's obligation in such circumstances under customary international law is to exercise due diligence to protect alien individuals or companies from investment losses (paragraph (c) of said letter, with reference to authorities stating that: "A state on whose territory an insurrection occurs is not responsible for loss or damage sustained by an alien to his person or property unless it can be shown that the government of this state was negligent in the use of, or in the failure to use, the forces at its disposal for the prevention or suppression of the insurrection").

The Respondent's submission as expressed in the Letter's final paragraph reads as follows:

Thus, the mere occurrence of investment losses by an alien, such as AAPL, does not render the Government responsible to compensate the alien for the losses. Rather, the Government is obliged to compensate the alien only in the event the alien demonstrates that the Government failed to act reasonably under the circumstances.

70. Within the context of the latter alternative, the Tribunal has to envisage whether effectively Sri Lanka's responsibility could be sustained under international law which has to be considered applicable by virtue of the renvoi provided for in Article 4.(1), combined with the conventional standard of "full protection and security" stipulated in Article 2.(2), as well as in other Bilateral Investment Treaties concluded by Sri Lanka.

71. But, before turning to undertake that task, the Tribunal has to emphasize that the Respondent referred in the september 13, 1989 Letter to another legal ground available by virtue of the renvoi contained in Article 4.(1), which is the State's responsibility under the rules of the domestic legal system.

As indicated in paragraph (B) of said letter, previously quoted in its entirety (supra, § 36), the Sri Lankan Law provides, for the person who suffered losses owing to armed hostilities, "a remedy under lex aquilian principles, namely, for intentional or negligent wrongdoing".

Nevertheless, the Tribunal deems appropriate, for procedural considerations, not to delve into the domestic law responsibility, since the Sri Lankan Law was not fully pleaded during the present arbitration proceedings.

III—The Legal and Factual Considerations on which the Respondent's Responsibility is Established

72. It is a generally accepted rule of International Law, clearly stated in international arbitral awards and in the writings of the doctrinal authorities, that :

- (i) - A State on whose territory an insurrection occurs is not responsible for loss or damage sustained by foreign investors unless it can be shown that the Government of that state failed to provide the standard of protection required, either by treaty, or under general customary law, as the case may be; and
- (ii) - Failure to provide the standard of protection required entails the state's international responsibility for losses suffered, regardless of whether the damages occurred during an insurgents' offensive act or resulting from governmental counter-insurgency activities.

73. The long established arbitral case-law was adequately expressed by Max HUBER, the Rapporteur in the Spanish Zone of Morocco claims (1923), in the following terms:

The principle of non-responsibility in no way excludes the duty to exercise a certain degree of vigilance. If a state is not responsible for the revolutionary events themselves, it may nevertheless be responsible, for what its authorities do or not to do to ward the consequence, within the limits of possibility. (Translation from the French original text reported by CHENG, in his general principles..., op. cit., at p. 229).

Furthermore, the famous arbitrator indicated that the "degree of vigilance" required in proving the necessary protection and security would differ according to the circumstances.

In the absence of any higher standard provided for by Treaty, the general international law standard was stated to reflect the "degree of security reasonably expected". Max HUBER indicated in this respect:

Du moment que la vigilance exercée tombe manifestement au-dessous de ce niveau par rapport aux ressortissants d'un Etat étranger déterminé, ce dernier est en droit de se considérer comme lésé dans des intérêts qui doivent jouir de la protection du droit international (Rapport, U.N. Recueil des Sentences Arbitrales, vol. II, p. 634; and in Repertory..., op. cit., p. 426).

In implementation of said standard of vigilance "qu'au point de vue du droit international l'Etat est tenu de garantir", HUBER arrived in his award rendered on May 1, 1925 (Britanic Property case between Spain and the U.K.) to hold Spain responsible for: "manque de diligence dans la prévention des actes dommageables" (U.N. Recueil des Sentences..., op. cit., p. 645), and in the Melillea-Ziat, Ben Kiran case he went as far as to declare the authorities responsible for: "négligence qui friserait la complicité" (Ibid., p. 731).

74. Another reputed arbitrator and author, RALSTON acting as Umpire in the Sambiggo case between Italy and Venezuela, did not hesitate to declare:

The umpire .... accepts the rule that if in any case of reclamation submitted to him it is alleged and proved that Venezuelan authorities failed to exercise due diligence to prevent damages from being inflicted by revolutionists, that country should be held responsible (U.N. Recueil des Sentences Arbitrales, Vol. X, p.534).

75. On various other occasions, the State Responsibility had been admitted for failure to provide the required protection, as witnessed by the following examples:

- In the 1903 Kummerow case, the Germany/Venezuela Mixed Claims Commission declared:

substantially all the authorities on international law agree that a nation is responsible for acts of revolutionists under certain conditions such as lack of diligence, or negligence in failing to prevent such acts, when possible, or as far as possible to punish the wrongdoer and make reparation for the injuring (Repertory, op. cit., Vol I, p. 37);

- In Max HUBER's Report of 1925 on "the Individual Claims" (Spanish Zone of Morocco cases), he treated the failure to provide the necessary protection and security as an omission or inaction, and considered that:

l'on est fondé à envisager cette inaction comme un manquement à une obligation internationale (Repertory, vol. II, p. 430);

- In the 1926 Home Insurance Company case, the Mexico/USA General Claim Commission emphasized the importance of the "duty to protect", which required undertaking all "means reasonably necessary to accomplish that end" (Ibid., p. 433).

- In three successive years (1927, 1928, and 1929), the Mexico/USA General Claims Commission declared that the Mexican Government is to be responsible for what could be characterized as "lack of protection" in case this has been proven (the David Richards case (1927), the Oriental Navigation Co. case (1928), and the F.M. Smith case (1929), Repertory, vol. II, p. 435-437).

- In the Victor A. Ermerins case (1929), the Presiding Commissioner, Dr. SIND-BALLE, in response to the claim that the Mexican authorities failed "to afford protection to the interest of Ermerins", arrived at the conclusion that in the circumstances of that case:

a crime of this nature could not have taken place, if the authorities of the town had properly fulfilled their duty to afford protection to the property of Ermerins (U.N. reports of International Arbitral Awards, vol. IV, p. 476-477);

- In both the Chapman case and the Mrs. Mead case, adjudicated in 1930 by Mexico/USA General Claims Commission, in spite of the insufficiency of the records submitted, the Commission, relied on sworn affidavits and non-official reports introduced as evidence in order "to sustain the charge of lack of protection" (U.N. Reports, op. cit., Vol. IV, p. 639 and p. 656-657);

In the Dexter Balwin case (1933), the Panama/USA General Claims commission, condemned the local authorities's failure "to afford protection" (Repertory, vol. II, p. 442);

- In the 1937 two cases concerning Mr. Braumann and Frances Healey against the Republic of Turkey, the Government was declared responsible according to NIELSON's ruling on the basis that "reasonable care to prevent injuries" was not afforded (Ibid., p. 443-444).

76. In the light of all the above-mentioned arbitral precedents, it would be appropriate to consider that adequate protection afforded by the host State authorities constitutes a primary obligation, the failure to comply with which creates international responsibility. Furthermore, "there is an extensive and consistent state practice supporting the duty to exercise due diligence" (BROWNLIE, System of the Law of Nations, State Responsibility—Part I, Oxford, 1986, p. 162).

As a doctrinal authority, relied upon by both Parties during the various stages of their respective pleadings in the present case, Professor BROWNLIE stated categorically that:

There is general agreement among writers that the rule of non-responsibility cannot apply where the government concerned has failed to show due diligence (Principles of Public International Law, Third Edition, Oxford, 1979, p. 453).

After reviewing all categories of precedents, including more recent international judicial case-law, the learned Oxford University Professor arrived, not only to confirm that international responsibility arises from the mere "failure to exercise due diligence" in providing the required protection, but also to note “a sliding scale of liability related to the standard of due diligence” (State Responsibility, op. cit. p. 162 and p. 168).

In addition, special attention has to be given to the following passages of BROWNLIE’s writings which seem to be of particular relevance to the present case:

- “Unreasonable acts of violence by police officers ... also give rise to responsibility” (Principles, op. cit., p. 447);
- “Substantial negligence to take reasonable precautionary and preventive action” is deemed sufficient ground to create “responsibility for damage to foreign public and private property in the area” (Ibid., p. 452);
- In commenting the ICJ Judgment rendered in the Cofu case (1949), the fact that “nothing was attempted to prevent the disaster” was qualified as “grave omission” which involved the international responsibility of Albania (State Responsibility, op. cit., p. 154);
- With regard to the ICJ Judgment rendered in the Hostages case (1980), Professor BROWNLIE emphasizes Iran’s failure “to take appropriate steps to ensure the protection” required under the “full protection and security” provision of the Iran/U.S.A. Amity, Navigation and Commerce Treaty (Ibid., p. 157).

77. A number of other contemporary international law authorities noticed the “sliding scale”, from the old “subjective” criteria that takes into consideration the relatively limited existing possibilities of local authorities in a given context, towards an “objective” standard of vigilance in assessing the required degree of protection and security with regard to what should be legitimately expected to be secured for foreign investors by a reasonably well organized modern State.

As expressed by Professor FREEMAN, in his 1957 Lectures at the Hague Academy of International Law:

The “due diligence” is nothing more nor less than the reasonable measures of prevention which a well-administered government could be expected to exercise under similar circumstances (Responsibility of States..., op. cit., p. 15-16).

According to modern doctrine, the violation of international law entailing the State’s responsibility has to be considered constituted by “the mere lack or want of diligence”, without any need to establish malice or negligence (cf. C.F. AMERASINGHE, State Responsibility for Injuries to Aliens, Oxford, (1967), p. 281-282; F.V. GARCIA-AMADOR, The Changing Law of International Claims, vol. I, (1987), p. 115,118; M. BEDJAOUI, “Responsibility of States: Fault and Strict Liability”, Encyclopedia of Public International Law, vol. 10, (1987), p. 359; and K. ZEMANEK, “Responsibility of States: General Principles”, Ibid., p. 365).

78. In the light of the above-stated international law precedents and authorities, the arbitral Tribunal has to review the evidence submitted by both Parties in the present case in order to establish the proven facts, and to determine whether these facts sustain the Claimant’s allegation that the Respondent Government failed to comply with its obligation under the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty (particularly the standard provided for in Article 2.(2)), as well as by virtue of the rules governing State responsibility under general international law (which becomes necessarily applicable by virtue of the renvoi contained in Article 4.(1) of the Treaty)).

79. The Claimant’s case on the facts surrounding the events of January 28, 1987, as initially submitted can be summarized as follows:

- (a) - “During the later part of 1986 and into 1987, the Government of Sri Lanka was faced with grave difficulties because of terrorist activities, including terrorist activities in that part of the country which is near Serendib Seafoods, Ltd. farm” (Claimant’s Memorial, P. 7);
- (b) - The management of Serendib company had been closely cooperating “with the security authorities in the region”, and “was ready and willing to cooperate with the Government” (Ibid., p. 8-9);
- (c) - The destruction and killing which took place on January 28, 1987 “was caused by special security forces”, under circumstances which “strongly suggest that this incident was a wanton use of force not required by the exigencies of the situation and not planned pursuant to any combat action” (ibid., p. 8);
- (d) - The burning of Serendib’s “office structure, repair shed, store and dormitory”, the opening of the sluice gates to the grow-out ponds, thus destroying the shrimp crop, as well as the execution of “21 staff members of Serendib Staff”, was not needed since “less destructive action—short of wholesale destruction and murder—could surely have been taken by the Sri Lankan special security forces” (Ibid., p. 9 and 10).

In order to substantiate the Claimant’s version of the January 28th, 1987 events, a number of sworn affidavits were submitted with the Claimant’s Memorial, all emanating from the former Serendib employees or relatives of dead former employees, together with copies of two letters addressed by Serendib’s Managing Director to the President of the Republic on February 2, and February 9, 1987 (Exhibits form (F) to (P)).

80. In the Claimant’s Reply to Respondent’s Counter-Memorial, special additional emphasis was put on reiterating that “the destruction and the killings on January 28, 1987 were caused by the STF”, and the following supplemental points were particularly stressed:

- “the Serendib farm was not a terrorist facility”;
- “the STF did not meet with violent resistance from the farm on January 28, 1987”;
- “extensive combat action did not occur at the farm between terrorists and the STF”; and
- “that Respondent has admitted its liability by offering compensation payments to families of the staff members killed by the STF” (Claimant’s Reply, p. 72).

Among the documents attached to Claimant’s Reply to the Respondent’s Counter-Memorial, only one Exhibit related to the factual aspects of the events that took place on January 28, 1987, and during the following days was submitted as "Exhibit 00". The document in question contains a letter addressed to the Managing Director of Serendib Company by the Batticaloa District Citizen's Committee about the results of the visit of the farm that took place on February 10, 1987.

81. Furthermore, the only person who gave testimony in front of the Tribunal during the oral phase of the arbitration proceedings was the Managing Director of Serendib Company, Mr. Victor Santiapillai, whose two letters to the President of the Republic were submitted as evidence by the Claimant according to what has been previously indicated (Claimant's Exhibits (M) and (P)).

Mr. Santiapillai was examined by the Claimant's Counsel and cross-examined by the Respondent's Counsel.

82. The Respondent's case provided a different version of the facts, which can be summarized as follows:

- (a) - "The Government of Sri Lanka was seeking ways to prevent the spread of terrorism and the erosion of Government control in the towns surrounding the shrimp farm" (Government's Counter-Memorial, p. 3);
- (b) - "that the Serendib farm was, in the months preceding the operation (of January 28, 1987), used by Tiger rebels as a base of operations and support" (Ibid., p. 4);
- (c) - "That the farm's management cooperated with the Tigers (Ibid., p. 4)
- (d) - "That operating out of the farm (and the surrounding area) the Tigers violently resisted the Special Task Force raid", and "intense combat action occurred at the farm between the Tigers and the special Task Force during the raid" (Ibid., p. 4);
- (e) - "Any destruction of the farm which occurred was caused directly by terrorist action (in particular, mortar fire), and not by the Special Task force" (ibid., p. 41).

83. During the first exchange of the written pleadings, the Respondent's case on the facts concerning the events of January 28, 1987 relied exclusively on three Exhibits submitted with the Counter-Memorial, which contain:

- (i) - Document containing the Report of Assistant Superintendent Nimal Lewke, dated February 2, 1987, and addressed to his superior, Superintendent Karunasena, Commander of the Special Task Force (Exhibit No. 34);
- (ii) - Document dated February 1, 1987, by virtue of which the Operation's Commander Superintendent Karunasena addressed his Report to his superior, Superintendent Sumith Silva, the Coordinating Officer of Batticaloa (Exhibit No. 35); and
- (iii) - Three internal correspondence within the General Intelligence & Security Department of the Ministry of Defense, dated successively February 3, 1987, February 9, 1987, and March 18, 1987, all related to the fate of Serendib's prawns which were in the farm ponds and disappeared after the farm's destruction on January 28, 1987 (Exhibit No. 36).

84. The text of the Respondent's Rejoinder contained no new elaboration on the facts, but its enclosures comprised two additional Exhibits related to the events of January 28, 1987, which are:

- (i) - A sworn affidavit dated October 17, 1988 (Exhibit No. 38) emanating from the same Mr. Karunasena, the author of the report previously submitted as Exhibit No. 35; and
- (ii) - A sworn affidavit dated also October 17, 1988 (Exhibit No. 39), emanating from Mr. Sumith Silva, the area Coordinating Officer to whom Mr. Karunasena's Report has been previously submitted.

85. Exercising its recognized prerogatives with regard to the evaluation of the entire evidence submitted by both Parties taken as a whole, and after careful consideration of all arguments raised during the proceedings related to the factual aspects of the case, the Arbitral Tribunal came to the following conclusions:

- (A) - Both Parties are in agreement about one fact; that the infiltration by the rebels of the area in which Serendib's farm was located took such magnitude that the entire district had been for several months before January 1987 practically out of the Government's control.

Though such admitted situation would have raised logically the question of whether there was during that period failure from the Government's part to provide "full protection and security" according to the objective standard suggested to be applicable, said question remains theoretical since there were no claimed "losses suffered" due to the lack of governmental protection throughout that period.

- (B) - The Respondent never contested the evidence given by Mr. Santiapillai, neither during the written phase of the proceedings, nor when he gave his testimony at the Oral Hearing, about what he expressed in his letter of February 2, 1987, addressed the Sri Lankan President of the Republic by stating:

we maintained very cordial relationship with the senior officers of the security forces in Batticaloa, repeatedly told them that, if they had the slightest reservation about any of our Batticaloa staff they should let us know quietly and we would take action directly to get such persons out of the company.

More importantly, Mr. Santiapillai, indicated that:

On last visit to Batticaloa, (he) met Sumith de Silva, Coordinating Officer for the area, on January 17, 1987, (and) introduced (to him) the new Farm Manager (Mr. Karunargy), who was appointed on 1 January 1987 Farm Manager, after having worked for the Company since its inception.

He added, that during that visit to Mr. Sumith de Silva on January 17, 1987, the latter:

assured me ... that he had no such reservation.

In his Affidavit prepared and sworn in October 1988; i.e. after Mr. Santiapillai's letter was produced as evidence by the Claimant in the present case, the same Mr. Sumith de Silva did not contest that the meeting in question took place at the indicated date (just 10 days before the January 28, 1987 operation), he did not contradict the substance of the reported discussion, and he did not deny the existence of "cordial relationship" as manifested by making "enquiries from government officials" before recruiting staff and readiness to dismiss whoever the authorities have "the slightest reservation" about him.

In the light of said uncontested evidence, the Tribunal is of the opinion that reasonably the Government should have at least tried to use such peaceful available high level channel of communication in order to get any suspect elements excluded from the farm's staff. This would have been essential to minimize the risks of killings and destruction when planning to undertake a vast military counter-insurgency operation in that area for regaining lost control.

The Tribunal notes in this respect that the failure to resort to such precautionary measures acquires more significance when taking into consideration that such measures fall within the normal exercise of governmental inherent powers—as a public authority—entitled to order undesirable persons out from security sensitive areas. The failure became particularly serious when the highest executive officer of the Company reconfirmed just ten days before his willingness to comply with any governmental requests in this respect.

Accordingly, the Tribunal considers that the Respondent through said inaction and omission violated its due diligence obligation which requires undertaking all possible measures that could be reasonably expected to prevent the eventual occurrence of killings and property destructions.

- (c)- There are no reasons to doubt the Respondent's submission regarding the long planned character of the January 28, 1987 operation given the code-name "Day Break" which obtained prior high level clearance. But the Tribunal does not consider the military reports prepared at a later date conclusive evidence with regard to the alleged heavy firing coming "from the direction of the Prawn Farm", or that "the enemy hold up in the Farm" and resisted the security forces during a period over two hours.

The reports of the two officers are contradicted on these specific points by the information contained in the affidavits sworn by Mr. Kirupakara, the casual worker at Serendib farm (Exhibit F), and by Mr. Selbatnamby, the tractor driver at Serendib farm. Both provide more detailed account as eye-witnesses about what effectively happened on the spot with extreme rapidity between 7.45 in the morning, when gunfire came "in the direction of the office" causing the employees to "rush into the Farm office for shelter", and 8.00, when "three officers attached to the STF entered the office". The taking-over of the Farm by the security forces faced no resistance according to these two eye-witnesses, and there were no destructions at that time, as witnessed by the fact that the tractor driver returned later in the day to the Farm with four members of the security forces to take certain equipments from the Farm Office, which implies that it remained non-destroyed till then.

Moreover, it has to be noted that of the officers' reports raise certain issue of credibility with regard to their chronological order, since unexpectedly the commander of the operation, Mr. Karunasena who was observing from a helicopter reported to his superior the Area Coordinating Officer Sumith de Silva on February 1, 1987, before receiving any report from his assistant Mr. Lewke who effectively conducted on the ground the operation of taking over the farm facilities (the latter's report is dated February 2, 1987).

Therefore, the Respondent's version of the events has to be considered lacking convincing evidence with regard to the allegation that the farm became a "terrorist facility" which "violently resisted the Special Task Force" through an "intense combat action" that "occurred at the Farm".

Apparently, the officers' version of the events, which are not substantiated with any credible evidence, and which are contradicted by the Affidavits submitted by eye-witnesses, were intended to cover up their inability to prevent the destruction of the farm.

- (d) - Neither Party succeeded in providing the Tribunal with convincing evidence about: (i)—the circumstances under which the destruction of the premises took place after they came under the control of the governmental forces; (ii)—who are the persons responsible for the effective destruction of the farm premises; (iii)—how was the destruction committed; and (iv)—how the subsequent acts causing the loss of the prawns in ponds took place.

The Respondent could have at least provided the results of investigations conducted in this respect by the competent Sri Lankan authorities, particularly since all the events in question took place during the two weeks period when the farm was under the exclusive control of the security forces.

In final analysis, no conclusive evidence exists sustaining the Claimant's allegation that the special security forces were themselves the actors of said destruction causing the losses suffered.

At the same time no conclusive evidence sustains the Respondent's allegation that the destruction were "caused directly by the terrorist action".

Hence, the adjudication of the State's responsibility has to be undertaken by determining whether the governmental forces were capable, under the prevailing circumstances, to provide adequate protection that could have prevented the destructions from taking place totally or partially.

In this respect, it has been already indicated that the governmental authorities should have undertaken important precautionary measures to get peacefully all suspected persons out of Serendib's farm before launching the attack, either through voluntary cooperation with the Management of the company or by ordering the Company to expel the suspected persons.

The reports of Messrs. Lewke, Karumasena, and Silva, as well as the sworn affidavits of the last two senior officers, provide certain indications that the governmental authorities failed to undertake such measures because they were considering as suspected guerrilla supporters the entire Management of Serendib Company, starting from the newly appointed farm manager Mr. Karunargy, up to the American Manager, Mr. Bruce Cyr. Even Mr. Santiapillai the Managing Director was accused of "complicity with LLTE as far as the management of the Prawn Farm is concerned" (Paragraph 8, of the Report of the Commandant/STF dated March 18, 1987, Respondent's Exhibit No. 37, which referred to "evidence" against the Managing Director to that effect).

If this had been effectively the case, in the opinion of the Tribunal, the legitimate expected course of action against those suspected persons would have been either to institute judicial investigations against them to prove their culpability or innocence, or to undertake the necessary measures in order to get them off the Company's farm. But, as previously explained, nothing of the sort took place. On the contrary, only ten days before the January 28, 1987, operation no complaints were voiced against any of them, including the newly appointed farm manager Mr. Karunargy, during the meeting of Mr. Santiapillai with the Area Coordinating Officer Mr. Sumith de Silva. The mere fact that Mr. Karunargy had been the first person who lost his life during the first hours of the operation "Day Break", under the circumstances described by Mr. Kirupakara in his Affidavit (Claimant's Exhibit F) and Mr. Selbathnamny in his Affidavit (Claimant's Exhibit G), casts serious doubts about the ability of the security forces which took control over Serendib's farm to provide the required standard of protection in preventing human losses, or a fortiori of property destruction, which is by far a less imperative objective.

Therefore, and faced with the impossibility of obtaining conclusive evidence about what effectively caused the destruction of the farm premises during the period in which the entire area was out of bounds under the exclusive control of the governmental security force, the Tribunal considers the State's responsibility established in conformity with the previously stated international law rules of evidence (especially Rules (L) and (M), supra § 56).

86. For all the legal and factual considerations contained in the present section of the award, the Tribunal came to the conclusion that the Respondent's responsibility is established under international law.

IV—The Legal Consequences of the Respondent's International Responsibility

(A)—Quantum of the compensation

87. Both Parties are in agreement that whenever the State's responsibility is established, due to failure of its authorities to provide foreign investors with the full protection and security required under the relevant international law rules and standards, the interested party becomes entitled to claim the type of remedy deemed appropriate, which takes in the present case the form of monetary compensation (Respondent's Counter-Memorial, p. 28–29, p. 39, p. 40, p. 42 ss; and Government's Rejoinder, p. 11 ss).

88. Both Parties are equally in agreement about the principle, according to which, in case of property destruction, the amount of the compensation due has to be calculated in a manner that adequately reflects the full value of the investment lost as a result of said destruction and the damages incurred as a result thereof.

The basic rule long established in this respect was clearly formulated by Max Huber in the 1925 Melilla-Ziat, Ben Kim case in the following words:

Le dommage éventuellement remboursable ne pourrait être que le dommage direct, à savoir la valeur de marchandises détruites ou disparues (U.N. Reports of International Arbitration Awards, vol. II, p. 732).

Thus, the task of the Tribunal in the present case has to focus on the determination of the "value" of the Claimant's right which suffered losses due to the destruction that took place on January 28, 1987, and throughout the following days during which Serendib's farm remained under governmental temporary occupation (unjustifiably characterized by the Claimant as de facto "requisition", since it has not been proven that the Government used the farm to promote its own military interests and to benefit thereof).

89. Disagreement among the two Parties to the present arbitration emerges only with regard to the following two major points:

- (i) - Which elements have to be taken into consideration in calculating the Claimant's property rights to be compensated; and
- (ii) - What quantum reflects the full value of the elements constituting the Claimant's property right to be compensated.

90. With regard to the first point, the elements enumerated in the Claimant's Memorial included the following:

- (A) - 50% of the physical direct losses sustained by Serendib Company on January 28, 1987, which comprise:
  - (1) - loss of revenue from stocks of shrimp existing by then in the ponds;
  - (2) - value of farm structure and equipment destroyed, damaged or missing;
  - (3) - loss of investment in technical staff training at the farm;
  - (4) - compensation payable to dependents of dead staff members;
  - (5) - pond rehabilitation to resume operations.
- (B) - The "going concern value" of the Claimant's 50% share-holding percentage in Serendib Company on January 28, 1987.
- (C) - 50% of the projected lost profits for a reasonable period of 18 months (Claimant's Memorial, p. 14–16).

91. According to the final form submitted by the end of the oral hearing on April 19, 1989, expressing the Claimant's conclusions, the Tribunal was requested to award AAPL compensation that includes the following elements:

- (A) - 48.2% of the value of assets destroyed, comprising

- (1) - physical assets;
  - (2) - financial assets;
  - (3) - intangible assets.
- (B) - 48.2% of Serendib's net projected future earnings.

92. The Respondent's Counter-Memorial, emphasized the following important aspects:

- (i) - AAPL's Claims is "largely based on the illusion of expected profitability" (Government's Counter-Memorial, p. 42);
- (ii) - AAPL's claim "is based on blatant double (or triple) counting. AAPL claims entitlement not only to its share of "going concern value" of Serendib, but also to indemnification for physical losses and lost prospective profits. Yet AAPL cannot be entitled to both, because any measurement of the "going concern value" of Serendib on January 28, 1987, includes a valuation of the net book value of both Serendib's assets and its future profitability" (Ibid., p. 43);
- (iii) - "In the event the Tribunal finds the Government liable to AAPL for damage sustained by Serendib, the Tribunal must chose either to undertake a going concern valuation or to determine damages for "physical loss" and lost prospective profits, but cannot logically award both" (Ibid., p. 43).

93. During the course of the proceedings, the Respondent added another basic objection according to which the percentage of AAPL's share-holding in Serendib is neither 50% as initially claimed, nor 48.2% as subsequently admitted, but a far lesser percentage, since the "preference shares" of the Export Development Board should be taken into consideration as an integral part of Serendib's equity capital.

94. The Parties were invited by the Tribunal to express their considered opinions and conclusions on that issue, by virtue of the Order of April 20, 1989, rendered at the end of the oral hearing, and lengthy exchanges took place in this respect on May 22, and May 29, 1989 as previously indicated (supra, § 1.2).

95. In deciding on the issues under consideration which are subject to disagreement among the Parties, the Tribunal has primarily to indicate that AAPL is entitled in the present arbitration case to claim compensation under the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty, on the legal grounds previously described in Part II of this award due to the fact that the Claimant's "investments" in Sri Lanka "suffered losses" owing to events falling under one or more of the circumstances enumerated by Article 4.(1) of the Treaty ("revolution, state of national emergence, revolt, insurrection", etc....).

The undisputed "investments" effected since 1985 by AAPL in Sri Lanka are in the form of acquiring shares in Serendib Company, which has been incorporated in Sri Lanka under the domestic Companies Law.

Accordingly, the Treaty protection provides no direct coverage with regard to Serendib's physical assets as such ("farm structures and equipment", "shrimp stock in ponds", cost of "training the technical staff", etc.), or to the intangible assets of Serendib if any ("good will", "future profitability", etc...). The scope of the international law protection granted to the foreign investor in the present case is limited to a single item: the value of his share-holding in the joint-venture entity (Serendib Company).

96. In the absence of a stock market at which the price for Serendib's shares were quoted on January 27, 1987 (the day preceding the events which led to the destruction of the value of AAPL's investment in Serendib's capital), the evaluation of the shares owned by AAPL in Serendib has to be established by the alternative method of determining what was the reasonable price a willing purchaser would have offered to AAPL to acquire its share holding in Serendib.

97. Certainly, all the physical assets of Serendib, as well as its intangible assets, have to be taken into consideration in establishing the reasonable value of what the potential purchaser could have been willing to offer on January 27, 1987 for acquiring AAPL's shares in Serendib. But the reasonable price should have reflected also Serendib's global liability at that date; i.e. the aggregate amount of the current debts, loans, interests, etc... due to Serendib's creditors.

98. Consequently, the Tribunal is of the opinion that the determination of the percentage of AAPL's share-holding in Serendib's capital is a false problem, since the relevant factor is to establish a comprehensive balance sheet which reflects the result of assessing the global assets of Serendib in comparison with all the outstanding indebtedness thereof at the relevant time.

For the purpose of evaluating the market price of AAPL's shares on January 27, 1987, the result would be ultimately the same whether or not the "preference shares" of Sri Lanka's Export Development Board technically qualify under the domestic companies law as part of Serendib's capital. Assuming that the correct legal interpretation of the Sri Lankan Law would lead to include among Serendib's capital assets the value of the "preference shares" issued in favour of the Export Development Board as a security for the cash money funds already supplied to the Company, Serendib's capital assets would have on one hand, to be considered increased. But on the other hand, the global amount of the Development Board's disbursements together with the accruing interests due on January 27, 1987, should be taken into consideration in reflecting Serendib's global indebtedness.

In other words, in case the "preference shares" of Export Development Board decrease AAPL's percentage of share-holding in Serendib's equity capital, this would not ultimately affect the value of AAPL's share-holding.

In the language of figures, a 48% ordinary share-holding is an equity capital amounting to 21,464,241 Sri Lankan Rupees (S-L.Rs) equals 37% share-holding in an entity having a total capital of S-L.Rs 28,184,241 (i.e. by adding the value of the preferences shares).

At the other side of the equation, assuming 48% of loan liabilities totalling S-L.Rs 70,024,000, is the same as acquiring 37% of the global indebtedness amounting to S-L.Rs 76,744,000.

99. Taking into consideration the above stated preliminary remarks of general character, the Tribunal is faced with no legal objections in allocating to the Claimant compensation for the damages which were effectively incurred due to the destruction of a substantial part of Serendib's physical assets, thus rendering the legal entity in which AAPL invested out of business since January 28, 1987. In essence, Serendib ceased as of that date to be a "going concern" capable of realizing profits, thus causing AAPL's investment therein to become a total loss.

100. In the light of all the elements of evidence provided by both Parties, including the evaluation Report of Coopers & Lybrand, the additional explanation pertaining thereto (filed by AAPL as Exhibit BB), the Respondent's objections raised in the Government's Rejoinder (p. 17ss), as well as those other issues raised during the Oral Hearing, particularly in cross-examination of the Claimant's advisor Mr. Deva Rodrigo which led to revised evaluation figures submitted by the Claimant before the end of the Oral hearing, the Tribunal considers that the fair evaluation exclusively based on Serendib's tangible assets leads to value AAPL's investment in that company at a total amount of 460,000 U.S. Dollars.

101. Nevertheless, the major part of the Claimant's pleas were directed towards obtaining 5,703,667 U.S. dollars as compensation for a variety of other claimed damages, which include intangible assets, mainly "goodwill", and loss of future profits.

The admissibility of such claims raised serious legal objections from the Respondent, which are expressed in the following two quotations:

- (a) - "International arbitral tribunals are bound to project future on the basis of the past, Serendib's history offers no sound basis for projecting any future profitability" (Counter-Memorial of the Government, p. 49);
- (b) - "The loss of crops to be harvested in the future has usually been considered to be too speculative and indefinite to be included as a proper element of damage under international law" (Ibid., p. 50).

102. In the Tribunal's view, it is clearly understood that the evaluation of the "going concern" which is Serendib Company in the present case, has for unique objective the determination of what could be the reasonable market value of the Company's shares under the circumstances prevailing on January 27, 1987. Hence, as a general rule all elements related to subsequent developments should not be taken as such into consideration, and lucrum cessans in the proper sense could not be allocated in the present case for which the precedents concerning unlawful expropriation claims or liability for unilateral termination of a State contract are of no relevance.

The only pertinent question in the present case would be to establish whether Serendib have had by then developed a "good will" and a standard of "profitability" that renders a prospective purchaser prepared to pay a certain premium over the value of the tangible assets for the benefit of the Company's "intangible" assets.

Consequently, the projection of future profits in function of the "Discounted Cash Flow Method" (DCF) has to be envisaged simply as a tool to assess the level of Serendib's future profitability under all relevant circumstances prevailing at the beginning of 1987.

103. In this respect, it would be appropriate to ascertain that "goodwill" requires the prior presence on the market for at least two or three years, which is the minimum period needed in order to establish continuing business connections, and during that period substantial expenses are incurred in supporting the management efforts devoted to create and develop the marketing network of the company's products, particularly in cases like the present one where the Company relies exclusively on one product (shrimps) exportable to a single market (Japan).

The possible existence of a valuable "goodwill" becomes even more difficult to sustain with regard to a company, not only newly formed and with no records of profits, but also incurring losses and under-capitalized.

A reasonable prospective purchaser would, under these circumstances, be at least doubtful about the ability of the Company's balance sheet to cease being in the red, in the sense that the future earnings become effectively sufficient to off-set the past losses as well as to service the loans which exceed in their magnitude the Company's capital assets.

104. Furthermore, according to a well established rule of international law, the assessment of prospective profits requires the proof that:

"they were reasonably anticipated; and that the profits anticipated were probable and not merely possible" (Marjorie M. WHITEMAN, Damages in International Law, vol. II, (1937), p. 1837, with reference to extensive supporting precedents disallowing "uncertain" or "speculative" future profits, p. 1836-1849; The 1902 Award rendered in EL Triunfo case (EL Salvador/U.S.A.), Repertory, op.cit., vol. I, § 1350, p. 324; The 1903 Award rendered by the Italy/Venezuela Mixed Commission in the Poggidi case, Ibid. § 1358, p. 328-329; Ignaz SEIDEL-HOHENVELDOERN, "L'Evaluation des Dommages dans les Arbitrages Transnationaux", Annuaire Français de Droit International, vol. XXXIII, (1987), p. 17 ss. with ample reference to the numerous decisions rendered by the Iran/USA Claims Tribunal to that effect, and interestingly the Author's reference to the DCF calculations provided by the Expert Accountants of the Parties which contain "élément de conjecture" looking: "guère moins spéculatifs et tout aussi obscurs que les prophéties de Nostradamus" P. 24).

105. The Claimant itself, in the Reply to the Respondent's Counter-Memorial (p. 64-68), reproduced a long quotation from the Award rendered on July 14, 1987, by the Chamber presided by the late Michel VIRALLY, in the case AMOCO International Finance Corporation v. Iran, which after clearly distinguishing the lucrum cessans from the "future prospects" of profitability that constitutes an element to be taken into consideration in evaluating the "going concern", find necessary to emphasize the need to prove that:

the undertaking was a "going concern" which had demonstrated a certain ability to earn revenues and was, therefore to be considered as keeping such ability for the future ( § 203 of the Award as quoted on p. 67 of the Claimant's Reply).

The fact that Serendib exported for the first time two shipments to Japan during the same month of January 1987 when its farm was destroyed, does not sufficiently demonstrate in the Tribunal's opinion "a certain ability to earn revenues" in a manner that would justify considering Serendib—by exporting for the first time in its short life—able to keep itself commercially viable as a source of reliable supply on the Japanese market.

106. In the light of the above-stated considerations, and taking into account all the evidence introduced by both Parties with regard to the existence or non-existence of "intangible assets" capable of being evaluated for the purpose of establishing the total appropriate value of Serendib on January 27, 1987, the Tribunal comes to the conclusion that neither the "goodwill" nor the "future profitability" of Serendib could be reasonably established with a sufficient degree of certainty.

107. Without putting into doubt the binding force of the rules requiring that the intangible assets including "goodwill" and "future profitability" of an enterprise have to be reflected in the evaluation of a "going concern", the Tribunal's opinion is established on considering the assumptions upon which the Claimant's projection were based in the present case insufficient in evidencing that Serendib was effectively by January 27, 1987, a "going concern" that acquired a valuable "goodwill" and enjoying a proven "future profitability", particularly in the light of the fact that Serendib had no previous record in conducting business for even one year of production.

108. Therefore, all the amounts of claimed compensation for "intangible assets", as well as for "future earnings" are rejected.

(B)—The issue of AAPL's Guarantee to the European Asian Bank

109. Evidently, the present Arbitral Tribunal does not have jurisdiction to adjudicate any controversy or dispute related to the interpretation of AAPL's Guarantee given for the benefit of Serendib in AAPL's capacity as share-holder in Serendib Company, in order to determine whether said Guarantee came to an end or is still operative and capable of creating potential liability on AAPL.

110. Nevertheless, the Tribunal takes into consideration that AAPL as Claimant in the present Arbitration has considered its investment in Serendib a total loss, and submitted in its final conclusions dated April 19, 1989, that:

... AAPL is willing to give up its shares of Serendib Seafoods Ltd, should the Respondent pay adequate compensation.

The Tribunal equally notes that the Respondent Government did not raise any objection, with regard to said offer.

111. Accordingly, the Tribunal deems appropriate to invite the two Parties to envisage, upon reception of the amounts becoming due to the Claimant by virtue of the present Award, to conclude an agreement according to which AAPL undertakes all the necessary steps in order to transfer free of charge all its shares in Serendib

Company to the Government of Sri Lanka or to any other entity the Government may nominate, with the understanding that said transfer of title on the shares entails in exchange the passing of any potential liability under the European Asian Bank Guarantee from AAPL to the new owner of the shares.

(C)—The allocation Of Interest

112. The Claimant requested interest at the rate of 10% per annum as of the date of the losses incurred (January 28, 1987), and the Respondent did not raise any objection with regard to, either the principle of entitlement to interests in case the Government's responsibility is sustained by the Tribunal, or to the suggested rate of 10% per annum.

113. In accordance with a long established rule of international law expressed since 1872 by the Arbitral Tribunal which adjudicated the Alabama case between the U.K. and U.S.A., "it is just and reasonable to allow interest at a reasonable rate" (Reportory, op.cit., vol. I, § 1382, p. 343).

In implementation of the above-stated rule, and in view of the Parties' attitude indicated herein-above, the present Tribunal deems appropriate to allocate interest on the amount of U.S. $460,000 granted to the Claimant as previously stipulated (§ 100), at the rate of 10% per annum.

114. The only pending issue in this respect relates to the date from which that interest starts accruing.

The survey of the literature reveals that, in spite of the persisting controversies with regard to cases involving moratory interests, the case-law elaborated by international arbitral tribunals strongly suggests that in assessing the liability due for losses incurred the interest becomes an integral part of the compensation itself, and should run consequently from the date when the State's international responsibility became engaged (cf. R. LILLICH, "Interest in the Law of International Claims", Essays in Honor of Vade Saario and Toivo Sainio, (1983), P. 55-56.

115. Therefore, and taking into account that Article 8.(3) of the Sri Lanka/U.K. Bilateral Investment Treaty provides that the foreign investor becomes entitled to file a recourse in front of the Centre only in case agreement with the Host State "cannot be reached within three months", and since the claimant in the present case effectively submitted his Request of Arbitration on the 8th of July, 1987, the Tribunal rules that the 10% per annum rate of interest adopted starts accruing as of July 9th, 1987, and continues to run as a part of the compensation allocated to the Claimant up to the date of the payment of the sum awarded.

116. In implementation of Article 61.(2) of ICSID Convention, the Tribunal exercises the discretionary power accorded thereto in the following manner:

- (i) - in assessing the fees and expenses incurred by the Claimant in preparation and presentation of its case, all the amounts figuring in AAPL's final Statement of May 7, 1990 under Items 1, 4, 5 and 6 in the Section entitled "Statement of expenditure incurred by AAPL and its officers" have to be excluded, since they are not proven necessary "in connection with the proceedings", and the rest which is totalling U.S. $164,917.20 (One Hundred, Sixty Four Thousands, Nine hundred Seventeen, and Twenty Cents) has to be shared on the basis of two thirds by the Claimant and one third by the Respondent;
- (ii) - the Respondent has to bear all the fees and expenses incurred in preparation and presentation of its case;
- (iii) - the costs of the arbitration, including the arbitrators' fees and the administrative charges of the Centre, have to be shared on the basis of 40% by the Claimant and 60% by the Respondent.

For the above-stated reasons:

THE TRIBUNAL DECIDES AS FOLLOWS:

1. The Republic of Sri Lanka shall pay to Asian Agricultural Products Ltd., the sum of U.S. Dollars FOUR HUNDRED AND SIXTY THOUSAND (U.S. $ 460,000) with interest on this amount at the rate of ten percent (10%) per annum from July 9, 1987 to the date of effective payment.

2. The Two Parties are invited to envisage adopting a solution that would permit, upon reception of the payment due under the preceding paragraph, to conclude an agreement according to which Asian Agricultural Products Ltd. undertakes all the steps required in order to transfer free of charge all its shares in Serendib SEA-FOODS LTD. to the Government of Sri Lanka or any other entity the Government may nominate, provided that in exchange the new owner of the shares assumes any potential liability under the European Asian Bank Guarantee previously granted by AAPL as shareholder to the benefit of Serendib Company.

3. All other submissions of the Parties are rejected.

4. The Republic of Sri Lanka shall bear the amount of U.S. $54,972.40 (Fifty Four Thousands Nine Hundred Seventy Two, and Forty Cents) which represents one third of the relevant fees and expenses incurred by Asian Agricultural Products Ltd. for the preparation and presentation of its case.

5. The Republic of Sri Lanka shall bear the fees and expenses it incurred for the preparation and presentation of its case.

6. The Republic of Sri Lanka shall bear sixty percent (60%) of the arbitrators' fees and expenses and the charges of use of the facilities of the Centre, and the remaining forty percent (40%) shall be borne by Asian Agricultural Products Ltd.

Ahmed S. EL-KOSHERI

Berthold GOLDMAN

Signed by both arbitrators forming the majority of the Arbitral Tribunal on 21 June 1990, after taking notice of Dr. ASANTE's Dissenting Opinion dated 15 June 1990.

Facts

F1 On 11 June 1975 the United Kingdom and Egypt entered into an Agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the Arab Republic of Egypt for the Promotion and Protection of Investments (UK/Egypt) (11 June 1975), entered into force 24 February 1976 ('Egypt-UK BIT') whereby Egypt and the UK promised to create favourable conditions for nationals or companies of the other contracting party to invest in its territory.

F2 On 8 August 1989, Wena Hotels Ltd, an English company ('Wena'), entered into a Lease and Development Agreement with the Egyptian Hotels Company ('EHC'), a company wholly owned by the Egyptian government. Pursuant to the Lease and Development Agreement, Wena was to operate and manage the Luxor Hotel in Luxor, Egypt for a period of 21 years and six months. The agreement also required Wena to upgrade and expand the hotel facilities. On 28 January 1990, Wena entered into a similar agreement with EHC to operate and manage the Nile Hotel in Cairo, Egypt—together, the 'Lease Agreements'.

F3 On 1 October 1989, Wena entered into a related agreement with both EHC and the Egyptian Ministry of Tourism whereby Wena agreed to train Egyptian nationals in hotel management in the UK.

F4 On 20 August 1989, Wena entered into a consultancy agreement with Mr Kandil, the Chairman of EHC. Under the terms of the consultancy agreement, Mr Kandil was to advise and assist Wena in relation to the opportunities available for the development of other hotel business opportunities in Egypt. Between 18 August 1989 and 30 January 1990, Wena made a total of £52,000 in payments to Mr Kandil. On 26 March 1991 Wena initiated a lawsuit against Mr Kandil for allegedly breaching the consultancy agreement.

F5 Shortly after entering into the Lease Agreements, disputes arose between EHC and Wena concerning their respective obligations under these agreements. Wena claimed that the condition of the two hotels was far below the standard stipulated in the Lease Agreements and withheld part of the rent due. In response, EHC claimed that Wena failed to pay the rent due under the Lease Agreements and therefore liquidated the performance security posted by Wena.

F6 On 3 May 1990, Wena instituted arbitration proceedings in Egypt against EHC arising out of the disputes over the Luxor Hotel. In an award dated 14 November 1990 an ad hoc Tribunal ordered EHC to make repairs to the Luxor Hotel and ordered Wena to fulfil its rental obligations. Wena applied to the local courts to have the award set aside.

F7 On 27 March 1991, EHC's Board of Directors met to discuss the course of action to be taken in relation to Wena's withholding of rent. The decision was taken to terminate the leases on both hotels and this course of action was confirmed by a resolution of the Chairman of the Board of EHC on 30 March 1991. EHC attempted to inform Wena of its decision but there was no evidence that this information was received by Wena prior to 1 April 1991.

F8 On 1 April 1991, EHC staff attacked both the Luxor and Nile hotels and forcefully took possession of both hotels from Wena. From 1 April 1991 through to 25 February 1992, the Nile Hotel remained in the control of EHC. The Luxor Hotel remained in EHC's control until 21 April 1992. During this time, Wena made efforts to regain control of the hotels by seeking assistance from officials in the United States and UK as well as Egyptian officials.

F9 Egypt, through its Minister of Tourism, Fouad Sultan, acknowledged that the seizure of the Luxor and Nile hotels was illegal and wrong. However, Egypt did not take any action to return possession of the hotels to Wena, to punish EHC or its officials, or to withdraw the hotels licenses so that EHC could not operate the hotels.

F10 On the 16 January 1992 the Chief prosecutor of Egypt ruled that attacks against the Nile Hotel were illegal and that Wena was entitled to repossess the hotel. However, it was not until 25 February 1992 the Nile Hotel was actually returned to Wena's control. The Nile Hotel was handed over to Wena with all the furniture and fixtures removed. Two days before the Nile Hotel was returned to Wena, the Ministry of Tourism cancelled the operating license of the Nile Hotel for alleged safety violations. Wena never operated the Nile Hotel again and it was placed in judicial receivership in 1997.

F11 On 21 April 1992, the Chief Prosecutor of Egypt ruled that attacks against the Luxor Hotel were also illegal and ordered that the hotel should be returned to Wena. On 28 April Wena re-entered the Hotel. However, the Ministry of Tourism denied Wena a permanent operating licence for the hotel instead only granting it a series of temporary licenses.

F12 Wena subsequently sought compensation from Egypt as a result of its loss of possession of both hotels. However, Egypt denied the requests.

F13 On 10 July 1998, Wena filed a request for arbitration with the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes ('ICSID'). Wena sought the following relief: A declaration that Egypt breached its obligations to Wena pursuant to the Egypt-UK BIT by illegally expropriating Wena's investments and failing to accord Wena's investments fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security; An order that Egypt pay damages in an amount no less than USD $62,820,000; And an order that Egypt pay Wena's costs associated with the arbitration.

F14 Egypt originally raised four objections to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. Egypt claimed that: Wena, although incorporated in the UK, should be treated as an Egyptian company by virtue of its ownership; Wena had made no investment in Egypt as required by Article 25 of the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes Between States and Nationals of Other States (18 March 1965) 575 UNTS 159, entered into force 14 October 1966 ('ICSID Convention'); There was no legal dispute between the parties as required by Article 25 of the ICSID Convention; And Wena's consent to arbitration was insufficient and the Request for Arbitration was premature because Wena failed to comply with the three month waiting period required by the Egypt-UK BIT.

F15 Egypt withdrew two of its four objections at the hearing on jurisdiction. In its decision dated 29 June 1999 (Decision on jurisdiction; Wena Hotels Ltd v Egypt, ICSID Case No ARB/98/4; IIC 272 (1999); 41 ILM 881 (2002), 25 May 1999), the Tribunal concluded that Egypt's two remaining jurisdictional objections should be denied and jurisdiction should be exercised over the dispute.

F16 Egypt did not dispute that the repossession by EHC of the Luxor and Nile hotels and EHC's eviction of Wena from the hotels on 1 April 1991 was wrong. However, Egypt denied liability for the claims asserted by Wena by raising two affirmative defences. First, Egypt asserted that Wena's claims in relation to the seizure of the hotels were time barred by virtue of Article 172(i) of the Egyptian Civil Code (Egypt) ('Civil Code').

F17 Second, Egypt alleged that Wena had sought to improperly influence the Chairman of the EHC, Mr Kandil with respect to the award of the Lease Agreements by illegally granting him the consultancy agreement. Egypt asserted that Wena's actions amounted to corruption and that Wena could now not claim compensation for the loss of its interests in the Lease Agreements because the Lease Agreements had been obtained improperly.

Held

H1 Whilst there was no clear evidence that Egypt—other than EHC officials—had participated in the seizures of the two hotels, there was substantial evidence that Egypt was aware of EHC's intentions and took no action to prevent the seizure of the hotels.

H2 Once the seizures had taken place, neither the police nor the Ministry of Tourism did anything to restore possession of the hotels to Wena. Further, Egypt never imposed sanctions on EHC or its senior officials, suggesting that Egypt adopted the actions of EHC. As a result, Egypt breached Article 2(2) of the Egypt-UK BIT by failing to accord Wena's investments fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security. (paragraph 84)

H3 An expropriation may have taken place if the state allowed a de facto possessor to remain in possession of the property which had been seized. (paragraph 97) Further, it was well established that expropriation was not limited to tangible property rights. Contract rights were entitled to protection under international law and the taking of such rights may have involved an obligation to compensate. (paragraph 98)

H4 Whether or not it authorized or participated in the actual seizures of the hotels, Egypt had deprived Wena of its 'fundamental rights of ownership' by allowing EHC to forcibly seize the hotels and to possess them illegally for nearly a year. Thus, Egypt's actions amounted to an expropriation of Wena's investment without prompt, adequate and effective compensation in violation of Article 5 of the Egypt-UK BIT and international law. (paragraphs 99–101)

H5 Municipal statutes of limitation did not necessarily bind a claim for violation of an international treaty. (paragraph 106) Further, Article 42(1) of the ICSID Convention did not require an ICSID Tribunal to apply municipal statutes of limitation. Rather, Article 42(1) provided that a Tribunal should have applied the domestic law of the host state 'and such rules of international law as may be applicable.'

H6 Tribunals should have applied rules of international law to ensure the precedence of international law norms where the rules of the applicable domestic law were in collision with such norms. The strict application of statute of limitation found in the Civil Code would have collided with the general international principle that municipal statutes of limitation did not bind claims before international tribunals. Therefore, the statute of limitation in the Civil Code did not apply and Wena's claims were not time barred. (paragraph 107)

H7 With respect to the allegations of corruption, Egypt had not discharged its burden of proving any misconduct by Wena. The Egyptian Government was aware of the consultancy agreement and had not prosecuted Mr Kandil. Therefore, Egypt should not have been shielded from liability on the basis that the Lease Agreements were illegal under Egyptian law. (paragraph 116) Further, Egypt failed to refute the evidence put forth by Wena which indicated that the consultancy agreement was legitimate. (paragraph 117)

H8 Wena's claims for lost profits and lost opportunities using a discounted cash flow analysis were inappropriate in this case. There was an insufficient base of evidence to establish any profit or to predict growth of the investment made by Wena. (paragraphs 123, 124) Rather, the proper calculation of Wena's damages was the market value of the investment immediately prior to expropriation. (paragraph 125)

H9 Wena was entitled to damages in the amount of USD $20,600,986.43. In addition, Wena was entitled to interest at 9% compounded quarterly, plus its lawyers' fees and expenses incurred in relation to addressing the merits of the proceeding. (paragraphs 127–130)

Analysis

A1 It should first be noted that Professor Don Wallace Jr was appointed as arbitrator by Egypt following the resignation, due to medical emergency, of Professor Michael F Hoellering. Professor Hoellering was appointed by Egypt following the resignation of Professor Hamez Ahmed Haddad.

Professor Haddad was the original appointee of Egypt and sat as part of the Tribunal that issued the Decision on Jurisdiction. Professor Haddad resigned from the Tribunal due to his appointment as the Minister of Justice of Jordan.

A2 The Tribunal's substantive decisions with respect to Egypt's violation of the Egypt-UK BIT were relatively straightforward. The Tribunal found that there was clear evidence that Egypt had wrongfully seized the Nile and Luxor hotels on 1 April 1991. These seizures amounted to a violation of the fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security provisions of the BIT. The seizures also constituted a violation of the prohibition on illegal expropriation found in the BIT.

A3 Whilst the substantive rulings of the Tribunal with respect to violations of the Egypt-UK BIT appeared relatively uncontroversial, this decision was notable with respect to its ruling on the law applicable to the dispute. Article 42(1) of the ICSID Convention provided that, absent agreement of the parties, ICSID tribunals should have applied the law of the state party to the dispute 'and such other rules of international law as may be applicable'.

A4 In this decision, the Tribunal held that whilst the Egypt-UK BIT was the 'primary source' of applicable law, the Tribunal would, pursuant to Article 42(1), also apply Egyptian law and international law. The Tribunal also held that where Egyptian law conflicted with established international law norms, the international law norms should have prevailed. The Tribunal's view that international law performed a corrective function with respect to the host state's law was nearly identical to the views set out by the ad hoc Committees in Klöckner Industrie-Anlagen GmbH and ors v Cameroon, Decision on annulment, Case No ARB/81/2, 3 May 1985 and Amco Asia Corporation and ors v Indonesia, Decision on annulment, ICSID Case No ARB/81/1; (1993) I ICSID Rep 509, 1986.

I. The Proceedings

1. The present arbitration was initiated on July 10, 1998, when Claimant, Wena Hotels Limited (“Wena”),<sup>1</sup> filed a request for arbitration with the Secretary-General of the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (“ICSID”). The request was filed against Respondent, the Arab Republic of Egypt (“Egypt”), and asserted that “[a]s a result of Egypt's expropriation of and failure to protect Wena's investment in Egypt, Wena has suffered enormous losses leading to the almost total collapse of its business.”<sup>2</sup> Wena requested the following relief:

(a) a declaration that Egypt has breached its obligations to Wena by expropriating Wena's investments without providing prompt, adequate and effective compensation, and by failing to accord Wena's investments in Egypt fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security;

(b) an order that Egypt pay Wena damages in respect of the loss it has suffered through Egypt's conduct described above, in an amount to be quantified precisely during this proceeding but, in any event, no less than USD 62,820,000; and

(c) an order that Egypt pay Wena's costs occasioned by this arbitration, including the arbitrators' fees and administrative costs fixed by ICSID, the expenses of the arbitrators, the fees and expenses of any experts, and the legal costs incurred by the parties (including fees of counsel).<sup>3</sup>

The Acting Secretary-General registered the request for arbitration on July 31, 1998.

2. In accordance with Article 37(2)(a) of the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and nationals of Other States (“the ICSID Convention”), the parties agreed that the Tribunal was to consist of three arbitrators, one appointed by each party and the third, presiding, arbitrator, appointed by agreement of the parties or, in the absence of such agreement, by agreement of the two party-appointed arbitrators. Wena appointed Professor Ibrahim Fadlallah, a national of Lebanon, as an arbitrator. Egypt then appointed Hamzeh Ahmed Haddad, a national of Jordan, as an arbitrator. In accordance with Article 38 of the ICSID Convention, the Chairman of ICSID's Administrative Council was requested by Wena to appoint the third, presiding, arbitrator. The Center informed the parties that the Secretary-General of ICSID was planning to recommend Mr. Monroe Leigh, a United States national, for the Chairman's appointment. Having received no objection from either party, the Center informed the parties that the Chairman of the ICSID's Administrative Council had appointed Mr. Leigh as the arbitrator to be the President of the Arbitral Tribunal. Having received from each arbitrator the acceptance of his appointment, the Center informed the parties that the Tribunal was deemed to be constituted and the proceedings to have begun on December 18, 1998. The parties subsequently agreed that the Tribunal had been properly constituted under the provisions of the ICSID Convention.

3. The Tribunal held its first session, at the Permanent Court of Arbitration in The Hague, on February 11, 1999. During this first session, Egypt objected to the request for arbitration filed by Wena and expressed reservations as to the Tribunal's jurisdiction to hear the request.

4. The Tribunal, pursuant to Article 41(2) of the ICSID Convention, granted the parties an opportunity to brief the jurisdictional objections. The parties filed four sets of papers (including accompanying documentary annexes) with the Tribunal:

- (1) Respondent's Memorial on its Objections to Jurisdiction (submitted on March 4, 1999);
- (2) Claimant's Response to Respondent's Objections on Jurisdiction (submitted on March 25, 1999);
- (3) Respondent's Reply on Jurisdiction (submitted on April 8, 1999); and
- (4) Claimant's Rejoinder on Jurisdiction (submitted on April 22, 1999).

In its briefing, Egypt raised four objections to jurisdiction. First, Egypt asserted that it had “not agreed to arbitrate with the Claimant as it is, by virtue of ownership, to be treated as an Egyptian company.”<sup>4</sup> Second, Egypt argued that “[t]he Claimant has made no investment in Egypt.”<sup>5</sup> Third, Egypt claimed that “[t]here is no legal dispute between the Claimant and the Respondent.”<sup>6</sup> Finally, Egypt contended that “[t]he Claimant's consent to arbitration in the Request for Arbitration is insufficient and its Request premature.”<sup>7</sup>

5. The Tribunal heard oral argument on Respondent's objections to jurisdiction during a second session, at the offices of the World Bank in Paris, on May 25, 1999. During the session, Egypt withdrew two of its four objections. First, it noted that the “the papers that we have now been supplied as part of [Wena's briefing] do indicate at least a prima facie case that the Claimant has made an investment, that money was spent in the development and renovation of the hotels and that the money was paid for by the Claimant, rather than any other party.”<sup>8</sup> Thus, “for the purpose of establishing jurisdiction only, the Respondent is willing to accept that an investment has been made.”<sup>9</sup>

6. Second, Respondent also withdrew its procedural objections to Claimant's request for arbitration. As Egypt appropriately observed, even if the Tribunal had endorsed its objections, the alleged defects could have been easily rectified. Noting that “it is not our wish to raise argument simply for the purpose of being difficult or to delay,” Egypt advised “that as far as that particular objection is concerned, we are prepared to forgo it.”<sup>10</sup>

7. In its Decision on Jurisdiction dated June 29, 1999, the Tribunal concluded that Respondent's two remaining jurisdictional objections should be denied and that jurisdiction should be exercised over the dispute. Specifically, the Tribunal: (1) declined to adopt Egypt's contention that Wena should be treated as an Egyptian company for purposes of the Agreement for the Promotion and Protection of Investments between Egypt and the United Kingdom (“IPPA”),<sup>11</sup> and (2) found, without prejudice to the merits of the case, that Wena had at least alleged a prima facie legal dispute with Egypt.<sup>12</sup> The Tribunal proceeded to set a briefing schedule on the merits and proposed dates for oral argument.

8. On August 14, 1999, Professor Hamzeh Ahmed Haddad resigned from the Tribunal — apologizing that, as a result of his new duties as Minister of Justice for Jordan, he would no longer be able to continue as a member of the Tribunal. The Tribunal was reconstituted on September 14, 1999 with the appointment by Egypt of Mr. Michael F. Hoellering as the replacement for Professor Haddad.

9. The parties filed four sets of papers (each including voluminous accompanying documentary annexes) with the Tribunal addressing the merits of the case:

- (1) Claimant's Memorial on the Merits (submitted on July 26, 1999);
- (2) Respondent's Memorial on the Merits (submitted on September 6, 1999);
- (3) Claimant's Reply on the Merits (submitted on September 27, 1999); and
- (4) Respondent's Rejoinder on the Merits (submitted on October 18, 1999).

10. Regrettably, the session on the merits — which had been scheduled for November 15–18, 1999 — had to be postponed by the sudden hospitalization of Mr. Hoellering for a medical emergency. On November 15, 1999, Mr. Hoellering resigned from the Tribunal — apologizing for the inconvenience “this unexpected turn of events” had caused.

11. The Tribunal was reconstituted on December 9, 1999, with the appointment by Egypt of Professor Don Wallace, Jr. as the replacement for Mr. Hoellering. The Tribunal subsequently fixed a new schedule for oral argument on the merits.

12. The Tribunal heard witnesses and oral argument on the merits during its third session, at the offices of the World Bank in Paris, on April 25–29, 2000.<sup>13</sup> In lieu of closing argument, the Tribunal permitted the parties to file post-hearing briefs. The Tribunal also requested that the parties submit proposed findings of fact, chronologies of events and statements of their attorney's fees and costs. In accordance with this schedule, the parties filed a final round of papers with the Tribunal:

- (1) Claimant's Post-Hearing Brief (submitted on May 30, 2000);
- (2) Respondent's Post-Hearing Memorial (submitted on May 30, 2000);
- (3) Claimant's Post-Hearing Reply (submitted on June 15, 2000); and
- (4) Respondent's Post-Hearing Rebuttal Memorial (submitted on June 15, 2000).

13. On July 13, 2000, the Tribunal issued a Procedural Order concerning the introduction of certain documents into the proceeding subsequent to the hearing. As part of this Order, the Tribunal admitted into the record, without prejudice to their probative value, nine documents submitted by Wena with its Post-Hearing Reply brief<sup>14</sup> and a memorandum dated January 19, 1997 on the El-Nile Hotel prepared by Arthur Andersen & Co., which the Tribunal had received from the U.S. Agency for International Development.<sup>15</sup>

14. On November 1, 2000, the Secretary of the Tribunal issued a letter, advising the parties of the closure of the proceedings, pursuant to Arbitration Rule 38(1).

II. The Facts

15. This dispute arose out of long-term agreements to lease and develop two hotels located in Luxor and Cairo, Egypt. Having received voluminous submissions from the two parties and heard five days of oral testimony, the Tribunal hereby makes the following findings of fact:

A. U.K.-Egypt Agreement for the Promotion and Protection of Investments

16. On June 11, 1975, the United Kingdom and the Arab Republic of Egypt entered into an Agreement for the Promotion and Protection of Investments (“IPPA”).<sup>16</sup> Under Article 2(1) of the IPPA, Egypt and the United Kingdom promised to “encourage and create favorable conditions for nationals or companies of other Contracting Party to invest capital in its territory.” They also guaranteed that “[i]nvestments of nationals or companies of either Contracting Party shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment and shall enjoy full protection and security in the territory of the other Contracting Party.”<sup>17</sup> Finally, Egypt and the United Kingdom agreed that “[i]nvestments of nationals or companies of either Contracting Party shall not be nationalised, expropriated or subjected to measures having effect equivalent to nationalisation or expropriation ... in the territory of the other Contracting Party except for a public purpose related to the internal needs of the Party and against prompt, adequate and effective compensation.”<sup>18</sup> As discussed in the Tribunal's previous Decision on Jurisdiction, Wena is a British company for purposes of the IPPA.<sup>19</sup>

B. Luxor and Nile Hotel Agreements

17. On August 8, 1989, Wena and the Egyptian Hotels Company (“EHC”), “a company of the Egyptian Public Sector affiliated to the General Public Sector Authority for Tourism”<sup>20</sup> entered into a 21 year, 6 month “Lease and Development Agreement” for the Luxor Hotel in Luxor, Egypt.<sup>21</sup> Pursuant to the agreement, Wena was to “operate and manage the ‘Hotel’ exclusively for [its] account through the original or extended period of the ‘Lease,’ to develop and raise the operating efficiency and standard of the ‘Hotel’ to an upgraded four star hotel according to the specification of the Egyptian Ministry of Tourism or upgratly [sic] it to a five star hotel if [Wena] so elects....”<sup>22</sup> The agreement provided that EHC would not interfere “in the management and or/operation of the ‘Hotel’ or interfere with the enjoyment of the lease” by Wena and that disputes between the parties would be resolved through arbitration.<sup>23</sup> The lease was awarded to Wena in a competitive bid, after Wena agreed to pay a higher rent than another potential investor.<sup>24</sup>

18. On January 28, 1990, Wena and EHC entered into an almost identical, 25-year agreement for the El Nile Hotel in Cairo, Egypt.<sup>25</sup> Wena also entered into an October 1, 1989 Training Agreement with EHC and Egyptian Ministry of Tourism “to train in the United Kingdom ... Egyptian nationals in the skills of hotel management....”<sup>26</sup>

C. Events Leading up to the April 1, 1991 Seizures

19. Shortly after entering into the agreements, disputes arose between EHC and Wena concerning their respective obligations. Wena claims that it “found the condition of the Hotels to be far below that stipulated in the lease [and] withheld part of the rent, as the lease permitted.”<sup>27</sup> In turn, Egypt claims that Wena “failed to pay rent due to EHC... and EHC in turn liquidated the performance security posted by Claimant.”<sup>28</sup> In the view which the Tribunal takes of this case it is not necessary at this time to determine the truth of these conflicting allegations. It is sufficient for this proceeding simply to acknowledge, as both parties agree, that there were serious disagreements between Wena and EHC about their respective obligations under the leases.

20. On May 3, 1990, Wena instituted arbitration proceedings in Egypt against EHC concerning their disputes over the Luxor Hotel. In an award dated November 14, 1990, the ad hoc arbitral tribunal ordered EHC to make repairs to the Luxor Hotel and ordered Wena to pay its outstanding rental obligations.<sup>29</sup> Wena subsequently brought an action in the South Cairo Court to have the arbitration set aside.<sup>30</sup>

21. At about the same time, “toward the end of 1990,” according to Wena's parliamentary consultant, Mr. Humfrey Malins, M.P., “rumour, I think, must have reached Mr. Faragy because he told me that there were rumours that there would be violence and the hotels would be violently seized back.”<sup>31</sup> As a result, in December 1990, Mr. Malins traveled to Egypt to meet with the Egyptian Minister of Tourism, Minister Fouad Sultan, and the Egyptian Minister of the Interior, Minister Halim Moussa.<sup>32</sup> Mr. Malins recounted that “[b]oth Ministers gave me their separate, absolute assurances ... that no violence could or would take place.”<sup>33</sup>

officials from the Egyptian Hotels Company threatened to storm the hotels and expel us, and this was after our Company had spent the sums previously outlined. The matter reached a point where [sic] the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Egyptian Hotels Company issued a decision for his company to take possession of the Luxor Hotel without a legal ruling or any other measure [to support his decision].<sup>35</sup>

23. In response to Mr. Farargy's request, on February 26, 1991, Minister Sultan convened a meeting in his offices to "discuss the differences between the Egyptian Hotels Company and Wena...."<sup>36</sup> The attendees at the meeting included the Minister, representatives of EHC (including EHC's Chairman, Mr. Kamal Kandil), and Wena's lawyer (Mr. Ahmad Al Khawaga). During the meeting, Minister Sultan declared that "[t]he Ministry took no pleasure from any misunderstandings with investors; however, at the same time it could not accept any excesses in respect of any of the Government's rights."<sup>37</sup> The Minister proposed a series of compromises between the parties. Wena, however, subsequently did not accept the Minister's proposals.<sup>38</sup>

that the following steps be taken:

(One) the Letter of Guarantee for the Nile Hotel be seized and the sum deducted from their debt;

(Two) the contractual relationship for the two hotels be terminated;

(Three) the two hotels be taken and the license withdrawn;

(Four) list all development work at the two hotels and deduct it from their debt; and,

(Five) in the event that the company is still in debt following these measures, proceedings should be taken to seize [the outstanding money] in the United Kingdom.<sup>40</sup>

Alternatively, Mr. Kandil suggested that Minister Sultan establish a 10-day grace period for Wena to "pay its debts," with the understanding, however, that "[i]n the event that the payment is not made, the license for the two hotels would be withdrawn and the Egyptian Hotels Company would take the measures that it view appropriate to preserve its rights."<sup>41</sup> Mr. Kandil closed the letter by advising Minister Sultan: "We leave the matter to you."<sup>42</sup>

25. Marginalia on this March 21, 1991 letter (in Minister Sultan's handwriting), indicate that Minister Sultan telephoned the British Ambassador to Egypt, asking the Ambassador to ascertain Wena's response to the proposed compromises from the February 26, 1991 meeting.<sup>43</sup>

26. Contemporaneously, on March 25, 1991, Mr. Malins wrote to Minister Sultan asking for another meeting in mid-April or May to discuss the continued disputes between Wena and EHC.<sup>44</sup> Mr. Malins concluded his letter by requesting an understanding from the Minister that no actions would be taken until that meeting could occur: "please confirm what must surely be [sic] right, mainly that all matters be 'absolutely frozen,' with no detrimental action of whatever nature being taken pending our meeting...."<sup>45</sup>

27. Minister Sultan personally did not reply to Mr. Malins' letter. Instead, although the letter had been sent to Minister Sultan and not EHC, on March 31, 1991, Mr. Kandil responded to Mr. Malins, referencing "your fax dated 25th March 1991, concerning your request for a meeting, — in your capacity as the parliament advisor for Wena Ltd...."<sup>46</sup> Mr. Kandil mentioned the February 26, 1991 meeting and Wena's refusal to accept the proposed compromises. Mr. Kandil ended his letter by threatening that "the owning company will take all necessary measures to protect its rights which is considered a state ownership."<sup>47</sup>

D. Seizures of the Nile and Luxor Hotels (April 1, 1991)

1. Decision to Seize the Hotels

28. On March 27, 1991, EHC's Board of Directors met "to consider what action should be taken."<sup>48</sup> According to Mr. Munir Abdul Al-Aziz Gaballah Shalabi, of the Legal Affairs Division at EHC, the Board decided "to present Wena with an ultimatum to implement" the proposed compromises from the February 26, 1991 meeting with Minister Sultan.<sup>49</sup> He further explained that "Wena having failed to meet the deadline, it was decided that EHC would take possession of the Nile Hotel."<sup>50</sup> Similarly, Mr. Yusseri Mahmud Hamid Hajjaj, EHC's Manager for the Upper Egypt Hotels Division at EHC, stated that "[faced] with [Wena's] breaches of contract, the board of directors of EHC had no choice but to issue its decision of March 27, 1991 to take over the Luxor Hotel and to place it under its own management with effect from April 1, 1991."<sup>51</sup>

29. The decision to seize the hotels was "confirmed by a resolution of the Chairman of the Board No. 215 of 1991, dated March 30, 1991."<sup>52</sup> Although this resolution is mentioned by Mr. Munir in his witness statement and is referenced in at least two contemporaneous documents,<sup>53</sup> a copy of this resolution was not provided to the Tribunal.

30. EHC purported to notify Wena of its decision to terminate both the Nile and Luxor Leases and to reclaim the Hotels in a letter from Mr. Kandil to Mr. Farargy dated March 30, 1991.<sup>54</sup> In the letter, Mr. Kandil stated that:

the board of Directors of the [Egyptian Hotels] Company had decided:

- a — to terminate the two hotels Contracts.
- b — to receive the hotels and operate them with knowledge of the owning company starting form April 1,1991.
- c — to complain to the courts and to the Public Prosecutor in order to recover [our] company's dues which amount to millions of Egyptian pounds and that are considered as public funds, either by legal or diplomatic ... means including freezing of your accounts receivable.
- d — to warn security services to be aware of your arrival from abroad in order to present you to courts to decide what you owe and to collect it. <sup>55</sup>

However, there is no evidence that this letter was received before the seizures on April 1, 1991.<sup>56</sup> Of the two copies of the March 30, 1991 letter provided to the Tribunal, one was sent by registered mail to Wena's Gatwick Hotel in England and does not appear to have been received until April 5, 1991.<sup>57</sup> The second copy bears a fax legend indicating that the letter had been faxed by EHC and received by Wena on April 14, 1991.<sup>58</sup> Although Mr. Munir testified that the second copy had been faxed to Wena's offices in England on March 30, 1991, no fax cover sheet or confirmation sheet has been submitted to support this claim.<sup>59</sup>

31. In an Administrative Decision Number 216, dated March 31, 1991 and signed by Mr. Kandil, two EHC officials —Messrs. Fakhri Hamid Al-Batuti and Atif Abd Al-Al —were authorized to act on behalf of EHC "in respect of the Nile Hotel."<sup>60</sup> Mr. Yusseri was given the same authority concerning the Luxor Hotel.<sup>61</sup> EHC planned to evict Wena simultaneously from both hotels during the early evening on April 1, 1991 when they expected no resistance because "all the senior people of Wena would be taking the Ramadan breakfast at home...."<sup>62</sup>

32. Egypt does not dispute "that the repossession by EHC of the Luxor and Nile Hotels and EHC's eviction of the Claimant from the Hotels on April 1, 1991 was wrong."<sup>63</sup>

2. Seizure of the Nile Hotel

34. According to a statement made that evening to the Kasr El-Nile Police by Mr. Muhammad Abdul Hameed Wakid, an attorney for Wena Hotels, "about one hundred and fifty persons, some of whom were carrying sticks and cudgels, assaulted the hotel against us immediately after Ramadan breakfast."<sup>66</sup> When he "tried to enquire of them who they were they stated that they had come to seize the hotel according to instructions from the Chairman of the Board of Directors of their company to do so."<sup>67</sup> According to Mr. Wakid, "[t]hey seized all the keys of the offices and safes in which the company's funds and hotel receipts from the guests are deposited [and] seized the hotel in full and they threatened any person who resisted them and attacked them...."<sup>68</sup>

35. Similarly, Mr. Tamim Foda, Wena's resident manager at the Nile Hotel, stated in a subsequent police deposition:

At about 6:30 p.m., when it was time to take the fast breaking meal, I was reviewing some documents concerning my work ... I have been surprised by violent knocking on the door and its breaking, shouting in the hall of the hotel and I saw three persons bursting into my office. They attacked me, slapping my face and breaking my eye-glasses. They took possession of my office by force and everything inside it. ... I was prevented from getting in touch with anybody outside the hotel and they told me that all the telephones were cut. ... I was entrusted to three persons holding rods and cudgels who took me out of the hotel by force and while I was going out I saw more than one hundred men inside the hotel, holding rods and cudgels, some of them were taking out a number of cartons, belongings and implements of the hotel to vehicles parking in front of the door of the hotel. I waited outside the hotel until arrival of the police when I was taken inside for inspection under guard of the police.<sup>69</sup>

36. Mr. Mostafa Ahmed Osman, Financial Manager for Wena, who was "taking my fast breaking meal at the restaurant on the ninth floor," reported being "surprised by strange and suspicious persons [who] took me downstairs by force holding my arms to the administrative offices on the mezzanine... "<sup>70</sup> According to Mr. Osman, one of the EHC employees "threatened me, saying that he holds a licensed weapon and that he is ready to use it if I resist. He informed me that all communications inside and outside the hotel have been cut."<sup>71</sup>

37. A guest of the hotel restaurant, Mr. Sherif Ibrahim Mohamed Khalifa, who "was with my wife to take the fast breaking meal at the hotel as it is our favorite place," witnessed similar scenes.<sup>72</sup> In his statement to the police, Mr. Khalifa said that he "heard shoutings, sounds of breaking and crushing at the hotel."<sup>73</sup> When he went downstairs from the restaurant, he "found many [sic] person in the lobby, a state of absolute disorder, holding rods and some of them taking out carton cases and other things that I do not know, to vehicles parking in front of the hotel. These vehicles were bearing the badge of the Egyptian Hotels Co."<sup>74</sup> Afraid of "being attacked[,] I rushed out of the hotel with my wife."<sup>75</sup>

38. Another guest of the restaurant, Mr. Mohamed Sabry Ismail Emam, stated that he "heard shoutings and sounds of breaking coming from the side of the kitchen and somebody announcing in a loud voice that all the employees of the WENA HOTELS LTD have to go downstairs."<sup>76</sup> When he "tried to go downstairs escaping from this situation, one of the a/m took me downstairs and told me to go out quietly as the hotel had been seized by the Egyptian Hotels Co." and he noted several people "carrying carton cases and taking them to buses parking in front of the hotel, bearing the badge of the Egyptian Hotels Co."<sup>77</sup>

39. A Daily Telegraph article describing the seizure reported that "[o]ne British tourist said he was punched and gouged by 'semi-military types' who ordered him out of bed at 2 a.m."<sup>78</sup> The article also quoted a "British visitor" as saying:

The new managers said we could stay, but I did not feel safe. They told me they were repossessing the hotel on government orders because of an argument between Wena managers and the authorities.<sup>79</sup>

40. Mr. Hany Mohamed Hassan Mohamed Wahba, a security guard at the Nile Hotel, also stated in a subsequent deposition to the police:

While I was at the main entrance of the hotel, I saw a bus bearing the badge of the Egyptian Hotels Co. and numerous persons going into the hotel. They caught me and I was subject to personal searching. They were holding rods and cudgels and requested the key of the main door of the hotel. When I told them that I do not keep it and tried to inquire about the matter, as they were numerous, they tried to attack me and my colleagues.<sup>80</sup>

Mr. Wahba stated that he was taken "to the rear gate by force threatening me with the rods and cudgels."<sup>81</sup> As he was taken, Mr. Wahba "saw the guests of the hotel rushing out in a state of fear and terror caused by their bursting into the hotel in this savage way."<sup>82</sup> Mr. Wahba also reported seeing "a group of the a/m persons going upstairs and another group cutting the telephone wires, a third group burst into the reception and broke the cupboards containing the guests' registers."<sup>83</sup> Eventually, when he was released, Mr. Wahba "proceeded with a number of the employees of the WENA HOTELS LTD who were thrown out with me, to the Tourist Police where we informed verbally about the event. Then the Policeman came to the hotel."<sup>84</sup>

41. At approximately 8:45 p.m., Ms. Jelcic returned to the Nile hotel. She testified that she had just returned to her room when a group of men broke in, grabbed her and removed her from the hotel.<sup>85</sup> According to Ms. Jelcic, the men "had like Navy blue pants, dark pants, which is kind of unusual because they do not normally, you know, dress alike, so that gave me the illusion as if they were some sort of organization..."<sup>86</sup> Ms. Jelcic testified that she and other Wena employees (including Mr. Webster) then stood outside the hotel, looking into the lobby where she says she noticed "about four gentlemen or so that were standing in the lobby, towards the back of the lobby, and they were radically different from the other people that were in the lobby.... [t]hey were very well groomed, very well dressed..."<sup>87</sup> According to Ms. Jelcic, some of the Egyptian Wena staff "told me that they were Ministry of Tourism officials."<sup>88</sup> However, Ms. Jelcic admitted that she "personally did not recognize them, no, but my staff, obviously the staff that were there saw the people come into the hotel on previous occasions, so I had no reason to doubt them."<sup>89</sup> Mr. Webster also testified that, although he did not personally recognize any officials from the Ministry of Tourism, two of his Egyptian staff "said to me that there were officials from the Ministry of Tourism in the lobby at the time."<sup>90</sup>

42. Further evidence of their contemporaneous impression that the Ministry of Tourism was involved in the seizure of the Nile Hotel is reflected in the police statements that Ms. Jelcic and Mr. Webster made to the Kasr El-Nile police. Ms. Jelcic's statement, for example, begins "I would like to make a complaint, charge and case against the Egyptian Hotels Company and the Ministry of Tourism of Egypt."<sup>91</sup> Similarly, Mr. Webster's statement, which is titled "Against the Egyptian Hotels Company/Ministry of Tourism," concludes "[w]e therefore place and hold the Egyptian Hotel Company and Ministry of Tourism responsible for items as listed below and not returned immediately."<sup>92</sup>

43. However, in his testimony, Minister Sultan adamantly rejected the suggestion that Ministry officials might have been present during the seizure: "I am sure that none of them have been there. I am sure of that, and, please, those who are accusing the Ministry should have come up with physical evidence showing representatives of the Ministry were there."<sup>93</sup> Mr. Munir also testified that "[t]here was no official of the Ministry of Tourism" present during the seizure.<sup>94</sup>

44. According to Ms. Jelcic and Mr. Webster, Wena staff went to both the nearby Kasr El-Nile police station and the Tourist police station seeking assistance.<sup>95</sup> Although both Ms. Jelcic and Mr. Webster testified that—with the exception of one, lone policeman who arrived two to three hours later—both police forces refused to assist Wena,<sup>96</sup> there is evidence that officers from Kasr El-Nile police did begin an investigation at around 11:00 p.m.<sup>97</sup>

45. The report by the Kasr El-Nile Police records that they were “informed by the Director of the Security Department in the El“Nile Hotel,” perhaps Mr. Wahba, “that the Management of the Egyptian Hotels Corporation had previously sent a number of its employees to seize the hotel in full....”<sup>98</sup> According to the report, four officers from the Kasr El-Nile police station went to investigate. When they arrived, they met with officials from EHC, who “presented to us a photocopy of the administrative order number 216 dated 31/3/1991 stamped and signed by Mr. Muhammad Kamal Qindeel, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Egyptian Hotels Corporation.”<sup>99</sup> During their investigation that evening, the Kasr El-Nile Police reported that “damage was noticed which resulted from the use of force to locks in the rooms of the secretaries, the resident manager and the administrative business and the room for [reception?] customers and the buffet and the room of the lawyer to the Wena Company who is resident in the hotel.”<sup>100</sup>

46. As previously indicated, at approximately 1:00 a.m., Ms. Jelcic, Mr. Webster, and several other Wena employees went to the nearby Kasr El-Nile police station to file a complaint.<sup>101</sup> According to Ms. Jelcic and Mr. Webster, the police at first refused to let them make a statement, and then only would allow them to submit statements dealing with the loss of personal items, not the illegality of EHC's seizure.<sup>102</sup> Several other employees also prepared statements, reporting the loss of money, jewelry, watches, and other personal items.<sup>103</sup>

3. Seizure of the Luxor Hotel

47. Also on April 1, 1991, at approximately 7:00 p.m., several EHC employees, led by Mr. Yusseri, took possession of the Luxor Hotel.<sup>104</sup>

48. According to a subsequent statement to the Luxor police by Mr. Bahia El Din Abdel Hadi El Wakeel, a security guard at the Luxor Hotel, “more than 100 people from the EHC seized the Wena Hotel by force in spite myself and others responsible for the security and guards in the hotel presence at the time.”<sup>105</sup> Mr. Wakeel also stated that “EHC forced their entry through by force ... which caused panic, fear, and hysteria for the guests and employees.”<sup>106</sup> Two other guards, Messrs. Ismael Ahmed Hefni and Ahmed Hamza Mostafa, made short statements, agreeing with Mr. Wakeel's description of events.<sup>107</sup>

49. Mr. Muhammad Nagib Al-Sayyid, Wena's General manager of the Luxor Hotel, also filed a police statement, asserting that, at approximately 7:00 p.m., EHC personnel entered his office, seized the hotel's papers and ordered him to leave the hotel.<sup>108</sup> Mr. Nagib reported the incident to the Luxor Tourist Police, who accompanied Mr. Nagib back to the hotel and subsequently opened an investigation into the seizure.<sup>109</sup>

50. These contemporaneous descriptions comport with the subsequent report by the Advocate General at the Office of the Assistant Attorney General for Upper Egypt, which concluded that EHC “broke into the Hotel ... entered by force into the management office, broke open the doors and Offices of the Hotels Ltd. [and] forced the personnel they found there to quit the Hotel.”<sup>110</sup>

E. Events Following the Seizures of the Nile and Luxor Hotels

51. Minister Sultan testified that he first learned of the seizures by reading the newspaper the next morning.<sup>111</sup> Minister Sultan stated that he “requested one of my associates to investigate the issue and we found that he [Mr. Kandil] is mistaken by taking the law into his hands....”<sup>112</sup> Minister Sultan also testified that “we most probably discussed that with the Prime Minister....”<sup>113</sup>

52. Minister Sultan repeatedly stated that he “was furious”<sup>114</sup> at EHC's decision to seize the hotels, that EHC's actions were “wrong,”<sup>115</sup> and that “[i]f I had the slightest idea about that incident, I would have immediately stopped it because during that time I was also involved in the SPP dispute....”<sup>116</sup> However, Minister Sultan also admitted that he did not take any action to return Wena to the hotels, to punish EHC or its officials, or to withdraw the hotels licenses so that EHC could not operate the hotels.<sup>117</sup> Minister Sultan explained that by reinstating Wena “I would be taking again of siding [sic] with someone, whereas the dispute should be settled through arbitration or a court.”<sup>118</sup>

53. From April 1, 1991 through February 25, 1992, the Nile Hotel remained in the control of EHC. The Luxor Hotel remained in EHC's control until April 21, 1992. During this time, Wena made several efforts to recover possession of the hotels — including seeking the assistance of officials in the United States and United Kingdom.<sup>119</sup> For example, on July 9, 1991, Mr. Faragy wrote to the Egyptian Ambassador to the United Kingdom, complaining about the apparent collapse of negotiations between Wena and a representative of the Egyptian government.<sup>120</sup> Apparently, also during this time, the Civil Defense Authority (which is responsible for fire safety) issued at least two reports — on May 22, 1991 and November 12, 1991 — about unsafe conditions at the Nile Hotel.<sup>121</sup>

54. On January 16, 1992, the Chief Prosecutor of Egypt ruled that the seizure of the Nile Hotel was illegal and that Wena was entitled to repossess the hotel.<sup>122</sup> However, the Nile Hotel was not immediately returned to Wena. On February 21, 1992, Mr. Webster wrote to the British Embassy in Cairo, complaining of Minister Sultan's “uncooperative stance” and the delays that Wena was experiencing in recovering the hotels: “if he [Minister Sultan] wishes to press settlement of account, then we too will press for settlement of monies outstanding to Wena.”<sup>123</sup> Mr. Webster concluded his letter by saying that “[w]e are of the impression that the Minister is either poorly informed or part of the entire scheme.”<sup>124</sup>

55. On February 25, 1992, the Nile Hotel was returned to Wena's control.<sup>125</sup> Just two days before the hotel was returned, on February 23, 1992, the Ministry of Tourism withdrew the Nile Hotel's operating license because of fire safety violations and “the hotel was closed down.”<sup>126</sup> According to Mr. Munir, these safety violations had pre-dated EHC's seizure of the hotel in April 1991.<sup>127</sup> In a contemporaneous report to the Kasr El-Nile police, an EHC official confirmed that on February 23, 1992, just before returning the Nile Hotel to Wena, EHC had issued “decree no. 148/92 to stop operations” in response to orders from the Ministries of Interior and Tourism.<sup>128</sup>

56. According to the witnesses produced by Wena, upon returning to control of the Nile Hotel, they found the hotel vandalized.<sup>129</sup> Although Mr. Munir denied that any such vandalism occurred, he confirmed that EHC had removed and auctioned much of the hotel's fixtures and furniture.<sup>130</sup> According to Wena's management, it never operated the Nile Hotel again.<sup>131</sup>

57. On April 21, 1992, the Chief Prosecutor of Egypt ruled that EHC's seizure of the Luxor Hotel was illegal and ordered that the hotel should be returned to Wena.<sup>132</sup> On April 28, 1992, Wena reentered the hotel.<sup>133</sup> According to Wena's witnesses, the Luxor Hotel had also been damaged, although not nearly as badly as the Nile Hotel.<sup>134</sup> The Ministry of Tourism denied Wena a permanent operating license for the Luxor Hotel; instead, it granted only a series of temporary licenses because of alleged defects in the drainage system and the fire safety system, which Wena complains prohibited it from properly operating the hotel.<sup>135</sup>

58. After the return of the hotels, Wena sought compensation from Egypt.<sup>136</sup> On November 11, 1992, Mr. Malins wrote to the Honorable Lee Hamilton, a senior member of the U.S. House of Representatives, complaining that “the Minister of Tourism, Dr. Fouad Sultan, will not consider our requests” and that “it is clear that subsequent to any perceived movement, Dr. Sultan personally intervenes to obstruct a solution.”<sup>137</sup>

59. On April 10, 1993, the Kasr El-Nile court convicted several representatives of EHC —including

Messrs. Kandil and Munir—under Article 369/1 of the Egyptian Criminal Code (dispossession by violence), holding that unlawful force was used to expel Wena from the Nile Hotel.<sup>138</sup> These convictions were subsequently upheld by the Southern Cairo Court of Appeal, on January 16, 1994.<sup>139</sup> According to Mr. Munir, the decision is currently under appeal to the Court of Cassation.<sup>140</sup> Neither Mr. Kandil nor Mr. Munir was sentenced to serve any jail time; both were fined only 200 Egyptian pounds, which Mr. Munir stated that he had not paid.<sup>141</sup> Since then, Mr. Munir has been promoted to become the Head of the Legal Affairs division at EHC and is expecting a further promotion.<sup>142</sup> According to Ms. Jelcic, Mr. Kandil is currently an advisor to a senior member of the Egyptian parliament.<sup>143</sup>

60. On December 2, 1993, Wena initiated arbitration in Egypt against EHC for breaching the Nile Hotel lease.<sup>144</sup> Similar arbitration was initiated by Wena against EHC for breaching the Luxor Hotel lease on January 12, 1994.<sup>145</sup>

61. On April 10, 1994, an arbitration award of EGP 1.5 million for damages from the invasion of the Nile Hotel was issued in favor of Wena. However, the award also required Wena to surrender the Nile Hotel to EHC's control.<sup>146</sup> On June 21, 1995, Wena was evicted from the Nile Hotel.<sup>147</sup> Nearly two years later, on June 9, 1997, Wena received the damages awarded by the Nile Hotel arbitration, less, fees—a total of EGP 1,477,498.30.<sup>148</sup>

62. The Luxor Hotel arbitration also found in favor of Wena, awarding the company, in a September 29, 1994 decision, EGP 9.06 million for damages from the seizure.<sup>149</sup> The award subsequently was nullified by the Cairo Appeal Court on December 20, 1995, on the basis, among other things, that the arbitrator appointed by EHC had not signed the final decision.<sup>150</sup> On August 14, 1997, Wena was evicted from the Luxor Hotel and, according to Mr. Yusseri, the hotel was turned over to a court-appointed receiver requested by EHC.<sup>151</sup>

F. Harassment

63. Wena has also alleged “a campaign of continual harassment” by Egypt since the seizure of the two hotels, including the following allegations: “in 1991 the Minister of Tourism made defamatory statement about Wena that were reproduced in the media; in 1992 Egypt revoked the Nile Hotel's operating license without reason; in 1995 Egypt imposed an enormous, but fictitious, tax demand on Wena; in 1996 Egypt removed the Luxor Hotel's police book, effectively rendering it unable to accept guests; and, last but not least, in 1997 Egypt imposed a three-year prison sentence and a LE 200,000 bail bond on the Managing Director of Wena based on trumped-up charges.”<sup>152</sup>

64. The Tribunal has received some limited testimony and other evidence on these various allegations. However, because it finds, as discussed in section III, infra, that Egypt's actions concerning the April 1, 1991 seizures of the two hotels are sufficient to determine liability, the Tribunal does not find it necessary to make a finding on the veracity of these additional allegations.

G. Relationship between EHC and Egypt

65. From 1983 through September 1991, EHC was a “public sector” company, wholly owned by the Egyptian Government, and operating in accordance with law Number 97 of 1983 governing Public Sector Companies and Organizations.<sup>153</sup> In September 1991, Egypt enacted the Public Business Sector Companies Law, which reorganized the “314 State owned economic companies,” pooling them into “16 (reduced later to 12) State owned holding companies supervised by the Minister for [the] public Sector.”<sup>154</sup> However, at the time of the seizures of the Nile and Luxor Hotels, EHC was governed by Law Number 97 of 1983.

66. As explained by Minister Sultan during his testimony, under Law Number 97 of 1983, the sole shareholder of EHC was Egypt.<sup>155</sup> EHC's shareholder assembly was chaired by the Minister of Tourism and would be attended by several other government officials.<sup>156</sup> The Minister of Tourism also was responsible for the appointment of at least one half of the Board of Directors of EHC, and furthermore nominated EHC's Chairman.<sup>157</sup> Indeed, in May 1989, Mr. Kamal Kandil was appointed, at the nomination of Minister Sultan, Chairman and CEO of EHC by Egyptian Prime Minister's Decree Number 539 of 1989.<sup>158</sup> According to Mr. Munir's statement "EHC's Directors were also appointed by the Ministry of Tourism and Civil Aviation."<sup>159</sup>

67. Of considerable relevance to this proceeding, the Minister of Tourism was also empowered to dismiss the Chairman and the members of the Board of EHC if "it appears that the continued presence of these persons would affect the proper functioning of the company."<sup>160</sup>

68. Until at least the passage of the September 1991 Public Business Sector Companies Law, "EHC operated within broad policy guidelines laid down by the Egyptian Government."<sup>161</sup> As Minister Sultan explained during a parliamentary debate on July 14, 1992, at the time of the seizures, "the tourism sector with its companies" was "[s]ubordinated to the Minister of Tourism."<sup>162</sup> In a letter from February 1992, the Ministry of Tourism contrasted the relationship between EHC and the Egyptian Government before and after the passage of the September 1991 law, by explaining:

After the issuance of the new law of the Business Sector and after its implementation starting from Oct. 1991, the Egyptian Hotels Company has full autonomy in all of its business dealings without intervention from the Ministry.<sup>163</sup>

69. The documents also reflect that EHC and the Ministry of Tourism considered EHC's money to be "public money" or "public funds,"<sup>164</sup> and EHC's rights to be "a state ownership."<sup>165</sup> Indeed, during the February 26, 1991 meeting chaired by Minister Sultan, the Minister is recorded as saying that "[t]he Ministry took no pleasure from any misunderstandings with investors; however, at the same time it could not accept any excesses in respect of any of the Government's rights."<sup>166</sup> Similarly, in his April 1, 1991 statement to the Luxor police, Mr. Atitu Sirri Atitu, "Manager of the Legal Department at Egyptian Hotels Company for hotels in the Luxor area," explained that "the Egyptian Hotels Company, as a Government company, was compelled to preserve the public money by the means it viewed in as being in accordance with the public interest."<sup>167</sup>

H. Consultancy Agreement between Wena Hotels Ltd. and Mr. Kamal Kandil

70. Egypt has contended that the "claimant improperly sought to influence the Chairman of EHC with respect to the award of the leases."<sup>168</sup> Both parties agree that, on or about August 20, 1989, Wena Hotels Ltd. entered into a consultancy agreement with Mr. Kamal Kandil.<sup>169</sup> The second paragraph of the agreement provides that Mr. Kandil's duties "shall be to give advice and assistance to the company as to the opportunities available to the company for developing its hotel business in Egypt."<sup>170</sup>

71. On March 26, 1991, Wena (through its attorneys, Tuck & Mann) issued a Writ of Summons in England against Mr. Kandil, alleging that, under the agreement, Wena had made five payments to Mr. Kandil between August 18, 1989 and January 30, 1990.<sup>171</sup> The total of these payments, which Wena sought to reclaim, was GB£ 52,000.

72. On August 19, 1991, Mr. Kandil responded to this Writ in a letter written to the Senior Master of the Royal Court of Justice.<sup>172</sup> In his letter, Mr. Kandil objected to Wena's writ, claiming that "there was no Contract between the Claimant Company and myself," that there was only "a Draft Contract which is not a Contract because it was neither signed nor sealed between the Parties," and that "the signature which appears is not mine."<sup>173</sup> Mr. Kandil asserted that the "subject of the above-mentioned Draft Contract was to develop new hotels in Egypt, these hotels being the Ramses Village project in Abou Simbal and a Conference Center in Aswan City...."<sup>174</sup> Mr. Kandil also stated that "[i]n the Draft Contract I did not act in my quality of Chairman of the Egyptian Hotels Company nor did the Draft Contract concern either the Nile Hotel or the Luxor Hotel, instead I acted as Tourist Consultant for the Aswan Government and Chairman of the Board of Directors of Misr Aswan Tourist Co.”<sup>175</sup>

73. As corroborating evidence of Mr. Kandil's statements, Wena has submitted two letters it sent to the Governor of Aswan in December 1989 and January 1990 (including one letter on which Mr. Kandil was copied), concerning the Abou Simbal and Aswan City developments.<sup>176</sup>

74. Mr. Farargy testified that the Egyptian government was aware of the consultancy agreement and that Mr. Kandil “offered his help and assistance officially above board with their knowledge.”<sup>177</sup> According to Minister Sultan, however, he was not personally aware that “Mr. Kandil was an agent to Farargy” and that when he did learn about it, “I passed that to the prosecutor requesting a full fledged investigation....”<sup>178</sup> Both parties agree, however, that “the investigation appears ... to have been closed”<sup>179</sup> and that “Mr. Kandil was never prosecuted in Egypt in connection with the Consultancy Agreement.”<sup>180</sup> Unfortunately, other than this consensus that Mr. Kandil was never prosecuted, the Tribunal has been presented with no evidence of any investigation the Egyptian government might have undertaken in this matter.

III. Liability

75. In its Memorial on the Merits, Wena claims that “Egypt violated the IPPA, Egyptian law and international law by expropriating Wena's investments without compensation.”<sup>181</sup> Wena also argues that “Egypt violated the IPPA and other international norms by failing to protect and secure Wena's investments.”<sup>182</sup>

76. Egypt denies Wena's claims, asserting that it has neither “violated the IPPA's prohibition on expropriation without compensation”<sup>183</sup> nor “breached any obligation under international law to protect and secure the claimant's investment.”<sup>184</sup> In addition to its objections to the substance of Wena's claims, Egypt has also raised two affirmative defenses. First, Egypt asserts that “Claimant's claims in respect of the seizure of the hotels and acts of vandalism are time barred.”<sup>185</sup> Second, Egypt contends that “Claimant improperly sought to influence the Chairman of EHC [Mr. Kamal Kandil] with respect to the award of the leases that are the subject of this arbitration” and, therefore, as a result of this alleged corruption, “Claimant cannot now properly appear before an international tribunal, constituted in accordance with the IPPA, and claim compensation for the alleged loss of leasehold interests that were improperly obtained in the first place.”<sup>186</sup> The Tribunal has carefully considered all of these claims. The Tribunal devoted particular attention to the allegations of corruption raised by Egypt.

77. Despite the able representation of Egypt's counsel, the Tribunal concludes that Egypt did violate its obligations under the IPPA by failing to provide Wena's investments in Egypt “fair and equitable treatment” and “full protection and security”<sup>187</sup> and by failing to provide Wena with “prompt, adequate and effective compensation” following the expropriation of its investments.<sup>188</sup> The Tribunal also finds that Wena's claims are not time barred. Finally, although Egypt has raised serious allegations of misconduct and corruption, the Tribunal finds that Egypt (which bears the burden of proving such an affirmative defense) has failed to prove its allegations. The Tribunal's rationale is discussed in more detail below.

A. Law Applicable to this Arbitration

78. Before Disposing of the merits of this case, the Tribunal must consider the applicable law governing its deliberations. As both parties agree, “this case all turns on an alleged violation by the Arab Republic of Egypt of the agreement for the promotion and protection of investments that was entered into in 1976 between the United Kingdom and the Arab Republic of Egypt.”<sup>189</sup> Thus, the Tribunal, like the parties (in both their submissions and oral advocacy), considers the IPPA to be the primary source of applicable law for this arbitration.

79. However, the IPPA is a fairly terse agreement of only seven pages containing thirteen articles. The parties in their arguments have not treated it as containing all the rules of law applicable to their dispute, and this is also the view of the Tribunal. In particular, Egypt has relied on Egyptian law, namely, the Egyptian Civil Code to raise its first defense — that Wena's claims are time barred. In its response to that defense, Wena has taken the position that both Egyptian law and international law are applicable to the dispute.<sup>190</sup> Under Article 42(1) of the ICSID Convention:

The Tribunal shall decide a dispute in accordance with such rules of law as may be agreed upon by the parties. In the absence of such agreement, the Tribunal shall apply the law of the Contracting State party to the dispute (including its rules on the conflicts of laws) and such rules of international law as may be applicable.

The Tribunal finds that, beyond the provisions of the IPPA, there is no special agreement between the parties on the rules of law applicable to the dispute. Rather, the pleadings of both parties indicate that, aside from the provisions of the IPPA, the Tribunal should apply both Egyptian law (i.e., “the law of the Contracting State party to the dispute”) and “such rules of international law as may be applicable.” The Tribunal notes that the provisions of the IPPA would in any event be the first rules of law to be applied by the Tribunal, both on the basis of the agreement of the parties and as mandated by Egyptian law as well as international law.

B. The Issue of Egypt's Substantive Liability

1. Summary of Wena's Claims

80. As noted already, Wena raises two claims against Egypt. First, it contends that Egypt's actions constitute an unlawful expropriation without “prompt, adequate and effective” compensation in violation of Article 5 of the IPPA, as well as Egyptian law and other international law.<sup>191</sup> Second, Wena argues that Egypt violated Article 2(2) of the IPPA, and other international norms, by failing to accord Wena's investments “fair and equitable treatment” and “full protection and security.”<sup>192</sup>

81. Egypt disputes both allegations, contending, inter alia, “that the Claimant has no legitimate grievance against the Respondent, who neither authorized nor participated in the repossession of the Luxor and Nile Hotels on April 1, 1991 or most of the subsequent events of which the Claimant complains.”<sup>193</sup>

82. The Tribunal disagrees. There is substantial evidence that, even if Egyptian officials other than officials, of EHC did not participate in the seizures of the hotels on April 1, 1991, 1) Egypt was aware of EHC's intentions to seize the hotels and did nothing to prevent those seizures; 2) the police, although responding to the seizures, did nothing to protect Wena's investments; 3) for almost one year, Egypt (despite its control over EHC both before and after April 1, 1991) did nothing to restore the hotels to Wena; 4) Egypt failed to prevent damage to the hotels before their return to Wena; 5) Egypt failed to impose any substantial sanctions on EHC (or its senior officials responsible for the seizures), suggesting its approval of EHC's actions; and 6) Egypt refused to compensate Wena for the losses it suffered.

83. The Tribunal shall consider each of Wena's claims, beginning with its assertion that Egypt violated its obligations under Article 2(2) of the IPPA to provide “full protection and security” to Wena's investments.

2. Article 2(2) of the IPPA: “Fair and Equitable Treatment” and “Full Protection and Security”

84. The Tribunal agrees with Wena that Egypt violated its obligation under Article 2(2) of the IPPA to accord Wena's investment “fair and equitable treatment” and “full protection and security.” Although it is not clear that Egyptian officials other than officials of EHC directly participated in the April 1, 1991 seizures, there is substantial evidence that Egypt was aware of EHC's intentions to seize the hotels and took no actions to prevent EHC from doing so. Moreover, once the seizures occurred, both the police and the Ministry of Tourism took no immediate action to restore the hotels promptly to Wena's control. Finally, Egypt never imposed substantial sanctions on EHC or its senior officials, suggesting Egypt's approval of EHC's actions.

Article 2(2) of the IPPA provides:

Investments of nationals or companies of either Contracting Party shall at all time be accorded fair and equitable treatment and shall enjoy full protection and security in the territory of the other Contracting Party. Each Contracting Party shall ensure that the management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal of investments in its territory of nationals or companies of the other Contracting Party is not in any way impaired by unreasonable or discriminatory measures. Each Contracting Party shall observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investments of nationals or companies of the other Contracting party.<sup>194</sup>

In interpreting a similar provision from the bilateral investment treaty between Zaïre and the United States, another ICSID panel has recently held that “the obligation incumbent on [the host state] is an obligation of vigilance, in the sense that [the host state] shall take all measures necessary to ensure the full enjoyment of protection and security of its [sic] investments and should not be permitted to invoke its own legislation to detract from any such obligation.”<sup>195</sup> Of course, as still another ICSID panel has observed, a host state's promise to accord foreign investment such protection is not an “absolute obligation which guarantees that no damages will be suffered, in the sense that any violation thereof creates automatically a ‘strict liability’ on behalf of the host State.”<sup>196</sup> A host state “is not an insurer or guarantor... [i]t does not, and could hardly be asked to, accept an absolute responsibility for all injuries to foreigners.”<sup>197</sup> Here, however, there is no question that Egypt violated its obligation to accord Wena's investments “fair and equitable treatment” and “full protection and security.”

85. Even if Egypt did not instigate or participate in the seizure of the two hotels, as Wena claims,<sup>198</sup> there is sufficient evidence to find that Egypt was aware of EHC's intentions and took no actions to prevent the seizures or to immediately restore Wena's control over the hotels. As discussed in section II.C, supra, in December 1990, Wena's parliamentary consultant, Mr. Malins, traveled to Egypt expressly to meet with minister Sultan and the Egyptian Minister of the Interior to express Wena's concerns about such a seizure.<sup>199</sup> Mr. Malins recounted that “[b]oth Ministers gave me their separate, absolute assurances ... that no violence could or would take place.”<sup>200</sup> In February 1991, Wena wrote to Minister Sultan, mentioning that EHC was again threatening to repossess the hotels through force:

officials from the Egyptian Hotels Company threatened to storm the hotels and expel us, and this was after our Company had spent the sums previously outlined. The Matter reached a point where the Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Egyptian Hotels Company issued a decision for his company to take possession of the Luxor Hotel without a legal ruling or any other measure [to support his decision].<sup>201</sup>

86. Then, on March 21, 1991 (only eleven days before the seizures), Mr. Kandil wrote to Minister Sultan, proposing that, among other things, “the two hotels be taken and the license withdrawn.”<sup>202</sup> Mr. Kandil closed the letter by advising Minister Sultan: “We leave the matter to you.”<sup>203</sup> Marginalia, in Minister Sultan's handwriting, confirm that the Minister received and reviewed the letter.<sup>204</sup>

87. Finally, on March 25, 1991 (only six days before the seizure), Mr. Malins wrote to Minister Sultan asking for another meeting and requesting an understanding from the Minister that no actions would be taken until that meeting could occur: “please confirm what must surely be [sic] right, mainly that all matters be ‘absolutely frozen,’ with no detrimental action of whatever nature being taken pending our meeting..."<sup>205</sup> As evidence of the close coordination between the Ministry of Tourism and EHC, Mr. Kandil (and not Minister Sultan) responded to this letter on March 31, 1991 (the day immediately before the seizures).<sup>206</sup> Mr. Kandil ended his letter by threatening that "the owning company will take all necessary measures to protect its rights which is considered a state ownership."<sup>207</sup>

88. Despite all these warnings, Egypt took no action to protect Wena's investment. Minister Sultan sought to defend Egypt's failure to prevent the seizure by explaining he was not aware that EHC planned to illegally seize the hotels,<sup>208</sup> and that "[i]f I had the slightest idea about that incident, I would have immediately stopped it..."<sup>209</sup> Even if the Tribunal were to accept this explanation for Egypt's failure to act before the seizures, it does not justify the fact that neither the police nor the Ministry of Tourism took any immediate action to protect Wena's investments after EHC had illegally seized the hotels.

89. For example, despite the convincing evidence that a large number of people forcibly seized the Nile Hotel at approximately 7:00 p.m.,<sup>210</sup> it is undisputed that the Kasr El-Nile police (located only a few minutes away) did not begin an investigation until four hours later and it is not evident that the Ministry of Tourism police (also located nearby) ever responded to Wena's request for assistance.<sup>211</sup> Moreover, even after the Kasr El-Nile police began their investigation, they took no steps to remove EHC and restore Wena to control of the hotel. The Luxor police, although more prompt in their response, also declined to expel EHC and restore the Luxor hotel to Wena.<sup>212</sup>

90. The Ministry of Tourism also failed to take any immediate action to protect Wena's investments. Although he testified that he "was furious"<sup>213</sup> at EHC's decision to seize the hotels and that EHC's actions were "wrong,"<sup>214</sup> Minister Sultan also acknowledged that he did not take any action to return the hotels to Wena, to punish EHC or its officials, or to withdraw the hotel's licenses so that EHC could not operate the hotels.<sup>215</sup> Under Law Number 97 of 1983 governing Public Sector Companies and Organizations, Minister Sultan was empowered to dismiss the Chairman and the members of the Board of EHC if "it appears that the continued presence of these persons would affect the proper functioning of the company."<sup>216</sup> Also, given its power as the sole shareholder in EHC,<sup>217</sup> with several of its senior officials participating in and one of them chairing EHC's shareholder assembly,<sup>218</sup> and with "EHC operat[ing] within broad policy guidelines laid down by the Egyptian Government,"<sup>219</sup> Egypt could have directed EHC to return the hotels to Wena's control and make reparations.

91. Instead, neither hotel was restored to Wena until nearly a year later, after decisions by the Chief Prosecutor of Egypt,<sup>220</sup> which Wena asserts were only obtained as a result of diplomatic pressure on Egypt.<sup>221</sup> Even after the Chief Prosecutor's first decision (concerning the Nile Hotel) was issued on January 16, 1992, in which he found the seizures "illegal," the Ministry of Tourism delayed returning control of the Nile Hotel to Wena. For example, on February 21, 1992, Mr. Webster wrote to the British Embassy in Cairo, complaining of Minister Sultan's "uncooperative stance" and the delays that Wena was experiencing in recovering the hotels: "if he [Minister Sultan] wishes to press settlement of account, then we too will press for settlement of monies outstanding to Wena."<sup>222</sup> Mr. Webster concluded his letter by saying that "[w]e are of the impression that the Minister is either poorly informed or part of the entire scheme."<sup>223</sup>

92. Moreover, neither hotel was returned to Wena in the same operating condition that it had been in before the seizures. According to Wena's witnesses, both hotels had been vandalized.<sup>224</sup> Although Mr. Munir denied that any such vandalism occurred, he confirmed that EHC had removed and auctioned much of the Nile Hotel's fixtures and furniture.<sup>225</sup> Furthermore, neither hotel had a permanent operating license. In fact, just two days before the Nile Hotel was returned to Wena, the Ministry of Tourism withdrew that hotel's operating license because of alleged fire safety violations.<sup>226</sup> Although, as Mr. Munir noted, these safety violations had pre-dated EHC's seizure of the hotel in April 1991,<sup>227</sup> it is noteworthy that the Ministry of Tourism allowed EHC to operate the Nile Hotel from April 1991 through February 1992, despite these violations, and revoked the license only on February 23, 1992, just prior to restoring the hotel to Wena's control.

93. Egypt also refused to compensate Wena for the losses it had experienced.<sup>228</sup> On November 11, 1992, Mr. Malins wrote to the Honorable Lee Hamilton, a senior member of the U.S. House of Representatives, complaining that “the Minister of Tourism, Dr. Fouad Sultan, will not consider our requests” and that “it is clear that subsequent to any perceived movement, Dr. Sultan personally intervenes to obstruct a solution.”<sup>229</sup>

94. Finally, neither EHC nor its senior officials were seriously punished for their actions in forcibly expelling Wena and illegally possessing the hotels for approximately a year. Although several representatives of EHC — including Messrs. Kandil and Munir — were convicted for their actions, neither Mr. Kandil nor Mr. Munir was sentenced to serve any jail time. Instead, both were fined only EGP 200, which Mr. Munir stated that he has never paid.<sup>230</sup> Also, neither official appears to have suffered any repercussions in their careers. As noted above, the Ministry of Tourism chose not to exercise its authority to remove Mr. Kandil as Chairman of EHC and, according to Ms. Jelcic, he currently is serving as an advisor to a senior member of the Egyptian parliament.<sup>231</sup> Since the seizures, Mr. Munir has been promoted to become the Head of the Legal Affairs Division at EHC and is expecting a further promotion in the near future.<sup>232</sup> This absence of any punishment of EHC and its officials suggest that Egypt condoned EHC's actions.

95. For all of these reasons, the Tribunal concludes that Egypt violated its obligation under Article 2(2) of the IPPA, by failing to accord Wena's investments “fair and equitable treatment” and “full protection and security.”

3. Article 5 of the IPPA: Expropriation Without “Prompt, Adequate and Effective” Compensation

96. The Tribunal also agrees with Wena that Egypt's actions constitute an expropriation and one without “prompt, adequate and effective compensation,” in violation of Article 5 of the IPPA. That article provides in relevant part that:

(1) Investments of nationals or companies of either Contracting Party shall not be nationalised, expropriated or subjected to measures having effect equivalent to nationalisation or expropriation (hereinafter referred to as ‘expropriation’) in the territory of the other Contracting Party except for a public purpose related to the internal needs of the Party and against prompt, adequate and effective compensation. Such compensation shall amount to the market value of the investment expropriated immediately before the expropriation itself or before there was an official Government announcement that expropriation would be effected in the future, whichever is the earlier, shall be made without delay, be effectively realizable and be freely transferable. The national or company affected shall have a right under the law of the Contracting Party making the expropriation, to prompt review, by a judicial or other independent authority of that Party, of whether the expropriation is in conformity with domestic law and of the valuation of his or its investment in accordance with the principles set out in this paragraph.<sup>233</sup>

97. Although, as Professor Ian Brownlie has commented, “the terminology of the subject is by no means settled,”<sup>234</sup> the fundamental principles of what constitutes an expropriation are well established under international law. For example, as the ICSID tribunal in Amco Asia v. Indonesia noted, “it is generally accepted in International Law, that a case of expropriation exists not only when a state takes over private property, but also when the expropriating state transfers ownership to another legal or natural person.”<sup>235</sup> The tribunal continued by observing that an expropriation “also exists merely by the state withdrawing the protection of its courts from the owner expropriated, and tacitly allowing a de facto possessor to remain in possession of the thing seized...”<sup>236</sup>

98. It is also well established that an expropriation is not limited to tangible property rights. As the panel in SPP v. Egypt explained, “there is considerable authority for the proposition that Contract rights are entitled to the protection of international law and that the taking of such rights involves an obligation to make compensation therefore.”<sup>237</sup> Similarly, Chamber Two of the Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal observed in the Tippets case that “[a] deprivation or taking of property may occur under international law through interference by a state in the use of that property or with the enjoyment of its benefits, even where legal title to the property is not affected.”<sup>238</sup> The chamber continued by noting:

[w]hile assumption of control over property by a government does not automatically and immediately justify a conclusion that the property has been taken by the government, thus requiring compensation under international law, such a conclusion is warranted whenever events demonstrate that the owner has been deprived of fundamental rights of ownership and it appears that this deprivation is not merely ephemeral.<sup>239</sup>

99. Here, the Tribunal has no difficulty finding that the actions previously described constitute such an expropriation. Whether or not it authorized or participated in the actual seizures of the hotels, Egypt deprived Wena of its “fundamental rights of ownership” by allowing EHC forcibly to seize the hotels, to possess them illegally for nearly a year, and to return the hotels stripped of much of their furniture and fixtures.<sup>240</sup> Egypt has suggested that this deprivation was merely “ephemeral” and therefore did not constitute an expropriation.<sup>241</sup> The Tribunal disagrees. Putting aside various other improper actions, allowing an entity (over which Egypt could exert effective control) to seize and illegally possess the hotels for nearly a year is more than an ephemeral interference “in the use of that property or with the enjoyment of its benefits.”<sup>242</sup>

100. Moreover, even after the hotels were returned to Wena, Egypt failed to satisfy its obligation under the IPPA, and international norms generally, by refusing to offer Wena “prompt, adequate and effective compensation” for the losses it had suffered as result of Egypt's failure to act.<sup>243</sup> For example, as already noted, on November 11, 1992, Mr. Malins wrote to U.S. Congressman Lee Hamilton, complaining that “the Minister of Tourism, Dr. Fouad Sultan, will not consider our requests” and that “it is clear that subsequent to any perceived movement, Dr. Sultan personally intervenes to obstruct a solution.”<sup>244</sup>

101. For all these reasons, the Tribunal concludes that Egypt violated its obligation under Article 5 of the IPPA, by failing to provide Wena with “prompt, adequate and effective compensation” for the losses it suffered as a result of the seizures of the Luxor and Nile Hotel.

C. Whether Wena's Claims are Time Barred

102. In its Memorial on the Merits, Egypt argues that Wena's claims are time barred under Article 172(i) of the Egyptian Civil Code.<sup>245</sup> This article provides that:

A case filed for damages claimed for an illegal act, shall fall by prescription by lapse of three years from the day the wronged person learns of the damage taking place and of the person who is responsible for it, in all events the case shall fall with the lapse of 15 years from the day the illegal act takes place.<sup>246</sup>

Egypt also observes that “[e]ven if, contrary to the above, the Tribunal were to refuse to apply Article 172(i), it nevertheless would clearly still have the discretion to determine whether there has been unreasonable delay in the submission of the Claimant's claims to ICSID.”<sup>247</sup> Finally, Egypt contends that “if Egyptian law is not applied, it would be reasonable ... to have regard to the principles of prescription that are common to both of the Contracting Parties to the IPPA, i.e., in this case, the United Kingdom,” noting that the statute of limitation, under the English Limitation Act 1980, for breach of Contract or tortious behavior is six years.<sup>248</sup>

103. Ironically, as Wena notes, Respondent did not previously raise this “time bar” claim in its objections to jurisdiction.<sup>249</sup> To the contrary, Respondent asserted, as part of its objections, that Wena's Request for Arbitration was “premature.”<sup>250</sup>

104. Setting aside this apparent inconsistency, however, the Tribunal sees no legal or equitable reason to bar Wena's claim. First, contrary to Respondent's claim that “Claimant severely compromised the ability of the Respondent to defend itself in these proceedings,”<sup>251</sup> the Tribunal agrees with Wena that, given the voluminous evidence produced by the parties as well as the extensive testimony provided by several witnesses (in particular, EHC's counsel, Mr. Munir, who showed a remarkable recollection of the case), neither party seems to have been disadvantaged — which, of course, is one of the equitable reasons for disallowing an untimely claim.

105. Another equitable principle is the notion of “repose” — that a respondent who reasonably believes that a dispute has been abandoned or laid to rest long ago should not be surprised by its subsequent resurrection.<sup>252</sup> Here, however, the Tribunal finds that Wena has continued to be aggressive in prosecuting its claims and that Egypt has had ample notice of this on-going dispute.<sup>253</sup>

106. Second, as Wena notes, municipal statutes of limitation do not necessarily bind a claim for a violation of an international treaty before an international tribunal. In Alan Craig v. Ministry of Energy of Iran, Chamber Three of the Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal declined to apply an Iranian statute of limitation, despite the applicability of Iranian law.<sup>254</sup> The tribunal noted:

Municipal statutes of limitation have not been considered as binding on claims before an international tribunal, although such periods may be taken into account by such a tribunal when determining the effect of an unreasonable delay in pursuing a claim.<sup>255</sup>

This general principle was recognized as long ago as 1903 by the Italy-Venezuela Mixed Claims Commission, which held in the Gentini case that, although local statutes of limitation cannot be invoked to defeat an international claim, international tribunals may consider equitable principles of prescription to reject untimely claims.<sup>256</sup> Indeed, in the Gentini case, the American Umpire dismissed a thirty-year old claim. As discussed above, however, the Tribunal sees no reason to exercise such discretion in this case, where Egypt has had ample notice of Wena's continued claims and where neither party appears to have been substantially harmed in its ability to bring its case.

107. Egypt contends that Article 42(1) of the ICSID Convention mandates that the Tribunal must apply Article 172(i)'s three-year statute of limitation. The Tribunal does not agree. Article 42(1) of the ICSID Convention provides that a Tribunal shall apply domestic law “and such rules of international law as may be applicable.” As Wena notes, the decision in the Amco Asia case advised that one situation where a tribunal should apply rules of international law is “to ensure the precedence of international law norms where the rules of the applicable domestic law are in collision with such norms.”<sup>257</sup> Here, strict application of Article 172(i)'s three-year limit, even if applicable, would collide with the general, well-established international principle recognized since before the Gentini case: that municipal statutes of limitation do not bind claims before an international tribunal (although tribunals are entitled to consider such statutes as well as equitable principles of prescription when handling untimely claims).

108. Moreover, as discussed in Section III.A, supra, the principal source of substantive law in this case is the IPPA itself. The Tribunal notes that although the IPPA's concise provisions do not contain detailed procedures for bringing an arbitration, Article 8(1) does expressly provide that if a dispute “should arise and agreement cannot be reached within three months between the parties to this dispute through pursuit of local remedies, through conciliation or otherwise, then,” and only then, may a party institute ICSID proceedings.<sup>258</sup> This provision suggests a greater concern that the parties not rush into arbitration than that the parties will delay the initiation of proceedings.

109. Finally, although not necessary to the Tribunal's decision, the Tribunal is not convinced by the interpretation of Egyptian law presented by Respondent. As Respondent's expert noted, normally "[a]ctions for liability for administrative acts are time-barred after fifteen years."<sup>259</sup> Article 172(i), to the contrary, is viewed as an "exception to the general principle concerning the statute of limitation [because] it relates to ... unlawful acts."<sup>260</sup> Dr. Elehwany reached the conclusion that the normal 15-year prescription did not apply and that the exceptional three-year period of Article 172(i) did, because "what was being attributed to Egypt is liability for the physical acts the police are alleged to have committed on 1 April 1991 — namely the storming Nile and Luxor Hotels, the forcible eviction of the hotel guests and staff, the theft of cash, the detention of employees, the wrecking of everything...."<sup>261</sup>

110. Of course, as Egypt argued on the merits, and the Tribunal agrees, it has not been demonstrated that the police physically participated in the seizure of the hotels. As discussed in section III.B., supra, Egypt's liability does not arise from physical acts by the police, but from Egypt's failure to accord Wena's investments as required by IPPA, "full protection and security" — by failing to prevent or immediately reverse EHC's physical acts. Such failure to provide legal protection would appear to constitute the typical administrative act for which the normal, fifteen-year prescription period applies. Thus, Egypt's response to the contention that it failed to provide "full protection and security" is inadequate.

D. Consultancy Agreement with Mr. Kandil

111. Finally, the Tribunal considers Egypt's contention that "Claimant improperly sought to influence the Chairman of EHC with respect to the award of the leases" for the Luxor and Nile hotels.<sup>262</sup> If true, these allegations are disturbing and ground for dismissal of this claim. As Egypt properly notes, international tribunals have often held that corruption of the type alleged by Egypt are contrary to international bonos mores.<sup>263</sup> However, as Professor Lalive notes, "the delicate problems remains" for an arbitral tribunal "to determine precisely where the line should be drawn between legal and illegal contracts, between illegal bribery and legal 'commissions.'"<sup>264</sup>

112. As noted above in section II.H (paragraphs 70–74), it is undisputed that Wena and Mr. Kandil entered into an agreement in August 1989, that the purpose of the agreement was for Mr. Kandil "to give advice and assistance to the company as to opportunities available to the company for developing its hotel business in Egypt,"<sup>265</sup> that between August 18, 1989 and January 30, 1990 Wena made a total of GB£ 52,000 in payments to Mr. Kandil, and that on March 26, 1991, Wena initiated a lawsuit against Mr. Kandil for allegedly breaching the agreement.<sup>266</sup>

113. Egypt notes that, coincidentally, the first payment (on August 18, 1989) was ten days after the execution of the Luxor Hotel lease and that the last payment (on January 30, 1990) was two days after the signing of the Nile Hotel lease. It also observes that the amount paid to Mr. Kandil exceeds that which would have been authorized under the consultancy agreement.

114. Wena, however, contends that the agreement did not concern the Nile and Luxor hotels, but was to help Wena pursue development opportunities in Misr Aswan, where Mr. Kandil was a tourist consultant. This assertion is supported by both Mr. Kandil's response to Wena's March 1991 lawsuit,<sup>267</sup> as well as the letters Wena has submitted from December 1989 and January 1990, evincing its interest in the Abou Simbal and Aswan City developments in Misr Aswan.<sup>268</sup>

115. Wena also noted that according to Mr. Yusseri, the Luxor lease was awarded to Wena in a competitive bid with another investor, with Wena winning the lease because it agreed to pay a higher rent.<sup>269</sup> Finally, Mr. Farargy testified that the Egyptian government was aware of the agreement that Mr. Kandil "offered his help and assistance officially above board with their knowledge."<sup>270</sup>

that “Mr. Kandil was an agent to Farargy” and that when he did learn about it, “I passed that to the prosecutor requesting a full fledged investigation,”<sup>271</sup> it is undisputed that Mr. Kandil was never prosecuted in Egypt in connection with this agreement.<sup>272</sup> Regrettably, because Egypt has failed to present the Tribunal with any information about the investigation requested by Minister Sultan, the Tribunal does not know whether an investigation was conducted and, if so, whether the investigation was closed because the prosecutor determined that Mr. Kandil was innocent, because of lack evidence, or because of complicity by other government officials. Nevertheless, given the fact that the Egyptian government was made aware of this agreement by Minister Sultan but decided (for whatever reasons) not to prosecute Mr. Kandil, the Tribunal is reluctant to immunize Egypt from liability in this arbitration because it now alleges that the agreement with Mr. Kandil was illegal under Egyptian law.

117. Moreover, with the exception of the coincidence in the timing of the payments and the signing of the Luxor and Nile hotels (and the apparent over-payment of Mr. Kandil), the Tribunal notes that Egypt — which bears the burden of proving such an affirmative defense — has failed to present any evidence that would refute Wena’s evidence that the Contract was a legitimate agreement to help pursue development opportunities in Misr Aswan. Nor did either party offer to present live testimony from Mr. Kandil.

IV. Damages

118. Article 5 of the IPPA between Egypt and the United Kingdom provides that in the event of an expropriation, the private investor shall be entitled to “prompt, adequate, and effective compensation” and “such compensation shall amount to the market value of the investment immediately before the expropriation.”<sup>273</sup> The Tribunal shall apply this standard to the determination of damages.

119. Altogether Wena claims damages of GB£ 20.4 million for lost profits, GB£ 22.8 million for lost opportunities and GB£ 2.5 million for reinstatement costs, making a total of GB£ 45.7 million.<sup>274</sup> In addition, it seek interest on the previous sum and makes a claim of US$ 1,251,541 for counsel fees and costs of experts and witnesses incurred in pursuing its claim.<sup>275</sup>

120. In the alternative, Wena claims US$8,819,466.93 as the amount of its investment in the Egyptian hotel venture.<sup>276</sup>

121. The Respondent disputes these requests, contending that the claims summarized in paragraphs 119–120 are inappropriate and greatly overstated.<sup>277</sup> In the alternative, the Respondent suggest that if anything were awarded for damages it should be the amount of Wena’s investment in the Egyptian hotel venture, which, according to Respondent’s expert, could not be more than GB£ 750,000.<sup>278</sup>

122. Although experts presented by each party adopted variations of the well-known discounted cash flow (“DCF”) method of calculating the amount of the damages sustained by Wena, the experts reached widely varying results from their calculations.<sup>279</sup> Since, however, the Tribunal is not persuaded that the DCF method is appropriate in this case, it deems it unnecessary to enter into a detailed discussion of the differences that the experts’ calculations disclosed.

123. The Tribunal agrees with Egypt that, in this case, Wena’s claims for lost profits (using a discounted cash flow analysis), lost opportunities and reinstatement costs are inappropriate—because an award based on such claims would be too speculative. As another ICSID panel recently noted in the Metalclad decision:

Normally, the fair market value of a going concern which has a history of profitable operation may be based on an estimate of future profits subject to a discounted cash flow analysis. However, where the enterprise has not operated for a sufficiently long time to establish a performance record or where it has failed to make a profit, future profits cannot be used to determine going concern or fair market value.<sup>280</sup>

Similarly, the ICC panel in the SPP (Middle East) v. Egypt arbitration case declined to accept a discounted cash flow projection because, inter alia, “by the date of cancellation the great majority of the work had still to be done,” and “the calculation put forward by the Claimants produces a disparity between the amount of the investment made by the Claimants” and the “supposed value” of the investment as calculated by the DCF analysis.<sup>281</sup>

124. Like the Metalclad and SPP disputes, here, there is insufficiently “solid base on which to found any profit ... or for predicting growth or expansion of the investment made” by Wena.<sup>282</sup> Wena had operated the Luxor Hotel for less than eighteen months, and had not even completed its renovations on the Nile Hotel, before they were seized on April 1, 1991. In addition, there is some question whether Wena had sufficient finances to fund its renovation and operation of the hotels.<sup>283</sup> Finally, the Tribunal is disinclined to grant Wena's request for lost profits and lost opportunities given the large disparity between the requested amount (GB£ 45.7 million) and Wena's stated investment in the two hotels (US$8,819,466.93).<sup>284</sup>

125. Rather, the Tribunal agrees with the parties that the proper calculation of “the market value of the investment expropriated immediately before the expropriation”<sup>285</sup> is best arrived at, in this case, by reference to Wena's actual investments in the two hotels. As noted above, Wena pleads in the alternative for award of at least the amount of Wena's proven investment in the Egyptian hotel venture. Similarly, Respondent pleads in the alternative that if any award were made it should not be more than the amount of Wena's proven investment.

126. The Tribunal is not persuaded by the relevance of the Respondent's contention that much of the Egyptian investment came from affiliates of Wena rather than from Wena. Instead the panel takes the view that whether the investments were made by Wena or by one of its affiliates, as long as those investments went into the Egyptian hotel venture, they should be recognized as appropriate investments. The panel was persuaded from the testimony it received that it is a widely established practice for hotel enterprises to adopt allocation measures, which spread the profits from the group operations into various jurisdictions where there are tax advantages to the group as a whole.

127. On the basis of investment, Claimant states its loss as US$8,819,466.93. However, the panel in pursuing an objection raised by the Respondent that there were certain elements of double counting,<sup>286</sup> decided that the gross figure should be diminished by US$322,000.00 to eliminate probably double counting in certain instances. Beyond that, however, the panel was not persuaded by Respondent's evidence that there were significant other instances of double counting. Thus, the figure of US$8,819,466.93 should be diminished by US$322,000.00, leaving a total of US$8,497,466.93, which the Tribunal judges to be the approximate total for Wena's investment. From this, the Tribunal agreed that $435,570.38 should be deducted for the amount received already by Claimant as a result of the Egyptian arbitration award (the equivalent of EGP 1,477,498.30 at the exchange rate of $1 = EGP 3.3921 on June 9, 1997, the date of payment of the Egyptian award).<sup>287</sup>

128. To this should be added an appropriate sum for interest. Claimant has claimed interest but neither specified a rate nor whether interest should be compounded.<sup>288</sup> Moreover, the IPPA, the lease agreements, and the ICSID Convention and Rules are all silent on the subject of interest. The Panel is of the view that in this case interest should be awarded and that it would be appropriated adopt a rate of 9%, to be compounded quarterly.<sup>289</sup>

129. Like the distinguished panel in the recently-issued Metalclad decision, this Tribunal also has determined that compounded interest will best “restore the Claimant to a reasonable approximation of the position in which it would have been if the wrongful act had not taken place.”<sup>290</sup> Although the Metalclad tribunal awarded compound interest without comment, this panel feels that a brief explanation of its decision is warranted.<sup>291</sup> This Tribunal believes that an award of compound (as opposed to simple) interest is generally appropriate in most modern, commercial arbitrations. As Professor Gotanda has observed “almost all financing and investment vehicles involve compound interest .... If the claimant could have received compound interest merely by placing its money in a readily available and commonly used investment vehicle, it is neither logical nor equitable to award the claimant only simple interest.”<sup>292</sup> For similar reasons, Professor Mann has “submitted that ... compound interest may be and, in absence of special circumstances, should be awarded to the claimant as damages by international tribunals.”<sup>293</sup>

130. Thus, the total, with interest through December 1, 2000 (US$11,431,386.88) is US$19,493,283.43. To this figure there should be added an appropriate sum to reimburse Claimant for attorney's fees and related costs, as reparation for losses sufficiently related to its central claims and in keeping with common practice in international arbitration. It will be recalled that the Tribunal, in its Decision on Jurisdiction, rejected Wena's claims for costs incurred in rebutting Egypt's objections to jurisdiction.<sup>294</sup> Accordingly, the Tribunal shall only reimburse Claimant for that portion of its attorney's fees and costs incurred in presenting the merits of this arbitration. Wena has claimed US$1,107,703 for these expenses.<sup>295</sup> Thus, including the Claimant's attorney's fees and costs, the grand total to be awarded Claimant is US$20,600,986.43. This award will be payable within 30 days from the date hereof. Thereafter, it will accumulate additional interest at 9% compounded quarterly until paid.

V. Conclusion

131. In sum, the Tribunal concludes that Egypt breached its obligations under Article 2(2) of the IPPA by failing to accord Wena's investments in Egypt “fair and equitable treatment” and “full protection and security.” Even if the Egyptian Government did not authorize or participate in the attacks, its failure to prevent the seizures and subsequent failure to protect Wena's investments give rise to liability. The Tribunal also finds that Egypt's actions amounted to an expropriation — transferring control of the hotels from Wena to EHC without “prompt, adequate and effective compensation” in violation of Article 5 of the IPPA.

132. The Tribunal also dismisses the two affirmative defenses raised by Egypt. First, the Tribunal does not agree with Egypt's contention that Wena's claims are time barred. Second, although Egypt has raised some disturbing allegations regarding payments made to Mr. Kandil, the Tribunal finds that Egypt has failed to meet its evidentiary burden of proving that these payments were illegitimate.

VI. The Operative Part

133. For these reasons

THE TRIBUNAL, unanimously,

134. FINDS that Egypt breached its obligations to Wena by failing to accord Wena's investments in Egypt fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security in violation of Article 2(2) of the IPPA;

135. FINDS that Egypt's actions amounted to an expropriation without prompt, adequate and effective compensation in violation of Article 5 of the IPPA;

and

136. AWARDS to Wena US$20,600,986.43 in damages, interest, attorneys fees and expenses. This award will be payable by Egypt within 30 days from the date of this Award. Thereafter, it will accumulate additional interest at 9% compounded quarterly until paid.

Professor Wallace concurs in the Tribunal's entire award and is persuaded that compound interest should be awarded. However, he is not persuaded that compounding should be quarterly.

- 92. Statement of Mr. Simon Webster to Kasr El-Nile Police (April 2, 1991) [Annex W83]. Similar contemporaneous evidence of Wena’s impression that the Egyptian government was involved in the seizures is reflected in several of the newspaper articles describing the events. For example, an article in the Caterer and Hotelkeeper reported that “Mr. Faragy believed the attack ... was organised either by government elements or people who are fiercely opposed to foreign ownership in Egypt.” “Wena Hotels Attacked by Crowds,” Caterer & Hotelkeeper (April 18, 1991) [Annex W85]. Similarly, an article in the Crawley Observer quoted “Wena Managing Director Bernard Dibrberg” as saying “[t]his is a legal dispute with the Egyptian government. We owe money to them and they owe money to us.” “Mob Turn on Hotel Workers,” The Crawley Observer (April 24, 1991) [Annex W86].

The Tribunal also heard testimony from Mr. Tahir Al-Misiri Qasim (TR Day 4 at 223:8 et seq.) and Mr. Sameer Muhammad Khatir (TR Day 4 at 231:23 et seq.) to the effect that there was no violence at the time of the takeover. This testimony is inconsistent with the testimony of Webster and Jelcic and the other witnesses who testified consistently with Webster and Jelcic. Since the testimony of Mr. Qasim and Mr. Khatir has also been found inconsistent with the decision of the Southern Cairo Court of Appeal, which characterized the situation at the Nile Hotel on April 1, 1991 as including many acts of violence, the Tribunal has chosen not to rely on the testimony of these two witnesses.

- 198. The evidence submitted by the parties does suggest a unity of interest between EHC and Egypt such that it is possible that Egypt might have authorized and participated in the seizures of the hotels. The repeated reference in contemporaneous documents to EHC as a “government company,” to its money as “public money” and to its rights as “the Government's rights” or “state ownership” is particularly compelling in this regard. See, e.g., Luxor Police State Report No. 959 of

1991, at 8, 12 & 26 (April 1, 1991) [Annex E-M18]; Kasr El-Nile Police Report, at 6 (April 1, 1991) [Annex E-M25]; Letter from Mr. Kamal Kandil (Chairman, EHC) to Mr. Nael El-Faragy (Wena Hotels Ltd.) Nevertheless, the Tribunal concludes that Wena has failed to satisfy its burden of proving that Egypt actually participated in the seizures of the two hotels. For example, although both Ms. Jelcic and Mr. Webster believe that Ministry of Tourism officials were present at the Nile Hotel, they both admit that they were, personally, unable to identify any such officials. ## PART ONE : INTRODUCTION

I : INSTITUTION OF ARBITRAL PROCEEDINGS

- 1.01 American Manufacturing & Trading Corporation (Zaire), Inc. (AMT), an American company incorporated in the State of Delaware of which the majority shareholders are nationals of the United States of America, addressed to the Secretary General of the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID) a letter of 25 January 1993, instituting arbitral proceedings against the Republic of Zaire by virtue of Article 36 of the Washington Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States, of 18 March 1965 (the CONVENTION).
- 1.02 After acknowledging receipt of this request for arbitration on 26 January 1993, the Secretary General transmitted on the same day a copy of said request to the Republic of Zaire delivered by special courier to the Minister of Plan of Zaire at Kinshasa, as well as by a registered letter addressed to the Ambassador of Zaire in Washington, D.C. The Secretary-General of ICSID registered the request on 2 February 1993.
- 1.03 The request of AMT is based on the provisions of a Bilateral Treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Republic of Zaire concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investment (the BIT) of which the English and French text submitted by AMT was certified as true copy by the Secretary of State of the United States of America on 21 February 1995. The BIT was signed on 3 August 1984, and entered into force on 28 July 1989.
- 1.04 By letter of 2 July 1993, received by ICSID on 7 July 1993, the Claimant party informed ICSID of a change of name, and that it would hence forth be called "American Manufacturing & Trading, Inc."

1.05 In the Request for Arbitration (paragraphs 10, 11 and 15) as well as in the Additional Request of 16 March 1993, AMT in its final submission requests the Tribunal to adjudge and declare :-

- (1) That the Republic of Zaire has violated the rights of AMT recognized and protected by the provisions of BIT of 1984;
- (2) That the Republic of Zaire is thereby responsible for failing to fulfill its obligations of protection provided by the BIT, especially as regards the destructions caused by the elements of the armed forces of Zaire on 23-24 September 1991 and on 28-29 January 1993, in respect of damage to the properties and installations belonging to Société Industrielle Zaïroise (SINZA) Société privée à responsabilité limitée (SPRL) limited liability private company. 94 per cent of whose stocks are subscribed by AMT, including all losses suffered by SINZA as the result of the looting; and
- (3) That the Republic of Zaire be condemned to pay to AMT, as a measure of compensation and as damages and interests, an indemnity equivalent to
  - a) The fair market value of all the losses suffered by the investment of AMT in Zaire;
  - b) The loss of profits (Lucrum Cessans) which AMT would have acquired on its own behalf; and
  - c) The interests on the amount of compensation under a) and b) at a commercial rate equal to the appropriate international rate of interest for transactions in dollars from 23 September 1991 until the final payment.

1.06 Furthermore, AMT requests the Tribunal (paragraph 16 of the Request for Arbitration) to condemn the Republic of Zaire to pay for all the costs of the arbitral proceedings, including the fees and expenses of the Members of the Tribunal, the charges for the use of ICSID facilities, as well as all other expenses incurred by AMT in the course of the proceedings, consisting of the total amount of the fees and expenses of its own counsel, advocates and other persons called upon to appear before the Tribunal, and the interests thereon calculated at a commercial rate equal to the appropriate international rate for transactions in dollars from the date of the rendering of the Award until the day of the final payment.

- 1.07 In its Request (paragraph 15), AMT asserts that in the report prepared by a branch office of Lloyds in Zaire on 14 November 1991, the direct losses were estimated at US$ 10,524,023, without prejudice to the calculation of the total amount of compensation and interests that AMT will subsequently present. In its submission of additional claims of 16 March 1993 (paragraph 3), AMT adds that the value of the goods taken, destroyed or looted during the incidents of 28-29 January 1993 is estimated at US$ 324,868.

II : CONSTITUTION OF THE TRIBUNAL

- 2.01 Without any positive reaction on the part of the Republic of Zaire to the notification of the Request for Arbitration by ICSID more than 60 days after 2 February 1993, the date of registration of the Request for Arbitration, above all with regard to the nomination of arbitrators, and in the absence of agreement between the Parties, AMT has opted as for the number of arbitrators for the formula to constitute the Tribunal in accordance with the provisions of Article 37 (2)(b) of the Convention which provides for an Arbitral Tribunal composed of three arbitrators : each Party appointing one arbitrator and the President of the Tribunal appointed by agreement of the Parties.
- 2.02 At the same time, AMT has nominated Mr. Heribert GOLSONG, of German nationality as arbitrator and proposed Mr. Robert COUZIN, of Canadian nationality, as President of the Arbitral Tribunal in accordance with Article 3 (1)(a) of the ICSID Arbitration Rules. In the absence of any nomination by the Government of Zaire more than 90 days following the delivery of notification of registration of the Request for Arbitration to the parties, AMT has requested by its letter of 5 July 1993, addressed to the Chairman of the Administrative Council of ICSID, to appoint the arbitrator not yet appointed and to nominate the arbitrator to perform the function of the President of the Tribunal in accordance with Article 4 (1) of the ICSID Arbitration Rules. The Chairman of the Administrative Council is bound to give effect to this request by AMT within 30 days following its receipt in accordance with Article 4 (4) of the Arbitration Rules, (letter of the Secretary-General of ICSID of 8 July 1993).

- 2.03 By a letter of 13 July 1993, ICSID informed the parties that the Secretary-General intended to recommend to the Chairman of the Administrative Council to appoint to the Tribunal Judge Kéba MBAYE and Professor Sompong SUCHARITKUL and to nominate Professor SUCHARITKUL as President of the Tribunal. Judge Kéba MBaye, national of Senegal, domiciled in Dakar, is a former President of the Supreme Court of Senegal and former Vice-President of the International Court of Justice. Professor Sompong Sucharitkul, national of Thailand, domiciled in San Francisco, United States, is a former member of International Law Commission and a former Ambassador of Thailand. He is currently Professor of Law at Golden Gate University School of Law. The appointments of these arbitrators as well as the nomination of the President of the Tribunal, have been confirmed by the Chairman ad interim of the Administrative Council of the Centre and communicated to the Parties on 26 July 1993.

- 2.04 Upon notification of the acceptance by Judge MBaye and Professor Sucharitkul, the Arbitral Tribunal of ICSID was thus constituted on 4 August 1993 in accordance with ICSID Arbitration Rule 6 (1). The establishment of the Tribunal and its composition were duly notified to the Parties on 4 August 1993. The Arbitral Tribunal is composed of :-

Mr. Sompong	SUCHARITKUL	President
Mr. Heribert	GOLSONG	Member
Mr. Kéba	MBAYE	Member

Mr. Nassib G. Ziadé, Counsel, ICSID, was designated as Secretary of the Tribunal by the Secretary-General of ICSID.

III : PROCEDURAL DEVELOPMENTS

A. THE FIRST SESSION OF THE TRIBUNAL

3.01 On 1 October 1993, the Arbitral Tribunal held its first meeting with the Parties in Washington, D.C. This session was devoted exclusively to the questions concerning organization of the procedures to follow, including the written proceedings as well as the oral proceedings. In the absence of representation on the part of Zaire, the oral phase of the proceedings has become inevitable. The Tribunal fixed the time-limits for the filings of the Memorial and the Counter-Memorial by the Parties. The conclusion of the Tribunal were recorded in details in the Minutes of the Meeting for preliminary procedural consultation of 1 October 1993, of which a copy was distributed to each Party to the dispute.

B. WRITTEN PLEADINGS FILED BY THE PARTIES

3.02 In accordance with the time-limits fixed for the filing of written pleadings and the requests made by each Party in turn for extension of the time-limits thus fixed by the Tribunal, the Parties filed the following written pleadings :

- a) The Memorial by the Claimant on 9 December 1993;

- b) The Counter-Memorial by the Respondent raising at the same time an objection to the jurisdiction of ICSID and of the Tribunal on 30 May 1994;
- c) The Reply by the Claimant, replying and making observations on the objection to the jurisdiction of ICSID and of the the Tribunal on 17 June 1994;
- d) The Rejoinder by the Respondent on 19 July 1994.

3.03 a) The Memorial, filed by the Claimant on 9 December 1993 with 8 annexes, reiterated and consolidated the claims contained in the Request for Arbitration of 20 January 1993 and the Additional Request of 16 March 1993, giving an account of the events preceding and giving rise to the dispute between the Parties. The Memorial recalled the origin of the investments made by AMT which through SINZA was engaged in industrial and commercial activities in Zaire, namely, (a) the production and sale of automotive and dry cell batteries; and (b) the importation and resale of consumer goods and foodstuffs.

3.04 In its Memorial, AMT gave further details of the losses suffered by SINZA as the result of the destruction of property located in the industrial complex for the production of automotive and dry cell batteries and the looting on 23-24 September 1991 by certain members of the Zairian armed forces stationed at Camp Kolole in Zone de la Gombe. These soldiers also broke into the commercial complex and the stores, destroyed, damaged and carried away all the finished goods and almost all the raw materials and objects of value found on the premises. The commercial complex was reopened in February 1992, but since the second destruction of 28-29 January 1993, it was permanently closed.

- 3.05 In the Annexes, the Memorial estimated the total amount of compensation at US$ 14,339,610. This total comprises : (a) US$ 12,793,850 for the industrial complex in 1991; (b) US$ 1,220,900 for the commercial complex and the two stores in 1991; and (c) US$ 324,860 for the physical damage suffered by the commercial complex and the two stores in 1993.
- 3.06 AMT requested a sum of US$ 21,574,405 to be paid by the Government of Zaire as compensation, plus 8 per cent interest on this sum since 23 September 1991, and for the sum of US$ 305,368 since 30 January 1993. In addition, AMT claimed compensation for all expenses incurred in the course of the proceedings, the two reports of Lloyds for US$ 126,500, and all other expenses and fees paid by AMT including those of the Centre, of the Members of the Tribunal as well as of the Counsel and Advocate and other expenses that the Tribunal may consider appropriate.
- 3.07 In its Memorial, AMT based its claims on the provisions of Article 42 (1) of the Convention and on Articles II (4), III (1) and IV (2) of the BIT.
- 3.08 b) The Counter-Memorial filed by the Respondent on 30 May 1994, contained a summary of the facts, emphasizing that SINZA "has been the object of looting in 1991, as it was indeed the case with all the others".
- 3.09 The Counter-Memorial raised several preliminary objections to the jurisdiction of ICSID and consequently to the competence of the Tribunal, on the ground of a defect in the status of AMT without the capacity to act in the name of SINZA. The Respondent challenged the jurisdiction of ICSID to entertain the case instituted by AMT, without the existence of a dispute between AMT and the Republic of Zaire, but in the actual case, the dispute was ultimately between SINZA, a Zairian Company, and the Republic of Zaire.
- 3.10 Zaire raised the objection based on AMT's failure to comply with Article VIII of

- the BIT, requiring settlement of dispute by means of consultation between representatives of the two Parties and, failing that, by other diplomatic channels. The Counter-Memorial maintained that it was only after all these means had failed that it would have been possible to have recourse to ICSID Arbitration.
- 3.11 The Counter-Memorial raised another objection on the ground of inadmissibility of AMT's request for non-compliance with Articles II, IV and IX of the BIT without adducing any evidence that the State of Zaire "has granted in like circumstances a treatment no less favorable to SINZA than it had accorded to its own nationals or companies".
- 3.12 Besides, Zaire relied on Article IX of the BIT which stipulates that the present Treaty (BIT) shall not supersede, prejudice, or otherwise derogate from the laws, regulations, administrative practices or procedures or adjudicatory decisions of either Party, basing itself on Zairian Ordinance Law No. 69-044 of 1 October 1966, relating to the injuries suffered as the result of the disturbances which declared inadmissible all actions based on general law in matters of civil liability, seeking to condemn the State to pay compensation for the losses or injuries suffered in connection with the riots or insurrections. The Counter-Memorial confirmed as a consequence that the claim made by AMT was inadmissible, because the Treaty under reference could not derogate from this legal provision on public policy matters.
- 3.13 Finally, the Government of Zaire raised an additional objection based on the inadmissibility of AMT's claim for violations of Articles 45 and 46 of the Code of Investment of Zaire, AMT being a United States company which has never made any direct investment in the State of Zaire, whereas SINZA, the direct investor for this purpose is a legal entity of Zairian nationality, exclusively empowered to institute arbitral proceedings under Article 45 of Zairian Investment Code.
- 3.14 c) The Reply, filed by AMT on 17 June 1994, answered the objections raised by the Government of Zaire to the jurisdiction of ICSID and consequently to the competence of the Tribunal. AMT presented its observations on the questions of inadmissibility of its claims as to the jurisdiction of ICSID as well as its merits.

3.15 In its Reply, AMT rejected all the objections and exceptions raised by the Respondent, underlying the fact that it was AMT which was always the direct investor in Zaire, as majority stockholder of SINZA, an industrial corporation established in Zaire but deemed to be a legal entity of United States nationality for the purpose of ICSID jurisdiction.

3.16 In this Reply, the Claimant took occasion to propose the date for the hearing before the Tribunal in the course of the first week of September 1994. After consultation with the Parties, the Tribunal fixed the date of the beginning of hearing on 4 November 1994 at the headquarters of ICSID in Washington, D.C. and this date was communicated to the Parties by the Secretary of the Tribunal in his letter of 23 August 1994. On 13 October 1994, AMT requested that this date be postponed till after 4 November 1994. Upon this request, the Tribunal fixed 5 and 6 December 1994 as new dates for the hearing of the Tribunal at the offices of the World Bank in Paris.

3.17 d) The Rejoinder, filed by the Republic of Zaire on 19 July 1994, reconfirmed the position of the Government of Zaire as reflected in the Counter-Memorial and earlier documents, regarding lack of jurisdiction on the part of ICSID and the inadmissibility of AMT's claim, rejecting all allegations put forward by AMT in support of its claim for compensation plus interests, which the Claimant alleged that the State of Zaire had the duty to pay.

3.18 In short, the Republic of Zaire has never contended on the merit that the property of SINZA was not damaged. SINZA was actually subjected to the same plight as those who were victims of the looting of 1991 and 1993. But, the Rejoinder further maintained, that "the question of compensation is something else, because none of these victims has ever received any treatment more favorable than that accorded to SINZA". To the best of the Government of Zaire's knowledge, no victim of the looting of 1991 and 1993 has been compensated by the Zairian Government, for which no proof of compensation was ever furnished by AMT.

3.19 In the end, the Republic of Zaire reaffirmed its disposition with regard to ICSID, which has never been one of disdain, as AMT had led to believe, and that it was a false accusation by AMT.

C. THE ORAL PROCEDURE

3.20 a) Representation of the Parties : By letter dated 2 November 1994, AMT communicated to ICSID the names of the persons composing its representation :

1. Mr. Hassan YAHFOUFI, President of AMT; and
2. Mr. Daniel D. DINUR, Counsel and Advocate.

Apart from these representatives, the following witnesses would give evidence before the Tribunal :

1. Mr. David W. NICHOLAS, a U.S. national;
2. Mr. Madioko Julian MUTSHUNU, a Zairian national; and
3. Mr. Firas Mohammad YAHFOUFI, a Lebanese national.

3.21 By a letter No. 130.03/000817, dated 30 November 1994, from Minister LUNDA-BULULU to the President of the Tribunal, the Government of Zaire nominated its representation to the oral procedure, as follows :

1. Attorney Manzila Lundum SAL'ASAL, Advocate of the Government in this case; and
2. His Excellency Mr. Ramazani BAYA, ambassador of the Republic of Zaire to France.

3.22 b) The Oral Hearing By the above-cited letter of 30 November 1994, the Government of Zaire requested a postponement of the hearing until towards the end of January 1995. Having notified the Parties that the hearing could not at this stage be postponed and was as such maintained, the Tribunal held the sittings of the oral hearing in Paris on 5 December 1994 as scheduled, having also received a communication from the Claimant opposing any postponement of the hearing, (Procedural Order No. 2, 6 December 1994).

3.23 The oral hearing took place in Paris, as scheduled, at the offices of the World Bank on 5 and 6 December 1994. The Claimant, AMT, was represented by the persons previously designated. However, the Respondent remained without representation except in the person of a Counsellor of the Embassy without nomination, authorization or accreditation of any kind.

3.24 AMT thus proceeded to present its proofs and all grounds in support of its claims for reparation for the losses and injuries caused by members of the armed forces of Zaire during the destructions of 1991 and 1993 and the injurious consequences which ensued. The Tribunal heard the evidence given by two witnesses as well as a deposition of an expert concerning the assessment of compensation and interests thereon. The witnesses and the expert were questioned by the Arbitrators and by the President of the Tribunal on 5 December 1994, as provided by Article 35 of the Arbitration Rules.

D. PROCEDURAL ORDER NO. II

3.25 In the course of the hearing on 5 December 1994 at the offices of the World Bank in Paris, the Tribunal adopted a Procedural Order No. II, of which the relevant Paragraphs read as follows :

THE TRIBUNAL...

Having noted that the Respondent failed to present its case at the oral hearing, and Having duly deliberated thereon,

GRANTS the Respondent a period of grace in accordance with Article 45 (2) of the ICSID Convention and ICSID Arbitration Rule 42, and in the present case

DECIDES to hold a supplemental hearing in Paris on 13 and 14 February 1995, provided that

a) The Republic of Zaire informs the Arbitral Tribunal that it agrees to cover the fees and expenses of the Arbitrators as well as the administrative fees related to such hearing, and

b) The Republic of Zaire deposits not later than 25 January 1995 the funds requested by the Secretary of the Tribunal in his letter of today's date to cover the fees and expenses referred to above.

3.26 The Republic of Zaire has not chosen to confirm either its intention to appear before the Tribunal in the course of the supplemental hearing scheduled for 13 and 14 February 1995, or its acceptance of the conditions stipulated in paragraphs a) and b) of the Procedural Order No. II, cited above. The supplemental hearing was thus never held in Paris.

3.27 The time has come for the Tribunal to pronounce upon the questions presented by the Parties as to the competence of ICSID and that of the Tribunal itself, as well as on the merit of the dispute. The Tribunal will therefore examine these questions successively before reaching its conclusions.

PART TWO : QUESTIONS OF COMPETENCE

IV : GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS : OBJECTION TO THE COMPETENCE

4.01 The various procedural steps relating to the competence of the Tribunal have been mentioned and described in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 above.

4.02 After the Tribunal had had its first session at the headquarters of ICSID in the absence of Zaire, the Respondent, the latter submitted a "Counter-Memorial" dated 30 May 1994. Zaire never failed to take that opportunity to express its gratitude to the Tribunal for acceding to its request for an extension of the time-limit for the filing of its Counter-Memorial.

4.03 In its Counter-Memorial, Zaire maintains that the Tribunal is incompetent to hear the case brought before it by AMT. In support of this proposition, Zaire resorts to the following :

- Lack of status;
- Incompetence of ICSID to consider the proceeding instituted before it by AMT;
- Non-compliance by AMT with Article VIII of Zaire-U.S. Treaty (BIT); and
- Violations of Articles II, IV and IX of the same Treaty.

Zaire further concludes that AMT's claim was inadmissible by reason of its violations of Articles 45 and 46 of the Zairian Investments Code.

4.04 In its Rejoinder of 19 July 1994, Zaire reiterates its argument regarding the inadmissibility of AMT's claim for the reasons elaborated in the Counter-Memorial which Zaire reconfirms in its entirety.

4.05 The core defense of Zaire consists in the argument that the Zairo-United States Treaty may well relate to the natural and juridical persons of the United States or Zairian nationality; and although AMT is clearly a U.S. company, it has never made any direct investment in its name in the Republic of Zaire. According to Zaire, AMT has furnished no proof whatsoever of its direct investment. Zaire indicates that AMT has merely participated, as a stockholder, in the investment made by SINZA, a Zairian company. Zaire thereupon concludes that SINZA, being a Zairian company, cannot benefit from the Zaire-U.S. Treaty. Deducing consequences from this observation, Zaire contends that the Centre is without competence, considering that the dispute in question is between a State and a national of the same State, such a dispute has never entered into the scope of application of the Convention.

4.06 In its Rejoinder, Zaire denies ever entertaining any disdainful attitude towards the Tribunal and explains that its failures were due to the "unfortunate and disastrous" consequences triggered by the disturbances which happened to take place in the country.

4.07 The Tribunal notes that it has amply taken into consideration the circumstances referred to by Zaire throughout the proceedings. The Tribunal has in effect demonstrated a deep understanding in regard to Zaire.

4.08 In any event, as Zaire itself admits, it follows clearly from the facts of the case that Zaire has been in default, while invoking the incompetence of ICSID and of the Tribunal.

4.09 After having carefully examined the different arguments raised by Zaire to persuade the Tribunal to declare itself incompetent, the Tribunal has decided to join the preliminary objections to the merits of the case. On the other hand, the Tribunal deems it its duty to ascertain whether it is properly seized of the case and that it shall, in all cases, examine the question of its own competence before embarking upon consideration of the merits of the case.

V. QUESTIONS RELATING TO THE COMPETENCE OF THE TRIBUNAL AND THAT OF ICSID

A. REGISTRATION OF THE REQUEST FOR ARBITRATION

5.01 The competence of the Tribunal is obviously derived from that of the Centre. One may presume that by registering the Request for Arbitration of AMT, the Secretary General of ICSID does not consider, "on the basis of the information contained" in the Request "that the dispute is manifestly outside the jurisdiction of the Centre". In reality, the Secretary-General would not have registered this Request if, in accordance with Article 36 (3) of the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States, it was otherwise. Nevertheless, this fact does not prevent the Tribunal from examining the competence of ICSID, because, evidently Article 36 (3) does not confer upon the Secretary-General of ICSID, responsible for the registration of Request, notably as concerns verification of the competence of the Centre, the task other than a mere obligation of an extremely light control which in the execution does not, in any sense, bind the Tribunal in any way in the latter's appreciation of its own competence or lack thereof. The Tribunal will still have a number of questions to raise and also to find answers thereto.

5.02 In the process, the Tribunal will have to apply, in the present case, in addition to the Convention and the Rules of Procedure for Arbitration proceedings (Arbitration Rules), the Bilateral Treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Zaire concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investment (BIT).

Neither Party has contested the applicability of this Treaty to the present case.

B. GROUNDS ADVANCED BY ZAIRE FOR ITS OBJECTIONS TO THE COMPETENCE

5.03 The Tribunal will now examine the different grounds upon which Zaire founds its objections to the competence. It will, in addition, inquire into every question relating to its competence, as is already indicated.

(1) First Ground : The three prerequisites of ICSID Competence

5.04 In the first place, the Tribunal must respond to the question whether ICSID is competent in the present case. The problem of competence of the Centre is treated in Article 25 of the Convention. For this purpose, three conditions are required :

- a) There must be a legal dispute arising out of an investment;
- b) The dispute must have arisen between a Contracting State and a national of another Contracting State; and
- c) The parties must have consented to submit their dispute to the Centre.

5.05 The Tribunal will take up these three conditions for verification of the fulfillment.

(a) A LEGAL DISPUTE (RATIONE MATERIAE)

5.06 Is it a legal dispute?

Under Article 25 of the Convention, "The jurisdiction of the Centre shall extend to any legal dispute..."

In this regard, there does not seem to be the least discrepancy between the Parties and the Tribunal is of the view that there is clearly a legal dispute and not a dispute of another nature, the dispute requiring the application of rules of law and calling for legal solutions.

- (b) A DISPUTE BETWEEN A STATE AND A NATIONAL OF ANOTHER STATE (RATIONE PERSONAE)

5.07 Is it a dispute between a Contracting State and a national of another Contracting State?

The same Article 25 of the Convention expressly provides that the dispute must be between "a Contracting State (or any constituent subdivision or agency of a Contracting State) and a national of another Contracting State". In this case, the Contracting State is the Republic of Zaire. The dispute is with AMT. Is AMT truly, in accordance with Article 25, "a national of another Contracting State"? Zaire admits that AMT is clearly a national of another Contracting State, the United States of America. The Tribunal, in turn, reaches the same conclusion. Article 25 (2) defines what is regarded as a national of a Contracting State, as follows :

- (a) "Any natural person who had the nationality of a Contracting State other than the State party to the dispute on the date on which the parties consented to submit such dispute to conciliation or arbitration as well as on the date on which the request was registered pursuant to paragraph (3) of Article 28 or paragraph (3) of Article 36, but does not include any person who on either date also had the nationality of the Contracting State party to the dispute; and
- (b) "Any juridical person which had the nationality of a Contracting State other than the State party to the dispute on the date on which the parties consented to submit such dispute to conciliation or arbitration and any juridical person which had the nationality of the Contracting State party to the dispute on that date and which, because of foreign control, the parties have agreed should be treated as a national of another Contracting State for the purposes of this Convention."

5.08 The criticism of Zaire is not directed against the nationality of AMT but rather against its status or capacity to act. In effect, on its first ground in the Counter-Memorial, Zaire denies that AMT possesses any capacity to act in the present case. To support this argument, Zaire recalls that Article 1 of the Treaty identifies the beneficiaries of the advantages "which it has in mind and cites, on the one hand the juridical person, national of one of the Signatory States of the Treaty...", and on the other, "natural persons of Zairian nationality or of American nationality who invest in the United States or in the Republic of Zaire", and Zaire thus contends that AMT "is not an investor in the Republic of Zaire". An investor, in the view of Zaire, is certainly SINZA in its own country, an investor in whose name AMT could not act. AMT therefore does not have the capacity to act, according to Zaire.

5.09 The Tribunal finds that the dispute is brought before the Centre by AMT. It does not consider it possible to contest that AMT is not a juridical person with United States nationality. Besides, an appropriate document has been filed with the Tribunal which clearly proves this fact. It suffices for this purpose to refer to the developments contained in paragraphs 4.03 to 4.05 above. Furthermore, it should be recalled, Zaire also recognizes this fact.

5.10 Indeed, Zaire denies that the dispute is with AMT. It regards the dispute rather as being with SINZA that has assumed the function of Claimant, since it is SINZA that has been established in the territory of Zaire, which has operated the industry damaged by the destruction, the object of the dispute. Besides, Zaire continues, SINZA is a Zairian company and the dispute it has with Zaire would have to be settled in accordance with the normal law of Zaire, and not by and in accordance with the procedure provided by the ICSID Convention.

5.11 The Tribunal does not concur in the argument presented by Zaire because it does not find it pertinent. In fact, Zaire itself recognizes in its Reply (page 2, paragraph 2 (1) in fine) that AMT "invested by participating in the capital of SINZA". But at the same time, Zaire contends that the fact that AMT participated in the capital even at one hundred per cent (100 %) to form a Zairian company, SINZA, does not confer upon AMT any power to act in the place and instead of SINZA.

5.12 This reasoning has not convinced the Tribunal. For the Tribunal, the Zaire-United States Treaty concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investments (BIT) states, in its preamble, that "The two States parties, desiring to promote greater economic cooperation between themselves", particularly "with respect to investment by nationals and companies of each Party in the territory of the other Party."

5.13 And in Article I on definitions, it is provided in paragraph (a) that "Company means any kind of juridical entity, including any corporation, company, association, or other organization, that is duly incorporated, constituted, or otherwise duly organized, regardless of whether or not the entity is organized for pecuniary gain, privately or governmentally owned, or organized with limited or unlimited liability."

5.14 In paragraph (c) of the same Article I, the authors of the Treaty have made it even more abundantly clear when they define the term "investment". In effect, it is provided that the term "investment" means every kind of investment, owned or controlled directly or indirectly, including equity, debt, and service and investment contracts; and includes : ..... ii) "A company or shares of stock or other interests in a company or interests in the assets thereof."

5.15 It is uncontested that SINZA belongs to AMT 94 per cent and that AMT, formed in the United States of America with 55 per cent of its shares owned by United States citizens, is controlled by the Americans, and hence is a U.S. company. Thus, SINZA should be considered in terms of the perfectly clear provisions of the Treaty as an investment of AMT. It follows that SINZA falls within the category of juridical person envisaged in Article 25 (2) of the Convention as previously cited. It is not called into question whether, as Zaire suggests, AMT can act in the name of SINZA. AMT acts in its own name and in its capacity as an American enterprise having invested in Zaire, that is to say, a national of a State party having a dispute with another State party which has welcomed his investments on its territory.

5.16 For the foregoing reasons, the argument based on the defect in the capacity of the Claimant must be rejected.

(c) THE CONSENT OF THE PARTIES TO THE DISPUTE
(RATIONE VOLUNTATIS)

5.17 Is there absence of consent of the Parties?

The Tribunal will now examine, as earlier stated, whether the Parties have consented to submit the dispute to the Centre. Such a question is directly linked to the first ground already examined.

The first question that comes to mind is this : Is it necessary, in the present case, that there must be consent between the State (Zaire) and the national (AMT) of another State (U.S.A.), to submit the dispute to the Centre? The bilateral Treaty does not suffice since it provides that the disputes of the type to be considered by the Tribunal must be justiceable before ICSID.

In other words, does the consent of the United States creates an obligation for its national? Should there not be, in addition to that consent, also the consent by AMT itself relating to a specific dispute? Can the United States impose upon its national the passage of consent to ICSID? Or, better still, in the absence of AMT's consent, will the Treaty signed by the United States of America and Zaire suffice to take its place?

5.18 The Tribunal holds that this question must be answered in the negative. The requirement of the consent of the parties does not disappear with the existence of the Treaty. The Convention envisages an exchange of consents between the Parties. When Article 25 states in paragraph 1 that "the parties" must have consented in writing to submit the dispute to the Centre, it does not speak of the States or more precisely, it speaks of a State and a national of another State. It appears therefore that the two States cannot, by virtue of Article 25 of the Convention, compel any of their nationals to appear before the Centre; this is a power that the Convention has not granted to the States.

5.19 By the same token, reference should be made to Article VII, paragraph 2 of the Treaty, which provides : "Each Party hereby consents to submit investment disputes to the International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes (Centre) for settlement by conciliation or binding arbitration." This provision is further clarified by paragraph 3, in fine, of the same Article VII which reads : "If the dispute cannot be resolved through consultation and negotiation, then the dispute shall be submitted for settlement in accordance with the applicable dispute-settlement procedures upon which the Parties to the dispute may have previously agreed."

5.20 It appears clearly that if Zaire and the United States agree that the disputes of the type which is submitted to the Tribunal could be brought before ICSID, they have thus, each on its part, accepted the competence of ICSID to be eventually proceeded against by a national of the other co-contracting State. But this acceptance is not automatic for all disputes, the Parties in question, (that is to say, a State and a national of another State), remain masters of the procedure of their choice which they may deem appropriate to apply in order to resolve an emerging dispute. This is the way it is necessary to understand the meaning of Article VII, paragraph 3, "in fine", and sub-paragraph (a) of paragraph 4 of the same Article.

5.21 On the other hand, to be more convinced, it is enough to read paragraph 4 of Article VII of which sub-paragraph (b) is thus worded : "Once the national or company concerned has so consented, either party to the dispute may institute proceedings before the Centre or Additional Facility at any time after six months from the date upon which the dispute arose", provided the "dispute has not, for any reason, been submitted by the national or company for resolution in accordance with any applicable dispute settlement procedures previously approved by the parties to the dispute", and "the national or company concerned has not brought the dispute before the courts of justice or administrative tribunals or agencies of competent jurisdiction of the Party that is a party to the dispute."

5.22 Finally, it is convenient to cite the end of paragraph 4, which reads : "If the parties to the dispute disagree over whether conciliation or binding arbitration is the more appropriate procedure to be employed, the procedure desired by the national or company concerned shall be followed." A right of option is thus recognized for the national of the other contracting State.

5.23 It seems that upon reading this provision of the Treaty, it cannot be contended that consent of the parties to come before ICSID simply results from a pre-existing agreement by the United States and Zaire. It is therefore necessary to show that there has also been an agreement between the Parties, or in the absence of this agreement, it would have been necessary to apply Article VII, paragraph 4 in fine which confers upon a national of the other State the power to compel the State party to the dispute to appear before the Centre. This is very much the case before us.

In the present case, it happens that AMT (the national envisaged in paragraph 4) has opted for a proceeding before ICSID. AMT has expressed its choice without any equivocation; this willingness together with that of Zaire expressed in the Treaty, creates the consent necessary to validate the assumption of jurisdiction by the Centre.

(2) Other Supplementary Grounds Examined by the Tribunal

5.24 The second ground raised by Zaire is founded on the fact that ICSID is competent only to entertain proceedings between nationals and juridical persons of different nationalities and the present case is apparently a proceeding between SINZA, a Zairian corporation and the Republic of Zaire, the competence of the said ICSID is therefore not well-founded in this case.

5.25 The Tribunal has already found in paragraphs 5.06 to 5.16 above that the present case is in fact between AMT and Zaire, by virtue of the Convention and the Treaty between the United States of America and Zaire. The argument advanced by Zaire as its second ground cannot therefore be sustained, an argument which, in the ultimate analysis, is but an aspect of the first ground already rejected by the Tribunal.

5.26 In the third place, Zaire has raised a ground based upon AMT's failure to apply Article VIII of the Zaire-U.S. Treaty before instituting arbitral proceedings.

This Article provides that "Any dispute between the Parties concerning the interpretation or application of this Treaty should, if possible, be resolved through consultations between representatives of the two Parties, and if this should fail, through other diplomatic channels."

5.27 Zaire contends that, to the best of its knowledge, AMT has not used, as a prior requirement, the various means of dispute resolution referred to above, before addressing ICSID, and in so doing deduces from this fact that AMT has violated the above cited provision, which should entail rejection of its claim.

5.28 The Tribunal notes that Article VIII of the Treaty, as the title suggests "Settlement of Disputes between the Parties concerning Interpretation or Application of this Treaty", does not relate to the dispute of the type which is brought before it, but rather the disputes between two signatory States as to the interpretation or application of the Treaty. It follows that this ground also must fail.

5.29 The fourth ground presented by Zaire is based on the alleged violation of Articles II, IV and IX of the Zaire-U.S. Treaty. Article II relates to the investments and prescribes the obligation of the parties to apply to these investments the most favorable treatment.

5.30 As for Article IV, it concerns compensation in certain circumstances.

5.31 These two provisions are clearly concerned with the merit of the case and the Tribunal does not see how they can be invoked to pre-empt the admissibility of AMT's claim, subject to the reservation regarding its soundness.

5.32 Consequently, the Tribunal declares these grounds inadmissible.

5.33 The fifth ground presented by Zaire is founded on the alleged violation of Article IX of the Zaire-U.S. Treaty. Article IX, entitled "Preservation of Rights", runs :
"This Treaty shall not supersede, prejudice, or otherwise derogate from :

- (a) laws and regulations, administrative practices or procedures, or adjudicatory decisions of either Party;*
- (b) international legal obligations; or*
- (c) obligations assumed by either Party, including those contained in an investment agreement or an investment authorization,* whether extant at the time of entry into force of this Treaty or thereafter, that entitle investments, or associated activities, of nationals or companies of the other Party to treatment more favorable than that accorded by this Treaty in like situations."

5.34 Zaire deduces from these provision that "Ordinance-Law No. 69-044 of 1 October 1966 relating to losses and injuries caused by the disturbances, declaring inadmissible any action based on ordinary law in matters of civil liability and seeking to condemn the State to compensate for the damage caused either by riots or insurrections...", AMT's claim is inadmissible. This Treaty cannot derogate from the prescription of the above-cited ordinance-Law in public policy matters.

5.35 This way of proceeding cannot be retained by the Tribunal. In effect, the Treaty is supreme over the law. But what is more decisive is that Zaire gives to Article IX an interpretation which is untenable.

5.36 Certainly, the manner in which Article IX of the Treaty is formatted could mislead any reader and could entail an interpretation not in conformity with the object and purpose of the provisions in question. Such an interpretation would lead to an absurd result and an unacceptable fact. A careful reading, consistent with the title of the Article, clearly shows that a typographical error has tempted us to join the part of the Article starting with "Whether extant at the time of entry into force of this Treaty or thereafter, that entitle investments....." to paragraph (c) only, whereas, although the French word "donne" does not end with "ent" in French, and does not take a plural form, the end of paragraph (c) concerns points (a), (b), and (c), and has no other object but to preserve the treatments which would remain more favorable than those resulting from the Treaty. The format in the English version of Article IX reaffirms this method of viewing the provision.

5.37 It follows that this ground is also unfounded.

5.38 The sixth and final ground presented by Zaire is based in essence on its first ground, (that is to say, it is SINZA that has the capacity to act) and rests on the provisions of Article 45 of the Zairian Investments Code which provides for an arbitral proceeding organized by Articles 159 to 174 of Titles III and IV of the Code of Procedure of Zaire.

5.39 The Tribunal has already responded to this argument. This last ground is not well founded either.

5.40 It remains for the Tribunal to recall Article VII of the Treaty.

5.41 Under paragraph 3 of Article VII of the Treaty, the parties to the dispute shall initially seek to resolve the dispute by consultation and negotiation. And it is only when the parties have failed to settle their dispute by these two means of settlement that they have to resort to another method of settlement.

5.42 This ground is raised by the Tribunal proprio motu.

5.43 When Article VII is carefully read, it will become clear that the efforts of negotiation and consultation have not been slight. There have been serious endeavors. In fact, by way of illustration the Parties can agree on any of the third-party dispute settlement procedures, of which the decisions are non-binding, such as the machinery of enquiry available under the ICSID Additional Facility.

5.44 In the case on hand, there have been incontestably serious negotiation attempts undertaken by AMT. These endeavors are recalled in paragraphs 12 and 13 of the Request for Arbitration filed by AMT on 20 January 1993. They result profusely from the documents filed. Unfortunately, they have been without any success.

5.45 It follows that this last ground also is unfounded.

- 5.46 It thus appears that none of the grounds advanced by Zaire or by the Tribunal itself in support of lack of competence on the part of the Tribunal is valid and that the proceeding instituted by AMT before ICSID is perfectly admissible.

PART THREE : QUESTIONS OF MERIT

VI. THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE STATE OF ZAIRE

- 6.01 After having examined the questions of competence, of the Centre as well as of the Tribunal, and having reached an affirmative conclusion, by discarding each of the grounds invoked by the Republic of Zaire in support of its objections to the competence and by dismissing proprio motu other conceivable grounds for declining jurisdiction by ICSID and the Tribunal itself, the Tribunal must now examine the questions of merit.

A. LEGAL BASIS OF STATE RESPONSIBILITY

- 6.02 Once the questions of competence have been determined in the affirmative, it is necessary in the first place to determine the legal basis of the right to compensation and consequently the quantum of the compensation.
- 6.03 AMT suggests in paragraph 11 of its Request for Arbitration dated 25 January 1993, and repeated in its Memorial of 8 December 1993 that the Republic of Zaire has breached its obligations arising out of the Bilateral Treaty between Zaire and the United States of America of 1984 (BIT). These obligations are incorporated in the various provisions of the BIT, in particular, Articles II (4), III and IV (1)(b) and (2)(b).

- 6.04 a) Obligation of Protection and Security of Investment

In the first place, AMT invokes its right to the treatment of protection and security corresponding to the obligation provided by Article II paragraph 4 of the BIT which reads :

ARTICLE II : TREATMENT OF INVESTMENT

- (4) "Investment of nationals and companies of either Party shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment and shall enjoy protection and security in the territory of the other Party. The treatment, protection and security of investment shall be in accordance with applicable national laws, and may not be less than that recognized by international law..... Each Party shall observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investment of nationals or companies of the other Party."

- 6.05 The obligation such as cited above contracted by the Republic of Zaire and the United States of America constitutes an obligation of guarantee for the protection and security of the investments made by nationals and companies of one or the other Party, in the case before us, by American nationals or companies, AMT, in the territory of Zaire, at Kinshasa. The obligation incumbent upon Zaire is an obligation of vigilance, in the sense that Zaire as the receiving State of investments made by AMT, an American company, shall take all measures necessary to ensure the full enjoyment of protection and security of its investment and should not be permitted to invoke its own legislation to detract from any such obligation. Zaire must show that it has taken all measure of precaution to protect the investments of AMT on its territory. It has not done so, by mere recognition of the existing reality of the damage caused while designating SINZA as the victim and alleging that its own national legislation has exonerated Zaire from all obligations to make reparation for the injuries sustained on its territory in the circumstances such as those giving rise to the present dispute. In this regard, the Tribunal has demonstrated the contrary.

6.06 These treatments of protection and security of investment required by the provisions of the BIT of which AMT is beneficiary must be in conformity with its applicable national laws and must not be any less than those recognized by international law. For the Tribunal, this last requirement is fundamental for the determination of the responsibility of Zaire. It is thus an objective obligation which must not be inferior to the minimum standard of vigilance and of care required by international law.

6.07 The question to be considered relates to the means by which to ascertain whether there has been a breach of duty on the part of the State of Zaire in regard to its obligation of vigilance, such as provided by Article II paragraph 4 of the BIT to ensure the protection and security of the investment made by AMT in Zaire. What then is the practical criterion to determine the level of the precautionary measure to be taken by the receiving State consistent with the minimum standard recognized by international law? More particularly, what are the appropriate measures to be adopted by the Republic of Zaire in the circumstances to protect the security of the investment of AMT? Has Zaire taken any of these measures? These questions are not at all answered by Zaire.

6.09 Res ipsa loquitur : what has happened is self-explanatory without requiring extraneous proof. Yet, Zaire has never denied its breach of the obligation of vigilance. Simply, admits Zaire that it is SINZA which "has been the object of looting in 1991 as indeed it was the case with all the others." But, continues Zaire, AMT has not adduced any evidence to show that the State of Zaire "has accorded in like circumstances a treatment less favorable to SINZA than that which it has accorded to its own nationals or companies." Or else, Zaire could have contended that it has accorded to SINZA a treatment no less favorable in the circumstances than that which it has accorded to nationals or companies of any third State whatsoever.

6.10 If the argument advanced by Zaire does not seem altogether unfounded, the fact remains that Zaire has manifestly failed to respect the minimum standard required of it by international law. It should be added that Zaire has equally failed to perform a similar obligation with regard to a third State or all other third States. In effect, the argument advanced by Zaire that it has not accorded to nationals and companies of these States any protection or reparation, is not pertinent for the Tribunal. Since the repetition of breaches and failures to perform similar obligations it owes to third States will not in any way exonerate the objective responsibility of the State of Zaire for the breach of its obligation of the treatment of protection and security it owes to AMT by virtue of Article II paragraph 4 of the BIT.

6.11 Consequently, the reasoning presented by Zaire is not acceptable. The responsibility of the State of Zaire is incontestably engaged by the very fact of an omission by Zaire to take every measure necessary to protect and ensure the security of the investment made by AMT in its territory.

6.12 b) Obligation to prevent losses resulting from the event envisaged in Article IV paragraph 1 (b)

The engagement of the responsibility of the State of Zaire is more specifically reinforced by the provisions of Article IV paragraph 1 (b) of the BIT : titled : Compensation for Damages due to War and Similar Events", covering, in part the cases in which :

"1. Nationals or companies of either Party whose investments in the territory of the other Party suffer.....

(b) damages due to revolution, state of national emergency revolt, insurrection, riot or act of violence in the territory of such other Party..."

6.13 Without discussing for the moment the question of the quantum of appropriate compensatory indemnity, it suffices to confirm once more the engagement of the responsibility of the State of Zaire for all the losses resulting "from riot or act of violence in the territory of such other Party", in this case, Zaire. Such is the case without the Tribunal enquiring as to the identity of the author of the acts of violence committed on the Zairian territory. It is of little or no consequence whether it be a member of the Zairian armed forces or any burglar whatsoever. This responsibility Zaire cannot set aside by invoking its own national legislation. It is an international obligation which Zaire has freely contracted within the framework of the BIT.

6.14 It is by the process of this two-fold reasoning based on the double legal foundation of the bilateral Treaty, either Article II (4), or Article IV (1)(b), or the combination of both provisions that the Tribunal arrived at the conclusion that the Republic of Zaire is inevitably responsible for the losses and damages resulting from the events of 23-24 September 1991 and of 28-29 January 1993, without having to determine by whom these losses were caused. And this falls directly within the scope of Article IV paragraph (1)(b) of the said Treaty, which serves at the same time to reinforce further the engagement of the responsibility of the State of Zaire for ensuring the protection and security of the investment made by AMT on the Zairian territory in accordance with Article II paragraph 4 of the BIT, as well as the obligation to prevent the occurrence of any act of violence on its territory. It is the duty or obligation to prevent the occurrence of a given event that is at issue.

6.15 c) Obligation to make restitution or to pay compensation for the destruction of property "by the forces or authorities of the other Party which was not caused in combat action"

Furthermore, AMT alleges in its Request for Arbitration and in its Memorial that the losses and damages suffered by SINZA resulted from "the destruction of property by the forces or the authorities of the other Party which was not caused in combat action".

6.16 It is true that the damages and injuries sustained by AMT were not caused in combat actions. However, there has never been any claim that the injuries suffered in the course of the events of 23-24 September 1991 and of 28-28 January 1993 were caused in combat actions.

6.17 The only question that occupies the attention of the Tribunal up till now is whether there is a third reason to strengthen still further the responsibility of the State of Zaire with particular regard to the losses and damages suffered by AMT during the course of the above mentioned events. This third reason, if there ever was one, would merely serve as a complementary ground to engage the responsibility of the State of Zaire. The Tribunal could very well leave aside the question whether there is in reality a third legal basis in this case to engage once more the responsibility of Zaire for the same losses or injuries incurred to the detriment of AMT.

6.18 The Tribunal does not see any use in seeking to reach a definite conclusion to establish for the third time the responsibility of the Republic of Zaire, for the same losses and for the same injuries caused to the detriment of AMT. The Tribunal therefore refrains from making any pronouncement on this very question.

6.19 The Tribunal fails to see any usefulness in searching for yet an additional legal ground on which to found the responsibility of the State of Zaire by application of Article IV paragraph 2 (b) of the Zaire-U.S. Bilateral Treaty in favor of AMT. When it subsequently examines this question, it will not be to draw any conclusions regarding responsibility, but it will be simply to review the method of evaluation of the compensation due to AMT.

B. LEGAL CONSEQUENCES OF STATE RESPONSIBILITY

6.20 With the establishment of doubly reinforced legal foundation for the responsibility of the State of Zaire vis-a-vis AMT, it is now time to examine the legal consequences flowing from the ascertainment of international responsibility of the State of Zaire.

6.21 The delicate question that the Tribunal is called upon to consider is how the Tribunal should proceed to assess the amount of compensation or indemnification required by international law in order to restore to AMT the conditions previously existing as if the events had never occurred or taken place. This question may be better examined in the light of a critical analysis of the amount of compensation and interests thereon which the Tribunal must determine with precision and on a solid basis of a well-defined scientific measurement. Otherwise as an alternative, the Tribunal could have recourse to another path to follow, that of exercising its sovereign discretion to determine the amount of compensation to be paid to AMT by the Republic of Zaire, taking into account the actual injury suffered.

6.22 Zaire contends in its Rejoinder of 19 July 1994 that "The Republic of Zaire has never claimed that the property of SINZA was never damaged. SINZA has been subjected to the same plight as all those who were victims of the looting in 1991 and 1993." "But", adds Zaire, "the question of compensation is something else, because none of these victims has been accorded a treatment more favorable than SINZA."

6.23 The question of the amount of compensation should be considered separately from the question of responsibility which has been definitively determined. Zaire has claimed that it has now fulfilled all the obligations it was bound to perform if only no one could provide any proof that Zaire had accorded a treatment in regard to indemnification or compensation more favorable than that it has accorded to SINZA or to AMT, the Claimant in the present instance. Zaire adds that, having offered no one any compensation, it has in this sense not violated the principle of equality and of non-discrimination of treatment.

6.24 The argument as presented above by the Republic of Zaire could only be appreciated by the Tribunal to the extent that Zaire had accorded a favorable treatment to one of its own nationals or companies or to one of the nationals or companies of any third State whatsoever. In the absence of such a treatment, there would not be any possible comparison to ascertain the level or even the type of the treatment, whether by means of restitution, compensation or indemnification, or else precisely Zaire has not accorded any indemnity, any compensation. Accordingly, the Tribunal does not find such an argument sustainable. The contention of the Republic of Zaire is untenable. It is therefore rejected by the Tribunal. The only remaining issue is that envisioned in Article II of the BIT, that is to say the treatment, the protection and security at least equivalent to "those recognized by international law." It is therefore upon this basis that the Tribunal will proceed to assess the compensation due to AMT.

PART FOUR : THE QUANTUM OF DAMAGES THE AMOUNT OF COMPENSATION

7.01 Having firmly established the responsibility of the State of Zaire for all the losses, injuries and damages sustained by AMT, and caused by the acts of violence committed to the detriment of the investment made by AMT on the territory of Zaire, the Tribunal will now determine the quantum of compensation to be paid by Zaire regardless of the existence or absence of fault or independently thereof. Suffice it to prove that Zaire has not fulfilled its obligation of vigilance, and a fortiorissime, Zaire has also breached its obligation to prevent the occurrence of a given event, above all whether there have been acts of violence on the Zairian territory, giving rise to losses, damages and injuries sustained by AMT.

A. THE METHOD OF ASSESSMENT OF COMPENSATION

7.02 There are apparently several different methods of assessment of the quantum or the total amount of compensation plus interests thereon which should be equitable in the circumstances of the present case.

7.03 Two different criteria seem to attract the attention of AMT as Claimant. The first is the criterion reflected in the most favorable treatment as required by the minimum standard provided in Article II paragraph 4 of the Zaire-U.S. Bilateral Treaty. The second criterion preferred by AMT is the one proposed in Article III of the Treaty. This article, entitled "Compensation for Expropriation" provides for compensation "equivalent to the fair market value of the expropriated investment". The said compensation shall "include interests at a rate equivalent to current international rates from the date of expropriation, and be freely transferrable at the prevailing market rate of exchange on the date of expropriation". The case in hand is clearly not a case of expropriation. But can it be assimilated to expropriation? The answer of the Tribunal is in the negative.

7.04 AMT has invoked, in support of its preference, Article IV paragraph (2)(b) of the Zaire-U.S. Bilateral Treaty as the legal basis for its claim for compensation in accordance with Article III of the said Treaty, viewing the case as one of "destruction of property by the forces or the authorities of the other Party which was not caused in combat actions". It appears that this choice was essentially prompted by AMT's preference as to the method of calculation of compensation and interests thereon which should be allocated to it (Article III of the BIT). But for the Tribunal, the essence lies in the determination with certainty the basis of the responsibility and on that basis it may proceed to fix the just compensation due to AMT.

7.05 It has never been alleged that the destructions in question, neither that of 23-24 September 1991 nor that of 28-29 January 1993, were caused in combat actions. It is necessary to ascertain further whether there was "destruction of property by the forces or the authorities" of the Republic of Zaire.

7.06 AMT maintains that the destructions of both events in September 1991 and January 1993 were committed by the Zairian armed forces from Camp Kokolo. It is true that they appeared to be (in whole or in part - in this regard, the Tribunal is not certain) soldiers in uniform with weapons of the army, including grenades and automatic weapons belonging to the armed forces. The question to be considered by the Tribunal is whether the destruction of property was committed by the Zairian forces or authorities not in combat actions in the sense of Article IV paragraph 2(b) of the BIT.

7.07 To obtain more precise clarification on sub-paragraph (b) of paragraph 2 of Article IV, it is sufficient to read carefully once more sub-paragraph (a) which speaks of requisition of property by "the forces" or "the authorities" of the other Party, an action which can be assimilated to expropriation. It is suddenly apparent that in fact this relates to the organized forces, which even according to the evidences furnished by the only witness heard in this case is not at all the case in the circumstances of this case.

7.08 In the present case, it is true from the information received that they were the military, at least persons in military attire who manifestly acted individually without any one being able to show either that they were organized or that they were under order.

7.09 The nature of the looting and the destruction of property which were looted show clearly that it was not "the army" or "the armed forces" that acted as such in the circumstance. And this in no way resembles expropriation or requisition by the State.

7.10 And the fact that thereafter the President of the Republic of Zaire decided of his own accord to pardon these persons who acted in 1991 and in 1993 against the property of others does not alter anything in the circumstance. On the contrary, it clearly shows that they were separate individuals and not the forces that performed the action, because the Tribunal does not see how one could speak of a pardon similar to an armistice if it was the armed forces that acted in a given circumstance. An armistice may be either of a general or a personal character, but it must always refer to a determinate offense.

7.11 Moreover, an armistice or such a pardon to persons who acted in 1991 and in 1993 does not entail in international law the effect of exculpating for those receiving pardon save to the extent and from the point of view of Zairian law, and does not produce the result of exoneration for the responsibility of the State of Zaire in respect of the destruction of property belonging to nationals or companies and forming integral part of the investment made by them in Zaire.

7.12 The Tribunal does not consider it necessary to insist on this question beyond measure. In effect, its relevance is not here discussed as a foundation of the responsibility of Zaire. That is why the Tribunal prefers at this stage to concern itself with the method of calculation of the amount of compensation to which AMT is entitled because of the injury sustained.

7.13 As between the two methods of assessment of the amount of compensation to be paid to AMT by the Republic of Zaire, the Tribunal does not see any substantial difference in practice. In principle, it is necessary to assess the true value or the actual market value of the properties destroyed or the losses suffered by AMT. Is it necessary to add on top of that also the current interest to the total sum of compensation from the date of each destruction occurring in the territory of Zaire? The answer of the Tribunal will have to take into account the existing conditions of the country and not by making abstraction based on a criterion for the assessment which does not correspond at all to the reality, nor to the current happenings in Zaire, nor indeed to the commercial and industrial activities of the Claimant.

7.14 AMT would have liked to adopt a method of calculating compensation including interests practicable in the normal circumstances prevailing in an ideal country where the climate of investment is very stable, such as Switzerland or the Federal Republic of Germany. The Tribunal does not find it possible to accede to this way of evaluating the damages with interests in the circumstance under consideration, in which it is apparent that the situation remains precarious and that the lucrum cessans or the loss of profits is not at all measurable without a solid base on which to found any profit to take or for predicting the growth or expansion of the investment made. It would be neither practical nor reasonable to apply the method of assessment of compensation in a way so far removed from the striking realities of the current situation.

7.15 Preferably, the Tribunal will opt for a method that is most plausible and realistic in the circumstances of the case, while rejecting all other methods of assessment which would serve unjustly to enrich an investor who, rightly or wrongly, has chosen to invest in a country such as Zaire, believing that by so doing the investor is constructing a castle in Spain or a Swiss chalet in Germany without any risk, political or even economic or financial or any risk whatsoever.

B. COMPENSATION FOR THE LOSSES SUSTAINED

7.16 For practical reasons founded on equitable principles, the Tribunal finds that the Republic of Zaire which is responsible in international law, is under a duty to compensate AMT for the very losses which have been caused by the acts of violence and looting occurring in September 1991 and in January 1993.

7.17 In effect, the Republic of Zaire has pleaded in its Rejoinder that "No one on earth could ignore the fact that for the past four years, the Republic of Zaire has been going through a most painful and unfortunate period in its history." Zaire continues, "This requires a benevolent and compassionate attention on the part of all our partners, even those who have encountered unfortunate and disastrous consequences, for there was a time when these same persons were enjoying the benefit of the good situation of the State of Zaire."

7.18 The Tribunal has never denied the Republic of Zaire any opportunity to defend itself for the sake of good administration of justice. The Tribunal has never forsaken the principle of the right to be heard. Even without the Republic of Zaire entering an appearance to present its case, the Tribunal fully takes into account the situation in Zaire.

7.19 The Tribunal appointed Mr. Bernard Decaux, of French nationality, former civil servant of the World Bank, as independent expert for the purpose of evaluating the damages and losses suffered by Société SINZA (Zaire) in 1991/1993. Having assumed his functions to this end on 26 June 1996, the expert prepared and submitted his report on 5 September 1996 on the evaluation of the damages and losses suffered. According to the expert, the evaluation of the damages and losses suffered by Société SINZA (Zaire) in 1991/1993 is as follows :-

1. Damages to the equipments of the production line (dry cell and car battery)	US $
- Dry cell production line	1,750,000
- Car battery production line	1,465,000
- Factory repair shop	72,500
Subtotal	3,287,500

2. Damages to the building belonging to AMT
- Factory building	311,000
- Office building	28,500
- Living quarters	86,600
Subtotal	426,100
3. Value of goods damaged
- In offices (furnitures and equipment)	22,500
- In living quarters (furnitures and equipment)	25,900
Subtotal	48,400
4. Losses suffered by AMT (looting)
- Factory inventory	670,000
- Vehicles	20,500
- Merchandise and cash in the retail store
- Accounts receivable
- Appraisal fees
Subtotal	690,500
5. TOTAL (1+2+3+4)	4,452,500

7.20 This report was submitted to the Parties. It was contested by AMT in its response of 15 October 1996. The Republic of Zaire has not submitted its observations.

7.21 Thus the Tribunal must now determine the amount of compensation. The Tribunal proceeds to exercise its discretionary and sovereign power to determine the quantum of compensation that the Republic of Zaire shall pay to AMT, taking into account all the circumstances of the case before it.

A. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

1. On 27 September 2000, the Acting Secretary-General of ICSID registered a notice for the institution of arbitration proceedings, lodged by Waste Management Inc. (“Claimant”) under the ICSID Arbitration Additional Facility Rules (“the Rules”) against the United Mexican States (“Respondent”). The Claimant alleged that the Respondent is liable under Articles 1110 and 1105 of NAFTA for the actions of various state organs concerning the Claimant’s investment in an enterprise to provide waste management services to the City of Acapulco in the State of Guerrero.

2. In accordance with Article 1123 of NAFTA and Article 6 of the Rules, the parties proceeded to constitute the Arbitral Tribunal. The Claimant appointed Mr. Benjamin R. Civiletti, a United States national. The Respondent appointed Mr. Guillermo Aguilar Alvarez, a Mexican national. Pursuant to Article 1124(2), the Claimant requested the Secretary-General to appoint the President of the Tribunal. The Secretary-General, following consultations with the parties, appointed Professor James Crawford, an Australian national, to serve as President of the Tribunal. Pursuant to Article 1125 of NAFTA, the Claimant had previously agreed, by letter of 19 June 2000 accompanying its request for arbitration, to the appointment of each individual member of the Tribunal.

3. On 30 April 2001, pursuant to Article 14 of the Rules, the Secretary-General of ICSID informed the parties that all the arbitrators had accepted their appointment and that the Tribunal was deemed to have been constituted, and the proceeding to have begun, on that date. By that same letter, the Secretary-General informed the parties that Ms. Gabriela Alvarez Avila, Senior Counsel, ICSID, would serve as Secretary of the Tribunal. All subsequent written communications between the Arbitral Tribunal and the parties were made through the ICSID Secretariat.

4. On 1 June 2001, the Respondent informed the Centre that it objected to the competence of the Tribunal. This was the second occasion on which the Claimant had brought proceedings in respect of its claim. In the first proceeding, ICSID Case No. ARB/(AF)/98/2, a Tribunal constituted by Mr. Bernardo M. Cremades (President), Mr. Keith Hight and Mr. Eduardo Siqueiros (hereinafter the “First Tribunal”) rendered an award declining jurisdiction on the ground that the Claimant had not validly waived its right to pursue domestic remedies, a waiver required by NAFTA Article 1121 as a condition precedent to the submission of a claim to arbitration. Moreover this failure could not be remedied by any act of the Claimant, with the result that the Tribunal lacked jurisdiction over the claim.<sup>1</sup> The Respondent argued that the effect of the first unsuccessful proceedings was to debar the Claimant from bringing any further claim with respect to the measure alleged to be a breach of NAFTA.

5. On 8 June 2001, the first session of the Tribunal with the parties was held at the seat of the World Bank in Washington, DC. During the course of the session, the parties acknowledged that the Tribunal had been duly constituted pursuant to Article 1120 of NAFTA and the Rules. An exchange of views took place on the venue of the arbitration and on the procedure for dealing with the Respondent’s objection to jurisdiction based on the previous proceedings, and in particular on the decision of the previous Tribunal.

6. In its Procedural Order No. 1 of 8 June 2001, the Tribunal laid down timetables for written observations on the question of venue and on the preliminary objection. The parties filed their observations on the question of venue on 18 June 2001. On 6 August 2001, the Tribunal gave the parties an opportunity to make further observations on the question of venue in light of the possible relevance of the Panama

Convention.<sup>2</sup> The parties filed their further observations on venue on 28 August 2001. Subsequently, by a Decision on Venue of the Arbitration dated 26 September 2001, the Tribunal decided that the venue of the present proceedings would be the same as those of the first proceedings, viz., Washington, DC.<sup>3</sup>

7. Following a communication from the Respondent dated 16 November 2001 which did not, however, amount to a challenge, one of the Arbitrators, Mr. Guillermo Aguilar Alvarez, tendered his resignation from the Tribunal. Pursuant to Article 15(3) of the Rules, the Tribunal accepted his resignation. Pursuant to Article 18(1) of the Rules, Mexico thereupon nominated Mr. Eduardo Magallón Gómez to fill the vacancy so created. The Tribunal was reconstituted on December 14, 2001, following Mr. Magallón's acceptance of his appointment.

8. Pursuant to Procedural Order No. 1, Respondent lodged a Memorial on Jurisdiction of 8 August 2001. Claimant lodged a Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction on 9 October 2001. The hearing initially scheduled for 3 December 2001 having been postponed in order to allow the vacancy on the Tribunal to be filled, the Tribunal convened at the premises of the World Bank, Washington, DC, on 2 February 2002 to hear the parties' oral arguments on jurisdiction. The parties were represented as follows:

Ms. Brooke Bentley, Shaw Pittman.

The Tribunal heard, on behalf of the Respondent, Mr. Hugo Perezcano Díaz, and on behalf of the Claimant, Mr. Jay Alexander.

9. Representatives of the other two NAFTA parties attended the hearing on 2 February 2002:

Attending on behalf of the United States of America:

Mr. Barton Legum, Chief of the NAFTA Arbitration Division, Office of Legal Adviser, Office of International Claims, Department of State
Mr. David A. Pawlak, Attorney-Adviser, Office of Legal Adviser, Office of International Claims, Department of State.

Attending on behalf of the Government of Canada:

Mr. Douglas Heath, Embassy of Canada in Washington, DC.

10. In response to certain questions from the Tribunal concerning both the case as argued before the previous Tribunal and the proceedings brought by the Claimant in Mexico, the parties provided certain additional information and argument by letters both dated 19 February 2002.

11. On 28 June 2002, the Secretary of the Tribunal notified to the parties the Tribunal's Decision on Mexico's Preliminary Objection concerning the Previous Proceedings. A copy of the decision is attached as Annex 1. The Tribunal decided that the Claimant was not prevented from bringing its claim and reserved to a later stage the issue of the costs and expenses of the jurisdictional phase of the proceedings.<sup>4</sup> By the same letter, the Secretary of the Tribunal informed the parties that the Tribunal understood that the claim submitted by the Claimant was identical to that previously submitted to arbitration under NAFTA, and that the Memorial submitted as Appendix D to its Request of June 19, 2000 stood as the Claimant's Memorial in the present Arbitration. The Secretary of the Tribunal further invited the parties to consult with a view to agreeing on the time limits for the remaining written pleadings.

12. On the basis of the Claimant's observations of 5 and 13 August 2002 and of the Respondent's observations of 6 and 12 August 2002, and in view of the fact that the parties failed to agree in a schedule for the filing of the remaining pleadings, the Tribunal set up a schedule for the filing of pleadings by the parties, submissions by the NAFTA Parties and fixed a date for a hearing on the merits.

13. By letter of 12 August 2002, the Respondent submitted a request for interpretation and correction of certain translation errors into Spanish regarding the Tribunal's Decision of 26 June 2002, invoking Articles 56 and 57 of the Rules. On 13 August 2002, the Secretary of the Tribunal replied to Mexico, explaining that Articles 56 and 57 were only applicable to awards. The Secretary noted that Mexico's request would, however, be referred to the Tribunal for consideration pursuant to Article 35 of the Rules.

14. On 14 August 2002, the Secretary on behalf of the Tribunal invited the Claimant to file by 23 August 2002 any observations it might have in connection with Mexico's request of 12 August 2002.

15. On 22 August 2002, in a further letter to the Secretary-General, Mexico asserted that the Tribunal's Decision should be treated as an award. On 23 August 2002, the Acting Secretary-General responded to Mexico's letter of 22 August 2002, confirming that the term "award" in the ICSID Convention and Rules refers only to the final award which disposes of the case. With respect to the Additional Facility Rules, the Acting Secretary-General noted that these, being based on the Convention, were to the same effect. He further observed that a party could immediately ask the Tribunal to clarify, correct or supplement a preliminary or interim decision and that such question would be a matter for the Tribunal to decide under Article 35 of the Rules.

16. On 23 August 2002, the Claimant replied to the Tribunal's invitation to comment. It supported the Secretariat's interpretation of the term "award" in Articles 56 and 57 of the Rules, and argued that the Mexican request was accordingly inadmissible.

17. In a letter of 30 September 2002, the Secretary incorporated the Tribunal's observations to Mexico's request of 12 August 2002. The Tribunal affirmed that there was no request before it for interpretation or correction in accordance with Articles 56 and 57 of the Rules. It pointed out, however, that it had the power, while still exercising its functions and prior to the closure of the proceedings, to give any necessary interpretation of any of its decisions, to make any necessary supplementary decision, and to correct any error in the translation of a decision. The Tribunal further indicated that it could exercise such powers of its own motion or on the request of a party. The Tribunal, however, rejected Mexico's request, indicating that the two reasons given by Mexico for requesting interpretation were not relevant to the further proceedings before the Tribunal and that the Decision itself was clear. Regarding the correction of the Decision, the Tribunal stated that the points raised by Mexico did not reveal any inaccuracy in the translation of the Decision from English to Spanish or any inconsistency between the two versions.

18. By a letter of 23 September 2002, the Respondent requested an order from the Tribunal requiring disclosure of a series of documents which were said to be "relevant and necessary for the defense of this case". The request concerned two issues which were open at the merits phase, (A) damages and (B) ownership and control of the investment at issue, the Mexican company, Acaverde, S.A. de C.V., which was the actual concessionaire ("Acaverde").

19. By a letter of 30 September 2002, the Claimant noted that it was on the point of delivering to the Respondent's counsel in Washington, DC, a series of documents related to an opinion given by the Claimant's expert witness, Dr. Slottje, indicating that "most, if not all, of the financial information requested by the Respondent regarding the issue of damages will be contained in one form or another in those documents". However, it declined without an order from the Tribunal to provide documents in Category B, indicating that the Respondent appeared to be bringing an additional preliminary objection on the issue of standing. In the Claimant's view, the procedure followed by the First Tribunal had ensured that "all arguments of fact and law relating to jurisdiction" were disclosed; these did not include questions of standing.

20. By a further letter of 30 September 2002, the Respondent stressed that it had at no stage waived any right to raise other objections to the claim. In any event, it noted that the Claimant's ownership and control of Acaverde was relevant to the merits, including, eventually, to the quantum of damages.

21. On 1 October 2002, the Tribunal issued a Procedural Order concerning Disclosure of Documents, giving a certain number of indications regarding disclosure. The Tribunal expressed the view that documents concerning Acaverde's finances and operations in relation to the concession might be sought, provided they were sufficiently identified. The Tribunal further indicated that the Respondent's request for "copies of all the invoices issued in the period 1994-1998" was prima facie too burdensome, since it was likely to include large numbers of documents which were not in dispute as such. The Tribunal agreed that documents clarifying the extent of the Claimant's ownership and control of the investment were relevant. Finally, the Tribunal indicated that any remaining issues concerning specific documents could be referred back to the Tribunal by either party for a prompt ruling.

22. After an exchange of correspondence between the Respondent and the Claimant in connection with the production of documents, by a letter of 12 November 2002, the Respondent called on the Tribunal to order that it had access to information regarding Acaverde in possession of Servicios de Tecnología Ambiental, S.A. de C.V.

(“Setasa”).<sup>5</sup> The Respondent explained the reasons for its request of the Claimant’s consent to the hand-over by Setasa of documents that had been provided by a predecessor of the Claimant under cover of a confidentiality agreement, to enable Setasa to assess the value of Acaverde.

23. By a letter of 15 November 2002, the Claimant outlined aspects of the history of its relations with Setasa, underlining that Setasa did not return the documents provided to it and there had been earlier litigation between Setasa and the Claimant regarding Setasa’s compliance with the confidentiality agreement. It offered to disclose directly to the Respondent any responsive documents which were returned to it by Setasa. The Claimant also called on the Tribunal to order immediate disclosure by the Respondent of nine classes of documents previously requested to the Respondent.

24. By a letter of 15 November 2002 to the Tribunal, the Respondent sought directions from the Tribunal as to what it characterized as “the Claimant’s substantial failure to comply with the Tribunal’s order”. In particular, it sought directions as to two classes of documents not disclosed. The first concerned Claimant’s conveyance of its Mexico operations in 1997. The second concerned alleged discrepancies as to the effective date on which the Claimant’s predecessor acquired Acaverde.

25. By a letter of 20 November 2002 to the Tribunal, the Respondent summarized the disclosure so far made by the Claimant. It set out in further detail reasons why the Respondent should be given access to documents in the control of Setasa. It argued that any disclosure request by the Claimant should be entertained only after the deposit of the Counter-Memorial, when it could be considered in the light of the arguments and documents contained in that filing.

26. By letter of 21 November 2002 to the Tribunal, the Claimant commented on the Respondent’s 15 November 2002 requests for orders. As to the 1997 conveyance, it offered to make available to the Respondent a redacted version of the agreement, or to file with the Tribunal an unredacted copy, which the Tribunal could confirm did indeed exclude Acaverde from the sale. As to the Respondent's second request, the Claimant noted that the difference between October 1994 and June 1995 in terms of the completed acquisition of Acaverde was irrelevant to standing under NAFTA Chapter 11.

27. By a letter of 21 November 2002 to the Tribunal, the Respondent rejected both proposals the Claimant had made as to the Agreement of 1997. The Respondent further rejected the Claimant's argument regarding the information requested in connection with the Cayman Islands transactions.

28. By a letter of 22 November 2002 to the Tribunal, the Claimant attached a redacted version of the 1997 Agreement.

29. On 25 November 2002, the Respondent requested an extension to file its Counter-Memorial. The Secretary informed the parties by a letter of 26 November 2002, that the Tribunal granted the extension requested by the Respondent and indicated the new schedule for the filing of pleadings.

30. On 27 November 2002, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 2 concerning Disclosure of Documents. The Tribunal indicated that to the extent that documents identified by the Respondent were relevant to the question of ownership or control but the Claimant had neither disclosed them nor explained why they were not available, the Tribunal could draw corresponding inferences. It further stated that the Tribunal did not believe that any additional order was required as to documents pertaining to control over Acaverde in the period 1994-1995. The Tribunal also decided that the 1997 Agreement did not appear to be relevant to the present dispute, and accordingly did not order further disclosure. Regarding the documents in possession of Setasa, the Tribunal found it appropriate that the Claimant disclose promptly to the Respondent all relevant documents that Setasa might provide to the Claimant. The Tribunal asked the Claimant to provide the Tribunal with an explanation of the situation within 7 days of the date of the order.

31. In its Procedural Order No. 2, the Tribunal also addressed the Claimant's request for production of 9 categories of documents. The Tribunal granted in part the Claimant's request, in particular the documents related to Mexico's financial expert evidence, and denied or found not relevant other categories of documents. The Tribunal directed that the Respondent should disclose the documents concerned at the same time as the Counter-Memorial or at the latest within 7 days of the filing of the Counter-Memorial.

32. The Respondent lodged its Counter-Memorial on the merits on 6 December 2002. On 13 January 2003, the Claimant requested an extension to lodge its Reply. The Secretary informed the parties by a letter of 15 January 2003 that the Tribunal had granted the extension requested by the Claimant and indicated the new schedule for the filing of pleadings, including the filing of submissions by the NAFTA Parties under NAFTA Article 1128.

33. The Claimant filed its Reply on the merits on 22 January 2003. The Respondent filed its Rejoinder on the merits on 7 March 2003.

34. Pursuant to a request of the Tribunal, the parties submitted a joint letter of 12 March 2003 regarding the organization of the hearing on the merits. The parties further expressed their views by a letter submitted by each party on 13 March 2003. The Tribunal, having considered the above correspondence, issued directions regarding the hearing on the merits which were communicated by the Secretary's letter of 14 March 2003.

35. On 19 March 2003, the Government of Canada filed a submission under Article 1128 of NAFTA and the United States of America advised the Tribunal on the same date that it did not intend to make a submission.

36. The hearing on the merits was held from 7 April until 10 April 2003 at the premises of the World Bank in Washington DC to hear the parties' oral arguments and the witnesses and experts called by them. The parties were represented as follows:

Attending on behalf of the Claimant:

The Secretary also informed the parties, following the Tribunal's instructions, of the schedule for submitting their answers. The parties submitted their answers to the Tribunal's questions on 28 April 2003.

B. THE DISPUTE BETWEEN THE PARTIES

40. The present dispute arises from a concession for the provision of waste disposal services in the Mexican City of Acapulco in the State of Guerrero, one of the component states of Mexico. The agreed terms for this operation were laid down in a Concession Agreement (Título de Concesion), the parties to which were the City through its Council (Ayuntamiento) ("the City") and Acaverde. Acaverde was a Mexican company created in 1994. It is said at all relevant times to have been a wholly owned subsidiary of the Claimant, Waste Management Inc. ("Waste Management"), a Delaware corporation with substantial interests in municipal waste disposal services in the United States and elsewhere.<sup>6</sup> The question of Waste Management's entitlement to claim under Articles 1116 or 1117 of NAFTA in respect of the present dispute involving Acaverde is an issue in the case. In this section of the Award, the Tribunal will refer to Acaverde as the actual contracting party and provider of services under the Concession Agreement.<sup>7</sup>

41. The Concession Agreement was concluded on 9 February 1995. It was amended in significant respects by a further agreement of 12 May 1995. Under the Concession Agreement as so amended ("the Concession Agreement"), Acaverde undertook to provide on an exclusive basis certain municipal waste disposal and street cleaning services in a specified area of Acapulco. The area concerned, containing approximately 9000 residential and commercial addresses, covered the principal tourist and beachfront area of the City, which is a fraction of the total area of Acapulco, a city of approximately 1.5 million people. Tourism is the most important service industry in Acapulco, and there is no doubt that the waste collection system in the tourist area needed attention.

42. Clause 15 of the Concession Agreement provided that the City would not grant to any other company or person “any right or concession inconsistent with the rights of the Concessionaire under this Concession Agreement”. Under the Program of Operations, the City undertook to enact “such ordinances and local statutes as may be necessary to forbid manual street sweeping, the collection, transportation, use, recycling or disposal by any person or entity other than the Concessionaire of any Waste generated within the Concession Area”. These ordinances and statutes were to be fully and promptly enforced, both for residential and commercial waste collection. The Parties agreed that the enactment of the relevant ordinances would be a condition precedent to the commencement of operations and that Acaverde could “treat as a default any failure of the City to enforce these ordinances fully”.

43. On 30 June 1995, before Acaverde commenced services under the Concession Agreement, the City passed and subsequently promulgated a Regulation regulating the Rendering of the Public Cleaning Service Concession (“the Cleaning Services Ordinance”). The Cleaning Services Ordinance established exclusivity of waste collection services, prohibited dumping of rubbish in the area and provided for enforcement by way of fines. A schedule of rates was attached.

44. Article 8 of the Cleaning Services Ordinance provided that residents or businesses located in the concession area “must request” the public cleaning service within 90 days of commencement of operations. The Respondent argued that this provision did not correspond to any substantive obligation in the Concession Agreement, and noted that the obligation to pay scheduled rates was not imposed on residents as such. Formally this is true. Only persons who had signed a service contract with Acaverde were obliged to pay, and owners of holiday apartments in the concession area might not have any incentive to do so. Furthermore the terms of service contracts were a matter for agreement; the Ordinance established maximum but not minimum rates and Acaverde could (and did) enter into contracts at less than the scheduled rate. It is true that the Concession Agreement clearly contemplated that Acaverde would enjoy exclusivity within the concession area, and the City would not undermine this exclusivity by granting others the right to collect waste. But this did not necessarily translate into a situation where Acaverde’s market penetration in the concession area was sufficient to maintain its profitability.

45. In addition to providing collection services, Acaverde undertook under the Concession Agreement to build and operate a permanent solid waste landfill for the City as a whole, which would enable the closure of two existing temporary sites. The City would provide a site for the landfill “as [a] gratuitous loan for the term of the concession”. Fees for use of the landfill could be charged, at approved rates, to commercial customers. Pending the construction of the permanent landfill Acaverde would be given, free of charge, access to one of the existing sites.

46. The term of the Concession Agreement was to be 15 years from the date of commencement of services.

47. Under the Concession Agreement, Acaverde undertook to make an initial investment of up to US$12.8 million. Its charges were to be in accordance with the agreed schedule, which was an integral part of the Concession Agreement and was subject to indexation. In return the City would pay Acaverde a monthly fee for services which, after 1 January 1996 would be NP1 million<sup>8</sup> (approximately equivalent to US$170,000 at then-current exchange rates), and which was also indexed. Acaverde would pay the City a bonus calculated on the basis of its “success rate” in obtaining payment from customers in the concession area. The bonus payable was only 3% of certain revenues if the success rate was between .80 and .849, but rose to 30% with a success rate above .95. This gave the City some incentive to seek to ensure exclusivity and completeness of coverage. On the other hand it implicitly acknowledged that such coverage would not necessarily be achieved. In fact, the success rate never rose as high as .60, and no bonuses were ever paid to the City under these provisions.

48. Under the Concession Agreement, payments due to Acaverde by the City would bear interest at a specified rate if unpaid after 60 days. The City undertook to negotiate with a development bank established by the federal government of Mexico, Banco Nacional de Obras y Servicios Publicos, S.N.C. (“Banobras”), “an irrevocable, contingent and revolving line [of credit]” to guarantee “all payment obligations” of the City for the term of the Concession Agreement (Article 11).

49. The Line of Credit Agreement was issued on 9 June 1995. As envisaged by the Concession Agreement, the parties to the Line of Credit Agreement were the Government of the State of Guerrero (“Guerrero”), the City and Banobras. It recited the need to guarantee payment obligations under the Concession Agreement “in the event the City faces temporary cash flow problems that prevent the City to comply with such obligations” (Recitals, cl. III). Despite the reference in Article 11 of the Concession Agreement to “all payment obligations” of the City, the Line of Credit Agreement only covered “an amount equal to six monthly payments agreed to for the services rendered”, i.e. NP6,000,000 (Recitals, cl. XI). Demands for payment under the Line of Credit Agreement could be made by the City or by Acaverde. Disputes under the Line of Credit Agreement were referred to the federal courts of Mexico to the exclusion of “any other jurisdiction that might be available to them by reason of their present or future domiciles” (Clause 14, as translated by the Tribunal).

50. Although the Line of Credit Agreement was clear in limiting the total amount of credit available at any time to NP6 million, Banobras had the right to divert federal payments to Guerrero by way of reimbursement. In this regard Clause 6 provided:

“In the event that one or more requisitions made against the line [of credit] are not paid within 90 days, the Bank will proceed without delay to give effect to the guarantee corresponding to the present and future entitlements due from federal income to the State Government of Guerrero, thereby recovering the amounts paid to ‘Acaverde, S.A. de C.V.’ against this credit.”<sup>9</sup>

Interpreted literally, this provision was directed at the question of replenishment for Banobras from the federal funds of Guerrero in respect of payments already made to Acaverde and not repaid by the City. It was not expressed in terms of a right of recourse by Acaverde against federal funds in the hands of Guerrero.

51. Before the Tribunal there was some discussion as to Acaverde’s role in the conclusion of the Line of Credit Agreement, and whether it had accepted the limitation of the Banobras guarantee contained in that Agreement.<sup>10</sup> In the Tribunal's view, although Acaverde may not have played any role in the negotiation or drafting of the Line of Credit Agreement, and although it was no doubt unhappy about the limitation of the guarantee insisted on by Banobras, it nonetheless accepted the resulting situation and went ahead with its investment. In other words, in the Tribunal's view, Acaverde accepted that the Line of Credit Agreement concluded in June 1995 was sufficient to meet the requirements of the amended Concession Agreement.<sup>11</sup>

52. As required by Mexican law, the grant of the Concession for a period of 15 years was approved by Decree of the State Congress in December 1994.<sup>12</sup>

53. Disputes under the Concession Agreement were to be submitted to arbitration in accordance with Clause 17, which provided that:

“Any dispute arising from, or related to, this Concession, shall be submitted to Arbitration by one Arbitrator jointly appointed by the CONCESSIONAIRE and the MUNICIPAL COUNCIL. In the event the parties fail to reach an agreement on such appointment, the Arbitration shall be conducted by three Arbitrators, one of whom shall be an independent expert on Mexican Law. In the latter case, the Arbitrators appointed by the Parties shall jointly select a third Arbitrator, who shall be designated as President.”

The arbitration was to take place in Acapulco under the rules of Conciliation and Arbitration of the National Chamber of Commerce of Mexico City.

54. On 15 August 1995, Acaverde began providing services under the Agreement. Difficulties were encountered almost immediately in enforcing the exclusivity arrangements contained in the Concession Agreement, and there was strong customer resistance to paying for waste disposal services, either at all or at the published rate.<sup>13</sup> Many of those who had previously picked up and/or dumped waste in the concession area on an informal basis were resistant to the new arrangements. The cast of resisters included the pig-farmers (porcicultores) who took waste food from restaurants as food for their animals; the “pirates” (piratas) who ran unauthorised pick-up trucks looking for (and also dumping) waste, and the hawkers or barrow-men (carretilleros) who would do small jobs, including waste disposal, for a tip. Acaverde eventually reached an agreement with the pig-farmers association, but the piratas and the carretilleros were a continuing source of difficulty.<sup>14</sup> In particular, Acaverde complained that permits issued to the “pirates” allowing them to collect waste in the concession area were not revoked and even continued to be issued. Acaverde also complained that City drivers were picking up waste within the concession area in return for tips.

<sup>10</sup> Mr. Rodney Proto, transcript, 7 April 2003, 102; Mr. Steven Walton, ibid., 282-7. Acaverde's Mexican lawyer, Mr. Jaime Herrera stated that Acaverde did not participate in the drafting of the Line of Credit Agreement and that its suggestions in that regard were rejected by Banobras (Herrera Statement, para. 9; see also Banobras' letter to Sanifill of 19 June 1995). But it is clear that Acaverde, which had agreed to the amended Concession Agreement at Banobras' insistence, had notice of the precise terms of the Line of Credit Agreement when it commenced operations in August 1995: ibid., para. 8.

55. In addition, Acaverde complained at the City’s failure to provide premises for Acaverde’s operations or to enter into the gratuitous loan agreement for the new landfill. Under the Concession Agreement the City was required to provide, through a gratuitous loan, a municipally-owned piece of land for use as a permanent landfill. This would enable the existing open air dumps to be closed. Acaverde complained that the land, though identified and surveyed, was never made available. In lieu of the proposed landfill, Acaverde operated a temporary land-fill, and allowed the City to use it to dump waste collected outside the concession area.<sup>15</sup>

56. Following initial public unrest at the introduction of Acaverde’s services and charges, the Mayor of Acapulco in October 1995 is reported as having requested Acaverde to “make adjustments to fit the Mexican standards”. Mayor Almazán is reported to have said that “the obligation to contract Acaverde’s services will be eliminated in order to remove what was previously interpreted as an imposition”.<sup>16</sup> There is certainly evidence supporting the Mayor’s perception that Acaverde’s concession had been “interpreted as an imposition”. But notwithstanding his statement, neither the Cleaning Services Ordinance nor the Concession Agreement was amended. The Mayor’s statement may have added to Acaverde's difficulties, but in the Tribunal's view it did not cause the difficulties, nor did it bring about the failure of the enterprise. Rather it was symptomatic of a public debate about the concession at a difficult time for all concerned.

57. Over time, and with a substantial input of resources, Acaverde built up its client base in the Concession area to approximately 5000 addresses, i.e., about 55% of the total; but it was generally forced to offer discounts in order to attract customers. It also provided considerably more personnel for public street sweeping and collection services than the minimum required by the Concession Agreement. It is clear that the arrangement was not commercially viable, taking into account both the lower than expected proportion of customers serviced and the additional costs incurred.

58. But Acaverde's financial difficulties were greatly exacerbated in that from the beginning there were severe problems in ensuring regular payments from the City under the Concession Agreement. Of 26 invoices presented by Acaverde, the City paid one in full and made partial payments with respect to two.<sup>17</sup> In June 1996 Banobras paid invoices for the 4 months January-April 1996 under the Line of Credit Agreement (but without the indexation element), thereby reducing the City's indebtedness. This was the only payment made under the Line of Credit Agreement. On 23 July 1996, Acaverde requested Banobras to pay the invoice for May 1996, which had not been rejected by the City and was therefore deemed to have been accepted, and it made a series of similar requests for subsequent months. On 2 August 1996, Banobras gave two reasons for denying Acaverde's request: first, what it stated to be the NP5.9 million already paid had not been reimbursed by the City; second, the parties to the Concession Agreement were actively considering modifications to it in response to the City's financial crisis. Banobras' State Delegate wrote:

“Contractually, the Municipality of Acapulco is obliged to refund all amounts [paid under the Line of Credit] within 90 days and, if it fails to do so, the Bank will proceed to use federal contributions made by the Government of the State.

On the other hand, as you know, in the current negotiations between said company and the Municipality of Acapulco, it is considered to make amendments in the Concession Instrument, including the financial part as the main problem to be resolved. This willingness to amend the Concession

Instrument was expressed by both parties to the authorities of the Secretariat of Finance and Public Credit and to the Bank, but, to date, there is no final proposal accepted by both.

For the above reasons, I am informing you that it is impossible to pay the bill submitted, until the Municipality refunds to us the amount disbursed and sends us the agreements accepted by your company and the Municipality of Acapulco, which are indispensable elements in order to update the amount of the Line.”

59. Acaverde replied on 6 August 1996. It made the valid point that the amount it had received under the Line of Credit in June 1996 was only NP4.9 million, and that fees and interest charges owed by the City to Banobras as a result of payments to Acaverde should not be counted against it. It also noted that the continuation of its negotiations with the City was no excuse for Banobras not to comply with its obligations under the Line of Credit Agreement. Faced with Banobras’ refusal Acaverde reserved its legal rights:

“our company is forced to terminate the negotiations fostered by your H[onourable] Institution, we will protect our interests and rights contained in said Instrument [Concession Agreement] in the venue and form we deem necessary.”

60. Banobras was in a difficult position. On the one hand the initial Line of Credit was substantially exhausted, and the seizure of the diminished federal grants to the City for the purposes of replenishing it would have been a controversial act locally. The fact that the parties were considering changes to the Concession Agreement was, if not a justification, at any rate an excuse for not considering the exercise of that power for the time being.

61. For its part, the City wrote to Banobras on 11 September 1996, reciting what it claimed were failures on the part of Acaverde to perform its obligations under the Concession Agreement, requesting it not to make further payments under the Line of Credit and threatening it with litigation if it did.

62. The Claimant argued that this letter was a mere excuse by the City to avoid meeting its obligations under the Line of Credit Agreement, that any problems notified to Acaverde were promptly rectified, and that there was no general complaint from the City, at the time, as to the level and quality of the service Acaverde was providing. The Respondent argued on the contrary that there were persistent problems. This is a matter on which the Tribunal can only reach an impressionistic view. It notes the comment by one witness, who at the relevant time was the City's Secretary of Finance: in his opinion, "Acaverde's service was incomplete, because it only collected garbage from people who had contracts with the company. But it was efficient for those with contracts."<sup>18</sup> There is other evidence to the same effect: the commercial side of Acaverde's operations was efficiently performed, given the constraints upon it.

63. On the other hand, in the Tribunal's view, whatever may have motivated the City's letter to Banobras of 11 September 1996 it did not simply invent a dispute about the level of servicing which had no basis in fact. For a variety of reasons the street sweeping operations conducted by Acaverde were not enough to keep the streets of the concession area consistently clean. Apart from illegal dumping by pirates and the inevitable boundary problems of a partial concession in a large city, there was a persistent problem of "black spots" (puntos negros). For much of the period of operations, Acaverde did not collect from addresses which were not contracted; from its point of view this was an attempt to induce residents and businesses to contract with it, and was understandable. But Acaverde's sanitary obligations were not limited to removing trash deposited by its customers. The City had to step in on various occasions to deal with complaints and black spots, and it continued to have to expend resources and manpower on sanitary operations in the tourist zone. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the situation, the fact is that the black spots were a recurring problem. For example on 15 May 1996, Acaverde's General Manager wrote to the City stating that:

"Our company is making its best efforts to keep the concession area clean, so that we are asking for your help to penalize the citizens who throw out garbage in the streets creating black spots throughout the concession area."

64. Thus after September 1996, Banobras could argue that—quite apart from the non-replenishment of the Line of Credit—the City's non-payment of Acaverde's invoices was not the result of the City's financial crisis. Arguably it arose from a dispute between Acaverde and the City over the performance of the Concession Agreement, a dispute which Banobras had no obligation to settle. Whether that position was justified under the Line of Credit Agreement was a question—but at any rate it might help to extricate Banobras from its awkward situation as between Acaverde on one hand and the City on the other.

65. In a letter to the City of 15 November 1996, Banobras defended its payment of NP4.9 million in June on the ground that it was fully justified under the Concession Agreement, and it referred to Acaverde's subsequent demands for payment under the Line of Credit up to September 1996, implying that they might require similar treatment. But in fact it continued to refuse to pay Acaverde's invoices, and it did not seek to have resort to federal funds in Guerrero's hands.

66. By early 1997 the Claimant was seeking to withdraw from Acapulco and to sell its business. On 27 February 1997 Sanifill, principal shareholder of Acaverde's holding company, entered into a 60 day letter of intent with a Mexican company, Setasa, allowing the latter access to Acaverde's financial and operating information on a basis of confidentiality in order to assess the price. Subsequently, on 23 May 1997, a contingent sale agreement was concluded with a price of NP36.6 million (approximately equivalent to US$4.7 million at the then current exchange rate). In June 1997, however, Sanifill discovered that Setasa was in direct communication with the City, and eventually the sale did not proceed.

67. On 9 October 1997, Hurricane Paulina struck the Acapulco region, causing hundreds of deaths and enormous destruction.

68. By letter of 27 October 1997—with unhappy timing given that the City was still reeling from the hurricane—Acaverde announced that with effect from 12 November 1997 it would suspend the provision of services under the Agreement. The tasks it had performed were immediately assumed by Setasa,<sup>19</sup> which contracted with the City rather than with individual residents.

69. Over the 27 months of Acaverde's operations, its invoices to the City totalled more than NP49 million, of which the City itself paid NP2,225,000 and Banobras paid NP4.9 million. Approximately 80% of the total amount invoiced went unpaid.

70. Acaverde brought two sets of proceedings before the Mexican federal courts against Banobras for non-performance of the Line of Credit Agreement. These proceedings were dismissed and Acaverde's appeals were likewise dismissed. Acaverde also commenced arbitration under Clause 17 of the Concession Agreement against the City ("the CANACO arbitration"); this was subsequently discontinued. The domestic Mexican proceedings are examined in detail in paragraphs 118-132 below.

71. On 29 September 1998, while the Mexican proceedings were still pending, Waste Management commenced the first ICSID arbitration, referred to in paragraph 4 above. Indeed it was because those proceedings were pending, and because further proceedings were possible, that Waste Management qualified the terms of its waiver under Article 1121, leading to the dismissal of its claim by the First Tribunal. The present ICSID proceedings were registered on 27 September 2000, by which time Acaverde's claims in the Mexican courts had all been dismissed and the CANACO arbitration had been discontinued without any decision being reached.

72. Despite these developments, Claimant brought precisely the same claim before the present Tribunal as it had in the first ICSID arbitration. In other words, it did not express its claim in terms of a denial of justice through the subsequent Mexican proceedings. By agreement, Claimant's Memorial in the first proceedings was taken to constitute its Memorial in the present proceedings. Nonetheless, and in the Tribunal's view inevitably, attention was paid both to the outcome and to the reasoning behind the Mexican court decisions, as well as to the reasons for Claimant's withdrawal of the domestic arbitration, having regard to their potential relevance to the claim brought under NAFTA Chapter 11 to this Tribunal. In the circumstances the Tribunal proposes to ask whether the facts as disclosed to it involved a breach of NAFTA Articles 1105 or 1110, even though the position may not have been fully captured in Claimant's re-filed Memorial.

C. THE BASES OF CLAIM UNDER NAFTA

(1) Overview

73. The Tribunal begins by observing that—unlike many bilateral and regional investment treaties—NAFTA Chapter 11 does not give jurisdiction in respect of breaches of investment contracts such as the Concession Agreement. Nor does it contain an “umbrella clause” committing the host State to comply with its contractual commitments. This does not mean that the Tribunal lacks jurisdiction to take note of or interpret the contract. But such jurisdiction is incidental in character, and it is always necessary for a claimant to assert as its cause of action a claim founded in one of the substantive provisions of NAFTA referred to in Articles 1116 and 1117. Furthermore, while conduct (e.g. an expropriation) may at the same time involve a breach of NAFTA standards and a breach of contract, the two categories are distinct. Even as to Article 1105, while it will be relevant to show that particular conduct of the host State contradicted agreements or understandings reached at the time of the entry of the investment, it is still necessary to prove that this conduct was a breach of the substantive standards embodied in Article 1105. Showing that it was a breach of contract is not enough.<sup>20</sup>

74. The Claimant alleged that the circumstances outlined above disclosed a breach by the Respondent of its duties to United States investors under NAFTA Article 1110 or alternatively under Article 1105(1). It put its damages at more than US$36,000,000. In addition it sought to recover its demobilization costs resulting from the revocation of the Concession Agreement, which were estimated at US$630,000. It also sought an award of legal costs.

75. The Respondent did not deny that for the purposes of Chapter 11 of NAFTA the conduct of the City of Acapulco and the State of Guerrero was attributable to it. More difficult issues arise with respect to the conduct of Banobras, which is a development bank partly-owned and substantially controlled by Mexican government agencies. Banobras’ general objective, in the words of the regional director of Banobras in Guerrero, is “to promote and finance activities carried out by the Federal, State, and Municipal Governments of the Country”.<sup>21</sup> From the material available to the Tribunal it is doubtful whether Banobras is an organ of the Mexican State within the meaning of Article 4 of the ILC’s Articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts.<sup>22</sup> Shares in Banobras were divided between the public and private sector, with the former holding a minimum of 66%. The mere fact that a separate entity is majority-owned or substantially controlled by the state does not make it ipso facto an organ of the state. Nor is it clear that in its dealings with the City and the State in terms of the Line of Credit it was exercising governmental authority within the meaning of Article 5 of those Articles.<sup>23</sup> The Organic Law of 1986 regulating Banobras’ activity confers on it a variety of functions, some clearly public, others less so. A further possibility is that Banobras, though not an organ of Mexico, was acting “under the direction or control of” Guerrero or of the City in refusing to pay Acaverde under the Agreement.<sup>24</sup> again, it is far from clear from the evidence that this was so.<sup>25</sup> For the purposes of the present Award, however, it will be assumed that one way or another the conduct of Banobras was attributable to Mexico for NAFTA purposes.

76. Mexico’s legal defence involved three strands. First, it denied that the Claimant had the status of an investor for the purposes of Chapter 11 on the grounds that the Claimant did not have a direct interest in the investment in Mexico, because Acaverde’s direct shareholder was a company registered in the Cayman Islands, not a NAFTA Party. Secondly, while not denying that there may have been breaches of the Concession Agreement by the City, Mexico denied that these breaches, individually or collectively, rose to the level of conduct in violation of NAFTA Article 1105. Thirdly, it denied that there had been any expropriation, direct or indirect, of the investment, i.e., of Acaverde’s business, contrary to NAFTA Article 1110. The Tribunal will discuss the legal issues in turn, dealing with the facts (and with any factual disputes) as far as necessary for the purpose.

(2) The status of the Claimant as an “investor”

77. At the time it was incorporated, Acaverde was owned, through a holding company called AcaVerde Holdings Ltd, by Sun Investment Co., a Cayman Islands company. AcaVerde Holdings Ltd., also a Cayman Islands company, was purchased by Sanifill Inc., a U.S. company (“Sanifill”), at about the time the City initially approved the concession. The sale agreement of 21 December 1994 was contingent upon conclusion of the Concession Agreement and the Line of Credit Agreement. In fact the sale was completed on 27 June 1995. The price paid, in instalments, was US$5 million, plus the right to certain royalties based on Acaverde’s operations. Subsequently, in August 1996, Sanifill merged with USA Waste Services Inc.; the merged company later adopted the name Waste Management Inc.

78. A number of witnesses presented by the Respondent asserted that the City was not aware at the time the Concession Agreement was negotiated that Acaverde was not owned by Sanifill. The Claimant’s witnesses asserted that they had informed the City of this fact. The Tribunal does not need to resolve the discrepancy. Although the City may not have been aware of the specific financial arrangements between Sun Investments and Sanifill, it was certainly aware that United States interests were involved in the proposed arrangement,<sup>26</sup> as was reported in the local press at the time.<sup>27</sup> The Concession Agreement was signed by Mr. Proto, a senior employee of Sanifill, under a power of attorney granted by Acaverde. As noted, the actual purchase of Acaverde’s stock was contingent upon the conclusion of the Line of Credit Agreement, without which the project would not have gone ahead. By the time Acaverde commenced operations on 15 August 1995, almost all its shares were owned, through Cayman Islands companies, by Sanifill.<sup>28</sup>

79. In any event there is no general requirement of mens rea or intent in Section A of Chapter 11. The standards are in principle objective: if an investor suffers loss or damage by reason of conduct which amounts to a breach of Articles 1105 or 1110, it is no defence for the Respondent State to argue that it was not aware of the investor's identity or national character. The only question is whether the various requirements of Chapter 11 in this regard are satisfied.

80. Chapter 11 of NAFTA spells out in detail and with evident care the conditions for commencing arbitrations under its provisions. In particular it distinguishes between claims brought by an investor of another Party in its own right and claims brought by an investor on behalf of a local enterprise. The relevant provisions cover the full range of possibilities, including direct and indirect control and ownership. They deal with possible "protection shopping", i.e. with situations where the substantial control or ownership of an enterprise of a Party lies with an investor of a non-party and the enterprise "has no substantial business activities in the territory of the Party under whose law it is constituted or organized".<sup>29</sup> In other words NAFTA addresses situations where the investor is simply an intermediary for interests substantially foreign, and it allows NAFTA protections to be withdrawn in such cases (subject to prior notification and consultation). There is no hint of any concern that investments are held through companies or enterprises of non-NAFTA States, if the beneficial ownership at relevant times is with a NAFTA investor.

81. The scope of protection, and the care with which the relevant provisions were drafted, can be seen from the definitions in Articles 201 and 1139. In accordance with Article 201:

"enterprise means any entity constituted or organized under applicable law, whether or not for profit, and whether privately-owned or governmentally-owned, including any corporation, trust, partnership, sole proprietorship, joint venture or other association;

enterprise of a Party means an enterprise constituted or organized under the law of a Party;"

Plainly the term "enterprise" includes corporations established under the law of a third State.

82. Then under Article 1139, which defines certain terms for the purposes of Chapter 11, further definitions are relevant:

“investment means:

- (a) an enterprise;
- ...
- (e) an interest in an enterprise that entitles the owner to share in income or profits of the enterprise;
- ...

investment of an investor of a Party means an investment owned or controlled directly or indirectly by an investor of such Party”.

83. Of course these are only definitions, but they are used consistently in the substantive provisions of Section A of Chapter 11 and in the remedial provisions of Section B. Article 1101 specifies the scope and coverage of Chapter 11:

“1. This Chapter applies to measures adopted or maintained by a Party relating to:

- (a) investors of another Party;
- (b) investments of investors of another Party in the territory of the Party; and
- (c) with respect to Articles 1106 and 1114, all investments in the territory of the Party.”

Thus when Article 1105 specifies the treatment to be accorded to investments of investors of another Party, there is no trace of a requirement that the investment itself have the nationality of that Party either at the time it was acquired or at the time the conduct complained of occurs. Similarly under Article 1110 dealing with expropriation, the protected quantity is “an investment of an investor of another Party” in the territory of the expropriating State. The nationality of the investment (as opposed to that of the investor) is irrelevant. The same is true in respect of claims by investors on their own behalf under Article 1116: it is sufficient that the investor has the nationality of a Party and has suffered loss or damage as a result of action in breach of one of the specified obligations, including Articles 1105 and 1110. The extent of that loss or damage is a matter of quantum, not jurisdiction.

84. Article 1117 deals with the special situation of claims brought by investors on behalf of enterprises established in the host State. But it still allows such claims where the enterprise is owned or controlled “directly or indirectly”, i.e., through an intermediate holding company which has the nationality of a third State.

85. Where a treaty spells out in detail and with precision the requirements for maintaining a claim, there is no room for implying into the treaty additional requirements, whether based on alleged requirements of general international law in the field of diplomatic protection or otherwise. If the NAFTA Parties had wished to limit their obligations of conduct to enterprises or investments having the nationality of one of the other Parties they could have done so. Similarly they could have restricted claims of loss or damage by reference to the nationality of the corporation which itself suffered direct injury. No such restrictions appear in the text. It is not disputed that at the time the actions said to amount to a breach of NAFTA occurred, Acaverde was an enterprise owned or controlled indirectly by the Claimant, an investor of the United States. The nationality of any intermediate holding companies is irrelevant to the present claim. Thus the first of the Respondent’s arguments must be rejected.

(3) The claim for breach of NAFTA Article 1105

86. The Tribunal turns to the claim for breach of Article 1105(1). This was not the primary basis of claim. Rather the Claimant argued that Article 1105 “provides an alternative and overlapping basis for recovery by Waste Management”, alongside its claim for expropriation under Article 1110.<sup>30</sup> Nonetheless it was an autonomous basis of claim, and it is convenient to deal with it first, before turning to Article 1110.

87. According to the Claimant, the investment was subject to arbitrary acts by the City, Guerrero and Banobras which were capricious, lacking in due process of law and which rendered the investment valueless.<sup>31</sup> Furthermore Acaverde was subjected to a denial of justice at the hands of the City, Guerrero and Banobras, which conspired to obstruct its access to judicial and arbitral forums to resolve claims under the concession: more specifically, these entities “funnelled” the litigation by raising procedural issues to delay the merits claims and deny Acaverde the opportunity to obtain timely payment from Banobras, aggravating its bad financial position.<sup>32</sup>

88. In assessing these arguments it is necessary to consider first the interpretation to be given to Article 1105(1), then its application to the facts of the present case.

(i) The scope and interpretation of Article 1105(1)

89. Article 1105 is entitled “Minimum Standard of Treatment”. The relevant provision here is paragraph 1, which provides as follows:

“(1) Each Party shall accord to investments of investors of another Party treatment in accordance with international law, including fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security.”

90. On 31 July 2001, the Free Trade Commission, acting under NAFTA Article 1131, issued the following interpretation of Article 1105(1):

“B. Minimum Standard of Treatment in Accordance with International Law

1. Article 1105(1) prescribes the customary international law minimum standard of treatment of aliens as the minimum standard of treatment to be afforded to investments of investors of another Party.

2. The concepts of ‘fair and equitable treatment’ and ‘full protection and security’ do not require treatment in addition to or beyond that which is required by the customary international law minimum standard of treatment of aliens.

3. A determination that there has been a breach of another provision of the NAFTA, or of a separate international agreement, does not establish that there has been a breach of Article 1105(1).”

91. The FTC’s interpretation has been extensively discussed in subsequent decisions, in particular the Mondev<sup>33</sup> and ADF cases.<sup>34</sup> The Mondev tribunal found that the FTC interpretation:

<sup>34</sup> ADF Group Inc. v. United States of America, Award of 9 January 2003, 6 ICSID Reports 470.

- resolves any dispute about whether there was such a thing as a minimum standard of treatment of investment in international law in the affirmative;<sup>35</sup>
- makes clear that the standard of treatment is to be found by reference to international law;<sup>36</sup>
- clarifies that Article 1105 refers to a standard existing under customary law, not standards under other treaties of the NAFTA Parties or other provisions within NAFTA;<sup>37</sup>
- clarifies that the terms “fair and equitable treatment” and “full protection and security” are references to existing elements of customary international law and are not “additive”, that is, they do not add novel elements to that standard;<sup>38</sup> and
- incorporates current international customary law, at least as it stood at the time that NAFTA came into force in 1994, rather than any earlier version of the standard of treatment.<sup>39</sup>

92. This last point was expanded by the tribunal in ADF: it recorded the view of the United States, accepted by Canada and Mexico, that the customary international law in Article 1105(1) is not static and that the minimum standard of treatment does evolve, going onto say that “both customary international law and the minimum standard of treatment of aliens it incorporates, are constantly in a process of development.”<sup>40</sup>

93. Both the Mondev and ADF tribunals rejected any suggestion that the standard of treatment of a foreign investment set by NAFTA is confined to the kind of outrageous treatment referred to in the Neer case, i.e. to treatment amounting to an “outrage, to bad faith, to wilful neglect of duty, or to an insufficiency of governmental action so far short of international standards that every reasonable and impartial man would readily recognize its insufficiency”<sup>41</sup>.

94. The discussion of Article 1105 by the tribunal in S.D. Myers, even though before the FTC interpretation, may also be noted. The tribunal considered that a breach of Article 1105 occurs

“only when it is shown that an investor has been treated in such an unjust or arbitrary manner that the treatment rises to the level that is unacceptable from the international perspective. That determination must be made in the light of the high measure of deference that international law generally extends to the right of domestic authorities to regulate matters within their own borders. The determination must also take into account any specific rules of international law that are applicable to the case.”<sup>42</sup>

95. In the context of denial of justice arising from decisions of domestic courts, the Mondev tribunal formulated the test of the applicable “customary international law minimum standard” under Article 1105(1) in the following terms:

“The test is not whether a particular result is surprising, but whether the shock or surprise occasioned to an impartial tribunal leads, on reflection, to justified concerns as to the judicial propriety of the outcome, bearing in mind on the one hand that international tribunals are not courts of appeal, and on the other hand that Chapter 11 of NAFTA (like other treaties for the protection of investments) is intended to provide a real measure of protection. In the end the question is whether, at an international level and having regard to generally accepted standards of the administration of justice, a tribunal can conclude in the light of all the available facts that the impugned decision was clearly improper and discreditable, with the result that the investment has been subjected to unfair and inequitable treatment.”<sup>43</sup>

96. The ADF tribunal, citing Mondev v. United States, said of Article 1105 as interpreted by the FTC<sup>44</sup> that “any general requirement to accord ‘fair and equitable treatment’ and ‘full protection and security’ must be disciplined by being based on State practice and judicial or arbitral caselaw or other sources of customary or general international law.”<sup>45</sup> Considering the “general customary international law standard of treatment”, the Tribunal found that:

- the argument that the government procurement provisions were unfair was unconvincing. Performance requirements in governmental procurement were common to all three NAFTA Parties as well as to other States. Thus “the US measures cannot be characterized as idiosyncratic or aberrant and arbitrary”;<sup>46</sup>
- the actions of a government authority in refusing to follow and apply earlier case-law was not in the circumstances of the case “grossly unfair or unreasonable”, nor were ADF’s assumptions about the applicability of that case-law induced by the misrepresentations by authorised officials of government;<sup>47</sup>
- the government agency in question had not acted ultra vires, but, in any case, showing an act is ultra vires under the internal law of a state “by itself does not necessarily render the measures grossly unfair or inequitable under the customary international law standard of treatment embodied in Article 1105(1)... something more than simple illegality or lack of authority under the domestic law of a State is necessary”;<sup>48</sup>
- the investor’s claim that the United States had breached its duty under customary international law to perform its obligations in good faith in breach of Article 1105 added “only negligible assistance in the task of determining or giving content to a standard of fair and equitable treatment.”<sup>49</sup> However the Tribunal noted in this respect that the investor had not tried to show government actions refusing the request for a waiver of the procurement requirements were “flawed by arbitrariness”. There was no evidence that other companies had been granted the same waivers. The investor did not allege that the contract specifications were tailored so that only a specific US company could comply; nor did the investor show that extraordinary costs or other burdens had been imposed that were not also imposed on other contractors involved in the same project.

97. The content of Article 1105 in light of the FTC interpretation was also discussed in Loewen v. United States in the specific context of denial of justice.<sup>50</sup> The tribunal said:

“Neither State practice, the decisions of international tribunals nor the opinion of commentators support the view that bad faith or malicious intention is an essential element of unfair and inequitable treatment or denial of justice amounting to a breach of international justice. Manifest injustice in the sense of a lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends a sense of judicial propriety is enough, even if one applies the Interpretation according to its terms.”<sup>51</sup>

The Loewen Tribunal also noted that discriminatory violations of municipal law would amount to a manifest injustice according to international law.<sup>52</sup> However, the tribunal held that, where the minimum standards of international law in question in a particular case are raised in respect of a claim of judicial action—that is, a denial of justice—what matters is the system of justice and not any individual decision in the course of proceedings. The system must be tried and have failed, and thus in this context the notion of exhaustion of local remedies is incorporated into the substantive standard and is not only a procedural prerequisite to an international claim.<sup>53</sup> For this reason, although the Loewen tribunal found that the first instance trial and its verdict were “clearly improper and discreditable” and a breach of the minimum standards of fair and equitable treatment, that did not dispose of the case.<sup>54</sup>

98. The search here is for the Article 1105 standard of review, and it is not necessary to consider the specific results reached in the cases discussed above. But as this survey shows, despite certain differences of emphasis a general standard for Article 1105 is emerging. Taken together, the S.D. Myers, Mondev, ADF and Loewen cases suggest that the minimum standard of treatment of fair and equitable treatment is infringed by conduct attributable to the State and harmful to the claimant if the conduct is arbitrary, grossly unfair, unjust or idiosyncratic, is discriminatory and exposes the claimant to sectional or racial prejudice, or involves a lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends judicial propriety—as might be the case with a manifest failure of natural justice in judicial proceedings or a complete lack of transparency and candour in an administrative process. In applying this standard it is relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant.

99. Evidently the standard is to some extent a flexible one which must be adapted to the circumstances of each case. Accordingly it is to the facts of the present case that the Tribunal turns.

(ii) The allegations of breach of Article 1105(1)

100. The Claimant asserted that the failure of Acaverde's enterprise arose from a combination of conduct of local, provincial and federal authorities, together with the failure of Mexican courts and tribunals to provide it any relief. In the first place the Tribunal will consider separately the conduct of each of the various Mexican authorities concerned. Subsequently it will deal with the claim that there was collusion or conspiracy between these authorities.

101. Before turning to the specific facts, the Tribunal notes that an important part of the background to the case was the Mexican financial crisis, which started in December 1994 with a substantial devaluation of the currency and continued for several years. During that period the value of the peso was approximately halved, the rate of inflation reached 38%, and federal revenues to the States and municipalities were greatly affected.<sup>55</sup> The effects on the City were numerous: tourist numbers declined, its financial obligations under the Concession Agreement (which were indexed to inflation) were substantially increased<sup>56</sup> and the federal revenues it received were substantially reduced.

(a) The conduct of Banobras

102. The only executive entity at federal level of whose conduct Waste Management complained was the development bank, Banobras.<sup>57</sup> Assuming, for the sake of argument, that Banobras' conduct was attributable to Mexico for NAFTA purposes (see above, paragraph 75), nonetheless the Tribunal finds that it did not constitute a breach of Article 1105. Prior to the conclusion of the Line of Credit Agreement in June 1995, Banobras, which had not been a party to the initial negotiations for the Concession Agreement, was in no way obliged to grant the line of credit. Its regional director explained that "lines of credit... guaranteed by the share of the States and Municipalities in federal tax revenue" were not common; in Guerrero, this was the only example and would not be repeated.<sup>58</sup> When it was approached by the City to grant the line of credit, Banobras insisted on various changes to the Concession Agreement. It was within its rights to do so, and the changes were accepted, albeit reluctantly, by Acaverde as a condition of its investment. Whatever hopes Acaverde may have entertained of having a significant part of its income guaranteed by the federal development bank, the fact is that the eventual guarantee was a more limited one, expressed to cover "temporary liquidity problems which the City of Acapulco might experience". On its face it "was not an alternative source [or] mechanism... for the regular payment, to Acaverde, of monthly payments for its services".<sup>59</sup> It was also limited in amount to NP6 million. In other words, it does not appear that Banobras had any obligation to make payments to Acaverde beyond that figure, unless the line of credit was replenished by the City or Banobras was able to divert federal funds in Guerrero's hands in order to replenish the line of credit.

103. It is not necessary for the Tribunal to determine whether, after the Line of Credit Agreement had been concluded, Banobras in all respects complied with its terms. The Agreement provided its own mechanism for determining that question. But it is clear that Banobras did comply at least to some extent, making payments to Acaverde totalling nearly NP5 million. It appears that this amount had not been reimbursed to Banobras by the City at the time Acaverde withdrew from providing services in October 1997. At the same time Banobras discussed with the parties possible changes to their arrangements which might be sustainable given the sharp drop in federal revenues to Guerrero and the City and the underlying crisis in public finances. Its role here was that of a concerned intermediary, and the failure of those discussions was not its fault.<sup>60</sup>

104. For these reasons, the Tribunal rejects the claim that Mexico was in breach of Article 1105(1) by reason of the conduct of Banobras.

105. There is a separate issue whether the Mexican courts denied justice to the Claimant through their decisions in the cases brought against Banobras. This is discussed in paragraphs 118-132 below.

(b) The conduct of Guerrero

106. Representatives of the State of Guerrero attended a number of meetings discussing a settlement of the problem, for example in June 1996. According to one witness, State officials offered help with payments to avoid drawing on the line of credit. But the City was unable to pay the share envisaged by these proposals, and the discussions did not reach any conclusion.<sup>61</sup>

107. Although the Claimant asserted that representatives of Guerrero were implicated in the continuing breach of the Concession Agreement, Guerrero was neither a party to the Agreement nor a guarantor. This situation was not affected by the legal requirement that the legislature of Guerrero approve the Concession Agreement, which it did on 15 December 1994. Overall the Tribunal has not been provided with any evidence that supports any specific charge against Guerrero in terms of Article 1105(1) of NAFTA.

(c) The conduct of the City

108. The position with respect to the City is more complex, and there is certainly a case to answer with respect to Article 1105(1).

109. On the information before the Tribunal it is clear that the City failed in a number of respects to fulfil its contractual obligations to Claimant under the Concession Agreement. It did so, most obviously, with respect to the monthly payments, which immediately fell into arrears. In addition Acaverde credibly alleged breaches of the agreement, for example with respect to inadequate enforcement of the 1995 Ordinance and the provision of land for the proposed permanent waste disposal site.

110. On the other hand there are a number of countervailing factors. The City did make at least some attempts to enforce the 1995 Ordinance. It defended proceedings brought against it by local residents challenging the Concession Agreement and the 1995 Ordinance. It made at least some attempts to encourage local residents and business groups to contract with Acaverde. Contrary to the Claimant's allegations, it did bring at least some proceedings against the "pirates" and even against its own employees caught moonlighting in the concession area. It made at least some attempts, through the deployment of inspectors, to enforce the Cleaning Services Ordinance. And some steps were taken, in conjunction with Acaverde, to identify a location for the permanent waste disposal site and to obtain secure title over it. For example, the City brought non-contentious proceedings before an Agrarian Court in Guerrero to give an agreement made with the holders of customary title over the land the status of an order of the Court; on 8 April 1996 the Court granted the order accordingly.<sup>62</sup>

111. Against this background of breaches of contract and allegations of non-performance, two facts are evident. The first is that the Concession Agreement was unpopular with a significant proportion of the residents of the concession area, many of whom were not permanently resident in Acapulco but maintained holiday apartments there. Even the permanent residents were not used to paying separately for waste disposal services. Moreover this problem—acknowledged as a potential difficulty by the Claimant from the outset—was exacerbated by the initial, rather heavy-handed approach of the Claimant in issuing immediate invoices to all area residents, accompanied by threats of legal action in the event of non-payment. As the Tribunal has noted (see paragraph 44 above), the obligation to pay for waste collection services was contingent upon the conclusion of a service agreement, and did not arise under the Cleaning Services

<sup>62</sup> The land in question was ejido land (a form of customary or communal title). The agreement of 5 August 1995 conferred rights of exclusive use of 56 hectares of land for 25 years for use as a sanitary landfill by Acaverde.

Ordinance itself. The Claimant's apparent assumption to the contrary at the early stages of the introduction of the Concession stirred up substantial opposition, leading to public protests and a series of amparo actions against the City by residents and business groups. The City defended these actions, not always successfully; for example, confiscated vehicles belonging to several "pirate" collectors had to be released. At least some of the cases of non-compliance with the Concession Agreement of which Claimant complains were the result of these cases and of interim or final orders obtained against the City.

112. The second fact is that the financial plans of the City, and thus of the Claimant, were severely affected by the Mexican financial crisis, which lasted well into 1996 and severely affected the City's capacity to perform its obligations. The City was reduced to offering certain land holdings either to Acaverde in lieu of payment or to Banobras as security for extension of the line of credit.<sup>63</sup> Understandably, neither of them was prepared to accept this, but it is further evidence of the reality of severe financial difficulties.

113. The Tribunal notes that Acaverde itself responded to these early setbacks. It sought to persuade its potential customers to enter into contracts, so that by the end of the period of operations rather more than 50% of residents and enterprises had done so, although in many cases it was necessary to offer substantial discounts (up to 40-50%) on the published rates. It addressed operational complaints and difficulties. It showed flexibility in discussions with the City on a range of matters.<sup>64</sup> It took the initiative in creating a temporary land-fill which appears to have complied with applicable standards, unlike the two existing land-fills.<sup>65</sup> But the fact remains that the weaknesses of the original business plan could not be overcome at a time of financial stringency.

114. The Tribunal does not suggest that financial stringency or public resistance are, as such, excuses for breaches of contractual commitments on the part of a municipality. But NAFTA Chapter 11 is not a forum for the resolution of contractual disputes, and as investment tribunals have repeatedly said, "Investment Treaties are not insurance policies against bad business judgments”.<sup>66</sup> The question is whether, having regard to the conduct of the parties concerned and the general circumstances, losses were caused to Waste Management by the City in circumstances amounting to a breach of the minimum standard of treatment embodied in Article 1105, a standard which the Tribunal has summarised in paragraph 98 above.

115. In the Tribunal’s view the evidence before it does not support the conclusion that the City acted in a wholly arbitrary way or in a way that was grossly unfair. It performed part of its contractual obligations, but it was in a situation of genuine difficulty, for the reasons explained above. It sought alternative solutions to the problems both parties faced, without finding them. The most important default was its failure to pay; the Tribunal will discuss in a subsequent section whether such failure, persisted in, could have amounted to a breach of NAFTA Article 1110 because it was tantamount to expropriation, either of the enterprise as a whole or at least of the sums remaining unpaid.<sup>67</sup> For present purposes it is sufficient to say that even the persistent non-payment of debts by a municipality is not to be equated with a violation of Article 1105, provided that it does not amount to an outright and unjustified repudiation of the transaction and provided that some remedy is open to the creditor to address the problem. In the present case the failure to pay can be explained, albeit not excused, by the financial crisis which meant that at key points the City could hardly pay its own payroll. There is no evidence that it was motivated by sectoral or local prejudice.

116. The importance of a remedy, agreed on between the parties, for breaches of the Concession Agreement bears emphasis.<sup>68</sup> It is true that in a general sense the exhaustion of local remedies is a procedural prerequisite for the bringing of an international claim, one which is dispensed with by NAFTA Chapter 11. But the availability of local remedies to an investor faced with contractual breaches is nonetheless relevant to the question whether a standard such as Article 1105(1) have been complied with by the State. Were it not so, Chapter 11 would become a mechanism of equal resort for debt collection and analogous purposes in respect of all public (including municipal) contracts, which does not seem to be its purpose.

117. For these reasons the Tribunal is not satisfied that the City's breaches of contract rose to the level of breaches of Article 1105(1) of NAFTA.

(d) The Mexican legal proceedings

118. But even if the conduct of the City or Banobras in itself did not violate the Article 1105 standard, the question remains whether the situation presented by their conduct was adequately responded to by the Mexican courts. Both the Concession Agreement and the Line of Credit Agreement made provision for dispute settlement, referring to local arbitration and proceedings before the federal courts of Mexico City respectively. The Claimant tried both avenues, eventually discontinuing the arbitration proceedings and failing in the federal court. It is thus necessary to ask to what extent the decisions of the federal courts or of CANACO either compounded the situation, or constituted a distinct denial of justice, so as to entail a breach of Article 1105(1).<sup>69</sup>

119. Before turning to the relevant legal principles, the course of the three proceedings needs to be described in more detail.

120. By notice of 3 December 1997, Acaverde notified the City that it was commencing arbitration proceedings under Article 17 of the Concession Agreement. On 9 January 1998 the Permanent Commission of Commercial Arbitration of the National Chamber of Commerce (CANACO) was notified. On 4 March 1998 the City objected to the Claimant's notice on procedural grounds, but it subsequently appointed its arbitrator after CANACO had threatened to make a default appointment if it did not. The two party-appointed arbitrators having failed to agree, on 8 September 1998 CANACO was requested to appoint a Chairman of the Tribunal, which it did. On 25 November 1998 the City objected to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal on the ground, inter alia, that the Concession Agreement was an administrative act governed by public law and therefore necessarily subject to the jurisdiction of the contentious administrative courts; it also denied the Claimant's case on the merits.

121. Subsequently the City commenced court proceedings seeking to block the arbitration, using the same arguments.

122. In the light of the City's resistance to the arbitration, CANACO requested an advance of payment of NP2.5 million from each party as a condition of continuing the arbitration. (At then-current exchange rates this was equivalent to approximately US$275,000.) The City refused to pay this amount, and thus if the arbitration was to proceed it would have had to be wholly funded by Acaverde. On 7 July 1999, counsel for Acaverde wrote to CANACO stating that unspecified "actions of the said Permanent Commission of Arbitration in the above mentioned arbitration trial, as well as the position taken by the Municipality of Acapulco, State of Guerrero, have prevented the continuation of such arbitration procedure". The file was duly returned on 14 September 1999.

123. CANACO is not a State organ, and in any event its sole role was to facilitate the arbitration. Evidence of collusion between CANACO and the City with respect to the conduct of the arbitration or of discrimination against Acaverde on account of its foreign ownership would have been very material, but there is no such evidence before the Tribunal.<sup>70</sup> Although the deposit sought was very large by local standards, the claim was large and the case threatened to be complex. On the evidence presented to the Tribunal, CANACO apparently behaved in a proper and impartial way. For example it rejected a preliminary jurisdictional submission made by the City's lawyers on the grounds that the question of jurisdiction was a matter for the tribunal.<sup>71</sup> Proceedings before the Mexican courts to resolve the issue of arbitrability were never concluded, but it may be inferred from the decisions both of the federal and State courts that they would have enforced the arbitration clause against the City: at any rate the Claimant has not demonstrated the contrary. In the circumstances the Tribunal finds that the discontinuance of the arbitration, a decision made by the Claimant on financial grounds, did not implicate the Respondent in any internationally wrongful act.

<sup>70</sup> The Claimant asserts that CANACO imposed the requirement for deposit of costs "because it was concerned about its own liability in the nullification lawsuit if the arbitration continued". Whether or not its concerns were justified, they were still those of CANACO as a private entity, and there is no sufficient evidence that the judicial process was dilatory or gave unfair advantages to state entities in seeking to avoid domestic arbitration clauses to which they had agreed.

124. In addition, in January 1997 Acaverde brought proceedings in the Mexican federal court against Banobras under the Line of Credit Agreement in respect of the unpaid invoices of 1996. Subsequently, in July 1998 it brought further proceedings against Banobras in respect of the 1997 invoices. Although Acaverde was not a party to the Line of Credit Agreement, under Mexican law it was entitled to sue as a beneficiary of that Agreement, and its standing to do so was upheld by the courts.

125. In the first proceeding against Banobras, Acaverde claimed more than NP15 million by way of principal plus damages and costs.<sup>72</sup> Guerrero and the City intervened as third parties at Banobras' suit, even though Acaverde made no affirmative claim against them in the proceedings. A challenge to Acaverde's standing having failed, the Tribunal dismissed Acaverde's claim on the ground that it had not proved it had strictly complied with the requirements of the Line of Credit Agreement in terms of demands for payment made on Banobras.<sup>73</sup> Acaverde appealed from this decision. On 11 March 1999, the Federal Tribunal dismissed the appeal, in part relying on the grounds given by the trial court, in part because, at the time the demand was made, Banobras had received from the City notice of a dispute about provision of services by Acaverde.<sup>74</sup> According to the appeal court this was "enough to prove that non-payment of the invoices presented was due to non-performance by Claimant, who is now dissatisfied, and not due to the Municipality's lack of liquidity".<sup>75</sup> An application for amparo<sup>76</sup> (a constitutional action) failed on the basis that although the lower court had misinterpreted the Line of Credit Agreement Acaverde had failed to prove the indebtedness.<sup>77</sup>

126. The second action,<sup>78</sup> in which Acaverde claimed NP22 million owing in respect of the January-October 1997 invoices, was dismissed on the basis that Banobras, having been notified of the dispute between Acaverde and the City, was entitled not to pay under the Line of Credit until that dispute was resolved.<sup>79</sup> Acaverde's appeal.<sup>80</sup> was dismissed on procedural grounds, on the basis that the dispute related to the Concession Agreement and that Acaverde should first have arbitrated its dispute with the City under Article 17 of the Concession Agreement. The dismissal was stated to be without prejudice to the rights of the Claimant in the proper forum.<sup>81</sup> Again Acaverde brought a constitutional action by way of amparo in respect of this decision.<sup>82</sup> It argued that the lower court, in applying the provisions of a 1996 amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure and the Code of Commerce, violated Articles 14 and 16 of the Mexican Constitution which prohibit the retrospective application of laws. The Line of Credit Agreement having been concluded in 1995, Acaverde argued, the 1996 amendment should not have been applied to it. The amparo application was rejected by a decision of 20 May 1999. The Court did not accept the City's argument that the application was inadmissible, but it denied the amparo claim on the basis that Acaverde had commenced the proceedings relying on the provisions of the law then in force, including the 1996 amendment. The Claimant having failed to challenge a ruling of the lower court to that affect had thereby consented to it: "if... Appellant submitted to the application of legislation currently in force and voluntarily consented to continuing the proceedings thereunder, it is not legally possible to change that on the grounds of that constituting a retroactive application of the Law where the application thereof was consented to from the beginning".

(e) Was there a denial of justice?

128. In asking whether these proceedings involved a denial of justice in terms of Article 1105, two points are fundamental. First, these proceedings were against Banobras yet the underlying dispute was between the parties to the Concession Agreement, Acaverde and the City. That dispute could not be settled in federal proceedings against a federal agency unless Banobras was a guarantor of the whole of the City's indebtedness under the Concession Agreement. But—and this is the second point—such was not the case. Banobras had quite properly insisted on limiting its obligations under the Line of Credit and Acaverde had accepted that limitation.<sup>83</sup> It is true that Banobras could have sought replenishment of the Line of Credit by diverting federal revenues destined for the City which were in the hands of Guerrero. But in the context of the Mexican financial crisis this was hardly a realistic option, and in any event, it does not appear that Acaverde had any right under the Line of Credit that this be done. Thus the federal proceedings were in any event incapable of resolving Acaverde's most important grievances.

129. Turning to the actual reasons given by the federal courts, the Tribunal would observe that it is not a further court of appeal, nor is Chapter 11 of NAFTA a novel form of amparo in respect of the decisions of the federal courts of NAFTA parties. Certain of the decisions appear to have been founded on rather technical grounds, but the notion that the third party beneficiary of a line of credit or guarantee should strictly prove its entitlement is not a parochial or unusual one. Nor was it unreasonable, given the limitations of the Line of Credit Agreement, for the court in the second proceedings to insist that Acaverde comply with the dispute settlement procedure contained in the Concession Agreement, notice of the dispute with the City having been given to Banobras.

130. In any event, and however these cases might have been decided in different legal systems, the Tribunal does not discern in the decisions of the federal courts any denial of justice as that concept has been explained by NAFTA tribunals, notably in the

Azinian,<sup>84</sup> Mondev,<sup>85</sup> ADF<sup>86</sup> and Loewen cases.<sup>87</sup> The Mexican court decisions were not, either ex facie or on closer examination, evidently arbitrary, unjust or idiosyncratic. There is no trace of discrimination on account of the foreign ownership of Acaverde, and no evident failure of due process. The decisions were reasoned and were promptly arrived at. Acaverde won on key procedural points, and the dismissal in the second proceedings, in particular, was without prejudice to Acaverde's rights in the appropriate forum.

131. The Claimant argues that litigation strategy adopted by the City itself amounted to a denial of justice and hence a breach of Article 1105. But the City was a litigant, and there is no evidence that it was acting in collusion either with CANACO or the federal courts. It is not unusual for litigants to be difficult and obstructive, and there is nothing here comparable to the abusive remarks of counsel in the Loewen case which were tolerated and even condoned by the trial judge, producing a denial of justice.<sup>88</sup> The point is that a litigant cannot commit a denial of justice unless its improper strategies are endorsed and acted on by the court, or unless the law gives it some extraordinary privilege which leads to a lack of due process. There is no evidence of either circumstance in the present case.

<sup>84</sup> In Azinian the tribunal also addressed whether the Claimants could have successfully pursued a denial of justice claim. It said: "A denial of justice could be pleaded if the relevant courts refuse to entertain a suit, if they subject it to undue delay, or if they administer justice in a seriously inadequate way.... There is a fourth type of denial of justice, namely the clear and malicious misapplication of the law [which] ... overlaps with the notion of 'pretence of form' to mask a violation of international law." However, in the view of the tribunal, the findings of the Mexican courts could not "possibly be said" to be in any way a denial of justice, Azinian, Davitian & Baca v. United Mexican States, Award of 1 November 1999, 5 ICSID Reports 269, 290 (paras. 102-103).

<sup>86</sup> The ADF Tribunal, rejecting the investor's submission that a federal administrative body had acted ultra vires in its interpretation of the measures in question, the Tribunal said, "...even had the investor made out a prima facie basis for its claim, the Tribunal has no authority to review the legal validity and standing of the US measures... under US internal administrative law. We do not sit as a court with appellate jurisdiction.... The Tribunal would emphasize, too, that even if the US measures were somehow shown or admitted to be ultra vires under the internal law of the United States, that by itself does not necessarily render the measures grossly unfair or inequitable under the customary international law standard of treatment embodied in Article 1105(1).... [S]omething more than simple illegality or lack of authority under the domestic law of a State is necessary to render and act or measure inconsistent with the customary international law requirements of Article 1105(1)...", ADF Group Inc. v. United States of America, Award of 9 January 2003, (para. 190). Nor was the authority's refusal to follow prior rulings "grossly unfair or unreasonable" on the facts presented by the investor.

132. Of course, as the Loewen tribunal said, it is

“the responsibility of the State under international law and, consequently, of the courts of a State, to provide a fair trial of a case to which a foreign investor is a party. It is the responsibility of the courts of a State to ensure that litigation is free from discrimination against a foreign litigant and that the foreign litigant should not become the victim of sectional or local prejudice.”<sup>89</sup>

But neither the decisions themselves nor other evidence before the Tribunal suggest that these proceedings involved discrimination, bias on grounds of sectional or local prejudice, or a clear failure of due process. The CANACO arbitration, which alone held the prospect of complete relief for Acaverde in respect of its claims against the City, was not pursued, and the Tribunal has already held that this fact did not of itself entail a breach of Article 1105. As to the Banobras litigation, Acaverde did exhaust its remedies, but it was not a denial of justice for the federal courts to insist on prior action against the City. This aspect of the claim under Article 1105(1) accordingly fails.

(f) The termination phase

133. On the other hand the relief sought in the Mexican domestic proceedings did not cover the full scope of Claimant’s grievances against the City. Chapter 11 of NAFTA does not require that a party should exhaust local remedies before bringing an international claim: rather it requires a waiver of remaining remedies. There thus remains a question whether conduct attributable to the Respondent, and going beyond the scope of the legal proceedings brought by Acaverde, might constitute a breach of the standard embodied in Article 1105 of NAFTA.

134. Two specific complaints require discussion here. The first concerns the City’s dealings with Setasa, which the Claimant alleged involved a breach of its exclusive rights under the Concession Agreement, if not outright collusion.<sup>90</sup> There is little doubt that Setasa, having been initially involved in discussions with the Claimant,<sup>91</sup> was “waiting in the wings” later that year to take over the operation on a different basis. But there is no evidence that it did so before Acaverde’s withdrawal from the Agreement, and

in any event whatever civil wrongs may have been committed during the denouement of the project, they did not in the Tribunal's opinion either cause or trigger its failure, nor did they independently amount to a breach of the Article 1105 standard.

135. A second and more serious complaint concerns the subsequent attempt by the City to enforce the performance bond given by Acaverde in the amount of NP6 million. This attempt was problematic, especially given the City's own record of non-performance of its obligations under the Concession Agreement. But in fact the City's attempt to collect this money failed, the bond-holder rejecting the claim,<sup>92</sup> and it is not alleged by the Claimant that it suffered any specific losses as a result of this episode.

136. Looking at the matter more generally, the position in this terminal phase can be compared with that in the ELSI case, where improper conduct of the local Italian authorities seems to have precipitated the collapse of a failing enterprise, leading to a fire-sale of assets and consequent losses to the investor. A Chamber of the Court held that such conduct did not amount to a breach of the applicable FCN treaty;<sup>93</sup> whether it would have amounted to a breach of NAFTA the Tribunal does not need to inquire. For the key difference here is that there was no actual requisition or any equivalent act triggering the departure of Acaverde. The Claimant was not prevented (as the parent company in the ELSI case was arguably prevented) from seeking to conduct an orderly withdrawal from Acapulco. Attempts at a financial settlement or sale of the enterprise failed, but this was not a result of any internationally wrongful act of the Respondent State.

(g) The allegation of conspiracy

137. Thus far the Tribunal has considered the various items of conduct complained of by the Claimant separately and serially. But the Claimant also, in effect, alleged that the various Mexican agencies conspired together to frustrate the concession, and that the sum of this conduct was greater than its various component parts in terms of causing a violation of Article 1105.<sup>94</sup>

138. The Tribunal has no doubt that a deliberate conspiracy—that is to say, a conscious combination of various agencies of government without justification to defeat the purposes of an investment agreement—would constitute a breach of Article 1105(1). A basic obligation of the State under Article 1105(1) is to act in good faith and form, and not deliberately to set out to destroy or frustrate the investment by improper means.

139. But such an allegation needs to be proved, and the Claimant has not proved it. For example, the State Delegate of Banobras was said to be responsible for soliciting the City's letter of 11 September 1996 with a view to avoiding payment to Acaverde. He denied this in evidence before the Tribunal,<sup>95</sup> and the Tribunal accepts his denial. But in any event, as already noted, Banobras had no obligation to Acaverde to garnishee funds payable to the City in order to replenish the line of credit. There was a substantial reduction in federal funds being channelled through Guerrero, and in the absence of replenishment the line of credit was nearly exhausted. As the Tribunal has already found, the refusal of Banobras to go further, whether or not it was a breach of contract, was not in itself a breach of Article 1105(1), nor was it converted into such a breach by the federal court decisions. More generally, there are sufficient reasons to explain the collapse of the concession—attributable far more to the City than to Banobras—and there is no need to resort to conspiracy theories, unsupported by solid evidence. A marginal financial plan, predicated on a much more substantial federal guarantee than was eventually agreed, foundered on the rocks of a deteriorating financial climate and a combination of little and large local difficulties. That is not enough to cross the Article 1105(1) threshold.

(iii) Conclusions as to Article 1105(1)

140. For these reasons the Tribunal concludes that the claim under Article 1105(1) must fail.

(4) The claim for expropriation: NAFTA Article 1110

141. As noted, the Claimant's principal contention was founded not on Article 1105 but on Article 1110. The Claimant argued that Acaverde's entire enterprise in

<sup>95</sup> Statement of Mr. Mario Alcaraz Alarcón, para. 22 (“Nobody at Banobras had anything to do with the sending of this letter.”); Second Declaration of Mr. Mario Alcaraz Alarcón, paras. 7-8 (“I deny that there was any type of coordination of the actions taken by the City Council and those taken by the Bank... Neither I nor the personnel of the Banobras office for which I was responsible took part in any discussion of [the cancellation of the concession].”).

Acapulco was expropriated by the City, or at any rate by the combined conduct of the City, Guerrero and Banobras, and that this was a breach of Article 1110 of NAFTA. Although the Claimant did not put it in these terms, it could also be argued that the persistent failure of the City to pay the amounts due under the Concession Agreement was tantamount to an expropriation at least of the amount unpaid. In the Tribunal's view the latter claim is encompassed within the former, and is infra petita. It is open to the Tribunal to find a breach of Article 1110 in a case where certain facts are relied on to show the wholesale expropriation of an enterprise but the facts establish the expropriation of certain assets only. Accordingly the Tribunal will consider first the standard set by Article 1110, in particular for conduct tantamount to an expropriation, then whether the enterprise as a whole was subjected to conduct in breach of Article 1110, and finally whether (even if there was no wholesale expropriation of the enterprise as such) the facts establish a partial expropriation.

(i) The Article 1110 standard

142. So far as relevant, Article 1110 provides that:

“1. No Party may directly or indirectly nationalize or expropriate an investment of an investor of another Party in its territory or take a measure tantamount to nationalization or expropriation of such an investment ('expropriation'), except:

- (a) for a public purpose;
- (b) on a non-discriminatory basis;
- (c) in accordance with due process of law and Article 1105(1);
and
- (d) on payment of compensation in accordance with paragraphs 2 through 6.

7. This Article does not apply to the issuance of compulsory licenses granted in relation to intellectual property rights, or to the revocation, limitation or creation of intellectual property rights, to the extent that such issuance, revocation, limitation or creation is consistent with Chapter Seventeen (Intellectual Property).

8. For purposes of this Article and for greater certainty, a non-discriminatory measure of general application shall not be considered a measure tantamount to an expropriation of a debt security or loan covered by this Chapter solely on the ground that the measure imposes costs on the debtor that cause it to default on the debt.”

143. It may be noted that Article 1110(1) distinguishes between direct or indirect expropriation on the one hand and measures tantamount to an expropriation on the other. An indirect expropriation is still a taking of property. By contrast where a measure tantamount to an expropriation is alleged, there may have been no actual transfer, taking or loss of property by any person or entity, but rather an effect on property which makes formal distinctions of ownership irrelevant. This is of particular significance in the present case, at least as concerns the enterprise of Acaverde as a whole.

144. Evidently the phrase “take a measure tantamount to nationalization or expropriation of such an investment” in Article 1110(1) was intended to add to the meaning of the prohibition, over and above the reference to indirect expropriation. Indeed there is some indication that it was intended to have a broad meaning, otherwise it is difficult to see why Article 1110(8) was necessary. As a matter of international law a “non-discriminatory measure of general application” in relation to a debt security or loan which imposed costs on the debtor causing it to default would not be considered expropriatory or even potentially so. It is true that paragraph (8) is stated to be “for greater certainty”, but if it was necessary even for certainty’s sake to deal with such a case this suggests that the drafters entertained a broad view of what might be “tantamount to an expropriation”.

145. Thus there is some textual basis for the Claimant’s submission that “the modern definition of ‘expropriation’ must be broad enough to encompass every course of sovereign conduct that unfairly destroys a foreign investor’s contractual rights as an asset”.<sup>96</sup> The Claimant relied on a number of decisions in support of this proposition, and a review of these is first called for.

146. LETCO v. Liberia<sup>97</sup> concerned a 1970 concession agreement between LETCO and the Liberian government which gave LETCO, a Liberian company owned by French nationals, the exclusive right to harvest, process, transport and market forest products and to conduct other timber operations within an exclusive exploitation area, in return for certain payments and the performance of other contractual obligations.<sup>98</sup> Following an attempt to renegotiate the agreement, the Liberian Forest Development Authority by a letter of 18 February 1980 reduced the concession area by more than half with immediate effect on the grounds of breaches of the concession agreement by LETCO. After unsuccessfully protesting the actions of the Authority, LETCO suspended its operations in March 1983 and commenced ICSID arbitration proceedings under the agreement. Subsequently Liberia annulled the concession agreement, again citing breaches of the agreement by LETCO. The tribunal found that the Authority's letter of February 1980 communicating the withdrawal of over half the concession area was an effective revocation of the agreement which rendered the concession useless to LETCO, and that the revocation was carried out in breach of the notice and cure provisions of the concession agreement.<sup>99</sup> The tribunal examined LETCO's alleged breaches of the agreement (as set out by Liberia in its correspondence with LETCO), and found the alleged breaches were not supported by the facts before it. Before turning to the assessment of compensation due to LETCO for Liberia's breach of contract, the tribunal considered whether Liberia's actions in reducing the concession area could be justified as an act of nationalisation. It found that any such defence would have failed because the confiscation of the concession area was not for a bona fide public purpose, was discriminatory and was not accompanied by appropriate compensation.<sup>100</sup> It should be stressed that LETCO did not base its claim on expropriation or unfair treatment, nor did the tribunal find Liberia responsible under international law for breach of the concession. The tribunal's discussion of expropriation was in the context of addressing a potential defence by Liberia (which did not appear in the proceedings) to the finding of breach of contract. The award of damages was based on the Liberian law of contract.

147. Sapphire International Petroleums Ltd. v. National Iranian Oil Company<sup>101</sup> concerned alleged breaches leading to the unlawful termination of an agreement between the claimant and the National Iranian Oil Company (NIOC) under which the parties would form a joint venture to prospect for and exploit oil in a specified geographical area. relationship between the parties broke down after a only a few months. Sapphire repudiated the agreement on the grounds of NIOC's actions which, it concluded, showed that NIOC did not intend to perform its obligations under the agreement, and commenced arbitration proceedings. As in the LETCO case, the arbitration took place pursuant to an arbitration clause in the agreement between the parties. The arbitrator held that NIOC had breached the terms of the concession agreement in a manner which entitled Sapphire to terminate the contract and claim damages.<sup>102</sup>

148. The Claimant argues that the "Sapphire decision exemplifies State responsibility for undermining the investor-to-government relations on which a long-term economic development agreement is based" and that "the decision holds a State responsible for such conduct even where neither the State nor any State organ terminates the agreement outright".<sup>103</sup> While the arbitrator in Sapphire discussed in some depth the relevance of the nature of the contract to his finding as to the substantive law applicable to the dispute,<sup>104</sup> the award rests on a finding of breaches of contract by NIOC, a separate agency which was party to the contract and the defendant in the arbitration.

149. Thus both LETCO and Sapphire were awards for breach of contract, given by tribunals constituted under the arbitration provisions of those contracts. By contrast the present case concerns a claim that Mexico has breached Article 1110(1) by actions tantamount to expropriation. There is no suggestion that the contracts in the present case were "internationalized". They were contracts between Mexican persons or entities governed by Mexican law and including Mexican dispute settlement provisions. The Claimant relied on statements in the two decisions for the proposition that breach of contract can be characterised as an expropriation. But the two cases are of limited assistance: the statements to that effect, such as they are,<sup>105</sup> were not relevant to the awards of these tribunals.

<sup>104</sup> 35 ILR 136, 170-6. Arbitrator Calvin found that the law of the contract was the rules of law "common to civilized nations" on the basis that the parties had not specified the applicable law in the contract, and the contract was fundamentally different from the ordinary commercial contract envisaged by the rules of private international law because of its long-term and quasi-international character.

150. Turning to NAFTA itself, the meaning of Article 1110 has been discussed in a series of decisions by NAFTA tribunals.

151. Pope & Talbot Inc. v. Government of Canada concerned an alleged regulatory expropriation in terms of the right of access to the United States market. The tribunal held that this right was protected by Article 1105 as part of the “business” in question, but that the Canadian measure was not sufficiently restrictive to amount to a “taking”.<sup>106</sup>

152. The S.D. Myers case was also concerned with the distinction between regulation and expropriation, and to that extent is not relevant here. The tribunal defined creeping expropriation as “a lasting removal of the ability of an owner to make use of its economic rights...”.<sup>107</sup> The tribunal accepted that “in legal theory, rights other than property rights may be ‘expropriated’ and that international law makes it appropriate for tribunals to examine the purpose and effect of governmental measures”.<sup>108</sup> The tribunal held that the temporary closure of the border to PCB transports could not be characterised as a measure tantamount to expropriation, rejecting what it characterised as an attempt by the claimant to use the word “tantamount” to extend the meaning of the word “expropriation” beyond the “customary scope of the term... under international law”.<sup>109</sup> It noted that:

“The primary meaning of the word ‘tantamount’ given by the Oxford English Dictionary is ‘equivalent’. Both words require a tribunal to look at the substance of what has occurred and not only at form...”<sup>110</sup>

The tribunal considered that the drafters of the NAFTA intended the phrase “tantamount to expropriation” to cover the concept of “creeping expropriation”.<sup>111</sup> Canada’s actions were not measures “tantamount to expropriation” because Canada realised no benefit from the measure and there was no evidence of a transfer of property or benefit directly to others.<sup>112</sup>

153. Metalclad Corporation v. United Mexican States was a claim arising from another municipal concession contract which met fierce local resistance.<sup>113</sup> The claimant alleged that Mexico, through the governments of the State of San Luis Potosi and municipality of Guadalcazar, had breached Articles 1105 and 1110 of the NAFTA by interference in the development and operation of a hazardous waste landfill. Summarising the scope of Article 1110, the tribunal said,

“expropriation under NAFTA includes not only open, deliberate and acknowledged takings of property, such as outright seizure or formal or obligatory transfer of title in favor of the host State, but also covert or incidental interference with the use of property which has the effect of depriving the owner, in whole or in significant part, of the use or reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit of property even if not necessarily to the obvious benefit of the host State.”<sup>114</sup>

The tribunal held that Mexico, by tolerating and acquiescing in the actions of the municipal authorities which prevented the operation of the fully constructed landfill, notwithstanding the approval and endorsement of the federal authorities, was responsible for a measure tantamount to expropriation of Metalclad’s investment in breach of Article 1110. Further, it held, the denial by the municipal authority of a construction permit on grounds which were not open to it and which contradicted earlier federal commitments,<sup>115</sup> and the absence of a timely, orderly and substantiated basis for the denial of the municipal permit amounted to an indirect expropriation.<sup>116</sup> The tribunal also considered that the Ecological Decree, setting aside the area as a reserve and thus preventing the land from being used as provided for in the agreement, was an act tantamount to expropriation and a further ground for finding a breach of Article 1110.<sup>117</sup>

154. Mexico sought judicial review of the Metalclad award in the Supreme Court of British Columbia on various grounds.<sup>118</sup> The Supreme Court upheld Mexico's argument that the tribunal's finding under Article 1105 was in excess of jurisdiction because the tribunal used NAFTA's transparency provisions (extraneous to Chapter 11) as a basis for the interpretation and application of Article 1105.<sup>119</sup> As the tribunal had also based its Article 1110 finding of expropriation, at least in part, on Mexico's failure to act in a transparent manner, this finding was also outside the scope of the submission to arbitration.<sup>120</sup> However, the Supreme Court found that the tribunal's decision that the Ecological Decree was an expropriation was within jurisdiction and not patently unreasonable and that there were no grounds to set it aside.<sup>121</sup> Tysoe J. commented that the tribunal's definition of expropriation for the purposes of Article 1110 was "extremely broad", but held that this was not a reviewable issue under the relevant Canadian legislation.<sup>122</sup>

155. In the present case, for reasons that will appear, the Tribunal does not need to reach final conclusions on the meaning of the phrase "measures tantamount to... expropriation" in Article 1110. Each case has to be looked at it in light of the factual situation and the basis for the measures in question. There is no issue in the present case of "regulatory taking"; rather the question is whether the combined conduct of Mexican public entities had an effect equivalent to the taking of the enterprise, in whole or substantial part. In considering this question it is necessary to distinguish between the measures affecting Acaverde as a whole and those concerning particular contractual rights under the Concession Agreement.

(ii) The Article 1110 standard applied to the enterprise

156. Turning to the impact of the Mexican measures on Acaverde as a whole, the first point is that in the present case there was at no stage any expropriation of physical assets. The assets of Acaverde were sold off in an apparently orderly way at about the time it withdrew from operations under the Concession Agreement.<sup>123</sup>

157. Nor was there any direct or indirect expropriation of the enterprise, Acaverde, as such. As the Tribunal has already held, the reason Waste Management withdrew from Acapulco was not because the enterprise had been seized, or because its activity as a whole had been blocked, for example by the seizure of key items of its property, but because—as a result of contractual defaults, changes of circumstances and the fragility of the underlying business plan—the operation was persistently uneconomic.

158. Thus for present purposes the question is whether there was any conduct tantamount to an expropriation which might trigger NAFTA Article 1110. The Claimant contends that the City's refusal to pay on approved invoices and Banobras' refusal to make payments under the Line of Credit Agreement were confiscatory in effect, and that Acaverde's rights under the concession were rendered valueless by the combination of (a) the City's failure to enforce the exclusivity provisions of the Concession, (b) its frustrating the construction, building and operation of the landfill, and (c) its campaign of obstruction (in cahoots with Guerrero and Banobras) in the face of Acaverde's attempts to resolve the dispute. In short the Claimant argues that these actions and refusals to acts by the City, Guerrero and Banobras taken together resulted in a "creeping" expropriation of the Claimant's investment, in breach of Article 1110.<sup>124</sup> regard the conduct of Mexico in the present case as tantamount to expropriation of the enterprise as such, within the meaning attributed to that term in Metalclad. Acaverde at all times had the control and use of its property. It was able to service its customers and earn collection fees from them. It is true that the City failed to make available the promised land for the disposal site—but a failure by a State to provide its own land to an enterprise for some purpose is not converted into an expropriation of the enterprise just because the failure involves a breach of contract. It is also true that the City’s breaches (not remedied by Guerrero and remedied only to a limited extent by Banobras) had the effect of depriving Acaverde of “the reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit” of the project so far as the monthly fees due from the City were concerned. But that will be true of any serious breach of contract: the loss of benefits or expectations is not a sufficient criterion for an expropriation, even if it is a necessary one.

160. In the Tribunal’s view, an enterprise is not expropriated just because its debts are not paid or other contractual obligations towards it are breached. There was no outright repudiation of the transaction in the present case, and if the City entered into the Concession Agreement on the basis of an over-optimistic assessment of the possibilities, so did Acaverde. It is not the function of Article 1110 to compensate for failed business ventures, absent arbitrary intervention by the State amounting to a virtual taking or sterilising of the enterprise.

161. The nearest the Claimant came to showing an outright repudiation of the enterprise by Mexico was the Mayor’s statement, shortly after the Concession Agreement came into force, to the effect that “the obligation to contract Acaverde’s services will be eliminated in order to remove what was previously interpreted as an imposition”.<sup>126</sup> This of course related only to one aspect of the concession arrangements, although an important aspect. But even if a unilateral and unjustified change in the exclusivity obligation could have amounted to an expropriation, no legislative change was in fact made. The Claimant argued that this statement “effectively repealed the law” but the Tribunal does not agree. The Mayor was not purporting to exercise legislative authority or unilaterally to vary the contract. He was not intervening by taking some extra-legal action, as the Mayor of Palermo did when he intervened in the ELSI case. He was saying what ought to be done, in his view, to allay public concerns, concerns which did in fact exist at the time. Individual statements of this kind made by local political figures in the heat of public debate may or may not be wise or appropriate, but they are not tantamount to expropriation unless they are acted on in such a way as to negate the rights concerned without any remedy. In fact no action was taken of the kind threatened at the time or later. Even if it had been taken, the Claimant had remedies available to it, under the Concession Agreement and otherwise.

162. For these reasons the Tribunal does not accept that there was an expropriation of Acaverde in this case, or any measure tantamount to the expropriation of Acaverde as an enterprise.

(iii) Was there conduct tantamount to an expropriation of Acaverde's contractual rights?

163. This conclusion does not however exhaust the Claimant's case, for the reasons given in paragraph 141 above. Even if the enterprise of Acaverde was not subjected to conduct in breach of Article 1110 when considered as a whole, it is arguable that the persistent refusal or inability of the City to pay sums due under the Concession Agreement involved an expropriation, or at least measures tantamount to an expropriation, of the sums due. As another NAFTA tribunal confirmed in the Mondev case, "the protection afforded by the prohibition against expropriation or equivalent treatment in Article 1110 can extend to intangible property interests".<sup>127</sup> The Claimant alleged that the City's failure to pay, persisted in over many months, was a virtual expropriation of its contractual rights amounting to a breach of Article 1110.

164. This issue was raised but not resolved in the Azinian case.<sup>128</sup> There the claimants argued that the fundamental non-performance by the city council of a waste management contract with its Mexican subsidiary was a violation of Article 1110, relying on a "wealth of authority treating the repudiation of concession agreements as an expropriation of contractual rights”.<sup>129</sup> The tribunal, having emphasised that proof of a breach of contract did not equate to a breach of NAFTA Chapter 11, responded to this argument in the following terms:

“Labelling is... no substitute for analysis. The words ‘confiscatory,’ ‘destroy contractual rights as an asset,’ or ‘repudiation’ may serve as a way to describe breaches which are to be treated as extraordinary, and therefore as acts of expropriation, but they certainly do not indicate on what basis the critical distinction between expropriation and an ordinary breach of contract is to be made. The egregiousness of any breach is in the eye of the beholder—and that is not satisfactory for present purposes.”<sup>130</sup>

The Tribunal noted however that the repudiation by the council in that case took the form of the actual rescission of the contract for cause, which cause was upheld by the Mexican courts in proceedings not alleged to involve a denial of justice. In the absence of a denial of justice, the Mexican contract had no further existence as a source of rights.<sup>131</sup> That being so, the issue of breach of contract as conduct tantamount to expropriation did not arise: it was “unnecessary to consider issues relating to performance of the Concession Contract”.<sup>132</sup>

165. In the present case, by contrast, the City at no stage purported to invalidate or terminate the Concession Agreement. As the Tribunal has held, it did attempt to perform its obligations in a number of respects. At the same time it is undeniable (and the Respondent hardly sought to deny) that the City was in breach of the Agreement for much of its duration, especially as concerns its failure to pay the monthly fee due. Thus the present case does raise the question whether a persistent and serious breach of a contract by a State organ can constitute expropriation of the right in question, or at least conduct tantamount to expropriation of that right, for the purposes of Article 1110.

<sup>131</sup> The tribunal stressed that the claimants’ failure to plead denial of justice in respect of the decisions of the Mexican courts was fatal: “if there is no complaint against a determination by a competent court that a contract governed by Mexican law was invalid under Mexican law, there is by definition no contract to be expropriated”: ibid., 290 (para. 100).

166. The Claimant relied on several earlier cases as authority for the proposition that contractual non-performance, and in particular the refusal to pay a debt, can constitute an expropriation.

167. George W. Cook v. United Mexican States<sup>133</sup> was a decision of the United States-Mexican Claims Commission established under the Convention of 8 September 1923.<sup>134</sup> This was a claim for postal money orders issued in 1913 and 1914 which were not paid by the Mexican postal authorities on presentation. The Commission found for the claimant, dismissing Mexico's submission that the action was time-barred because the right to collect on money orders expired two years after issue. Cook had presented the orders for payment within the two year period, the authorities had refused to pay them, contrary to the governing provisions of Mexican law, and now Mexico could not rely on its own default as a defence to the claim. Commissioner Nielsen, in a statement with which the other two commissioners concurred, said that: "[b]y the failure of the Mexican authorities to pay the money orders in question in conformity with the existing Mexican law when payment was due... Cook was wrongfully deprived at the time of property in the amount [of the postal orders]."<sup>135</sup> It may be noted that the Commission had jurisdiction over the whole class of claims by nationals of one State against the Government of the other State, to be decided "in accordance with the principles of international law, justice and equity". According to Article V of the Convention:

"The High Contracting Parties, being desirous of effecting an equitable settlement of the claims of their respective citizens, thereby affording them just and adequate compensation for their losses or damages, agree that no claim shall be disallowed or rejected by the Commission by the application of the general principle of international law that the legal remedies must be exhausted as a condition precedent to the validity or allowance of any claim."

Thus the Commission's jurisdiction was not dependent upon the qualification of the conduct as expropriatory; nonetheless the Commission did characterise it in those terms.

168. In the Tribunal's view, the outright refusal by a State to honour a money order or similar instrument payable under its own law may well constitute either an actual expropriation or at least a measure tantamount to an expropriation of the value of the order. There was no suggestion that Cook as the beneficiary of the money order was not entitled to be paid. Like other instruments of similar character the money order was not just an ordinary contract; it was an instrument representing a certain value which the State was ex facie committed to pay under its own law.

169. The Cook case was, however, relied on in Singer Sewing Machine Co. v. The Republic of Turkey<sup>136</sup> for the broader proposition that a government's failure to pay a debt due under a contract is an expropriation of the amount owed—and correspondingly the Singer case was relied on by the Claimant before this Tribunal. In that case the American-Turkish Claims Committee held that the Turkish Government's failure to pay for sewing machines it had agreed to purchase could be viewed as either a confiscation of the purchase price of the commodities or the destruction or confiscation of property rights in a contract. According to Nielsen's report, the Committee stated that:

“It cannot be said that the law of nations embraces any ‘Law of Contracts’ such as is found in the domestic jurisprudence of nations. International law does not prescribe rules relative to the forms and legal effect of contracts, but that law may be considered to be concerned with the action authorities of a government may take with respect to contractual rights. It is believed that in the ultimate determination of responsibility under international law, application can properly be given to principles of law with respect to confiscation, and that the confiscation of the property of an alien is violative of international law. If a government agrees to pay money for commodities and fails to make payment, the view may be taken that the purchase price of the commodities has been confiscated, or that the commodities have been confiscated, or that property rights in a contract have been destroyed or confiscated.”<sup>137</sup>

170. The United States-Turkish Exchange of Notes of 24 December 1923, pursuant to which the decision was made, was not limited to claims for expropriation, or indeed to claims for breaches of international law in any sense. The Exchange of Notes provided only that the Committee...

<sup>136</sup> Reported in F.K. Nielsen, ed., The American-Turkish Claims Settlement Commission. Opinions and Report (Washington, Government Printing Office, 1937), 490, cited in Claimant's Memorial, paras. 5.46-5.47.

“will proceed, with a view to determining the solutions which should be given them, to the examination of the claims presented by either Government within a period of six months from its constitution. The dossiers of the claims must contain the documents establishing the nature, the origin, and the justification of each claim.”<sup>138</sup>

Thus the Committee’s dictum quoted above was not necessary for the purposes of its decision. Moreover it was, in the present Tribunal’s view, far too wide. Taken literally that dictum would appear to eliminate the distinction between breach of contract and breach of treaty entirely.

171. Subsequent authorities have sought to make a distinction between mere failure or refusal to comply with a contract, on the one hand, and conduct which crosses the threshold of taking or expropriation, on the other hand. The Tribunal is sympathetic to the view expressed in Azinian that such a distinction is not adequately made by the addition of adjectives (“egregious”, “gross”, “flagrant” or whatever).<sup>139</sup> But some distinction must be made: if certain cases of contractual non-performance may amount to expropriation, it must be possible to say, in principle, which ones, otherwise the distinction between contractual and treaty claims disappears.

172. On analysis it appears that the cases fall into a number of groups. First and perhaps best known are the cases where a whole enterprise is terminated or frustrated because its functioning is simply halted by decree or executive act, usually accompanied by other conduct.<sup>140</sup> This was so in many of the oil cases,<sup>141</sup> and in many cases before the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal.<sup>142</sup>

173. Secondly, there are cases where there has been an acknowledged taking of property, and associated contractual rights are affected in consequence. In such cases the bundle of rights requiring to be compensated includes all the associated contractual and other incorporeal rights,<sup>143</sup> unless these are severable and retain their value in the hands of the claimant notwithstanding the seizure of the related property.

174. Thirdly, there is the much smaller group of cases where the only right affected is incorporeal; these come closest to the present claim of contractual non-performance. Cook was such a case, and (if it is properly classified as an instance of expropriation, which is doubtful) so was Singer Sewing Machine Co. v. The Republic of Turkey. In such cases, simply to assert that “property rights are created under and by virtue of a contract” is not sufficient.<sup>144</sup> The mere non-performance of a contractual obligation is not to be equated with a taking of property, nor (unless accompanied by other elements) is it tantamount to expropriation. Any private party can fail to perform its contracts, whereas nationalization and expropriation are inherently governmental acts, as is envisaged by the use of the term “measure” in Article 1110(1). It is true that, having regard to the inclusive definition of “measure”,<sup>145</sup> one could envisage conduct tantamount to an expropriation which consisted of acts and omissions not specifically or exclusively governmental. All the same, the normal response by an investor faced with a breach of contract by its governmental counter-party (the breach not taking the form of an exercise of governmental prerogative, such as a legislative decree) is to sue in the appropriate court to remedy the breach. It is only where such access is legally or practically foreclosed that the breach could amount to an definitive denial of the right (i.e., the effective taking of the chose in action) and the protection of Article 1110 be called into play.

175. The Tribunal concludes that it is one thing to expropriate a right under a contract and another to fail to comply with the contract. Non-compliance by a government with contractual obligations is not the same thing as, or equivalent or tantamount to, an expropriation. In the present case the Claimant did not lose its contractual rights, which it was free to pursue before the contractually chosen forum. The law of breach of contract is not secreted in the interstices of Article 1110 of NAFTA. Rather it is necessary to show an effective repudiation of the right, unredressed by any remedies available to the Claimant, which has the effect of preventing its exercise entirely or to a substantial extent.

176. In the present case, in the Tribunal's view, this has not been shown. The question here is not one of final refusal to pay (combined with effective obstruction and denial of legal remedies); it is one of neglect and failure at the contractual level in the context of a marginal enterprise. That does not pass the test for an expropriatory taking of contractual rights as it emerges from the decisions analysed above.

(iv) Conclusion as to Article 1110

177. In the Tribunal's view, it is not the function of the international law of expropriation as reflected in Article 1110 to eliminate the normal commercial risks of a foreign investor,<sup>146</sup> or to place on Mexico the burden of compensating for the failure of a business plan which was, in the circumstances, founded on too narrow a client base and dependent for its success on unsustainable assumptions about customer uptake and contractual performance. A failing enterprise is not expropriated just because debts are not paid or other contractual obligations are not fulfilled. The position may be different if the available legal avenues for redress are blocked or are evidently futile in the face of governmental intransigence. But this was not the case here. The Claimant's decision not to proceed with the CANACO arbitration may have been understandable, but taking into account all the circumstances it did not implicate Mexico in a breach of Article 1110 any more than of Article 1105.<sup>147</sup>

178. For all these reasons, in the Tribunal's view, there was nothing which could be properly described as an expropriation by Mexico of Waste Management's property, assets or investment, or a measure tantamount to such expropriation, within the meaning of NAFTA Article 1110. The Claimant's case on Article 1110, like that on Article 1105, must fail.

D. THE ISSUE OF COSTS

179. Turning to the question of the costs and expenses of the proceeding, no question arises as to the costs of the first proceeding, which were dealt with by the first Tribunal.<sup>148</sup>

180. In its decision of 26 June 2002, this Tribunal reserved the question of costs on Mexico's preliminary objection, as to which the Claimant was successful.

181. As is now unfortunately common, there were a significant number of interlocutory issues raised by both parties during the proceedings.

182. As to the merits, in the Tribunal's view the proceedings were expeditiously and efficiently conducted by the representatives of both parties.

183. There is no rule in international arbitration that costs follow the event. Equally, however, the Tribunal does not accept that there is any practice in investment arbitration (as there may be, at least de facto, in the International Court and in interstate arbitration) that each party should pay its own costs. In the end the question of costs is a matter within the discretion of the Tribunal, having regard both to the outcome of the proceedings and to other relevant factors.

184. In circumstances where the conduct of the City is by no means beyond criticism, the Tribunal concludes that a fair outcome would be an order that each party bear its own legal costs and expenses, and that the costs and expenses of the Tribunal be borne equally between them.

AWARD

For the foregoing reasons, the Tribunal unanimously DECIDES:

- (a) That the claim is admissible under Chapter 11 of NAFTA;
- (b) That the conduct of the Respondent which is the subject of the claim did not involve any breach of Article 1105 or 1110 of NAFTA;
- (c) That Waste Management's claim is accordingly dismissed in its entirety;
- (d) That each Party shall bear its own costs and half of the costs and expenses of these proceedings.

II. Procedural background

3. On September 19, 2001, Azurix filed a request for arbitration against the Argentina Republic, with the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (hereinafter the "Centre"). Azurix claims that Argentina has violated obligations owed to Azurix under the 1991 Treaty Concerning the Reciprocal Encouragement and Protection of Investment between the Argentine Republic and the United States of America (hereinafter "the BIT"), international law and Argentine law in respect of Azurix's investment in a utility which distributes drinking water and treats and disposes of sewerage water in the Argentine Province of Buenos Aires. Azurix alleges such breaches were made by Argentina both directly through its own omissions and through the actions and omissions of its political subdivisions and instrumentalities.

4. On October 23, 2001, the Secretary-General of the Centre registered Azurix's request for arbitration, pursuant to Article 36(3) of the ICSID Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and National of other States (hereinafter "the Convention").

5. On November 12, 2001, the parties agreed that the Arbitral Tribunal would consist of three arbitrators, one to be appointed by each party and the third presiding arbitrator to be appointed by the Chairman of the Administrative Council of the Centre. Accordingly, the Claimant appointed Professor Elihu Lauterpacht, C.B.E. Q.C., a British national, and the Respondent appointed Dr. Daniel H. Martins, an Uruguayan national. Dr. Andrés Rigo Sureda, a Spanish national, was appointed President after consultation with the parties.

6. The Tribunal was deemed to have been constituted on April 8, 2002 and the proceeding to have commenced. On the same date, the parties were notified that Ms. Claudia Frutos-Peterson, Counsel, ICSID, would serve as Secretary of the Arbitral Tribunal.

7. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 13, the Tribunal held its first session with the parties in Washington D.C. on May 16, 2002. Mr. R. Doak Bishop of King & Spalding represented the Claimant at the first session, and Mr. Hernán Cruchaga and Ms. Andrea G. Gualde of the Procuración del Tesoro de la Nación, Buenos Aires, acting on instruction from the then Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación, Dr. Rubén Miguel Citara, represented the Respondent at the first session.

8. At the first session, the parties agreed that the Tribunal had been properly constituted and that they had no objection to any of the members of the Tribunal, and it was noted that the proceedings would be conducted under the ICSID Arbitration Rules in force since September 26, 1984 (hereinafter “the Arbitration Rules”). In respect of the pleadings to be filed by the parties, their number, sequence and timing, it was announced after consultation with the parties that the Claimant would file its Memorial within 150 days of the date of the first session, the Respondent would file its Counter-Memorial within 150 days of the date of receipt of the Memorial, the Claimant’s Reply would be filed within 60 days of the date of receipt of the Counter-Memorial, and the Respondent’s Rejoinder would be filed within a further 60 days of its receipt of the Reply. It was further noted by the Tribunal that, in accordance with the Arbitration Rules, the Respondent had the right to raise any objections it might have to jurisdiction no later than the expiration of the time limit fixed for filing its Counter-Memorial. If such objections to jurisdiction were made by the Respondent and rejected by the Tribunal, it was agreed that the above timetable would be resumed following the resumption of proceedings on the merits.

9. In accordance with the timetable decided during the first session, Azurix filed its Memorial on the merits on October 15, 2002, claiming that Argentina had breached the BIT by expropriating its investment by measures tantamount to expropriation without prompt, adequate and effective compensation (Article IV(1)), by failing to accord to it fair and equitable treatment, full protection and security, and treatment required by international law (Article II(2)(a)), by taking arbitrary measures that impaired Azurix’s use and enjoyment of its investment (Article II(2)(b)), by failing to observe obligations Argentina entered into with regard to Azurix’s investment (Article II(2)(c)), and by failing to provide transparency concerning the regulations, administrative practices and procedures and adjudicatory decisions that affect Azurix’s investment (Article II(7)). In addition, Azurix requested orders for the payment of compensation for all damages suffered and the adoption by Argentina of all necessary measures to avoid further damages to Azurix’s investment. Azurix expressly reserved its right to request a decision on provisional measures under Article 47 of the ICSID Convention and Arbitration Rule 39.

10. On March 7, 2003, Argentina filed a Memorial on jurisdiction raising two objections to the Tribunal's jurisdiction. The first was that Azurix agreed to submit this dispute to the courts of the city of La Plata and waived any other jurisdiction and forum; the second was that Azurix had already made a forum selection under Article VII of the BIT by submitting the dispute to Argentine courts. On March 12, 2002 the Tribunal suspended the proceeding on the merits pursuant to Arbitration Rule 41(3), and set dates for filing pleadings on jurisdiction. Accordingly, Azurix filed its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction on May 13, 2003.

11. Azurix filed a request for provisional measures on July 15, 2003 (dated July 14, 2003), subsequently supplemented by two letters dated July 21 and 28, 2003. The request sought a provisional measure recommending that Argentina refrain from incurring by itself or through any of its political subdivisions in any action or omission capable of aggravating or extending the dispute, taking into account especially the reorganization of Azurix's Argentine subsidiary, Azurix Buenos Aires S.A. (hereinafter "ABA"), or any other measure having the same effect.

12. At the request of the Tribunal, Argentina filed observations on Azurix's request for provisional measures on July 24, 2003, seeking dismissal of the request for provisional measures together with costs and requesting that the Tribunal request the Claimant to produce an original copy of the Decision of the Appeals Chamber of the Province of Buenos Aires.

13. The Tribunal, in a decision of August 6, 2003, rejected Azurix's request for provisional measures, considering that, in the circumstances of the case and at that stage of proceedings, it was not in a position to recommend the specific measure requested or to propose others with the same objective. The Tribunal did, however, invite the parties to abstain from adopting measures of any character which could aggravate or extend the controversy submitted to arbitration, and took note of statements made by Argentina affirming that the Province of Buenos Aires (hereinafter "the Province") recognizes that the receivables for services rendered by ABA before

March 7, 2002 belong to ABA, and that those collected or to be collected in the future have been or will be deposited in a special banking account, and that the situation described in Azurix's request would not affect the enforceability or execution of any award rendered on the merits. The Tribunal postponed its decision on costs in respect of the provisional measures request to a later stage of the proceedings and considered it unnecessary to request the Claimant to furnish the Tribunal with the Decision of the Appeals Chamber.

14. Argentina filed its Reply on jurisdiction on August 4, 2003

15. Azurix filed a Rejoinder on jurisdiction on August 29, 2003.

16. The hearing on jurisdiction took place in London on September 9 and 10, 2003. The parties were represented by Messrs. R. Doak Bishop, Guido Santiago Tawil, Ignacio Minorini Lima and Craig S. Miles, on behalf of the Claimant. Messrs. Carlos Ignacio Suárez Anzorena, and Jorge Barraguirre, and Ms. Beatriz Pallarés, from the Procuración del Tesoro de la Nación, and Mr. Osvaldo Siseles, from the Secretaría Legal y Administrativa del Ministerio de Economía y Producción, represented the Respondent. On December 8, 2003 the Tribunal issued its Decision on Jurisdiction, which is part of this Award, declaring that the dispute was within the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal.

17. During the hearing on jurisdiction, the Respondent had requested an extension of 90 days to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits should the Tribunal find that it had jurisdiction. On December 8, 2003, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 1 establishing the schedule for the further procedures on the merits. According to that schedule, the Respondent was granted an extension of 50 days and its Counter-Memorial on the merits was due within 60 days from the date of that Procedural Order; the Claimant was to file its Reply within 60 days from its receipt of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial, and the Respondent was to file its Rejoinder within 60 days from its receipt of the Claimant's Reply.

18. On February 9, 2004, the Respondent filed its Counter-Memorial on the merits. In the Counter-Memorial, Argentina requested the Tribunal to order the Claimant to produce all reports, analysis and other documentation related to the Claimant's participation in the privatization of the water supply and sewerage services of the Province and the Claimant's IPO. The Respondent also requested, if considered appropriate by the Tribunal, that the Tribunal ask the United States Congress to furnish the reports related to ENRON's scandal and its relationship to Azurix.

19. On February 20, 2004, it was agreed that the hearing on the merits would take place in Paris from October 4 to 8, 2004 and, if necessary, extend it to October 11-12.

20. On March 8, 2004, the Tribunal invited Azurix to comment on Argentina's evidence request in the Counter-Memorial. Azurix objected to the request on March 15, 2004 and requested the Tribunal that, in case it would agree to Argentina's request, Argentina be invited in turn to produce all documentation related to AGOSBA's services, their privatization, the original setting of the tariffs, all documents of the Privatization Commission, the ORAB, and the files related to ABA, AGOSBA and ABSA. The Respondent commented on Azurix's objection on March 29, 2004 and manifested its willingness to request the Province to produce evidence that the Tribunal considered relevant under Arbitration Rule 34.

21. On March 29, 2004, the parties agreed to extend by three weeks the schedule for the presentation of the Reply and the Rejoinder.

22. On April 19, 2004, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 2 inviting the Respondent to request the Province to furnish the documentation filed with the Province for participating in the bidding process (Envelop No. 1 –the technical offer- and Envelop No. 2 –the economic offer) ("Envelops No. 1 and No. 2"), and postponed consideration of the production of the remainder of the evidence requested until the Tribunal had an opportunity to review the Reply, which was due by May 7, 2004.

23. The Respondent furnished the documentation requested under Procedural Order No. 2 on May 17, 2004. At the same time, the Respondent requested that the Tribunal do not distribute such documentation until Azurix had furnished its own copies of Envelops No. 1 and No. 2. At this point, the Respondent alleged certain irregularities in Circulars 51(b) and 52(a) and pointed out changes in the Concession Agreement which were not part of the draft agreement included in the bidding documents.

24. On May 24, 2004, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 3 requesting Azurix to furnish the Tribunal its own copies of Envelops No. 1 and No. 2 and withheld the documentation received from the Respondent.

25. Azurix, instead of presenting its own copies of Envelops No. 1 and No. 2, sought copies directly from the Province allegedly for convenience's sake. On May 31, 2004, the Respondent objected that, by seeking the documents from the Province, Azurix had not complied with Procedural Order No. 3, withdrew its request related to the production of Envelops No. 1 and No. 2, informed the Tribunal on irregularities it had detected in Envelop No. 2 and requested that the Tribunal charge to the Claimant the costs related to this procedural incident.

26. On July 24, 2004, the Respondent requested an extension of 10 days to file its Rejoinder. The extension was granted on August 10, 2004.

27. On July 29, 2004, the Tribunal issued procedural Order No. 4 rejecting the request for production of evidence formulated in the communication of the Respondent of July 22, 2004 because of its general nature and failure to justify it.

28. On August 3, 2004, the Secretariat notified the parties that Professor Lauterpacht had resigned as an arbitrator for health reasons, and suspended the proceedings in accordance with Arbitration Rule 10(2). On the same date, the Secretariat notified the parties that the Tribunal had consented to Professor Lauterpacht's resignation in accordance with Arbitration Rule 8(2). On August 4, 2004, Mr. Marc Lalonde, a Canadian national, was appointed as an arbitrator by the Claimant in replacement of Professor Lauterpacht. On August 10, 2004, the Tribunal was reconstituted and the proceedings were resumed.

29. On August 16, 2004, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 5 rejecting a further Respondent's request, dated August 2, 2004, for production of evidence because it considered that it was not adequately justified even if more precise than the request of July 22, 2004. On the same date, Argentina notified the appointment of Mr. Osvaldo César Guglielmino as the Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina.

30. On August 17, 2004, the Respondent filed its Rejoinder on the Merits.

31. On August 23, 2004, the Respondent requested the Tribunal to reconsider Procedural Order No. 5. The Claimant reiterated its objections to the Respondent's request on August 26, 2004. The Tribunal, after considering anew the Respondent's request and having then had the opportunity to review the Rejoinder, issued Procedural Order No. 6, requesting the Claimant to submit, not later than September 17, 2004, the study prepared by Hytsa Estudios y Proyectos, S.A. ("Hytsa") referred to in paragraph 35 of the Rejoinder, and the Respondent to submit by the same date the bid evaluation reports related to each stage of the bidding for the Concession.

32. As previously decided, the hearing on the merits was held, from October 4-13, 2004, at the World Bank's office in Paris, France. Present at the hearing were:

33. On November 29, 2004, the Respondent filed an application to disqualify the President of the Tribunal under Article 57 of the ICSID Convention. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 9(6), the proceedings were suspended. Pursuant to Article 58 of the Convention, the co-arbitrators issued a Decision dated February 25, 2005 on the Challenge to the President of the Tribunal declining the Respondent's disqualification proposal, which was notified to the parties on March 11, 2005.

34. On March 14, 2005, the proceedings were resumed in accordance with Arbitration Rule 9(6).

35. On March 15, 2005, the Centre transmitted to the Tribunal the parties' Post- Hearing Briefs of November 29, 2004.

36. The Tribunal met in Washington, DC from September 7 to 9, 2005 to discuss a draft of this award, and decided to request Azurix to explain, not later than September 28, 2005, certain discrepancies in the amounts in the financial statements of ABA for fiscal years 2000 and 2001. Azurix furnished its explanation on September 27, 2005 and the Tribunal invited the Respondent to comment on it by October 17, 2005. The Respondent sent comments on October 14, 2005.

37. On April 17, 2006, the Tribunal declared the proceedings closed pursuant to Arbitration Rule 38. By letter of June 13, 2006 the Tribunal extended by a further 30 days the period by which the award would be drawn up, in accordance with ICSID Arbitration Rule 46.

III. Background to the Dispute

38. In 1996 the Province started the privatization of the services of Administración General de Obras Sanitarias de la Provincia de Buenos Aires ("AGOSBA"), the Province owned and operated company which provided potable water and sewerage services in the Province. The Province passed Law 11.820 ("the Law") to create the regulatory framework for privatization of AGOSBA's services. The future operator of the water services would be granted a concession which would be overseen and regulated by a new regulatory authority established for the purpose - Organismo Regulador de Aguas Bonaerense ("ORAB"). The concessionaire was required to be a company incorporated in Argentina. The Province engaged Schroeders Argentina S.A. ("Schroeders") as adviser for the privatization of AGOSBA and requested Schroeders to distribute an information statement to potential investors. Schroeders sent the information statement to ENRON Corporation ("ENRON") inviting this company to participate in the bidding. ENRON requested from a consulting company, Hytsa Estudios y Proyectos S.A. ("Hytsa") a preliminary report on the information furnished by the Province in the Data Room on AGOSBA and its operations.

39. The privatization process was conducted by the Privatization Commission, which tendered the concession on the international market on the basis of the Law and of a set of contract documents prepared in accordance with the Law by ORAB, including the Bidding Terms and Conditions and a draft Concession Agreement.

40. A bid offer was made by two companies of the Azurix group of companies established for this specific purpose: Azurix AGOSBA S.R.L. ("AAS") and Operadora de Buenos Aires S.R.L. ("OBA"). AAS and OBA are indirect subsidiary companies of Azurix. AAS is registered in Argentina and is 0.1% owned by Azurix and 99.9% owned by Azurix Argentina Holdings Inc. (a company incorporated in Delaware), which in turn is 100% owned by Azurix. OBA, also registered in Argentina, is 100% owned by Azurix Agosba Holdings Limited which is registered in the Cayman Islands. Azurix owns 100% of the shares in Azurix Agosba Holdings Limited.

41. Having successfully won their bid, AAS and OBA incorporated Azurix Buenos Aires S.A. ("ABA") in Argentina to act as concessionaire. On June 30, 1999, ABA (also referred to as "the Concessionaire") made a "canon payment" of 438,555,554 Argentine pesos ("the Canon") to the Province. On payment of the canon, ABA, AGOSBA and the Province executed a concession agreement ("the Concession Agreement") which granted ABA a 30-year concession for the distribution of potable water, and the treatment and disposal of sewerage in the Province ("the Concession"). Handover of the service took place on July 1, 1999.

42. Azurix declared to know and accepted the bidding conditions and committed itself to undertake all measures necessary to ensure that OBA would fulfill the obligations set forth in the bidding conditions and the Concession Agreement as operator of the Concession during the first 12 years of operation. Similarly, Azurix accepted to be jointly responsible for the obligations of AAS and that during the first six years of the Concession there would be no change in the control of AAS.

43. The Claimant contends that its investment in Argentina has been expropriated by measures of the Respondent tantamount to expropriation and that the Respondent has, in addition, violated its obligations, under the BIT, of fair and equitable treatment, non-discrimination and full protection and security; that such measures are actions or omissions of the Province or its instrumentalities that resulted in the non application of the tariff regime of the Concession for political reasons; that the Province did not complete certain works that were to remedy historical problems and were to be transferred to the Concessionaire upon completion; that the lack of support for the concession regime prevented ABA from obtaining financing for its Five Year Plan; that in 2001, the Province denied that the canon was recoverable through tariffs; and that “political concerns were always privileged over the financial integrity of the Concession”,<sup>1</sup> and “[w]ith no hope of recovering its investments in the politicized regulatory scheme, ABA gave notice of termination of the Concession and was forced to file for bankruptcy”.<sup>2</sup>

44. The Respondent has disputed the allegations of the Claimant. For the Respondent, the dispute is a contractual dispute and the difficulties encountered by the Concessionaire in the Province were of its own making. In particular, the Respondent has argued that the case presented by the Claimant is intimately linked to Enron’s business practices and its bankruptcy; that the price paid for the Concession was excessive and opportunistic and related to the forthcoming IPO of Azurix at the time Azurix bid for the Concession through AAS and OBA and that the Concessionaire did not comply with the Concession Agreement, in particular its investment obligations, and the actions of the Province, including the termination of the Concession Agreement by the Province, were justified.

45. Before proceeding to examine the facts and the parties’ allegations, the Tribunal will make the following preliminary observations concerning the responsibility of the Respondent for actions or omissions of the Province, the scope of the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, the Claimant’s ENRON relationship, allegations of corruption, Argentina’s economic crisis and the law applicable to the merits of the dispute.

IV. Preliminary Observations

1. Responsibility of the Respondent for Actions and Omissions of the Province

(a) Positions of the Parties

46. The Claimant alleges that Argentina is responsible for the actions of the Province under the BIT and customary international law. Indeed, the definition of investment covers investments made in the territories of the parties to the BIT, and the BIT in its preamble refers to the territory of each of the parties in reference to its reach. Furthermore, Article XIII makes the BIT explicitly applicable to the political subdivisions of the parties. The Claimant also refers to the responsibility of the State for acts of its organs under customary international law and cites, as best evidence, Articles 4 and 7 of the Draft Articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts of the International Law Commission (“ILC”) (“Draft Articles”).

47. The Claimant also notes the decision on the merits in Compañía de Aguas del Aconquija S.A. and Vivendi Universal v. Argentine Republic (“Vivendi”) where the tribunal stated that: “It is well established that actions of a political subdivision of [a] federal state, such as the Province of Tucumán in the federal state of the Argentine Republic, are attributable to the central government.”<sup>3</sup> The Annulment Committee confirmed that statement: “in the case of a claim based on a treaty, international rules of attribution apply, with the result that the state of Argentina is internationally responsible for the acts of its provincial authorities.”<sup>4</sup>

48. The Respondent has not disputed that the BIT applies to the Province or the responsibility of the central State for acts of provincial authorities under customary international law. The Respondent has based its counter-argument on the fact that the Claimant’s allegations are in all instances based on breaches of obligations contractually assumed by the Province. Hence, according to the Respondent, the Tribunal does not need to reach the stage of whether the BIT imposes absolute responsibility on the central government for actions of a political subdivision because the Claimant has failed to allege facts that are attributable to the Argentine Republic under the BIT.

49. The Respondent considers that the Claimant takes for granted the highly debatable proposition that contractual breaches result in a violation of the BIT. The Respondent then refers, among others, to statements in the Annulment Decision in Vivendi II to the effect that: “As to the relation between breach of contract and breach of treaty in the present case, it must be stressed that Articles 3 and 5 of the BIT do not relate directly to breach of a municipal contract. Rather they set an independent standard”, and “A state may breach a treaty without breaching a contract, and vice versa, and this is certainly true of these provisions of the BIT... It may be that “mere” breaches of contract, unaccompanied by bad faith or other aggravating circumstances, will rarely amount to a breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard ...” From these statements, the Respondent concludes that “a claimant in similar cases may not invoke as events or facts giving rise to international responsibility the same facts that constitute a breach of contract ... international rules are ‘independent rules’. Therefore, a State’s international responsibility may not be asserted by disguising mere contractual breaches.” The Respondent concludes by recalling that to address the conflicts of a contractual nature raised by the Claimant, both ABA and Azurix have waived their right to submit them to any other jurisdiction other than the administrative courts of the city of La Plata.<sup>5</sup>

50. The responsibility of States for acts of its organs and political subdivisions is well accepted under international law. The Draft Articles, as pointed out by the Claimant, are the best evidence of such acceptance and as such have been often referred to by international arbitral tribunals in investor-State arbitration. Moreover, Article XIII of the BIT states clearly: “This Treaty shall apply to the political subdivisions of the Parties.” This is not in dispute between the parties. The issue is whether the acts upon which Azurix has based its claim can be attributed to the Respondent. The Respondent contends that such attribution is not feasible because all the acts are contractual breaches by the Province. This is a different matter to which the Tribunal will now turn.

2. Scope of the Jurisdiction of the Tribunal

51. The Tribunal recalls that its decision on jurisdiction is based on the finding that the Claimant had shown a prima facie claim against the Respondent for breach of obligations owed by Argentina to the Claimant under the BIT. In that decision, the Tribunal noted that:

“The investment dispute which the Claimant has put before this Tribunal invokes obligations owed by the Respondent to Claimant under the BIT and it is based on a different cause of action from a claim under the Contract Documents. Even if the dispute as presented by the Claimant may involve the interpretation or analysis of facts related to performance under the Concession Agreement, the Tribunal considers that, to the extent that such issues are relevant to a breach of the obligations of the Respondent under the BIT, they cannot per se transform the dispute under the BIT into a contractual dispute”.<sup>6</sup>

52. The Tribunal also recalls that Azurix and the Respondent have no contractual relationship. The Concession Agreement is a contract between the Province and ABA, and Azurix made certain commitments and undertook certain guarantees to the Province at the time of the bidding for and signature of the Concession Agreement. None of the allegations made by the Claimant refer to breaches of the Province in relation to Azurix itself. The obligations undertaken by the Province in the Concession Agreement were undertaken in favor of ABA not Azurix. As the Respondent itself has asserted, Argentina is not party to the Concession Agreement, and ABA is not party to these proceedings. Therefore, the underlying premise of Article II(2c) of the BIT – that a party to the BIT has entered into an obligation with regard to an investment – is in-existent. Neither the Respondent nor the Province, as a political subdivision of the Respondent, has entered into a contractual relationship with Azurix itself.

53. The Tribunal, in evaluating the facts and the allegations of the parties, is mindful that its task is to determine whether the alleged actions or omissions of the Respondent and the Province, as its political subdivision, amount to a breach of the BIT itself. For this purpose, and since the allegations of the Claimant are based on disputes related to the Concession Agreement, the Tribunal will need to determine the extent to which the Province was acting in the exercise of its sovereign authority, as a political subdivision of the Respondent, or as a party to a contract. As stated by the tribunal in the case of Consortium FRCC c. Royaume du Maroc, a State may perform a contract badly, but this will not result in a breach of treaty provisions, “unless it be proved that the state or its emanation has gone beyond its role as a mere party to the contract, and has exercised the specific functions of a sovereign.”<sup>7</sup> It should be noted, however, that this was not just any contract as between two private parties. It was a Concession Agreement embodying the tariff regime of the Concession and the actions taken by the Province were taken in its capacity as a public authority and by issuing resolutions through its regulator and decrees, actions which can hardly be treated as those of “a mere party to the contract.”

54. As noted earlier, Argentina has questioned the ability of a claimant to invoke as events or facts giving rise to international responsibility the same facts that constitute a breach of contract. The Tribunal has no doubt that the same events may give rise to claims under a contract or a treaty, “even if these two claims would coincide they would remain analytically distinct, and necessarily require different enquiries.”<sup>8</sup> To evoke the language of the Annulment Committee in Vivendi II, the Tribunal is faced with a claim that it is not “simply reducible to so many civil or administrative law claims concerning so many individual acts alleged to violate the Concession Contract or the administrative law of Argentina”, but with a claim that “these acts taken together, or some of them, amounted to a breach” of the BIT.<sup>9</sup> This is the nature of the claim in respect of which the Tribunal held that it had jurisdiction and which the Tribunal is obliged to consider and decide.

3. The ENRON relationship

55. Argentina has placed substantial emphasis on the fact that Azurix was a subsidiary of ENRON and has alleged that Azurix followed the aggressive and dubious practices of ENRON in its bidding for and subsequent operation of the Concession. For purposes of the dispute before this Tribunal and based on the documentation submitted by the parties, the Tribunal considers that nothing has been proven that relates the case before this Tribunal to ENRON's case. The proven facts are that ENRON was invited by the Province to bid for the Concession and ENRON declined in 2001 to guarantee a loan of Banco de la Nación Argentina to ABA under the program of the National Sanitation Works Agency ("ENOHSA") financed by the Inter-American Development Bank ("IDB").

4. Corruption

56. In 2002, at the time Argentina was preparing the Rejoinder on jurisdiction, it realized that Section 12.1.1 of the Concession Agreement was added after the award of the Concession. ABA's exemption of fines during the first six months of the Concession for failure to meet the Concession's performance standards was also added after the award of the Concession. The Tribunal was informed by Argentina that an investigation of this matter had been initiated by the office of the Procurador del Tesoro. During the hearing on the merits, and as a reaction to insinuations of corruption during the examination by Argentina of a witness presented by Argentina, counsel for the Claimant asked the witness whether to his knowledge there had been any corruption in connection with the award of the Concession. The witness replied that he was not aware of any improper conduct, and the Procurador General present at the hearing confirmed that the investigation was continuing but that no evidence of improper conduct had surfaced. No further information has been transmitted to the Tribunal.

5. Argentina's Economic Crisis

57. Argentina has pleaded that the institutional, social and economic crisis that it endured in the period 1998-2002 was the worst in its history.<sup>10</sup> On the other hand, the Claimant has alleged that the Respondent deliberately confuses the economic recession starting in 1998 with the economic and political crisis that began in 2001. According to the Claimant, the recession and economic crisis took place after termination of the Concession Agreement, are irrelevant for the purposes of this arbitration and cannot justify the Province's breaches of the Concession Agreement. The Claimant further observes that Argentina does not claim any justification based on the recession and only notes it as a background fact.<sup>11</sup> The Tribunal notes that the parties have not argued that the actions of the Province, ABA or Azurix had been influenced by the economic crisis. The crisis may provide context to the dispute, but none of the parties has pleaded that the economic crisis was the cause of the actions taken by the Province, ABA or Azurix.

V. Applicable law

1. Positions of the parties

58. The Claimant has argued that Article 42 of the Convention, in its first sentence, directs the Tribunal to look first to the rules of law agreed by the parties. Since the parties have not agreed to the governing law, the Tribunal should apply the BIT as lex specialis between the parties, and international law. The BIT expressly requires Argentina to comply with international law, and the BIT and international law have been incorporated by Argentina in its domestic law.<sup>12</sup>

59. The Claimant refers, among others, to Professor Weil's opinion that: "the existence of a Bilateral Investment Treaty raises the question of compliance with the rights and obligations contained therein to the level of a matter under international law, with respect not only to relations between the States party to the treaty but also to relations between the host State and the investor." According to the Claimant, the BIT requires “the Argentine Republic to afford U.S. investors like Azurix treatment no less favorable than that required by international law, both with respect to investment generally, and in particular with respect to expropriations or measures tantamount to expropriation of an investment.”

60. The Claimant also relies on the statement of the Annulment Committee in Vivendi II on the law applicable to the determination of whether a breach of the BIT has occurred, “In such a case, the inquiry which the ICSID tribunal is required to undertake is one governed by the ICSID Convention, by the BIT and by applicable international law. Such an inquiry is neither in principle determined, nor precluded, by any issue of municipal law, including any municipal law agreement of the parties.”<sup>13</sup>

61. The Claimant adds that international law also applies under the second sentence of Article 42(1) of the Convention. The Claimant relies here again on the authority of Professor Weil,

“no matter how domestic and international law are combined, under the second sentence of Article 42(1), international law always gains the upper hand and ultimately prevails. It prevails indirectly through the application of domestic law where the latter is deemed consistent with international law or incorporates it. It prevails directly where domestic law is deemed deficient or contrary to international law. Thus, under the second sentence of Article 42(1), international law has the last word in all circumstances: international law is fully applicable and to classify its role as ‘only’ ‘supplemental and corrective’ seems a distinction without a difference.”<sup>14</sup>

62. The Respondent draws a different conclusion from the fact that the parties have not agreed on the applicable law. In such a case, the Tribunal shall apply “the law of the Contracting State party to the dispute, including its rules on the conflicts of laws, and such rules of international law as may be applicable.” (Article 42(1) of the Convention). In accordance with this article, the dispute is basically governed by Argentine law, which is also applicable to contractual matters and provincial administrative law underlying the claim. However, the Respondent admits that the BIT is “the point of reference for establishing the merits of the Argentine Republic’s obligations in connection with Azurix’s investment. Non-contractual international law is relevant to the extent that the Treaty refers to it, or to the extent relevant to interpretation of the contract, or to the extent included in Argentine law.”<sup>15</sup>

63. In its Reply, the Claimant concurs in that the BIT is the point of reference to judge the merits and reaffirms that the BIT is the lex specialis between the parties. The Claimant is unsure about the meaning of “non-contractual international law” and affirms that all relevant international law may be applicable. The Claimant adds that customary international law provides a floor or minimum standard of treatment for foreign investment while the terms of the BIT may provide a higher standard.<sup>16</sup>

64. In its Rejoinder, the Respondent reaffirms its considerations in the Counter-Memorial whereby, pursuant to Article 42 of the Convention, “the dispute is basically governed by Argentine law which is also applicable to contractual matters and by the provincial administrative law underlying Azurix’s claim.”<sup>17</sup>

2. Considerations of the Tribunal

65. The Tribunal notes first the agreement of the parties with the statement that the BIT is the point of reference for judging the merits of Azurix’s claim. The Tribunal further notes that, according to the Argentine Constitution, the Constitution and treaties entered into with other States are the supreme law of the nation, and treaties have primacy over domestic laws.<sup>18</sup>

66. Article 42(1) has been the subject of controversy on the respective roles of municipal law and international law. It is clear from the second sentence of Article 42(1) that both legal orders have a role to play, which role will depend on the nature of the dispute and may vary depending on which element of the dispute is considered. The Annulment Committee in Wena v. Egypt considered that “The law of the host State can indeed be applied in conjunction with international law if this is justified. So too

67. Azurix’s claim has been advanced under the BIT and, as stated by the Annulment Committee in Vivendi II, the Tribunal’s inquiry is governed by the ICSID Convention, by the BIT and by applicable international law. While the Tribunal’s inquiry will be guided by this statement, this does not mean that the law of Argentina should be disregarded. On the contrary, the law of Argentina should be helpful in the carrying out of the Tribunal’s inquiry into the alleged breaches of the Concession Agreement to which Argentina’s law applies, but it is only an element of the inquiry because of the treaty nature of the claims under consideration.

68. Before the Tribunal considers the meaning of each of the standards allegedly breached by the Respondent, and because this discussion is closely related to the conflicting views of the parties on the facts of the dispute and their implications, the Tribunal will now consider at length the facts and then each of the standards of treatment of the BIT supposedly breached by the Respondent. In considering the allegations of the parties under each of the factual situations, the Tribunal will assess to which extent the established facts evidence actions on the part of the Province in the exercise of its public authority or as a party to a contract. The Tribunal will follow the order in which the facts have been presented in the memorials taking into account the witness statements, the documentation submitted, expert opinions and the written and oral arguments made by the parties.

VI. The Facts

1. The Takeover of the Concession

(a) Positions of the Parties

69. The Claimant has alleged that on the day of the transfer of the Concession, July 1, 1999, no representatives of the Province or AGOSBA were present to ensure an orderly and safe transfer. According to the Claimant, critical documents were burnt in the facility located at the Plaza San Martín, and in nearly all branches tools and equipment to operate the Concession were missing. The Claimant alleges also to have found certain anomalies in the customer database, – i.e. the archives of large account customers were missing and so were the methodology for calculating VAT amounts, interest calculation, whether or not a property was a vacant lot, the due date of installments, etc. According to the Claimant, ABA communicated the specific deficiencies of the database to the MOSP and ORAB in October 1999 after it received an inadequate response from AGOSBA, and did not receive an “effective response” from either.<sup>20</sup>

70. The Respondent has pointed out that Claimant alleged no difficulties at the takeover of the Concession in the request for arbitration, in the grounds for the termination of the Concession Agreement adduced by the Claimant or in the discussions on the Memorandum of Understanding (MOU). According to the Respondent, the execution of the Concession Agreement took place in the presence of all the relevant provincial authorities, the Concession area is very large and it was not possible for officials to be present physically at all locations, and the Bidding Conditions provided a remedy in Article 15.1.3 for such a situation. ABA never notified the Province of any conflict or negligence by the Province in connection with the takeover.

71. The Respondent affirms that all necessary information was made available to the bidders as part of the privatization related documentation and drawings and maps were made available to ABA on July 2, 1999 and that, in accordance with Section 2.4 of the Terms of Reference, Azurix acknowledged full access to all information and waived any claim to insufficient or non-delivery of information. The Respondent also points out that no claim was ever made in connection with defective equipment or tools and considers that the allegations of the Claimant in respect of the database are inadmissible. The Respondent refers in this respect to a communication of ABA to AGOSBA in terms that show deference and gratitude rather than offense for lack of cooperation. According to the Respondent, the database may have contained errors and defects but they were known to all bidders. The Respondent concludes by affirming that the takeover took place in a “context of mutual cooperation.”<sup>21</sup>

72. In its Reply, the Claimant alleges that the Respondent relies on formalisms. It disputes the meaning given by the Respondent to Article 15.1.1, since this section could only be invoked if the ‘legal’ transfer was not made. Equally, the Claimant considers misplaced the reference to Section 2.4, since this Section presumes good faith in the Province’s discharge of its duties and cannot be invoked when insufficient information was not received because of obstruction and sabotage by provincial employees.<sup>22</sup> The Claimant contests the affirmation that no complaints were ever made. In fact, numerous complaints were filed with the Privatization Commission, the ORAB, the Provincial Governor and Argentine federal officials.<sup>23</sup>

73. The Claimant admits in its Reply that 12,700 maps were received on July 2, 1999, but that they were in total disarray and ABA had to engage the services of Halcrow to digitalize and organize the documentation. The maps were old, outdated and failed to describe the current state of the Concession. In contrast, ABA’s employees were approached by former AGOSBA staff to offer them digitalized updated maps of the Concession, that, according to them, could substantially reduce the number of network expansions required under the Concession Agreement.<sup>24</sup>

74. The Respondent in the Rejoinder reaffirms its understanding of Article 15.1.3 of the Bidding Conditions and disputes that it only applies to the “legal” transfer. The takeover was a defined term in the Concession Agreement: “The act whereby the Concessionaire assumes the provision of service according to Chapter 15.”<sup>25</sup> The Respondent confirms that all documentation, including blueprints, maps and the users’ database, was provided to the Concessionaire. ABA had the obligation under the Concession Agreement to digitalize the maps, and, if the Concessionaire employed Halcrow for this purpose, it was to fulfill an obligation not because the Province did not comply with providing the pertinent information.<sup>26</sup> The Respondent finds that none of the evidence provided by the Claimant shows that ABA voiced any complaints during the six-month period following the takeover. ABA did not even mention it at the time of submitting its First Five-Year Plan proposal.<sup>27</sup>

75. The Respondent concludes by alleging that the evidence shows that the conflict identified as “takeover” was created by Azurix for these proceedings and that ABA and Azurix raised concerns about facts related to the takeover before provincial and federal authorities when their officers were warned about possible international arbitration proceedings.<sup>28</sup>

76. The Tribunal considers that the Claimant has failed to prove that the irregularities that may have occurred had the serious consequences that the Claimant has alleged and that can be attributable to the Province. The item with most serious implications would seem to be the destruction and removal of documentation, in particular of Concession’s maps. As admitted in the Reply, these maps were supplied by AGOSBA to ABA and ABA had the obligation to digitalize them. It would appear that the maps that the former employees had digitalized were more current than those furnished to ABA by the Province but no evidence has been furnished to the Tribunal showing that the alleged up to date maps offered by former employees of AGOSBA had been updated while in the service of AGOSBA and removed before the handover of the Concession, or that they were ever in the possession or control of the Province.

2. Measures related to the tariff regime

77. The measures under this heading include the elimination of zoning coefficients, the valuation applicable to non-metered customers whose property had undergone construction changes, the so-called Valuations 2000, and the RPI. The Tribunal will consider them in that order.

(a) Zoning Coefficients

78. On April 9, 1999, the Privatization Commission issued Information Communiqué No.12 on zoning coefficients. This communiqué attached a list of coefficients that “will apply for the correction of fiscal valuation of property and allow for determining the billing ranges as per Sanitary Rates in each district to which AGOSBA provides services according to provisions of Act 10.474 Section 7”. The communiqué added: “Please note that the tariff scheme that shall apply to the Concession shall be the one contained in Annex Ñ, which does not contemplate any zoning coefficients.”

79. The Privatization Commission was asked the following question on Communiqué No. 12:

“Question No. 160: Annex Ñ Concession Contract. The information communiqué No. 12 leaves evidence that the tariff system, which will rule the concession, will be the one included in Annex Ñ, which does not contemplate zoning coefficients. Is it correct to assume that the new billing could surpass the one determined in the last billing previous to the taking over due to the fact that it was affected by such adjustment?”

80. On April 23, 1999, the Privatization Commission replied:

“It is clarified that as regards the tariff system, it is governed by what is established in Annex Ñ of the Concession Agreement and the tariffs set not only for metered system but also for the non-metered system in Section 4 of the aforesaid Annex should be especially taken into account.”

81. The Claimant concludes from this exchange that it was reaffirmed that Annex Ñ would govern the application of the non-metered tariff regime and that water bills would be increased for those persons who previously benefited from zoning coefficients.<sup>29</sup>

82. According to Circular 59(A) of June 25, 1999, AGOSBA issued the first billing cycle after the transfer of the Concession so that the new Concessionaire would have sufficient time to prepare. When ABA sent the bills for its first billing cycle (the second billing cycle after the transfer) without applying the zoning coefficients, consumers reacted badly to the resulting price increase. This event happened during the presidential campaign in which the governor of the Province, Mr. Duhalde, was running for president of the country.

83. On August 4, 1999, the ORAB issued Resolution 1/99. According to this resolution, ABA was precluded from billing amounts in excess of those amounts billed by AGOSBA for non-metered service prior to the granting of the Concession, and it ordered ABA to credit those amounts that exceeded AGOSBA's final billing for non-metered service during the month of August. ORAB based Resolution 1/99 on Article 4a-1 of Title II of Annex Ñ which states: "The tariff that results due to the application of the scale shall not exceed the one determined by the final billing prior to the Taking of Possession, for the same real estate, i.e., provided no building developments have been recorded."

84. ABA appealed administratively Resolution 1/99. ABA argued that Resolution 1/99 equated the terms tariff and bill, that a bill increase is not necessarily a tariff increase, that it did not change the tariff; and that it had simply eliminated the zone coefficient and, while the bills were higher, the tariff remain unchanged. The ORAB rejected the appeal by Resolution 2/00 of January 19/00 and dismissed ABA's interpretation of Annex Ñ as inconsistent with the regulatory framework promulgated by the Law.

85. The Claimant alleges that the action taken by the ORAB was politically motivated under pressure of the Government of the Province which was concerned that higher water bills would damage the chances of Mr. Duhalde in the presidential race. According to the Claimant, the press reported statements by the Minister of Public Works (MOSP) to the effect that the bills issued by ABA were incorrect and that consumers should not pay them until the issue was clarified (testimony of Mr. Castillo quoted in the Memorial p. 33). The Claimant further alleges that the Minister of MOSP

“wanted to ease and postpone the solution in any way” till after the presidential election.<sup>30</sup>

86. The Claimant maintains that the action taken by ABA was correct and permitted under the Concession Agreement. The Claimant bases its position on the interpretation provided by Circular 27(A) and on the different meanings of the terms bill and tariff. Tariff is “a public document that includes a description of the company services, rates and charges, as well as the governing rules, regulation and practice in relation to those services”.<sup>31</sup> It is inappropriate to use tariff as a synonym of rates or prices, “the tariff is nothing else that a list of prices or rates”.<sup>32</sup> According to the Claimant, the ORAB contravened the Law by not providing a well-founded decision in dismissing the appeal of ABA as required by Chapter III, article 13-II of the Law.

87. The Respondent argues that the position of the Claimant has no basis on the Contract or on the Communiqué or the Circular. The Respondent first recalls that the non-metered system was a temporary system that should have been replaced 100% by a metered system by year five of the Concession, and that the Communiqué is not part of the contractual documentation of the Concession. In rejecting the understanding by the Claimant of the Communiqué and the Circular, the Respondent explains that, according to article 4 of Annex Ñ, the Concessionaire needed to follow two criteria for billing purposes: first, the bill should be the result of multiplying the presumed consumption by the price per cubic meter established on the basis of the valuation of the building concerned, and second, the resulting bill should not exceed that of the last bill prior to the takeover of the Concession. Thus, if the bill resulting from applying the values in the table included in article 4 exceeded the bill before the takeover, then the consumer should be charged only what had been charged then. The exceptions were only for new customers that, by definition, would not have received a bill prior to the Concession takeover, and in the case of construction variations which would affect the fiscal valuation of the building.

88. The Respondent expresses its inability to understand how the Claimant can rely on the distinction between tariffs and rates to justify its position. The Respondent agrees with the definition of tariffs and rates provided by the Claimant and affirms that the Province never maintained that these concepts were the same or were used indistinctly.<sup>33</sup> The Respondent cannot follow how a bill for a building for a non-metered service may be increased without at the same time increasing the tariffs.<sup>34</sup>

89. The Respondent considers that it was always clear that Annex Ñ did not contemplate zoning coefficients and the clarification in Communiqué No.12 would have been unnecessary. This does not mean that bills for the first month of the Concession could be increased; the function of article 4 (a-1) was to avoid this effect.<sup>35</sup> Equally irrelevant, for purposes of the Claimant's interpretation, is Circular 27(A). This circular replied to the question by simply referring to the provisions of Annex Ñ, in particular what is provided in article 4.<sup>36</sup> According to the Respondent, once the appeal of Resolution 1/99 was rejected, the decision of the ORAB became administratively firm and unassailable under the administrative law of the Province.<sup>37</sup>

90. Both parties agree that zoning coefficients are not included in Annex Ñ. They also agree on the meaning of the terms tariff, bills and rates. Communiqué No.12 was issued by the Privatization Commission at its own initiative, so it may have considered it necessary to point out that Annex Ñ did not include zoning coefficients. When applied to a bill, coefficients had the effect of reducing it. Hence the follow up question to the Privatization Commission - question No. 160 - specifically asking whether "Is it correct to assume that the new billing could surpass the one determined in the last billing previous to the taking over due to the fact that it was affected by such adjustment?" The Commission replied – item No. 20 of Circular 27(A) - by referring generally to the tariff regime in Annex Ñ and stating that "the tariffs set not only for the metered system but also for the non-metered system in Section 4 of the aforesaid Annex should be especially taken into account”.

91. This statement evaded the answer to the question asked and left ample room for misunderstanding. The interpretation of paragraph 4(a) by the Claimant is based on the difference between tariffs and bills which is reflected in the terminology of the Concession Agreement. In the key subparagraph of article 4, we read: “the resulting tariff from the application of said scale shall not exceed that determined in the last billing...” The paragraph clearly refers to tariffs and billing as two different matters, what should not be exceeded is the tariff applied in the last billing, not the billing itself. This being the case, the reading by the Claimant of the Concession Agreement and of the information provided by the Privatization Commission would seem reasonable. Indeed, if there is a subsidy resulting from the application of a zoning coefficient and such subsidy ceases to be applicable, the bill will necessarily be higher without any increase in the underlying tariff. To interpret the Contract otherwise, it is to admit that the Information Communiqué No. 12 was openly misleading and Circular 27(a), at best, evasive.

92. To conclude, the ORAB provided an interpretation of the Concession Agreement not in accordance with the concepts of tariff, rates and bills underlying it and with the information provided the bidders at the time they prepared the tenders. The decision of ORAB seems to reflect a concern with the political consequences of the elimination of the coefficients rather than with keeping to the terms of the Concession Agreement.

(i) Factual background

93. The Concession Agreement permitted the Concessionaire to re-categorize non-metered customers whose fiscal valuation had changed because of construction improvements. On February 17, 1999, March 8, 1999 and March 24, 1999, the Claimant requested the Privatization Commission for the updated records of property valuations of the Dirección Provincial de Catastro Territorial (DPCT). On May 5, 1999, the Commission issued Circular 44(A) stating that the records had not been updated since 1994 except for individual updates “which occurred on a daily basis by customers visiting local branch offices.”<sup>38</sup> Allegedly the Claimant continued to press for the records<sup>39</sup> and on June 23, 1999, the Commission issued Circular 58(A) with a CD containing the valuations of the DPCT.

94. Based on this information, ABA identified about 60,000 non-metered customers whose properties reflected a valuation increase. In January 2000, ABA informed the ORAB that it would re-categorize these customers into a higher tariff scale. On February 8, 2000, the ORAB issued Resolution 7/00 ordering ABA to abstain from re-categorizing these customers until the ORAB would have verified the valuation changes with DPTC. After three weeks, ABA appealed Resolution 7/00.

95. On March 17, 2000, the ORAB, by Resolution 15/00, authorized retroactive increases for construction variations of lands that were paying for the water service as uncultivated land and appeared as built lots in the CD attached to Circular 58(A). In these cases, it was evident that the different valuation was due to construction.

96. On June 26, 2000, the ORAB issued Resolution 54/00 rejecting the appeal of ABA. Resolution 54/00 recalled that, in the presentation made by ABA, it was not evident that the changes in fiscal valuation were due to construction variations and, therefore, the ORAB considered it necessary to conduct a study to determine the rationale of the variations. Resolution 54/00 affirmed that Resolution 7/00 only requested the Concessionaire to abstain from re-categorizing the properties and did not alter the procedure established in the Concession Agreement for the application of the valuations furnished by the Cadastre.<sup>40</sup>

97. The study conducted by the ORAB revealed that 76% of the variations presented by the Concessionaire were due to construction on the properties concerned.<sup>41</sup> On November 22, 2001, after ABA had terminated the Concession, the ORAB issued Resolution 62/01 authorizing the re-categorization of those properties subject to the approval of a business plan to mitigate the impact on users. ABA

presented the business plan on December 11, 2001. The ORAB requested further information on the plan on December 28, 2001. ABA responded on January 29, 2002. According to the Respondent, the relationship of ABA with the Province and the ORAB and the delivery of the service had deteriorated to such an extent that the ORAB requested the MOSP Undersecretary to include this matter among those to discuss between the Province and ABA.<sup>42</sup> Thereafter, the MOSP Undersecretary advised ABA by letter not to proceed with the re-categorization. According to Azurix and based on press reports, the re-categorization took place once the Concession was transferred to Aguas Bonaerenses.

98. The facts as described have not been contested by the parties.

99. Resolution 7/00 did not refer to the reasons why the ORAB considered it necessary to verify the variations with DPCT. The Resolution ordered ABA to refrain from re-categorization until the ORAB had determined whether the variations were actually construction variations. The ORAB acted on the basis of an internal report of February 8, 2003 that alerted it to the fact that the CD attached to Circular 58(A) did not distinguish between variations in fiscal valuations for construction or other reasons. This simple factual information was not referred to in Resolution 7/00.

100. Construction variations had been the subject of several questions during the bidding process so a clear understanding of what the term meant seems to have been important from the bidders' point of view. According to Annex Ñ, the real estate fiscal valuations to be applied were those furnished by the DPTC. When the information was furnished to the bidders with Circular 58(A), this Circular did not refer to variations in fiscal value. When ABA identified the variations, it had no way to know whether they were caused by construction activity or other reasons. When the ORAB became aware of the issue, it would have seemed appropriate to base its reasoning on this fact, rather than to simply refer to the need to verify the valuation changes, which was understood as a delay tactic by the Concessionaire. The reason for the verification became only apparent when Resolution 15/00 was issued and the appeal was rejected.

101. The ORAB proceeded to identify the previously uncultivated lots with relative speed as compared with the time that it took to verify the other valuation changes. Resolution 15/00 was issued within 5 weeks of Resolution 7/00. On the other hand, Resolution 62/01 was issued more than 21 months after Resolution 7/00. Even if the tariff increases could be applied retroactively and the number of variations to be verified was large, this seems to have been an unduly protracted process. The delay also meant that the application of the new level of tariff would result in larger amounts to be paid retroactively with the consequent negative perception from the consumers' point of view. When the ORAB authorized the re-categorization, a plan to mitigate the impact was required from ABA and, even when such plan had been approved by the provincial authorities, the re-categorization by ABA was not authorized by MOSP.

102. To conclude, the bidders were not provided with accurate information on the variations, and the Province seems to have engaged in a protracted dilatory process; first in identifying the construction variations and then in delaying the re-categorization. As in the case of the zone coefficients, the concern was on the political effect rather than with applying the terms of the Concession Agreement.

103. The Concession Agreement specified that the 1958 valuations methodology or its equivalent be used to determine the appropriate tariff schedules for non-metered customers. The 1958 valuation was discontinued by the DPCT in early 2000 by law 12.397 of the Province.

(i) Positions of the Parties

104. The Claimant argues that the change in property valuation methodology caused a fundamental problem for ABA as it became impossible to apply accurately Valuations 2000 to the existing non-metered tariff scale.<sup>43</sup> The new methodology prevented the application of the tariff regime to new real estate created and to updated valuations for existing real estate that had experienced construction variances.<sup>44</sup> Since the Province did not provide an equivalent methodology, as required by the Concession

Agreement, ABA proceeded to prepare an equivalent methodology and presented it to the ORAB on November 22, 2000. According to the Claimant, the ORAB avoided responding on the equivalent methodology proposal notwithstanding persistent communications of ABA, and no determination was ever made by the ORAB.<sup>45</sup>

105. The Respondent argues that it was not the role of ABA to prepare equivalent valuations and that the Concession Agreement was clear that the equivalent valuations had to be determined by the DPCT. Furthermore, the change to Valuations 2000 would have a minimum impact on the Concessionaire since it would only affect construction variations in existing properties and new properties in the Concession area. In any case, the Concession Agreement provided the way to calculate the applicable tariffs when there was inadequate real estate valuation. According to the Respondent, the methodology proposed by ABA was a disguised effort to increase tariffs, a fact that is denied by the Claimant.

106. The Respondent points out that ABA in fact made a proposal to value ex officio properties which had no valuation on February 29, 2000. The DPCT informed ABA that it could not decide on this matter because the system in effect did not permit the establishment of a valuation mechanism such as proposed by ABA. However, the ORAB, by Resolution 45/00 of June 13, 2000, permitted ABA and AGBA to carry out ex officio valuations as proposed by ABA.<sup>46</sup>

(ii) Considerations by the Tribunal

107. The Province proceeded to change the valuation system in the first quarter of 2000, shortly after the Concession was awarded. The bidders were not informed of the upcoming change. When the change occurred no alternative methodology was provided. The complaint of Azurix seems to be more on the lack of a meaningful response by the Province than anything else. Even the arrangement proposed by ABA in February 2000 was put forward at its own initiative, although it was the Province's responsibility to provide alternative methodologies as explained by the Respondent. Irrespective of the merits of ABA's proposal and whether it meant a raise on applicable tariffs to the properties affected by the valuations, this tariff conflict could have been avoided by simply instructing the Concessionaire on what to do at the time the new law was issued and as part of its implementation. It seems that the administration of the Province was not very pro-active in search of solutions to a problem that the Province itself had created.

108. The Concession Agreement provides for extraordinary revisions of the tariffs on account of, inter alia, variations in cost indices. According to Article 12.3.5.1, the concept of such revisions is as follows: "These revisions shall be carried out where the Concessionaire or the Regulatory Entity alleges an increment or fall in the Concession cost indexes when its absolute value exceeds three per cent (3%), in accordance with the provisions set out in clause 12.3.5.2." Article 12.3.5.2 sets forth the formula for the calculation of the percentage cost index variation. For this purpose, the formula uses as a basis 50% of the change in the Consumer Price Index of the United States and 50% of the change in the Producer Price Index, Industrial Commodities, also of the United States.

109. ABA requested the commencement of the procedures for the tariff review foreseen in Article 12.3.5.3 of the Concession Agreement on December 20, 2000 based on a 6.659% increase in the RPI. On January 3, 2001, the ORAB regulatory department noted in a letter to the Board of the ORAB that ABA had met the formal regulatory requirements of said article and was authorized to seek an RPI review.<sup>47</sup> On January 30, 2001, Mr. Pievani, the head of the economic regulation area of the ORAB, sent a further report to the ORAB president confirming the 6.659% RPI increase but considering the request inadmissible based on consequences related to the provision of the service and to the users, in particular, he referred to the Bahía Blanca incident, which is considered later in this award. On February 8, 2001, the President of the ORAB notified the MOSP Undersecretary of ABA's request and recommended the denial of the tariff review. On February 27, 2001, the MOSP instructed the ORAB to solicit from ABA a detailed cost study justifying the impact of the variance of prices on ABA's cost structure, to conduct its own cost study and to condition the review and ultimate submission of the request to the Executive Branch on ABA's presentation of the cost study. On March 9, 2001, the ORAB notified ABA of the need to present a cost study.

110. ABA responded to the cost study request in a note to the ORAB, dated March 18, 2001, requesting ORAB to clarify the procedural or contractual framework on which ORAB based its request.<sup>48</sup> The ORAB reiterated the request for a cost study within five days on April 5, 2001. On April 16, 2001, ABA responded by explaining "the economic and financial principles behind the RPI adjustment as an integral element of price cap regulation and price controls, and the importance of the regulator's objectivity to insure the transparency of the regulatory process".<sup>49</sup> On May 14, 2001, ABA sent the ORAB a more comprehensive analysis of the economic and financial principles underlying inflationary adjustments and a discussion of the automatic and objective nature of the inflationary review process.<sup>50</sup>

111. On May 30, 2001, the ORAB sent a letter to the MOSP Undersecretary informing him of ABA's concerns with the handling of the RPI request by the Province and requesting the advice of the provincial Organismos de Asesoramiento y Control (Asesoría General de Gobierno, Contaduría General and Fiscalía de Estado). After these organs had expressed their opinion, the ORAB issued, on October 24, 2001 (after ABA had terminated the Concession Agreement) Resolution 53/01 whereby it summoned ABA "to furnish the ORAB with a study on costs that warrant the incidence of such indexes on tariffs in order to verify the admissibility of an extraordinary tariff revision" within ten days under the penalty of the tariff revision request be disallowed. Since ABA did not provide the cost study requested, the ORAB issued Resolution 23/02 on March 26, 2002 (after the Province had taken over the Concession) dismissing the request.

112. The controversy on the RPI is related to the extent that the review had an automatic character under the Concession Agreement. The Claimant argues that such review was automatic once the correctness of the elements underlying the percentage calculation had been verified, that this was an essential element of price-cap regulation and that there was no need to present a cost study. Such study was required only for the extraordinary tariff review foreseen elsewhere in the Concession Agreement. The Claimant notes that it was notified of the need of a cost study nearly three months after it filed its RPI request when in accordance to the contract the review of ORAB was to be completed within 30 days, and that the cost study was mandated by the MOSP Undersecretary but it did not figure in the ORAB's early evaluation of the review, nor in the separate report of Mr. Pievani. The Claimant alleges that the protracted process outlined by the Regulatory Group in the ORAB and the addition of a cost study were politically motivated and that there is no basis for them in the Concession Agreement. Furthermore, the public hearings do not have the role in the case of the RPI review attributed to them by the Respondent. Their objective is to provide transparency in the process of tariff reviews. According to the Claimant, the last paragraph of Article 12.3.5.3 proves that, once the revision is considered pertinent, the percentage of variation in the RPI had to be applied to the tariffs established in US dollars.

113. The Respondent has alleged that the procedure for the extraordinary tariffs reviews was common to all such reviews, and that there was no automatic raise of tariffs simply by the fact that a review had been triggered by a certain level of inflation. The steps required to be undertaken for such review were followed by the ORAB without the cooperation due by ABA to the regulatory organ of the Province and without any political motivation on the part of the Province which at all times followed the provisions of the Law and the Concession Agreement. The function of the public hearing goes beyond that attributed to it by the Claimant and it is the same for all tariff reviews. The ultimate decision to approve a tariff review request was the function of the provincial Governor.

114. As in the other controversies under the generic heading of tariff conflicts, the issues are based to a large extent on the interpretation of the Concession Agreement, in particular, Article 12. This Article has the following structure: General Principles (12.3.1), Procedure (12.3.2), Automatically Unacceptable Assumptions for Increases in the Tariffs and Prices (12.3.3), Ordinary Five-Year Reviews (12.3.4), Extraordinary Reviews based on Variations in the Indices of Costs (12.3.5), and General Extraordinary Reviews (12.3.6).

115. One of the general principles applicable to all revisions (“modificaciones”) is that revisions of the tariffs and prices can compensate only the costs arising from the delivery of the Service provided that there is compliance with the terms of the Agreement. The procedure to be followed is common for all revisions and includes, inter alia, the requirements that the revisions be based “on prior analyses and technical, economic, financial and legal reports, and on proof of the facts and actions that justify the revision”, and that there be an evaluation of the consequences that may result from the revision in respect of the delivery of the service and of the users. In addition, the proposed revisions shall be debated in a public hearing before the executive approves or rejects proposed revisions.

116. In the specific context of the revisions for reason of variations in the cost indices, Article 12.3.5.3 entitled “Verification of Revision Admissibility” provides that, once it is established that a variation is above the percentage set forth in Article 12.3.5.1, the procedure moves on to “the verification stage” where the ORAB is required to verify the existence of the elements that justify the revision in accordance with the general principles of Article 12.3.1 and the provisions of Article 12.3.5. Once the verification is completed, the ORAB shall determine whether the revision is justified and the modification to be introduced to the existing tariffs and prices. If the ORAB finds the revision justified, then a public hearing on the proposed revision should take place. The conclusions of the ORAB and the minutes of the hearing are sent to the executive which decides whether to agree to the revision or reject it.

117. It is evident from a reading of the contractual provisions that the Concession Agreement applies the same procedure to all reviews, therefore, a review for variations in cost indices is not more or less automatic than an ordinary five-year review. The elements that trigger the review are objective and whether a review should or should not take place could be seen as automatic once the correctness of the calculations have been verified, but this is the first step in the process. The ORAB then had to decide on the appropriateness of any revisions taking into account the general principles in Article 12.3.1, one of which is that modifications may only compensate for actual costs in the delivery of the service, and the consequences that the modification may have for service delivery and the users. The fact that the revision would be the subject of a public hearing and that the executive may or may not approve it show that a cost indices variation revision was not assured, under the terms of the Concession Agreement, to produce the result of simply transferring the variation in the costs indices to the tariffs and prices.

118. The parties have also argued whether the cost study requested from ABA by the ORAB was appropriate. The Claimant has placed special emphasis on the political motivation of the request since it was not in the original assessment of the ORAB. Given that under the terms of the Concession Agreement the ORAB was obliged to evaluate whether the modification based on variation in the cost indices was justified in terms of the general principle that modifications should reflect the costs of the service, the request would seem to be legitimate.

119. In interpreting the Concession Agreement and as affirmed by the parties and required by the Agreement itself, it is necessary to proceed with a harmonious reading of all the relevant provisions. While the last paragraph of Article 12 would seem to indicate that once the review is considered justified then the price index increase shall be applied to the tariffs retroactively as calculated, this provision cannot be read in such a manner as to contradict the general principle established in Article 12.3.1. The Tribunal is not convinced that the position taken by the Province would have changed the economic equilibrium of the Concession, as Azurix has claimed, as long as the principle to reflect actual cost variations due to inflation had been respected. In any case, this point is speculative since the review was never completed.

3. The Works in Circular 31(A)

120. The Privatization Commission issued Circular 31(A) on April 23, 1999 on the subject of works under execution. This circular lists works in progress for purposes of Article 15.3.1 of the Concession Agreement and explains that, once the works would have been completed, they would be transferred without charge to the Concessionaire. Each work is listed with the location, a brief description, the amount budgeted and the percentage of completion. It is disputed whether the works were ever completed. ABA either refused to accept them because it considered them defective, or accepted them provisionally, according to ABA, in order to prevent a collapse of the water supply system. We will consider each of these works in the sequence presented by the Claimant in its Memorial and the allegations made by the parties in their respect.

(a) Bahía Blanca: Algae Removal Works

121. The so-called “Algae removal works at the Paso de las Piedras Dam” in Circular 31(A) consisted of the construction of a micro-filtering plant, refurbishment of certain key aspects of the Patagonia WTP filters, the repair of the system that evenly distributes the incoming water between the two filtration modules at the Patagonia WTP (“the Equipartition system”), the modification of certain elements of the direct filtration system at the Patagonia WTP (“Direct Filtration”), and the construction of a chlorine dioxide dosing facility (“Chlorine Dioxide Dosing System”). The Province retained the responsibility for the operation of the Reservoir and supplying raw water to the Patagonia WTP.

(i) Positions of the Parties

122. In the Memorial, the Claimant alleges that the Algae Removal Works had serious defects in their design and construction. The Claimant gives as examples that the Micro-Filtration Plant as designed permitted raw untreated water to by-pass microfiltration, the Direct Filtration system was only partially completed and the items installed were never connected, the Equipartition System was only partially completed and did not allow even distribution of water to the filter modules, the Patagonia Filters were not completed, and the Chlorine Dioxide Dosing system was defective in its design and construction and posed operational safety hazards.

123. On August 24, 1999, explains the Claimant, ABA provided the ORAB with a list of necessary short-term corrective measures to be completed prior to ABA taking possession of the Algae Removal Works, including that the water level at the Reservoir was unusually low, the new Micro-Filtering Plant was overloaded, the sand filters at the Patagonia WTP were old and overloaded, and the repairs to the Equipartition system failed to evenly distribute water. ABA also proposed the creation of a technical committee for the operation of the dam and reservoir to define contingency plans for drought periods and determine minimum quality standards to be met by the raw water supplied by the Province.<sup>51</sup>

124. The Claimant alleges that the failure to complete the Algae Removal Works caused an extraordinary algae bloom in the reservoir on April 10-11, 2000 resulting in the water appearing cloudy and hazy and with earth-musty taste and odor. According to the Claimant, the complaints of the consumers were picked up by the press and politicians and it became a major media and political event. The Claimant contends that none of the factors that caused the algae bloom were subject to ABA's control nor could the algae bloom have been foreseen based on the information supplied by the Province. This notwithstanding, observes the Claimant, provincial officials issued statements that caused panic in the population and did not conform with the analyses of the provincial Central Laboratory of the Ministry of Health which had determined that, "although the Bahía Blanca network water is not drinkable from a physical/chemical standpoint, no microbial contamination that could cause infectious diseases was detected."<sup>52</sup>

125. The Claimant points out that, as reported in the press, the Governor invited the citizens not to pay the bills, and that the ORAB ordered ABA to discount the invoices from April 12 until the ORAB deemed the drinking water to meet quality standards. The Claimant alleges that the ORAB took this action bowing to political pressure even if the president of the ORAB had indicated to the press that there were no grounds for a penalty because the quality parameters were in accordance with the standards defined in the bidding terms and conditions.<sup>53</sup> On April 28, 2000, the ORAB, by Resolution 24/00, prevented ABA from invoicing any amounts until the service was normalized. The prohibition was lifted by Resolution 33/00, dated May 8, 2000. On May 18, 2000, at the request of MOSP, the Provincial Domestic Trade Bureau forbade ABA from invoicing and collecting for services until water quality was deemed acceptable to users.

126. The Claimant notes that this action was taken under the Consumer Defense Act which applies to situations not covered by a specific regulatory framework, and disputes the authority of the Provincial Domestic Trade Bureau to issue this measure because the ORAB had exclusive jurisdiction on billing matters. The Claimant also notes that the press reported that the governor was studying the means to remove the ORAB officials responsible for the decision to allow ABA to receive payments when the service was not in good condition and that a lawsuit was filed against these officials.<sup>54</sup> Under such pressure, ABA agreed with the ORAB to extend the service discount from May 5 to May 31, 2000 but stating that it did not accept responsibility for the water problems and reserved the right to seek reimbursement for its damages from the Province. On June 2000, the ORAB issued Resolution 43/00 ordering a 100% discount on invoices for services provided in Bahía Blanca and Punta Alta from April 12 through May 31, 2000.<sup>55</sup>

127. The Committee of Control for Privatized Public Services and Companies, and the Consumer and User Defense Committee of the Provincial Legislature held hearings on the algae incident. According to the Claimant, ABA, MOSP and the ORAB were summoned to appear before said committees. MOSP and the ORAB arranged for a separate meeting closed to the public. In that meeting, the MOSP Minister stated:

“We are aware that, in association with the ORAB, we have forced certain decisions that are of a political nature, particularly by requesting the ORAB to apply a resolution whereby the Concessionaire is to receive no payment for each day in which water supply quality is not as agreed; by doing so, we breached the concession agreement, and this was a political decision. We took a step further beyond the general meaning of the agreement itself.”<sup>56</sup>

According to the Claimant, the MOSP Minister also recognized that the problems that occurred had plid causes and the Mayor of Bahía Blanca attributed them to the lack of investments for many years.<sup>57</sup>

128. In the Counter-Memorial, the Respondent recalls that, according to Circular 31(A), 98% of the works had been completed. This percentage reflected the fact that the Micro-Screening Plant of the Paso de las Piedras dam had been refurbished and started up by June 23, 1998, and on December 9, 1998 eight additional filters were released for use.<sup>58</sup> The Respondent points out that Azurix was aware of the condition of the works at the time it submitted the bid for the Concession and ABA had taken over the operation of the service, including algae treatment.<sup>59</sup>

129. The Respondent explains that, under the Concession Agreement, the Concessionaire was responsible for carrying out all tasks to guarantee efficient provision to users, the protection of public health and the rational use of resources, and it was specifically responsible for the quality of unfiltered water and the quality and quantity of drinking water. The Respondent further notes that the Concessionaire was also responsible for the quality of unfiltered and drinking water taken from the Paso de las Piedras dam. The Respondent affirms, based on Article 1 of Exhibit O to the Concession Agreement, that “even when the Province was in charge of the operation and maintenance of the Dique Paso de las Piedras dam, the latter was explicitly exempted from any responsibility regarding the ‘quality and quantity of water delivered’ to the Concessionaire.”<sup>60</sup>

130. The Respondent affirms that ABA infringed the biological parameters for drinking water required in the Concession Agreement. The Respondent points out that the audit report ordered by the ORAB stated that all water coming from superficial sources is susceptible of being treated for human consumption and what varies is the intensity of the required treatment. The same report considered that the Concessionaire managed the crisis in an improvised and imprudent manner and the measures adopted by ABA were not technically suitable to remedy the problem and, hence, the ORAB imposed a fine for not non-compliance with its obligations under the Concession Agreement.<sup>61</sup>

131. The Respondent further notes that a crisis in the drinking water supply is a serious and alarming event for the community and, if the image of ABA deteriorated in the eyes of the users, it was because of the negligent manner in which ABA addressed the problem.<sup>62</sup>

132. In its Reply, Azurix alleges that the Province did not disclose to the bidders information in its possession related to the reservoir situation and points out that Argentina fails to recognize that the April 2000 algae bloom was an extraordinary occurrence that ABA could not predict or avoid on the basis of the information or assets under its management.<sup>63</sup>

133. Azurix contests Argentina's assertion that since the beginning ABA was in charge of algae treatment operations. Azurix recalls that the Algae Removal Works were the exclusive responsibility of the Province, and the works that concerned the Patagonia plant were never completed. Furthermore, ABA could not avoid operating this plant in its existing condition because of its critical importance. Azurix also explains in this context that it needed the ORAB's prior permission for any operation to be carried out in connection with the Algae Removal Works and to access the Micro Filtration Plant facilities. The Claimant notes that this plant was never transferred to ABA and ABA was involved in its operation during the algae crisis in order to take emergency measures.<sup>64</sup>

134. The Claimant disputes the interpretation of the Concession Agreement by the Province and argues that Article 3.6.1 only applied to raw water sources under ABA's management and considers it nonsensical the extension of ABA's obligation to sources exclusively controlled and operated by the Province. In fact, according to the

Claimant, none of the action that could have prevented the algae incident was under ABA's control: the Province had exclusive control of the dam and reservoir, could control agricultural run-off into the reservoir, fail to complete the Algae Removal Works and lowered the water level of the reservoir favoring algae blooms.<sup>65</sup>

135. The Claimant explains that the fine imposed by the ORAB on account of the algae incident was imposed after the service had been transferred to the Province more than two years after the algae bloom event and four days before the deadline for filing petitions in ABA's bankruptcy proceedings. The Claimant also points out that the fine was in excess of the amounts permitted under the Concession Agreement. Azurix contests the grounds on which the fine was imposed. Azurix argues that the guidelines values in Table IV of Annex C to the Concession Agreement are only reference values in line with the World Health Organization (WHO)'s recommendations and that the Respondent turns them in strict limits.<sup>66</sup>

136. The Claimant affirms that ABA took all measures required to remedy or mitigate the effects of the situation caused by the Province and that at no time was there any risk to public health, and observes that the Respondent relies exclusively on the audit report prepared by the ORAB to argue that ABA was negligent in dealing with the crisis. Azurix further observes that such report is not reliable given the lack of independence of the ORAB from the Province's political will.<sup>67</sup>

137. The Claimant contests the Respondent's assertion that ABA voluntarily gave a discount to customers and affirms that ABA was forced by the ORAB to apply such discount to the water bills.<sup>68</sup> Furthermore, it is unacceptable to Azurix that public statements by officials with a view "to inciting fear, uncertainty and even violence against ABA" be described by the Respondent as "the free exercise of a democratic society's rights."<sup>69</sup>

138. In the Rejoinder, Argentina reiterates in substance its previous arguments, mainly, that at the time of the bidding for the Concession the Algae Removal Works were 98% completed, that Azurix and ABA were aware of the condition of the works and submitted themselves to Section 2.4 of the Bidding Conditions,<sup>70</sup> that Azurix inspected the works before submitting its offer, that since the beginning of the Concession ABA was in practice responsible for the operation of the Service and the treatment of the algae, that the Concessionaire was responsible for the quantity and quality of raw water from the Paso de las Piedras dam even if the operation and maintenance was under the charge of the Province, that Table IV of Exhibit C to the Concession Agreement required that the drinking water had no phytoplankton and zooplankton, and that failure to meet these biological parameters meant that the ORAB was required to impose a fine.<sup>71</sup>

139. The Respondent alleges that the community unrest was not due to intervention of provincial officials, as claimed by Azurix, on the contrary, these officials were responding to the population concern over the foul smelling and tasting water. The Respondent argues that Azurix has admitted as much by recounting how the problem with the water smell and taste had “gradually attracted the attention of politicians and journalists and became an issue widely covered by the media.”<sup>72</sup>

140. The allegations of the parties relate to their understanding of the Concession Agreement, the causes of the algae incident and the reaction of the provincial authorities.

141. It is a matter of dispute between the parties whether the Concessionaire was responsible for the quantity and quality of the water from a source not under its management. The dispute relates to whether Article 3.6.1 of the Concession Agreement applies to the raw water supplied from the Paso de las Piedras reservoir. The Tribunal notes that this Article does not differentiate between sources of raw water and Annex O specifically exempts the Province from responsibility from the quantity and quality of water supplied from said reservoir.

<sup>70</sup> This section provides, inter alia, that bidders by the fact of submitting a bid recognize that they had sufficient access to information to prepare it correctly and that the bid was based exclusively on their own investigation and evaluation.

142. It is also disputed between the parties whether the Concessionaire breached the biological parameters set forth in Annex C to the Concession Agreement. The Tribunal has difficulty with the Claimant's understanding of the wording of Annex C and the concordant provisions in the Concession Agreement. Article 3.6.2 is very clear in requiring that the Concessionaire meet the parameters established in Annex C and in specifying that in all cases the failure to meet the technical parameters shall be considered a potential risk for the public health.

143. However, the Concession Agreement was based on certain factual assumptions that did not turn out to be correct. It is not contested that the Algae Removal Works were not completed notwithstanding that at the time of bidding for the Concession they were represented to be 98% complete and expected to be completed by April 1999, at least two months before the beginning of the Concession and a full year before the extraordinary algae bloom occurred. The reservoir was kept by the Province only 25% full to permit completion of the works. In turn the low water level contributed to the extraordinary nature of the algae bloom. The works undertaken by the Province had the objective to obtain treated water at the outlet of the Patagonia plant with "levels of the chlorophyll photosynthetic pigment below 1mg/m<sup>3</sup>, irrespective of the species or number of cells, pH, etc. present in the water." This objective was not achieved. The filters installed at the micro-filtering plant were inadequate for filtering algae, a fact on which the ORAB and the consultants of Azurix agreed. The Bahía Blanca Drinking Water Supply Monitoring Report prepared by the ORAB noted that it had not found domestic or international precedents where these micro-filtering systems were used for the primary elimination of this type of plankton organisms.<sup>73</sup> Similarly, the report prepared by the consulting firm JVP employed by ABA concluded that the direct filtration system at Paso de las Piedras was not fit for the treatment of water because of the high concentration of algae/chlorophyll reaching the Patagonia plant due to the properties of the water from the reservoir and the removal capacity of the micro-screens system.<sup>74</sup> Since August 1999, ABA had repeatedly advised the ORAB, to no avail, of the measures necessary for ABA to take possession of the Algae Removal Works. For instance, in a letter to the ORAB dated August 24, 1999 (less than two months into the Concession and eight months before the April 2000 incidents) ABA alerted the ORAB that there was an increase in “the algae problem” due to the unusual low level in the reservoir.<sup>75</sup> In the same vein, ECODYMA, the contractor engaged by AGOSBA to carry out the Algae Removal Works, wrote to the General Administrator of Sanitary Works of the Province on July 19, 1999 to bring to her attention that the quality of the water of the reservoir did not meet the standards used as a base for its bid because of the high level of turbidity of the water and the algae bloom in large number and variety.<sup>76</sup>

144. Given this factual situation, the reaction of the provincial authorities shows a total disregard for their own contribution to the algae crisis and a readiness to blame the Concessionaire for situations that were caused by years of disinvestment and to use the incident politically, as admitted by the MOSP Minister in hearings held by commissions of the provincial parliament on the algae incident. It equally shows the willingness of high placed provincial officials, including the Governor, to interfere in the operation of the Concession for political gain whether by forcing ABA not to bill the customers or threatening the staff of the ORAB for lifting the billing interdiction. These actions by the Province are clearly actions taken in use of its public authority and go beyond the contractual rights as a party to the Concession Agreement. The Tribunal understands that governments have to be vigilant and protect the public health of their citizens but the statements and actions of the provincial authorities contributed to the crisis rather than assisted in solving it.

145. As explained by the Claimant in its Memorial, the works as described in Circular 31(A) included two elements: “Drilling Construction Works” and “Construction of Aqueduct and Injection Pipelines”. These works were only 10% and 25% completed according to Circular 31(A). The drilling component consisted of drilling 16 wells capable of extracting 300 m<sup>3</sup> per hour. Under the drilling contract, AGOSBA had the right to reject the work performed if the water flow was lower than 50% of the required capacity or the water did not meet sanitary requirements. The aqueduct was intended to transport water from Moctezuma to the cistern in Carlos Casares for delivery to this town and the town of Pehuajó. These works were to be completed in 18 months, by June or early July 2000.

146. According to the Claimant, on March 14, 2000, AGOSBA informed the ORAB that there would be a two-month delay and the works would be completed by September 2000. The dateline was postponed further and the Claimant finds it disconcerting that the ORAB, instead of pressing the Province to fulfill its obligations, informed ABA that “Azurix [sic] cannot assert completion of works as the grounds of non-compliance of the parameters for water quality in such localities.”<sup>77</sup> The completion occurred nearly 18 months after the original completion date and after ABA had terminated the Concession. The Claimant explains that ABA was willing to accept the works provisionally subject to a technical and functional evaluation and that the evaluation performed on January 3, 2002 showed that the works were unsuitable for the purpose and were not accepted by ABA. In particular, the wells could supply only a third to half the agreed water flow.<sup>78</sup>

147. In the Counter-Memorial, Argentina describes a different situation. It refers to the study submitted by ABA to the ORAB in May 2000 where it acknowledges that the wells have been drilled and 13 km. of aqueduct completed. In the same study, ABA recommended to cut the extraction of water by 50% to preserve the geological reserves. The works were completed and ABA was notified on October 2, 2001. ABA accepted the works provisionally on October 10 because it had terminated the Concession on October 5. The civil works were completed by end of August but the electricity connection could not be installed because of flooding in the area. The External Audit of September 2001 presented by ABA to the ORAB states that access to some drillings was not gained because they were in a flooded area. The works were not essential to meet service quality targets because of the 3-year exemption in Annex F of the Concession related to physical and chemical parameters of water quality. ABA was never penalized nor has Azurix claimed any damages on this account.

148. In its Reply, Azurix points out that Argentina has failed to mention that the wells were expected to solve quantity of water issues and not only quality, and that the quality of the water did not comply with the parameters originally provided in the work specifications.<sup>79</sup> The fact that there was no deadline in Circular 31(A) does not mean that this Circular can be considered in isolation of the contracts and specifications for the works in question. The flooding only took place after April 15, 2001, more than eight months after the expiration of the deadline and after the works had been suspended because of lack of payment to the contractor.<sup>80</sup> Azurix maintains that ABA did not even accept the works provisionally but “subject to the conditions mentioned in Note GRP 1882/01, particularly its completion in accordance with the specifications and the contract signed for their execution...”<sup>81</sup> As already pointed out, the ORAB warned ABA that non-completion of the works in Moteczuma could not be used as excuses for non-compliance with water quality parameters. The ORAB also determined that there was decreased pressure in the cities of Pehuajó and Carlos Casares and ordered ABA to solve this issue. ABA had to drill five new wells, implement a pumping scheme to optimize drinking water distribution in Pehuajó, and started the construction of an arsenic treatment plant because the Moctezuma wells failed to meet the standard required in relation to arsenic levels.<sup>82</sup> According to the Claimant, the worst part was the damage to the image of ABA among the customers since the works had been presented by the Province as the solution to the water problems of the previous 40 years and created high expectations among the authorities and local people.

149. Argentina in its Rejoinder claims that the temporary acceptance of the works on October 10, 2001 was linked to the unilateral termination of the Concession 5 days earlier and that the additional works and studies claimed to have been necessary because of the deficient Moctezuma works were already included in the Five-Year Plan presented by ABA to the ORAB in November 1999. No fine was ever imposed on ABA related to the alleged consequences of the Moctezuma works on ABA's delivery of services. The only fines were related to the interruption of service because of breakage of the Nueve de Julio aqueduct on May 2 and June 29, 2000 because of improper operating procedures. The breakage happened before the original delivery dates.<sup>83</sup>

(ii) Considerations by the Tribunal

150. It is accepted by the parties that the works were late. It is clear from the evidence presented that the works stopped first because the contractor was not paid by the Province and later because of flooding. It is also clear that the quantity of the water that could be extracted from the wells was below expectations. For the Tribunal this is a simple contractual matter not involving the exercise of the provincial public authority.

(c) Polo Petroquímico ("Polo")

151. AGOSBA had entered into an agreement with Profertil and the Province for the supply of industrial water for a fertilizer plant under construction. The water supply contract was assigned to ABA as part of its takeover of the Concession. To meet the water requirements, the Province had started construction of an aqueduct which was listed as 95% complete in Circular 31(A). Azurix claims that the Province failed to deliver the aqueduct. In a letter of August 25, 1999 to ABA and AGOSBA, Profertil noted the defects "in the construction and design of the Industrial Aqueduct and the inferior quality of the equipment and materials used". In January 2000, ABA informed Profertil that the aqueduct did not meet the requirements to provide the service and it would not be possible to supply Profertil with the quantity and quality of water agreed by the Province. Azurix received the Industrial Aqueduct in March 2000 provisionally and subject to "final acceptance upon the satisfactory result of routine technical evaluation and the Province assuming full responsibility for any service failures not caused by ABA".<sup>84</sup> On August 2000, the Province, Profertil, PBB and Polisur (other industries in the Polo) signed a letter of intent to construct a new pipeline. Azurix considers this fact as an admission that the existing aqueduct was "not fit for its intended purpose". Azurix lists a series of steps that it took to minimize the deficiencies of the aqueduct, including the building of a by-pass between the aqueduct and an existing water pipeline, and supplying the companies in the Polo with industrial water while bearing the cost of the raw water paid to the Province.<sup>85</sup>

152. Argentina points out that pursuant to Article 15.4.1 of the Concession Agreement, the contracts signed by OSBA listed in Annex N would be transferred to the Concessionaire. Circular 39(B), item 2, Annex O, established guidelines for the supply of industrial water to the companies in the Polo. The guidelines established the price to be paid to the Province and the responsibility of the Province for the amount of water delivered. The quality of the water should be that of water in its natural state at the Paso de las Piedras dam treated at the micro-screening plant.<sup>86</sup> The President of the ORAB informed ABA about the transfer of the aqueduct on March 28, 2000. In the “Inventory of Fixed Assets” of ABA, the aqueduct was listed as an asset assigned to the Concession with April 15, 2000 as “Date of Origin” and in excellent condition.<sup>87</sup> Argentina argues that ABA tried to generate conflicts with Profértil because it did not consider the contract advantageous, and with the Province to renegotiate the Concession.<sup>88</sup>

153. Azurix in its Reply reaffirms that the poor condition of the work prevented adequate service provision to the industries in the Polo. In addition, the deficient operation of the dam affected the quality of the water to such an extent that ABA could not “invoice the industrial water it delivered in order not to become committed to an operation that it could not guarantee through the Province’s facilities”.<sup>89</sup> Furthermore, the commercial negotiations that ABA may have held with the industries of the Polo are alien to the issues raised by Azurix. There is no doubt that the deficiencies experienced by the aqueduct created a negative image of ABA in the eyes of the industries located in the Polo.<sup>90</sup>

154. In the Rejoinder, Argentina reaffirms its previous arguments on the assignment of the contract and ABA's acceptance of the aqueduct. If ABA had made investments to ensure the continuity of service, it is because ABA considered it necessary to comply with its obligations. They are not the Province's or Argentina's responsibility.

(ii) Considerations of the Tribunal

155. The Tribunal considers that the fact that the Province agreed to build a new aqueduct proves that the one delivered to the Concessionaire was inadequate. The tests conducted by ABA, which have not been disputed by Argentina, provide also evidence of the low level of pressure acceptance by the water pipeline. The letter of August 1999 from Profertil to AGOSBA and ABA speaks by itself and its content has not been refuted by Argentina. However, this is a matter of a contractual nature that does not go beyond the relationship between the parties to the Concession Agreement acting as such.

(d) Florencio Varela

156. This component of work in progress for which AGOSBA took responsibility consisted of drilling four wells. According to the drilling contract, the wells were to be completed in 180 days from the date of the contract, December 30, 1998. Circular 31(A) stated that the wells were 70% completed, which Azurix disputes. Azurix alleges that the Province failed to deliver the wells and hence it was impossible to keep up with the summer water demands and such failure caused service interruptions. On December 27, 1999, the ORAB ordered ABA "to conform the service to the established service levels within 24 hours". To comply, ABA "took control of the Florencio Varela Extraction Wells on a provisional basis in order to begin providing water service to the local citizens".<sup>91</sup> On December 28, 1999, ABA explained to the ORAB that the Province's failure to complete the wells made it impossible for ABA to comply with its obligations to provide water service. ABA's first Annual Report noted that the drilling ended before

157. According to Argentina, the wells were “practically completed” at the end of July 1999 and the final measurement was carried out. ABA’s Service Report states that the wells were available for service. The wells were included in the inventory of assets on June 15, 1999. The wells needed to be supplemented with the pertinent interconnection pipes. Their installation was the responsibility of the Concessionaire. ABA’s Annual Progress Report on the POES and Service levels for the year July 1999-June 2000 includes at least three of the wells in the actual service provision. In any case, ABA did not suffer any damages nor did the ORAB impose any penalties.<sup>93</sup>

158. In its Reply, Azurix finds that Argentina has failed to address the evidence presented in the Memorial. Azurix notes that it took five months for the ORAB to authorize ABA to assume operation of the Florencio Varela wells, to conduct tests, to adapt them and to complete them in order to address the summer increased demands.<sup>94</sup> Azurix contests the significance of the quoted reports and the measurement statement. According to Azurix, the purpose of the Service Report was “to evaluate the condition of the water system ‘at the time of ABA’s take over of the Concession’”.<sup>95</sup> The Report noted that the four wells were not in operation and the equipment was missing. The date of origin in the Fixed Assets Inventory does not have the relevance that Argentina attributes to it. Date of origin is merely a technical term that does not explain why the ORAB did not authorize ABA to take material possession till December 27, 1999. Prior delivery of the wells was essential for the installation of the water pipes. Once ABA obtained the authorization, it immediately proceeded to complete them at its own expense and connect them to the network. Only three wells were put in operation, the fourth could not be used due to construction problems, was abandoned and new drillings had to be made at ABA’s own expense.<sup>96</sup>

159. In the Rejoinder Argentina contends that the completion of the works during the first month of the Concession was duly proved by Argentina. Argentina points out that Azurix quoted only partially from the Service Report which stated that “only the ducted well was available. The equipment is missing. The equipment is stored at the ‘Centro’ operating location”.<sup>97</sup> Contrary to Azurix’s allegations, it was not necessary to equip the wells to interconnect them. In any case, no fine was imposed since no fines could be imposed during the first six months of the Concession.<sup>98</sup>

160. From the parties allegations it emerges that Argentina does not contest that ABA was authorized to use the wells on December 27. The inventory of fixed assets showing the wells as an asset added on June 15, 1999 indicates that assets were added before work was completed or were in service. On June 15, the Concession Agreement had not been signed yet and there is no dispute that, on that date, the works were not completed. Argentina claims the works were completed in July and ABA claims never to have accepted them. There is no dispute that only three out of the four original wells went into service and that they produced low water flow. The certificate of measurement of July 20, 1999 simply recorded the fact that the final measurement took place and it is signed by OSBA and the Contractor. Hazen & Sawyer (“H&S”) stated that: “The concessionaire had to unilaterally take over the unfinished wells from AGOSBA and to put them into production before they were formally transferred as stipulated in ABA’s concession contract”.<sup>99</sup> There seems to be a difference of view between simply executing the works and accepting them as works satisfactorily completed under the terms of the civil works contract concerned. ABA considered works completed when accepted in terms of the specifications in the contract, while the Province seems to have been concerned with the physical completion of the works even if they did not meet the contract specifications. The Tribunal concludes from these considerations that that this is a matter in which the Province did not exercise its public authority and acted as any other contractual party.

4. Rejection of Financing by the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (“OPIC”)

(a) *Positions of the Parties

161. Azurix submits that, in the privatization of public water systems, the private investor usually needs to compensate for under-investment in the infrastructure during the previous State-run operation.<sup>100</sup> ABA estimated that it would need $311 million to comply with the POES goals. ABA contacted OPIC and the Inter-American Development Bank (“IDB”) to obtain $100 and $150 million loans, respectively, in the fall of 1999. In April 2000, both institutions expressed interest in providing financing and in May 2000 Azurix submitted formal applications.<sup>101</sup> These institutions engaged H&S to perform a comprehensive due diligence investigation of the Concession and H&S staff visited Argentina in August 2000. During a second visit in October 2000, H&S focused primarily on ascertaining “how the Provincial authorities viewed the ongoing development of the Concession and what role the Province would play in promoting investment security and stability over the course of the Concession”.<sup>102</sup> On September 21, 2001, OPIC rejected formally the application. The letter described the issues identified by their due diligence that required “clear and definitive resolution to ensure the concession’s long-term viability and render it an acceptable credit capable of borrowing funds.”

162. The issues identified by H&S were uncertainty on tariffs, substantial scope of the capital plan required to meet the service goals compared to the level of cash ABA is expecting to generate from forecasted revenues based on tariffs in place, lack of clear definition of roles or responsibilities and unclear commitment of the Province to the Concession given unmet obligations.<sup>103</sup> The letter concluded:

“We understand that since our meeting in Argentina during November 2000, ABA has continued discussions with ORAB and Buenos Aires Provincial government and no significant progress has been made regarding the core issues related to tariff setting and the capital expenditures program. From a creditworthiness perspective, this failure to reach an agreement regarding modifications to the concession to restore a sustainable situation for ABA precludes us from moving forward with potential financing.”

163. According to Azurix, the denial of financing by OPIC made it impossible to obtain long-term financing from other sources. It meant that Azurix would have to fund ABA’s operational expenses itself.<sup>104</sup>

164. In the Counter-Memorial, Argentina alleges that Azurix was always short of funding. Argentina points out that Azurix prepared an IPO to obtain funds that it could not obtain otherwise but that the IPO funds benefited ENRON instead. Furthermore, the World Bank denied funding to Azurix in Ghana because of its totally non-transparent policy. In any case, Azurix was responsible for obtaining funding, and it was its decision where to find it whether using its own capital or becoming indebted to multilateral institutions or other entities.<sup>105</sup>

165. Azurix contests the assertions of Argentina on financing, the link of OPIC financing to the denial of a World Bank loan to Ghana and the lack of resources. Azurix draws attention to the fact that the denial of financing in Ghana took place in March 2000 while OPIC and the IDB expressed interest in providing financing in April and June 2000. The H&S report in January 2001 did not mention the issue and the letter of OPIC sent on September 21, 2001 neither.<sup>106</sup>

166. Argentina points out in its Rejoinder that the conflicts that eventually led OPIC to deny funding were generated by Azurix itself. The notification of Azurix on January 5, 2001 of a dispute under the BIT would have affected the denial of funding by OPIC. Argentina adds another instance of funding denial not mentioned by Azurix. ABA requested a US$50 million loan from ENOHSA under an IDB-financed program. The loan was denied because the lender requested the guarantee of ENRON or a suitable bank guarantee, which ABA could not provide. ABA was notified on September 21, 2001, the same date as OPIC’s letter, and no reference was made to any conduct or omissions by the Province or the Regulatory Agency but to lack of plans, excessive budgets, lack of environmental impact assessments, etc.

167. The rejection of the loan by OPIC was very clear and specific in its reasons. The World Bank was not mentioned nor ENRON. The Tribunal has no reason to second guess the management of OPIC in its reasoning for rejecting the request. As regards the ENOHSA loan, ENRON was not prepared to guarantee the loan as required by Banco de la Nación Argentina, the administrator of the program. By September 21, 2001, ABA had already requested the Province to cure its noncompliance with the Concession Agreement. Evidently, each institution had a different choice of reasons for denying funding. For the Tribunal, the significance of the reasons given by OPIC and the due diligence analysis on which they are based stems from the fact that OPIC is unrelated to any of the parties involved and the consultants hired to do the due diligence had no allegiance to any of the parties to this proceeding. The H&S report shows that the lack of funding for ABA could not be attributed to the relationship of Azurix with ENRON or to whichever denial of funding by the World Bank. H&S's assessment noted the politicization of the Concession, the lack of commitment of the provincial authorities to the Concession, and the impact of those two factors on its viability. However, these were not the only reasons adduced by OPIC to reject Azurix's financing request. OPIC's letter also referred to "the substantial scope of the capital plan required to meet the service goals of the concession in terms of both aggressive timing and cost, as compared to the level of cash ABA is expecting to generate from forecasted revenues based on tariffs currently in effect."<sup>107</sup> In other words, the current tariff level was insufficient to sustain the scope of the capital plan.

5. Memorandum of Understanding (MOU)

168. On January 5, 2001, the Claimant notified Argentina of the existence of a dispute under the BIT. According to the Claimant, at that point the Province renewed its discussions with ABA to remedy the breaches of the Concession Agreement, and on February 15, 2001 the MOSP and ABA signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU). The Claimant alleges that:

“the MOU implicitly recognized that the guarantees given by the Privatization Commission (including Circular 52(A) were essential to the attraction of qualified investors. Moreover, it implicitly recognized that the Province, as the granting authority, had the ability to revisit the purpose and goals of the Concession Agreement to optimize intended social purposes. Finally, and importantly, it recognized implicitly that the economic equilibrium of the contract was broken. These principles were incorporated into the MOU under the mutual understanding by ABA and the Province that the economic equilibrium of the Concession needed to be restored.”<sup>108</sup>

169. To implement the goals of the MOU a committee was established (“the MOU Committee”). This committee had to produce an interim report of the negotiations within 30 days and a resolution of the issues outlined in 60 days. During the discussions, the MOSP Undersecretary took the view that the Canon was subject to business risk and he proposed an amortization scheme as a percentage over sales and the remaining unamortized value to be recovered through the re-bidding of subdivided areas of the Concession. According to the Claimant, throughout the discussions “the approach of the MOSP was centered on questioning the privatization process and discarding key assurances that had been provided to ABA”, and the affirmation that the Concession was based on the risk principle.<sup>109</sup> The Claimant alleges that by the end of the negotiating period “the repeated promises that the Province made to cure the outstanding breaches related to the application of the tariff regime remained unfulfilled” and the Province opted for deferring ABA’s rights under the Concession. Thus as told by Mr. Clark, a member of the MOU Committee representing ABA, in his witness statement:

“As a condition to the signing of MOU II, the Province asked Azurix to withdraw its arbitral claim with ICSID and to release the Province from any claims... when ABA stressed the urgent need to increase cash flow, the Province responded that ABA should address this at the first tariff review at the end of the five-year period ... ABA was not in a position to wait until the end of the five-year period, and needed immediate solutions to the threat of its financial collapse.”<sup>110</sup>

170. The Claimant summarizes the MOU process results by affirming that by September 2001 the promises made by the Province to resolve the tariff issues were conditioned to withdrawal of the arbitration claim and the renunciation to recover the Canon, “In essence, after nearly a year of pursuing the rectification of Provincial breaches through the MOU efforts, nothing had changed to make the Concession economically viable. The breaches of the Concession Agreement, which affected the viability of Azurix’s investment, were still uncured.”<sup>111</sup> According to the Claimant, this situation prompted ABA to consider the termination of the Concession Agreement due to the Province’s continuous breaches.

171. From the Respondent’s point of view, the MOU was simply an agreement to create a committee to look into possible negotiating procedures.<sup>112</sup> It was “a negotiating process in which the parties, regardless of the rights to which they are legally entitled or for which they may have a rightful claim, try to reach a sustainable understanding for the Concession Contract within the framework of Law No. 11.820 and the rules and regulations applicable to the service.”<sup>113</sup>

172. The Respondent alleges that no agreement was reached in the context of the MOU negotiations because ABA adopted an unyielding position to be released of its obligations and transfer entrepreneurial risk to the Province. As a result, no proposals were ever submitted to the MOSP as it had been foreseen in Article 2 of the MOU, and the quality and expansion targets in the Concession Agreement and in the approved First Five-Year Plan were never modified.<sup>114</sup>

173. The MOU was part of a process to revisit certain aspects of the Concession. Its purpose and function was to conduct “the joint analysis of the issues” listed in Section 2 of the MOU. All items listed are couched in terms of work to be done – studies, discussions, preparation of a “regulatory model” - except for the second item – POES goals (Section 2.2) – which in part is drafted as a decision to establish, right there and then, a “priority works” plan to be performed during the current year because “the current critical service condition cannot be resolved by goals based contracts.” (2.2, first paragraph) A detailed plan of works and actions for 2001 was attached as an exhibit to the MOU.

174. The second paragraph of Section 2.2 recognizes the need to revise the goals of the POES in view of Resolution 179/00 of the MOSP and Resolution 59/00 of the ORAB which established sanitary vulnerability, risk and access criteria. The third paragraph of this section entrusts the ORAB with the control and regulation of the service “by following up on the Priority Works Plan.”

175. The MOU was signed by the Minister of Public Works and Services and the General Manager of the Concessionaire in the presence of the Secretary General of FENTOS and the Secretary General of SOSBA and city mayors, all of whom acknowledged the contents by subscribing the exhibit on works and actions for 2001. The signature took place also in presence of members of the provincial Senate and House of Representatives.

176. While the Respondent has played down the importance and significance of the MOU, it seems that it reflected a moment in which the parties were prepared to give serious consideration to the problems that had surfaced during the first year of the Concession. The level of the positions held by the persons who signed it and the context of the signature ceremony show the importance that the parties attached to the

MOU. In particular this is significant for the decision to establish the Priority Works Plan and have it subscribed by the city mayors. At least in this respect, the MOU was more than a simple agreement to establish a committee as has been submitted by the Respondent. The Tribunal will now consider the implications of the MOU for purposes of assessing the performance of the Concessionaire against the POES in 2001.

6. The Program for Optimizing and Expanding Service (POES)

(a) *Positions of the Parties

177. The Respondent points out in its Counter-Memorial that the Claimant had failed to comply with the POES, the core of the Concession. It argues that as part of the POES, the Concessionaire presented a Five-Year Plan proposal with serious shortcomings because from the very beginning it knew that it would not fulfill its obligations. As early as June 2000, ABA tried to reformulate the POES so as not to comply with the Five-Year Plan. The POES obligations were enforceable from the beginning and the MOU did not exempt ABA from complying with them. ABA did not meet the POES goals and investment commitments to such an extent that it prompted the Province to impose fines and terminate the Concession Agreement by fault of the Concessionaire.

178. In response, the Claimant alleges that the Province failed to provide accurate information to the Concessionaire necessary to define the POES goals and delayed approval of these goals for so long that they were no longer relevant. According to the Claimant, the POES goals were superseded by the MOU which recognized that “the economic equilibrium of the concession had been materially altered, and the parties agreed to a finite Priority Work Plan to replace the POES.”<sup>115</sup> Furthermore, the compliance with the POES was subject to certain pre-conditions, such as the proper application of the tariff regime and the cooperation of the Province and the ORAB with the Concessionaire.

179. The Claimant alleges that the provincial authorities failed to provide the Concessionaire with complete and accurate information for purposes of the definition, presentation and subsequent performance of the First Five-Year Plan. The documents promised in Circular 66(A) were not delivered to the extent promised and ABA had to request information on, among others, updated network plans, business documentation, computer center documentation, billing unit records and documents, information and documents related to personnel, debits and credits and technical operating documentation. The documentation requested was never delivered to ABA notwithstanding that it existed: "It was held by former AGOSBA officials – closely connected to the Union - who sought to require ABA to enter into commercial arrangements to acquire the same information that should have been delivered by the Province at the takeover."<sup>116</sup>

180. The Claimant maintains that it presented the Five-Year Plan diligently given the circumstances and that delays in its approval occurred by factors not mentioned by the Respondent such as the request, on February 23, 2000, three months after filing the Five-Year Plan, for information that was in fact in the hands of former officers of AGOSBA to pressure ABA into arrangements with them, or the introduction of the sanitary risk concept that the Province requested that be included by Resolution No. 59/00 of July 21, 2000. According to the Claimant, the introduction of this concept meant that the Concessionaire was instructed to prioritize investment based on new criteria –accessibility, risks and sanitary vulnerability- and “with no consideration to the relevant compensation required to preserve the economic balance of the concession.”<sup>117</sup> The Five-Year Plan was not approved until February 21, 2001 by Resolution 11/01.

181. The First Annual POES Progress Report was approved by the ORAB by Resolution 16/02 on February 19, 2002, 18 months after the submission of the Report. According to the Claimant, “these delays jeopardized the Concessionaire’s performance and evidenced the ORAB’s arbitrary conduct. Furthermore, the lack of certainty and the impossibility to foresee the plan that would be approved by the ORAB or the criteria that would be used to measure compliance with the goals placed ABA in an uncertain situation, which affected its operations.”<sup>118</sup>

182. The Claimant disagrees with Argentina’s argument that the Priority Work Plan included in the MOU was independent from the POES. For the Claimant, this would mean that ABA would have undertaken new investment obligations in addition to those in the POES notwithstanding that the MOU recognized the economic imbalance of the Concession; it was clear that the MOU suspended the goals for the second year of the Concession.<sup>119</sup>

183. According to the Claimant, the Province, not ABA, sought to modify the POES because of a political shift in how the new provincial government viewed the Concession Agreement. Minister Sícara had expressed the intent in February 2001 to change the model from one based on objectives to a model based on investments and a return to a cross-subsidy scheme implementing a social tariff for low income users.<sup>120</sup>

184. The Claimant disagrees with the description of POES non-compliance provided by the Respondent. According to the Claimant, the Respondent carries the evaluation without taking into account the non-application of the tariff regime and the agreement on a Priority Work Plan in the MOU. According to the Claimant, the ORAB could never have evaluated compliance with the POES because it had failed to define the methodology to assess the goals of the POES. The Claimant points out that the evaluation is based on investment amounts rather than goals as required in the Concession Agreement, that the analysis of the expansion goals disregards the setbacks concerning determination of serviced populations, excludes the connections installed within the serviced areas, and that includes, as alleged breaches, goals to be reached in a three or five-year term.<sup>121</sup>

185. The Claimant also alleges discriminatory treatment to the extent that public – ABSA - and private companies – AGBA - were exempted from POES compliance. According to the Claimant, this exemption was due to the

unreasonableness of the POES goals when the Province refused for political reasons to apply the tariff regime. The Claimant points out that, in the case of AGBA, the goals for year 2001 were suspended even though the economic crisis did not start until the end of 2001.<sup>122</sup>

186. The Respondent affirms that the MOU did not operate to amend the Concession Agreement or the targets under the POES, “it was merely an attempt by the parties to create a committee to consider the issues and submit a proposal designed to overcome certain difficulties, which was never put together”.<sup>123</sup> The POES was enforceable from the beginning of the Concession. The quantitative and qualitative targets were established in the Concession Agreement and the Five-Year Plans were merely designed to provide additional details, adjustments or updates.<sup>124</sup> The POES and the Five-Year Plans were specific contractual obligations to be discharged in accordance with the terms of the Concession Agreement and were not merely guidelines towards the targets as argued by the Claimant.<sup>125</sup> Compliance with the POES was an exclusive obligation of the Concessionaire and the Province did not hinder or affect negatively compliance of ABA with the POES.

187. The Respondent also contests that the Province discriminated in favor of other companies. AGBA, a private company, had complied with the applicable POES notwithstanding that it had higher targets during the first year of its concession and had only requested, on July 20, 2001, a temporary postponement of the POES deadline for the second year in view of the extraordinary economic crisis of the country. The postponement was not related to the rate system as asserted by the Claimant.<sup>126</sup>

188. As regards ABSA, the Respondent justifies the exemption from the service expansion obligations because it was owned by the Province, the temporary nature of the service transfer, the fact that the Concession had been abandoned, and the deep crisis prevailing at the time.<sup>127</sup>

189. The Respondent contests that the Province had any responsibility for the delayed approval of the First Five-Year Plan. It had provided ABA all the necessary information and the delay was the result of the many requests for postponing the submission deadline. The original deadline of three months from the date of takeover of the Concession was first postponed by two months, and then it was extended by an additional 45 days. As this was not yet enough, two further postponements were granted by ORAB. All together these postponements delayed presentation of the draft Five-Year Plan by nearly nine months. It was submitted on June 12, 2000.

190. According to the Respondent, it was always ABA that attempted to change the POES. When ABA was supposed to submit the Five-Year Plan, in fact it submitted an Emergency Investment Plan and sketched the structure of a plan for the five years, there was a second draft Five-Year Plan, an appeal for reversal of Resolution 10/00, a Supplementary Report to the Five-Year Plan, and a letter to ORAB of July 17, 2001.

191. The Respondent considers that the notions of vulnerability, accessibility and sanitation risk did not modify substantially the POES. Inclusion of these notions was to direct the targets already established to areas that were more intensely exposed to sanitation risks.<sup>128</sup>

192. The Respondent argues that the MOU was only the first step in a process of renegotiation that was never completed because of ABA's desire to walk away from its obligations and transfer all business risks to the Province. The Priority Work Plan never became effective and it could not have amended the Concession Agreement or changed the targets established in the POES for the second year of the Concession.<sup>129</sup>

193. The Respondent affirms that the obligations under the POES were not conditional upon the definition of evaluation criteria regarding performance under the POES, and the achievement of the targets regarding the expansion of drinking water and sewerage works did not call for any regulatory criterion beyond the terms of the Concession Agreement.<sup>130</sup> ABA did not comply with the minimum requirements for region and county during the first two years, the annual renovation and reconditioning of

pipes' target, and the target of maintenance or reconditioning of effluent primary and secondary treatment plants. ABA failed to make sufficient progress in the micro-measurement by year two of the Concession to such an extent as to make it unlikely that the 40% target prescribed in the Concession Agreement could be reached by year five. ABA equally failed to complete the infrastructure works contemplated in Exhibit I to the approved Five-Year Plan. In the second year, ABA prepared the second progress annual report for the POES based exclusively on the Priority Works Plan attached to the MOU and hence failed to reach the targets established in Exhibit F of the Concession Agreement.<sup>131</sup>

194. The Priority Works Program was not additional to the POES. It is doubtful that, in its financial condition, ABA would have undertaken new obligations in addition to the POES. The sanitary risk was a new element which would have an effect on the POES and was introduced by the Respondent. It is evident that the MOU was an attempt to solve the problems that had developed and the attempt failed. The POES was never amended and the parties to the Concession Agreement continued to be bound by its original terms, including the tariff regime. However, the failure by the Province to honor the tariff regime contributed significantly to Azurix's inability to implement the POES as planned.

7. Circular 52(A) and Canon Recovery

(a) Introduction

195. The issue of Canon recovery and the meaning of Circular 52 (A) first emerged during the discussions in 2001 in the context of the MOU as we have already seen. On July 18, 2001, ABA sent a communication to the Province requesting that the Province cure the breaches of the Concession and warning that, if these were not cured, ABA would terminate the Concession. The Province replied on August 29, 2001 denying any wrongdoing and, in particular, denying "ABA's right to recover its investment (including the initial Canon), as expressly stated in Circular 52(A) and Article

196. Azurix claims that the Province issued Circular 52(A) in an attempt to attract the highest bids from prospective investors. Azurix maintains that Circular 52(A) assured bidders that the Canon would be considered an investment fully amortizable through tariffs.<sup>133</sup> In this respect, Azurix refers to LECG’s expert report: in which it is stated:

“Although the Province did not issue ex-ante details on regulatory methodology and accounting principles for the tariff reviews, it issued Circular 52(A). In this Circular, the Province indicates very clearly that the initial payment will be treated as an investment. As such, bidders, including Azurix Corp. must have properly assumed that, in the context of a price-cap regime, the canon would be included in the asset base for tariff review purposes, after accounting for its amortization.

This expectation was based on international and Argentine regulatory experience.”<sup>134</sup>

197. Argentina contests the interpretation given by Azurix to Circular 52(A). In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina explains that the fee paid for the Concession is the price to run a monopoly. Argentina considers that this issue was not “a real conflict between ABA and the Province as Law No. 11,820 and the Contract would have never allowed such transfer. The issue was introduced within the framework of negotiations with the Province, in a desperate attempt by Azurix to alter the obligations assumed and the Contract”.<sup>135</sup> Argentina draws attention to Article 12.3.1 of the Concession which provides that the tariffs shall be in force during the term of the Concession and their review may only occur based on events after the takeover of the Concession (Article 12.3.4, 5 and 6 of the Contract and Section 23-II of the Law).

198. Argentina refers to the expert report of Mr. Chama, one of Argentina's experts, who explains that the bidding process for the Concession sought to select "the economic player that is willing to pay the highest price, usually called 'fee', for the right to exercise the monopoly; and the selection consists simply of determining who is willing to pay the highest price as from a certain rate level, with a rate adjustment system primarily based on service conditions established in the bidding documents and in the regulatory framework governing the service."<sup>136</sup>

199. According to Argentina, the offer of Azurix was opportunistic in the sense that the purpose was the immediate renegotiation of the Concession Agreement to recover the profits renounced in the competitive bidding process. Mr. Chama states that "it could never be argued that the concession fee can be defined as a component of the cost of service and become a factor determining the rates or prices of the service itself".<sup>137</sup> Argentina wonders what would be the point of competing in a bidding process if the concession fee would be subsequently transferred to users.<sup>138</sup> Argentina further argues that the transfer of the concession fee to the tariffs would result in "the absurdity of having different tariffs in different areas depending on the concession fee offered by the winning bidder."<sup>139</sup>

200. Argentina points out that, in the letter of August 29, 2001, the Minister of Public Works of the Province stated that Azurix's representative, after several months of negotiations, requested "an additional condition: to study the mechanisms to adjust the Tariff Regime, aiming at recouping the concession fee paid for taking over the Concession."<sup>140</sup> The Minister adds: "under the Bidding Conditions, payment of the concession fee corresponded to the price that you bid for the concession, assuming the risk that you may not recoup it, considering that if the [C]oncession guaranteed the reimbursement of the price paid plus a rate of return thereon, the business started by

Azurix would not be a risky one, as it is stated in Article 12.3.1 of the Concession Contract.”<sup>141</sup>

201. As part of Argentina’s arguments on this issue, Argentina brings to the attention of the Tribunal certain alleged irregularities regarding Circulars 51(B) and 52(A) and Section 12.1.1 of the Contract. According to Argentina, these two circulars were the last circulars issued by the Privatization Committee before bidders presented their economic offer.<sup>142</sup> Circular 51(B) reduced the volume of water that the Concessionaire was to deliver annually free of charge established only the week before, on May 5. The reduction for ABA exceeded 57%. In contrast, the water volumes fell only by 1.48% in Region B, the only Region not awarded to ABA.<sup>143</sup>

202. As regards Article 12.1.1 of the Contract, Argentina draws the attention of the Tribunal to the statement of Azurix in the Memorial whereby the Province, in need of money to balance the budget in 1999, wanted to maximize the Canon and “To this end, it issued Circular 52(A), saying that the Canon would be recognized as an amortizable investment, and thus, included in the tariff rate base. The Province confirmed this by adding Article 12.1.1 to the Contract.”<sup>144</sup> Argentina observes that this section of Article 12 was not in the model contract which was part of the bidding documents and did not establish that the concession fee could be transferred through tariffs. The original Article 12 simply stated a general principle to be taken into account in the determination of the tariff regime. Azurix’s interpretation would make this section contrary to law. The Concession Agreement could not be substantially altered after the bidding process. Amendments to the Concession Agreement were done through letters of amendment, no such letter was used in this case and it might have also been absent in another change also introduced after the award of the contract, i.e. the introduction of a 6-month period of grace for penalties on account of any infringements.<sup>145</sup>

203. Argentina alleges that the Tribunal took Article 12.1.1 of the Concession Agreement into account as a decisive factor in its decision on jurisdiction in disregard of the possible irregularities that affect this section which “could have led the tribunal to error.”<sup>146</sup> Argentina informs that its courts will solve the issues dealing with the inclusion of Article 12.1.1 and considers that, “In any case, the impact on the progress of Azurix’s claim before this Tribunal is evident, as well as the fact that the Tribunal is not competent to decide on the facts described.”<sup>147</sup>

204. Azurix contests that the Canon is only an access fee for the Concession. Circular 52(A) explained that the Canon constitutes an investment to be amortized. According to Azurix, utility investors understand that, when access to other markets is prohibited, canon payments are considered investments to be recovered through regulated tariffs. This is standard regulatory practice in Argentina and the Province. Azurix refers to an internal MOSP report on the MOU process in which Mr. Sícario states: “the proposed scheme accounts for the fact that there is a canon to be amortized by the expiration of the Concession term”.<sup>148</sup> This is in contrast with the statements made by him before the Tribunal as a witness. According to Azurix, the Province simply lacked the political will to allow its recovery in accordance with representations made by the Privatization Commission, the Concession Agreement and Circular 52(A).<sup>149</sup>

205. Azurix dismisses the concept of “unbounded risk” claimed by Argentina. According to Azurix and relying on LECG rebuttal: “The ‘unbounded risk’ concept introduced by Mr. Chama, is deadly off the mark. Were concessions based on the ‘unbounded risk’ concept, no private investor will ever pay anything for the concession.”<sup>150</sup>

206. Azurix also dismisses the unconstitutionality alleged by Argentina if similarly situated customers would pay different prices for public services. This is actually a fact in the Province and Argentina.<sup>151</sup>

207. Azurix also rebuts the notion that Circular 52(A) is only an accounting clarification and points out that Argentina fails to explain how this clarification was to be applied or its practical meaning. Furthermore, argues Azurix, Argentina's allegations in respect of the Canon are not consistent with the facts and recognized utility practice. Azurix points out that in the case of another Argentine public utility, Transener, specific provisions like Article 7.8 and Circular 52(A) were not deemed necessary to include the Canon in the tariff rate base.<sup>152</sup>

208. Azurix affirms that it was the behavior of the Province that was opportunistic. The additional capital contributions made by Azurix and exceeding US$106 million do not indicate behavior of an opportunistic investor seeking additional advantages through a post-bid negotiation. Azurix observes that if the Province, advised by Mr. Chama himself during the bidding process judged Azurix's bid opportunistic or reckless could have rejected the bid and did nothing of the sort.<sup>153</sup> On this point, Azurix concludes that, 'in light of the guarantees offered by the Regulatory Framework, the Concession Agreement and Circular 52(A), the Province should have recognized the implications of accepting Azurix bid. If the Province chose to ignore long-term effects for the benefit of short-term political interests, then it did so under the legal obligation to honor commitments made.'<sup>154</sup>

209. Azurix also contests the supposed irregularities of Circular 52(A) and Article 12.1.1. As Argentina itself admits, this Article merely reiterates what is already contemplated in the Regulatory Framework and the Concession Agreement: "It is Azurix's view that Article 12.1.1 is consistent with Article 28-II(d) of Law 11.820, Article 7.8 of the Concession Agreement and Circular 52(A). They all fit together into a harmonious and systematic whole. Therefore any suggestions that this introduction substantially changed the scope of the Concession Agreement is wrong. It merely clarified it."<sup>155</sup> According to Azurix, by its actions, the Province repudiated Circular 52(A).

210. In the Rejoinder, Argentina refers to statements made by a World Bank expert, Mr. Guasch, to support the allegation of opportunistic behavior of Azurix. According to Mr. Guasch, “...operators should be held accountable to their bids, and if petitions for renegotiation are turned down, operators ought to feel free to abandon the projects, if they choose to do so (with the corresponding penalties). The appropriate behavior for the government is to uphold the sanctity of the bid and not concede to opportunistic request for renegotiation and, in such cases, allow concessions to fail. Such outcomes would reduce the incidence of renegotiation. That is a key issue in private concessions of infrastructure services –yet one that is often resolved in favor of operators. Thus aggressive bidding and the high incidence of renegotiation should not be surprising.”<sup>156</sup>

211. And again more specifically on the issue of valuation of concession assets:

“What clearly should not be used for the value of the concession in the capital base –from which the operator is allowed to earn a fair rate of return- is the value paid at the bidding stage, regardless of depreciation method. Doing that would take away the efficiency-competitive angle of the auction, by allowing a rate of return on whatever price was paid for the concession.”<sup>157</sup>

212. Argentina considers reasonable that the bidders take into account the return on the investment in order to calculate the concession fee, but it is illogical and unreasonable that the fee be passed through to rates. While every bidder may expect to make reasonable profits above the concession fee, this is not an acquired right.<sup>158</sup>

213. Argentina denies Azurix’s allegation that in the natural gas and electricity sectors the amounts paid as concession fees had been taken into account to determine applicable rates.<sup>159</sup> Furthermore, Argentina considers that the concession fees in these sectors may reflect accurately the value of assets transferred because there are no cross-subsidies or an obligation to expand the grid.<sup>160</sup> Then Argentina refers to the specific example of Transener, an electricity distribution company. In the context of a five-year rate review, Transener argued that the price paid for the concession should be used to determine the asset value for rate-setting purposes. The regulatory agency for the power sector did not accept the argument. In fact, NERA, an expert consulting company in the instant case, advised the regulator that, if the price paid at the time of the privatization:

“constituted the basis of the calculation, then, any amount paid should be recovered through rates (circularity of rates)” and, “if the rates can be calculated on the basis of the value of the company at the time of privatization or, if the rate of return of the company is guaranteed on the bid price, there is nothing to prevent an economic agent from offering a large amount if the implicit regulatory rate of return is higher than its own weighted capital cost.”<sup>161</sup>

214. Argentina refers also to NERA’s advice to defend the concepts of regulatory and accounting amortization advanced in the Counter-Memorial. According to NERA:

“Regulatory amortization is the annual percentage of the asset base that is deducted from the regulatory book value in accordance with the standards established by the regulator. Accounting amortization is the percentage of the asset base that may be written off the accounting books every year in accordance with the standards set by the tax authority and the professional council of economic sciences. These are two different concepts. While regulatory amortization serves the purpose of setting rates, accounting amortization is used to calculate taxes and determine the accounting book value.”<sup>162</sup>

According to Argentina, ENRE, the regulator, took into account these observations.

215. Argentina considers Article 7.8 of the Contract to be very clear. It consists of three elements: the amortization of assets in service acquired or built by the Concessionaire and the improvements made thereon by the Concessionaire.<sup>163</sup> As regards Article 1.8, Argentina considers that this Article is also clear in showing that the concession fee was not an investment but the price paid to be awarded an area. Argentina refers to Mr. Chama's expert advice and affirms that, for the Concessionaire to earn a reasonable return, Azurix's assessment underlying its Offer would have to have been reasonable and the fee compatible with the financial equilibrium of the Concession. The Concession fee presupposed an appropriate economic offer, otherwise the Concessionaire would offset its deficits derived from ordinary business risks, a compensation expressly prohibited in the Concession Agreement.<sup>164</sup>

216. Argentina points out that, as there was no rule permitting it, there was no submission by ABA to the ORAB requesting the transfer of the concession fee paid onto rates or the increase in rates to cover a part of the concession fee. Argentina alleges that the dispute only arose at the end of the negotiations with the Province in search of an overhaul of the rate system or an excuse to provide grounds for termination.<sup>165</sup> The circulars issued by the Privatization Commission could only introduce clarifications of or amendments to the Terms of Reference provided they were not substantial in nature. If Circular 52(A) would be interpreted as Azurix suggests, it would have introduced a substantial amendment to the rate system contemplated in the Contract. Professor Comadira in his expert opinion states that, in that case, "it would be unreasonable and incompatible with the rest of the provisions of the terms of reference."<sup>166</sup> According to the same expert, the rate system could only be modified after the third year of the Concession (Article 30-II(c)), the rates<sup>167</sup> and prices should have been effective during the term of the Concession (Article 12.3.1), and the values and prices could only be modified by virtue of the procedures and for the reasons disclosed in Article 12.3.2. Therefore, ABA's interpretation of Circular 52(A), "apart from being inconsistent with the harmonic and systematic interpretation of all the clauses of the Terms of Reference, which it may only clarify but never modify substantially under penalty of becoming an absolute nullity, disregards clear legal regulations applicable to the Concession Contract.”<sup>168</sup> Professor Comadira even affirms that:

“A modification of the contracting conditions as the one provided for in the Circular under analysis should have necessarily meant a new call for bids to enable the possible participation of any potential bidders that would have been self excluded under the original conditions. Since that was not the case, the equality guarantee has been clearly violated, thus corrupting the whole procedure.”<sup>169</sup>

217. In addition, Professor Comadira explains that the addition of Article 12.1.1 and its interpretation by Azurix would mean that the essential principle of equality in a bidding process would have been violated, this being “a fundamental principle of the general law and administrative law.” He concludes by inviting the Tribunal to rule this article as manifestly void of absolute and incurable nullity in response to “an ethical or juristic requirement.”<sup>170</sup>

218. According to Argentina, the studies leading to the presentation of the offer could not have taken into “account an interpretation that would have distorted the rate system contemplated in the contract, on the grounds of a nonexistent provision.” Azurix could not have entertained any expectations in this respect.<sup>171</sup>

(c) Considerations of the Tribunal

Article 28 of the Law:

“Prices and tariffs will tend to reflect the economic cost of providing potable water and sewer services, including the Concessionaire’s margin of profit for and the resulting basic infrastructure costs of the POES.”

Concession Agreement:

Article 12.1.1:

“Determination of the tariff level required under Article 28-II of Law No. 11.820, shall be based on the general principle under which tariff values shall cover the operating, maintenance and amortization costs of the services and allow for a reasonable rate of return on the amounts invested by Concessionaire within an efficient operation and management environment, as well as full achievement of the agreed-upon service expansion and quality goals.”

Article 7.8:

“The Service-related assets acquired or built by the Concessionaire and belonging to it as well as all improvements made thereon shall be capitalized by accounting procedures and shall be depreciated integrally over the term of the Concession or over their Useful Lives, whichever term is shorter; the provisions of the fourth paragraph hereof notwithstanding.

The investments the Concessionaire makes in the assets received by/from the Province upon Take Over shall be considered as acquisition and/or maintenance costs of the Concession in accordance with provisions of clause 1.8 and shall be amortized over the term of the Concession.”

Article 1.8:

“The grant of the Concession shall be in consideration of payment of an initial canon equal to ... by the Concessionaire. Said amount has been paid up by the Concessionaire to the Province upon the signing of the Agreement, and it is equivalent to the amount offered by the Awardee [sic] under the Bidding Process, to be credited as the price for the Concession Area. However, the Concessionaire does hereby undertake to make all necessary investments to execute the POES and to secure the correct provision of Service under the Agreement, the description of which is detailed in Annex F hereto, the tariffs increments being subject to the guidelines stated in Annex Ñ being subject to compliance with said obligations.”

Circular 52(A):

“It is clarified that the initial royalty which is referred to in Section 1.8 of the Concession Contract constitutes an amortizable investment during the concession period (article 7.8 correlative and concordant of the Concession Contract).”

220. The Tribunal will turn first to the relationship of Circular 52(A) to Article 1.8, second to the meaning of the additional provision 12.1.1 of the Concession Agreement, third to the rationale of the Concession, and fourth to asset depreciation in the asset regime of the Concession Agreement (Article 7.8).

(i) Circular 52(A): The Canon as an Investment

221. The parties have discussed the meaning of the term “canon” and whether the Canon is an investment. Article 1.8 of the Contract refers to the Canon as “the consideration” for the granting of the Concession and, in the next sentence, as “the price for the Concession Area.” The following sentence deals with the undertaking related to the POES investments. It starts with the word “however” as a counterpoint to the consideration paid by the Canon, as if to emphasize that the payment of the Canon were not the only contribution to be made by the Concessionaire. This reading of Article 1.8 is reinforced if compared with the terms of Article 28 of the Law. Article 28 sets forth the general principle that: “the prices and tariff will tend to reflect the economic cost of the provision of the services of water supply and sewer services”, and continues by saying: “including a profit margin and the cost arising from the POES related to basic infrastructure.” The economic cost of a service would include, by definition, all costs related to the provision of the service. The specific reference to investments arising out of the POES would seem to be a clarification rather than an exclusion of other investment costs. In case there was any doubt about its meaning at the time of the bidding for the Concession, the Privatization Commission issued Circular 52(A) which clearly states that “the initial canon...constitutes an investment.” The Tribunal has no reason to doubt the interpretation given by the Privatization Commission. It had the power to issue clarifications of the Bidding Terms and Conditions and all bidders would have been aware of the clarification when they submitted the bid as in the case of any other circular issued by the Privatization Commission. Argentina had argued that Circular 52(A) was issued close to the deadline for the submission of bids and was the last circular issued by the Commission. The evidence provided to the Tribunal shows that Circular 52(A) was not the last circular to be issued by the Commission and that other significant circulars were issued after the date of Circular 52(A). The issue is not so much whether the Canon is an investment but whether being an investment makes it a recoverable investment beyond the given tariff at the time of bidding and as adjusted through the extraordinary reviews.

222. In arguing that Article 12.1.1 of the Concession Agreement is not extraneous to the Concession regime, the Claimant states that: “it is Azurix’s view that Article 12.1.1 is consistent with Article 28-II(d) of Law 11.820, Article 7.8 of the Concession Agreement and Circular 52(A). They all fit together into a harmonious and systematic whole. Therefore, suggestions that this introduction substantially changed the scope of the Concession Agreement are wrong. It merely clarified it.”<sup>172</sup> In support of this statement, the Claimant refers to the expert opinion of Professor Fernández who affirms:

“Section 12.1.1 of the Contract is not a word-by-word reproduction of the section with the same number of the sample agreement attached to the Bidding Terms and Conditions; however, under no means does it imply a modification to the agreed-upon terms since it merely incorporates into the contract the provisions of Section 28(ii) of Law 11.820 and the statement made at the time by means of Circular 52(A), acknowledging that the Canon was an ‘investment to be amortized throughout the term of the concession.’”<sup>173</sup>

223. In the Counter-Memorial, Argentina considered that Article 12.1.1 established a general principle already taken into account in Annex Ñ of the Concession Agreement in order to determine the tariff regime. The resulting rate for the duration of the Concession was “fair and reasonable and allowed a reasonable return.”<sup>174</sup> For Argentina, it was impossible to build Azurix’s interpretation into the terms of Circular 52(A) and Article 12.1.1 of the Concession Agreement without amending substantially the terms of the agreement against the provisions of the Law, which did not permit the passing through of the Canon to the rates.

224. In the Rejoinder, Argentina argued differently and, instead of admitting that Article 12.1.1 established a general principle, it stated that the insertion of Article 12.1.1 is not being supported by any legal provision and that this article could not have been part of the considerations present when Azurix submitted its bid for the Concession.<sup>175</sup>

225. Article 12.1.1 provides that the tariff level required under article 28-II shall be based on the general principle that the tariff values cover the operation, maintenance and amortization costs of the service and permit a reasonable return on the investments of the Concessionaire in the context of an efficient administration and operation and exact fulfillment of the agreed quality and expansion objectives of service. While article 12.1.1 refers to article 28-II of the Law, it introduces a notion, “return on assets”, not present in this article 28, and, conversely, there is no reference to the “profit margin” of Article 28-II in Article 12.1.1. Taking a long term view of the Concession, profit margins and rates of return may come to the same result, but they are different concepts and the concession regime does not contemplate a regime based on rates of return as explained by the Claimant’s own experts and to which we will now turn.

226. At the time of bidding, the bidders knew the tariff level and that this level could not be changed except as provided in the model contract. These provisions are usual in concession tariff regimes known as price cap regulatory regimes. Both parties agree that the tariff regime under the Concession Agreement followed the price cap model.<sup>176</sup> However, the parties' experts draw different implications for purposes of determining whether the Canon was part of the tariff review. The expert report of LECG submitted by the Claimant explains this regime and affirms that:

"The strong incentives for greater efficiency are probably the major innovation of the price cap regulatory regimes, and reflect an essential benefit of the system. A second benefit...is the reduction in regulatory costs as compared to the traditional rate of return regulation, which required continuous supervision of investments and costs, thus increasing regulatory costs."<sup>177</sup>

227. This report quotes from a World Bank study:

"For a concessionaire that has paid a transfer to government to operate a business at a predetermined set of prices, these issues [asset valuation and depreciation] could be important. Regulatory disputes could emerge relating to what the concessionaire actually bought with that transfer – a stream of future earnings or a return on the preexisting and future asset base? Issues relating to the depreciation profile of both old and new assets therefore assume particular importance and should be signaled by the government during the bidding process.

[...] If the criterion is the largest lump sum offered to run a franchise, however, the outgoing concessionaire could receive the highest bid, since this bid reflects the value of the assets as they currently exist. However, this value is based on the future stream of earnings, which is determined by the price set by the regulator throughout the new franchise. If the regulator unreasonably ratchets down prices for the period of the new concession, this effectively expropriates the value of the assets built in the previous concession. Generally, therefore, new

<sup>176</sup> Argentina explains in its Counter-Memorial that there are different ways to regulate utilities, "One is to adjust tariffs based on the actual costs of the service provider and the other way is to fix in advance a fair and reasonable tariff capable of covering the costs of an efficient operator and yielding a reasonable profit. In the latter case, to earn a reasonable profit, the service provider must be efficient." (para. 959). According to Argentina, the privatizations during the nineties followed generally the second model (Counter-Memorial, para. 960).

investment by the concessionaire needs to be transparently treated by the regulator at each review, as part of the process of rolling forward the asset base and charging depreciation on it.”<sup>178</sup>

228. Somehow contradictorily, the LECG report argues for linking the Canon to the tariff review in a price cap regime when the quoted literature explains that in lump sum situations the value of the assets has been calculated by the bidder on the basis of the stream of estimated earnings within the set level of tariffs and the periodic adjustments permitted by the Concession Agreement.

229. LECG analyzes what would be the evolution of tariffs if the Canon were not included in the tariff base,

“At the first ordinary rate review the regulator, following standard regulatory practice as well as the regulatory framework and the Concession Contract, would consider the expected investment and operating costs, add the amortization of capital additions for the previous four years, and derive a tariff rate that would provide a normal rate of return only on the additions to the capital following the privatization. The result would be a price that would fall substantially below the long run marginal cost of the system. This is because such rates would remunerate only the capital added since privatization but not the capital already in place when the company started operations. Since, to be able to provide the service efficiently and effectively, both kinds of assets (i.e., that in place prior to privatization and the additional post-privatization) are needed, rates have to remunerate both of them.”<sup>179</sup>

230. LECG concludes,

“Adding the canon to the tariff base provides the right incentives for both consumption and investment. Consumers will be facing the long run cost of providing the system and investors will have incentives to invest.”<sup>180</sup>

231. In its reasoning, LECG ignores the current tariff level at the time that the Concession was granted. That tariff level was already in effect and future adjustments were meant precisely to remunerate the capital added since privatization. LECG's argument assumes that the current tariff would not be taken into account in the calculation of the adjustment, while the Concession Agreement considers it the base from which to start the review. The existing tariff provides the remuneration for the capital invested in the Concession ab initio.

232. Paradoxically, LECG itself seems to agree with this conclusion. When discussing the issue of the elimination of monopolistic rents through a competitive bidding process, the report adds a footnote stating that:

“Observe that although the investor bids the expected net present value of future cash flows, the investor makes money on the investment. Indeed, when discounting future cash flows, the investor uses a discount rate. This discount rate is the rate of return the investor gets on the initial investment (the canon) over the life of the concession.”<sup>181</sup>

233. The Tribunal will now analyze asset depreciation in the asset regime of the Concession Agreement.

(iv) Article 7.8

234. Article 7.8 on depreciation (“amortización”) is part of Article VII of the Concession Agreement on “Assets” (“Régimen de Bienes”). The first paragraph of this article provides for the capitalization and depreciation of assets over the term of the Concession or their useful lives whichever is shorter, with an exception which we do not need to refer to for purposes of this analysis. The assets to be capitalized and depreciated are those assets, and improvements on them, which are service-related, have been acquired or built by the Concessionaire and belong to the Concessionaire. They need to meet these three conditions. The term “belonging” is a translation of “que sean de su titularidad.” They need to be assets to which the Concessionaire has legal title. Article 7.2 on “Title” distinguishes between the possession of assets received by the Concessionaire from the Province and assets and movable assets and real property acquired or constructed during the term of the Concession which shall be owned by the Concessionaire. Title to these assets shall be recorded in the Real Property Registry and in the respective registries of movable assets. This is not the case of assets received from the Province.

235. The distinction becomes clearer when Article 7.2 and 7.8 are read together with Article 7.6 on disposition of assets. In the case of disposition of assets “owned by the Province ... the Concessionaire shall act as the Province’s agent.” This distinction then carries over to the second paragraph of Article 7.8 which establishes that, “The investments made by the Concessionaire in the assets received by [sic] [“de” in Spanish, “from” would be the correct translation] the Province upon Take Over shall be considered as acquisition of and/or upkeep costs of the Concession in accordance with provisions of clause 1.8 and shall be depreciated over the term of the Concession.” This paragraph limits the definition of investments to those made in the properties received from the Province without including the properties themselves.

236. The distinction between assets received and those acquired or improvements on the assets received carries over to the requirement for approval of acquisition and disposal of assets and how administrative silence to a request for acquisition or disposal of assets needs to be interpreted. In the case of movable assets owned by the Province, and those owned, whether movable or not, by the Claimant, silence to a request for their disposal shall be understood as approval (Article 7.6.2). On the other hand, silence by the ORAB in the case of non-movable assets registered in the name of the Province shall be understood as rejection of the request (Article 7.6.1).

237. The distinction is particularly relevant when it comes to the termination of the Concession. In the case of termination due to acts of God or force majeure (Article 14.2.1), the Province is required to pay the non-amortized value of investments and Service-related assets acquired or built by the Concessionaire in accordance with Article 7.8. Under the terms of this article, the assets received from the Province are not acquired assets. The Concessionaire did not become the owner of the assets transferred by the Province, nor did it ever have registered title to them.

238. The Claimant has argued that the existing assets at the time of the transfer and those acquired later form a unit. The argument is based on Articles 42-II and 43-II of the Law. Article 42-II provides that: “The assets that are covered by this article and which must be included in the Concession Contract are the assets the Concessionaire receives by virtue of the Contract. Also included are assets that the Concessionaire acquires or builds in order to fulfill its obligations under the Concession Contract.” Article 43-II reads as follows: “Assets that are transferred to the Concessionaire are part of a group known as the appropriated unit [‘unidad de afectación’ in Spanish].”

239. The Tribunal considers that the indivisibility of the unit has to be considered in the light of the other provisions on assets in the Concession Agreement and it cannot override the distinctions made between them regarding the ownership of assets, and their administration and disposal.

240. The Tribunal concludes after this analysis of the relevant provisions of the Law and the Concession Agreement that a harmonious interpretation of these provisions does not permit to consider the Canon as if it would be an investment not included in the existing tariff at the time of the transfer. The Tribunal has no doubt that the Canon is an investment, but, for purposes of tariff setting and amortization, the investor, in preparing the bid for the Concession, had to make a calculation of the value of the earnings stream of the Concession, and the price paid for the Concession was the result of this calculation. It is interesting to note, in that regard, that the Claimant seems to be the only bidder to have interpreted Circular 52(A) as it did, the other bidders presenting canons with values at least ten times lower than that submitted by the Claimant.

241. While the principle of amortization may have applied to the initial Canon as a matter of principle, whether it was amortized or not during the duration of the Concession would depend on whether the Concessionaire had estimated correctly the worth of the future earnings of the Concession based on the initial tariff and the discount rate to be applied to this estimate of future earnings. The discount rate used by the Claimant in the preparation of the bid was the rate of return on the Canon as an “investment”. This seems to be inherent to a price cap concession regime and the terms of the Concession Agreement.

242. To conclude the consideration of the issue of Canon recovery, the Tribunal refers to the statement made by Argentina that the Tribunal may have erred by disregarding the irregularities of Article 12.1.1 in affirming its jurisdiction. According to Argentina, the Tribunal took this Article as a decisive factor in its decision. The Respondent refers specifically to paragraph 62 of the decision on jurisdiction, which reads as follows:

“The Tribunal finds difficulty in following the Respondent’s reasoning on the basis of the definition of investment in Article 1.1(a) of the BIT. First, a concession contract, such as that entered by ABA with the Province, qualifies as an investment for purposes of the BIT given the wide meaning conferred upon this term in the BIT that includes “any right conferred by law or contract.” The Concession Agreement itself refers repeatedly to investments. For instance, in the context of the determination of the tariff level, the Concession Agreement refers to “a reasonable return on the amounts invested by the Concessionaire,” [Article 12.1.1] and “the Concessionaire does hereby undertake to make all necessary investments to execute... [Article 7.8]”

243. In that paragraph, the Tribunal refers to Article 12.1.1 as an example of references to investments for purposes of the definition of this term under the BIT. The reasoning of the Tribunal would be the same without this example, which is not the only example in the paragraph. The other example, Article 7.8, has not been questioned by the Respondent. It should be apparent from the preceding discussion that what is an investment under the BIT and what is a recoverable investment under the Concession Agreement are different matters, and that whether an investment is or is not recoverable may be irrelevant for purposes of it being considered an investment under the BIT.

8. Termination

(a) Introduction

244. As has already been noted, ABA requested the Province to cure its breaches of the Concession Agreement on July 18, 2001. The Province replied on August 29, 2001 denying any wrongdoing; in particular, the letter denied the right of the Concessionaire to recover its investment, including the initial Canon. On October 5, 2001, ABA terminated the Concession Agreement. On November 1, 2001, the Province issued an Executive Order rejecting the termination of the Concession Agreement and ordering ABA to cease and desist from claiming that it had terminated the Concession Agreement, and to refrain from engaging in conduct that would disturb the provision of the service.

245. ABA filed for bankruptcy reorganization proceedings on February 26, 2002. On March 7, 2002, the Province deemed that ABA had abandoned the service. On March 12, 2002, the Province terminated the Concession Agreement alleging ABA's fault: non-fulfillment of service expansion and quality goals, fines imposed on ABA, difficulties of ABA in obtaining chemical supplies in February 2002 and paying for electric power, Enron's bankruptcy and service abandonment. On March 15, 2002, ABA delivered the service to the Province.

(b) Positions of the Parties

246. The Claimant has asserted that Article 48-II of the Law expressly delegated the definition of the right to terminate the Concession to the Concession Agreement, and that Article 14.1.4 of the Concession Agreement did not require the intervention of any authority to be terminated. On the other hand, Article 14.4.4 provides for court intervention for purposes of the reception of the service. Thus, concludes the Claimant, when the Province had considered it necessary to include reference to court intervention, it did so.<sup>182</sup>

247. The Claimant also addresses the need for the competent authorities to intervene in case of termination of a concession required by Article 49-II of the Law.

According to the Claimant, this Article has to be construed appropriately and can “only be interpreted as appointing the competent governmental authorities for the purposes of declaring termination of the Concession Agreement upon the occurrence of events allowing the grantor its right of termination [...] It cannot be construed as a reference to termination when it is not declared by ‘an authority’”.<sup>183</sup>

248. The Claimant also draws the attention of the Tribunal to the different treatment of termination on account of the grantor’s fault in the case of the Concession Agreement as compared to other concession agreements previously entered into by the Province and in which intervention of the courts is required to declare the agreement terminated in the event of resistance on the part of the Province. The Claimant draws the conclusion that these previous agreements were taken into account by provincial officials in drafting the Concession Agreement and departed from them, inter alia, in respect of the Concessionaire’s right to terminate the Concession Agreement.<sup>184</sup>

249. The Claimant maintains that the many serious breaches of the Concession Agreement caused an irreversible imbalance of the economics of the Concession and that, in these circumstances, the demand by the Government that ABA continue to provide the service and complying with the expansion goals constituted overt and unwarranted abuse of its rights.<sup>185</sup> On the basis of Professor Fernández’s legal opinion, the Claimant affirms that, if it were not possible for the Concessionaire to terminate the Concession Agreement unilaterally without further intervention of the Province the contractual provision would lack any practical application; because the final settlement of this matter would be entirely left to the discretion of the Government, ignoring what the law specifically intended to avoid.<sup>186</sup> The same expert considers that:

“whenever the Law or the agreement recognizes in contractors the right to terminate said agreement, the general rule that sets forth that the termination of the agreement always requires a formal pronouncement by the Government must be replaced by the maxim exceptio non adimpleti contractus, as the only possible way of avoiding an abuse by the Government under this rule, disregarding the contents of its provisions and forcing the contractor into a ruinous situation.”<sup>187</sup>

250. The Claimant adduces extensive doctrinal opinion and Argentine and European administrative case law to defend the applicability of the exceptio non adimpleti contractus to the termination of the Concession Agreement.<sup>188</sup> The Claimant also refers to Aucoven where the arbitral tribunal, when faced with a similar situation found that, if the parties had intended to subject the termination of the concession agreement to a ruling by a judicial body, they would have expressly referred to such requirement in the clause in question.<sup>189</sup> The Claimant further argues that, if Article 14.1.4 is ambiguous, then it should be construed against its drafter.<sup>190</sup>

251. According to the Claimant, the Province fabricated a case against Azurix to hide its own breaches while the Concessionaire continued to provide the service. The Concessionaire informed the Province on the day of the termination that it would continue to provide service for 90 days. In fact, it provided it for more than five months, which proves that the Concessionaire did not abandon the Concession.<sup>191</sup>

252. The Claimant draws the attention of the Tribunal to the fact that the Respondent continued to take measures that have aggravated the situation notwithstanding the Tribunal’s order to refrain from doing so. In particular, the Province indicated that it would not approve ABA’s proposal to creditors, collected payments of ABA’s customers, and cashed ABA’s and OBA’s performance bonds.<sup>192</sup>

253. The Respondent argues that the Province had the exclusive power to terminate the Concession, that the Concessionaire had to request termination from the Province and, if the Province denied it, then the Concessionaire could file an action in the local courts to seek a judgment declaring contractual termination. In fact, ABA lodged an appeal against the Province’s termination before the Argentine Courts.

According to Argentina's expert, Dr. Solomoni, Article 14.1.4 does not authorize the Concessionaire to declare the Concession Agreement terminated but it regulates the Province's prerogative to terminate the Concession Agreement even in the event of non-compliance by the Province. The Respondent alleges that the defense of the Claimant based on the exceptio non adimpleti contractus is not applicable here because it was never used by ABA when it defended its action. ABA always maintained that it had the right to terminate the Concession Agreement unilaterally.<sup>193</sup>

254. The Respondent also raises the issue of a conflict between the BIT and human rights treaties that protect consumers' rights. According to Argentina's expert, a conflict between a BIT and human rights treaties must be resolved in favor of human rights because the consumers' public interest must prevail over the private interest of service provider.<sup>194</sup> On this point, the Claimant argues that the user's rights were duly protected by the provisions made in the Concession Agreement and the Province fails to prove how said rights were affected by the termination.<sup>195</sup>

255. Article 14.1.4 – Termination due to Fault of the Granting Authority - reads as follows in the translation furnished by the Claimant:<sup>196</sup>

“The Concessionaire may claim termination of the Agreement based on the Concession Grantor's fault where a rule, act, fact or omission by the Concession Grantor results in a substantial noncompliance with the obligations undertaken by the Concession Grantor under the Agreement reasonably impairing its performance.

In such event, within thirty (30) days from knowledge or occurrence of said event, the Concessionaire shall demand the Concession Grantor to cease such noncompliance, and grant a reasonable term of at least thirty (30) days. In the event that Grantor fails to observe its obligations, the Agreement shall terminate.”

256. The Tribunal notes first that the last sentence quoted is not an accurate translation from the original Spanish version, which reads: “En el supuesto que el Concedente no cumpla con sus obligaciones, deberá declarar rescindido el Contrato.”

257. The Claimant has read this sentence as if the subject of the verb “deberá” were the Concessionaire. However, the Concessionaire is not mentioned at all in the sentence and it is more logical to consider the “Concedente” (the Grantor) as the subject. This reading is consistent with the first paragraph of the Article which refers to the ability of the Concessionaire to request the termination of the Agreement (“podrá solicitar”). The mandatory use of “deberá” (“shall”) would also seem to refer to the obligation of the Grantor since the Concessionaire may or may not wish to pursue its right. If the subject of the sentence were the Concessionaire, the term “may” would have been more appropriate.

258. This interpretation fits with Article 49-II of the Law that provides:

“The rescission of the contract or the salvaging of the services must be resolved by the Provincial Executive Authority with the intervention of ORAB.”

This text does not differentiate between rescission at the initiative or the nonperformance of one or the other of the parties. In all cases, the issue must be resolved by the Grantor. In the specific case of the Concession Agreement, the Grantor had no alternative but to declare the termination if its noncompliance continued, but this is where the parties disagreed. Both parties alleged noncompliance as a cause for their respective rescission of the Concession Agreement.

259. The above interpretation does not match the procedure for the rescission of the Concession Agreement on grounds of the Grantor’s fault in Article 14.4.4. When the Concession Agreement is terminated because of the Concessionaire’s fault, Article 14.4.3 provides that the Concessionaire shall deliver the service once it has been notified of the decree of the Grantor terminating the Concession. In contrast, Article 14.4.4 does not refer to any administrative act of the Grantor to rescind the Concession Agreement. It simply states that “Once the Contract shall have been terminated because of the Grantor’s fault...” without indicating by whom or by what action. The comparison of the two provisions seems to reflect the difference between the procedure to be followed by a public authority which acts through decrees and resolutions and a private party which may simply notify the Grantor.

260. The difficulty in interpreting the provisions of Article 14 harmoniously is compounded by Article 49-II of the Law which, as already noted, prescribes that termination “must be resolved by the Provincial Executive Authority with the intervention of ORAB.” The Law does not distinguish between termination by the Grantor or the Concessionaire. It would seem appropriate that the Concession Agreement be interpreted consistently with the provisions of the Law. On the other hand, the Tribunal cannot ignore the practical result of this interpretation: if taken to the extreme, a concessionaire would be obliged to continue to provide the service indefinitely at the discretion of the government and its right to terminate the Concession Agreement would be deprived of any content. For this reason, the application of the maxim exceptio non adimpleti contractus provides a balance to the relationship between the government and the concessionaire. The Tribunal considers it immaterial whether ABA raised this defense in its recourse to the Argentine courts. The Tribunal is assessing the conduct of the Respondent and its instrumentalities in the exercise of its public authority against the standards of protection of foreign investors agreed in the BIT, and the application of the maxim exceptio non adimpleti contractus has been raised by the Claimant in these proceedings. This exception is not unknown to Argentine law and to legal systems generally as it is a reflection of the principle of good faith. The Tribunal will take it into account when evaluating the actions of the Province under the standards of protection.

261. The Respondent has also raised the issue of the compatibility of the BIT with human rights treaties. The matter has not been fully argued and the Tribunal fails to understand the incompatibility in the specifics of the instant case. The services to consumers continued to be provided without interruption by ABA during five months after the termination notice and through the new provincial utility after the transfer of service.

9. Conduct of the Province after Service Transfer

(a) Positions of the Parties

262. The Claimant points out that, on March 20, 2002, the ORAB issued Resolution 20/02 preventing ABA from collecting amounts owed in its accounts receivables for services provided prior to the date the service was transferred. Two days later an announcement in the press advised the public that all amounts payable to ABA for service before March 7, 2002 and not yet paid should be paid to the new service provider, and that payments made to ABA would not be honored. ABA requested the bankruptcy court to issue a protective measure. This measure was issued on June 4, 2002, “ordering the appropriate entities and agencies to refrain from collecting payments on invoices issued for services rendered by Azurix during periods preceding March 7, 2002, which shall only be paid to the debtor in these reorganization proceedings, at the domicile of such company. Furthermore, in the event that payments have already been collected on any such invoice, the appropriate entities shall deposit such amounts into an account opened for these proceedings and all other amounts shall be deposited at the Tribunales branch of Banco de la Ciudad de Buenos Aires.”<sup>197</sup>

263. The Claimant notes that only one sanction had been imposed on ABA before the letter of July 18, 2001. Thereafter, there was a radical change and numerous penalties were levied against ABA as a clear harassment by the Province. The ORAB continued to impose sanctions on ABA even after the service was transferred. The Province was driven by the bankruptcy proceedings and the deadline to request the court to allow their claims. The deadline was June 3, 2002 and on such date the Province and its instrumentalities filed claims for AR$187 million and US$2.85 million as compared to AR$15 million by all other creditors. The Claimant points out that the claims were filed four days before ABA itself was notified by Resolution No. 46/02, dated June 7, 2002, and that ABA was denied access to the documentation on which the penalty was based and an extension of the deadline to file an appeal. ABA filed an appeal to the trustee in bankruptcy who, according to the Claimant, considered most of the claims without merit.<sup>198</sup>

264. Based on the report of the University of La Plata (“UNLP Report”),<sup>199</sup> the ORAB adopted Resolution No. 52/02 approving the final credit and debit account of the Concession resulting in a credit of the Province against ABA of AR$640 million. According to the Claimant, the supporting documentation and a request for an extension of the deadline to file an appeal were denied. ABA filed an appeal on September 30, 2002 based on the hypothetical nature of the claims and their lack of grounds. Specifically, the Claimant alleges that damages concerning assets were estimated even though the ORAB never made the inventory required by Sections 14.4.3 and 14.4.4 of the Concession Agreement; the cost of new water and sewage connections were claimed although the Province released the new provider of making such investments; obligations not enforceable until years 3 and 5 of the Concession were considered unfulfilled and related damages were claimed; and damages concerning the same assets were duplicated. Furthermore, the credit and debit account includes hypothetical damages such as the loss in tax collections caused by the loss of possible increases in real estate properties value due to the interruption of the POES, the cost of a new bidding for the Concession which was never organized, increases in tax collection that the Province could have obtained from hotel, restaurant and tourism activities if ABA had continued as Concessionaire for 30 years.<sup>200</sup>

265. In the Counter-Memorial, the Respondent contests that the penalties reflected anything more than the non-performance of ABA. The Respondent notes first that the Claimant had failed to indicate to the Tribunal that ABA had a penalty holiday of six months after the takeover of the Concession. This grace period was a change introduced to the model contract included in the Bidding Documents. There was no doubt that such grace period was not part of the draft contract as confirmed by a reply of the Privatization Commission to a question.<sup>201</sup> The Respondent cites two other penalties imposed on ABA by Resolution No. 34/00 and Resolution No. 50/00. The

Respondent points out that before imposing a penalty ORAB had to determine non-performance and follow the pertinent administrative proceedings. It was not a hostile attitude but respect for the administrative procedures to impose sanctions.<sup>202</sup>

266. According to the Respondent and on the basis of the UNLP Report, the damages to be borne by the Province as a result of failure to meet the goals undertaken in the POES and termination of the Concession Agreement for causes attributable to ABA exceeded AR$149 million and the economic impact of the environmental damages caused by ABA amounted to over AR$467 million.<sup>203</sup> The Respondent observes that, in the statement of credits in favor of the Province, the amount collected for service prior to March 7, 2002 has been taken into account and that the relevant protective measure was revoked on appeal by the Commercial Court of Appeal. The Respondent also notes that ABA brought an action against Decree 508/02 terminating the Concession Agreement before the Supreme Court of the Province.<sup>204</sup>

267. In its Reply, the Claimant alleges that the sanctions imposed on ABA were part of a strategy to overwhelm Azurix's claim in these proceedings. They were a set of measures taken in a wider context of abusive measures by the Province and Argentina, including measures taken after the Decision on Provisional Measures of this Tribunal.<sup>205</sup>

268. In its analysis of the penalties imposed, the Claimant finds that: (i) 14 out of 16 fines were imposed after the termination of the Concession Agreement by ABA, (ii) during the two months that Decrees No. 2598/01 and 3039/01 were issued, ABA was fined seven times for a total of US$555,000, (iii) seven more fines were imposed after the transfer of the service for a total of US$1,960,000, and (iv) four fines for a total of US$1,800,000 were levied between the filing of reorganization proceedings and the deadline for creditors to file a petition for allowance of claims.<sup>206</sup>

269. The Claimant points out, in particular, that the fine for the violation of biological parameters in Bahía Blanca related to an incident that happened in April 2000 and ORAB did not file the charge until August 2001, and that in the case of 14 out of 16 fines, the drafts were prepared from July 2001 onwards.<sup>207</sup>

270. The Claimant observes that the six-month grace period is customary in this type of agreements to allow the concessionaires to adapt to the poor service management conditions that existed before privatization.<sup>208</sup>

271. In the Rejoinder, the Respondent enumerates 12 procedures underway at the time when ABA terminated the Concession Agreement to show that the process had started long before July 18, 2001 and before the penalties were imposed. The failures of ABA range from the breakage of an aqueduct, to over billing, breakage of a master pipe, deficiencies in operation and reconditioning of effluent purifying plants, lack of water quality standards at Bahía Blanca and Vedia.<sup>209</sup> According to the Respondent, every single fine was imposed for a specific violation of the Concession Agreement by ABA. It was ABA that was exclusively responsible for supplying drinking water that met the quality and standards agreed in the Concession agreement and for performing under the POES.<sup>210</sup>

272. The Respondent further notes that the Claimant in its Reply did not refer to the specific grounds of termination set forth in Decree 508/02, nor the effect of ABA's filing for bankruptcy and ENRON's bankruptcy on the Concession Agreement, nor ABA's filing against Decree 508/02.<sup>211</sup>

273. As to the damage sustained by the Province, the Respondent defends the calculation of the economic impact of the termination of the Concession as part of the damages for which ABA is liable and quotes from the UNLP Report: "The reasons that led the Province to start the bidding process – in which Azurix voluntarily submitted its bid – were to achieve positive environmental, sanitary, economic, fiscal, and operating results. All these privatization purposes may be assessed in economic terms. Azurix assessed them in order to submit the bid that secured Azurix the award of the contract; and the Province should assess them in order to determine the costs of the failure and seek fair compensation."<sup>212</sup>

274. The Respondent concludes on this point by observing that the allowance of the Province's claim against ABA has yet to be adjudicated by the bankruptcy court.<sup>213</sup>

275. The Claimant has not questioned the underlying reasons for the penalties except in the case of Bahía Blanca and the fines and claims taken into account in the credit and debit account of the Concession, in particular the claims based on the UNLP Report. As noted by the Claimant, it is striking to note the contrast of administrative speed with which the fines and claims were processed after ABA gave notice of termination of the Concession and the deliberate pace with which other administrative matters were handled such as the construction variations or the valuations 2000. The Tribunal is surprised that the underlying documentation on which Resolutions 46/02 and 52/02 were based would be denied to ABA for purposes of filing an administrative appeal. The Tribunal is equally surprised that damages against ABA would be assessed in part on considerations that do not find any basis in the Concession Agreement or the Law.

VII. Breach of the BIT

1. Expropriation without compensation

(a) Positions of the Parties

276. Azurix claims that its investment, the Concession Agreement, has been expropriated as a result of "measures tantamount to expropriation". For Azurix, what is important is not the form of the measures or their intent but their consequences. Azurix argues that the expropriation of its contract rights – and contract rights are included in the definition of investment - is the consequence of a series of acts that alone may not be sufficient to constitute expropriation but taken together constitute creeping

expropriation. Based on a review of case law and authorities, the Claimant defines this type of expropriation as “unreasonable or incidental interference that significantly deprives an owner of the control, use, benefits, enjoyment, access to, or reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefits of property, rights or interests to an extent that is more than ephemeral.”<sup>214</sup> Azurix notes that public utility companies are particularly exposed to this type of measures because the privatizing State “may be tempted to exploit the company once it has constructed a water system. When the water system is built the company can no longer walk away and take the pipelines with it, but is at the mercy of the regulator.”<sup>215</sup> The Claimant further observes that “The political capture of rents is equivalent to asset expropriation, as the company – whether public or private – will be unable to reap the rewards associated with those sunk costs.”<sup>216</sup>

277. According to Azurix, the Province took away Azurix’s rights under the tariff regime of the Concession, compromised the ability of ABA to obtain financing, saddled ABA with unexpected expenses by not finishing the promised infrastructure included in Circular 31(A), and took away Azurix’s right to recover fully the Canon. After paying for the Concession, “Provincial officials used Azurix’s investment as their personal ‘whipping boy’ to stir the pot of ratepayer anger caused by years of neglect of the water infrastructure and misdirect it towards ABA.” The Province broke the Regulatory Compact and signaled that it was not committed to a sustainable Concession. To conclude, “Under any plausible construction of expropriation, the Province and the Republic deprived Azurix of the use and enjoyment of the reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefits of the Concession and expropriated its investments.”<sup>217</sup>

278. The Respondent contests the definition of creeping expropriation arrived at by the Claimant. The Respondent argues that a central aspect of the test related to the notion of unlawfulness or unreasonableness is missing in that definition: “only if Buenos Aires Province has ignored ABA’s contractual rights may an evaluation be made about whether or not an expropriation has occurred. If Buenos Aires Province has

not ignored Azurix's contractual rights, there is no expropriation to complain about."<sup>218</sup> According to the Respondent, the Province acted at all times in accordance with the Law and the Concession Agreement. On the other hand, there has been a gradual violation of both by ABA which, from the beginning, attempted to renegotiate the Concession Agreement under more convenient terms to its own satisfaction and has failed to meet its obligations under the POES. According to Argentina, citing Lauder and S.D. Myers, in order to determine whether or not an expropriation has occurred the government's intention may not be disregarded:

"Detrimental effect on the economic value of property is not sufficient; Parties to [the Bilateral Treaty] are not liable for economic injury that is the consequence of bona fide regulation within the accepted police powers of the State."<sup>219</sup>

"Both words ['tantamount' and 'expropriation'] require a tribunal to look at the substance of what occurred and not only at form. A tribunal should not be deterred by technical or facial considerations from reaching a conclusion that an expropriation has occurred. It must look at the real interests involved and the purpose and effect of the government measure." (emphasis added by the Respondent).<sup>220</sup>

279. The Respondent argues that respecting a contract may never be held to be an expropriation. The Concession Agreement stipulated the tariff structure for the entire term of the Concession, "an error in the Concession fee calculation might not be invoked for amending the tariffs."<sup>221</sup> If investment risk in the case of utilities is usually considered low, as stated by Azurix, this is because the utility provider knows "in advance the tariff regime to be applied throughout the term of the concession before submitting the Offer."<sup>222</sup>

280. The Respondent affirms that the sunken cost argument made by Azurix does not apply in this case; it was the Province that installed the infrastructure and the fee paid was to exercise “the natural monopoly facilitated by the investment previously made by the State.”<sup>223</sup>

281. The Respondent comments in relation to the tariff conflicts that, except in one case, they all referred to the non-metered regime which was a temporary regime, and, as regards the exception, no damage occurred because the tariff increase sought was based on a cost increase that never existed. The Respondent refers again to S.D. Myers where the tribunal held, on the facts of the case that a temporary measure should not be characterized as an expropriation, “the evidence did not support a transfer of property or benefit directly to others, simply an opportunity was delayed”.<sup>224</sup> The Respondent points out that a reasonable period of time needs to pass to examine whether or not measures actually have the expropriating effect attributed to them, and that time is also important to determine when the expropriation took place:

“According to Azurix’s conduct ... the investment conflict had already arisen by January 5, 2001, that is to say only a few months after having executed the contract. This position is untenable and purely speculative. The operability of a Concession such as Azurix had in its hand is not defined in less than eighteen months. Moreover, validating the way Azurix acted would mean rewarding self-fulfilling prophecies. Azurix could not have negotiated in good faith because the investment conflict it was claiming could not have possibly arisen.”<sup>225</sup>

282. In the Reply, the Claimant argues that the measures alleged to constitute tantamount to expropriation are not limited to mere breaches of contract. The Claimant brings to the attention of the Tribunal that the tariff regime incorporated into the contract also represents “part of a regulatory system established by law whereby the regulatory agency ... -which is not a direct party to the contract – unilaterally interprets the Tariff Regime and holds the power to order the implementation of its interpretations. That is not a normal contract situation, and the refusal of the ORAB properly to interpret and implement the Tariff System is not a mere contract breach, although it does breach the contract as well.”<sup>226</sup>

283. The Claimant lists, as other measures tantamount to expropriation beyond the repudiation of the tariff regime, the repudiation by the Province of representations and assurances provided in the bidding process through circulars and information communiqués, the public call for customers not to pay their bills in August 1999 when the equalization subsidy was eliminated, the public calls by the provincial Governor and the Mayor of Bahía Blanca for users not to pay their water bills, the incorrect public statements by provincial office holders that the Concessionaire was wholly responsible for the incident, the incorrect public statements by public officials creating hysteria by suggesting that the water was toxic, the ORAB resolutions not allowing ABA to collect for its services, etc.<sup>227</sup>

284. The Claimant argues that, in any case, breaches of contract may constitute an expropriation and cites internal legislation of the United States, a party to the BIT, where it is stated that ‘any abrogation, repudiation, or impairment by a foreign government of its own contract with an investor ... and [which] materially adversely affects the continued operation of the project ...’<sup>228</sup> According to the Claimant, breach of contract or actions affecting contract rights may constitute an expropriation in certain situations: a breach of contract which is part of a series of acts that combined would have the effect of a creeping expropriation (Waste Management), a fundamental breach of contract, which goes to the heart of the performance promised and adversely affects the continued operation of the project subject of the contract (BP v. Libyan Arab Republic), regulatory conduct that denies contract rights or requires their alteration (CME v. Czech Republic), repudiation of specific contract rights or a contract as a whole (Phillips Petroleum v. Iran), and a breach of a stabilization clause in a contract (Agip v. Congo).<sup>229</sup>

285. As regards whether the deprivation of rights or benefits is ephemeral, the Claimant observes that the relevant inquiry is the duration of the deprivation of rights or benefits, nor the duration of the expropriatory acts themselves. First, there is no set duration for a period of time to be classified as being more than ephemeral in international law. The Claimant in this respect refers to the General Conditions of Guarantee for Equity Investments of MIGA which require that the failure by an administrative agency to act remain uncured for one year. Second, the measures of the Province were permanent measures: ABA was permanently deprived from its right to eliminate the zoning subsidy, so were the repudiation of Circular 52(A) and the contract rights embodied in Articles 7.8 and 12.1.1 of the Concession Agreement to treat the Canon payment as an investment, the actions of the Province resulted in the permanent denial of multilateral financing, the Province permanently refused to return the unamortized portion of the Canon payment, the Province permanently repudiated the contractual rights to calculate tariffs in US dollars and to index the tariffs by US indexes. The effect of these measures was to drive ABA into bankruptcy and permanently put it out of business.<sup>230</sup>

286. According to the Claimant the notion advanced by the Respondent - that there cannot be an expropriation without an effect on an investor's contractual rights - ignores the authorities and the case law. According to the Claimant, "Conduct contrary to an investor's legitimate expectations that constitute a norm or were induced by the government also can amount to expropriation."<sup>231</sup> The Claimant refers to a long line of case law to prove this point, "Middle East Cement, Goetz, Metalclad, Tecmed, and other recent cases, "demonstrate that a State's actions need not affect formal contractual rights in order to constitute expropriation. Contrary to the GOA's assertions, the case law shows that actions that have the effect of depriving a foreign investor of the 'reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit' of an investment can amount to an expropriation even if the actions do not affect or alter contract rights."<sup>232</sup>

287. According to the Claimant, expropriation also exists when a State repudiates former assurances or refuses to give assurances that it will comply with its obligations, “which deprives the investor, in whole or significant part, of the use or reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit of its investment constitutes an expropriation. Similarly, Azurix was deprived of the reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit of its investment in the Concession and is entitled to compensation for this expropriation.”<sup>233</sup>

288. The Claimant alleges also loss of control of its investment as grounds for expropriation. The effect of the measures taken not only took away the financial benefits from the Concession by making it unsustainable, but also stripped the investment of its legal security. The Claimant relies in particular on Revere where the tribunal held that “the government’s actions were expropriatory because they repudiated contract rights resulting in the inability of the investor to make rational, calculated decisions based on known contract rights, thus causing the investor to lose control of the investment.”<sup>234</sup>

289. The Respondent in its Rejoinder explains that its reference to contract rights in the Counter-Memorial was motivated by the fact that Azurix had based its claims on breaches of contract rights. The Respondent then relies on Serbian Loans, Woofruff, ELSI and, in particular, Vivendi, SGS v. Pakistan and SGS v. Philippines to contest that contractual claims should be heard before arbitral tribunals. It is clear, according to the Respondent, that “arbitration tribunals do not accept hearing domestic contractual claims as if they were genuine international claims.”<sup>235</sup> According to the Respondent, if “the Tribunal understood the substance of the claim in the way Azurix does, said Tribunal would lack jurisdiction and the award would be clearly null.”<sup>236</sup>

290. The Respondent then alleges that Azurix introduces a confusion by contending that umbrella clauses apply beyond specific investment agreements, in reality, these clauses can only be applied in case of an investment agreement breach but not for a breach of a concession agreement governed by the domestic and administrative law agreed in the forum clause: “Azurix intently confuses Investment Agreement with investment, terms that are not equivalent or amalgamable.”<sup>237</sup>

291. Argentina also argues against a pro-investor interpretation of the BIT. By protecting investors and investment broadly, the treaties would come to be regarded as guarantees and assurances, eliminating the notion of risk and venture as stated by the tribunal in Tecmed. According to Argentina, in this case the tribunal had, “to consider the elements forming the standard banning expropriation without compensation, it was far from claiming broad and vague interpretative assumptions in favor of the investor based on BIT supposed purposes. On the contrary, it acknowledged the principle of deference to the State in order to define the public interest or usefulness reasons upon which its actions are founded.”<sup>238</sup>

292. Argentina alleges that, in the Reply, the Claimant tries to reformulate the standard so that it can be read “exactly in the same way as what is under the protection of the general clauses (umbrella clauses).” According to Argentina, the Claimant alleges that some of the actions were expropriatory per se. The Respondent explains that in a progressive expropriation no action in itself is expropriatory. The Respondent relies on the dissident opinion of Keith Highet in Waste Management:

“a ‘creeping expropriation’ is comprised of a number of elements, none of which can - separately – constitute the international wrong. These constituent elements include non-payment, non-reimbursement, cancellation, denial of judicial access, actual practice to exclude, non-conforming treatment, inconsistent legal blocks, and so forth. The ‘measure’ at issue is the expropriation itself; it is not merely a sub-component part of expropriation.”<sup>239</sup>

293. The Respondent also quotes from Santa Elena,

“As it is well known, there is a wide spectrum of measures that a state may take in asserting control over property, extending from limited regulation of its use to a complete and formal deprivation of the owner’s legal title. Likewise, the period of

time involved in the process may vary – from an immediate and comprehensive taking to one that gradually and by small steps reaches a condition in which it can be said that the owner has truly lost all attributes of ownership. It is clear, however, that a measure or a series of measures can still eventually amount to a taking though the individual steps in the process do not formally purport to amount to a taking or to a transfer of title. What has to be identified is the extent to which the measures taken have deprived the owner of the normal control of his property.”<sup>240</sup>

294. Furthermore, according to the Respondent, in a creeping expropriation what matters is not the duration of the effects but the intensity of the expropriatory process. The Respondent contests the affirmation by the Claimant that international law fixes an exact limit as regards when to determine a creeping expropriation, only a reasonable period of time is required. The Respondent also contests the interpretation of MIGA’s General Conditions and observes that they have been only partially quoted by the Claimant. These Conditions require that, for some measures, the company concerned should not have been able, for three years, to operate without losses. In any case, the time would run from the measure that culminates in the expropriation, since none of the preceding measures per se constituted expropriation.

295. The Respondent concludes that the individual effect of each measure may never be expropriatory; to determine if a series of measures has an expropriatory effect, the intensity of the process globally considered should be measured; the expropriatory effect should have lasted until it consolidated and could be considered a permanent effect; the set time to lapse is not defined by international law as an algorithm, but it requires the passing of reasonable time.<sup>241</sup>

296. The Respondent disagrees with Azurix’s insistence exclusively on the effect of the measures as the key element to determine whether an expropriation has occurred. There is another element. The investor needs to have a right to the specific treatment expected, “If there is no legal right to be treated in a specific manner, no

expropriation can be considered when someone is treated according to the law.” In this respect, the Respondent refers to the tribunal’s finding in Feldman that NAFTA and principles of customary international law do not require a State to permit a gray market of cigarette exports. Mexican law did not afford cigarette resellers a right to export cigarettes and the claimant’s investment remained under its complete control and with the right to export other Mexican products.<sup>242</sup>

297. Furthermore, the Respondent argues that the effect and intent of measures cannot be separated as Azurix has done. The intent is important to differentiate between legitimate regulation and confiscatory regulation. The Respondent refers approvingly to the statement in Feldman that,

“not all government regulatory activity that makes it difficult or impossible for an investor to carry out a particular business, change in the law or change in the application of existing laws that makes it uneconomical to continue a particular business, is an expropriation under Article 1110. Governments, in their exercise of regulatory power, frequently change their laws and regulations in response to changing economic circumstances or changing political, economic or social considerations. Those changes may well make certain activities less profitable or even uneconomic to continue.”<sup>243</sup>

298. The Respondent further refers to Generation Ukraine,

“Predictability is one of the most important objectives of any legal system. It would be useful if it were absolutely clear in advance whether particular events fall within the definition of an ‘indirect’ expropriation. It would enhance the sentiment of respect for legitimate expectations if it were perfectly obvious why, in the context of a particular decision, an arbitration tribunal found that a governmental action or inaction crossed the line that defines acts amounting to an indirect expropriation. But there is no checklist, no mechanical test to achieve that purpose. The decisive considerations vary from case to case, depending not only on the specific facts of a grievance but also on the way the evidence is presented, and the legal bases pleaded. The outcome is a judgment, i.e., the product of discernment, and not the printout of a computer program.”<sup>244</sup>

299. Faced with the task of judging, the tribunal in Generation Ukraine, set some negative criteria that the Respondent quotes as supporting its argument that mere effect is not enough:

“The fact that an investment has become worthless obviously does not mean that there was an act of expropriation; investment always entails risk. Nor is it sufficient for the disappointed investor to point to some governmental initiative, or inaction, which might have contributed to its ill fortune. Yet again, it is not enough for an investor to seize upon an act of maladministration, no matter how low the level of the relevant governmental authority; to abandon his investment without any effort at overturning the administrative fault; and thus to claim an international delict on the theory that there had been an uncompensated virtual expropriation. In such instances, an international tribunal may deem that the failure to seek redress from national authorities disqualifies the international claim, not because there is a requirement of exhaustion of local remedies but because the very reality of conduct tantamount to expropriation is doubtful in the absence of a reasonable – not necessarily exhaustive – effort by the investor to obtain correction.”

300. And further,

“There is, of course, no formal obligation upon the Claimant to exhaust local remedies before resorting to ICSID arbitration pursuant to the BIT. Nevertheless, in the absence of any per se violation of the BIT discernible from the relevant conduct of the Kyiv City State Administration, the only possibility in this case for the series of complaints relating to highly technical matters of Ukrainian planning law to be transformed into a BIT violation would have been for the Claimant to be denied justice before the Ukrainian courts in a bona fide attempt to resolve these technical matters.”<sup>245</sup>

301. Argentina agrees with this consideration of the tribunal “to avoid becoming an administrative tribunal that conscientiously goes through the actions and omissions of the host State administrative bodies.”<sup>246</sup>

302. As regards the protection of the investor’s expectations, the Respondent affirms that the cases adduced by the Claimant do not support the Claimant’s contentions because Azurix’s claim is based completely on alleged contractual breaches by the Province.<sup>247</sup> Addressing the specific cases, Argentina argues that the Aminoil tribunal never analyzed whether Kuwait had expropriated legitimate expectations from the private petroleum company, but it considered that contractual rights have been expropriated. Legitimate expectations are not the basis for expropriation but the measure of compensation. Argentina considers that the same is true of Middle East Cement. This case simply shows that the contractual rights of the investor are able to be expropriated even when a contract has not been formally terminated and its contractual rights had been de facto revoked. Argentina points out that, in Goetz, the tribunal did not make a finding regarding legitimate expectations, but whether rights conferred by a unilateral act –such as granting of a license- can also be expropriated. Argentina considers that Metalclad and Tecmed are not applicable because in neither of these cases Mexico had entered into a contract with the investor and hence it was impossible for the tribunals to decide in favor of the expropriation of contractual rights.<sup>248</sup>

303. The Respondent emphasizes that there were no contractual breaches by the Province and that, if there had been, as held in Waste Management, contractual breaches did not generate international responsibility:

“In the Tribunal’s view, an enterprise is not expropriated just because its debts are not paid or other contractual obligations towards it are breached. There was no outright repudiation of the transaction in the present case, and if the City entered into the Concession Agreement on the basis of an over-optimistic assessment of the possibilities, so did Acaverde. It is not the function of Article

1110 to compensate for failed business ventures, absent arbitrary intervention by the State amounting to a virtual taking or sterilising of the enterprise.”<sup>249</sup>

304. And,

305. The Respondent concludes by referring to the Regulatory Framework, the Bidding Conditions and the Concession Agreement. The Respondent affirms that the circulars and information communiqués had no power to modify substantially the established contractual system, which had been known and accepted by Azurix and ABA and hence “it is not possible that Azurix may construe, in good faith, that there had been alleged rights or expectations, which are manifestly in conflict with this normative system.”<sup>251</sup>

306. The parties’ arguments raise issues ranging from whether the BIT should be interpreted in favor of the investor to the requirements of expropriation measures in terms of effect, intention and duration, and whether such measures may, or may not necessarily, be contractual breaches which cumulatively may be tantamount to expropriation or the taking of the benefits legitimately expected by the investor. The Tribunal will now address these arguments in that order.

307. The Tribunal does not consider that the BIT should be interpreted in favor or against the investor. The BIT is an international treaty and should be interpreted in accordance with the interpretation norms set forth by the Vienna Convention on the Law of the Treaties (“the Vienna Convention”), which is binding on the States parties to the BIT. Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention requires that a treaty be “interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in light of its object and purpose.” The Tribunal observes that the BIT itself is an instrument agreed by the two State parties to encourage and protect investment. In the preamble of the BIT, the parties agreed that “fair and equitable treatment of investment is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment and maximum effective use of economic resources”. Therefore, the BIT itself is a document that requires certain treatment of investment which the parties have considered necessary to “stimulate the flow of private capital”. The Tribunal in interpreting the BIT must be mindful of the objective the parties intended to pursue by concluding it.

(ii) Effect, Intent and Duration of Expropriation Measures

308. The parties agree that cumulative steps which individually may not qualify as an expropriating measure may have the effect equivalent to an outright expropriation. The parties also agree on the varied nature of possible steps, including breach of contract: the Respondent affirms that if the Province had “ignored ABA’s contractual rights an evaluation could be made about whether or not an expropriation has occurred.”<sup>252</sup> The Respondent has adduced Mr. Highet’s definition of creeping expropriation, which includes in the list of examples of possible constituent elements non-payment and non-reimbursement, elements which refer to contractual non-performance. On the other hand, the Respondent has also relied on holdings of the tribunal in Waste Management to the effect that breach of contract is not the same as expropriation of a contractual right.

309. The parties disagree on the relevance of taking into account the intent pursued by the measures concerned and the time needed for the measures to consolidate into a creeping expropriation. Whether to consider only the effect of measures tantamount to expropriation or consider both the effect and purpose of the measures is a point on which not only the parties disagree but also arbitral tribunals. In Santa Elena, that the Respondent found a useful point of reference for the concept of creeping expropriation, the tribunal did not take into account the environmental purpose of the expropriatory measures: “Expropriatory environmental measures – no matter how laudable and beneficial to society as a whole – are, in this respect, similar to any other expropriatory measures that a state may take in order to implement its policies: where property is expropriated, even for environmental purposes, whether domestic or international, the state’s obligation to pay compensation remains.”<sup>253</sup> The same tribunal was persuaded by the finding in Tippetts that “The intent of the government is less important than the effects of the measures on the owner, and the form of the measures of control or interference is less important than the reality of their impact.”<sup>254</sup>

310. For the Tribunal, the issue is not so much whether the measure concerned is legitimate and serves a public purpose, but whether it is a measure that, being legitimate and serving a public purpose, should give rise to a compensation claim. In the exercise of their public policy function, governments take all sorts of measures that may affect the economic value of investments without such measures giving rise to a need to compensate. The tribunal in S.D. Myers found the purpose of a regulatory measure a helpful criterion to distinguish measures for which a State would not be liable: “Parties [to the Bilateral Treaty] are not liable for economic injury that is the consequence of bona fide regulation within the accepted police powers of the State.”<sup>255</sup> This Tribunal finds the criterion insufficient and shares the concern expressed by Judge R. Higgins, who questioned whether the difference between expropriation and regulation based on public purpose was intellectually viable:

“Is not the State in both cases (that is, either by a taking for a public purpose, or by regulating) purporting to act in the common good? And in each case has the owner of the property not suffered loss? Under international law standards, a regulation that amounted (by virtue of its scope and effect) to a taking, would need to be ‘for a public purpose’ (in the sense of in general, rather than for a private interest). And just compensation would be due. At the same time, interferences with property for economic and financial regulatory purposes are tolerated to a significant extent.”<sup>256</sup>

311. The argument made by the S.D. Myers tribunal is somehow contradictory. According to it, the BIT would require that investments not be expropriated except for a public purpose and that there be compensation if such expropriation takes place and, at the same time, regulatory measures that may be tantamount to expropriation would not give rise to a claim for compensation if taken for a public purpose. The public purpose criterion as an additional criterion to the effect of the measures under consideration needs to be complemented. The parties have referred in their exchanges to findings of the tribunal in Tecmed. That tribunal sought guidance in the case law of the European Court of Human Rights, in particular, in the case of James and Others. The Court held that “a measure depriving a person of his property [must] pursue, on the facts as well as in principle, a legitimate aim ‘in the public interest’”, and bear “a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realized”. This proportionality will not be found if the person concerned bears “an individual and excessive burden”. The Court considered that such “a measure must be both appropriate for achieving its aim and not disproportionate thereto.” The Court found relevant that non-nationals “will generally have played no part in the election or designation of its [of the measure] authors nor have been consulted on its adoption”, and observed that “there may well be legitimate reason for requiring nationals to bear a greater burden in the public interest than non-nationals.”<sup>257</sup>

312. The Tribunal finds that these additional elements provide useful guidance for purposes of determining whether regulatory actions would be expropriatory and give rise to compensation.

313. The parties hold also different views on the time needed for a set of measures to have an expropriatory effect. There is no specific time set under international law for measures constituting creeping expropriation to produce that effect. It will depend on the specific circumstances of the case. Arbitral tribunals have considered that a measure is not ephemeral if the property was out of the control of the investor for a year (Wena) or an export license was suspended for four months (Middle East Cement), or that the measure was ephemeral if it lasted for three months (S.D. Myers). These cases involved a single measure. When considering multiple measures, it will depend on the duration of their cumulative effect. Unfortunately, there is no mathematical formula to reach a mechanical result. How much time is needed must be judged by the specific circumstances of each case. As expressed by the tribunal in Generation Ukraine: “The outcome is a judgment, i.e., the product of discernment, and not the printout of a computer program.”<sup>258</sup>

(iii) Breach of Contract and Expropriation

314. Whether contract rights may be expropriated is widely accepted by the case law and the doctrine. The discussion by the parties reflects more a question of whether in the specifics of the instant case the alleged breaches of the Province can be considered to be such. As repeatedly stated by the Respondent, the Province with its actions did no more than to comply with the Concession Agreement and the Regulatory Framework. Therefore, according to the Respondent, ABA was not entitled to the alleged rights which supposedly the Province ignored.

315. The Tribunal agrees that contractual breaches by a State party or one of its instrumentalities would not normally constitute expropriation. Whether one or series of such breaches can be considered to be measures tantamount to expropriation will depend on whether the State or its instrumentality has breached the contract in the exercise of its sovereign authority, or as a party to a contract. As already noted, a State or its instrumentalities may perform a contract badly, but this will not result in a breach of treaty provisions, “unless it be proved that the state or its emanation has gone beyond its role as a mere party to the contract, and has exercised the specific functions of a sovereign.”<sup>259</sup> In considering each of the grounds which the Claimant has advanced to justify its expropriation claim and to the extent that they may be characterized as breaches of the Concession Agreement, the Tribunal will assess them from the perspective of possible breaches of the BIT and of whether they reflect the exercise of specific functions of a sovereign.

316. The issue of whether an expropriation may take place without formally affecting the contract rights has been discussed by the parties in the context of the frustration of the investor’s legitimate expectations when a State repudiates former assurances, or refuses to give assurances that it will comply with its obligations depriving the investor in whole or significant part, of the use or reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit of its investment. Tecmed is a clear example in which a tribunal took into account the expectations of the investor. Argentina has dismissed the relevance of this case on the basis that Mexico had no contract with the investor. In fact, the tribunal in that case considered attributable to Mexico, as the sovereign, certain acts that frustrated the expectations generated in the investor even when Mexico was not party to the contract. That tribunal determined that the conduct of INE, the Mexican federal agency which had issued the license, was attributable to the government. Hence, the considerations of that tribunal are not without significance for these proceedings:

“The political and social circumstances [...] which conclusively conditioned the issuance of the Resolution, were shown with all their magnitude after a substantial part of the investment had been made could not have reasonably been foreseen by the Claimant with the scope, effects and consequences that those circumstances had. There is no doubt that, even if Cytrar [the vehicle used by the investor] did not have an indefinite permit but a permit renewable every year, the Claimant's expectation was that of a long-term investment relying on the recovery of its investment and the estimated return through the operation of the Landfill during its entire useful life."<sup>260</sup>

317. The tribunal then adds:

"Both the authorization to operate as landfill, dated May 1994, and the subsequent permits granted by INE, including the Permit, were based on the Environmental Impact Declaration of 1994, which projected a useful life of ten years for the Landfill [footnote deleted]. This shows that even before the Claimant made its investment, it was widely known that the investor expected its investments in the Landfill to last for a long term and that it took this into account to estimate the time and business required to recover such investment and obtain the expected return upon making its tender offer for the acquisition of the assets related to the Landfill. To evaluate if the actions attributable to the Respondent – as well as the Resolution – violate the Agreement, such expectations should be considered legitimate and should be evaluated in light of the Agreement and of international law."<sup>261</sup>

318. The expectations as shown in that case are not necessarily based on a contract but on assurances explicit or implicit, or on representations, made by the State which the investor took into account in making the investment. That tribunal, for instance, took into account the declaration of 1994 and the implicit need of a long-term operation of the landfill for the investor to be able to have a reasonable return on the expected investment even when the specific permit was only a one-year permit. In the case before this Tribunal, the Respondent has questioned that any of the alleged expectations may have been created by the Province when these expectations are in conflict with the normative system.<sup>262</sup> Whether they actually are in conflict with the normative system of the Concession and they have been frustrated to the extent of depriving the investor of the benefits of the investment is a matter that the Tribunal will now proceed to determine.

319. The measures and actions taken by the Province to be considered for purposes of determining whether they amounted to an expropriation are those related to the so called tariff conflicts, Canon recovery, the works under Circular 31(A) and the consequential effect on the ability of ABA to obtain financing. The actions of the provincial authorities in the case of the first tariff conflict and the Bahía Blanca works exceeded any contractual rights by inviting customers not to pay bills even before the administrative appeal of ABA against the decision of the ORAB was resolved, or notwithstanding the fact that the Province had not completed the works in the Paso las Piedras reservoir that it represented it would complete at the time of the bidding for the Concession. The same can be said of the public threats against officials of the ORAB for allowing ABA to resume billing of customers after the Bahía Blanca incident. These instances show the politicization of the Concession, as H & S noted, and the lack of commitment of the new provincial authorities to the privatization process undertaken by their predecessors.

320. The unhelpful attitude of the authorities is also evident in the procrastination in resolving the issue of the construction variations when the information given the bidders proved to be incorrect and in completing the works under Circular 31(A). Even if no specific date was established for their completion, the percentage of works completed given the bidders and the dates of completion in the respective contracts created a reasonable expectation that the works would be completed. Even if ABA had no right under the Concession Agreement to a revision of tariffs to recover the Canon, it had the right to recover it to the extent that this was feasible within the existing tariff framework; thus statements made by government officials that the Canon was not recoverable were not in accordance with the financial terms of the Concession. There is also no doubt that the image of the Concessionaire was damaged by the actions of the Province vis-à-vis its customers at the time when it was crucial for the privatized service to take hold.

321. However, the politicization of the Concession or the actions taken by the Province were not the only cause of OPIC's denial of financing. The letter of OPIC referred also to the capital requirements of the Concession as compared to the revenues generated by the existing tariff level were the tariff regime not amended. The conclusions reached by the Tribunal on the recovery of the Canon and the RPI are also significant for purposes of the determination of the degree of impact that the actions of the Province had on Azurix's investment. The Tribunal disagrees with the understanding of the Claimant of the terms of the Law and the Concession Agreement on these matters. Were this not the case, the Tribunal would agree that the breaches of the Concession Agreement would have had a devastating effect on the financial viability of the Concession, but the Claimant has been unable to convince the Tribunal of the correctness of its understanding of the terms of the Law and the Concession Agreement.

322. Therefore, the Tribunal finds that the impact on the investment attributable to the Province's actions was not to the extent required to find that, in the aggregate, these actions amounted to an expropriation; Azurix did not lose the attributes of ownership, at all times continued to control ABA and its ownership of 90% of the shares was unaffected. No doubt the management of ABA was affected by the Province's actions, but not sufficiently for the Tribunal to find that Azurix's investment was expropriated.

323. The Tribunal will turn now to whether the other standards of protection in the BIT were violated as claimed by Azurix. The Tribunal has grouped the arguments made under the heading of "Transparency" under "Fair and Equitable Treatment."

2. Fair and Equitable Treatment

(a) *Positions of the Parties

324. Azurix first refers to Article II(2)(a) of the BIT which provides that "[i]nvestment shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment,...and shall in no case be accorded treatment less than required by international law." The BIT emphasizes this treatment by including it in the preamble: "agreeing that fair and equitable treatment of investment is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment and maximum effective use of economic resources...” Azurix notes that the BIT does not include a definition of the phrase “fair and equitable” and that its meaning revolves on whether it means the minimum standard required by international law or whether “the phrase represents an independent, self-contained principle, which must be given its ‘plain meaning’ pursuant to the general principle for interpreting treaties in Article 31 of the Vienna Convention.”<sup>263</sup>

325. The Claimant argues that, on the basis of the text of Article II(2)(a), doctrine and case law, the phrase in question does not refer to the minimum standard. In particular, the Claimant relies on the opinion of F.A. Mann:

“[t]he terms ‘fair and equitable treatment’ envisage conduct which goes far beyond the minimum standard and afford protection to a greater extent and according to a much more objective standard than any previously employed form of words. A tribunal would not be concerned with a minimum, maximum or average standard. It will have to decide whether in all the circumstances the conduct in issue is fair and equitable or unfair and inequitable. No standard defined by other words is likely to be material. The terms are to be understood and applied independently and autonomously.”<sup>264</sup>

326. The Claimant analyzes the text of the provision and considers that the comma separating the phrase of fair and equitable treatment from the treatment required by international law would seem to indicate a sequence of standards and, “strongly suggests that the latter is intended to be a self-contained standard independent of the former. Moreover, the introductory phrase, ‘in no case ... less than that required by international law’, appears to establish the international law standard as the minimum standard against which, ipso facto, the ‘fair and equitable treatment’ standard must be deemed a higher, more rigorous standard.”<sup>265</sup>

327. The Claimant notes that a position paper of UNCTAD on the meaning of ‘fair and equitable treatment’ reaches the conclusion that “[t]hese considerations point ultimately towards fair and equitable treatment not being synonymous with the international minimum standard.”<sup>266</sup>

328. The Claimant refers to Pope & Talbot, and to the fact that the tribunal in that case relied on Mann’s article and UNCTAD’s paper extensively in its reasoning. That tribunal held that the standard under NAFTA was different from the minimum international law requirement and considered that “compliance with the fairness elements must be ascertained free of any threshold that might be applicable to the evaluation of measures under the minimum standard of international law”. The tribunal rejected that the State’s conduct needed to be egregious, outrageous, shocking or otherwise extraordinary, which is the standard applied in Neer.<sup>267</sup>

329. The Claimant also refers to the plain meaning of fair and equitable. Fair means impartial, honest, free from prejudice, favoritism and self interest, equitable is just, conformable to the principles of justice and right.

330. The Claimant alleges that Argentina breached this standard because as it occurred in Pope & Talbot,

331. All this occurred, according to the Claimant, because the Province needed money to balance its budget deficit and was unwilling to allow water increases because it would be a political problem for the new administration.<sup>269</sup>

332. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina disagrees on the meaning of fair and equitable, which it considers inextricably attached to the international minimum standard, on the controversial appreciation of the facts, which do not constitute a violation of the standard, and on the autonomous characterization of the standard.

333. Argentina argues that there are very few awards and authors that postulate the assertion that the standard of fair and equitable treatment is different from the minimum international standard. Based on the findings of the tribunals in Genin, Azinian, and S.D. Myers, Argentina considers that the meaning of this standard is “related to the purpose of providing a basic and general principle”, “constitutes a minimum international standard”, and “for it to be violated it is necessary that the State receiving the investment incur in acts that demonstrate a premeditated intent to not comply with an obligation, insufficient action falling below international standards or even subjective bad faith.”<sup>270</sup> The Respondent emphasizes that in Myers the tribunal stated that Article 1105(1) of the NAFTA imposes “fair treatment at a level acceptable to the international community, measured with the highest degree of deference towards domestic authorities.” Thus, “[o]nly the reasonableness of the measure claimed to be grievous must be measured, and this, with deference.”<sup>271</sup>

334. Argentina expresses its agreement with the binding interpretation of Article 1105(1) of NAFTA by the Free Trade Commission (“FTC”). The FTC interpreted the article as follows:

3. A determination that there has been breach of another provision of the NAFTA, or of a separate international agreement, does not establish that there has been a breach of Article 1105(1).”

335. The Respondent also manifests its agreement with the provision of Article 10.4 of the Free Trade Agreement between the United States of America and Chile which in reference to “fair and equitable treatment” and “full protection and security” “does not require treatment in addition or beyond that which is required by that standard and does not create additional substantive rights.”<sup>272</sup>

336. The Respondent denies the contention of Azurix that this standard would refer to the expectations of the investor not being frustrated by legislation, rules and regulations and adduces as reasons for casting aside this conception that, “Fairness and equitableness may require (not merely allow) the amendment of a legal system. Such would be the case if, for example, the beneficiary of such legal system is causing harm to others. This is frequently true in environmental and health matters...thus violating the fundamental juristic principle forbidding causing harm.” The Respondent argues that, “Any acceptable concept of what constitutes ‘property’ incorporates as property rights the expectations based on the legal system that begets them. Therefore, in the event of changes to such system (or of the property rights or of the vested rights), the aggrieved party is faced not with unfair treatment but rather with an alleged expropriatory treatment. The legitimate expectations, as part of any reasonable concept of property, are protected by a different standard.”<sup>273</sup>

337. Argentina questions the facts on which the alleged breach of this standard is claimed by Azurix. Referring to the list of expectations reproduced early here, Argentina qualifies them as rash or extremely vague or semantic labels rather than description of the facts.<sup>274</sup> Argentina argues that, in terms of the standard proposed, Argentina cannot be held responsible for a breach of the BIT nor can it be held to have breached it even under the standard proposed by Azurix. Neither the Province nor Argentina departed from applicable legislation, rules and regulations.

338. Argentina disagrees with the autonomous categorization of unfair and inequitable acts. The facts, measures, events, acts and omissions described by the Claimant in violation of the fair and equitable standard are the same as those alleged to be expropriatory, “[s]uch is the extent of this identification that when it comes to claiming a compensation only the expropriation of the investment is taken into account.”<sup>275</sup>

339. Argentina maintains that the events or acts that qualify as expropriation cannot be the same as those that qualify as unfair and inequitable treatment. Depending on their legal qualification, facts produce different legal consequences. According to Argentina, “confusion between expropriatory acts and acts constituting unfair treatment renders one of the two claims invalid.”<sup>276</sup> Argentina then contests the supposed strategy of Azurix to pursue the two claims so that if the Tribunal would not consider the measures expropriatory then they could be considered as constituting unfair and inequitable treatment with a claim to the same compensation. Argentina questions that this could be the case,

“unfair treatment can never be characterized as the loss of a property right because that is precisely the core of an expropriation ... The unfair treatment should generate some other form of damage, a detrimental consequence other than the alleged loss of property rights. It should be a consequence as independent from the expropriation damage consequence as the acts that trigger the application of this second standard are (or ought to be) independent and autonomous of the events that caused the application (or non-application) of the first standard.”<sup>277</sup>

340. Argentina supports further its argument by referring to Azinian. In that case, the claimant had alleged violations of Articles 1110 and 1105 of NAFTA. The tribunal reasoned that,

“The only conceivably relevant substantive principle of Article 1105 is that a NAFTA investor should not be dealt with in a manner that contravenes international law. There has not been a claim of such a violation of international law other than the one more specifically covered by Article 1110. In a feeble attempt to maintain Article 1105, the Claimants’ Reply Memorial affirms that the breach of the Concession Contract violated international law because it was ‘motivated by non-commercial considerations, and compensatory damages were not paid.’ This is but a paraphrase of a complaint more specifically covered by Article 1110. For the avoidance of doubt, the Arbitral Tribunal therefore holds that under the circumstances of this case if there was no violation of Article 1110, there was none of Article 1105.”

Argentina considers that the same reasoning applies to the instant case.

341. In its Reply, the Claimant alleges that the interpretation of Article II(2)(a) of the BIT by the Respondent is erroneous. According to the Claimant, the basic touchstone of fair and equitable treatment is to be found in the legitimate and reasonable expectations of the parties. The Claimant considers that, as recommended by Jan Paulsson, the Tribunal should examine “the impact of the measure on the reasonable investment backed-expectations of the investor, and whether the state is attempting to avoid investment-backed expectations that the state created or reinforced through its own acts.”<sup>278</sup> The Claimant finds support for this view in Tecmed where the tribunal held that fair and equitable treatment requires treatment by the Contracting Parties “that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment.”<sup>279</sup>

342. The Claimant argues that this standard encompasses more specific standards recognized by international tribunals the breach of which entails the breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard, such as that a government will obey its own laws and customary international law, will act honestly, transparently, consistently with representations made and in good faith. As part of good faith, according to the Claimant, the State's rights must be exercised reasonably and within the limits of international law, domestic law and the contract, otherwise it incurs in abuse of those rights.<sup>280</sup>

343. The Claimant questions the interpretation of ICSID awards by the Respondent. According to the Claimant, in Genin the tribunal did not attempt to develop a comprehensive definition of the meaning of fair and equitable treatment, as opposed, for instance, to the full analysis provided in Tecmed. The standard in NAFTA is different from the standard in the BIT. Article 1105(1) of NAFTA states that investments must be provided "treatment in accordance with international law, including fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security" (emphasis added by the Claimant). This text differs from the corresponding provision of the BIT in the way "international law" and "fair and equitable treatment" are connected. For the Claimant, it is evident that, under the BIT, "fair and equitable treatment" is "a separate requirement and additional requirement from the international law standard, and that international law sets a floor, indicating that 'fair and equitable treatment' requires something different from and more, but never less, than international law."<sup>281</sup>

344. According to the Claimant, even in S.D. Myers the tribunal did not say what the Respondent pretends. The tribunal held that the standard is breached when "an investor has been treated in such an unjust or arbitrary manner that the treatment rises to the level that is unacceptable from the international perspective." That tribunal concluded that Canada had acted in a discriminatory manner and had breached Article 1102, and such breach also entailed a breach of the fair and equitable standard provided in Article 1105.<sup>282</sup>

345. The Claimant observes that the minimum standard argument of the Respondent is based on the standard set in Neer in the 1920s and that the standard

has evolved as pointed out in Mondev: The minimum standard today cannot be limited to the content of customary international law as recognized in arbitral decisions in the 1920s; what is unfair or inequitable to today's eye need not equate with the outrageous or egregious. In that tribunal's view: "there can be no doubt that, by interpreting Article 1105(1) to prescribe the customary international law minimum standard of treatment of aliens as the minimum standard of treatment to be afforded to investments of investors of another Party under NAFTA, the term "customary international law" refers to customary international law as it stood no earlier than the time at which NAFTA came into force." The customary international law standard is defined by the ordinary meaning of the terms "fair and equitable".<sup>283</sup> Tecmed, on the other hand, maintains that this standard requires the contracting parties "to provide to international investments treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment."<sup>284</sup>

346. Then the Claimant turns to the Respondent's contention that Azurix's confuses the meaning of expropriatory acts and acts constituting unfair and inequitable treatment. The Claimant argues that the BIT provides rights that are independent from each other and the breach of any one of them would entitle the investor to resort to the dispute settlement procedure provided by the BIT and would give rise to a right to compensation for the economic harm sustained. What are independent are the rights under the BIT not necessarily the measures that have breached those rights.<sup>285</sup>

347. The Claimant addresses the question of which losses suffered by Azurix could be attributed to unfair and inequitable treatment and which to expropriation. According to the Claimant, unfair and inequitable treatment does not generate a different form of damage. The real question that Argentina is raising is whether Azurix is claiming double recovery. The Claimant affirms that this is not the case. Azurix is entitled to recover its full damages, but only once. The Claimant quotes from S.D. Myers on the cumulative nature of the rights and remedies under BITs:

“When both Article 1102 and 1105 have been breached, as the Tribunal has found in this case, the usual principle to be applied is that rights and remedies under trade agreements are cumulative unless there is actual conflict between different provisions. The fact that a host Party has breached both Article 1102 and Article 1105 cannot be taken to mean that the investor is entitled to less compensation than if only Article 1103 were breached. A host Party does not reduce the extent of its liability by breaching more than one provision of the NAFTA.”<sup>286</sup>

348. The Claimant argues that it has provided the Tribunal a discrete damage evaluation that identifies which damages were caused by each of the measures. This should be sufficient to answer Argentina’s question. As regards the Respondent’s question about the causal relationship between an unfair act and the damage that the expropriatory is alleged to have caused, the Claimant considers that this concern has become meaningless once it has been shown that the same measure may breach more than one right under the BIT and the analysis of damages presented by Azurix allows the Tribunal to identify the impact caused by each measure of Argentina.<sup>287</sup>

349. The Claimant observes that the Respondent qualifies Azurix’s claims as rash and states that they are not independent and cannot be analyzed, but it does not explain the reasons for these statements. The Claimant alleges that Argentina is wrong on both counts and lists in non-exhaustive form the ways in which the Province frustrated Azurix’s expectations by not allowing to charge tariffs in accordance with the Concession Agreement, by repudiation of Circular 52(A), by refusing to accept ABA’s termination of the Concession, by refusal to return the non-amortized portion of the investments, by not allowing ABA to collect the receivables, by requiring that ABA continue to operate the service for more than 90 days, by imposing arbitrary penalties, by politicizing the tariff regime, by publicly calling on customers not to pay their bills, by provoking the illegal intervention of the Provincial Domestic Trade Bureau to enjoin ABA from billing for its services.<sup>288</sup>

350. In the Rejoinder, the Respondent points out that it never referred to Neer in the Counter-Memorial, and contests the interpretation given by the Claimant to Tecmed. According to the Respondent, Tecmed and Genin arrive to the same conclusion. The Mexican authorities had engaged in conduct that was notoriously unfair. This was not the case of ABA's treatment, which was never a cooperative investor and had breached the Concession Agreement. Tecmed supports the Argentine position because it distinguishes between "the object of protection (that could be legitimate expectations, good faith and transparency) from the level of protection granted by the Treaty". The Respondent emphasizes that its own concept of fair and equitable permits to differentiate between standards rather than collapse them. The Respondent notes that the Reply does not change the fact that NAFTA tribunals apply a minimum standard defined more recently in Waste Management.

"...despite certain differences in emphasis, a general standard for Article 1105 arises. Taken together, cases S.D. Myers, Mondev, ADF and Loewen suggest that the minimum standard of fair and equitable treatment is infringed by conduct attributable to the State and harmful to the claimant if the conduct is arbitrary, grossly unfair, unjust or idiosyncratic, is discriminatory and exposes claimant to sectional or racial prejudice or involves a lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends judicial propriety- as may be the case with a manifest failure of natural justice in judicial proceedings or a complete lack of transparency and candour in an administrative process. In applying this standard it is relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant."<sup>289</sup>

351. The Respondent concludes that this is the standard applied in NAFTA, which delimits the level of violation from the object of the protection, and the scope that the Claimant gives to the standard would make irrelevant all the standards of protection because it would encompass them all.<sup>290</sup>

352. As regards Article II(7) of the BIT, the Claimant has argued that the Respondent breached its duty of transparency under this article. The Claimant points out that Article II(7) of the BIT requires that “each Party shall make public all laws, regulations, administrative practices and procedures, and adjudicatory decisions that pertain to or affect investments.” This requirement prevents States, according to the Claimant, from imposing undisclosed laws, regulations or practices that adversely affect investments. The Claimant refers to how the tribunal in Metalclad understood a similar provision in NAFTA. That tribunal understood the concept of transparency “to include the idea that all relevant legal requirements for the purpose of initiating, completing and successfully operating investments made, or intended to be made, under the [NAFTA] should be capable of being readily known to all affected investors of another Party. There should be no room for doubt or uncertainty on such matters.”<sup>291</sup> The Claimant argues that the transparency provision under the BIT is reinforced by the requirement of a transparent regulatory environment under the Law and the Concession Agreement. Specifically, the ORAB never made public its “regulations, administrative practices and procedures”. The Concession Agreement requires the ORAB to rule on any proposals for tariff adjustment within the period set in the “procedural regulation”. If such regulation had been issued, compliance with it would have prevented the dilatory tactics that compromised the tariff regime.<sup>292</sup>

353. The Claimant observes that the ORAB was established as an autonomous entity under the Law and had exclusive authority to supervise the Concession. Regardless of this fact, the decisions of the ORAB were controlled and dictated by the MOSP. To this allegedly improper influence, the Claimant attributes the request of the RPI study and other instances may be established circumstantially:

“because the ORAB candidly told ABA that, although they believed it was correct in its position on Resolution 1/99, they could not undo it because of political pressures. This is confirmed by the statements to ABA by Minister Romero and Undersecretary García about the political problems created by increased water bills. And in fact (based on Minister’s Romero’s comments) newspapers reported that the ORAB would issue a resolution forcing withdrawal of the bills before the ORAB ever met to issue Resolution 1/99. Similarly, the ORAB President told ABA the ORAB could not grant the RPI adjustment because of political pressure from the MOSP, and ORAB directors said the Bahía Blanca ‘crisis’ was not ABA’s fault, but when the Governor and the MOSP Minister publicly attacked ABA, the ORAB also took actions against the company. These actions are consistent with the Governor’s pronouncement to Azurix and ABA.”<sup>293</sup>

354. The Minister also admitted before the provincial House of Representatives that there was still a great lack of transparency on the regulation of the concessionaires:

“The other element we consider worth mentioning is Resolution 16 under which controlling entities are to make public all their decisions. This is a point we should like to emphasize since we consider there used to be a great lack of transparency – and there still is – on the control of companies under concessions in Argentina”.<sup>294</sup>

355. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent considered that the Metalclad case was not relevant because of the different circumstances of that case which concerned a regulatory conflict between different jurisdictions of a Federal State.<sup>295</sup>

356. Azurix insists in its Reply that the case is analogous to the instant case and provides useful guidance on the application of the transparency standard: “the facts of the present case are more compelling than Metalclad since the BIT explicitly requires that ‘[e]ach party shall make public all...administrative practices and procedures [...]’ and the Province indisputably failed to do so.”<sup>296</sup> The Claimant also observes that this standard has been applied by other tribunals besides in Metalclad. In Maffezini the tribunal held that the lack of transparency in a loan transaction was incompatible with Spain’s commitment to ensure fair and equitable treatment of the investor, and in Tecmed the tribunal found that the State had an obligation in applying the fair and equitable treatment standard to act ‘totally transparently in its relations with the foreign investor...’<sup>297</sup>

357. The Respondent, in the Rejoinder, simply affirms its previous defense, and points out its surprise that the Province is accused of lack of transparency when it was Azurix and ABA “who after being in charge of the Service provision, pretended to make an attempt against the terms of the Contract that they had known and accepted.”<sup>298</sup>

358. The arguments exchanged by the parties raise the following issues:

1. Whether the standard of fair and equitable treatment is a standard which entails obligations for the parties to the BIT in the treatment of foreign investment which are additional to those required by the minimum standard of treatment of aliens under customary international law;
2. What conduct attributable to the State can be characterized as unfair and inequitable? In other words, what is the substantive content of the standard?; and
3. Whether Article II(7) of the BIT has been breached.

359. In discussing the first issue, the Tribunal will start by considering the specific provision of the BIT on fair and equitable treatment and recall that the BIT is an international treaty that should be interpreted in accordance with the norms of interpretation established by the Vienna Convention. As already noted, the Vienna Convention is binding on the parties to the BIT. Article 31(1) of the Convention requires that a treaty be “interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose”.

360. In their ordinary meaning, the terms “fair” and “equitable” used in Article 3(1) of the BIT mean “just”, “even-handed”, “unbiased”, “legitimate.”<sup>299</sup> As regards the purpose and object of the BIT, in its Preamble, the parties state their desire to promote

greater cooperation with respect to investment, recognize that “agreement upon the treatment to be accorded such investment will stimulate the flow of private capital and the economic development of the Parties”, and agree that “fair and equitable treatment of investment is desirable in order to maintain a stable framework for investment and maximum effective use of economic resources.” It follows from the ordinary meaning of the terms fair and equitable and the purpose and object of the BIT that fair and equitable should be understood to be treatment in an even-handed and just manner, conducive to fostering the promotion of foreign investment. The text of the BIT reflects a positive attitude towards investment with words such as “promote” and “stimulate”. Furthermore, the parties to the BIT recognize the role that fair and equitable treatment plays in maintaining “a stable framework for investment and maximum effective use of economic resources.”

361. Turning now to Article II.2(a), this paragraph provides: “Investment shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment, shall enjoy full protection and security and shall in no case be accorded treatment less than required by international law.” The paragraph consists of three full statements, each listing in sequence a standard of treatment to be accorded to investments: fair and equitable, full protection and security, not less than required by international law. Fair and equitable treatment is listed separately. The last sentence ensures that, whichever content is attributed to the other two standards, the treatment accorded to investment will be no less than required by international law. The clause, as drafted, permits to interpret fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security as higher standards than required by international law. The purpose of the third sentence is to set a floor, not a ceiling, in order to avoid a possible interpretation of these standards below what is required by international law. While this conclusion results from the textual analysis of this provision, the Tribunal does not consider that it is of material significance for its application of the standard of fair and equitable treatment to the facts of the case. As it will be explained below, the minimum requirement to satisfy this standard has evolved and the Tribunal considers that its content is substantially similar whether the terms are interpreted in their ordinary meaning, as required by the Vienna Convention, or in accordance with customary international law.<sup>300</sup>

362. Argentina has declared its agreement with the interpretation of Article 1105 of NAFTA by the “FTC. This article bears the heading of the “Minimum Standard of Treatment”. Paragraph 1 reads as follows: “Each Party shall accord to investments of investors of another Party treatment in accordance with international law, including fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security.” In this provision, the standards of fair and equitable and full protection and security are defined as part of the treatment in accordance with international law. As interpreted by the FTC, the standard of treatment, and as indicated in the title of the article, is the minimum required under customary international law.

363. Argentina has also drawn the attention of the Tribunal to recent Free Trade Agreements (FTAs) entered by the United States, such as the Free Trade Agreement with Chile, where the minimum treatment required is that required under international law. The interpretation of the FTC or the examples of FTAs adduced by the Respondent may be evidence of a significant practice by one of the parties to the BIT, but the Tribunal has difficulty in reading it in the text of the BIT which governs these proceedings. The fact that the FTC interpreted Article 1105 in reaction to a tribunal’s different understanding of this article and that, in recent agreements, the correlative clause has been drafted to reflect the FTC’s interpretation show that the meaning of that article and similar clauses in other agreements could reasonably be understood to have a different meaning.

364. The question whether fair and equitable treatment is or is not additional to the minimum treatment requirement under international law is a question about the substantive content of fair and equitable treatment and, whichever side of the argument one takes, the answer to the question may in substance be the same.

365. In 1927, the US-Mexican Mixed Claims Commission considered in the Neer case that a State has breached the fair and equitable treatment obligation when the conduct of the State could be described as outrageous, egregious or in bad faith or so below international standards that a reasonable and impartial person would easily recognize it as such. This description of conduct in breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard has been considered as the expression of customary international law at that time. In deciding the determinant elements of fair and equitable treatment, the question for the Tribunal is whether, at the time the BIT was concluded, customary international law had evolved to a higher standard of treatment.

366. The parties have interpreted differently how arbitral tribunals have understood this standard. We will turn to the cases discussed. Argentina has placed particular emphasis on Genin. In that case, the tribunal had to decide on whether the investor had been treated fairly and equitably in the context of the revocation of a banking license. The tribunal found no breach of the standard because there were ample grounds for the action taken by the Bank of Estonia. The tribunal in considering the meaning of fair and equitable did not engage in a textual analysis of the fair and equitable treatment clause in the US-Estonia BIT but simply referred to how this requirement has been generally understood under international law, namely, an international minimum standard separate from domestic law but “that is, indeed, a minimum standard.”<sup>301</sup> According to the same tribunal, for State conduct to breach such standard, it would need to reflect “a willful neglect of duty, an insufficiency of action falling far below international standards, or even subjective bad faith.”<sup>302</sup>

367. Notwithstanding the finding that, in the circumstances of the case, Estonia did not breach the duty of fair and equitable treatment, the tribunal seems to have been uneasy about letting the conduct of Estonia stand without criticism and considered it necessary to express the hope that “Bank of Estonia will exercise its regulatory and supervisory functions with greater caution regarding procedure in the future.”<sup>303</sup> In considering the award of costs, the same tribunal noted that “the awkward manner by which the Bank of Estonia revoked EIB’s license, and in particular the lack of prior notice of its intention to revoke EIB’s license and of any means for EIB or its shareholders to challenge that decision prior to its being formalized, cannot escape censure.”<sup>304</sup>

368. Arbitral tribunals under NAFTA have found, after the interpretation of the FTC, that the customary international law to be applied is the customary international law as it stood in 1994 not in 1927. In Mondev, the tribunal considered that “the content of the minimum standard today cannot be limited to the content of customary international law as recognized in arbitral decisions in the 1920s.”<sup>305</sup> The tribunal noted that the parties in that case agreed that the international standard of treatment has evolved as all customary international law had evolved, and that the two other State parties to NAFTA also agreed with this point.<sup>306</sup> Therefore, the customary international law to be applied “is not limited to the international law of the 19th century or even of the first half of the 20th century, although decisions from that period remain relevant. In holding that Article 1105(1) refers to customary international law, the FTC interpretations incorporate current international law, content, the content of which is shaped by the conclusion of more than two thousand bilateral investment treaties and many treaties of friendship and commerce. Those treaties largely and concordantly provide for ‘fair and equitable’ treatment of and, and for ‘full protection and security’ for, the foreign investor and his investments.”<sup>307</sup> Applying this evolutionary concept to customary international law, the tribunal found that “To the modern eye, what is unfair or inequitable need not equate with the outrageous or the egregious. In particular, a State may treat foreign investment unfairly and inequitably without necessarily acting in bad faith.”<sup>308</sup>

369. The tribunal in Loewen came to a similar conclusion: “Neither State practice, the decisions of international tribunals nor the opinion of commentators

<sup>308</sup> Ibid., para.116. The tribunal in ADF affirmed the same point: “what customary international law projects is not a static photograph of the minimum standard of treatment of aliens as it stood in 1927 when the Award in the Neer case was rendered. For both customary international law and the minimum standard of treatment of aliens it incorporates, are constantly in a process of development.” *ADF Group, Inc. v. support the view that bad faith or malicious intention is an essential element of unfair and inequitable treatment or denial of justice amounting to a breach of international justice.”<sup>309</sup>

370. After an analysis of arbitral decisions and awards under NAFTA, the tribunal in Waste Management reached the conclusion that:

“the minimum standard of treatment of fair and equitable treatment is infringed by conduct attributable to the state and harmful to the claimant if the conduct is arbitrary, grossly unfair, unjust or idiosyncratic, is discriminatory and exposes the claimant to sectional or racial prejudice, or involves a lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends judicial propriety – as might be the case with a manifest failure of natural justice in judicial proceedings or a complete lack of transparency and candor in an administrative process. In applying this standard it is relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant.”<sup>310</sup>

“the Contracting Parties to provide to international investments treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment. The foreign investor expects the host State to act in a consistent manner, free from ambiguity and totally transparently in its relations with the foreign investor, so that it may know beforehand any and all rules and regulations that will govern its investments, as well as the goals of the relevant policies and administrative practices or directives, to be able to plan its investment and comply with such regulations.”<sup>311</sup>

372. Except for Genin, there is a common thread in the recent awards under NAFTA and Tecmed which does not require bad faith or malicious intention of the recipient State as a necessary element in the failure to treat investment fairly and equitably. As recently stated in CMS, it is an objective standard “unrelated to whether the Respondent has had any deliberate intention or bad faith in adopting the measures in question. Of course, such intention and bad faith can aggravate the situation but are not an essential element of the standard.”<sup>312</sup> It is also understood that the conduct of the State has to be below international standards but those are not at the level of 1927. A third element is the frustration of expectations that the investor may have legitimately taken into account when it made the investment. The standards of conduct agreed by the parties to a BIT presuppose a favorable disposition towards foreign investment, in fact, a pro-active behavior of the State to encourage and protect it. To encourage and protect investment is the purpose of the BIT. It would be incoherent with such purpose and the expectations created by such a document to consider that a party to the BIT has breached the obligation of fair and equitable treatment only when it has acted in bad faith or its conduct can be qualified as outrageous or egregious.

373. Based on these considerations, the Tribunal will now turn to whether the Respondent breached its obligation to treat the Claimant’s investment fairly and equitably. To this effect, the Tribunal considers the instances described below to be particularly relevant:

374. The Tribunal is struck by the conduct of the Province after the Claimant gave notice of termination of the Concession Agreement. ABA had requested to terminate it in agreement with the Province. The Province refused what was a reasonable request in light of the previous behavior of the Province and its agencies. The refusal by the Province to accept that notice of termination and its insistence on terminating it by itself on account of abandonment of the Concession is a clear case of a breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard. It is evident from the facts before this Tribunal that the Concession was not abandoned.

<sup>312</sup> CMS Gas Transportation Company v. Argentine Republic (ICSID Case No. ARB/01/8) Award of May 12, 2005, para. 280.

375. Although the Tribunal has rejected to a certain extent the interpretations of the Concession Agreement and the Law alleged by the Claimant regarding the RPI and the Canon, it is also clear that the tariff regime was politicized because of concerns with forthcoming elections or because the Concession was awarded by the previous government. The issues of the zoning coefficients and the construction variations are cases in point. It is significant that, once the service was transferred, the new service provider was allowed to raise tariffs reflecting the construction variations.

376. Finally, the repeated calls of the Provincial governor and other officials for non-payment of bills by customers verges on bad faith in the case of the Bahía Blanca incident when the Province itself had not completed the works that would have helped to avoid the problem in the first place.

377. Considered together, these actions reflect a pervasive conduct of the Province in breach of the standard of fair and equitable treatment.

378. It remains to be considered whether Argentina also breached Article II(7) of the Treaty. Azurix bases its claim on the fact that ORAB never published its regulations and lacked independence. Article II(7) requires publication of the laws, regulations, adjudicatory decisions and administrative practices and procedures pertaining or affecting investments. The Tribunal has already found that the politicization of the Concession is an element in the Tribunal's determination that the fair and equitable standard has been breached. On the other hand, the Tribunal has also found that ORAB's request for a study in the context of the RPI was a legitimate request. The Tribunal considers that, in view of the facts, what is at issue here is the conduct in the application of the regulatory framework rather than its publicity. There is no doubt that publication of ORAB's regulations would have been a desirable improvement, but the lack of it as argued by the Claimant is not sufficient to conclude that Article II(7) has been breached.

3. Failure to Observe Obligations

(a) Positions of the Parties

379. In its Memorial, the Claimant argues that the Province and the Republic have failed to observe their obligations as required by Article II(2)(c) of the BIT: “Each Party shall observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investments.” The Claimant refers to the fact that Article XIII of the BIT extends its application to the political subdivisions of the Respondent and concludes from it that the BIT imposes an obligation directly on the Province to observe its obligations to foreign investors.<sup>313</sup>

380. In the Counter-Memorial, Argentina contends that contractual claims do not become automatically treaty claims, and that no tribunal has accepted such an argument. Furthermore, Azurix and ABA specifically renounced to raise contractual issues before an ICSID tribunal, and Article II(2)(c) of the BIT refers to obligations undertaken towards specific investment agreements and not to concession contracts governed by domestic administrative law. Argentina also observes that the Claimant has failed to prove the existence of a cause and effect link between the event and the loss and to provide a precise assessment of the losses. Argentina concludes its argument by affirming that it had not undertaken any contractual obligation whatsoever with Azurix and the same is true of the Province.<sup>314</sup>

381. In its Reply, the Claimant notes that Article II(2)(c) refers to “any obligation”, it includes obligations arising under international law and under municipal law; it is not limited to breaches of international agreements, which in any case is a term that would include concession agreements. The Claimant alleges that “To limit this BIT provision to any one category of obligations would require that limiting language be read into the treaty, something the drafters could have done but intentionally chose not to do. The Tribunal’s task, of course, is to construe the treaty as written, not rewrite it as the GOA would prefer.” Any uncertainties should be interpreted in favor of the investor given the objectives of the BIT as expressed in its preamble.<sup>315</sup>

382. Azurix adds that the phrase “entered into” is not limited to any particular mode or method and encompasses obligations undertaken through contract, legislation, decrees, resolutions or regulations. Moreover, the BIT does not limit the application of this clause to a specific investment as claimed by the Respondent, Article II(2)(c) refers to obligations in respect of investments in plural and generically. As regards the issue of the forum for contractual disputes provided for in the Concession Agreement, the Claimant argues that Article VII(2) of the BIT is very clear in giving a choice to the private party concerned between submitting the dispute to the forum previously agreed or international arbitration. Azurix re-affirms that it had already proved that damages had occurred during the Concession and were continuing annually as a result of the Province’s breaches.<sup>316</sup>

383. In its Rejoinder, Argentina recalls the findings of the PCIJ in Serbian Loans, the ICJ in ELSI, the arbitral tribunal in Woodruff, the Ad hoc Annulment Committee in Vivendi, and the arbitral tribunals in the SGS cases, and concludes that general international law bluntly separates contractual claims from those under international law, that even in the case of BITs the prohibition to transubstantiate a contractual claim into a BIT claim remains, and that when a tribunal has established conditions for the application of an umbrella clause it has required the claimant to abide by the contract forum clause.<sup>317</sup>

384. As already stated by the Tribunal in affirming its jurisdiction within the limits permitted by the Convention and the BIT, the Tribunal finds that none of the contractual claims as such refer to a contract between the parties to these proceedings; neither the Province nor ABA are parties to them. While Azurix may submit a claim under the BIT for breaches by Argentina, there is no undertaking to be honored by Argentina to Azurix other than the obligations under the BIT. Even if for argument’s sake, it would be possible under Article II(2)(c) to hold Argentina responsible for the alleged breaches of the Concession Agreement by the Province, it was ABA and not Azurix which was the party to this Agreement.

4. Arbitrary Measures

(a) Positions of the Parties

385. The Claimant argues that arbitrary or discriminatory measures are listed as alternatives in the BIT and, therefore, it is sufficient that a measure be arbitrary to constitute a breach of the BIT. In its ordinary meaning arbitrary means “a characterization of a decision or action taken by an administrative agency... [as] willful and unreasonable action and without consideration or in disregard of facts or law or without determining principle.”<sup>318</sup> The Claimant also refers to the definition of arbitrary by the ICJ in ELSI, “Arbitrariness is not so much something opposed to a rule of law, as something opposed to the rule of law... It is willful disregard of due process of law, an act which shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of judicial propriety.” The Claimant observes that this definition is too narrow and does not accord with the ordinary meaning of arbitrariness. The Claimant refers to Pope & Talbot and its comments on the evolution of international law, as characterized by the ICJ decision, that moves away from the Neer formulation. According to that tribunal, the formulation in ELSI:

“leaves out any requirement that every reasonable and impartial person be dissatisfied and perhaps permits a bit less injury to the psyche of the observer, who need no longer be outraged, but only surprised by what the government has done. And, of course, replacing the neutral ‘governmental action’, with the concept of ‘due process’ perforce makes the formulation more dynamic and responsive to evolving and more vigorous standards for evaluating what governments do to people and companies.”<sup>319</sup>

386. The Claimant maintains that to determine whether an action is or not arbitrary in its ordinary meaning should meet four tests: it should be taken by the proper authority, for the proper purpose, because of relevant circumstances and should not be patently unreasonable. In accordance with these tests, the measures taken by the

Province were arbitrary. Resolution 1/99 was issued for an improper purpose, the tariff regime was improperly applied, the issues related to Circular 58(A) were not dealt within reasonable periods of time, the RPI was denied for irrelevant reasons, the Province induced a high bid price with Circular 52(A) and then claimed that the bidder paid too much and it could not be fully included in the base rate. The Province acted according to the electoral needs of its officials rather than in accordance with the rule of law.<sup>320</sup>

387. The Respondent considers that the definition in ELSI is the most appropriate. Argentina contests the relevance of Pope & Talbot, which was referring to the concept of fair and equitable treatment not to a definition of discriminatory measures.. The Respondent points out that, in Genin, the tribunal held that “in order to amount to a violation of the BIT, any procedural irregularity that may have been present would have to amount to bad faith, a willful disregard of due process of law or an extreme insufficiency of action.”<sup>321</sup>

388. In its Reply, the Claimant insists that the meaning in the BIT should be the ordinary meaning of its terms. Article II.2(b) uses the most general of terms, “in any way” either party shall “impair” the management, operation, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion, or disposal of investment.” The verb “impair” means “to diminish, lessen, damage, deteriorate, or make worse.” From this the Claimant concludes that the terms used “indicate that the prohibition is to be applied broadly to any conduct that directly or indirectly achieves the prohibited result.”<sup>322</sup> If the drafters would have wished to limit the import of arbitrary measures to meaning a violation of the rule of law, they could have said it in no uncertain terms, directly and without bothering to draft the clause “with such precision and detail.”<sup>323</sup>

389. Argentina reaffirmed, in the Rejoinder, its understanding of arbitrary as defined by the ICJ and not by its ordinary meaning as pretended by the Claimant.

390. Article II.2(b) provides: “Neither Party shall in any way impair by arbitrary or discriminatory measures the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion, or disposal of investments. For the purposes of dispute resolution under Articles VII and VIII, a measure may be arbitrary or discriminatory notwithstanding the opportunity to review such measure in the courts or administrative tribunals of a Party.”

391. The Tribunal agrees with the interpretation of the Claimant that a measure needs only to be arbitrary to constitute a breach of the BIT. This interpretation has not been contested by the Respondent and it follows from the alternative way in which the term “measures” is qualified by the adjectives “arbitrary or discriminatory”. The parties disagree on whether the meaning of arbitrary should be the ordinary meaning of “arbitrary” or the meaning to arbitrary given by the ICJ in ELSI. The parties also disagree on the relevance of Pope & Talbot to this case and Argentina has pointed out the description of arbitrary given in Genin. The Tribunal is required to consider the ordinary meaning of the terms used in the BIT under Article 31 of the Vienna Convention. The findings of other tribunals, and in particular of the ICJ, should be helpful to the Tribunal in its interpretative task.

392. In its ordinary meaning, “arbitrary” means “derived from mere opinion”, “capricious”, “unrestrained”, “despotic.”<sup>324</sup> Black’s Law Dictionary defines the term, inter alia, as “done capriciously or at pleasure”, “not done or acting according to reason or judgment”, “depending on the will alone.” Pope & Talbot did not define arbitrary as it stood today. It only commented on the fact that the ICJ itself had moved from the standard advocated by Canada based on Neer to a less demanding standard. Genin does not seem to take notice of the change that has taken place when it adds the requirement of bad faith. The Tribunal finds that the definition in ELSI is close to the ordinary meaning of arbitrary since it emphasizes the element of willful disregard of the law.

393. The question for the Tribunal is whether the measures taken by the Province can be considered to be arbitrary and have impaired “the management, operation, maintenance, use, enjoyment, acquisition, expansion, or disposal” of the investment of Azurix in Argentina. The Tribunal finds that the actions of the provincial authorities calling for non-payment of bills even before the regulatory authority had made a decision, threatening the members of the ORAB because it had allowed ABA to resume billing, requiring ABA not to apply the new tariff resulting from the review of the construction variations and affirming that zone coefficients apply in contradiction with the information provided to the bidders at the time of bidding for the Concession, restraining ABA from collecting payment from its customers for services rendered before March 15, 2002, and denying to ABA access to the documentation on the basis of which ABA was sanctioned are arbitrary actions without base on the Law or the Concession Agreement and impaired the operation of Azurix’s investment.

5. Full Protection and Security

(a) Positions of the Parties

394. In its Memorial, the Claimant argues that the standard of full protection and security imposes an obligation of vigilance and due diligence upon the government, as stated in APPL, “according to modern doctrine, the violation of international law entailing the state’s responsibility has to be considered constituted by ‘the mere lack or want of diligence’, without any need to establish malice or negligence”. The Claimant defines further the standard by referring to AMT. The tribunal in that case found that:

395. The Claimant proceeds to argue that the standard goes beyond physical protection and includes the protection described in CME Czech Republic B.V.: “The host State is obligated to ensure that neither by amendment of its laws nor by actions of its administrative bodies is the agreed and approved security and protection of the foreign investor’s investment withdrawn or devalued.”<sup>326</sup>

396. The Claimant alleges that Argentina breached the standard so defined by failing to apply the regulatory framework and the Concession Agreement and thus destroying the security provided by them: the Province never revoked Resolutions 1/99 and 7/00 or decided on the RPI adjustment or on the issue of the valuations, ABA was never compensated for, inter alia, the Bahía Blanca damages, the Province insisted that ABA give up the right assured by the Law, Circular 52(A) and the Concession Agreement to recover the Canon in full, and the Respondent failed to take any action to protect the Claimant’s investment.

397. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent observes that Azurix had simply requested the use of its good offices to ensure the Province’s compliance with the Concession Agreement. Thus Azurix was requesting assistance in a contractual dispute between ABA and the Province.<sup>327</sup> The Respondent refers to the view held by the ad hoc Committee in Aguas del Aconquija and the assertion of the tribunal in that case that “federal authorities could have reasonably considered the difference as being one of a contractual nature, and the scope of any federal obligation to react could have been reasonably influenced by this perception.”<sup>328</sup>

398. The Respondent argues that the nature of the dispute brought to its attention was a contractual dispute not a dispute related to an investment, and that no new ground may be adduced after filing, otherwise, either the claim was immature or there was a new dispute.<sup>329</sup> The Respondent notes that the Claimant has not determined what specific duty to act it has breached under the BIT, and that the standard allegedly breached requires active behavior and not simply omissions in the duty of care.<sup>330</sup>

399. The Respondent also contests the relevance of cases such as AAPL and AMT which involved physical destruction of facilities of the investor by the armed forces. As for the relevance of CME, the Respondent points out that it is questionable to adduce CME without referring to Lauder where, on the basis of the same facts, the tribunal reached the opposite conclusion.<sup>331</sup>

400. As a final argument, the Respondent requests the Tribunal, in examining Argentina's liability, to consider that, "during the period under review the country was undergoing the worst economic, social and institutional crisis in its history."<sup>332</sup>

401. In its Reply, the Claimant observes that the Respondent confuses "its obligation to comply affirmatively with the BIT standards in its own conduct with its ultimate responsibility under international law for violations of the BIT by its political subdivisions."<sup>333</sup> Acts or omissions of the Province that violate the BIT are "necessarily and automatically" the responsibility of Argentina under international law. Furthermore, it is not correct that Azurix simply requested the good offices of Argentina in a contractual dispute. In its response, Argentina ignores clear statements in the communications of the Claimant addressed to Argentina whereby the latter is informed not only of contractual breaches but also of deviations from the regulatory framework and arbitrary acts of the officers and entities of the Province which constitute violations of the BIT "for which the Argentine Republic is directly responsible." (letter of January 5, 2001). In another letter dated May 24, 2001, Azurix stated:

"The purpose of this letter is to reiterate the need for the Argentine Republic to rectify the failure to comply with its obligations under the BIT, international law and the Concession Agreement. The Argentine Republic has an obligation to prevent violations of the BIT and international law within its territory whether committed by the federal government or its political subdivisions. The federal government has an obligation to prevent expropriations [without compensation] by it or its political subdivisions. Azurix requests that the Argentine Republic take all necessary actions to prevent such violations ...”<sup>334</sup>

402. The Claimant considers that it has amply made its case on the responsibility of Argentina for the acts and omissions of the Province under international law, and that , “It is unnecessary, and perhaps confusing, to analyze the GOA’s liability as ‘absolute’ or ‘strict’ for the acts of its political subdivisions”, as mentioned by the Respondent.<sup>335</sup>

403. As regards the allegation of the Respondent that no new grounds may be stated, Rule 40 of the Arbitration Rules permits a party to present incidental, ancillary or additional claims arising directly out of the subject matter of the dispute not later than the reply memorial.<sup>336</sup>

404. The Claimant re-affirms that the standard of full protection and security is not limited to basic police functions as alleged by Argentina. The Claimant finds nothing in the language of the BIT that would limit the application of this standard to issues of physical security and protection. According to the Claimant, this standard requires the government to exercise “vigilance and use due diligence within its political and legal system to protect investments.”<sup>337</sup>

405. In its Rejoinder, the Respondent refers to Tecmed that held that “the guarantee of full protection and security is not absolute and does not impose strict liability upon the State that grants it.” Based on this interpretation of the standard, the Respondent concludes that the argument of the Claimant cannot be accepted.<sup>338</sup>

(b) Considerations of the Tribunal

406. While the cases of APPL and AMT refer to physical security, there are other cases in which tribunals have found that full protection and security has been breached because the investment was subject to unfair and inequitable treatment –

Occidental v. Ecuador – or, conversely, they have held that the obligation of fair and equitable treatment was breached because there was a failure to provide full protection and security – Wena Hotels v. Egypt. The inter-relationship of the two standards indicates that full protection and security may be breached even if no physical violence or damage occurs as it was the case in Occidental v. Ecuador.

407. In some bilateral investment treaties, fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security appear as a single standard, in others as separate protections. The BIT falls in the last category; the two phrases describing the protection of investments appear sequentially as different obligations in Article II.2(a): “Investment shall at all times be accorded fair and equitable treatment, shall enjoy full protection and security and...” The tribunal in Occidental based its decision on a clause worded exactly like in the BIT, and nonetheless considered that, after it had found that the fair and equitable standard had been breached, “the question of whether in addition there has been a breach of full protection and security under this Article becomes moot as a treatment that is not fair and equitable automatically entails an absence of full protection and security.”<sup>339</sup>

408. The Tribunal is persuaded of the interrelationship of fair and equitable treatment and the obligation to afford the investor full protection and security. The cases referred to above show that full protection and security was understood to go beyond protection and security ensured by the police. It is not only a matter of physical security; the stability afforded by a secure investment environment is as important from an investor’s point of view. The Tribunal is aware that in recent free trade agreements signed by the United States, for instance, with Uruguay, full protection and security is understood to be limited to the level of police protection required under customary international law. However, when the terms “protection and security” are qualified by “full” and no other adjective or explanation, they extend, in their ordinary meaning, the content of this standard beyond physical security. To conclude, the Tribunal, having held that the Respondent failed to provide fair and equitable treatment to the investment, finds that the Respondent also breached the standard of full protection and security under the BIT.

VIII. Compensation

1. Positions of the Parties

409. Azurix has requested full compensation for expropriation as required by the BIT under Article IV paragraph 1. Azurix has also argued that the expropriation was unlawful because it did not satisfy the form and substance requirements of due process nor was full or fair compensation paid. Therefore, Azurix claims that it is entitled to enhanced compensation that, in the words of the Permanent Court of International Justice in the Chorzów Factory case, “wipe-out all the consequences of the illegal act and re-establish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if the act had not been committed.”<sup>340</sup>

410. Azurix has proposed four possible dates for purposes of determining the compensation due for expropriation: (A) July 1999 just before the issuance of Resolution 1/99 on August 4; (B) December 2000, when the MSP Undersecretary had promised that the tariff issues would be resolved in favor of Azurix and they were not; (C) August 2001 when the Province denied any breaches of the Concession Agreement, the Tariff Regime or the Regulatory Framework and refused to permit ABA to fully recover the Canon payment; and (D) November 2001 when Decree No 2598/01 was issued refusing to accept ABA’s notice of termination of October 5, 2001. Professor Riesman in his opinion cautioned that, in a case of creeping expropriation, the use of a later date may reward the Province for its own arbitrary conduct in regulating the Concession.<sup>341</sup> Azurix takes the position that “No matter what date is fixed by this Tribunal, the Province should not be permitted to benefit from its own unlawful acts.”<sup>342</sup>

411. Azurix discusses the compensation methodologies for expropriation, and submits claims under each one of them without expressing a preference for one or another method. Under the actual investment method, Azurix claims to have invested

$449 million when it acquired the Concession, $102.4 million in additional capital contributions to ABA, and $15 million on consequential costs including corporate expenditures and legal costs related to negotiations with the Province. Under the book value method and based on NERA's report calculation for each of the four dates referred to above, Azurix considers that the book value of the Concession in August 1999 was $516.9 million, in January 2001 $484.6 million, in August 2001 $483.9, and in November 2001 $482.2 million.<sup>343</sup> Alternatively, Azurix submits the possibility for the Tribunal to consider compensation based on unjust enrichment - on the benefits received by the Province. On this basis, the Province was enriched by the Canon, the further investment of $102.4 million, and the time value - interest - of the funds. In the case of the Canon, Azurix submits that in accordance with the NERA report, the consideration of the time value would raise it to $450.5.<sup>344</sup>

412. Additionally, Azurix has claimed the amount due by customers to ABA when the Concession was taken over by the Province and which the Province publicly requested the customers not to pay to ABA. According to Azurix, these accounts receivable amounted approximately to AR$120 million.

413. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent does not comment on the compensation claimed by Azurix. Azurix in its Reply, considers that, by not responding, Argentina has conceded Azurix's damages and reaffirms them. In its Rejoinder, Argentina notes that Azurix claimed compensation only for expropriation and questioned the dates chosen by the Claimant as possible dates for purposes of calculating compensation. Furthermore, Argentina argues that the standard of compensation under the BIT is the fair market value and that value cannot be the amount paid for the Concession when extraneous considerations influence it. Argentina recalls that the bid of Azurix was out of line with the other bids for the concession areas and calculates that, "considering the bids that would have maximized the revenues of the Province from those regions [A, C1, C2, C3, and C4] excluding Azurix's bid, the maximum amount that would have been paid by the other bidders for the ABA Concession is

38.52 million dollars.”<sup>345</sup> In any case, argues Argentina, Azurix would not be entitled to more than 90% of the fair market value of ABA and the effect of the deep economic crisis that affected the country on asset values cannot be disregarded.<sup>346</sup>

414. In the Post-Hearing Memorial, the Claimant has defined “full compensation” as including, as a minimum, “(i) the unamortized value of all investments made, including the US$438.55 million Canon payment and Azurix’s additional capital contributions to ABA through 2002 of US$114,864,000, which were lost as a result of the GOA [Government of Argentina]’s actions, (ii) discrete damages in excess of US$55 million, and (iii) costs.”<sup>347</sup>

415. On compensation, three issues have to be addressed by the Tribunal: (i) the difference in compensation claimed by Azurix in its various submissions, (ii) the starting point for the calculation of damages, and (iii) the principle upon which those damages should be based.

416. First, the Tribunal notes that Azurix’s request for compensation in its Memorial is limited to amounts related to the Canon payment, the additional capital contributions made, the accounts receivable and consequential costs. This request is confirmed in the Reply. In the Post-Hearing Memorial the accounts receivable are not included in the definition of “full compensation” and, on the other hand, an amount in excess of $55 million is claimed on account of discrete damages detailed in the NERA report. The Tribunal considers that the Post-Hearing Memorial is not the place to change the submissions for compensation since the simultaneous timing of the memorials of the parties does not permit the other party to comment on the changes made. Thus, the Tribunal shall retain for consideration the compensation requested in the Memorial and confirmed in the Reply. The Tribunal is aware that the discrete damages listed in the NERA report are part of the allegations made in the Memorial but they were not included in the calculation of compensation pleaded then by the Claimant.

417. As to the second issue, various dates in 2001 have been proposed by Azurix. In a case of direct expropriation, the moment when expropriation has occurred can usually be established without difficulty. In the case where indirect or “creeping” expropriation has taken place or, as the Santa Elena tribunal put it, “the date on which the governmental ‘interference’ has deprived the owner of his rights or has made those rights practically useless”<sup>348</sup>, it will be much more difficult for the tribunal to establish the exact time of the expropriation. The difficulty is no less severe, unless the decision is based on a single act creating liability, when the Tribunal concludes that an investor has not received fair and equitable treatment or that it has been subjected to arbitrary treatment or that the host State has not provided the investor the full protection and security guaranteed by the BIT. The Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal, in one of its awards, decided that “where the alleged expropriation is carried out by way of a series of interferences in the enjoyment of property”, the date of the expropriation is “the day when the interference has ripened into a more or less irreversible deprivation of the property rather than on the beginning date of the events”.<sup>349</sup> It has been sometimes argued that applying this formula would lead to an inequitable situation where the investment’s value would be assessed at the time when the cumulative actions of the State would have led to a dramatic devaluation of the investment. However, such a view does not take into account that, in assessing fair market value, a tribunal would establish that value in a hypothetical context where the State would not have resorted to such maneuvers but would have fully respected the provisions of the treaty and the contract concerned.

418. There can be legitimate disagreement as to the date in 2001 at which the cumulative actions of the Province led to breaches of the Treaty; but, in the Tribunal’s view, there can be no doubt that, by March 12, 2002 when the Province put an end to the Concession, alleging abandonment by ABA, its breaches of the BIT had reached a watershed. For purpose of calculating the compensation due to Azurix, this is the date which will be retained by the Tribunal.

419. The Tribunal will now proceed to deal with the third issue relating to compensation, i.e., the basis upon which the damages should be assessed. The Tribunal points out that the Treaty only provides for the measure of compensation in the case of an expropriation that meets the Treaty's requirements that it be done for a public purpose and be non-discriminatory. In such case, Article IV (1) of the BIT provides:

“Compensation shall be equivalent to the fair market value of the expropriated investment immediately before the expropriatory action was taken or became known, whichever is earlier; be paid without delay; include interest at a commercially reasonable rate from the date of expropriation; be fully realizable; and be freely transferable at the prevailing market rate of exchange on the date of expropriation”.

420. The tribunal, in the recent CMS v. Argentina case, when faced with a similar situation, was “persuaded that the cumulative nature of the breaches discussed here is best dealt with by resorting to the standard of fair market value. While this standard figures prominently in respect of expropriation, it is not excluded that it might also be appropriate for breaches different from expropriation if their effect results in important long-term losses”.<sup>350</sup>

421. Under NAFTA, tribunals which have held that a standard of protection was breached and no expropriation had occurred were in the same position as the Tribunal, since NAFTA does not provide for a measure of compensation in such situations. In three NAFTA cases, tribunals awarded damages for breaches other than expropriation, S.D. Myers, Pope & Talbot and Feldman. The tribunal in Feldman after having considered the other two cases concluded: “It is obvious that in both of these earlier cases, which as here involved non-expropriation violations of Chapter 11, the tribunals exercised considerable discretion in fashioning what they believed to be reasonable approaches to damages consistent with the requirements of NAFTA.”<sup>351</sup>

422. In fact, in S.D. Myers the tribunal considered that the lack of a measure of compensation in NAFTA for breaches other than a finding of expropriation reflected the intention of the parties to leave it open to the tribunals to determine it in light of the circumstances of the case taking into account the principles of both international law and the provisions of NAFTA.<sup>352</sup>

423. In MTD, another ICSID case, the tribunal found that the respondent had breached the fair and equitable treatment obligation and accepted the Claimants' proposal to apply the standard of compensation formulated in Chorzów. The tribunal noted that the Respondent had not objected to the application of this standard and that "no differentiation has been made about the standard of compensation in relation to the grounds on which it is justified. Therefore, the Tribunal will apply the standard of compensation proposed by the Claimants to the extent of the damages awarded."<sup>353</sup>

424. In the present case, the Tribunal is of the view that a compensation based on the fair market value of the Concession would be appropriate, particularly since the Province has taken it over. Fair market value has been defined as: "the price, expressed in terms of cash equivalents, at which property would change hands between a hypothetical willing and able buyer and a hypothetical and able seller, acting at arm's length in an open and unrestricted market, when neither is under compulsion to buy or sell and when both have reasonable knowledge of the relevant facts."<sup>354</sup>

425. Azurix has submitted, in its Memorial, two methodologies to measure fair market value in the present case: the actual investment and the book value. It has asserted in addition that the argument in support of using actual investment is compelling as the investment is recent and highly ascertainable. The Tribunal agrees that the actual investment method is a valid one in this instance. However, the Tribunal considers that a significant adjustment is required to arrive at the real value of the Canon paid by the Claimant.

426. First of all, in the Tribunal's view, no well-informed investor, in March 2002, would have paid for the Concession the price (and more particularly, the Canon) paid by Azurix in mid-1999, irrespective of the actions taken by the Province and of the economic situation of Argentina at that time. In that regard, the Tribunal refers to some of the concerns expressed by OPIC at the time it denied financing the investment plan of ABA. As already noted, OPIC pointed out the size of the investments needed to achieve the Concession's objectives as compared to the estimated revenues expected from the tariffs in effect, and considered that failure to agree on a modification of the Concession in order to establish a sustainable situation was an obstacle to OPIC's financing. Yet, at the time Azurix won the Concession, the Province accepted the price paid by Azurix as the fair market price for the Concession and the Province benefited from the alleged aggressive price paid. Furthermore, there is no doubt that the loss in value is partly attributable to the actions of the Province and the politicization of the Concession.

427. More importantly, the Tribunal refers to the conclusions it reached concerning the RPI review process and the impossibility of including the Canon in the recoverable asset base for the purpose of tariff increases. Azurix has argued that the right price for an auctioned item is the price paid by the winning bidder. Argentina, for its part, argues that the fair market value of the Concession should be based on the much lower competing bids. The function of the Tribunal is not to second-guess the values established by the various bidders at the time of the privatization of AGOSBA, but to try and determine what an independent and well-informed third party would have been willing to pay for the Concession in March 2002, in a context where the Province would have honored its obligations. In that regard, being aware that the RPI tariff adjustment was not automatic and that the Canon could only be recoverable over the remaining duration (some 27 years and 9 ½ months) of the Concession and on the basis of the existing tariffs as adjusted periodically through the review process spelled out in the Concession Agreement, such investor would have realized that his only hope of recouping the Canon was essentially through expansion of the system and through efficiency improvements between the periodic 5-year tariff reviews. On the other hand, as to the RPI review process, it would have been reasonable for such an investor to conclude that the ORAB would have approved tariff increases from time to time to take into account the Argentine inflation rate, if not the American one.

428. At the same time, the Tribunal cannot ignore the fact that the Province, through its actions and inaction, contributed to the loss in value of the Concession. When the Province accepted Azurix's bid, it considered it as the fair market value for the Concession and the Province benefited from the alleged aggressive price paid.

429. Considering those factors and valuing the Canon at present-day value, the Tribunal is of the opinion that no more than a fraction of the Canon could realistically have been recuperated under the existing Concession Agreement. The Tribunal therefore concludes that the value of the Canon on March 12, 2002 should be established at US$60,000,000 (sixty million US dollars).

430. Secondly, Azurix should be compensated, as part of the fair market value of the Concession, for the additional investments to finance ABA. In its Memorial, Azurix has claimed US$102.4 million in additional capital contributions to the initial sum invested of US$449 million of which US$438,555,551 represent the payment for the Canon. The amount of US$102.4 million when added to the difference between the initial sum invested and the Canon results in investments additional to the Canon of US$112,844,446 (one hundred and twelve million eight hundred forty-four thousand four hundred forty-six US dollars). However, the Tribunal considers that this amount should be reduced by US$7,603,693 (seven million six hundred and three thousand six hundred ninety-three US dollars) which represent the aggregate of the claims presented by Azurix on account of damages which the Tribunal has found to be related to contractual claims -those related to the works listed in Circular 31(A) except for Bahía Blanca<sup>355</sup>- and that should be borne by Azurix as part of its business risk. Therefore, the amount awarded on account of additional investments is US$105,240,753 (one hundred and five million two hundred forty thousand seven hundred fifty-three US dollars).

431. Thirdly, Azurix has claimed AR$120 million on account of unpaid bills to ABA for services rendered prior to the take over of the Concession by the Province and which the Province directed customers not to pay to ABA. According to Argentina, only an amount of about half million pesos has been paid and it is held separately. The Tribunal notes that the amount claimed by Azurix represents all bills due by customers on March 7, 2002. The Tribunal considers that this amount is owed by the Province to ABA and, therefore, should not be part of the compensation awarded to Azurix..

432. Fourthly, Azurix has claimed US$15,000,000 (fifteen million US dollars) on account of consequential damages in order to wipe out the consequences of a breach of an international obligation. This amount relates to: (i) corporate expenditures for negotiations with the Province, termination of the Concession and transfer of the service (US$7.1 million), and (ii) costs for the preparation, registration, and participation in these proceedings (US$7.9million). The Tribunal will consider the second component as part of the award of costs of these proceedings. As for the first component, the Tribunal finds that it has not received sufficient evidence in support of such costs and that, in any case, these are costs related to the business risk that Azurix took when it decided to make the investment. Therefore, while the Tribunal agrees that in principle compensation should be such that wipes out the consequences of an illegal act, in the circumstances of this particular case, the Tribunal does not find the amount claimed to be justified.

433. Fifthly, bearing in mind the responsibility of the Province in the failure of the Concession and the fact that the implementation of the POES was spread over a five-year period, while the Concession was cancelled after less than half of that time, the Tribunal concludes that Azurix should bear no liability with regard to the non-execution of that plan.

434. The Claimant has proposed, as an alternative to the fair market value of the investment, that compensation be based on “the theory of unjust enrichment”. In this respect, the Claimant has referred to the decision of the court (in fact, an arbitral tribunal) in Lena Goldfields which chose to base the award on unjust enrichment rather than damages. As stated by the court and quoted in the Memorial:

“The Court further decides that the conduct of the Government was a breach of the contract going to the root of it. In consequence, Lena is entitled to be relieved from the burden of further obligations thereunder and to be compensated in money for the value of the benefits of which it had been wrongfully deprived. On ordinary legal principles this constitutes a right of action for damages, but the Court prefers to base its award on the principle of “unjust enrichment,” although in its opinion the money result is the same.”<sup>356</sup>

435. The Tribunal observes that the court did not give any reason for its choice of unjust enrichment as opposed to damages. This decision has been criticized for its lack of clarity and the reference to the same result in monetary terms,

“raises the suspicion that these considerations, far from being decisive for the outcome of the award, were merely used to add an appearance of broad general justice. This case, although frequently quoted in support of a ‘principle against unjustified enrichment’ in international law, has probably contributed nothing but a great deal of confusion.”<sup>357</sup>

436. The Tribunal further observes that damages and unjust enrichment are conceptually distinct in terms of the principles of liability and the measure of restitution. In the case of damages, liability rests on an unlawful act, which is not necessarily the case in unjust enrichment. As to compensation on account of an unlawful act, it is based on the loss suffered, while, in the case of unjust enrichment, it is based on restitution: for instance, what can be claimed, at least under some civil law regimes, is restitution of the lower of the amount contributed by the impoverished or the gain made by the enriched.<sup>358</sup>

437. The Iran-US Tribunal, which has dealt with claims based on the principle of unjust enrichment on several occasions, defined the principle of unjust enrichment and its applicability as follows:

“There must have been an enrichment of one party to the detriment of the other, and both must arise as a consequence of the same act or event. There must be no justification for the enrichment, and no contractual or other remedy available to the injured party whereby he might seek compensation from the party enriched.”<sup>359</sup>

438. The Tribunal has found that Argentina breached the Treaty, an unlawful act under international law. The Claimant has chosen the remedy provided for in the Treaty and the Tribunal has also found that the measure of compensation applicable in this case is not the restitution of the Claimant’s investment in respect of which the breach has been found but its fair market value before the breach occurred. For these reasons the Tribunal has not pursued the alternative of compensation on account of unjust enrichment proposed by the Claimant.

IX. Interest

439. The Claimant has requested the award of interest on all damages suffered at the average rate applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit compounded semi-annually. The Respondent has affirmed that it would not be legitimate to award compound interest and that, were the Tribunal to find for Azurix, a simple rate of interest should be used.

440. The Tribunal considers that compound interest reflects the reality of financial transactions, and best approximates the value lost by an investor. Therefore, compound interest should be paid on the amount of damages awarded as from the date at which the Province terminated the Concession – March 12, 2002 - until the date of dispatch of this award to the parties at the average rate applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit. In case the amount awarded is not paid in full 60 days after such date, the Respondent shall pay interest at the rate applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit until the day of payment in full and such rate shall also be compounded.

X. Costs

441. The Claimant has partially prevailed on the merits. The Tribunal declined to issue the provisional order requested by the Claimant and Argentina failed in its objections to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal and its challenge to the president of the Tribunal. The Claimant did not submit its own copy of envelopes 1 and 2 as requested by the Tribunal, and Argentina requested that the Claimant bear the costs related to this procedural incident. For these reasons, the Tribunal decides: (1) that each party shall pay its own costs and counsel fees, and (2) that the arbitrators' fees and expenses and the cost of the ICSID Secretariat shall be borne by Argentina, except for the amount of US$34,496 (thirty-four thousand four hundred ninety six U.S. dollars), which shall be borne by the Claimant and correspond to the said provisional measures and the procedural incident.

XI. Decision

442. For the reasons above stated, the Tribunal unanimously decides:

1. That the Respondent did not breach Article IV(1) of the BIT.
2. That the Respondent breached Article II(2)(a) of the BIT by failing to accord fair and equitable treatment to Azurix's investment.
3. That the Respondent failed to accord full protection and security to Azurix's investment under Article II(2)(a) of the BIT.
4. That the Respondent breached Article II(2)(b) of the BIT by taking arbitrary measures that impaired Azurix's use and enjoyment of its investment.
5. To award compensation to Azurix on account of the fair market value of the Concession in the amount of US$165,240,753 (one hundred sixty-five million two hundred forty thousand seven hundred fifty-three US dollars), including in part the additional investments made by Azurix to finance ABA.
6. To award interest compounded semi-annually on the amount referred to in paragraph 5 of this decision: (i) as from March 12, 2002 to June 30, 2006 at the rate of 2.44%, which is the average rate applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit during that period, and (ii) as from 60 days after the dispatch of this award to the parties until such amount has been fully paid at the average rate applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit.

7. That each party shall be responsible for their own costs and counsel fees, and the Respondent shall bear the fees and expenses of the arbitrators and the costs of the ICSID Secretariat except for US$34,496 (thirty-four thousand four hundred ninety six U.S. dollars) which shall be borne by Claimant.

8. That all other claims are dismissed.

I. Procedural History

1. On May 23, 2002, the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (“ICSID” or the “Centre”) received from Siemens A.G. (“Siemens” or “Claimant”) a request for arbitration against the Argentine Republic (“Respondent”, “Argentina” or “Government”). On June 7, 2002, the Centre acknowledged receipt of the request in accordance with Rule 5 of the ICSID Rules of Procedure for the Institution of Conciliation and Arbitration Proceedings (“Institution Rules”) and informed the Claimant that it would not take further action until it had received the prescribed lodging fee as provided by Institution Rule 5(1)(b). On June 13, 2002, the Centre acknowledged receipt of the prescribed lodging fee by the Claimant and transmitted a copy of the request to Argentina and to the Argentine Embassy in Washington, D.C. in accordance with Institution Rule 5(2).

2. According to Article 36(3) of the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States (“the Convention”), the Secretary-General of the Centre registered the request for arbitration on July 17, 2002. In accordance with Institution Rule 7, the Secretary-General notified the parties on the same date of the registration of the request and invited them to proceed to constitute an Arbitral Tribunal as soon as possible.

3. On August 7, 2002, the parties agreed that the Arbitral Tribunal would consist of three arbitrators, one arbitrator to be appointed by each party and the third, who shall serve as the President of the Tribunal, to be appointed by the agreement of the parties. The Claimant appointed Judge Charles N. Brower, a U.S. national, and the Respondent appointed Professor Domingo Bello Janeiro, a Spanish national. However, the parties failed to agree on the appointment of the third, presiding arbitrator. On October 21, 2002, the Claimant requested that the third, presiding arbitrator be appointed in accordance with Article 38 of the Convention and Rule 4 of the ICSID Rules of Procedure for Arbitration Proceedings (“Arbitration Rules”).

4. After consulting the parties, Dr. Andrés Rigo Sureda, a national of Spain, was appointed by the Centre as the third, presiding arbitrator. In accordance with Rule 6(1) of the Arbitration Rules, on December 19, 2002, the Secretary-General notified the parties that all three arbitrators accepted their appointment and that the Arbitral Tribunal was deemed to be constituted and the proceedings to have begun on that date. On the same date, pursuant to ICSID Administrative and Financial Regulation 25, the parties were informed that Mr. Gonzalo Flores, Senior Counsel, ICSID, would serve as Secretary of the Arbitral Tribunal. The Tribunal held its first session with the parties in Washington, D.C. on February 13, 2003.

5. Mr. Guido Santiago Tawil of M. & M. Bomchil and Mr. Peter Gnam of Siemens A.G. represent the Claimant. Messrs. Tawil and Gnam represented the Claimant at the first session. Mr. Osvaldo César Guglielmino, Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina, represents the Respondent. Messrs. Ignacio Suárez Anzorena and Carlos Lo Turco, acting on instructions from the then Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina, and Mr. Osvaldo Siseles, from the Ministerio de Economía, represented the Respondent at the first session.

6. During the first session, the parties agreed that the Tribunal had been properly constituted in accordance with the ICSID Convention and the Arbitration Rules and that they did not have any objections to any members of the Tribunal. It was also noted that the proceedings would be conducted under the Arbitration Rules in force since September 26, 1984.

7. During the first session, the parties also agreed on several other procedural matters, which were later set forth in the written minutes signed by the President and the Secretary of the Tribunal. Regarding the written submissions, the Tribunal, after consulting with the parties, fixed the following time limits for the presentation of the parties' pleadings: The Claimant would file a Memorial within 90 (ninety) days from the date of the first session; the Respondent would file a Counter-Memorial within 90 (ninety) days from its receipt of the Claimant's Memorial; the Claimant would file a Reply within 60 (sixty) days from its receipt of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial, and the Respondent would file a Rejoinder within 60 (sixty) days from its receipt of the Claimant's Reply.

8. The Tribunal further noted that, according to the Arbitration Rules, the Respondent has the right to raise any objections to jurisdiction no later than the expiration of the time limit fixed for the filing of its Counter-Memorial, and that, in the event that the Respondent would raise objections to jurisdiction, the following schedule would apply: the Claimant would file its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction within the same number of days used by Argentina to file its objections to jurisdiction, but in any event, the Claimant would have a minimum of 60 (sixty) days to file its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction; the Respondent would file its Reply on jurisdiction within 30 (thirty) days from its receipt of the Claimant's Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction; and the Claimant would file its Rejoinder on jurisdiction within 30 (thirty) days from its receipt of the Respondent's Reply on jurisdiction. It was also agreed that, if the Respondent would raise any objections to jurisdiction and proceedings would be resumed following the filing of such objections (because the Tribunal dismisses the objections or because it decides to join them with the merits of the dispute), the calendar agreed for the merits would recommence, and the Respondent would have the remaining number of days at the date of the filing of its objections to jurisdiction for the filing of its Counter-Memorial on the merits.

9. On March 14, 2003, the Claimant filed its Memorial on the merits and accompanying documentation.

10. On March 24, 2003, Ms. Claudia Frutos-Peterson, ICSID, Counsel, replaced Mr. Flores as the Secretary of the Tribunal.

11. On April 8, 2003, the parties agreed that the hearing on jurisdiction would take place on January 20-22, 2004, in Washington, D.C.

12. By letter of June 10, 2003, the Argentine Republic requested an extension of time due to the institutional succession in the Argentine Government to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits and/or to raise any objections to the jurisdiction of the Centre until August 4, 2003. By letter of June 18, 2003, the Claimant objected to the extension requested by the Respondent.

13. On June 23, 2003, due to the particular circumstances, the Tribunal granted the extension sought by Argentina and informed the parties that if Argentine filed its Counter-Memorial without objecting to jurisdiction, the Claimant, if requested, would be granted a similar extension of time to file its Reply on the merits. The Tribunal further noted that if the Argentine Republic filed any objections to jurisdiction, the Claimant would have the same number of days used by the Argentine Republic to file such objections for the filing of its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction.

14. On July 1, 2003, Mr. Horacio Daniel Rosatti informed the Tribunal that he had been appointed Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina.

15. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 41(1), on August 4, 2003, the Respondent filed a Memorial raising objections to the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal. In its Memorial on jurisdiction, Argentina requested the Tribunal for a 45 (forty-five) day extension of the time limit to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits in the event that the Tribunal would declare that it has competence over this matter.

16. Pursuant to Arbitration Rule 41(3), on August 7, 2003, the Tribunal suspended the proceedings on the merits.

17. After inviting the Claimant to present any observations on the time limit extension requested by the Respondent, the Tribunal informed the parties on August 21, 2003, that it was premature to decide on the extension of the time limit to file the Counter-Memorial on the merits requested by Argentina.

18. On October 16, 2003, the Claimant filed its Counter-Memorial on jurisdiction. On November 17, 2003, the Respondent filed its Reply on jurisdiction.

19. On December 10, 2004, the Respondent requested to postpone the hearing on jurisdiction scheduled for January 20-22, 2004 until February 15, 2004. On December 11, 2004, the Tribunal invited the Claimant to present any observations to the Respondent's request. On the same date, the Claimant presented its observations asking the Tribunal to reject the Respondent's request and to maintain the previous agreed schedule for the hearing on jurisdiction.

20. After considering the Respondent's request to postpone the hearing on jurisdiction, the Claimant's observations thereon, the fact that the development of the proceeding would not be affected due to the brevity of the postponement requested, the availability of the parties, and the agreement of the same to have a two-day hearing, the Tribunal, by letter of December 19, 2003, informed the parties of its decision to schedule the hearing on jurisdiction on February 3 and 4, 2004.

21. On December 24, 2003, the Claimant filed its Rejoinder on jurisdiction.

22. As previously decided by the Tribunal, the hearing on jurisdiction took place in Washington, D.C. on February 3 and 4, 2004. At the hearing, the Claimant was represented by Mr. Guido Santiago Tawil, Mr. Peter Gnam, Mr. Stephan Signer and Ms. María Inés Corrá. Messrs. Tawil and Gnam addressed the Tribunal on behalf of the Claimant. The Respondent was represented by Ms. Andrea Gualde, Ms. Ana Badillos, and Mr. Jorge Barraguirre from the Procuración del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina, as well as by Messrs. Osvaldo Siseles from the Ministerio de Economía, and Mr. Roberto Hermida from the Embassy of Argentina in Washington, D.C. Ms. Gualde and Mr. Barraguirre addressed the Tribunal on behalf of the Respondent. During the hearing, the Tribunal also questioned to the parties in accordance with Arbitration Rule 32(3).

23. On July 2, 2004, the Respondent requested to extend its 45-day extension request to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits to 75 days, in the event that the Tribunal would declare that it had jurisdiction.

24. On August 3, 2004, the Tribunal issued its Decision on Jurisdiction, which is part of this Award, declaring that the dispute was within the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of the Tribunal.

25. On that same date, the Tribunal issued Procedural Order No. 1, establishing the timetable for the continuation of the proceeding, after taking into consideration the reasons expressed by the Respondent in its requests for an extension of the time limit to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits and the observations of the Claimant. The timetable was decided as follows: the Respondent was to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits within 60 (sixty) days, counting from the date of that Procedural Order; the Claimant was to file its Reply within 60 (sixty) days from its receipt of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial, and the Respondent was to file its Rejoinder within 60 (sixty) days from its receipt of the Claimant's Reply. Two alternate dates were set for the hearing on the merits, and the parties were asked to inform the Secretariat on the number of days needed for the hearing.

26. On August 10, 2004, both parties requested the hearing on the merits to be held on April 4-15, 2005. Additionally, the Claimant reserved its right to request an extension, if needed, to file its Reply, in the understanding that such an extension should not change the hearing dates already set.

27. On August 16, 2004, Argentina notified the appointment of Mr. Osvaldo César Guglielmino as Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina.

28. On August 19, 2004, the Tribunal confirmed that the hearing on the merits was to be held on April 4-15, 2005, and that, if needed, the Tribunal would additionally be available on April 18-19, 2005. (Later on the parties confirmed to the Tribunal that there would be no need to extend the hearing to April 18-19, 2005).

29. On September 24, 2004, Argentina requested an additional extension of 15 (fifteen) days of the time limit to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits due to the recent appointment of Mr. Osvaldo César Guglielmino as Procurador del Tesoro de la Nación Argentina. By letter of September 29, 2004, the Claimant objected to the extension requested by the Respondent. After considering the Respondent's request and the Claimant's observations, the Tribunal, by letter also of September 29, 2004, granted the 15 day extension requested by the Respondent to file its Counter-Memorial on the merits, on the understanding that a similar extension, if requested, would be granted to the Claimant, and informed the parties that no further extensions would be authorized. The Tribunal also invited the parties to directly exchange their filings in Buenos Aires to avoid further delays.

30. In accordance with the Tribunal's decision, the Respondent filed its Counter-Memorial on the merits on October 19, 2004. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent requested the production of certain documents by the Claimant: (i) forward contract in US dollars ("dollars or "$"), (ii) financial statements of Siemens IT Services, S.A. ("SITS") from its commencement of business in Argentina, and (iii) financial statements of Siemens for the same period with respect to the registration of all operations transacted between SITS-Siemens and the rest of the affiliates of the Claimant parent corporation. By letter of December 1, 2004, the Claimant informed the Tribunal that it would submit, together with its Reply, a copy of SITS' financial statements for the fiscal years ended September 30 of 1997 to 2003 and the Annual Reports of Siemens for the fiscal years ended September 20 of 1997 to 2003.

31. On December 1, 2004, the Respondent filed an application to disqualify the President of the Tribunal under Article 57 of the Convention. On December 7, 2004, in accordance with Arbitration Rule 9(6), the two co-arbitrators informed the parties that the proceedings were suspended and that the schedule for the parties' submissions and the date for the hearing on the merits were to be maintained.

32. On December 14, 2004, the Claimant requested a 15-day extension to file its Reply on the merits, which was due on December 20, 2004. By letter of December 21, 2004, the two co-arbitrators granted the extension requested by the Claimant, in accordance with the Tribunal's letter of September 29, 2004. Accordingly, the Claimant was to file its Reply on the merits no later than January 4, 2005. The Claimant filed its Reply on the merits on December 27, 2004. However, due to the suspension of the proceedings, the Claimant's Reply was circulated neither to the Tribunal nor to Argentina. After considering several communications exchanged by the parties regarding whether to provide a copy of the Claimant's Reply to the Respondent, the co-arbitrators decided, with the agreement of the parties, that a copy of the Claimant's Reply be delivered directly to the Respondent in Buenos Aires and that the Respondent was to file its Rejoinder within 60 (sixty) days from the receipt of the Claimant's Reply, i.e., no later than March 14, 2005.

33. By letter of February 3, 2005, the co-arbitrators, having considered the parties' request to delay for some days the hearing on the merits, granted such request.

34. On March 2, 2005, the Respondent requested a 15-day extension to file its Rejoinder due to translation difficulties. On March 3, 2005, the Claimant expressed its opposition to granting the extension.

35. On March 10, 2005, the Secretariat sent the parties Judge Brower's and Professor Bello Janeiro's separate opinions concerning Argentina's proposal for disqualification. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 9, the proceeding was to remain suspended pending a decision on the disqualification proposal, and, therefore, the date for the hearing on the merits was postponed indefinitely. In addition, the 15-day extension requested by the Respondent to file its Rejoinder was granted, which was then to be filed no later than March 29, 2005.

36. On March 16, 2005, the Deputy Secretary-General of ICSID informed the parties that in accordance with Article 58 of the ICSID Convention, the Chairman of the Administrative Council was to decide on the Respondent's proposal for disqualification as the other members of the Tribunal were divided on the proposal. In addition, the Deputy Secretary-General also informed the parties that, because the President of the Tribunal had been a staff member of the World Bank and as proceeded in an earlier similar ICSID case, the request would be sent to the Secretary-General of the Permanent Court of Arbitration ("PCA") at The Hague to provide his recommendation on the disqualification proposal.

37. As directed, on March 29, 2005, the Respondent filed its Rejoinder on the merits.

38. On April 8, 2005, the parties were informed that the PCA would not hold a hearing with the parties, as requested by Argentina, but that it had agreed to receive any additional written information from the parties, besides that already filed by them and provided by ICSID to the PCA. Accordingly, the parties were informed on April 11, 2005, that considering Argentina's intention to send such additional information, the decision by the Secretary-General of the PCA on the disqualification proposal was postponed until April 15, 2005. On such a date, the Secretary-General of the PCA sent his recommendation to ICSID. Based on that recommendation, the Secretary-General of ICSID informed the parties on April 15, 2005 that the disqualification proposal was not sustained. In accordance with Arbitration Rule 9, the proceeding was resumed with the composition of the Arbitral Tribunal unchanged.

39. On April 15, 2005, two letters from the Respondent, dated December 7, 2004 and February 25, 2005, that had been received while the proceedings were suspended, were circulated. In its letters, the Respondent insisted on its request for the production of evidence by the Claimant of: (i) a copy of the "forward" contract, and (ii) a copy of SITS' financial statements and Siemens' annual reports for the periods therein indicated. The Respondent also requested a 30-day period for the examination of such documents.

40. On April 18 2005, the Claimant requested that the hearing on the merits be scheduled to take place at the earliest possible time.

41. By letter of April 25, 2005, the Claimant, by invitation of the Tribunal, filed its observations on the Respondent's letters of December 7, 2004 and February 25, 2005.

42. On April 26, 2005, the Tribunal informed the parties that the hearing on the merits would be held on October 10-21, 2005, in Washington, D.C.

43. Between June 7, 2005 and July 28, 2005, the parties exchanged multiple communications regarding the Respondent's document request. The Tribunal granted the Claimant and the Respondent, respectively, time to present observations with respect to the Respondent's document request, as well as with respect to the different documents presented by the Claimant in this regard, (Tribunal's letters of June 7 and 27, 2005, and July 15 and 26, 2005). On September 2, 2005, after taking note of the Respondent's letter of August 17, 2005, objecting to the documents provided by the Claimant in connection with the Respondent's document request, as well as the Claimant's response of August 22, 2005, the Tribunal informed the parties that the information filed by the Claimant was not the information that the Tribunal had requested on July 15, 2005. Consequently, the Tribunal ordered the Claimant to furnish the requested information no later than September 8, 2005.

44. On September 2, 2005, the parties filed a document with their comments on the Tribunal's directives concerning the organization of the hearing on the merits. In addition, the parties requested the Tribunal to fix a time limit in order for the parties to file additional documents to be used during the hearing. According to the agreement of the parties, such documents were to be limited to: (i) new issues brought up by the Respondent, its experts or witnesses in its Rejoinder; (ii) documents in support of the examination of witnesses and experts, and (iii) documents related to events that occurred after the parties' pleadings.

45. As instructed by the Tribunal, on September 9, 2005, the Claimant filed accounting information in connection with Siemens Nixdorf Informationssysteme A.G. (“SNI”)’s investment in SITS. The Tribunal, by letter of September 12, 2005, invited the Respondent to make any observations on the documents filed by the Claimant no later than September 29, 2005.

46. Between September 9, 2005 and September 15, 2005, in accordance with the Tribunal’s instructions of September 2, 2005, the parties informed the Tribunal of the names of the witnesses and experts that they were planning to examine and cross examine during the hearing as well as their agreement on the order of appearance for the witnesses and experts. (Respondent’s letters of September 9 and September 14, 2006, and Claimant’s letter of September 15, 2006).

47. On September 15, 2005, the Tribunal set September 23, 2005 as a deadline for the parties to object to the additional documents that were to be filed respectively by the Claimant and the Respondent.

48. As instructed by the Tribunal, the parties filed their respective additional documents on September 16, 2005, and on September 21, 2005, the Claimant submitted further information with respect to the capital contributions made by SNI in SITS.

49. On September 27, 2005, following the Tribunal’s invitation of that same date, the Respondent made certain observations with regard to the information filed by the Claimant on September 9 and 21, 2005 in connection with SNI’s investment in SITS.

50. On September 28, 2005, the Claimant rebutted the observations made by the Respondent by letter of September 23, 2005, with regard to the additional documents that had been filed by the Claimant on September 16, 2005.

51. In connection with the Respondent’s observations filed on September 27, 2005, the Claimant, by letter of October 3, 2005, offered, among other things, to submit, if the Tribunal so requested, a copy of SITS’s books related to its expenditures, as well as any other additional documentary information that the Tribunal may consider appropriate.

52. On October 4, 2005, having taken into account the parties’ communications with regard to their additional documents, the Tribunal informed the parties of its decision to: (i) reject certain additional documents filed by the Respondent, which referred to an issue that had been known to the Respondent since 1998, and had not been previously raised; (ii) request explanations from both parties with regard to certain additional documents; (iii) admit other additional documents filed by the Claimant for the reasons stated by the Claimant's letter of September 28, 2005; and (iv) subject the admission of certain exhibits filed by the Claimant to the timely submission of further explanations from the Claimant in such respect. The Tribunal set October 6, 2005 as the deadline for the parties to provide the information therein requested, and the parties did so.

53. By letter of October 4, 2005, the Claimant agreed to the modification of the schedule for the appearance of the witnesses and experts during the hearing requested by the Respondent by a letter of that same date.

54. On October 5, 2005, following the Tribunal's invitation of October 3, 2005, the Respondent filed observations with regard to the Claimant's objections raised on September 30, 2005 to the inclusion of Mr. Claudio Antonio Michalina as a member of Argentina's delegation to the hearing on the merits. According to the Claimant, Mr. Michalina was not part of the legal team, but rather an assistant to one of the Respondent's witnesses, Mr. Daniel Eduardo Martín.

55. All the pending matters raised before the Tribunal were decided on October 7, 2005, before the hearing on the merits took place. The Tribunal ratified the rejection of the Respondent's submission of certain additional documents, because they had been known to the Respondent since 1998. The Tribunal also decided that Mr. Michalina could attend the hearing because each party decides who attends the hearings in its representation. Regarding the Claimant's accounting information requested by the Respondent, the Tribunal decided to accept the information provided by the Claimant, to take note of the Claimant's willingness to submit SITS' accounting books, should the Tribunal need them, and to declare that the Claimant had complied with the filing of the supporting documents in connection with SNI's investment in SITS.

56. On October 7, 2005, the Respondent, referring to the Claimant's letter of September 28, 2005, ratified its objections of September 23, 2005 to the new evidence filed by the Claimant.

57. The hearing on the merits took place on October 10-17, 2005, in Washington, D.C., present at the hearing were:

58. As per request of the Tribunal, the Claimant filed during the hearing SITS's accounting books ("Mayor", "Caja" and "IVA") for the relevant periods.

59. As instructed by the Tribunal, on November 23, 2005, the parties filed their post-hearing briefs.

60. On November 23, 2005, the Respondent filed certain observations concerning the additional accounting information provided by the Claimant during the hearing and, on November 30, 2005, filed a report with accompanying documentation on the accounting documents provided by the Claimant, as well as on "the assessment conducted and Siemens A.G.'s claim for damages". The Respondent's letter of November 23, 2005 was contested by the Claimant on December 21, 2005. The Tribunal invited the Respondent to present any observations on this letter by January 14, 2006.

61. On January 17, 2006, the Claimant noted that the Respondent had not filed observations on the Claimant's letter of December 21, 2005 before the deadline set by the Tribunal, and requested the Tribunal to declare the proceeding closed pursuant to Arbitration Rule 38(1).

62. On January 26, 2006, the Respondent informed the Tribunal that it had not received the Tribunal's letter of December 27, 2005, and rejected the Claimant's request for the closure of the proceeding.

63. On January 30, 2006, the Claimant sent a letter reiterating that the deadline established by the Tribunal for the Respondent to file any observations on its letter of December 27, 2005 had lapsed, and insisted on its request to the Tribunal to declare the proceedings closed.

64. On February 1, 2006, the Respondent sent its observations on the Claimant's letter of December 21, 2005, as well as supporting documentation to justify why they had not received the Tribunal's letter of December 27, 2005.

65. On February 16, 2006, the Tribunal, after considering the Respondent's communications of January 26 and February 1, 2006, and that of the Claimant of January 30, 2006, decided: (i) to accept the explanations given by the Respondent with regard to its delay in filing observations to the Claimant's letter of December 21, 2005; (ii) to admit the Respondent's letter of February 1, 2006; and (iii) to invite the Claimant to make, no later than February 23, 2006, any observations it might have. The Claimant filed its observations on February 17, 2006.

66. On March 1, 2006, the Respondent sent a letter in reply to the Claimant's letter of February 17, 2006, to which the Claimant answered on March 9, 2006. On March 13, 2006, the Tribunal informed the parties of its decision to disregard such communications because they had not been requested by the Tribunal, and the parties had already had several occasions to raise the observations they had deemed pertinent in such regard (Respondent's letters of November 23 and 30, 2005, January 26 and February 1, 2006, and Claimant's letters of December 21, 2005, January 17, 30, and February 17, 2006).

67. On March 31, 2006, the Respondent requested the Tribunal to reconsider its decision of March 13, 2006. On April 13, 2006, the Tribunal confirmed its decision of March 13, 2006 for the reasons there established.

II. The Jurisdiction of the Tribunal

68. Argentina has invited the Tribunal to review its finding on jurisdiction in light of recent decisions in the cases of Plama Consortium Ltd. v. Republic of Bulgaria<sup>1</sup> and Salini Costruttori, S.p.A. & Italstrade, S.p.A. v. Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan<sup>2</sup> on the application of the most-favored-nation

clause (“MFN clause”). The Claimant has for its part referred to the decision of the tribunal in Gas Natural SDG S.A. v. the Argentine Republic<sup>3</sup> which reaches similar conclusions as Emilio Agustín Maffezini v. Kingdom of Spain<sup>4</sup> and the Tribunal on the scope of the MFN clause. The Tribunal will not review what it has already decided; it is inappropriate at this stage of the proceedings and the Tribunal has no doubt about its findings. The Tribunal will limit itself to observe that the cases adduced by the Respondent deal with the application of the MFN clause to situations not akin to the instant case. Indeed, in Plama and Salini v. Jordan, tribunals faced extensions of the MFN clause to situations widely different from the facts considered by the Tribunal or for that matter considered in Maffezini or Gas Natural. The Claimant in Salini sought to include, through the application of a MFN clause, an umbrella clause where the basic treaty had none. In Plama, there was no ICSID clause in the basic treaty. There had never been any question that the parties to these proceedings agreed to ICSID jurisdiction and the issue was avoidance, through the MFN clause, of a procedural requirement that Argentina has consistently dispensed within the investment treaties it has concluded since 1994.

III. Applicable Law

1. Positions of the Parties

69. Siemens argues that the Treaty on the Mutual Protection and Promotion of Investments between the Federal Republic of Germany and the Argentine Republic, dated July 9, 1991 (“Treaty”), contains an explicit choice of law in Article 10(5) which mandates the Tribunal to decide the merits of the dispute “on the basis of this Treaty, and, as the case may be, on the basis of other treaties in force between the Contracting Parties, the internal law of the Contracting Party in whose territory the investment was made, including its rules of private international law, and on the general principles of international law”. Siemens then refers to Article 42(1) of the Convention which directs the Tribunal to look first to the rules agreed by the parties. In this case, the rules agreed by the parties are the provisions of the Treaty that constitute a special bilateral regime with respect to the matters regulated by it.

70. Siemens argues further that, in the case of lacunae, general international law applies and it has a corrective role in the sense that it controls and prevails over domestic law. In this respect, Siemens refers to Professor Weil's statement on the relationship between domestic law and international law under Article 42(1) of the Convention, to wit: "[...] no matter how domestic law and international law are combined, under the second sentence of Article 42(1), international law always gains the upper hand and ultimately prevails."<sup>5</sup> Siemens also refers to the Draft Articles on Responsibility of States adopted by the International Law Commission ("ILC") ("Draft Articles"), which state: "The characterization of an act of a State as internationally wrongful is governed by international law. Such characterization is not affected by the characterization of the same act as lawful by internal law."<sup>6</sup>

71. Siemens contends that this conclusion is reinforced by Article 7(1) of the Treaty which provides:

"If the laws and regulations of either Contracting Party or obligations under international law existing at present or established hereafter between the Contracting Parties in addition to this Treaty contain a regulation, whether general or specific, entitling investments by nationals or companies of the other Contracting Party to a treatment more favorable than is provided for by the Treaty, such regulation shall to the extent that it is more favorable prevail over this Treaty."

Therefore, the Claimant argues that Argentine law may prevail over the provisions of the Treaty only to the extent that it provides treatment to the investment more favorable than the Treaty. Conversely, those provisions of domestic law that may be less favorable are not applicable.

72. In any case, according to Siemens, the host State's domestic law is relevant only with respect to factual issues as held by the doctrine and the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") in Case Concerning Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia (Germany v. Poland):

"From the standpoint of International Law and of the Court which is its organ, municipal laws are merely facts which express the will and constitute the activities of States, in the same manner as do legal decisions or administrative measures. The Court is certainly not called upon to interpret the Polish Law as such; but there is nothing to prevent the Court's giving judgment on the question whether or not, in applying that law, Poland is acting in conformity with its obligations towards Germany under the Geneva Convention."<sup>7</sup>

73. Furthermore, Siemens points out that, as held by the Annulment Committee in Compañía de Aguas del Aconquija S.A. and Vivendi Universal v. the Argentine Republic<sup>8</sup> and the tribunal in Técnicas Medioambientales TECMED, S.A. v. the United Mexican States<sup>9</sup>, governmental measures that are lawful under domestic law are not necessarily in conformity with international law. Siemens concludes that domestic law is only relevant as evidence of Argentina's measures and conduct and needs to be analyzed through the lens of international law.

74. Argentina contends that there is no express agreement between the parties as to the law applicable to the dispute and that the Treaty does not indicate the law to be applied and, therefore, the Tribunal should apply the municipal law of Argentina. In this respect, Argentina affirms that the constitutional law of Argentina is the first source of law to be applied, and explains that the Argentine Constitution recognizes the right to property and the right of the State to regulate it provided it is done by law and subject to principles of reasonableness and equality. As further explained by Argentina, these principles mean that restrictions on individual rights must be warranted by the facts and meet a social necessity or convenience and the limitation must be in line with the ends sought. Argentina further points out that, under Article 75(22) of the Constitution, treaties rank above the law and, under Article 27, treaties must conform to the principles of public law set by the Constitution.

75. Argentina draws to the Tribunal's attention that the constitutional reform of 1994 recognized a number of international instruments on human rights to have constitutional rank. Argentina claims that the human rights so incorporated in the Constitution would be disregarded by recognizing the property rights asserted by the Claimant given the social and economic conditions of Argentina.

2. Considerations of the Tribunal

76. The Tribunal has been established under the provisions of the Treaty and the ICSID Convention. Under Article 42(1) of the Convention, the Tribunal is obliged to apply the rules of law agreed by the parties. The Treaty provides that a tribunal established under the Treaty shall decide on "the basis of this Treaty, and, as the case may be, on the basis of other treaties in force between the Contracting Parties, the internal law of the Contracting Party in whose territory the investment was made, including its rules of private international law, and on the general principles of international law." By accepting the offer of Argentina to arbitrate disputes related to investments, Siemens agreed that this should be the law to be applied by the Tribunal. This constitutes an agreement for purposes of the law to be applied under Article 42(1) of the Convention.

77. In regards to the arguments whether international law is referred to in the Treaty or the Convention as a corrective to municipal law or as a filler of lacunae in that law, the Tribunal refers to the finding of the Annulment Committee in Wena Hotels Limited v. Arab Republic of Egypt in the sense that: "The law of the host State can indeed be applied in conjunction with international law if this is justified. So too international law can be applied by itself if the appropriate rule is found in this other ambit.”<sup>10</sup>

78. The Tribunal has found that it has jurisdiction over breaches of the Treaty and will review the conduct of Argentina as a State party to the Treaty in respect of the commitments undertaken in the Treaty. In so doing, and as stated by the Ad Hoc Committee in Vivendi II, the Tribunal’s inquiry is governed by the Convention, by the Treaty and by applicable international law. Argentina’s domestic law constitutes evidence of the measures taken by Argentina and of Argentina’s conduct in relation to its commitments under the Treaty.

79. In any case, the Treaty is not a document foreign to Argentine law. As explained by Argentina, the Constitution and treaties entered into by Argentina with other States are the supreme law of the nation, and treaties have primacy over domestic laws.<sup>11</sup> In this respect, the Tribunal notes the reference made by Argentina to international human rights law ranking at the level of the Constitution after the 1994 constitutional reform and implying that property rights claimed in this arbitration, if upheld, would constitute a breach of international human rights law. This argument has not been developed by Argentina. The Tribunal considers that, without the benefit of further elaboration and substantiation by the parties, it is not an argument that, prima facie, bears any relationship to the merits of this case.

80. The allegations of the parties will require that the Tribunal interpret the Treaty. In this respect and as a general matter, the Tribunal recalls that the Treaty should be interpreted in accordance with the norms of interpretation established by the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969 (“Vienna Convention”). The Vienna Convention is binding on the parties to the Treaty. Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention requires that a treaty be “interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.”

IV. The Facts

81. On August 26, 1996, Argentina called for bids on the provision of an integral service for the implementation of an immigration control (“the DNM<sup>12</sup> sub-system”), personal identification (“the RNP<sup>13</sup> sub-system”) and electoral information (“the DNE<sup>14</sup> sub-system”) system (“the System” or “the Project”), including the provision of all equipment necessary for data processing and the intercommunication of such equipment, start-up, technical support and maintenance services, and preparation, printing and home delivery of national identity cards (“DNIs”).

82. For the purpose of participating in the bidding, Siemens, acting through SNI, a company legally integrated into Siemens, created SITS, a domestic Argentine company as required by the Bidding Terms and Conditions. SITS was organized as a special purpose company and used by Siemens for the exclusive purpose of investing in the Project.

83. SITS submitted a bid which included, as required by Argentina, a statement declaring that: (i) SNI had been integrated into Siemens since 1992, Siemens being the owner of 100% of SNI’s stock; (ii) SNI was controlled by Siemens, which appointed SNI’s directors and instructed them in relation to SNI’s activities and projects; and (iii) as a result of SNI’s integration into Siemens, the latter was jointly and severally liable for SNI’s obligations towards third parties.

84. Argentina selected SITS’ bid taking into consideration Siemens’ credentials and financial soundness. The contract for the provision of the System (“the Contract”) was awarded to SITS by Decree No. 199/98. The Contract between SITS and Argentina was executed on October 6, 1998 and approved by Decree 1342/98. The Contract took effect on November 21, 1998.

85. The compensation for the services to be provided under the Contract consisted of the price of each DNI issued, including home delivery and DNI updates, the fees for the immigration proceedings processed through the System and the price for printing the voting rolls. All prices in the Contract were denominated in Argentine pesos (“pesos” or “AR$”). At the time, pesos were convertible into dollars at par pursuant to the Convertibility Law.

86. The Contract had a six-year term as from its effective date – November 21, 1998 - and was automatically renewable twice for a three-year term, i.e., for a total of twelve years, unless a notice of intent to the contrary had been given by either party. However, the parties had agreed to give such notice only if the purpose of the Contract had been fully met.

87. The execution of the Project had two stages: a System engineering stage, which consisted of designing the System specifications and acquiring the computer hardware, software and telecommunications networks necessary for its implementation, and a System operation stage, to be managed by the Government. SITS would receive compensation only during this second stage.

88. Production of DNIs was scheduled to begin in August 1999 and extend to the whole country. To this effect, it was necessary for the Argentine government to reach agreements with the Provinces and the City of Buenos Aires (“the External Circuit”).

89. In August 1999, Argentina requested SITS to postpone production of the new DNIs. According to the minutes signed by SITS and the Government, the postponement was due to an extraordinary increase in demand for DNIs because of the short period left before the elections scheduled on October 24, 1999, and to the fear that the introduction of the new mechanisms under such circumstances would burden the public with inconveniences that should be avoided.<sup>15</sup> Thus DNIs production was postponed to October 1, 1999 for foreign residents’ DNIs and November 1, 1999 for Argentine citizens’ DNIs. Production of the respective DNIs started on those dates.

90. In the October election, Mr. Fernando de la Rúa became President-elect. The new authorities took office on December 10, 1999.

91. The DNM sub-system started to operate on February 1, 2000 and its operation was halted on February 2, 2000. On that date, SITS requested an explanation for the interruption. On February 7, SITS was informed that the operation of the sub-system required a governmental authorization. The sub-system continued to be interrupted indefinitely.

92. On February 24, 2000, Argentina suspended the production, printing and distribution of all new DNIs because, in the case of foreigners' DNIs, the RNP sub-system printed the left thumbprint at the place reserved for the right thumbprint. Argentina prohibited SITS from introducing any modification to the System to correct this problem.

93. These two suspensions occurred in the context of statements made by Government officers to SITS and Siemens in January 2000 to the effect that the Government would seek to renegotiate the DNIs price, and increase the number of free-of-charge DNIs.

94. In March 2000, the Government set up a special commission under the Ministry of the Interior to review the Contract and propose a course of action ("the Commission"). During the negotiations that ensued, Siemens made several proposals and agreement was reached with the Commission on a proposal on November 10, 2000. The Commission sent the negotiated proposal to the Government and the Government gave Siemens a "Contract Restatement Proposal" identical in its terms to the proposal submitted by the Commission for the Government's approval.

95. Siemens' representatives met with the President of Argentina on December 19, 2000. Allegedly he promised to issue the decree approving the negotiated terms of the Contract Restatement Proposal by December 31, 2000. When the decree was not issued, Siemens addressed several notes in February 2001 to the Minister of the Interior expressing concern over the delay.<sup>16</sup> The Minister replied on March 12, 2001 and attributed the delay to the required intervention of controlling agencies.<sup>17</sup>

96. In November 2000, the Argentine Congress approved the Economic-Financial Emergency Law ("the 2000 Emergency Law") which empowered the President to renegotiate public sector contracts. This law became effective two days before the Contract Restatement Proposal was submitted by the Commission to the Minister of the Interior. The Government proposed to include the Contract under the provisions of the 2000 Emergency Law and Siemens did not object, in the belief, according to Siemens, that this step would speed up the approval of the Contract Restatement Proposal.

97. The Minister of the Interior was replaced and, in March 2001, the new Minister, Mr. Mestre, claimed to be unaware of the Contract Restatement Proposal. On May 3, 2001, SITS received a new Draft Proposal from the Government which differed from the Contract Restatement Proposal. On May 8, 2001, SITS replied commenting on the new terms, and requesting the exhibits to the proposal which had not been enclosed. The Minister informed Siemens that the new proposal was not negotiable and, on May 18, 2001, the Contract was terminated by Decree 669/01 under the terms of the 2000 Emergency Law. SITS filed an administrative appeal which was rejected by Decree 1205/01.

V. Allegations of the Parties

98. The Tribunal will now describe at length the allegations of the parties as they relate to the facts of the dispute.

1. Memorial

99. In its Memorial, Siemens has framed its claim in the context of the Treaty, the Convertibility Law of 1991, Decree No. 2128/91, and the State Reform Law of 1989. Siemens contends that it entered into the Project based on the assurance of the authorities' commitment and the legal security framework provided by these instruments.

100. Siemens explains that significant investments were made during 1999 and further investments were made in 2000, due to Argentina's requirements as a prerequisite for resuming income-generating operations, for an aggregate amount of $284 million up to May 18, 2001. Additional expenses exceeding $9.1 million were incurred after termination of the Contract and until September 2002.

101. Siemens claims that the following results were achieved:

- (i) as regards the DNM sub-system, establishment of the immigration information center, and the immigration flows and border control systems at three locations; the Government first hindered this component from becoming operational and later hindered its functioning, but Argentina has nonetheless benefited from better processing, follow-up and control of immigration proceedings, and the generation of single, non-duplicate files for each alien, containing all identification data, which reduced tampering possibilities;
- (ii) as regards the RNP sub-system, the engineering stage was completed by August 1999 and it became operational by August 19, 1999, the electronic loading of the Remaining Human Potential File (“Back Record Conversion” or “BRC”) was performed (by December 1999, 45.8 million individual records had been digitalized), an ID personalization center was completed, hardware and software were acquired, buildings were fitted, the communications network was implemented, training courses were held, more detailed and demanding System applications were developed, and a pilot test not required under the Contract was performed. However, because of the measures taken by Argentina, only 3,189 DNIs were issued over a period of 147 days as opposed to 12,000 DNIs foreseen as the initial daily average;
- (iii) as regards the DNE sub-system, the electoral information component was completed by August 1999, and SITS carried out the processing, printing and distribution of provisional lists and final voting rolls for the national elections of October 24, 1999; and
- (iv) physical and IT security equipment and technical support were provided by SITS to the three implementation agencies.

102. Siemens explains that the investments were financed through capital contributions by Siemens through SNI in the amount of $27 million, through loans made by one of the wholly owned subsidiaries or in minor amounts by local financial institutions (later refinanced by Siemens directly or through SNI and totaling approximately $242 million), and through non-financial funding by the Siemens Group in the amount of $15 million approximately up to May 18, 2001. Siemens further explains that the investments were exclusively applied to the Project since SITS was a special purpose company used by Siemens only for the execution of the Project.

103. Siemens alleges that, during the first year of the Contract, Argentina failed to make budgetary provision for the obligations it had undertaken under the Contract, to provide facilities for Project development, to assign appropriate personnel to fill the different positions and take the corresponding training courses. Siemens also alleges that Argentina delayed approval of the Functional Operational Model (“FOM”) during seven months notwithstanding its relevance, failed to execute with the provincial authorities the agreements to carry out production of the new DNIs throughout the country, failed to adopt the measures necessary to replace the existing DNIs by those issued through the System, and failed to discontinue the manual system of issuing DNIs. Siemens observes that these breaches of the contractual obligations were noted by the independent auditor hired by the Government.

104. Siemens recalls that in the context of these failures, in August 1999, Argentina requested SITS, on account of the October elections, to postpone commencement of the new DNIs production until October 1, 1999 for foreign residents and November 1, 1999 for Argentine citizens. Later Argentina requested that the discontinuation of the old DNIs be postponed to November 30, 1999, except for certain jurisdictions for which a new deadline of January 31, 2000 was established.

105. According to Siemens, after the October elections, the new authorities failed to make budgetary provision for the second year of the Project and to enter into agreements with the provincial authorities. Argentina also delayed providing the technical definitions essential to complete the immigration component and, as a result, it did not start to operate until February 1, 2000.

106. Siemens refers to the suspension of the DNM sub-system on February 2, 2000, allegedly because of lack of authorization to operate the sub-system given that public funds were at issue. According to Siemens, the requirement of such authorization was not provided for in the Contract and was not required for the border control component of the DNM sub-system. Siemens alleges that SITS never got an adequate response and was never paid for the documents actually processed.

107. Regarding the suspension of production of DNIs on February 24, 2001, Siemens affirms that this is a technical inconsistency that could have been quickly solved by modifying one sentence in the printing software. Siemens recalls that Article 17 of the Contract established a procedure in the event that errors were detected but, instead of respecting it, the Argentine authorities prohibited SITS from introducing any correction while the Contract was in effect.

108. According to Siemens, since January 2000 the newly elected authorities had made public announcements reported in the press indicating their intention to renegotiate the Contract to obtain a reduction in the DNI price, a larger number of free DNIs and a postponement of the discontinuation of the manual system. Siemens submits that the actions taken in February 2000 by Argentina suspending the two income-generating activities of the Project had the objective of pressuring SITS to re-negotiate the Contract at the point at which most of the investment for the Project had been made.

109. Siemens explains that, during the renegotiation of the Contract with the Commission from March to November 2000, each proposal made by SITS was rejected and resumption of the operation of the System was subject to ever more demanding economic concessions. In November 2000, as explained by Siemens, the parties agreed on the basic terms on which the Contract would be reinstated and the immediate System operation would be resumed, namely, a $5 reduction in the price of the DNIs (in part to be compensated by a $3 increase in airport passengers' fees to be passed on to SITS), an increase in the annual free-of-charge DNIs from 75,000 to 250,000, and a reduction in the immigration and voting roll printing fees. Siemens draws to the attention of the Tribunal that the Ministry of Finance authorities opined favorably on the new terms as also did the RNP, DNM and DNE. The restated terms were set forth in the Contract Restatement Proposal provided by the Government to Siemens on November 30, 2000 with the understanding that this proposal would now be formalized by the Government.

110. Siemens explains that the 2000 Emergency Law was published on November 21, 2000 and that, in order to facilitate the approval of the terms agreed, the Commission proposed to include the Contract under the provisions of the 2000 Emergency Law in a note to the Minister of the Interior dated November 23, 2000.<sup>18</sup> The Minister declared the Contract subject to the 2000 Emergency Law by Resolution No. 1779 of December 6, 2000.<sup>19</sup>

111. Siemens alleges that, when in March 2001 a new Minister of the Interior was appointed, he claimed to be unaware of the agreement reached between the two parties and the undertaking made by the President. The new Minister ordered, on April 6, 2001, the inclusion in the administrative file of the minutes, dated October 30, 2000, of a meeting of Directors of Provincial Registry Offices rejecting the Contract continuation. According to Siemens, he also instructed Sindicatura General de La Nación (“SIGEN”), RPN, DNM and DNE to re-analyze matters related to the Contract and these agencies reached different conclusions from when they reviewed the Contract Restatement Proposal.

112. Siemens refers to the new Draft Proposal presented to Siemens on May 3, 2001 with terms significantly different from those negotiated, mainly, reduction of the number of DNIs to be issued to almost one half as it did the effective term of the Contract, and elimination of the obligation to discontinue issuance of the old DNIs. Siemens points out that the exhibits referred to in the Proposal were not furnished to SITS. According to Siemens, the only purpose of this proposal was to trigger a rejection and create an excuse to terminate the Contract. In its Reply on May 8, Siemens recalled that the parties had already reached an agreement and certain aspects had already been implemented, and that the changes indicated above were unacceptable because they changed completely the economic-financial equation, and requested the missing exhibits to complete the evaluation. The Minister responded immediately indicating that failure to accept such proposal as a whole would result in early termination of the Contract. In fact, even when the proposal was presented to Siemens as a draft, the instruction of the Minister was that the Proposal was to be notified for acceptance or rejection.<sup>20</sup>

113. Siemens argues that such a proposal was only an illegitimate tool to avoid liability for frustrating the Contract. In this respect, inter alia, Siemens points out a number of irregularities in the proceedings for the Contract termination, such as the failure to obtain the Ministry of Economy's consent to subject the Contract to the 2000 Emergency Law and factual inaccuracies, e.g. the covering letter from the Minister of the Interior to the President submitting Decree 669/01 stated that the Contract costs were beyond the capabilities of the Government notwithstanding that there were no supporting budgetary reports and in November 2000 the Ministry of Economy had opined otherwise,<sup>21</sup> and the Government had approved the budget for the proposed restated terms of the Contract which in turn had been approved by Congress on December 12, 2000 and the President on December 29, 2000.<sup>22</sup> Siemens also points out that said letter reports errors in the System without supporting evidence (errors which were disregarded by the President), it uses the Provinces' opposition to the Project notwithstanding that the Contract was undertaken by Argentina itself within its exclusive powers,<sup>23</sup> and it exaggerates deliberately the costs based on RPN's analysis.

114. Siemens points out that the Contract was terminated on the sole grounds of the 2000 Emergency Law, which termination was ratified by Decree No. 1205/01 rejecting SITS's appeal against Decree 669/01. Siemens recalls that Argentina denied SITS access to the administrative file for purposes of filing the appeal and presenting evidence in support of its claims. Siemens alleges that the administrative file was not made available until Siemens reported the secret handling of the file and Siemens had filed the claim under the Treaty. After Contract termination, Siemens claims that Argentina caused delays in the transfer and reception of equipment and in the assessment of the compensation, and never returned the performance bond, which had lost its purpose once Argentina terminated the Contract unilaterally. According to Siemens, SITS continued to provide technical support, train personnel as agreed in cases of Contract termination, assigned to the Government ownership of the computer hardware, the installed communications equipment and fittings and the non-exclusive licenses for use of application software, and requested the Ministry of the Interior to arrange for the transfer of the satellite links.

115. Siemens points out the passivity of the Government during the months that followed the termination of the Contract and that in November 2001, the Ministry of the Interior called the SITS' sub-contractors to conduct a test and assess the possibility of resuming production of the DNIs without Siemens. According to Siemens, the tests conducted in Casa de Moneda were satisfactory and Casa de Moneda proposed to produce DNIs through the System provided by SITS.

2. Counter-Memorial

116. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina alleges that Siemens raised false expectations by the statements made in the bid for the Contract. Siemens had stressed its experience and that of its sub-contractors in high-performance secure systems to meet automated data and image-capturing requirements for issuing passports, foreign resident documents, drivers licenses, visas, frequent traveler cards, health plan cards and DNIs, but in reality neither Siemens nor SNI had been involved in projects of a similar size because no country in the world had undertaken a project of the complexity, size and significance of the Project. According to Argentina, Siemens and SNI lacked the technical expertise to provide a comprehensive service involving the operation and support of a secure and reliable personal identification, migration control and electoral information system.

117. As regards Siemens' claim that Argentina delayed the approval of the FOM and it is at fault for the non-implementation of the External Circuit, Argentina argues that Siemens presents a traditional notion of contracts with the parties' obligations bearing a relationship of interdependence and does not take into account the particularities and complexities surrounding the procurement of information technology products and services. Argentina explains that the Contract is a turnkey information technology contract including tailored software development and it is inevitable that there will be some uncertainty as to the actual completion date of the work.

118. Argentina alleges that in this type of contract the reporting and advisory duties of the information technology service provider and product supplier play a key role in maintaining the balance between the parties. Argentina recognizes that it received assistance from technical personnel who participated in the guideline-setting stages for the technical definition of the System, but this is not sufficient, argues Argentina, to eliminate the imbalance in technical expertise level between the parties.

119. As regards the approval of the FOM, Argentina describes how, a few days before the deadline for the presentation of the FOM, it requested SITS to deliver the working papers so that RNP's technical staff could advance with the examination of the FOM. SITS never provided the documentation requested. Argentina refers to a number of communications sent to SITS that show the delay in the acceptance of the FOM by Argentina was due to inconsistencies in the FOM proposed by SITS. To further support its argument, Argentina refers to two reports prepared by RNP on the weaknesses of the FOM submitted by SITS and the security of the FOM. In brief terms, several items in the FOM submitted by SITS did not comply with applicable law, were defined on a general or incomplete basis, or failed to provide specifications for the security, audit, and quality and management control of the System. Argentina infers from the foregoing that SITS' technical qualifications were not sufficient to perform the Contract and that it used the Project to gain experience.

120. As regards the External Circuit, Argentina explains that SITS and Argentina through RNP agreed that the proposed model could not be implemented as described in the Contract and SITS was requested to design an External Circuit taking into account the following general guidelines: (i) flexible terms for a gradual regional implementation; (ii) installation of computers in the Manual Data Capture Centers under the charge of SITS to facilitate form scanning; (iii) set-up of scanning and quality control centers in every provincial capital, for purposes of resolving any possible rejection of the applications in the applicant's location; and (iv) the maintenance by the contractor of the investment levels that had originally been agreed.

121. Argentina further explains that it is not surprising that the Provinces were not interested in signing framework agreements for the External Circuit since they were not advantageous from an economic point of view; under them, the Provinces would receive lower compensation while the expenses they had to incur for the System to work efficiently were higher. Argentina also refers to the nature of its federal system of government where the Government cannot oblige the Provinces to enter into agreements to cooperate in the performance of functions that belong to the Federal Government.

122. Argentina argues that SITS was aware of the circumstances of the country, it had admitted that the design of the External Circuit was not consistent with the social reality of Argentina and it was necessary to do a comprehensive review of the design, the External Circuit could not be implemented until the FOM was approved on condition that SITS fulfilled certain requirements, and, in the agreement signed between Argentina and SITS on November 26, 1999, the Coordinator of the Project at RNP and the SITS' Project Director were empowered to introduce amendments to the System set-up schedules and in the size of the Electronic Data Capture Centers.

123. Argentina also argues that, given the long presence of Siemens in the country and as a product and service provider to the public sector, SITS should have been aware of the political issues that would necessarily have an impact on the performance of some stages of the Contract and compliance with its obligations.

124. Argentina alleges that data capture for the External Circuit could not be set up in the Provinces because of the suspension of manufacturing, printing and distribution of DNIs on February 24, 2000. Argentina alleges also non-compliance by SITS with its obligation to deposit the source codes in escrow and transfer them to the Government upon completion of the Contract. Argentina affirms that without the source codes it could not properly operate the System after termination of the Contract. Furthermore, Argentina had detected errors in the System and the source codes were necessary to correct SITS' work.

125. Argentina contends that, contrary to Siemens' claim that Argentina did not comply with the schedule provided for in the Contract to cease issuing DNIs manually, SITS had agreed to reformulate the terms of the Contract applicable to begin issuing new DNIs and consented to the extension of the term for the discontinuation of manual DNI issuance.

126. Argentina explains that the Contract did not amend the law regulating when DNIs are issued and updated. The law requires that a DNI be issued when a baby is born and this document is updated when the child reaches school age. Then a photograph is added to the identity document and the right thumb fingerprint is stamped on the document. This DNI is replaced when a person turns sixteen and a new photograph is taken. Then this DNI is updated when a person turns thirty. In order to determine whether the Project was economically advantageous, SITS should have calculated the number of DNIs that had to be replaced.

127. According to Argentina, the RNP sub-system was the most important undertaking since the revenues it would generate would guarantee the expected return on the investment made by Siemens, and it was precisely in the design of this sub-system that SITS failed to comply with its obligations. On February 23, 2000, the RNP head of the Aliens Division reported that federal police officers had discovered that on two DNIs belonging to foreigners the fingerprint was incorrectly identified, e.g., the left thumbprint was identified as the right thumbprint. Argentina explains that the technical report states that the fingerprint experts verified that the fingerprints had been correctly taken by RNP staff. The head of the RNP Aliens Division concluded that the error was in the design of the System which was entrusted exclusively to the Claimant, which defeated the purpose of implementing an information technology system to avoid the risk of human error.

128. Argentina contests that Article 17 of the Contract was applicable in that situation. Argentina explains that such article is intended to regulate the parties' conduct in the event of any possible physical error of the identity document and not an error involving the inappropriate design.

129. Argentina then turns to the 2000 Emergency Law and points out that this law provided that the events of force majeure foreseen in sections 53 and 54 of Law No. 13,064 were considered to have occurred, that within 30 days the Government should determine the contracts subject to the provisions of the 2000 Emergency Law, that government contracts would not be terminated if the continuation of the works or the performance of the contract was possible on the basis of the "shared sacrifice" principle, and that compensation payable in the case of those contracts revoked on grounds of convenience, merit and advisability would not include lost profit or unproductive expenses.

130. Argentina further points out that in no circumstances did the Contract entail the privatization of the System's operation and that the goal of the Commission established by Resolution No. 263/00 was to find a solution ensuring the continuity of the Contract given the crisis in Argentina. Argentina explains the doctrine of unforeseeability that would apply in the emergency situation:

"There is certainly no obligation for the Government to compensate the contractor as the events causing the contractual imbalance are totally beyond the Government's control. There is nothing that would prevent the strict and specific application of the contract provisions and thus the termination of the contract [...] However, no benefit for the public interest can be derived from this situation; quite the contrary, the public interest will not be satisfied by the abrupt interruption of the service provision. Thus, the doctrine of unforeseeability or unforeseeable risk may be applied to these cases. According to the doctrine, the Government has to provide assistance to the concessionaire, sharing the risks that unpredictability might have arisen for purposes of avoiding a total collapse of the licensed service.”<sup>24</sup>

131. Argentina further explains that it is obliged to revoke a public contract when the public need that would be satisfied by the contract disappeared or new public demands require that it be terminated. Revocation by reason of public interest is one of the cases of a Government’s liability for lawful actions and entails the obligation to compensate the contractor whose individual right is sacrificed for the sake of the public, but compensation shall not include lost profits or unproductive expenses.

132. Argentina disputes Siemens’ affirmation that the Government took advantage of the passing of the 2000 Emergency Law allegedly to accelerate the implementation of the agreement concluded with Siemens. Argentina explains that it is correct that SITS participated in the report prepared by the Commission, but it is not correct that such report had to be considered by the Government and SITS as a formal and final renegotiation proposal. According to Argentina, the report was an initial contract renegotiation proposal which included the Contractor’s point of view.

133. Argentina also questions the position taken by Siemens in respect of the role of SIGEN and its refusal to furnish the cost structure of SITS’ services. According to Argentina, SIGEN was unable to determine the reasonableness of compensation to SITS because it had not access to conclusive information about the cost of the services. Argentina disputes the allegation that the reduction of the original DNIs price reflected SITS’ share of the sacrifice to continue with implementation of the Contract. Argentina recalls in this respect that Article 4.6.2 of the Contract required disclosure of SITS’ cost structure where extraordinary and unforeseeable events materially and adversely affect the original economic and financial equation of the Contract.

134. Argentina also takes issue with the characterization by the Claimant of the 2000 Emergency Law as an instrument devised to hurt the Claimant. Argentina also contests the truthfulness of the assertion by Siemens that it has been penalized by pursuing this arbitration and lists a number of public sector contracts won by Siemens in recent years. According to Argentina, Siemens continued to do business with the Government and with other public sector players and provided new services after the termination of the Contract.

135. Argentina describes the steps involved in the reception of SITS' assets to justify the delay, which it also ascribes to lack of cooperation by SITS at that stage. Indeed, according to Argentina, SITS refused to participate in the asset verification process because the inventories already submitted by SITS included all necessary specifications for asset identification. In fact, according to Argentina, SITS' inventories in most cases referred to total quantities without a breakdown that would permit actual verification of the assets' existence and their relevance to the System. Argentina claims that, in contrast, the Notary General's Office recorded the asset verification proceedings, including a list of the assets present in the various agencies belonging to the System and unequivocal information regarding each and every asset.<sup>25</sup>

136. Argentina also refers to the issue of the verification of certain computer equipment stored at the Siemens National Route 8 plant in San Martin County in the Province of Buenos Aires. Argentina claims that the Government was only informed of the existence of such equipment in a presentation made by SITS to the Asset Reception Committee on September 4, 2001. Argentina explains the difficulties that this revelation presented for the Government as, among other matters, it was uncertain whether these assets were part of the assets to be transferred under Article 10.7 of the Contract and, if they were, it was unclear whether or not the Government should actually receive them because of SITS' refusal to transfer title to those assets until payment was made to SITS. The Asset Reception Committee decided to accept the National Route 8 assets on December 17, 2001 and that on December 20, 2001, both parties should agree on a procedure to receive them. The serious events that happened on that date led to the worst ever political and institutional crisis in Argentina, but once the new authorities were in place in Argentina, the Asset Reception

137. Then Argentina describes the performance tests of the various sub-systems at RPN, DNE and DNM and affirms that in all three cases the technicians concluded that the sub-systems were not operative. Argentina explains that SITS was invited to attend the tests but refused the invitation. Furthermore, the tests had to be carried out without access to the source codes that SITS should have turned over to Argentina at Contract termination. According to Argentina, without the source codes it was not possible to determine the degree of progress by SITS regarding the purpose of the Contract and it was not possible to conduct an accurate appraisal.

138. Argentina provides the breakdown of the appraisal conducted by the TTN, which in the aggregate amounts to AR$71,735,510, and explains that the items appraised would be valuable only if, among other matters, SITS would deliver the source codes, the licenses for basic software and databases, and the use of SITS’ software licenses. Argentina reports that the TTN pointed out that it was not certain that all licenses could be transferred as their respective contracts did not provide for such possibility.

139. As regards the performance bond, Argentina argues that it ends on termination of the Contract, provided that the Contractor has fulfilled its obligations under the Contract, which has not been the case. Argentina in this respect particularly emphasizes the fact that the source codes and the software licenses have not been delivered by SITS to the Government.

3. Reply

140. In its Reply, the Claimant notes that Argentina recognizes the fundamental facts of the case and the events that frustrated Siemens’ investment. The Claimant takes issue with the argument that Argentina was the weaker party because of an alleged technology gap. The Claimant points out this cannot be true when Argentina had designed the Bidding Terms and Conditions, defined the characteristics of the service, and reserved the right to control and manage the tasks during Contract performance.

141. Siemens disputes that there was a mutually agreed renegotiation process. According to Siemens, the Government took advantage of the sunk cost of Siemens' investment to impose a renegotiation process not provided for in the Contract. Siemens also questions the arguments based on security concerns. Siemens first points out that lack of security or reliability of the System was not the subject of any discussion between the parties during the performance of the Contract, that these arguments were developed after the Contract termination, and that the only audit report issued during the term of the Contract on the security of the System was submitted to the authorities by the external security auditor appointed by the Government, which audit report concluded that the System reasonably complied with the security standards required by the Contract. According to Siemens, this is confirmed by the termination of the Contract with no finding of fault on the part of the Contractor (Decree 669/01) and the ratification of the termination in September 2001 after the SIGEN reports had been issued (Decree 1205/01).

142. Siemens also points out that the security concerns of the old system which motivated the tender (Decree 1310/94) for a new system are still valid, while the security and reliability of the System was never questioned before this arbitration. Siemens surmises that if the real concern had been security, then the logical course of action would have been to allow the Contract's performance, instead of discontinuing the Project and preserving the system that caused the documentary emergency from which Argentina is still suffering.

143. Siemens argues that Argentina distorts reality and deliberately intends to confuse the situation that led to the passage of the 2000 Emergency Law with the economic and political crisis that resulted in the enactment of Emergency Law No. 25,561 in 2002. Siemens explains that, contrary to the description made by Argentina, the 2000 Emergency Law only declared the fiscal accounts in emergency and empowered the new administration to repudiate certain contracts concluded by its predecessor. According to Siemens, the emergency was not related to "extraordinary and unforeseeable" events unrelated to the State as claimed by Argentina, because public deficits fail to meet such qualifications: the events that led to the enactment of the 2000 Emergency Law were attributable exclusively to the State itself.

144. Siemens contests Argentina's allegations regarding its technical qualifications. Siemens recalls that in the bidding process SITS was allocated the best ratings in terms of experience in the implementation and or administration of the System, and in project integration and capacity to handle the Project. Siemens recalls that Argentina holds Siemens in such high regard that it has repeatedly requested its intervention in other public projects, even after the Contract's termination.

145. Siemens dismisses Argentina's allegations regarding defects in the Contract and recalls that, in compliance with Decree No. 1310/94, the Ministry of the Interior approved the Bidding Terms of Conditions through Resolution No. 2183/96, stating in the whereas clauses that RPN, DNM, DNE, the Ministry of the Interior, the Attorney General's office and SIGEN had been involved in their preparation. RPN, DNM and DNE prepared reports for the Technical Evaluation Committee which concluded: "it may be inferred from the technical reports received, from which contents this Committee finds no reasons to depart,"<sup>26</sup> that the bidders have complied with all the provisions referring to the items and amounts tendered, and that "it is appropriate to share the conclusions reached by the Technical Agencies consulted [RNP, DNM, DNE], that SIEMENS IT's rating is 13.03% higher than the rating [...]."<sup>27</sup> Furthermore, it is Siemens' contention that:

"Only Argentina was in a position to identify its own political, economic and social needs involved in the System. It was also the one that had the duty to set the requirements consistent with its own capabilities and limitations. Contrary to its claims, it was Argentina and not the Contractor that had the duty to inform its contractual party of the economic, political or social limitations that could be encountered in the design, implementation and subsequent development of the Project."<sup>28</sup>

146. As regards the delayed approval of the FOM and the allegation by Argentina that SITS lacked the technical capacity to perform the Contract, Siemens asserts that the reasons that delayed FOM approval were not of a technical nature that could be ascribed to SITS, but originated in the indolent attitude of the Government and its lack of cooperation with SITS.

147. Siemens contests the presentation made by Argentina on the failure of implementing the External Circuit and the implication that it was Siemens that designed this circuit and determined its need. According to Siemens, the model incorporating the External Circuit was created by Argentina taking into account the country's geographical extent and the rules applicable to its personal identification and registration activity. Furthermore, Argentina has justified not making the necessary budget allocations on the basis of ignorance of the characteristics required for the buildings allocated to the External Circuit. Siemens claims that this is not a valid reason because Argentina had all the information to purchase the properties and prepared a budget estimate months later when the System was paralyzed.

148. As regards the failure to discontinue the production of the old manually produced DNIs, Siemens recalls that the "cut-over" criterion was a basic commitment of Argentina under the Contract and an essential component of the Project, that, in any case, Argentina did not meet the new deadlines agreed reluctantly by SITS, and that the error detected by the police occurred several months after the original date of the "cut-over" and after the new deadlines.

149. Siemens contends that the decision to suspend the for-profit-operations of the System were arbitrary. In the case of the fingerprint error, Siemens insists that it originated in a mistaken software sentence found in the programming of one of the applications. According to Siemens, SITS acknowledged the error and offered to correct it immediately, but the Government decided to suspend provisionally the processing of DNIs for Argentine nationals and foreigners throughout the System. The decision remained in effect until the termination of the Contract.

150. Siemens contests the interpretation given by Argentina to Article 17 of the Contract. This Article does not distinguish between design errors and errors related to individual documents; it simply refers to a DNI that may have errors resulting from any cause, whether attributable to SITS or the Government.

151. Siemens recalls that the services provided by SITS to the DNM and DNE were accepted by the relevant agencies and that, in the case of the DNM sub-system, its operation was suspended because of the alleged lack of formal authorization for the launch of the sub-system after one day of operation and not because of the flaws that Argentina now points out, supported by a report of SIGEN of September 2001, four months after termination of the Contract and eighteen months after the suspension of the sub-system operation. According to Siemens, the sub-system is in use by DNM to this date.

152. Siemens questions the use of the technical studies presented by Argentina in this arbitration when the Government did not consider that SITS had committed breaches to allow the Contract's termination, nor did it ever notify SITS of the serious breaches now invoked in accordance with the procedures provided for in the Contract, nor imposed any sanctions whatsoever based on the alleged inconsistencies of the System. According to Siemens, SIGEN produced its reports months after the System had started to operate with express approval of RPN, and after the authorities had already decided to terminate the Contract. Siemens claims that Argentina did not convey the reports or their recommendations to SITS or Siemens and refers to Article 10.2 of the Contract, which provides that:

“Following Systems implementation, but prior to their being put into operation, the security and high degree of inviolability of the Systems shall be tested and certified by a world-class auditor appointed by mutual agreement of the parties. The inexistence of observations from the State's Security Officer shall imply the acceptance of the Systems' security and inviolability test results.”

153. Siemens affirms that the only auditing reports provided for in the Contract determined the reasonable accomplishment of the System's security standards, including the initial stage, SITS' compliance with its contractual obligations, and the Government's non-compliance with theirs. Siemens points out that these reports were ignored by the Government and excluded from the administrative files, probably, Siemens surmises, because their outcome was deemed unfavorable to Argentina.

154. Siemens recalls that two months prior to the creation of the Commission, and days before the suspension of for-profit operations, the new authorities declared publicly before informing SITS of their intentions that the Contract had to be reviewed. Siemens also recalls that the technical aspects were irrelevant in the discussions to renegotiate the Contract, and that the issues discussed were limited to the reduction in the number of DNIs, migration proceedings prices, the redesign of the External Circuit, the progressive discontinuance of the manual system as opposed to the "cut-over", an increase in the amount of free-of-charge DNIs, etc. Siemens submits that these were not "external circumstances" or an "extraordinary and unforeseeable event that materially affected the equilibrium of the relationship", but reflected the opposition of the new Administration to the obligations undertaken by its predecessor. Siemens notes that, with a high degree of political opportunism, the Government took advantage of the fact that by then most of the investment for the Project had been made.

155. Siemens questions the correctness of the ius variandi as understood by Argentina. First, Siemens refers to the acknowledgement by Argentina that the power of the Government to vary the terms may be exercised only to the extent to which the economic balance of the contract is preserved. However, Siemens points out that Argentina neglects to mention the limitations to the ius variandi. Indeed, the authority of the State to modify the terms and conditions of the contract does not affect those provisions pertaining to compensation and financial advantages, since it would be contrary to the principle of good faith and to business security to allow the State to modify the contract unilaterally and reduce compensation. Siemens refers to the limitations imposed by the Argentine Constitution and law, in particular the property safeguard (Article 17 of the Constitution), the proportionality principle (Article 28 of the Constitution), the pacta sunt servanda rule (Article 1197 of the Civil Code) and the principle of good faith (Article 1198 of the Civil Code).

156. Siemens argues that, when Argentina called for foreign investment to carry out its public sector transformation in 1990, Argentina assumed that some of the legal features of the public contract could discourage investors and deliberately self-limited its public powers and prerogatives. Siemens points out that one of the most important limitations was directed at preventing the unilateral modification or termination of contracts, even if ostensibly in the ‘public interest.’<sup>29</sup> Thus Article 33.6 of the Contract provides that, “Any change or amendment to this Contract shall be agreed upon by the parties and set forth in writing.” Article 26.1 limits early termination by the State to cases of SITS’ fault, and Article 3.5.2 limits early termination by the State until all existing DNIs issued as of the date of the Contract had been replaced.

157. Siemens submits that “if the State does not comply with the previously described limitations, it would be in breach of its duties and it should be accountable for its wrongful acts by fully compensating the contractor for having deprived it of its vested rights and/or having frustrated its legitimate expectations (as appropriate).”<sup>30</sup> Siemens also points out that Argentina does not specify any new events that would justify a different assessment of the public interest as it was when the Contract was awarded; a change of Administration is not a valid legal ground. The renegotiation of the Contract was initiated, not as an exercise of Argentina’s discretionary powers, but as an attempt to depart from its contractual obligations.

158. Siemens insists that there was “no mutual will to renegotiate following a change in circumstances, but a coerced process involving substantial alterations of the initial conditions to the detriment of SITS, strongly conditioned by the fact that – the investment already being made – the State suspended the operations of the income generating systems [sub-systems] [...]”<sup>31</sup>

159. Siemens recalls the Argentine Supreme Court constitutionality test for emergency measures that restrict individual rights, namely, they may last only as long as necessary to allow the cause of the measures to disappear, and “Even where a more intense exercise of police power is recognized in emergency circumstances, the Supreme Court has repeatedly held that an individual’s own property cannot be taken without a declaration of public use and prior compensation.”<sup>32</sup> The application of the 2000 Emergency Law to terminate the Contract was a political decision and not, as alleged by Argentina, the result of events “absolutely alien and independent from the administrative activity.”<sup>33</sup>

160. Siemens contends that the disclosure of SITS’ cost structure was necessary only at a later stage and points out that, during the 14 months of negotiations prior to SIGEN’s report in March 2001, this issue was never raised. Furthermore, the Contract was based on a price cap and the cost to Argentina did not depend on SITS’ cost structure, the conditions of Article 4.6.2 of the Contract had not been met and the 2000 Emergency Law did not trigger them, and even the Draft Proposal of May 2001 did not require any disclosure.

161. Siemens notes that there was no “shared sacrifice” and that the burden was exclusively on SITS is particularly evident in the May 2001 Draft Proposal intended to provoke a rejection from SITS and to justify the termination of the Contract on the basis of the 2000 Emergency Law. Siemens asserts that its reply to the proposal was not a rejection, but that it only insisted on the need to reach a solution that would respect the parties’ rights and previous commitments, and requested the missing annexes for a correct assessment of the proposal.

162. Siemens recalls that the new Minister of the Interior ordered new reports from RNP, DNM and DNE and that these agencies issued reports in April 2001 that differ from those issued in December 2000, particularly in the case of RNP. The proposal of May 2001 shows that technical issues were not relevant and the disclosure of the cost structure was not required by the State at the time of formulating such proposal. The State had not required it as a condition of the

163. Siemens points out that it was denied access to the administrative file until August 2001 –three months after termination of the Contract – and then it realized that: the file had been started on December 13, 2000, it included documents dated from as early as January 2000, and reports favorable to the Contract's continuation were absent. According to Siemens, such reports apparently had been included in the file and then removed without indicating the reason; notably, the SWIPCO reports were missing and were also ignored in the Counter-Memorial.

164. Siemens then refers to the contracts that Argentina has reported in the Counter-Memorial to have been terminated under the 2000 Emergency Law to respond to the claim of discrimination, and argues that these contracts were not comparable, that main contracts involving foreign investments had been formally excluded, that most of them had been renegotiated and not terminated and that the two public works terminated were in the end terminated because of the contractors' fault. Siemens points out that a passport contract between a local company and the State is not included in the list presented by Argentina, and was not subject to the 2000 Emergency Law notwithstanding how expensive it was.

165. Siemens claims that, after termination of the Contract, the behavior of Argentina was as arbitrary as before, namely, it denied access of SITS to the administrative file, subjected SITS' compensation to the performance and to the physical tests of the System after it had been in the power of the State since its transfer and over which SITS had lost control a long time before, excluded SITS from the tests at Casa de Moneda, and issued reports unfavorable to SITS without notifying SITS or including them in the administrative file. Siemens claims that Argentina's lack of good faith is confirmed by bringing before this Tribunal a large number of contractual breaches absent any actual decision of the Government pertaining to the Contract.

166. Siemens affirms that SITS took every possible action to overcome the difficulties placed in its way by Argentina and to avoid the expropriation of the Contract and recover its investment.

167. Siemens points out that it took Argentina 28 months to receive the assets transferred from SITS. Siemens recalls how Argentina did not take measures for the orderly transfer of the non-exclusive licenses for the use of the applications software or the contract for the supply of satellite link services, and all links between SITS' help desk and the System were cut in May 2001. Siemens claims that the passive behavior of Argentina caused losses and jeopardized the System. Hence, SITS could not agree to any physical, performance or functionality test carried out by the Government after its damaging attitude.

168. Siemens notes the positive results of the test at Casa de Moneda in order to verify the overall operation of the System. Siemens refers to the following statement in a letter provided by the President of Casa de Moneda to the Under-Secretary of the Interior reporting on the test results:

“As per your request, I would like to inform you the positive result of the verification test of the operativity [sic] of the General Persons Identification System that forms part of the Argentine and International Public Bidding Process No. 01/96, the contract of which was terminated by Decree 669/01.

Therefore, it has been verified that it is possible to print identity documents at the plant.”<sup>34</sup>

169. Siemens also points out that SITS' sub-contractors who were present at the tests reported that they “[...] evidenced the successful operation of the systems set up for the production of DNIs, and that pursuant to Section 2 of Decree No. 669/2001 those systems were received by the Government.”<sup>35</sup> Siemens refers to press reports on the satisfactory functioning of the System

notwithstanding attempts by officials of RNP to prevent its operation to the extent that floppy disks and software applications containing important information for the issuance of the DNIs mysteriously were lost.<sup>36</sup>

170. Siemens maintains that the source code issue lacks any merit. First, source codes were excluded from the Contract. The Government, prompted by a question of SITS seeking confirmation that the only right to be acquired by the Ministry of the Interior over the software would be a non-exclusive use license, replied: “The requirement included in the bidding terms and conditions related to the software is that the Ministry of the Interior be transferred a permanent and non-exclusive use license”, and “the bidder or contractor may assign all or a portion of the ownership rights over the software if it so accepted.”<sup>37</sup> Siemens affirms that there is no reference in the Contract to software source codes and, to have access to them, Argentina would need to negotiate directly with the software copyright owners.

171. Siemens recalls that software and source codes are protected by Argentine law and international law and that no third party has the right to access, reproduce, execute, adapt and modify them without the copyright holder’s express authorization.

172. Siemens notes that the Respondent never demanded compliance with Article 10.12 of the Contract prior to this arbitration. As the evidence attached to the Counter-Memorial shows, this article was invoked by Argentina for the first time in April 2002, nearly a year after Contract termination and after the provision had lost its effect. Furthermore, the allegation made by Argentina that defects had been detected in the System that require access to the source codes to be corrected is an argument first made by Argentina in its Counter-Memorial.

4. Rejoinder

173. In its Rejoinder, Argentina points out that it is striking that, notwithstanding the contractual concerns expressed by Siemens in this arbitration, it never saw fit to initiate the dispute settlement provisions set out in Article 30 of the Contract. Argentina emphasizes the seriousness of the breaches of the Contract by SITS, and that Siemens agreed to renegotiate the Contract and to the application of the 2000 Emergency Law to the renegotiation. Siemens was aware of the consequences of renegotiating under that law. Argentina explains that the final proposal was prepared after receiving the opinions of the General Department of Legal Affairs of the Ministry of the Interior and of SIGEN. Argentina also points out that the delay in compensation can be attributed to institutional changes but also to the lack of cooperation of SITS with the Asset Reception Committee.

174. Argentina clarifies that it is true that Siemens won the bid on the basis of Siemens' qualifications as technology leader but the System failed to perform the task identifying and registering individuals pursuant to Law No. 17,671. Argentina affirms that the FOM was never approved and hence the System never existed, only some functions worked.

175. Argentina questions the political motivations alleged by the Claimant at each step of the way. Argentina points out that the FOM approval process already showed before the change of Government that SITS lacked the technical expertise required. The FOM was approved on November 26, 1999, subject to the observations made by RNP, and Argentina allowed SITS to start printing the DNIs beforehand so that SITS could recover its investment. As regards the External Circuit, Argentina clarifies that it was refused by the Provinces because of economic reasons, that it would have been irresponsible to oblige the Provinces considering how onerous the model was and the impossibility of continuing efficiently with the development of the Project, and that SITS agreed with the Government on November 26, 1999 to empower the project coordinator of RNP and the project manager of SITS, together with the Provincial Directors of Vital Records, to amend the schedules of implementation, composition and size of the Electronic Data Collection Centers and established December 20, 1999 as the deadline for implementation.

176. Argentina dismisses the contention that no budgetary allocations were made and refers to pertinent provisions of the budget laws for 1999, 2000 and 2001, and alleges that it would have been irresponsible on the part of Argentina to use the budget to develop a faulty product.

177. Argentina maintains that the manual system to issue DNIs could not be suspended because the System as such never worked. The mistake detected by Argentine police officers was not a minor mistake; it was a major design error in the sub-system. The DNM component also failed; it was installed in less than 10% of the places and presented gross validation mistakes. Argentina argues that SITS failed to bring any action against the measures taken and only objected to Decree 669/01 and then for reasons different from those adduced here.

178. Argentina insists that Article 17 of the Contract referred only to errors related to the physical support and not to the design of the software, that it was essential for the Government to secure the continuation of the System, that the interruption was not a penalty, and that the mistake in the fingerprint did not give rise to the revision of the Contract.

179. Argentina observes that Siemens has not objected to any of the safety-related questions in the report of SIGEN; it simply asserts that it was not notified. In respect of the date when the report was issued, Argentina dismisses the point made by Siemens since surely a report needs some time to be prepared and the date of the report is the date of its completion. Furthermore, Argentina notes that SITS was aware of the preparation of the report since its representatives attended the audit meetings organized by SIGEN.

180. Argentina asserts that at no time has it affirmed that the Contract was rescinded by the Contractor's fault. The reports of the various agencies were used to revise the Contract but the rescission was done under the 2000 Emergency Law. Argentina alleges that it did not inform SITS of any breaches nor imposed any sanctions because it was its intention to preserve the Contract and affirms that at all times it acknowledged that the rescission was a consequence of the economic and financial emergency.

181. Argentina affirms that it does not confuse the emergency of 2000 with that of 2002; the circumstances detected in 1999, which gave rise to the 2000 Emergency Law, are the background to the crisis that burst in December 2001. Argentina asserts that the two crises are linked, contrary to the argument made by Siemens.

182. Argentina explains that the Commission had no power to reach agreement with SITS and, therefore, it could not commit or oblige the State. Argentina describes the Contract Restatement Proposal prepared by the Commission as an internal preparatory document indicating SITS' point of view.

183. Argentina further explains that the report of SIGEN was an internal report of the Administration, and that due to their importance and effects some documents are published on its website. Thus there is nothing surprising that SITS learned of its existence that way rather than through a formal notice. Argentina understands the business reasons for SITS' disagreement with the changes resulting from SIGEN's report, but it does not understand the refusal of SITS to reveal its cost structure which would have assisted the Government in finding a more rapid and favorable solution for the parties.

184. Argentina takes issue with the statements by Siemens that only Siemens was required to do its part in aid of the shared sacrifice principle. To maintain the Contract as Argentina tried to do, adapting it to the economic circumstances of Argentina and its population represented a cost to Argentina over simply letting the Contract collapse.

185. Argentina argues that, when the Claimant did not accept 10 of the 21 points in the Draft Proposal, Argentina concluded that the points accepted by SITS were not sufficient to meet its savings expectations, and that Siemens may not argue now that it did not reject the proposal and that the State frustrated the Contract. Argentina recalls that SITS was informed that the 2000 Emergency Law had passed and that the Contract should not be excluded from it since the Contract was not a privatization contract, and affirms that the purpose of Argentina, when it included the Contract under the 2000 Emergency Law, was not to rescind the Contract but rather to reach an agreement that guaranteed its survival. According to Argentina, Resolution MI No. 1779/00 was clear in stating that the proposal made to the Contractor could be modified by the Contractor, but in such case the Government could reject the modification and rescind the Contract.

186. Argentina recalls that the System never reached the C2 Security Level required under Annex II, Appendix I of the Contract for the configuration installed in the Document Production Centre (“DPC”) and the Central Scanning Center. Argentina explains that SIGEN security reports in respect of the RPN and DNM were started by SIGEN on December 21, 2000, and February 21, 2001, respectively. The reports show that the Contract needed to be revised and redrafted not only because of errors in the design related to printing of fingerprints but also because of failures in IT security. Argentina explains that, because the Contract was rescinded under the 2000 Emergency Law and not for non-performance reasons, it was not necessary to have the final conclusions of the three audits carried out by SIGEN. On the other hand, according to Argentina, the SIGEN audits are a relevant element to bear in mind for the appraisal of property and equipment delivered by SITS upon termination of the Contract.

187. Argentina argues that the scope of the audit conducted by Pistrelli was limited because of its terms and the time when it took place, and may not be used validly to refute the recourse to SIGEN. Pistrelli’s audit was in the nature of desk work and could analyze the System only in a preliminary phase because it had not started to operate as a whole. On the other hand, affirms Argentina, SIGEN carried out an integral audit after the System operated and the Project was halted due to a mistake in its design. Argentina recalls that RPN criticized the Pistrelli audit and requested elaboration of a number of points and that, as of April 17, 2000, the authorities had not been able to prove whether the security changes requested by RPN had been incorporated.

188. Argentina observes that SITS refused to participate every time tests were carried out in spite of several invitations made by the Government. Argentina also points out that SITS refused to participate in the asset reception process notwithstanding official invitations to this effect. Thus SITS did not participate in the physical cross-checking, operative cross-checking or performance cross-checking because: (i) the inventories of assets already furnished contained accurate specifications, and (ii) since termination of the Contract it had not been in charge of the operation of the System, did not have access to the equipment and did not know the physical and operative situation.

189. Argentina acknowledges that SITS has the right to compensation and that it has taken all the measures leading to satisfy it.

190. Argentina confirms that the contractual performance bond has not been returned because there has been no compliance of SITS with Article 10.12 of the Contract regarding deposit of the source codes and with Article 10.7 regarding the delivery of licenses for the use of applications software. According to Argentina, the return of the performance bond is not required until the Asset Reception Committee issues a decision as to compliance by SITS with its contractual obligations.

191. Argentina maintains that the agreements between SITS and the sub-contractors have been transferred to the State and that the amount to be paid is included in the amount of compensation assessed by the TTN.

192. Argentina takes exception to the allegation that it has not been diligent in respect of the transfer of the non-exclusive licenses and the satellite links. Argentina contends that the licenses have not been delivered because delivery was subject by SITS to prior payment by the Government. As regards the assignment of satellite links, it was the choice of Argentina to continue or not with the same provider.

193. Argentina rebuts the statements of Siemens on the test of Casa de Moneda. In the first place, the test was conducted outside the asset reception process and there was no reason to invite SITS since the Contract by then had been terminated. Furthermore, Argentina affirms that the test was not as successful as the Claimant pretends since documents were printed only and not produced and, even with the assistance of sub-contractors, it was not possible to make the System work appropriately.

194. Argentina then turns to the source codes issue and re-affirms that the codes were necessary for the purpose of determining the extent of compliance by SITS with its obligations within the framework of the 2000

Emergency Law and Resolution ME No. 3/2001. Argentina also questions the statement of Siemens that Argentina had never raised the issue of compliance with Article 10.12. Argentina in fact requested the source codes at the request of the TTN and SITS breached Article 10.12 by not providing them. Argentina explains that the value of the source codes has been included in the assessment carried out by the TTN.

VI. Merits of the Dispute

195. Argentina has based its defense on its submission that the claim of Siemens is grounded on issues of contractual performance, while Siemens maintains that its claim is based on breaches of the Treaty, including the breach of the umbrella clause – Article 7(2) of the Treaty. The Tribunal will address this question first and, before turning its attention to the other specific claims related to expropriation, fair and equitable treatment, and arbitrary and discriminatory measures, it will consider the relevance of SITS’ and Siemens’ agreement to the Contract Restatement Proposal and alleged agreement of SITS and Siemens to include the revision of the Contract under the framework of the 2000 Emergency Law.

1. Umbrella Clause

a) Positions of the Parties

196. The Tribunal will start by recalling the specific arguments of the parties on the meaning of Article 7(2) of the Treaty. This article reads as follows:

“Each Contracting Party shall observe any other obligation it has assumed with regard to investments by nationals or companies of the other Contracting Party in its territory.”

197. Siemens argues that Argentina breached Article 7(2) of the Treaty by failing to comply with its obligations with regard to Siemens’ investment. According to Siemens, such obligations may be contractual obligations in agreements between States and investors or broader undertakings contained in the States’ national investment legislation. The effect of Article 7(2) is to protect investments against interferences with contractual rights and licenses elevating them to violations of the Treaty regardless of breaches of Articles 2 and 4. Siemens observes that this conclusion is even more compelling if the State does so in bad faith, for political reasons and lacking public purpose. Siemens also finds that this conclusion is confirmed by Article 10(1), which covers all “[d]isputes concerning investments in the sense of this Treaty between a Contracting Party and a national or company of the other Contracting Party [...]”

198. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina reviews the history of the umbrella clauses and in particular refers to the concept of the essential base of the claim introduced in Woodruff v. Venezuela<sup>38</sup> and used in Vivendi II for purposes of determining the validity of the forum choice in the contract. Argentina finds further support in its argumentation in Ronald S. Lauder v. the Czech Republic<sup>39</sup>, Alex Genin, Eastern Credit Limited, Inc. and A.S. Baltoil v. the Republic of Estonia<sup>40</sup>, CMS Gas Transmission Company v. Argentine Republic<sup>41</sup> and SGS Société Générale de Surveillance S.A. v. Islamic Republic of Pakistan.<sup>42</sup> In the latter case, Argentina points out that the tribunal insisted that the text of the clause has to be unambiguous and that there must be clear and convincing evidence of the purpose of the umbrella clause to elevate contractual claims to treaty claims. Argentina also finds support in SGS Société Générale de Surveillance S.A. v. Republic of the Philippines since both SGS tribunals were moved by the goal of preventing the transformation of contractual claims into international claims.

199. Argentina points out that the tribunal in SGS v. Philippines restricts the commitments to which the clause is applicable: “For Article X(2) to be applicable, the host State must have assumed a legal obligation, and it must have been assumed vis-à-vis the specific investment – not as a matter of the application of some legal obligation of a general character. This is very far from elevating to the international level all ‘the municipal, legislative or administrative or other unilateral measures of a Contracting Party.’<sup>43</sup> Furthermore, according to Argentina, if there is an exclusive contractual forum selection clause, the forum specified in the contract is the forum with jurisdiction over contractual matters.

200. Applying these considerations to the instant case, Argentina argues that “the clause can only be invoked vis-à-vis an Investment Agreement in the case of breach of the Agreement and not vis-à-vis a concession contract governed by domestic administrative law and containing an agreed upon forum clause. Siemens intentionally confuses the Investment Agreement with the investment, terms that are not equivalent and cannot be merged.”<sup>44</sup>

201. In its Reply, Siemens affirms that Article 7(2) includes obligations arising from a contract. Siemens finds that the attempt by Argentina to distinguish between an investment agreement and domestic utility contracts has no support under the terms of investment treaties or in their ordinary meaning. Siemens points out that Articles 7(2) and 10(1) use the term “investments”, which is broadly defined and that claims raised under an umbrella clause are additional to and independent of claims based on the other protections under the Treaty. According to Siemens, under an umbrella clause, “any violation of a contract thus covered, becomes a violation of the BIT. The consequence is that the BIT’s clause on dispute settlement becomes applicable to a claim arising from the breach of the contract.”<sup>45</sup>

202. Siemens argues that case law supports its claims under article 7(2) of the Treaty. First, it refers to the criticism of the SGS v. Pakistan in SGS v. Philippines which termed that decision unconvincing because it failed to give any clear meaning to the umbrella clause. Siemens points out that the facts of the instant case are different because SGS v. Pakistan did not involve any allegation of sovereign interference with the Contract. Second, Siemens recalls the conclusion of the tribunal in the Philippines case: “[the umbrella clause] makes it a breach of the BIT for the host state to fail to observe binding commitments, including contractual commitments, which it has assumed with regard to specific investments.”<sup>46</sup> Third, Siemens rebuts the argument of Argentina that a more specific provision shall take precedence over a more general one. Relying on the opinion of Professor Christoph Schreuer, Siemens contends that this argument in fact favors Siemens’ position:

“The dispute settlement clause in the BIT is merely a standing offer to investors. By accepting that offer an investor perfects a specific arbitration agreement. The ICSID arbitration agreement, as perfected through the institution of proceedings, applies only to the specific dispute. By contrast, the dispute settlement clause in the Contract refers to any dispute arising from the Contract. It follows that the ICSID arbitration agreement is the more specific one. The principle generalia specialibus non derogant, should work against the contractual forum selection clause and in favor of ICSID.”<sup>47</sup>

Fourth, Siemens rejects the arguments on the essential claim base and the contractual forum clause for having been already rejected by the Tribunal in its decision jurisdiction.

203. Argentina in its Rejoinder denies as a primary submission that there were any breaches of its obligations towards the Claimant and, if the Tribunal would consider otherwise, then these would be a contractual matter to be determined by the proper law of the Contract and not international law. Furthermore, Argentina contests the meaning attributed by the Claimant to the umbrella clause, and points out that, in the case of SGS v. Philippines, the wording of the clause was different and it referred to “specific” investments, and that, in any case, the tribunal found that the umbrella clause did not “convert the issue of the extent or content of such obligations into an issue of international law.”<sup>48</sup> Argentina explains that the case law provides very little authority to support the approach embraced by the Claimant and that SGS v. Pakistan and Salini v. Jordan<sup>49</sup> are evidence of the unwillingness of arbitral tribunals to embark on the resolution of contractual disputes. Argentina concludes by reminding the Tribunal that the approach proposed by the Claimant would re-write the Treaty, depart from the classical approach to the arbitral function under international law, and bring into play the provisions of Article 52 of the Convention.

204. The Tribunal considers that Article 7(2) has the meaning that its terms express, namely, that failure to meet obligations undertaken by one of the Treaty parties in respect to any particular investment is converted by this clause into a breach of the Treaty. Whether an arbitral tribunal is the tribunal which has jurisdiction to consider that breach or whether it should be considered by the tribunals of the host State of the investor is a matter that this Tribunal does not need to enter. The Claimant is not a party to the Contract and SITS is not a party to these proceedings.

205. In regards to the scope of Article 10(1), the Tribunal concurs with the submission that reference to disputes related to investments would cover contractual disputes for purposes of the consent of the parties to arbitration given the wide meaning of the term “investments” and the terms of Article 7(2). However, to the extent that the obligations assumed by the State party are of a contractual nature, such obligations must originate in a contract between the State party to the Treaty and the foreign investor as, for instance, in the SGS cases.

206. The Tribunal does not subscribe to the view of the Respondent that investment agreements should be distinguished from concession agreements of an administrative nature. Such distinction has no basis in Article 7(2) of the Treaty which refers to “any obligations”, or in the definition of “investment” in the Treaty. Any agreement related to an investment that qualifies as such under the Treaty would be part of the obligations covered under the umbrella clause. The Tribunal does not find significant, for purposes of the ordinary meaning of this clause, that it does not refer to “specific” investments. The term “investment” in the sense of the Treaty, linked as it is to “any obligations”, would cover any binding commitment entered into by Argentina in respect of such investment.

2. Consent of Siemens and SITS

207. The positions of the parties related to the argument advanced by Argentina to the effect that SITS or Siemens agreed to the measures taken by Argentina have already been described. The Tribunal recalls that such argument is based on the fact that SITS and Siemens agreed to the Contract Restatement Proposal in November 2000, that no administrative appeal was filed by SITS except with respect to Decree 669/01, and that they did not object to the ministerial Resolution placing the Contract under the regime of the 2000 Emergency Law.

208. As regards the agreement to the Contract Restatement Proposal, Argentina itself contends that it was a preliminary agreement that was not binding. In any case, Argentina modified the proposal and SITS did not accept certain terms of the revised proposal. Thus it is difficult to understand how it can be held that SITS or Siemens have agreed to the Contract Restatement Proposal if its terms were not an agreement but, as argued by Argentina, an internal document in which the views of the private party were expressed and Argentina did not accept them.

209. The argument on the consent of Siemens and SITS to the application of the 2000 Emergency Law to the Contract is even more puzzling to the Tribunal. It is expected that individuals and companies will obey the law; it is not a question of choice, as would be the option to accept a negotiated proposal.

210. It is a matter of dispute between the parties as to whether Siemens or SITS did not object to the application of the 2000 Emergency Law regime to the Contract because they were led to believe by the Respondent that this would speed up the administrative processing of the Contract Restatement Proposal. Whatever the reasons for not objecting, Argentina always had the power to apply the 2000 Emergency Law to the Contract, irrespective of the position of Siemens or SITS on the matter, and it did. It is clear from the evidence that the expectation of Siemens was that the Contract Restatement Proposal would not be modified even if this may have been possible under the 2000 Emergency Law. It would lack logic that a high official of Siemens would be received by President de la Rúa to plead that a decree be issued on terms different from those negotiated.

211. To conclude, the Tribunal considers that, for purposes of evaluating the measures taken by Argentina in light of its commitments under the Treaty, the allegations based on the consent of Siemens or SITS are not relevant.

212. The Tribunal will now turn to the other specific commitments under the Treaty alleged by Siemens to have been breached by Argentina. Since the parties understand these commitments differently, not only as they apply to the facts of this case but also in their meaning, the Tribunal will describe first in respect of each commitment the arguments made by the parties on its scope and meaning.

3. Expropriation

a) Positions of the Parties

213. Siemens argues that its investment has been expropriated indirectly as a result of measures taken by Argentina. According to Siemens, whether or not Argentina intended to expropriate its investment is irrelevant, what is of essence is the actual effect of the measures on the investors' property: "measures that indirectly, but effectively, deprive an investor of the use or enjoyment of its investment, including the deprivation of the whole or a significant part of the economic benefit of property, are as expropriatory as the seizure of an investor's formal title to its property."<sup>50</sup>

214. Siemens further argues that contractual rights and the right to complete a project are part of the property rights that may be expropriated and that government measures that frustrate such assurances and substantially

215. According to Siemens, irrespective of whether or not the purpose of a State measure affects its legality, it does not affect the State's obligation to compensate the investor promptly, adequately and effectively; as plainly stated in Article 4(2) of the Treaty, the public purpose of expropriatory measures by either State party in no way alters the legal obligation to compensate investors affected by those measures. Failure to provide prompt, adequate and effective compensation renders the expropriation unlawful whether or not it is for a public purpose.

216. Siemens claims that the acts and omissions of Argentina were expropriatory measures that substantially deprived Siemens of the use and enjoyment of its investment, and significantly reduced its value without payment of any compensation. Siemens relied on the following assurances given and obligations undertaken by Argentina: (i) replacement of all DNIs previously issued by new DNIs issued through the System; (ii) discontinuation of the issuance of manual DNIs; (iii) implementation of the System on a nationwide basis; (iv) processing of immigration proceedings through the System and payment of the corresponding fees; and (v) adoption of all measures necessary to fulfill the obligations under the Contract and regular collection of SITS' revenues resulting from the fees and prices paid by the users.

217. According to Siemens, these assurances constituted essential conditions of its investment and Argentina was aware of its meaning as recognized in the report of the Commission:

“Progressive replacement of all DNIs [...] is actually the State's guarantee rather than an obligation of the contractor, and defines the value of the contract [...]

[...] the contract term, which is defined as a six-year term that may be extended for two three-year periods, prescribes a mechanism that guarantees returns on the investment made; this relates to the need to have all existing DNIs replaced by the ones dealt with in the contract

218. Siemens affirms that the acts and omissions of Argentina qualify as “measures” under Article 4(2) of the Treaty. According to Siemens, the term “measures” is an all encompassing term for any actions attributable to a State that may affect an investment and includes acts performed by its different organs and subdivisions. In the case of its investment, Siemens refers to the following measures that resulted eventually in its expropriation:

(i) From the date of execution of the Contract and up to August 1999 Argentina failed to meet the obligations it had undertaken to allow the performance of the Contract on schedule; it did not make the necessary budget allocations, it did not provide the funds and human resources necessary to make the system operational, it delayed approval of the FOM, it failed to execute agreements with the Provinces, and it did not adopt the statutory and executive measures necessary to carry out the replacement of existing DNIs by those issued through the System.

(ii) Argentina pressed SITS into postponing the initial date for DNI production because of the then upcoming elections and into agreeing to postpone until January 31, 2000 discontinuation of the manual issuance of DNIs.

(iii) Argentina failed: (A) to adopt alternative measures to implement the System throughout its territory even when the RNP had the exclusive power to issue the DNIs and gather the information to produce them, (B) to provide budget allocations for the Project for the year 2000, (C) to provide the technical definitions to complete implementation of the immigration proceedings system and the imposition of new requirements not included in the new Project, and (D) to provide the facilities to implement the External Circuit to extend the System throughout the national territory.

(iv) Argentina notified Siemens in January 2000 that it intended to reduce the originally agreed-upon prices in the Contract and that agreement to the reduction was a condition for the continuation of the Contract and, in February 2000, unjustifiably halted immigration processing and DNI production through the System.

(v) The negotiations that ensued were concluded in November 2000 with the promise that the System's revenue-generating operations would immediately resume, and to speed approval of the new contractual terms the Contract was subjected to the Emergency Law of 2000. Notwithstanding assurances of the President of the Republic that a decree would be issued approving the new terms before the end of the year, the new terms were never approved.

(vi) New terms were proposed by Argentina in May 2001 on a take it or leave it basis without providing the basic elements for an evaluation of the proposal. The new proposal was not acceptable to SITS, which indicated its willingness to consider alternatives. Argentina terminated the Contract on May 18, 2001 invoking the power granted under the 2000 Emergency Law and without reference to any technical or other reason related to the fulfillment of the Contract by SITS.

(vii) After termination of the Contract, Argentina failed to pay compensation, although it had acknowledged its obligation to do so, denied the right of defense to SITS when SITS filed an appeal against Decree 669/01, failed to receive the equipment, facilities and instruments used in Project execution, and refused to return the Contract performance bond although it was mandatory to return it at Contract termination.

(viii) Siemens' investment was the only foreign investment expropriated under the 2000 Emergency Law and the public purpose invoked to terminate the Contract was merely an excuse to legitimize the measure adopted by the Government for political convenience, since economic studies carried out by the Ministry of Economy had recommended renegotiation of the terms agreed by the parties.

219. Siemens concludes by affirming that the aggregate of these measures amounts to a creeping expropriation of its investment and submits that, notwithstanding that Argentina's conduct constitutes a case of creeping expropriation, it seems reasonable to consider May 18, 2001, the date of Decree 669/01, as the date of expropriation for valuation purposes. Siemens adds that the Treaty states that the value of an investment for purposes of compensation is determined by reference to the date before the intention to expropriate became known, and, therefore, the effects of the taking itself and any act related to the taking, including threats to take the asset concerned, that may have diminished the value of the property or enterprise on the date of the taking, shall not be considered in the valuation and that Siemens is entitled to compensation for any loss suffered before or after May 18, 2001 caused by Argentina's creeping expropriation.

220. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina denies that it expropriated Siemens' investment and draws the Tribunal's attention to the following sentence of Article 4(2) of the Treaty: "The legality of the expropriation, nationalization or similar measure, and the amount of the indemnification should be reviewable through ordinary legal proceedings." Based on this sentence, Argentina asserts that it is entitled to apply this review option to any future decision of the Tribunal in connection with the alleged expropriation.

221. Argentina challenges the qualification of events by Siemens. It is Argentina's contention that for events to lead to an expropriation each one of them should affect the investment adversely. However, when the main feature of a contract is to provide one set of goods -the System in the instant case-, it is not possible to speak of successive acts, either the Contract is thwarted or not. Argentina argues that Siemens is unable to provide evidence that the alleged expropriatory events affected the investment adversely. In this respect, Argentina refers to the statement of Siemens that it agreed to renegotiate the Contract not only to save it but also because the Government had promised to resume the System's operation. This means, according to Argentina, that the Contract would not have been thwarted and there could not be a creeping expropriation. Argentina finds support for its line of argument in Generation Ukraine, Inc. v.

Ukraine, which admitted difficulty in finding many cases that fall under the creeping expropriation category and stated:

“A plea of creeping expropriation must proceed on the basis that the investment existed at a particular point in time and that subsequent acts attributable to the State have eroded the investor’s rights to its investment to an extent that is violative of the relevant international standard of protection against expropriation.”<sup>52</sup>

222. Argentina then develops the argument that Siemens’ claim is a purely contractual claim and international law does not include regulations on contracts, as acknowledged in Saudi Arabia v. Arabian American Oil Company (Aramco), Robert Azinian, Kenneth Davitian & Ellen Baca v. The United Mexican States<sup>53</sup>, and by Professor Brownlie<sup>54</sup>. Furthermore, Siemens has not contributed evidence showing, as stated by the Annulment Committee in Vivendi II, clear conduct contrary to the relevant standard in the circumstances of the case. Argentina disputes the relevance of the Iran-US Claims Tribunal case law because the law applicable to the cases before that tribunal is different from the law applicable in this arbitration. That tribunal has to rule on contractual disputes, can apply commercial usages and has highly discretionary powers in deciding the applicable law. Argentina reminds the Tribunal that the applicability of the legal principles developed by the Iran-US Claims Tribunal was explicitly rejected in Pope & Talbot, Inc. v. Canada<sup>55</sup> and S.D. Myers, Inc. v. The Government of Canada<sup>56</sup>. Argentina also argues in detail the inapplicability to the instant case of holdings by the tribunals adduced by Siemens regarding acquired international rights: (i) Aramco was concerned with the application of international law to a contract that included its own stabilization clause, (ii) Revere Cooper & Brass,

Inc. v. Republic of Burundi<sup>58</sup> was concerned with the revocation of a permit to operate in a free trade zone, (iv) CME Czech Republic B.V. (the Netherlands) v. The Czech Republic<sup>59</sup> was not concerned with contractual guarantees by a State, and (v) the findings of CME were contradicted by Lauder.

223. Argentina questions how Siemens has drawn the line to delimit the State's legitimate actions from actions entitling an investor to compensation. Argentina argues that, if the effect of depriving a person of its property is the criterion for this purpose, then any regulation would be expropriatory because regulations have a damaging effect on regulated parties. Argentina refers to the proportionality test advanced by Tecmed between the measures taken and the public interest pursued by them, and to the deference due to the State when it defines issues of public policy. Thus this requires a more complex analysis than proposed by Siemens.

224. Argentina finds support in recent arbitral awards - Consortium RFCC v. Royaume du Maroc<sup>60</sup>, Waste Management, Inc. v. United Mexican States<sup>61</sup>, Generation Ukraine, SGS v. Philippines - for arguing that a breach of treaty is not a breach of contract, it is not enough to qualify a contractual breach as a treaty violation, there should be a reasonable effort by the investor to obtain compensation through the domestic channels under the law applicable to the contract, and the State should not have used its sovereign powers to amend pre-existing legal situations and the parties' rights and obligations. In this respect, Argentina affirms that:

225. Argentina also affirms that, like the Philippines in the SGS case, it had “not issued any act (law or decree in sovereign function) aimed at disregarding the possible contractual rights of SITS. Should there be any debt, it would still exist.”<sup>63</sup>

226. Argentina requests the Tribunal to focus on two aspects of Generation Ukraine. First, arbitral tribunals do not exercise the function of an administrative review agency. Second, arbitral tribunals should consider the changes in the economy of the State hosting the investments when assessing the investor’s legitimate expectations. Argentina also calls the attention of the Tribunal to the holding in Waste Management II, to the effect that international expropriation law is not meant to eliminate the ordinary risk assumed by foreign investors, and to the fact that, under the Contract, SITS took responsibility for the business risk.

227. Argentina denies that it gave Siemens any warranty or profitability assurance, and claims that Siemens agreed to revise the Contract when faced with the failure of the essential features of the System and the substantial alteration of the economic conditions under which the Contract was intended to be carried out. Argentina contends that Siemens must comply with the Contract before requesting its fulfillment and lists as breaches of the Contract concealed from the Tribunal the following: delay in the design of the FOM and the Security Operating Model, the imperfect designs for the Security Operating Model, the External Data Capture Circuit and fingerprint taking, ignorance of the Argentine personal identification system, failure to deliver the source codes, vulnerability of the System, and the hindrances placed by SITS during the entire reception process, including its refusal to participate.

228. In any case, pleads Argentina, even if the arguments of Argentina were rejected, the mere “effect” criterion applied by the Iran-US Claims Tribunal would not result in an expropriatory effect of the alleged actions of Argentina under Argentine law applicable to the Contract.

229. In its Reply, Siemens rejects the allegation of Argentina that, under Article 4(2), it has the right to submit to review before the local courts the potential award of this Tribunal. Siemens explains that this Article grants the investor, who is the only party affected by the expropriation measures, the right to challenge the legality of the expropriation and the amount of the compensation in ordinary judicial proceedings.

230. Siemens then questions the definition of expropriation used by Argentina in its allegations, namely, that expropriation may occur only directly or through measures that autonomously and independently affect the investment adversely, that deprivation of or substantial interference with contractual rights does not constitute an expropriation under international law, and that the effect of the measure should completely thwart the investment or be unreasonable,

231. Siemens notes that the Treaty includes measures tantamount to expropriation and explains that provisions on indirect expropriation are usually generic statements given the great variety of possible measures. Siemens refers to the findings by the tribunals in Compañía del Desarrollo de Santa Elena S.A. v. The Republic of Costa Rica,<sup>64</sup> *CME, Metalclad Corporation v. S.A. v. Arab Republic of Egypt<sup>67</sup> and Tecmed to show the endorsement of the notion of indirect expropriation by arbitral tribunals; such expropriation takes place by a variety of measures that by themselves would not necessarily be expropriatory or adversely affect the investment, nor would they need to be intended to be expropriatory. Siemens refers to scholarly opinion on the notion of creeping expropriation:

“In some, if not most other, creeping expropriations, however, that intent [to expropriate], though possibly present at some level of the host state’s government, will be difficult, if not impossible to discern. Discrete acts, analyzed in isolation rather than in the context of the overall flow of events, may, whether legal or not in themselves, seem innocuous vis-à-vis a potential expropriation. Some may not be expropriatory in themselves. Only in retrospect will it become evident that those acts comprised part of an accretion of deleterious acts and omissions, which in the aggregate expropriated the foreign investor’s property rights.”<sup>68</sup>

232. Siemens alleges that an analysis of Biloune and Marine Drive Complex Ltd. v. Ghana Investments Centre,<sup>69</sup> Tradex Hellas S.A. v. Republic of Albania,<sup>70</sup> Santa Elena, Tecmed, Generation Ukraine and Iran-US Claims Tribunal jurisprudence shows that expropriatory measures that take place step by step should be analyzed in their aggregate effects and not “autonomously and independently” as argued by Argentina. Siemens concludes that the termination of the Contract was not the only expropriatory step but the last of a clear chain of measures taken by Argentina since 1999 that destroyed the value of Siemens’ investment.

233. Siemens disputes Argentina's assertion that there cannot be expropriation following contractual breaches and repudiation of the Contract. Siemens refers to the opinion of Professor Schreuer, who states that:

“[...] the mere fact that the investment was made on the basis of a contract does not preclude a violation of the BIT [the Treaty]. Nor does an allegation of contract violations mean that a BIT claim cannot arise from the same facts. The standards are simply different. It is incumbent upon the Claimant to demonstrate a violation of the BIT. This task is not made impossible or more onerous by the simultaneous existence of contract violations.”<sup>71</sup>

234. Siemens further disputes the argument that, when a contract is subject to a domestic legal system, expropriation of rights under the contract would be precluded. Siemens maintains that the law governing a particular contract and whether contractual rights may be expropriated are two distinct and unrelated questions; contractual rights may be expropriated as tangible property may be expropriated. Siemens also questions the argument that a contract cannot be governed by international law unless it contains a stabilization clause: “the decisive point is that the absence of a stabilization clause does not mean that the contract cannot be the object of an expropriation. The expropriation of rights under a contract containing a stabilization clause would merely give rise to an additional claim for violation of that clause.”<sup>72</sup>

235. Siemens recalls that Article 1 of the Treaty defines as protected investments “every kind of asset” and specifically “rights to funds used to create economic value or to any performance with an economic value” and “concessions conferred by public law entities.” Siemens alleges that judicial practice unanimously supports a wide concept of property that includes rights under contract, e.g., the decisions in Rudloff<sup>73</sup>, Norwegian Shipowners<sup>74</sup>, Factory at Chorzów<sup>75</sup>, and the case law of the Iran-US Claims Tribunal.

236. According to Siemens, a breach of contract or actions affecting contract rights may constitute an expropriation when: (i) the breach consists of one or part of a series of acts that combine to effect a creeping expropriation; (ii) the breach is of such fundamental nature that it goes to the heart of the promised performance and adversely affects the continuance of the project concerned; (iii) regulatory conduct denies contract rights or requires their alteration; (iv) specific contract rights or rights under a contract as a whole are repudiated, and (iv) a stabilization clause is breached. Siemens affirms that most of these situations apply in the instant case.

237. As regards the argument that Argentina did not act in its sovereign capacity, Siemens finds the argument implausible given termination of the Contract by decree, rejection of the appeal by decree, and termination based not on contractual grounds but on the 2000 Emergency Law. Furthermore, Argentina has argued that a decisive reason for the termination was that a substantial number of Provinces refused to participate in the implementation of the Project.

238. Siemens explains that the purpose of the measures is not a criterion to determine whether an expropriation has occurred. Under Article 4(2) of the Treaty, public purpose is a criterion for the expropriation's legality, "Similarly, proportionality and reasonableness may play a role in assessing whether the power to expropriate has been exercised properly. But these criteria do not affect the question whether an expropriation exists or not."<sup>76</sup> Commenting on the cases relied on by Argentina, Siemens observes that they relate to regulatory takings, while Siemens was deprived of its investment through measures taken directly against it and not through regulatory measures.

239. Siemens rejects the argument that it needed to seek prior recourse through domestic channels and observes that this is an attempt to reintroduce an argument already put forward at the jurisdictional stage. Siemens explains that, under Article 26 of the Convention, the Contracting Parties waive the local remedies rule unless they state otherwise, which Argentina has not done and, in any case, SITS and the Claimant made every reasonable effort to obtain correction of Argentina's measures through domestic means, including an administrative appeal against Decree 669/01. Contrary to the factual situation in the cases of Waste Management II and Generation Ukraine adduced by Argentina, in the instant case Siemens' loss is persistent, irreparable, caused by the Government and not by low-level officials whose acts of maladministration might easily be corrected.

240. Siemens also dismisses the argument that it may not be entitled to claim under the Treaty because it allegedly failed to perform its own obligations. Siemens observes that Article 4(2) does not impose any duty with regard to the investor; there is no defense based on the failure to comply with the other party's duties.

241. Argentina in its Rejoinder affirms that Siemens fails to draw the line between a contractual breach and the expropriation of an agreement, and clarifies that it referred to Waste Management II in its argument because the tribunal in that case established criteria for expropriation of an agreement, namely, an effective repudiation of the property rights of the investor which prevents it from exercising them entirely or to a substantial extent, and not redressed by remedies available to the claimant. Argentina emphasizes the reasonableness of the measures taken as part of the expropriation concept and as held by the European Court of Human Rights and Tecmed.

242. Argentina contends that the measures were taken under the usual and ordinary forms of terminating an agreement and Siemens failed to reply to its arguments and focused instead on whether the measures were taken in the exercise of its ius imperium. Argentina insists that there is a requirement of making a reasonable effort on the part of the investor to obtain correction in the domestic jurisdiction, and that this is a substantive requirement to distinguish between an act of maladministration from an act which constitutes an expropriation, "not because there is a requirement of exhaustion of local remedies but because the very reality of conduct tantamount to expropriation is doubtful in the absence of a reasonable – not necessarily exhaustive – effort by the investor to obtain correction.”<sup>77</sup> In this respect, Argentina argues that SITS failed to comply with its essential duties and agreed to re-negotiate the Contract to conform to the fiscal possibilities of the State and the pocketbook of the people.

243. Argentina takes issue with the contention of Siemens that the defense of non-performance does not apply because investors may assert their rights under the Treaty. Argentina argues that the exception non adimpleti contractus is equally a principle of international law. Argentina maintains that the conditions set in Waste Management II for contract expropriation are not met in this case. According to Argentina, the actions taken before Decree 699/01 were in response to technical errors and failures to deliver on the part of SITS and its sub-contractors. Argentina insists that the termination of the Contract by Decree 669/01 was not only based on economic considerations but also on technical grounds after receiving independent advice. Therefore, Decree 669/01 was a legitimate, rational and proportionate response to a disappointing and inadequate performance of SITS’ contractual obligations; it was not an expropriatory measure since “[i]t left intact the Claimant’s contractual rights, and in particular the ability to have recourse to the national courts of Argentina to challenge acts of its contractual partner which it considered to have breached the Contract.”<sup>78</sup>

244. Argentina further develops the argument that investment treaties are not a guarantee of profits to foreign investors and contends that if Decree 669/01 were to be considered expropriatory by the Tribunal, then the expropriation is a lawful expropriation because “it was a reasonable and proportionate response to a national fiscal crisis; it was carried out for a public purpose; it was not discriminatory on national or any grounds; and the decree contained within its terms provision for compensating SITS for cancellation of the Contract.”<sup>79</sup> Argentina explains that there were at least two major public policy reasons for the termination of the Contract: the massive fiscal crisis which necessitated cutting back projects involving a high level of public expenditure, and the inability or unwillingness of a substantial number of Provinces to participate in the Project given the fiscal crisis.

b) Considerations of the Tribunal

245. Before considering the arguments dealing with expropriation proper, the Tribunal will address the issue of contractual claims as opposed to treaty claims which has been argued by the parties in the context of the asserted breach of Article 4(2) and also of Article 7(2) (the umbrella clause). Subsequently, the Tribunal will discuss whether under Article 4(2) the findings of this Tribunal are subject to review by the ordinary courts, whether each individual measure in a creeping expropriation needs to be considered autonomously, whether the proper law of the Contract is relevant for purposes of expropriation, whether intent of the State to expropriate is necessary or only the effects of the State's measures need to be considered, whether an expropriation has taken place, and, if so, whether it conformed with the Treaty requirements.

i) Treaty claims and Contract Claims

246. Argentina has argued that at no time in the course of the dispute with SITS it took measures that could be regarded as an exercise of its police powers as a State, including when it terminated the Contract under the 2000 Emergency Law. The Tribunal considers that Argentina's view of when a State acts iure imperii is exceedingly narrow and inconsistent with the arguments advanced by Argentina itself.

247. The distinction between acts iure imperii and iure gestionis has its origins in the area of immunity of the State under international law and it differentiates between acts of a commercial nature and those which pertain to the powers of a State acting as such. Usually States have been restrictive in their understanding of which activities would not be covered by their immunity in judicial proceedings before the courts of another State. Here we have the reverse situation where the State party posits a wide content of the notion of iure gestionis.

248. In applying this distinction in the realm of investor-State arbitration, arbitral tribunals have considered that, for the behavior of the State as party to a contract to be considered a breach of an investment treaty, such behavior must be beyond that which an ordinary contracting party could adopt and involve State interference with the operation of the contract:

“ Pour qu’il y ait droit à compensation il faut que la personne de l’exproprié prouve qu’il a été l’objet de mesures prises par l’Etat agissant non comme cocontractant mais comme autorité publique. Les décisions aux cas d’expropriation indirecte mentionnent toutes l’ ‘interférence’ de l’Etat d’accueil dans l’exercice normal, par l’investisseur, de ses droits économiques. Or un Etat cocontractant n’ ‘interfère’ pas, mais ‘exécute’ un contrat. S’il peut mal exécuter ledit contrat cela ne sera pas sanctionné par les dispositions du traité relatives a l’expropriation ou à la nationalisation à moins qu’il ne soit prouvé que l’Etat ou son émanation soit sorti(e) de son rôle de simple cocontractant(e) pour prendre le rôle bien spécifique de Puissance Publique. ”<sup>80</sup>

249. Waste Management II distinguished a number of categories to determine whether it was faced with a matter of contract non-performance or expropriation. In the first category are those cases “where a whole enterprise is terminated or frustrated because its functioning is simply halted by decree or executive act, usually accompanied by other conduct.”<sup>81</sup> In the second category fall instances of “acknowledged taking of property, and associated contractual rights are affected in consequence.”<sup>82</sup> The third category includes cases “where the only right affected is incorporeal.”<sup>83</sup> In the latter cases, “the mere non-performance of a contractual obligation is not to be equated with a taking of property, nor (unless accompanied by other elements) is it tantamount to expropriation. Any private party can fail to perform its contracts, whereas nationalization and expropriation are inherently governmental acts.”<sup>84</sup>

250. The tribunal in SGS v. Philippines excluded as a treaty claim the debt owed to SGS because there had not been a “law or decree enacted by the Philippines attempting to expropriate or annul the debt, nor any action tantamount to an expropriation [...] A mere refusal to pay a debt is not an expropriation of property, at least where remedies exist in respect of such a refusal.”<sup>85</sup>

251. In the Jalapa Railroad case, the US-Mexican Mixed Claims Commission decided: “Here the Government of Veracruz stepped out of the role of contracting party and sought to escape vital obligations under its contract by exercising its superior governmental power.”<sup>86</sup>

252. In Salini v. Jordan, the tribunal held:

“Only the State, in the exercise of its sovereign authority (puissance publique), and not as a Contracting Party, has assumed obligations under the bilateral agreement. [...] In other words, an investment protection treaty cannot be used to compensate an investor deceived by the financial results of the operation undertaken, unless he proves that his deception was a consequence of the behavior of the receiving State acting in breach of the obligations which it had assumed under the treaty.”<sup>87</sup>

253. What all these decisions have in common is that for the State to incur international responsibility it must act as such, it must use its public authority. The actions of the State have to be based on its “superior governmental power”. It is not a matter of being disappointed in the performance of the State in the execution of a contract but rather of interference in the contract execution through governmental action.

254. In the instant case, what actions did Argentina take to step out of its role as a contractual party? In the first place, Argentina issued Decree 669/01 on the basis of the 2000 Emergency Law. Argentina has advanced the argument that termination of the Contract by Decree 669/01 was based not only on the fiscal emergency but also on the failures of the Contractor. This is not a credible argument inasmuch as Decree 669/01 and Decree 1205/01 did not provide for termination based on non-performance and Argentina itself has manifested in these proceedings that at no time had it affirmed that the Contract was rescinded by the Contractor's fault.<sup>88</sup>

255. Argentina itself has argued that the Tribunal should defer to Argentina in deciding what is in the public interest of Argentina, and should consider the measures taken by Argentina – the 2000 Emergency Law and Decree 669/01 - as a response by the State to the impending financial and social crisis. The Tribunal has no intention of second guessing the considerations that led Argentina to declare a fiscal emergency in 2000. At this stage, the Tribunal simply notes that this argument is not consistent with the submission that Decree 669/01 was a measure taken as a simple contracting party. Whether Decree 669/01 is a measure in breach of the Treaty is a question that the Tribunal will address later.

256. In the view of the Tribunal, Decree 669/01 is not the only measure that can be attributed to Argentina as a State. Argentina used its governmental authority on other occasions. First, Argentina interfered in the contractual relationship with SITS by requiring changes in the economic equation when the change of Government occurred and nearly a year before the fiscal emergency was declared. Argentina has claimed that, as a State, it has a right under administrative law to request changes in a contract. The Tribunal considers that, irrespective of whether the changes requested were or were not within the ius variandi of the State (a disputed matter between the parties), this is a right that Argentina claims as a State in order to control the deteriorating fiscal situation in the country. This is an assessment by the State related to the public interest and not one that would pertain to a regular contractual party.

257. Second, Argentina failed to enter into the agreements with the Provinces related to the External Circuit. The Tribunal considers this matter to be beyond a contractual breach because Argentina relies on its political structure to excuse itself from the obligation undertaken and because it relied on it as a matter of policy for terminating the Contract. As a State, Argentina should know what is possible for it to do (or not to do) with respect to its Provinces and the extent to which it may honor its commitments because of its own political structure.

258. Third, the permanent suspension of the two main components of the Project –the RPN sub-system and the DNM sub-system – also falls in the non-contractual category. The fact that an authorization was needed and never given for the immigration component is clearly a governmental act which had no basis in the Contract and its need came to light only when the DNM sub-system started to operate and in the context of Argentina expressing its intention to renegotiate the Contract. The alleged authorization requirement is suspect because the Contract had been drafted by Argentina and all the agencies that were involved later when the Contract was in effect had previously reviewed the terms of the Contract. The “provisional” suspension of the RPN sub-system is reasonable in terms of checking and correcting errors; what exceeds the contractual role and does not fit with Argentina’s legitimate security concerns is that SITS was not allowed to correct the error and that the manual system is still in effect as it was when the Contract was open for bids. During the Contract renegotiation, the resumption of the RPN sub-system was not linked to security concerns.

259. Fourth, Decree 669/01 provides for compensation to be paid. Argentina has not paid compensation, using arguments that go beyond its rights under the Contract. We refer to the issue of the source codes. SITS may or may not have complied with Article 10.12. At this stage it is immaterial because the Contract has been terminated and this article only required that the source codes be deposited with a notary public until the termination of the Contract. There is no provision of the Contract that requires delivery of the source codes to Argentina at Contract termination. There are provisions covering delivery of non-exclusive licenses but not of source codes. This is such an important matter in the technology field, as Argentina itself has argued, that it could not have been left to interpretation and guesswork. If it had been really intended ab initio that the source codes would have to be delivered to Argentina, the Contract would have specifically provided for this obligation. This is confirmed by the answer given by the Ministry of the Interior to Question No. 48 of SITS during the bidding stage of the Contract. The Minister had been asked to confirm that, under Article 95 of the Contract, the Ministry of the Interior's only right in respect of the software would be a non-exclusive license to its use. The Minister replied that the Bidding Terms and Conditions required that a permanent and non-exclusive license of use of the software be transferred to the Ministry. The Minister added: "This notwithstanding the bidder or the contractor may transfer in full or in part the property rights to the software if it would be acceptable [to the bidder or the contractor]." <sup>89</sup>

260. The Tribunal concludes that, in the actions listed above, Argentina acted in use of its police powers rather than as a contracting party even if it attempted at times to base its actions on the Contract. As to the other allegations made by Siemens, they relate to delays, non-budgetary allocations, or continuation of the manual system to issue DNIs and are actions that, in the context, could be construed as acts of a contractual party or of the sovereign acting as such. They are not essential to a finding of expropriation and the Tribunal will not consider them.

ii) Ordinary Courts' Review of the Legality of the Expropriation and of the Amount on Account of the Compensation under Article 4(2) of the Treaty

261. Article 4(2) provides that the legality of the expropriation, nationalization or equivalent measure, and the amount of compensation, may be subject to review by the ordinary courts. Argentina has reserved its right to apply this review option to any future decision of the Tribunal in connection with the expropriation. The context of the sentence does not support any right of Argentina in that respect. Article 4(2) is concerned with expropriation, nationalization or measures tantamount to either taken by the parties to the Treaty, and with the compensation paid. It is that expropriation or nationalization or compensation that is subject to the review of the ordinary courts, not a decision by this Tribunal. The objective of the sentence in question is to ensure that the investor has access to the ordinary local courts to review actions by the Government. It is a right that the parties accord to the investor, not to themselves, in relation to decisions of this Tribunal.

iii) Autonomy of the Measures constituting Creeping Expropriation

262. Argentina has argued that each measure alleged by the Claimant to be part of the process that results in a creeping expropriation must have an adverse effect on the investment, and that in the instant case it is not possible to speak of successive acts because if agreement had been reached on the renegotiated Contract, the Contract would not have been thwarted, to use Argentina's own words.

263. By definition, creeping expropriation refers to a process, to steps that eventually have the effect of an expropriation. If the process stops before it reaches that point, then expropriation would not occur. This does not necessarily mean that no adverse effects would have occurred. Obviously, each step must have an adverse effect but by itself may not be significant or considered an illegal act. The last step in a creeping expropriation that tilts the balance is similar to the straw that breaks the camel's back. The preceding straws may not have had a perceptible effect but are part of the process that led to the break.

264. We are dealing here with a composite act in the terminology of the Draft Articles. Article 15 of the Draft Articles provides the following:

“(1) The breach of an international obligation by a State through a series of actions or omissions defined in aggregate as wrongful occurs when the action or omission occurs which, taken with the other actions or omissions, is sufficient to constitute the wrongful act”.

265. As explained in the ILC's Commentary on the Draft Articles:

“Paragraph 1 of Article 15 defines the time at which a composite act 'occurs' as the time at which the last action or omission occurs which, taken with the other actions or omissions, is sufficient to constitute the wrongful act, without it necessarily having to be the last of the series.”

266. The concept could not be better explained.

iv) Expropriation of Contractual Rights and Proper Law of the Contract

267. Argentina has linked the argument about expropriation of contractual rights and the law applicable to the Contract and assumes that unless a contract is internationalized through a stabilization clause, it is not susceptible of expropriation. The fact that the Contract is subject to Argentine law does not mean that it cannot be expropriated from the perspective of public international law and under the Treaty. The two issues are unrelated. The Contract falls under the definition of “investments” under the Treaty and Article 4(2) refers to expropriation or nationalization of investments. Therefore, the State parties recognized that an investment in terms of the Treaty may be expropriated. There is nothing unusual in this regard. There is a long judicial practice that recognizes that expropriation is not limited to tangible property. The Tribunal will refer, for the sake of brevity, to the findings of the Permanent Court of Arbitration (“PCA”) in the case of the Norwegian Shipowners’ Claims and the Permanent Court of International Justice (“PCIJ”) in the Factory at Chorzów Case.

268. The PCA held that “[...] whatever the intentions may have been, the United States took, both in fact and in law, the contracts under which the ships in question were being or were to be constructed.”<sup>90</sup> The PCIJ found that:

“[...] it is clear that the rights of the Bayerische to the exploitation of the factory and to the remuneration fixed by the contract for the management of the exploitation and for the use of its patents, licenses, experiments, etc., have been directly prejudiced by the taking over of the factory by Poland. As these rights related to the Chorzów factory and were, so to speak, concentrated in that factory, the prohibition contained in the last sentence of Article 6 of the Geneva Convention applies in all respects to them.”<sup>91</sup>

269. These findings on the issue are conclusive and have been followed by ICSID and NAFTA tribunals, and the Iran-US Claims Tribunal. The Respondent has taken exception to the relevance of cases decided by the latter tribunal on the basis of the law applicable to those cases. The Tribunal considers that the findings of that tribunal are significant in that they show the consistency of approach on this matter by different international jurisdictions.

v) Intent to Expropriate

270. Argentina has argued against taking into consideration only the effect of measures for purposes of determining whether an expropriation has taken place. The Tribunal recalls that Article 4(2) refers to measures that “a sus efectos” (in its Spanish original) would be equivalent to expropriation or nationalization. The Treaty refers to measures that have the effect of an expropriation; it does not refer to the intent of the State to expropriate. The quotation of the finding of the PCA in Norwegian Shipowners refers to “whatever the intentions”<sup>92</sup> of the US were when the US took the contracts. A different matter is the purpose of the expropriation, but that is one of the requirements for determining whether the expropriation is in accordance with the terms of the Treaty and not for determining whether an expropriation has occurred.

vi) Was the Investment Expropriated?

271. The Tribunal has identified a series of measures that Argentina took which cannot be considered as measures based on the Contract but on the exercise of its public authority. Of all these measures, Decree 669/01 by itself and independently can be considered to be an expropriatory act. It was not based on the Contract but on the 2000 Emergency Law, it was a permanent measure and the effect was to terminate the Contract. Had it not been for Decree

669/01, and if a revised contract proposal had been agreed, the measures taken previously by themselves might not have had the effect and permanence required to be considered expropriatory, but, as no agreement was reached and the measures were never revoked, they stand as part of a gradual process which, with the issuance of Decree 669/01, culminated in the expropriation of Siemens' investment.

272. Contrary to the facts of the cases adduced by Argentina, the acts identified by the Tribunal as measures leading to the expropriation are acts of Argentina, decided at the highest levels of government, and not "simple acts of maladministration by low level officials." For that reason, Argentina's argument that simple acts of maladministration by low-level officials should be pursued in the local courts lacks validity in the circumstances of the instant case.

vii) Was the expropriation in accordance with the Treaty?

273. The Treaty requires that the expropriation be for a public purpose and compensated. The Tribunal finds that there is no evidence of a public purpose in the measures prior to the issuance of Decree 669/01. It was an exercise of public authority to reduce the costs to Argentina of the Contract recently awarded through public competitive bidding, and as part of a change of policy by a new Administration eager to distance itself from its predecessor. On the other hand, the public purpose of the 2000 Emergency Law was to face the dire fiscal situation of the Government. This is a legitimate concern of Argentina and the Tribunal defers to Argentina in the determination of its public interest. However, while the Tribunal would be satisfied in finding that an expropriation has occurred based only on Decree 669/01, and that the public purpose pursued by this Decree, in the context of Argentina's fiscal crisis and the 2000 Emergency Law, would be sufficient to meet the public purpose requirement of expropriation under the Treaty, the Tribunal cannot ignore the context in which Decree 669/01 was issued, nor separate this Decree from the other measures taken by Argentina in respect of the investment that culminated in its issuance. Decree 669/01 became a convenient device to continue the process started more than a year earlier long before the onset of the fiscal crisis. From this perspective, while the public purpose of the 2000 Emergency Law is evident, its application through Decree 669/01 to the specific case of Siemens' investment and the public purpose of same are questionable. In any case, compensation has never been paid on grounds that, as already stated, the Tribunal finds that are lacking in justification. For these reasons, the expropriation did not meet the requirements of Article 4(2) and therefore was unlawful. The Tribunal will examine the issues of compensation after addressing the alleged breaches of other obligations of Argentina under the Treaty.

4. Fair and equitable treatment

a) Positions of the Parties

274. Siemens argues that the obligation to treat an investment fairly and equitably requires arbitral tribunals to take into account the totality of the circumstances in each case. The proposition that investments shall have fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security constitutes the “overriding obligation”, and other standards must be applied as part of this general one. According to Siemens, fair and equitable treatment and full protection and legal security are intended to accord foreign investors broad protection, including a stable and predictable investment environment. Predictability is an essential element of stability, the rules and practices that affect investments must be predictable. A State violates the fair and equitable treatment standard when it fails to respect the specific assurances that it had given to investors as an inducement to invest and on which investors relied in making the investment

275. Siemens contends that Argentina provided assurances that SITS would be allowed to complete the Project and obtain the earnings that were the price of the System in an investment environment that was and would remain stable and predictable. To induce Siemens to invest in the Project, Argentina granted SITS the right to implement the complete and integral provision of the System and to issue all the DNIs to replace those existing on the date of the Contract, and all new DNIs and their renewals after the System entered into operation. The investment logically had to be made before the System startup and the return on the investment was dependent on the issuance of the DNIs and the processing of immigration proceedings.

276. According to Siemens, the acts and omissions previously described destroyed irreparably the legal framework for Siemens' investment, and at all times prior to the unilateral termination of the Contract Argentina promised that the Project would continue and the operation of the System would be resumed. Furthermore, due to Siemens' claim for compensation, Siemens has faced serious problems in other activities in Argentina.

277. Siemens argues that the standard of just and equitable treatment requires stable investment environments by ensuring transparency and predictable rules and practices, which in turn mean that the investor may rely on the undertakings made by the State to the investor. Additionally, fair and equitable treatment means freedom from coercion and harassment, due process and good faith. According to Siemens, RNP interposed serious obstacles to the regular performance of the DNI sub-system, the new authorities after the elections abused the vulnerable position of SITS and the renegotiation process announced in January 2000 was carried out under the threat of the early cancellation of the Contract. Siemens claims that Argentina committed gross procedural improprieties by interrupting the income generating activities, by denying SITS' access to the administrative records, by denying SITS the right to be heard on the May 2001 proposal and withholding information necessary for the decision of SITS on the proposal, by failing to meet the core requirements for terminating the Contract under the 2000 Emergency Law, and by removing administrative files pointing to the Government's failures. Furthermore, after termination of the Contract, SITS was denied information on the background of Decree 669/01 and evidence in support of its position, internal reports were issued without notice to SITS or without recording them in the administrative file, and SITS was excluded from the DNI sub-system test carried out together with SITS' former sub-contractors.

278. According to Siemens, the actions referred to above show also lack of good faith in the conduct of Argentina; in particular, the May 2001 proposal was done in bad faith to trigger the Contract's termination. Siemens adds non-payment of compensation, keeping the Contract performance bond, not taking responsibility for the sub-contractors' claims and the fact that all the alleged contractual breaches on which Argentina bases its defense were never notified to SITS or Siemens.

279. In its Counter-Memorial, as regards the violation of the full protection and security obligation, Argentina argues that the Claimant has failed to allege how this breach had taken place and affirms that this obligation refers only to physical damage. Then Argentina objects to the concept of fair and equitable treatment advanced by Siemens. Argentina argues that fair and equitable treatment means no more than the minimal treatment afforded by international law. It certainly does not mean that it gives arbitral tribunals the power to decide on the basis of equity. Argentina refers approvingly to the interpretation on this point by the NAFTA Free Trade Commission ("FTC"), recent investment treaties signed by the US and the findings of tribunals in Genin, S.D. Myers and Azinian.

280. Argentina disagrees with Siemens on the application of the standard of just and equitable treatment to the facts of the case. Argentina refers to the principle of good faith enshrined in this standard, how this standard applies equally to investors and States and how Siemens breached it during the failed negotiation that led to the rescission of the Contract. Thus Siemens systematically refused to reveal its cost structure; and "[i]n a demonstration of bad faith, Siemens went along with negotiations with the Commission named by the Argentine Government, by successive reductions in the final price of IDs."<sup>93</sup> Siemens also accepted the inclusion of the Contract in the 2000 Emergency Law and is prevented now by the doctrine of estoppel to claim that it was unaware of the implications, for "if its intention was to save the contract, it should have undertaken to bear the consequences that resulted from this emergency and adjust its expectations and claims so as to reach the shared burden of sacrifice" established by this law.<sup>94</sup> The need for shared sacrifice, according to Argentina, stems from the good faith that the parties owe each other, and fair and equitable treatment “in essence constitutes a guarantee of appropriate and reasonable treatment and that this should be viewed and analyzed taking into consideration the concrete and specific historical circumstances of the treatment. Fair and equitable treatment contains elements of good faith, consistency and reasonableness, which should be evaluated always bearing in mind the events that originated this arbitration.”<sup>95</sup>

281. Argentina also contends that the System did not provide the intended security and refers the Tribunal to the multiple security deficiencies pointed out in the audit performed by the Argentine authorities. In this respect, Siemens is responsible for SITS’ failures. It is not possible to make a claim for events affecting the subsidiary and at the same time avoid the legal consequences of the subsidiary’s acts.

282. As a final argument under this heading, Argentina alleges that SITS and Siemens consented to the 2000 Emergency Law in a case of normative acquiescence. Argentina refers in this respect to the Preah Vihear Temple case where the ICJ found: “It is an established rule that the plea of error cannot be allowed as an element vitiating consent if the party advancing it contributed by its own conduct to the error, or could have avoided it, or if the circumstances were such as to put that party on notice of a possible error.”<sup>96</sup> Argentina argues that Thailand, the party pleading error, can be substituted by the Claimant and SITS, which “accepted the emergency and their incorporation to the emergency legal system.”<sup>97</sup>

283. In its Reply, Siemens affirms that the allegation of Argentina that the conduct of SITS or Siemens lacks good faith because of the failure to reveal the cost structure is misplaced. Indeed, Article 2(1) addresses the duties of the State to the investors and not the reverse, and neither the Contract nor the 2000 Emergency Law required such disclosure. As for the doctrines of estoppel and acquiescence invoked by Argentina, Siemens points out that both doctrines had their origins in inter-State relations and it is doubtful that they can be extended to the area of investor-State relations. Siemens claims that there is no statement of fact by Siemens on which Argentina could have relied to its own detriment, and as regards acquiescence to the law, Siemens observes that the applicability of legislation does not depend on the assent or protest of foreign investors or of any other party subject to the law, and the fact that SITS did not take legal action against Resolution No. 1779/00 of the Ministry of the Interior does not mean that Siemens waived its rights under the Treaty against an uncompensated expropriation or other actions violating the Treaty's substantive standards.

284. Siemens denies that the protection accorded by the standard of fair and equitable treatment is the minimum required of States under international law:

“An interpretation that is in accordance with the BIT’s object and purpose would also have to give some independent meaning to the fair and equitable treatment standard. An interpretation that reduces its meaning to standards that are contained already in customary international law would deprive it of any independent meaning and would make the provision redundant. The application of the general principles of international law is already mandated by Article 10, paragraph 5 of the BIT. If Article 2(1) of the BIT providing for fair and equitable treatment is to have an independent meaning it must be in addition to the general principles of international law.”<sup>98</sup>

285. Siemens points out that the Neer standard has been rejected consistently in recent decisions: (i) in ELSI, the ICJ considered that to be a breach of the standard State conduct needs to show “a willful disregard of the process of law, an act which shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of judicial propriety”, (ii) in Mondev Intl. Ltd. v. The United States of America and Loewen Group, Inc. and Raymond L. Loewen v. the United States of America, the tribunals used the adjectives “improper and discreditable”, (iii) in Loewen, Waste Management and MTD, the tribunals considered discrimination against foreigners an important indicator of failure to respect fair and equitable treatment, and (iv) in Waste Management and MTD the tribunals used terms such as arbitrariness, idiosyncrasy, injustice, lack of good faith, lack of due process and proportionality.<sup>99</sup>

286. As regards the views of Argentina on the scope of “full protection and security”, Siemens observes that the Treaty goes further than most investment treaties when it refers to “legal” security and this reference is “a strong indication that the provision, as contained in the BIT [Treaty], goes beyond mere physical violence and extends to the investor’s legal position.”<sup>100</sup> Siemens refers to the following measures or omissions that deprived it of its protection and legal security: failure to make the budgetary allocations, suspension of the income-generating activities, renegotiation of the Contract under extreme pressure, and abusive use of the 2000 Emergency Law to terminate the Contract.

287. In its Rejoinder, Argentina argues that, given the failure of SITS to perform its obligations under the Contract and the circumstances of fiscal stringency, the issuance of Decree 669/01 could not be considered an arbitrary, grossly unfair, idiosyncratic measure, nor did it involve lack of due process. Argentina contests the broad interpretation of fair and equitable treatment by Siemens and takes issue with the approach taken by Tecmed and MTD in applying this standard of protection. Argentina considers that the standard applied by these tribunals does not reflect an accurate international standard. Argentina submits that fair and equitable treatment does not encompass the protection of legitimate expectations and the establishment of a stable investment environment.

288. Argentina also submits that, even if the Tribunal were to apply an expanded concept of fair and equitable treatment, there was no violation of this standard by Argentina. Argentina refers to the fact that the Claimant had never raised the political motivation of Argentina's acts before this arbitration and had consented to the acts that it now questions. Argentina submits that Siemens agreed on the laws that it now questions and that is, among other reasons, why there was no violation of the Treaty by Argentina. Argentina wonders what legitimate expectation can be affected by acts of the State to which the investor has consented.

289. The parties' allegations raise issues about the scope of standard of fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security and its relevance in this case. As regards the scope, the parties hold different views on whether the obligation to treat an investment fairly and equitably refers to the minimum standard of treatment of aliens under customary international law or requires from the State a higher standard of conduct more in consonance with the objective of the Treaty. They also differ on whether "security" refers to physical security or to security in a wider sense. The Tribunal will first address these two issues.

290. In their ordinary meaning, the terms "fair" and "equitable" mean "just", "even-handed", "unbiased", "legitimate".<sup>101</sup> As expressed in the Treaty preamble, it is the intention of the State parties to intensify their economic cooperation, and their purpose to create favorable conditions for the investments of the nationals of a party in the territory of the other, while recognizing that the promotion and protection of such investments by means of a treaty may serve to stimulate private initiative and improve the well being of both peoples. It follows from the ordinary meaning of "fair" and "equitable" and the purpose and object of the Treaty that these terms denote treatment in an even-handed and just manner, conducive to fostering the promotion and protection of foreign investment and stimulating private initiative. The parties to the Treaty show by their intentions and objectives a positive attitude towards investment. Terms such as "promote" or "stimulate" are action words that indicate that it is the intention of the parties to adhere to conduct in accordance with such purposes. This understanding is confirmed by Article 2(1) of the Treaty, whereby each party even undertakes to promote the investments of nationals or companies of the other party.

291. The specific provision of the Treaty on fair and equitable treatment is found also in Article 2(1) after the commitment to promote and admit investments in accordance with the law and regulations and as an independent sentence: “In any case [the parties to the Treaty] shall treat investments justly and fairly (“En todo caso tratará las inversiones justa y equitativamente”).”<sup>102</sup> There is no reference to international law or to a minimum standard. However, in applying the Treaty, the Tribunal is bound to find the meaning of these terms under international law bearing in mind their ordinary meaning, the evolution of international law and the specific context in which they are used.

292. Argentina has indicated its support for the interpretation of Article 1105 of NAFTA by the FTC. The Tribunal observes first that this article bears the heading “Minimum Standard of Treatment.” Paragraph 1 of this article states: “Each Party shall accord to investments of investors of another Party treatment in accordance with international law, including fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security.” As interpreted by the FTC and as indicated in the title of the article, the standard of treatment is the minimum required under customary international law.

293. The question whether fair and equitable treatment is or is not additional to the minimum treatment requirement under international law is a question about the substantive content of fair and equitable treatment. In 1927, the US-Mexican Mixed Claims Commission considered in the Neer case that a State has breached the fair and equitable treatment obligation when the conduct of the State could be qualified as outrageous, egregious or in bad faith or so below international standards that a reasonable and impartial person would easily recognize it as such. This description of conduct in breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard has been considered as the expression of customary international law at that time. For the Tribunal the question is whether, at the time the Treaty was concluded, customary international law had evolved to a higher standard of treatment.

294. It will be useful for this purpose to review the cases referred to by the parties in support of their differing positions. Argentina has particularly relied on Genin. In that case, the tribunal without engaging in a textual analysis of the fair and equitable treatment clause in the US-Estonia BIT considered this requirement to be an international minimum standard, which could only be breached by “a wilful neglect of duty, an insufficiency of action falling far below international standards, or even subjective bad faith.”<sup>103</sup> That tribunal found that, in the circumstances of the case, Estonia did not breach the duty of fair and equitable treatment; however, it hoped that the “Bank of Estonia will exercise its regulatory and supervisory functions with greater caution regarding procedure in the future,”<sup>104</sup> and observed that “the awkward manner by which the Bank of Estonia revoked EIB’s license, and in particular the lack of prior notice of its intention to revoke EIB’s license and of any means for EIB or its shareholders to challenge that decision prior to its being formalized, cannot escape censure.”<sup>105</sup>

295. After the interpretation of the FTC, several tribunals established under NAFTA have held that the customary international law to be applied is the customary international law as it stood when that treaty was concluded and not in 1927. In Mondev, the tribunal held that “the content of the minimum standard today cannot be limited to the content of customary international law as recognized in arbitral decisions in the 1920s.”<sup>106</sup> The same tribunal noted that the State party in the dispute agreed that the international standard of treatment has evolved as all customary international law has, and that the two other State parties to NAFTA also agreed with this point.<sup>107</sup> Therefore, that tribunal considered that:

“the FTC interpretations incorporate current international law, whose content is shaped by the conclusion of more than two thousand bilateral investment treaties and many treaties of friendship and commerce. Those treaties largely and concordantly provide for ‘fair and equitable’ treatment of, and for ‘full protection and security’ for, the foreign investor and his investments.”<sup>108</sup>

And found that “To the modern eye, what is unfair or inequitable need not equate with the outrageous or the egregious. In particular, a State may treat foreign investment unfairly and inequitably without necessarily acting in bad faith.”<sup>109</sup>

296. The tribunal in Loewen came to a similar conclusion: “Neither State practice, the decisions of international tribunals nor the opinion of commentators support the view that bad faith or malicious intention is an essential element of unfair and inequitable treatment or denial of justice amounting to a breach of international justice.”<sup>110</sup>

297. After reviewing arbitral awards under NAFTA, the tribunal in Waste Management II reached the conclusion that:

“the minimum standard of treatment of fair and equitable treatment is infringed by conduct attributable to the state and harmful to the claimant if the conduct is arbitrary, grossly unfair, unjust or idiosyncratic, is discriminatory and exposes the claimant to sectional or racial prejudice, or involves a lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends judicial propriety – as might be the case with a manifest failure of natural justice in judicial proceedings or a complete lack of transparency and candour in an administrative process. In applying this standard it is

<sup>109</sup> Ibid., para. 116. The tribunal in ADF affirmed the same point: “what customary international law projects is not a static photograph of the minimum standard of treatment of aliens as it stood in 1927 when the Award in the Neer case was rendered. For both customary international law and the minimum standard of treatment of aliens it incorporates, are constantly in a process of development.” ADF Group, Inc. v. United States of America, ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/00/1, Award (January 9, 2003), para. 179.

relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant.”<sup>111</sup>

“treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment. The foreign investor expects the host State to act in a consistent manner, free from ambiguity and totally transparently in its relations with the foreign investor, so that it may know beforehand any and all rules and regulations that will govern its investments, as well as the goals of the relevant policies and administrative practices or directives, to be able to plan its investment and comply with such regulations.”<sup>112</sup>

299. It emerges from this review that, except for Genin, none of the recent awards under NAFTA and Tecmed require bad faith or malicious intention of the recipient State as a necessary element in the failure to treat investment fairly and equitably, and that, to the extent that it has been an issue, the tribunals concur in that customary international law has evolved. More recently in CMS, the tribunal confirmed the objective nature of this standard “unrelated to whether the Respondent has had any deliberate intention or bad faith in adopting the measures in question. Of course, such intention and bad faith can aggravate the situation but are not an essential element of the standard.”<sup>113</sup> That tribunal also understood that the conduct of the State has to be below international standards but not at their level in 1927 and that, as in Tecmed and Waste Management II, the current standard includes the frustration of expectations that the investor may have legitimately taken into account when it made the investment.

300. The Tribunal has already noted that the standards of conduct agreed by the parties to the Treaty indicate a favorable disposition to foreign investment. The purpose of the Treaty is to promote and protect investments. It would be inconsistent with such commitments and purpose and the expectations created by such a document to consider that a party to the Treaty has breached its obligation of fair and equitable treatment only when it has acted in bad faith.

301. The Tribunal will now turn to the question of the meaning of full protection and security. According to Argentina, “security” refers only to physical security while the Claimant attributes to this term a wider meaning, in particular because the Treaty refers to “legal security.”

302. The Tribunal first notes that, although the parties have argued the application of this standard as a single standard, the Treaty provides for the fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security under two different Articles. The parties do not seem to have found this separation to be significant and the Tribunal will not dwell further on this point. The Tribunal also notes that Argentina in its arguments did not address the fact that security was qualified by “legal” in this instance.

303. As a general matter and based on the definition of investment, which includes tangible and intangible assets, the Tribunal considers that the obligation to provide full protection and security is wider than “physical” protection and security. It is difficult to understand how the physical security of an intangible asset would be achieved. In the instant case, “security” is qualified by “legal”. In its ordinary meaning “legal security” has been defined as “the quality of the legal system which implies certainty in its norms and, consequently, their foreseeable application.”<sup>114</sup> It is clear that in the context of this meaning the Treaty refers to security that it is not physical. In fact, one may question given the qualification of the term “security”, whether the Treaty covers physical security at all. Arguably it could be considered to be included under “full protection”, but that is not an issue in these proceedings.

304. Based on this understanding of fair and equitable treatment and full protection and legal security, the Tribunal will now consider whether the actions of Argentina, identified by the Tribunal as actions taken by Argentina acting as a State, constitute a breach of this obligation.

305. Argentina has argued that Siemens and its subsidiary, for whose conduct Siemens is responsible, acted in bad faith because they accepted the laws of Argentina and alleged before this Tribunal political motives which were never denounced during the long lasting re-negotiation of the Contract. Siemens has argued likewise that it was never notified under the Contract of all the failures that have been alleged by Argentina in these proceedings. The parties' response to these arguments is similar: both parties were intent on reaching a renegotiated agreement that ultimately proved elusive.

306. The Tribunal considers that neither party may hold against the other positions that it may have taken during a good faith negotiation.<sup>115</sup> In any case, acceptance of laws or regulations should not be held against a company which has accepted them by the Government that adopted them. As stated elsewhere by the Tribunal, to comply with the law is not understood to be an optional matter. In this respect, the arguments advanced by Argentina on acquiescence and estoppel are misplaced and have already been dealt with by the Tribunal.

307. On the other hand, the Tribunal finds without merit the argument made by Siemens that since filing its claim Siemens has encountered difficulties to operate in Argentina. This statement is contradicted by the affirmation in Siemens' Reply that Argentina holds Siemens in such high regard that it has repeatedly requested its intervention in other public projects, even after the Contract's termination

308. To conclude, the Tribunal finds that the initiation of the renegotiation of the Contract for the sole purpose of reducing its costs, unsupported by any declaration of public interest, affected the legal security of Siemens' investment. The Tribunal also finds that when a government awards a contract, which includes among its critical provisions an undertaking of that government to conclude agreements with its provinces, the same government can not argue that the structure of the State does not permit it to fulfill such undertaking. This runs counter to the principle of good faith underlying fair and equitable treatment. The arguments made to justify delay in paying compensation without basis in the Contract or Decree 669/01 and the denial of access to the administrative file for purposes of filing the appeal against Decree 669/01 show lack of transparency of Argentina in respect of the investment, particularly when Argentina itself has manifested in these proceedings that at no time had it affirmed that the Contract was rescinded due to the Contractor's fault.<sup>116</sup>

309. For these reasons, the Tribunal finds that the full protection and legal security and fair and equitable treatment obligations under the Treaty have been breached by Argentina.

5. Arbitrary and Discriminatory Measures

a) Positions of the Parties

310. Siemens argues that, based on the plain meaning of "arbitrary", the measures adopted towards Siemens' investment meet the test of arbitrariness: "not governed by any fixed rules or standard", "performed without adequate determination of principle and one not founded in nature of things", "without cause based upon the law", or "failure to exercise honest judgment", "characterization of a decision or action taken by an administrative agency [...] [as] willful and unreasonable action without consideration or in disregard of facts or law or without determining principle."<sup>117</sup>

311. According to Siemens, the intentional frustration of the performance of the Contract when all the investment had been made to put the System into operation was arbitrary. The measures were unreasonable, taken unilaterally without due cause or justification. They caused serious damage to Siemens for which it has not been compensated. The measures were also discriminatory in intent and effect. No other investor was treated like Siemens, no measures such as those imposed on Siemens' investment were adopted by Argentina concerning contracts or investments of similar importance, in particular, no other public contract was terminated by Argentina under the 2000 Emergency Law and compensation has never been paid. These discriminatory measures impaired Siemens' ability to manage, use and enjoy its investment.

312. In its Counter-Memorial, Argentina argues that the measures it adopted were reasonable in proportion to their purpose and of general application. Thus, they were neither arbitrary nor discriminatory. Argentina refers to the concept of arbitrariness defined by the ICJ in ELSI: "It is a willful disregard of due process of law, an act which shocks, or at least surprises, a sense of juridical propriety;"<sup>118</sup> and the arbitral tribunal in Genin: "any procedural irregularity that may have been present would have to amount to bad faith, a willful disregard of due process of law or an extreme insufficiency of action."<sup>119</sup> According to Argentina, the measures it took were in defense of vital security of the State, to keep the data on its inhabitants secure since otherwise it would violate rights enshrined in international treaties on the protection of human rights.

313. Argentina also questions the qualification as arbitrary of the delay in approving the FOM. The FOM presented by SITS was not in a condition to be approved and Argentina showed diligence by requesting in advance information that would have helped in speeding up the approval process and that SITS did not provide. According to Argentina, a government may not be accused of being arbitrary when it tries to protect and preserve the confidentiality of the data on its inhabitants.

314. As to the meaning of "discriminatory", Argentina contends, based on ELSI and S.D. Myers, that, for a measure to be discriminatory, the measure has to be harmful, favor a national against a foreign investor and be intended to discriminate. Argentina argues that the measures it took were intended to protect its citizens and as such could not be considered discriminatory. Furthermore, the measures taken in relation to Siemens' investment had nothing to do with any differential treatment vis-à-vis any other investor group in the same situation because Siemens was in a unique situation.

315. In its Reply, Siemens insists that in terms of Article 2(3) of the Treaty actions are arbitrary if they are opposed to the rule of law or surprise a sense of juridical propriety, or if a measure harming an investor cannot be justified in terms of rational reasons that are related to the facts. Siemens contests the argument of “voluntary consent” or “acquiescence” by SITS and affirms that what occurred was an abusive exercise of the State’s authority that left SITS powerless. According to Siemens, Argentina’s measures were “arbitrary because they dismantled the entire legal framework that had led Siemens to conduct its investment, contrary to the expectations of any reasonable and impartial person. The political motivation behind Argentina’s actions only serves to emphasize the arbitrariness of the measures adopted.”<sup>120</sup>

316. As regards discriminatory treatment, according to Siemens, the criterion is whether the foreign investor has been treated less favorably than domestic investors or investors of other nationalities; de facto discrimination is sufficient even without violation of the host State’s domestic law. Siemens argues that the measures taken towards Siemens’ investment were not of a general nature; the Contract is the only significant contract terminated which involved a foreign investor and the only foreign investment terminated unilaterally under the 2000 Emergency Law.

317. In its Rejoinder, Argentina recalls that the Contract was unique in terms of its scope, importance, duration and expense. Argentina explains how the Contract could not be compared to the passport issuance contract that the Claimant adduced as evidence of discrimination. Passports are not obligatory, while DNIs are. In the face of an economic crisis, Argentina had a right to protect its interests and those of its citizens. The measures taken by Argentina in response to “the fiscal emergency were of general operation, for a public purpose and did not introduce unreasonable discrimination.”<sup>121</sup> Argentina further explains that the fact that public utilities were excluded from the 2000 Emergency law does not mean that the crisis did not impact their rights, e.g., foreign companies that invested in the natural gas transport and distribution agreed to defer adjustment of their fees as permitted in their contracts sixteen months before the termination of the contract. Argentina concludes by asserting that, given the enormous costs of the Contract, “it cannot be said that the measures taken to terminate it early were unfair, unjust or disproportionate to the extent of the problem in hand.”<sup>122</sup>

b) Considerations of the Tribunal

318. In its ordinary meaning, “arbitrary” means “derived from mere opinion”, “capricious”, “unrestrained”, “despotic.”<sup>123</sup> Black’s Law Dictionary defines this term as “fixed or done capriciously or at pleasure; without adequate determining principle”, “depending on the will alone”, “without cause based upon the law.” There is also abundant case law on the interpretation of this term to which the parties have referred. The Tribunal considers that the definition in ELSI is the most authoritative interpretation of international law and it is close to the ordinary meaning of the term emphasizing the willful disregard of the law. The element of bad faith added by Genin does not seem to find support either in the ordinary concept of arbitrariness or in the definition of the ICJ in ELSI.

319. In the instant case, certain measures taken by Argentina do not seem to be based on reason. Argentina has explained that an authorization was needed to start the operation of the DNM sub-system, but has failed to explain why the authorization was never given after the investment was made and the DNM sub-system had started to operate. Similarly, the Tribunal does not question the importance to the vital interests of Argentina to have secure identification of individuals, but applied to the suspension of the RPN sub-system such argument would have justified requiring an immediate correction of the error. No evidence has been submitted that the error could not be corrected. Instead, SITS was denied the possibility of correcting the error. While the Tribunal could accept that there may have been reasons to justify the temporary suspension of the DNM and RPN sub-systems, the Tribunal finds its permanent suspension arbitrary.

320. As to discriminatory measures, under Article 3(1) and (2) of the Treaty, the parties undertook to treat each other's nationals and companies not less favorably than they treat their own investors or those of a third party. Whether intent to discriminate is necessary and only the discriminatory effect matters is a matter of dispute. In S.D. Myers, the tribunal considered intent "important" but not "decisive on its own."<sup>124</sup> On the other hand, the tribunal in Occidental Exploration and Production Company v. Republic of Ecuador found intent not essential and that what mattered was the result of the policy in question.<sup>125</sup> The concern with the result of the discriminatory measure is shared in S.D. Myers: "The word 'treatment' suggests that practical impact is required to produce a breach of Article 1102, not merely a motive or intent." The discriminatory results appear determinative in Marvin Roy Feldman Karpa v. United Mexican States,<sup>126</sup> where the tribunal considered different treatment on a de facto basis to be contrary to the national treatment obligation under Article 1102 of NAFTA.

321. The Tribunal concurs that intent is not decisive or essential for a finding of discrimination, and that the impact of the measure on the investment would be the determining factor to ascertain whether it had resulted in non-discriminatory treatment. The Claimant has based its arguments mainly on the fact that the Contract was the only major contract, and the only contract with a foreign investor, terminated under the 2000 Emergency Law, while the contract of the Government with an Argentine national to issue passports was allowed to stand notwithstanding the high costs associated with it. The Respondent has explained to the Tribunal that the Contract was unique and that the mandatory nature of DNI justified the difference in treatment. The Tribunal considers that, while there are aspects in the actions of Argentina that seem discriminatory, the allegations of the Claimant have not been fully substantiated. Given the holdings of the Tribunal under other protections of the Treaty, the Tribunal finds it unnecessary to determine whether Argentina breached the non-discriminatory treatment obligation.

VII. Compensation

1. Positions of the Parties

322. Siemens claims that it is entitled to receive full and comprehensive compensation for the breaches of the Treaty and to recover the fair market value of its wrongfully expropriated investment, calculated for valuation purposes immediately before the date of expropriation of May 18, 2001; the loss of profits or lucrum cessans and the additional damage caused as a result of the expropriatory measures and acts, including those damages claimed by subcontractors and suppliers of Siemens and/or SITS regarding the Project and caused by Argentina's expropriation. In addition, Siemens claims pre and post-award interest of 6% compounded annually.

323. Siemens argues that the expropriation was unlawful because it did not meet the conditions of the Treaty and international law, namely, it did not serve a public purpose, it did not satisfy the formal and substantive requirements of due process, it did not comply with the legal standards of treatment set forth in the Treaty and no compensation was paid. Based on the Factory at Chorzów case, Siemens pleads that an illegal dispossession leads to a twofold obligation: first, the obligation to restore the property in question or, if this is not possible, to pay compensation corresponding to its value; and second, there is an obligation to pay damages for any additional losses sustained as a consequence of the taking.

324. Siemens observes that the value of the asset expropriated is not affected by whether or not an expropriation is lawful, but the amount of compensation due to an investor may be significantly affected. In the instant case, Siemens claims that the value of the property at the moment of the taking plus interest to the day of payment is a legal floor, and calls upon the Tribunal to add any potential consequential damages so as to "wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed.”<sup>127</sup>

325. Siemens considers as appropriate the definition of fair market value in Starrett Housing Corp. v. The Islamic Republic of Iran: “[T]he price that a willing buyer would pay to a willing seller in circumstances in which each had good information, each desired to maximize his financial gain, and neither was under duress or threat.”<sup>128</sup>

326. Siemens argues that the fair market value includes the lost future profits that the enterprise would have gained had it been allowed to continue to operate, points out that SITS was a single project company, and affirms that its future revenues and profits were ascertainable on the basis of the commitments made by Argentina. Siemens refers to Norwegian Shipowners, LETCO and the concurring opinion of Judge Brower in Amoco International Finance Corporation, which stated that “[...] where the expropriated property consists of contract rights, the compensation must be defined by the anticipated net earnings that would have been realized, as well as one can judge, had the contract been left in place until completion.”<sup>129</sup>

327. Siemens claims that SITS, as a single project company, had foreseeable and ascertainable revenues and profits based on the commitments made by Argentina. Furthermore, any negative effect of the taking itself or the measures related to the taking must be excluded from the valuation. According to Siemens, a State may not reduce its obligation to pay compensation simply by creating a situation in which expropriation is to be feared before it occurs or by breaching contractual obligations or other duties to the foreign investor.

328. According to Siemens, the appropriate method of valuation is the book value method in its variant of actual investments. Based on this method, Siemens claims that, as of May 17, 2001, the value of its investment amounts to US$283,859,710. Siemens affirms that this amount is comparable to the amounts that could be obtained with the application of other alternative methods of valuation. In addition, Siemens claims to be entitled to US$124,541,000 on account of lucrum cessans.

329. Siemens also claims additional damages based on the unlawful nature of the expropriation measures and the behavior of Argentina prior to and after the date of expropriation. On this account, Siemens claims: (i) the costs incurred for maintaining a skeleton operation in Argentina to allow the conclusion of the Project, (ii) storage costs because of a 20-month delay in the transfer of assets to the Government, (iii) training costs and costs of technical support services provided by SITS during a period in excess of 75 days after May 18, 2001 pursuant to Article 26.3 of the Contract, (iv) damages claimed or that may be claimed by subcontractors involved in the Project's execution as a result of the expropriation, (v) unpaid invoiced services of SITS to the DNE agency in 1999, and (vi) the costs of this arbitration and of counsel. According to Siemens, subcontractors' damages amount to US$44,678,462 and the aggregate amount of the other items is US$9,397,899.

330. Siemens claims pre-award compounded interest at the rate of 6% per annum so that it is fully compensated for the loss suffered and considers that May 18, 2001 should be the date of expropriation for valuation purposes, including for the assessed value of the lost profits. In the case of the additional damages, interest shall be applied from the dates in which they have been caused.

331. Argentina argues in its Counter-Memorial that Siemens is not entitled to the compensation it has claimed: First, the Treaty in Article 4(2) states that compensation shall correspond to the value of the investment expropriated. Argentina interprets the reference to "value" of the investment – as opposed to "fair market value" - to exclude future profits. To support this point, Argentina reviews its own treaty practice and offers examples in four categories ranging from compensation on the basis of fair market value of the investment to the classical Hull formula, or a partial Hull formula or "the value" of the investment as in the case of the Treaty. Argentina alleges that there is no uniformity in the doctrine on the level of compensation.

332. Argentina questions the cases relied on by Siemens to argue the extent of the damages claimed. According to Argentina, in Maffezini, neither lucrum cessans nor future profits were redressed, and full compensation awarded in the Factory at Chorzów case does not correspond to fair market value. Argentina requests the Tribunal to apply the principles of Tecmed, a case that Argentina finds strikingly similar to this case and quotes approvingly its reasoning under Mexican law. Argentina affirms that Argentine law applicable to this case and the 2000 Emergency Law to which Siemens consented do not grant the compensatory right claimed by Siemens.

333. Argentina also questions the currency of the claimed compensation. Argentina argues that it did not guarantee the value of the investment in terms of dollars. Argentina points out that the Contract was not a dollar contract and that Siemens entered into a forward dollar contract to secure US$190 million, the same amount of the alleged loans made by the parent company to its Argentine affiliate. The existence of such contract, according to Argentina, proves that Siemens never intended to enter into a contract with Argentina in a foreign currency.

334. Argentina explains that under Decree 669/01 for Siemens to be compensated in the amount calculated by the Appraisals Tribunal in accordance with the Contract, the applicable law and the Treaty, Siemens has to deliver real assets in condition to be used, otherwise Argentina would not receive any consideration for its compensation. To achieve this objective, the Appraisals TTN established the following conditions: delivery of the source codes, executable programs correctly set up and approved, delivery of the licenses for base software, databases and other necessary utilities, delivery of the licenses for application software of the sub-contractors, delivery of documentation related to applications, systems and training proved as to its usefulness, and ability to use the Contractor's software licenses.

335. Argentina criticizes the valuation carried out by Siemens' expert. Argentina points out that: (i) he did just office work and had not checked the market values to confirm that the amounts charged by suppliers to SITS reflect the usual market practices, (ii) he did not consider whether the intra-Siemens

Group transfers were carried out at arm's length, (iii) he did not carry out the task personally and did not perform any due diligence, (iv) he accepted all of Siemens' assumptions at face value without verifying them, (v) he affirms to have applied the book value method when he never analyzed where the alleged funds of Siemens were invested and the same analysis should have been done in respect of SITS' liabilities, (vi) he maintains that the book value method and the discounted cash flow analysis reach the same result when the figures are different, and (vii) he made a number of mistakes in calculating future income. Furthermore, the supporting documentation of the valuation is lacking.

336. In its Reply, Siemens argues that it is entitled to full compensation and that "investment value" has to be given its plain and ordinary meaning. Siemens points out that: (i) the Treaty does not qualify the reference to investment value, (ii) "value" in its ordinary meaning is defined as "[t]he monetary worth or price of something; the amount of goods, services, or money that something will command in an exchange," and (iii) in a free market economy the exchange is conducted on the market. Therefore, "the plain and ordinary meaning of 'value' is what one may expect to obtain in exchange for something, that is to say its 'fair market value.'"<sup>130</sup>

337. Siemens observes that the legal authorities referred to by Argentina relate to the general debate on the extent of compensation under customary international law and not to the interpretation of the Treaty which contains a clear standard of full compensation. Siemens refers to CME where the tribunal, drawing its conclusions from the Factory at Chorzów case, ruled that "genuine value" in Article 5 of the Netherlands-Czech Republic BIT meant the fair market value of the investment. Siemens also refers to Biloune which held that the fair market value, which takes into account future profits, is the most accurate measure of value of the expropriated property.

338. On the issue of future profits, Siemens draws the attention of the Tribunal to how the ILC has expressed the principle that lost profits are awarded where there is a reliable basis for the expectation of future income:

“In cases where lost future profits have been awarded, it has been where an anticipated income stream has attained sufficient attributes to be considered a legally protected interest of sufficient certainty to be compensable. This has normally been achieved by virtue of contractual arrangements or, in some cases, a well-established history of dealings.”<sup>131</sup>

According to Siemens, the contractual provisions concerning the production, issuance and price of the DNIs and other fees constituted a “legally protected interest of sufficient certainty.”<sup>132</sup>

339. Siemens points out that Argentina refers to documents which are 30 and 45 years old and pertain to debates already settled. Furthermore, in Tecmed, and contrary to what Argentina has alleged, the tribunal awarded compensation in accordance with the provisions of the relevant investment treaty, on the basis of the market value of the assets concerned, lost profits and compound interest.

340. Siemens argues that, for purposes of Siemens’ claim of expropriation under international law, the domestic law of Argentina and the provisions of the 2000 Emergency Law are irrelevant.

341. Siemens also contends that, in any case, it is entitled to fair market value on the basis of the Treaty’s most-favored-nation clause and other investment treaties signed by Argentina that specifically provide for such valuation of expropriated assets.

342. Siemens contests the affirmation by Argentina that there was no unlawful expropriation and affirms that the requirements of public benefit, compensation and compliance with the general principles of treatment provided for in the Treaty had not been respected by Argentina. Siemens insists on full damages and, given the unlawful nature of the expropriation, consequential damages all paid in dollars. In this respect, Siemens recalls that the investment was made in dollars and argues that the forward contract itself proves this point. Siemens adds that it is entitled to the value of the investment immediately before the date of the taking when the peso had parity with the dollar. Siemens also recalls that, as it explained at the jurisdictional stage, its right to compensation under the Treaty is distinct from SITS' rights under the Contract and domestic law, and that Argentina never offered nor even approved any compensation under the 2000 Emergency Law.

343. Siemens points out the shortcomings of the valuation report of the TTN, among others: (i) it was never submitted to SITS for consideration, (ii) it was prepared long after termination of the Contract and a long time after SITS lost control and supervision of the System, (iii) it evaluated items individually rather than the System as a whole, and (iv) it was not done in the currency of the investment. According to Siemens, the appraisal done by the TTN does not even reflect the compensation due to SITS under the 2000 Emergency Law.

344. Siemens further points out that Argentina fails to provide a proper response for the sub-contractors' claims and the excuses for withholding the performance bond under the Contract are unsustainable and constitute another arbitrary measure taken by Argentina.

345. As regards Argentina's criticisms of the valuation report prepared by Siemens' expert, Siemens argues that Argentina has misunderstood the task of the expert, which was to evaluate the loss suffered by Siemens on the investment and not to evaluate SITS' loss under the Contract under Argentine law. According to Siemens, it was not the task of this expert to value individual assets: "Valuing hardware and software on a part by part basis, when the very condition of those items are now the result of the expropriation, would provide no support in valuing Siemens A.G.'s investment in the contractual right to operate the System and to generate revenue and return on its investment."<sup>133</sup> Siemens adds that Argentina ignores the fact that the financial statements and accounting records relied on by the expert had been audited by a leading auditing firm – KPMG -, and refers to case law showing the appropriateness of the use of audited accounting records to carry out a valuation task. According to Siemens, Argentina also ignores the fact that SITS was a single project company, which should answer the criticism that the expert never examined where the alleged funds of Siemens were invested. Regarding the costs of the investment, Siemens contends that, if Siemens' global price was the lowest in the bidding for the Contract, the individual cost and prices of the components would also be lowest or extremely competitive compared to other tenders.

346. In its Rejoinder, Argentina argues that the fair market value of an expropriated property as the measure of compensation for an expropriated investment is not always applicable when an expropriation becomes necessary for social policy reasons. If this would not be the case, it would be a serious limitation on State sovereignty, and no social or economic reforms could be accomplished by poorer nations. Argentina maintains that it had effectively become bankrupt, and that to maintain that an expropriation is only lawful if full market compensation is payable is incompatible with the principle of self-determination. Argentina refers in this respect to professor Brownlie's statement that: "The principle of nationalization unsubordinated to a full compensation rule may be supported by reference to principles of self-determination, independence, sovereignty and equality."<sup>134</sup> Argentina also refers to the statement of the European Court of Human Rights in James v. UK, which held that Article 1 of the First Protocol does not "guarantee a right to full compensation in all circumstances. Legitimate objectives of 'public interest' such as pursued in measures of economic reform or measures designed to achieve greater social justice, may call for less than reimbursement of full market value."<sup>135</sup>

347. Argentina affirms that these considerations are applicable to the situation in Argentina and are entirely consistent with the Treaty. Argentina concludes that, even if there was an expropriation, the Claimant would not be entitled to more than the direct losses and not to the lucrum cessans.

2. Considerations of the Tribunal

348. The Tribunal will address the following issues raised by the parties: applicable law for purposes of determining compensation, the meaning of “value” of the investment, currency of compensation, whether compensation should include lucrum cessans and consequential damages, on what evidence it should be based, the amount of compensation, the applicable rate of interest, and whether it should be simple or compound interest.

a) Applicable Law

349. The Tribunal has found that Argentina took measures that had the effect of expropriating the investment and that such expropriation is in breach of the Treaty, and hence unlawful. The Tribunal has also found that the Respondent breached its obligations to provide fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security and that it adopted arbitrary measures in respect of the investment. The law applicable to the determination of compensation for a breach of such Treaty obligations is customary international law. The Treaty itself only provides for compensation for expropriation in accordance with the terms of the Treaty.

350. The Draft Articles are currently considered to reflect most accurately customary international law on State responsibility. Article 36 on “Compensation” provides:

“1. The State responsible for an internationally wrongful act is under an obligation to compensate for the damage caused thereby, insofar as such damage is not made good by restitution.

2. The compensation shall cover any financially assessable damage including loss of profits insofar as it is established.”

351. This Article relies on the statement of the PCIJ in the Factory at Chorzów case on reparation:

“The essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act – a principle which seems to be established by international practice and in particular by the decisions of arbitral tribunals – is that reparation must, so far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that act had not been committed.”<sup>136</sup>

352. The key difference between compensation under the Draft Articles and the Factory at Chorzów case formula, and Article 4(2) of the Treaty is that under the former, compensation must take into account “all financially assessable damage” or “wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act” as opposed to compensation “equivalent to the value of the expropriated investment” under the Treaty. Under customary international law, Siemens is entitled not just to the value of its enterprise as of May 18, 2001, the date of expropriation, but also to any greater value that enterprise has gained up to the date of this Award, plus any consequential damages.

b) Value of the Investment

353. In the Factory at Chorzów case, the PCIJ asked the experts to calculate the value of the undertaking as of the date of the taking and as of the later date of its prospective judgment, and such value to include the lands, buildings, equipment, stocks and process, supply and delivery contracts, goodwill and future prospects. It is only logical that, if all the consequences of the illegal act need to be wiped out, the value of the investment at the time of this Award be compensated in full. Otherwise compensation would not cover all the consequences of the illegal act. While the Tribunal has determined that the Treaty does not apply for purposes of determining the compensation due to Siemens, which is governed by customary international law as reflected in Factory at Chorzów, it is worth noting that the PCIJ, as the Treaty itself, refers to the value of the investment without qualification. To reach its conclusion, the PCIJ did not need to have “value” qualified by “full”. The Tribunal is satisfied that the term “value” does not need further qualification to mean not less than the full value of the investment. Having reached this conclusion, it is unnecessary for the Tribunal to discuss the argument advanced by the Claimant that it is entitled to the fair market value of its investment on the basis of the MFN clause in the Treaty.

354. Argentina has pleaded that, when a State expropriates for social or economic reasons, fair market value does not apply because otherwise this would limit the sovereignty of a country to introduce reforms in particular of poor countries. Argentina has not developed this argument, nor justified on what basis Argentina would be considered a poor country, nor specified the reforms it sought to carry out at the time. Argentina in its allegations has relied on Tecmed as an example to follow in terms of considering the purpose and proportionality of the measures taken. The Tribunal observes that these considerations were part of that tribunal's determination of whether an expropriation had occurred and not of its determination of compensation. The Tribunal further observes that Article I of the First Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights permits a margin of appreciation not found in customary international law or the Treaty.

c) Method of Valuation

355. The Claimant has proposed that compensation be calculated on the book value of the investment and that lucrum cessans be arrived at through discounting an estimate of profits calculated as a percentage of the revenues that SITS would have received if the Project would have run its course on the basis of the prices for its services set forth in the Contract. Usually, the book value method applied to a recent investment is considered an appropriate method of calculating its fair market value when there is no market for the assets expropriated. On the other hand, the DCF method is applied to ongoing concerns based on the historical data of their revenues and profits; otherwise, it is considered that the data is too speculative to calculate future profits. Normally the two methods are regarded as alternative means of valuing the same object. Here, however, Siemens's expert has applied the two in tandem because, under the terms of the Contract, all Siemens' costs would be incurred before the first peso of revenue would be realized. Therefore, Siemens has calculated its claimed loss of profits by applying a notional profit percentage to its projected future net revenues under the Contract, and then discounting those claimed profits to their present value via the DFC method, to which it then has added the book value of its costs actually incurred, i.e., its “sunk costs”, which due to the actions of Argentina never will be able to produce the projected (or any) revenues. In other words, Siemens claims: (i) the present value of its estimated lost profits or lucrum cessans, plus (ii) the costs it actually incurred, which were “wasted” in the effort to produce the revenues from which those profits would have been derived.

356. Siemens has defended its approach on the basis that SITS had already by May 18, 2001 incurred most Project development costs, the future costs could be estimated with reasonable certainty based on existing service contracts, and the prices for the delivery of SITS’ services were known as were the number of DNIs to be produced. For these reasons, Siemens has argued that an estimate of the present value of future profits could be calculated to complement the book value of the investment. In this respect, the Lemar Report uses the rate of profits on sales projections presented to the board of Siemens at the time the Project was proposed for approval. At that time, the estimated profit rate was 18%. Expert Lemar reduces it to 16% because of developments during the first year of the Contract. Furthermore, Siemens’ expert compares this estimated profit rate to other companies operating in Argentina with prices subject to State regulation, substantial upfront infrastructure investment cost to deliver the service, and the intention of the Government that they would produce a reasonable return to the owners of the investment.<sup>137</sup> For this purpose, the expert uses information from the Argentine Comisión Nacional de Valores, Bloomberg Services and the National Gas Authority of Argentina. Mr. Lemar arrives at a cross-sector average profit rate of 16%.<sup>138</sup> Thus similar to that projected by Siemens as adjusted.

357. While the Tribunal understands the reasons for the admittedly unusual approach followed by Siemens and considers that it has merit in the particular circumstances of this case, it has some concerns, as later explained, about how the valuation has been calculated, including the valuation of the lucrum cessans.

358. The parties have taken different approaches in respect of what is the adequate evidence of Siemens' investment. For the Claimant, the audited financial statements of SITS are sufficient evidence of the amounts invested. For Argentina, there is a need to show how each dollar or peso was spent and relate each dollar or peso to the item financed with it. Argentina has insisted that the Tribunal use an expert to analyze the accounts of SITS and ensure that the amounts spent by SITS were spent for purposes of carrying out the Project.

359. The Claimant has pointed out that the Project consisted of a made-to-order integrated system to be carried out by a single purpose company –SITS- as required by Argentina itself. Siemens contends that the financial statements properly audited are sufficient evidence of Siemens' investments, that the financial statements of SITS were audited by KPMG, and that no evidence has been presented to question KPMG's audit.

360. The approach advanced by Argentina responds to the need to assess the value to Argentina of Siemens' investment for purposes of applying Decree No. 669/01. The Tribunal has to apply customary international law. Accordingly, the value of the investment to be compensated is the value it has now, as of the date of this Award, unless such value is lower than at the date of expropriation, in which event the earlier value would be awarded. It is not the value of the investment to Argentina but the value of the investment in terms of the sums invested in the Project. The Project had started to operate and no convincing evidence has been submitted showing that the funds intended for the Project made available to SITS, as loans or equity, were not used for the intended purpose. The valuation made by the Respondent was made from a perspective different from that required under customary international law months after the Contract was terminated. For these reasons, the Tribunal saw no merit in prolonging the proceedings and engaging an expert to analyze the accounts of SITS and where the funds had been invested.

e) Currency of Compensation

361. Argentina has argued that the Contract is denominated in pesos and that it had not guaranteed to Siemens the parity of the peso in effect at the time it entered into the Contract. This assertion is correct but it has to be considered in the context of the requirement that the consequences of the illegal act be wiped out. It would be hardly so if the parity of the currency would be added as yet another risk to be taken by the investor after it has been expropriated. In the instant case, the Claimant has pleaded that the Tribunal accept May 18, 2001 as the date of expropriation. The Tribunal has considered that the issuance of Decree 669/01 was determinant for purposes of its finding of expropriation and it is also the date that would be in consonance with Article 15 of the Draft Articles on the date of occurrence of a composite act. On May 18, 2001, the peso was at par with the dollar. If such obligation would have been met, the Claimant would have been compensated in pesos convertible at that rate. Therefore, the Tribunal concludes that compensation shall be paid in dollars.

f) Amount of Compensation

362. Siemens claims $283,859,710 as the book value of the investment to May 17, 2001.

363. Under the Contract (Annex VIII), SITS committed itself to invest $201,486 million ("Plan de Inversiones" dated June 25, 1998 ("the Investment Plan")) and the variable costs such as satellite links, distribution costs of documents, overheads and operational expenses listed in page 2, paragraph 1.1 of Annex VIII. It is clear from the Contract that the total investment would include the items for which an amount is specified in the Investment Plan and those variable costs for which no estimated amount is given.

364. At the time of the 2000 SWIPCO audit, financed by SITS but carried out for the account of the Respondent, SITS had spent 126,235,000 pesos compared with the 241,486,000 envisaged in the Investment Plan. Both figures are exclusive of the variable costs for which no amount was specified in the Investment Plan.

365. After termination of the Contract and for purposes of the valuation carried out by the TTN, SITS claimed to have invested AR$158,106,542. As explained in the report of the TTN of December 27, 2002,<sup>139</sup> AR$47,237 pesos of that amount correspond to subcontractors' invoices and the remainder to invoices of companies in the Siemens group. In addition, SITS claimed "non-productive expenses" (AR$44,452,193), interest on investments and "non-productive expenses" (AR$25,260,008 and AR$8,332,985, respectively), capital contributions (AR$27 million), close-down costs (AR$31 million), certain paid and unpaid invoices (AR$13,100,000), subcontractors' claims (AR$40 million) and lucrum cessans (AR$254,942,070), for a total in excess of AR$444 million. The TTN considered, pursuant to the terms of Decree 669/01, only the AR$158,106,542 on account of investments and valued them at AR$72,161,510.

366. Argentina in its comments of November 23, 2005 on the accounting information provided by Siemens asserts that the investment made reached AR$107,472,398.23. The Claimant disputes the amount and currency of the latest value attributed to the investment by Argentina, and of the valuation of the TTN. The Claimant also points out, inter alia, that "non-productive expenses" and interest have been excluded, notwithstanding the submission of the related invoices by SITS to the Ministry of the Interior on July 22, 2001.

367. Mr. Lemar, the Siemens' expert, has concentrated on the financing of SITS and has calculated the book value by adding Siemens' capital contributions, the loans made to SITS and the corresponding interest, as recorded in SITS's financial statements for 2001. Mr. Lemar concludes that the book value of Siemens' investment at May 17, 2001 was $283,859,710.

368. The Tribunal observes, that except for Mr. Lemar's, none of the valuations listed above respond to the criteria that need to be applied by the Tribunal and, as explained forthwith, the Tribunal has difficulty in accepting the value of the investment as calculated by Mr. Lemar. The Tribunal will use as a starting point SITS' audited financial statements. They have been audited by a highly qualified firm of independent auditors, which confirmed the reliability of the accounting records, and no evidence has been submitted to the Tribunal which proves otherwise. Mr. Lemar has capitalized all interest paid by SITS. Prima facie, capitalization of interest during the development phase of an investment is normal practice. However, the financing of the Project was highly leveraged. Siemens paid-in 27 million pesos in equity and financed the rest primarily by three-month credit at 12.08% in 1999, twelve-month credit at 9% in 2000 and again with three-month credit at 14% in 2001. The high interest charged to the Project and the short-term nature of the credit raise the issue of the extent to which it is appropriate to recognize the full amount of interest claimed as part of the value of the investment since it is a way of building into book value what otherwise would have to be earned as profits. The Tribunal considers that it is appropriate to capitalize interest on loans made to SITS for the Project, but in case of loans made by Siemens or its subsidiaries such interest should reflect the actual cost of funds to Siemens because the Tribunal's task is to determine the loss of Siemens itself. Therefore, the Tribunal will proceed to calculate<sup>140</sup> the respective percentage of loans made to SITS by third parties, and Siemens and its subsidiaries and the costs of funds to the latter.

369. According to the funding data in the table in paragraph 3.7 of the Lemar Report, total loan funding by Siemens and its subsidiaries was AR$224,906,029 and loan funding by others AR$12,194,531 up to April 30, 2001, and AR$225,726,812 and AR$17,241,306 up to May 31, 2001. The Tribunal has adjusted these figures to May 17, 2001 by assuming that debt funding by Siemens, its subsidiaries and third parties increased at a steady daily rate during the month of May. The result is debt funding to May 17 of AR$225,356,136 by Siemens and its subsidiaries, and AR$14,962,117 by third parties. Therefore, Siemens and its subsidiaries provided 93.8% of all loans made to SITS and third parties provided 6.2%.

370. For purposes of determining an appropriate interest rate on loans made by Siemens or its subsidiaries, the Tribunal observes that, as a general matter, corporations of Siemens' size and creditworthiness hedge a substantial portion of the interest rate risk inherent in their fixed rate borrowings through floating interest rate swaps. Hence, the cost of borrowing that should be taken into account is the floating rate that Siemens could have achieved using interest rate swaps during the life of the Contract from November 26, 1998 to May 17, 2001. The average of such interest rate during this period was 2.35%.<sup>141</sup>

371. Now the Tribunal turns to the percentage of interest payments made to Siemens and its subsidiaries that would be appropriate to capitalize based on the assumed cost of funds to Siemens in addition to interest payments paid to third parties. To arrive at such percentage, it is necessary to calculate the ratio of 2.35% to the annual average interest rate charged to SITS as reflected in SITS' financial statements.<sup>142</sup> Thus, 2.35% is: (i) 18.35% of 12.08% (the average interest rate charged in fiscal year 1998-1999), (ii) 26.11% of 9% (the average interest rate charged in fiscal year 1999-2000), and (iii) 16.78% of 14% (the average interest rate charged in fiscal year 2000-2001). Therefore, the percentage of interest payments to be capitalized out of payments made to Siemens and its subsidiaries is 18.35% in 1998-1999, 26.11% in 1999-2000 and 16.78% in 2000-2001.

372. As recorded in its financial statements, SITS paid on account of interest: AR$150,828 in fiscal year 1997-1998, AR$1,383,596 in fiscal year 1998-1999, AR$12,156,499 in fiscal year 1999-2000 and AR$16,950,704 up to May 17, 2001,<sup>143</sup> for a total of AR$30,642,627. Of that amount, 93.8% would correspond to payments made to Siemens and its subsidiaries: AR$1,297,813 in fiscal year 1998-1999,<sup>144</sup> AR$11,402,796 in fiscal year 1999-2000 and AR$15,899,760 in fiscal year 2000-2001 up to May 17, 2001, for a total of AR$28,600,639. The remainder AR$2,041,988 was paid by SITS to third parties. The Tribunal will now apply to the amounts paid by SITS to Siemens and its

<sup>143</sup> During the full fiscal year 2000-2001 SITS paid AR$27,017,497 on account of interest. This amount needs to be adjusted to May 17, 1991 because SITS' fiscal year ran until September 30. For this purpose, the Tribunal has assumed that interest accrued at the same rate each day, divided the amount of interest payments made by 365, multiplied the daily rate by the number of days between May 17 and September 30 -136 days- and deducted the result -AR$10,066,793- from the amount of interest paid that fiscal year. This brings the amount of interest payments between October 1, 2000 and May 17, 2001 to AR$16,950,704.

subsidiaries the yearly percentages arrived at in the preceding paragraph with the following results: AR$234,255 represents 18.35% of the interest paid to Siemens and its subsidiaries in fiscal year 1998-1999, AR$2,977,270 represents 26.11% of such payments made in fiscal year 1999-2000 and AR$2,667,979 represents 16.78% of those made in fiscal year 2000-2001 up to May 17, 2001. These three items add up to AR$5,879,504. The Tribunal will allow that amount of interest paid to Siemens and its subsidiaries plus AR$2,041,988 paid to third parties for a total of AR$7,921,492 to be capitalized for purposes of the calculation of the book value of Siemens' investment. Therefore, the book value calculated by Siemens' expert Lemar should be reduced by the difference between the aggregate amount of interest payments made to Siemens and its subsidiaries - AR$28,600,369 - and AR$5,879,504, namely, AR$22,720,865.

373. The book value calculation by Mr. Lemar includes two other items that the Tribunal finds inappropriate. First, in note 5 to SITS' financial statements for fiscal year 2000-2001 under the heading of "Resultados extraordinarios", there is an entry on "Constitución previsión de otros créditos" with an amount of AR$42,253,305. This item cross-refers to note 4.5, which explains that this amount corresponds to tax credits that have been provisioned in full because of the uncertainty regarding their recoverability and have been charged as extraordinary losses. The Tribunal holds the opinion that it is incorrect to include this amount in the book value of SITS for purposes of compensation. Indeed, the tax credits had not been realized because of SITS' lack of revenues. Hence, the amount of AR$42,253,305 should also be subtracted from the calculation of the book value.

374. Second, the Tribunal refers again to note 5 to the financial statements of SITS for fiscal year 2000-2001 and to the item on "Constitución previsión para riesgos relacionados con la rescisión del contrato" under the heading of "Resultados extraordinarios." An entry of AR$10,445,000 is listed on that account. Since the Tribunal has allowed compensation for consequential damages, as explained later, the provisioning for risks related to Contract termination would lead to double counting and is disallowed for purposes of the book value calculation.

375. To conclude the book value calculation, the Tribunal decides that such value is the value claimed by Siemens minus the amounts disallowed above on account of excessive interest rates, tax credits and risks associated with Contract termination. The amounts corresponding to these items add up to AR$75,419,170, which when subtracted from AR$283,859,710 claimed by Siemens reduce the book value of the investment to AR$208,440,540.

376. As the Tribunal has noted, it has been a matter of controversy whether to use funds invested as a measure of the value of the investment or how these funds have been used. The Tribunal has looked into the use of funds as recorded in the financial statements themselves and the result of such examination confirms the adjusted book value set forth above. The Tribunal has taken into account the items in the financial statements that correspond to the Project as such, “bienes de uso”, intangible assets and “project cost”. It emerges from note 5 to SITS’ 2001 audited financial statements (“Estado de resultados” under the heading of “Resultados extraordinarios”) that, in 2001 and because of the termination of the Contract, SITS wrote off AR$39,777,220 of intangible assets, AR$49,678,876 of “bienes de uso” and AR$123,127,297 of “project costs”. These three items add up to AR$212,583,393.

377. The audited financial statements reflect the financial situation of SITS on September 30, 2001 and the Tribunal has the task to value the investment of Siemens at May 17, 2001. Therefore, the Tribunal has considered it appropriate to compare the aggregate amount of funds applied to “bienes de uso”, intangible assets and “project cost” between September 2000 and September 2001, to assume that these funds were applied at the same daily rate through the period, and to subtract from the difference the amount corresponding to the 136 days between May 17 and September 30, 2001. These assumptions correspond, mutatis mutandis, to those applied by expert Lemar to the sources of funds to calculate the value of the investment to May 17, 2001. The financial statements for 2001 show that SITS spent AR$20,741,994 in “project cost” during the year and AR$8,973,678 on “bienes de uso” (no funds were applied to intangible assets). These two items add up to AR$29,715,672. This amount prorated by 365 days results in a daily application of funds to such items of AR$81,412.8, which multiplied by 136 is equal to AR$11,072,140. The subtraction of this amount from AR$212,583,393 (the sum expended on account of “bienes de uso”, intangible assets and “project cost”) results in AR$201,511,253, which the Tribunal considers a reasonable approximation to the amount applied to “bienes de uso”, intangible assets and “project cost” up to May 17, 2001. When the allowed capitalized interest of AR$7,921,492 is added to this amount we arrive at AR$209,432,745. A result slightly higher than the book value, which can be explained by the adjustments that need to be made to reflect the value of the investment on May 17, 2001.

378. Siemens further claims $124,541,000 on account of loss profits before taxes.

379. The Tribunal considers that the amount claimed on account of lost profits is very unlikely to have ever materialized for the following reasons:

380. First, in considering the estimated rate of profit on sales, the Tribunal recalls that the calculation of the Claimant assumes the issuance of 33 million DNI. The Tribunal considers that this amount is excessive taking into account that the Claimant accepted to make the investment with a guaranteed minimum of 24 million DNI (Article 16(b) of the Contract).<sup>145</sup> Therefore, the estimated amount of revenues of AR$889,147,000 calculated by the Claimant needs to be reduced by AR$270 million (30 pesos per each DNI multiplied by 9 million) to AR$619,147,000.

381. Second, the amount of AR$619,147,000 includes a 21% value added tax (Article 4.4 of the Contract) equal to AR$107,455,000, which needs to be subtracted and results in AR$511,692,000. Applying to this amount the 16% profit rate results in profits before applicable taxes of AR$81,870,000 over the life of the Contract.

382. Third, the discount rate to be applied to the estimated profits should reflect the cost of money and the country and business risks. According to Siemens' own expert, this should be a rate within a range of 11% and 15%. Mr.

<sup>145</sup> The TTN points out in its report that the license of Printrak that SITS held to print DNIs was valid for printing only 24 million documents. Exhibit 161 to the Counter-Memorial, folio 15.

Lemar himself has offered a calculation using a rate in the middle of such range - 13%. The Tribunal considers this rate appropriate taking into account the country and business circumstances of the operation and the cost of funds.

383. Fourth, Siemens' expert has discounted the profits over the expected life of the Contract assuming that it would not be extended. It was possible for the Contract to be extended for an additional six years. It would not be unreasonable to assume that delays would have occurred in the normal course of Project operation given the novelty and complexity of the Project; it is undisputed by the parties that it was the first of its kind. Furthermore, the analysis performed by Mr. Lemar to take into account the three-month delay in Project start-up shows the sensitivity of profits to delays in the timing of revenues. A delay of three months resulted in a drop of 2% in the profit rate notwithstanding the addition of AR$29 million in revenues for printing of electoral roles which had been underestimated in an earlier calculation. An extension of the Contract to 9 or 12 years would have had devastating effects on the profit rate.

384. Fifth, the profits would have been subject to a corporate profits tax.

385. For these reasons, the Tribunal concludes that Siemens is not entitled to any compensation on account of profit loss.

386. Additionally, Siemens has claimed $9,178,000 for post-expropriation costs incurred by SITS in continuing a skeleton operation, $219,899 for unpaid invoices by the Government in relation with the voters list of 1999, $44,678,462 for sub-contractors' claims, and the return of the performance bond.

387. The Tribunal considers that the claim on account of post-expropriation costs is justified in order to wipe out the consequences of the expropriation. As regards the sub-contractors' claims, Argentina has affirmed to have taken the necessary measures to ensure that these claims are transferred to Argentina. The Tribunal acknowledges this affirmation and decides that Argentina shall hold the Claimant, its subsidiaries and affiliates, wherever located, harmless from, and indemnify same in respect of, any claims heretofore or hereafter asserted against any of them by any of the following subcontractors to SITS in relation to the Contract: Boldt S.A., Correo Argentino S.A., Printrak International/Printrak de Argentina S.R.L., Imaging Automation Inc., Impsat S.A., SWIPCO Argentina S.A., Mojacar S.A., Indra Spain and Indra Argentina, and Oracle.

388. Since the Contract was terminated on grounds other than performance, it is congruent that the performance bond be returned promptly to Siemens or SITS, as its agent for this purpose. Should the bond not have been returned 30 days after the date of this Award, Argentina shall pay the Claimant the amount of the bond.

389. As for the amount claimed on account of services rendered and unpaid, the Tribunal considers that, since such amount is not disputed and would normally be considered an asset forming part of the value of the investment, the Respondent shall compensate Siemens for the full amount claimed.

g) Interest

390. The Claimant has requested that the Tribunal award compound interest at the rate of 6% per annum and that interest accrue as from May 18, 2001 for compensation on account of the expropriated investment and as from the date costs were incurred in the case of compensation for additional damages. The Lemar Report takes into account a number of options before arriving at the conclusion that 6% would be an appropriate rate to apply based on the consideration that this is the rate that Siemens used as its average corporate borrowing rate in appraising investments and in considering funding costs in 2001-2003. The rate of 6% has also been advanced in Professor Schreuer's opinion on the basis of arbitral practice.

391. In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent does not comment on the issue of the applicable rate of interest. In its Rejoinder, Argentina simply disputes the rate of interest claimed since the Treaty provides that interest be paid at "the usual bank rate." No alternative interest rate is proposed nor is any reason adduced to question how the Claimant has arrived at that rate. Argentina seems to presume that “the usual bank rate” would be different but without specifying what this bank rate should be.

392. In its Rejoinder, the Respondent objects to the award of compound interest, it considers that this is an inappropriate case for awarding compound interest without offering reasons why this would be so, and responds to the Claimant’s assertion that compounding of interest is in line with the principle of full damages as follows:

“That may theoretically be the case if in fact the investor has borrowed elsewhere to make good the loss of the money which it is said it should have received. But nowhere is it claimed that this Claimant was obliged to make good any financial losses by itself borrowing money at compound interest rates from banks. Thus, the claim for loss of the interest on interest which it is said would have been earned is unfounded in fact as well as being entirely speculative. This element of the Claim amounts to an attempt by the Claimant to unjustly enrich itself in the circumstances of this case.”<sup>146</sup>

393. Argentina further objects to the date of May 18, 2001 as the date from which interest would accrue. It argues that, since the Treaty is silent on this point, it would be artificial to attribute most losses as from that date and speculative and complex to establish dates when the additional damages occurred.

394. The Tribunal will address first the applicable rate of interest, then turn to the questions of the date as from which interest should accrue and whether interest should be simple or compounded.

395. As an expression of customary international law, Article 38 of the Draft Articles states:

“1. Interest on any principal sum payable under this Chapter shall be payable when necessary in order to ensure full reparation. The interest rate and mode of calculation shall be set so as to achieve that result.

2. Interest runs from the date when the principal sum should have been paid until the date the obligation to pay is fulfilled.”

396. Thus, in determining the applicable interest rate, the guiding principle is to ensure “full reparation for the injury suffered as a result of the internationally wrongful act.”<sup>147</sup> The Tribunal considers that the rate of interest to be taken into account is not the rate associated with corporate borrowing but the interest rate the amount of compensation would have earned had it been paid after the expropriation. Since the awarded compensation is in dollars, the Tribunal considers that the average rate of interest applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit is an appropriate rate of interest. The average of such rate from May 18, 2001 to September 30, 2006 is 2.66%.<sup>148</sup>

397. For purposes of erasing the effects of the expropriation, interest should accrue from the date the Tribunal has found that expropriation occurred, namely, May 18, 2001, in respect of the book value of the investments made for the Project up to that date. Compensation for post-expropriation costs incurred after May 18, 2001 should accrue interest as from the date on which they were incurred. Since this would not be practical for calculation purposes given the multiple dates involved, the Tribunal considers that interest on post-expropriation costs shall accrue as of January 1, 2002, date by which most of these costs had been incurred ($9,339,863 out of a total claimed of $9,807,638). As for interest on unpaid Government bills, interest should accrue from January 1, 2000 since they relate to services rendered in 1999.

398. In the eventuality that Siemens or any of its affiliates or subsidiaries would be held liable for any of the claims of the sub-contractors related to the Contract, interest shall accrue from the date of payment of any such claim. Furthermore, in the eventuality that the performance bond is not returned by the Respondent within 30 days of the dispatch of this Award to the parties, interest shall accrue on the amount of the bond as from 30 days after the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties and until such amount has been fully paid.

399. As regards compounding of interest, the question is not, as argued by Argentina, whether Siemens had paid compound interest on borrowed funds during the relevant period but whether, had compensation been paid following the expropriation, Siemens would have earned interest on interest paid on the amount of compensation. It is in this sense that tribunals have ruled that compound interest is a closer measure of the actual value lost by an investor. As expressed by the tribunal in Santa Elena:

“[w]here an owner of property has at some earlier time lost the value of his asset but has not received the monetary equivalent that then became due to him, the amount of compensation should reflect, at least in part, the additional sum that his money would have earned, had it, and the income generated by it, been reinvested each year at generally prevailing rates of interest.”<sup>149</sup>

400. Similarly have held the tribunals in Metalclad and Wena Hotels. The Ad Hoc Committee in Wena Hotels decided that it was within the tribunal’s power to take the option of compound interest as an alternative compatible with the objectives of prompt, adequate and effective compensation and compensation that reflects the market value of the investment immediately before the expropriation.<sup>150</sup>

401. For these reasons, the Tribunal concludes that interest shall be compounded and be compounded annually.

VIII. Costs

402. In order to take into account that the Claimant has not fully prevailed in these proceedings, the Tribunal determines that each party shall bear its own legal costs, and that Argentina and Siemens shall be responsible for 75% and 25%, respectively, of the fees and expenses of the Tribunal and the costs of the ICSID Secretariat.

IX. Decision

403. Having carefully considered the parties' arguments in their written pleadings and oral submissions and for the reasons above stated the Tribunal unanimously decides:

1. that the Respondent breached Article 4(2) of the Treaty by expropriating Claimant's investment without complying with its terms;
2. that the Respondent breached Articles 2(1) and 4(1) of the Treaty by failing to accord fair and equitable treatment and full protection and legal security to the investment of the Claimant;
3. that the Respondent has breached Article 2(3) of the Treaty by the arbitrary measures taken in respect of the investment of the Claimant;
4. that the Respondent shall pay forthwith to the Claimant compensation in the amount of $208,440,540 on account of the value of its investment, $9,178,000 on account of consequential damages and $219,899 on account of unpaid bills for services rendered by SITS to the Government;
5. that the Respondent shall forthwith, and in no event later than thirty (30) days from the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties, deliver to Claimant (or SITS as its agent for this purpose) the Contract performance bond provided by SITS (insurance policy No. 000589772) for an amount of $20 million);
6. that the Respondent shall hold the Claimant, its subsidiaries and affiliates, wherever located, harmless from, and indemnify same in respect of, any claims heretofore or hereafter asserted against any of them by any of the following subcontractors to SITS in relation to the Contract: Boldt S.A., Correo Argentino S.A., Printrak International/Printrak de Argentina S.R.L., Imaging Automation Inc., Impsat S.A.,

SWIPCO Argentina S.A., Mojacar S.A., Indra Spain and Indra Argentina, and Oracle;

7. that the Respondent shall pay to the Claimant interest compounded annually on the sums listed in point 4 of this decision at the rate of 2.66%, which is the average rate applicable to US six-month certificates of deposit from May 18, 2001 to September 30, 2006; such interest to accrue as from May 18, 2001 in the case of compensation on account of the value of the investment, January 1, 2000 in the case of compensation on account of unpaid bills by the Government, and January 1, 2002 in the case of compensation on account of consequential damages, all until the date of dispatch of this Award to the parties;

Italy–Venezuela Mixed Claims Commission in 1903 had to adjudicate whether Venezuela was monetarily liable to Italian nationals for damage resulting from the acts of revolutionaries operating in Venezuelan territory. Article 4 of the Italy–Venezuela Treaty of 1861 stated that each state's citizens should enjoy 'the fullest measure of protection and security of person and property, and should have in this respect the same rights and privileges accorded to nationals' of the territory. The umpire in the case declared that he 'accepts the rule that if in any case of reclamation submitted to him it is alleged and proved that Venezuelan authorities failed to exercise due diligence to prevent damages from being inflicted by revolutionists, that country should be held responsible'.<sup>15</sup> He ultimately denied Italy's claims that the treaty imposed strict liability.

Probably the most authoritative case interpreting the FCN treaty provisions on protection and security was a 1989 decision of a chamber of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in the ELSI case.<sup>16</sup> In that case, the United States brought a claim against Italy under the US–Italy FCN treaty for injuries incurred by Raytheon, a US company, with respect to its subsidiary in Sicily. A factory of Raytheon's subsidiary in Palermo was taken over by workers and then requisitioned by the mayor in order to forestall its closure by the investor for economic reasons. The United States alleged that such actions violated Italy's obligation to give US investors 'the most constant protection and security', as required by Article V(1) of the FCN treaty. The United States did not contend, however, that the obligation constituted a guarantee resulting in strict liability. Instead, it pointed to the 'well-established aspect of the international standard of treatment... that States must use "due diligence" to prevent wrongful injuries to the person or property of aliens within their territory'. The ICJ Chamber found that the Italian government had taken adequate measures to protect the investor and its property, stating that '[t]he reference in Article V to the provision of "constant protection and security" cannot be construed as the giving of a warranty that property shall never in any circumstances be occupied or disturbed'.<sup>17</sup>

In general, jurisprudence relating to the FCN provisions on protection and security recognizes that this standard requires host countries to take steps to protect investors against physical injury to their persons or properties, whether by government agents or third persons. However, the FCN provision does not make the host state a guarantor of the safety of the investor or its property. It requires only that the host state exercise due diligence in carrying out its obligations under the treaty. As one commentator has observed, the decisions of tribunals and the other sources offer no definition of 'due diligence', noting: 'No doubt the application of this standard will vary according to the circumstances, yet, if "due diligence" be taken to denote a fairly high standard of conduct the exception will overwhelm the rule'.<sup>18</sup> A host state satisfies its due diligence obligation when it

(c) Full protection and security in the modern era

With the development of bilateral and other investment treaties since 1960, the inclusion of provisions granting investors some form of protection and security has become standard. It can thus be found in countless BITs, NAFTA,<sup>20</sup> the Energy Charter Treaty (ECT),<sup>21</sup> and the 2009 ASEAN Comprehensive Investment Agreement,<sup>22</sup> among others. These provisions have also been the basis of several investor–state arbitrations, and so arbitral tribunals have had to interpret and apply them in a new era. In doing so, contemporary tribunals have relied on the jurisprudence interpreting FCNs to a significant extent but have also extended the scope of protection in certain instances.

The first such BIT case was Asian Agricultural Products Limited v Sri Lanka (AAPL).<sup>23</sup> In AAPL, an ICSID tribunal considered the claims of a UK investor in shrimp farming in Sri Lanka which had suffered injuries as a result of the destruction of its facilities by Sri Lankan security forces during an alleged operation against rebels. The claimant maintained that the UK–Sri Lanka BIT's provision guaranteeing 'full protection and security' went beyond the minimum standard of customary international law and imposed an unconditional obligation of protection on the host country. Therefore, failure to comply with the obligation entailed 'strict or absolute liability' for the host state once damage to the investor's property was established. In response, Sri Lanka contended that the 'full protection and security' standard incorporates, rather than supplants, the customary international legal standard of responsibility requiring due diligence on the part of states and reasonable justification for the destruction of property, but not <sup>19</sup> On the meaning of due diligence, tribunals and scholars have often referred to the statement of Professor AV Freeman in his lectures at the Hague Academy of International Law: 'The "due diligence" is nothing more nor less than the reasonable measures of prevention which a well-administered government could be expected to exercise under similar circumstances.' AV Freeman, 'Responsibility of States for the Unlawful Acts of Their Armed Forces' (1956) 88 Receuil des Cours 261. See also Asian Agricultural Products Ltd v Sri Lanka, ICSID Case No ARB/87/3 (Final Award) (27 June 1990) ¶ 170.

<sup>21</sup> ECT, Art 10, entitled 'Promotion, Protection, and Treatment of Investments', provides in part in para 1: '[s]uch investments shall enjoy the most constant protection and security'.

<sup>22</sup> Art 11(1), on the Treatment of Investments states: 'Each member state shall accord to covered investments of investors of any other member state fair and equitable treatment and full protection and security.' Art 11 (2) further provides: 'For greater certainty... (b) full protection and security requires each Member State to take such measures as may be reasonably necessary to ensure the protection and security of covered investments.'

institution's decision. Through the duty to give reasons, the private party can force the institution to explain clearly on what grounds it has based its decision. A common objective of the umbrella-principle of good administration may be defined as promoting transparency, legal certainty and predictability within administrative procedures.

3.2.2.1.1 The Principle of Due Diligence

The principle of due diligence has been applied by Community courts in a wide range of situations and under varying forms. The name of the principle has also varied. The obligations incumbent on the institutions discussed here have been labelled as due diligence,<sup>13</sup> principle of care,<sup>14</sup> and principle of good,<sup>15</sup> proper,<sup>16</sup> or sound<sup>17</sup> administration. Its core can be described as a procedural tool for private parties to ensure that Community institutions handle the affairs of individuals with care, by giving individuals a right to influence the basis for the public authority's decisions both as to how the matter is handled and how the substantive aspects are assessed and weighed by the institutions. In two cases establishing the principle of due diligence in the early 1990:s, TU München and Nölle, the European Court of Justice held that the institutions have a duty to examine carefully and impartially all the relevant aspects of the individual cases<sup>18</sup> and to give special attention to aspects that speak for private parties.<sup>19</sup> The field of application of the principle of due diligence can thus be divided into two types of situations. Firstly, from the demand to examine carefully and impartially all the relevant aspects, follows a duty for the institutions to handle matters diligently and to carefully follow any procedures laid down in secondary legislation or as general principles. Secondly, to give special attention to aspects that speak for private parties includes a duty to use the principle of due diligence as a counterweight to the discretionary powers of the institutions in the decision-making process itself.

When applied in the first manner, the principle of due diligence functions as a standard for the good behaviour of institutions. In the Fresh Marine Company-case, the Commission received a report from a Norwegian salmon company in an anti-dumping matter that contained some unclear figures. The Commission proceeded by unilaterally changing the figures, with the result that the Norwegian company appeared to have transgressed the anti-dumping agreement. It was later shown that the changes made by the Commission were inaccurate. The Court of First Instance held that there was a duty of diligence incumbent upon the Commission and that the error committed by the Commission was such that it 'would not have been committed in similar circumstances by an administrative authority exercising ordinary care and diligence'.<sup>20</sup> The European Court of Justice, in plenum, came to the same conclusion regarding the action of the Commission, even though the Court of Justice did not explicitly refer to the principle of due diligence.<sup>21</sup>

Similarly, Community institutions must be careful to observe and fulfil more general duties laid down in secondary legislation, so that mistakes and substandard practises of the institutions will not adversely affect private parties in individual matters. The Court of First Instance in several cases has applied the principle of due diligence to customs cases, where the Commission has an obligation to monitor trade between the EU and third countries. In the Eyckeler & Malt-case regarding the import of Hilton beef from Argentina, the Court of First Instance found that the Commission had failed in its obligation, leading to a breach of Article 211 EC and of the principle of good administration.<sup>22</sup> In the area of Community trade mark law, the European Court of Justice held equally in the Bayer- case that the principle of sound administration, as it was referred to, together with the principle of legal certainty, implied a duty to uphold time-limits and procedural rules in such a way as to ensure the proper conduct and effectiveness of proceedings.<sup>23</sup> A third example can be taken from the area of classification and control of foodstuffs, veterinary and medical matters, where the Commission enjoys a role as a legislator. Here, the Court of First Instance has applied the principle of due diligence or good administration as a standard in liability cases, CEVA Santé Animale and Monsanto Company.<sup>24</sup> In the both cases, the European Court of Justice, in plenum, overturned the verdicts of the Court of First Instance. In Ceva Santé Animale, the European Court of Justice did not review the principle of sound administration in itself, but held that that Court of First Instance had erred when it had not established what scope of discretion the Commission enjoyed.<sup>25</sup> In Monsanto Company, the European Court of Justice referred to the principle of sound administration and the duty of care, but found, in contrast to the Court of first Instance, that the Commission was not in breach of the principle. The European Court of Justice performed a more individualised test of the principle, as described below, balancing the interest of the private parties concerned against the interest of the Commission. The European Court thus held that in the present case, Monsanto Company had not established, or even sought to establish, that the decision at issue was adopted in disregard of the principle of sound administration and the duty of care.<sup>26</sup> In what circumstances the principle is to be understood as a standard or as an individual guarantee does not seem to be clear at all.

On the other hand, See case T-13/99 Pfizer Animal Health v Council ECR 2002, p. II-3305, where the Court of First Instance in a similar type of question in an action for annulment applied the principle of due diligence as a counterweight to the discretion of the Commission in scientific matters.

When the principle of due diligence is applied in the second manner as described above, the principle functions as a counterweight to the discretionary powers of the institutions. The principle gives the private party a tool to influence the substantive outcome of the decision-making procedure, by enabling the party to give input to the basis of the decision and to how it should be assessed. In this form, the principle of due diligence is a procedural rule with a close connection to the substantive evaluation of the case, as the duty to investigate carefully necessarily will be closely connected to the interpretation of the legal question at stake. Substantively irrelevant circumstances need not to be investigated as carefully.<sup>27</sup> The principle of due diligence can further be used as a supplementary tool to other procedural guarantees, such as the right to be heard, in order to ensure that Community institutions give appropriate attention to the arguments put forward by private parties. This may be useful for private parties who do not enjoy a formal standing in the administrative procedure, such as third parties. This application of the principle was described by Advocate General Poiares Maduro, in max.mobil:<sup>28</sup>

In the case-law, these safeguards are understood as a means, first, of laying down limits to the Commission's discretionary power and, second, of protecting third parties whose interests are affected but who have no procedural protection equal to that of persons to whom decisions are addressed.

Advocate General Maduro referred to Schlüsselverlag J.S. Moser<sup>29</sup> and Sytraval,<sup>30</sup> two cases in which the European Court of Justice found that the views put forward by private (third) parties should have prompted the Commission to take those considerations into account in its decision-making. Another case where the principle of due diligence was applied in this connection, is TU-München,<sup>31</sup> as mentioned above. The common ground in these cases is the interpretation of the private parties' legitimate interest in having a decisive influence over the institutions decision-making, especially in cases where the Community institution has a wide power of appraisal or where complex economic or technical issues are at stake.

27. See case T-44/90 La Cinq v Commission ECR 1992, p. II-1, para. 94, where the Court of First Instance stated that the Commission failure to fulfil its obligation to take account of all the relevant facts in the case amounted to a manifest error of appraisal and not a procedural error, which would have been more logical. See further case T-7/92 Asia Motor France v Commission ECR 1993, p. II-669, para. 37.

3.2.2.1.2 The Principle of a Right to be Heard

The right to be heard in administrative proceedings was developed by the European Court of Justice in its very early case law as an independent general principle. In a staff case in 1962, Alvis, the European Court of Justice held that according to a generally accepted principle of administrative law in force in the Member States, the administrations of these states must allow their servants the opportunity of replying to allegations before any disciplinary decision is taken concerning them. This rule, which the European Court of Justice found to a part of 'sound justice and good administration', was to be followed by the Community institutions. In Transocean Marine Paint from 1974, the right to be heard was introduced as a general principle of administrative procedure.<sup>32</sup>

The right to be heard in Community law is ensured to private parties that in some way are affected by a measure taken by a Community institution, and first and foremost to those who are adversely affected. The typical situation is where an institution initiates proceedings of some kind against a private party, involving sanctions, fines and or penalty payments. The decision does not necessarily have to be addressed to a party for that party to be considered targeted. Third parties that might lose a benefit through the Community measure may also be 'targeted'.<sup>33</sup> It is more questionable whether there is a right to be heard in a situation where a private party turns to the institution in order to apply for a benefit. In Windpark Grothusen, a company had applied for financial support for an energy project administered by the Commission, together with 700 other applicants. When the application was denied, the company maintained that they had not been given a right to be heard. Both the Court of First Instance and the European Court of Justice found that the company did not have such right, as the company had not been adversely affected in the way understood by case law.<sup>34</sup> On the other hand, in TU München mentioned above in the context of the principle of due diligence, the party in the case, a university, was considered to have a right to be heard in regards to an application of exemption of import duties.<sup>35</sup> In TU München, the ground for promoting administrative procedural guarantees for the private party was the fact that the Commission had a wide power of appraisal in deciding the matter and that the importing university could be an important source of information, since they were

Judgment

1 By application lodged at the Court Registry on 29 December 2000, the Commission of the European Communities brought an appeal under Article 49 of the EC Statute of the Court of Justice against the judgment of the Court of First Instance of 24 October 2000 in Case T-178/98 Fresh Marine v Commission [2000] ECR II-3331 ('the contested judgment'), by which the Commission was ordered to pay Fresh Marine Company A/S ('Fresh Marine'), established in Trondheim (Norway), the sum of NOK 431 000 in damages.

Legal background

2 As stated in Article 8(10) of Council Regulation (EC) No 384/96 of 22 December 1995 on protection against dumped imports from countries not members of the European Community (OJ 1996 L 56, p. 1):

'A provisional duty may, after consultation, be imposed in accordance with Article 7 on the basis of the best information available, where there is reason to believe that an undertaking is being breached, or in case of breach or withdrawal of an undertaking where the investigation which led to the undertaking has not been concluded.'

- 3 Article 13(10) of Council Regulation (EC) No 2026/97 of 6 October 1997 on protection against subsidised imports from countries not members of the European Community (OJ 1997 L 288, p. 1) provides:

‘A provisional duty may, after consultation, be imposed in accordance with Article 12 on the basis of the best information available, where there is reason to believe that an undertaking is being breached, or in case of breach or withdrawal of an undertaking where the investigation which led to the undertaking has not been concluded.’

Facts

- 4 The factual background to the dispute is set out at paragraphs 1 to 21 of the contested judgment as follows:

‘1 [Fresh Marine] is a company established in 1992 and incorporated under Norwegian law, which specialises in the sale of farmed Atlantic salmon.

- 2 Following complaints lodged in July 1996 by the Scottish Salmon Growers’ Association Ltd and the Shetland Salmon Farmers’ Association on behalf of their members, the Commission announced on 31 August 1996, by two separate notices published in the Official Journal of the European Communities, the initiation of an anti-dumping and an anti-subsidy proceeding concerning imports of farmed Atlantic salmon originating in Norway (OJ 1996 C 53, pp. 18 and 20).

- 3 The Commission... found that it was necessary to impose definitive anti-dumping and countervailing measures...

- 4 On 17 June 1997, [Fresh Marine], having been informed of the Commission's findings, offered an undertaking pursuant to Article 8 of [Regulation No 384/96] and Article 10 of Council Regulation (EC) No 3284/94 of 22 December 1994 on protection against subsidised imports from countries not members of the European Community (OJ 1994 L 349, p. 22)....

- 5 By Decision 97/634/EC of 26 September 1997 accepting undertakings offered in connection with the anti-dumping and anti-subsidy proceedings concerning imports of farmed Atlantic salmon originating in Norway (OJ 1997 L 267, p. 81), the Commission accepted the undertakings offered by a number of Norwegian exporters of farmed Atlantic salmon, including that of [Fresh Marine].... [Fresh Marine]'s undertaking entered into force on 1 July 1997.

- 6 On the same day, the Council adopted Regulation (EC) No 1890/97 of 26 September 1997 imposing a definitive anti-dumping duty on imports of farmed Atlantic salmon originating in Norway (OJ 1997 L 267, p. 1) and Council Regulation (EC) No 1891/97 of 26 September 1997 imposing a definitive countervailing duty on imports of farmed Atlantic salmon originating in Norway (OJ 1997 L 267, p. 19). Pursuant to Article 1(2) of each of those two regulations, imports into the Community of farmed Atlantic salmon originating in Norway produced by [Fresh Marine] were exempt from those duties on account of the acceptance of its undertaking by the Commission.

- 7 On 22 October 1997, [Fresh Marine] sent the Commission a report on all its exports of farmed Atlantic salmon to the Community during the third quarter of 1997 (“the October 1997 report”).

- 8 On 16 December 1997, the Commission adopted, on the basis of Council Regulation No 384/96 and [Regulation No 2026/97], Regulation (EC) No 2529/97 of 16 December 1997 imposing provisional anti-dumping and countervailing duties on certain imports of farmed Atlantic salmon originating in Norway (OJ 1997 L 346, p. 63). That regulation imposed a provisional anti-dumping duty... and a provisional countervailing duty... on imports, into the Community, of farmed Atlantic salmon originating in Norway produced by [Fresh Marine]... The regulation entered into force on 18 December 1997....

- 9 By letter of 19 December 1997, the Commission informed [Fresh Marine] of the... facts... It stated that examination of the data disclosed in the October 1997 report had shown that [Fresh Marine] had exported farmed Atlantic salmon, gutted head-on, at an average price... lower than the minimum average price set in its undertaking of 17 June 1997, which led it to believe that it had not observed that undertaking....

- 10 By fax of 22 December 1997, [Fresh Marine] complained that the Commission had manipulated the October 1997 report by deleting a number of lines which were intended to cancel lines containing errors. Pointing out that it had ceased all exports to the Community since the entry into force of Regulation No 2529/97, and as a result was suffering considerable harm, it asked for the immediate lifting of the sanctions taken against it.

11 In its letter of 5 January 1998, the Commission explained to [Fresh Marine] the reasons why it had decided to delete a number of lines from the October 1997 report containing quantities and values preceded by a minus sign, which, in the absence of explanations in the report, could not be offset against the corresponding invoices. It added that, if [Fresh Marine] sent it in good time a proper report showing that all sales transactions, net of credit notes, during the third quarter of 1997 were, on average, above the minimum price, the Commission would be prepared to reconsider its position. It again emphasised the provisional nature of the duties imposed by Regulation No 2529/97 and pointed out to [Fresh Marine] that it could have chosen to continue to export to the Community by providing the relevant customs authorities of the Member States concerned with an appropriate guarantee in regard to its “DDP” (“delivered duty paid”) sales.

12 On 6 January 1998, [Fresh Marine] sent to the Commission an amended version of the October 1997 report.

19 By letter of 30 January 1998, the Commission informed [Fresh Marine] that it now took the view that [Fresh Marine] had, during the third quarter of 1997, complied with the minimum export price fixed in its undertaking in respect of salmon, gutted head-on, and that, accordingly, there was no longer any reason to believe that the undertaking had been broken.

20 By letter of 2 February 1998 the Commission informed [Fresh Marine] that it intended to propose to the Council that it should not impose definitive duties and that, accordingly, the provisional duties imposed by Regulation

No 2529/97 ought not to be confirmed. It added that, under Article 10(2) of Regulation No 384/96, the amounts lodged as provisional duties were to be released in so far as there was no decision by the Council to collect all or part of them definitively.

21 On 23 March 1998, the Commission adopted Regulation (EC) No 651/98 amending Regulations Nos 1890/97, 1891/97 and 2529/97 and Decision 97/634 (OJ 1998 L 88, p. 31). Under Regulation No 651/98, the provisional anti-dumping and countervailing duties imposed by Regulation No 2529/97 were repealed so far as concerned imports of [Fresh Marine]'s products... Its undertaking was moreover reinstated with effect from 25 March 1998...'

The proceedings before the Court of First Instance and the contested judgment

- 5 On 27 October 1998, Fresh Marine brought an action before the Court of First Instance seeking an order requiring the Commission to make good the damage it had suffered following the adoption of the provisional measures prescribed by Regulation No 2529/97, totalling NOK 2 115 000.
- 6 The Commission claimed that the action should be dismissed as inadmissible or, in the alternative, as unfounded.
- 7 Having declared the action to be admissible, the Court of First Instance pointed out, at paragraph 54 of the contested judgment, that, in order for the Community to incur non-contractual liability, the applicant must prove the unlawfulness of the alleged conduct of the institution concerned, actual damage and the existence of a causal link between that conduct and the alleged damage.

8 In that connection, the Court of First Instance found as follows:

‘Unlawfulness of the conduct alleged against the Commission

57 Although the measures of the Council and Commission in connection with a proceeding relating to the possible adoption of anti-dumping measures must in principle be regarded as constituting legislative action involving choices of economic policy, so that the Community can incur liability by virtue of such measures only if there has been a sufficiently serious breach of a superior rule of law for the protection of individuals ([Case T-167/94] Nölle v Council and Commission [[1995] ECR II-2589], paragraph 51), the special features of the present case must be pointed out. In the present case, the damage at issue arose from the allegedly unlawful conduct of the Commission when it examined the October 1997 report with the intention of checking whether [Fresh Marine] had complied during the third quarter of 1997 with the undertaking, the acceptance of which had brought to an end the anti-dumping and anti-subsidy investigation in regard to it. That allegedly unlawful conduct led the Commission to believe that [Fresh Marine] had broken its undertaking. It took place in the course of an administrative operation which specifically and exclusively concerned [Fresh Marine]. That operation did not involve any choices of economic policy and conferred on the Commission only very little or no discretion.

58 It is true that the alleged unlawfulness of the Commission’s conduct caused the alleged damage only when, and because, it was confirmed by the adoption of provisional measures against imports of [Fresh Marine]’s products within the framework of Regulation No 2529/97. However, the Commission, in that regulation, did no more with regard to [Fresh Marine] than draw the appropriate provisional conclusions from its analysis of the abovementioned report, in particular from the level of the average price of exports charged by [Fresh Marine] during the period covered by that report (see the ninth recital in the preamble to Regulation No 2529/97).

59 Furthermore, the background to the cases giving rise to the judgments relied on by the Commission in its written submissions..., in which the Community judicature characterised the measures of the Council and the Commission in an anti-dumping proceeding as legislative acts involving choices of economic policy, was radically different from that of the present dispute. In those cases, unlike the present case, the applicants sought compensation for damage, the operative event for which was a choice of economic policy made by the Community authorities in the context of their legislative power.

60 Thus, in [Case C-122/86] Epicheiriseon Metalleftikon Viomichanikon kai Naftiliakon and Others v Commission and Council [[1989] ECR 3959], the applicants sought compensation for the damage which they claimed to have suffered as a result of the Council's decision to close an anti-dumping proceeding without adopting the regulation proposed by the Commission for the imposition of a definitive anti-dumping duty on the relevant imports. In Nölle v Council and Commission, cited... above, a Community importer sought compensation for damage allegedly suffered as a result of the adoption by the Council of a regulation introducing a definitive anti-dumping duty and definitively collecting the provisional anti-dumping duty, a regulation which had been declared invalid by the Court of Justice on grounds relating to the conditions under which the Community authorities had chosen the reference country when determining the normal value of the products at issue.

- 61 In conclusion, mere infringement of Community law will be sufficient, in the present case, to lead to the non-contractual liability of the Community (see [Case C-352/98 P] Bergaderm and Goupil v Commission [[2000] ECR I-5291], paragraph 44). In particular, a finding of an error which, in analogous circumstances, an administrative authority exercising ordinary care and diligence would not have committed will support the conclusion that the conduct of the Community institution was unlawful in such a way as to render the Community liable under Article 215 of the [EC] Treaty [now Article 288 EC].
- 62 It is therefore necessary to examine whether the Commission, when monitoring compliance by [Fresh Marine] with its undertaking on the basis of the October 1997 report, committed an error which an administrative authority exercising ordinary care and diligence would not have committed in the same circumstances.
- 75 At first sight, on reading [the] final entries in the October 1997 report, it was possible to adopt the view that [Fresh Marine] had observed its undertaking during the period covered by that report....
- 76 Even if it is accepted that the terms of [Fresh Marine]'s undertaking did not provide for the possibility of including negative values in the quarterly sales reports, the Commission could not, when faced with a report which, at first glance, suggested that [Fresh Marine] had complied with its undertaking, take it upon itself, as it did in the present case..., unilaterally to change the content of that report by deleting lines containing negative values and replacing the final entries... with its own calculations, carried out on the basis of the report thus amended, of the average export price charged by [Fresh Marine] during the period in question, without explaining to it the reasons prompting it to ignore those final entries and without checking with it whether the changes so made affected the reliability of the information provided in order to monitor compliance with the undertaking. Having decided not to accept the first impression given by the October 1997 report, which was favourable to [Fresh Marine], the Commission was bound to exercise due care in interpreting correctly the data provided in that report, on which it intended to base its finding as to whether or not [Fresh Marine]'s conduct amounted to compliance with the undertaking during the period in question.

77 It cannot, in that connection, rely on the provisions of Article 8(10) of Regulation No 384/96 or Article 13(10) of Regulation No 2026/97.

78 Those provisions aim to enable the Commission, where there are grounds for believing on the basis of the best information available to it that an undertaking which it has initially accepted in the context of an anti-dumping or anti-subsidy proceeding has been breached, to take in good time any necessary provisional measures in order to protect the interests of the Community industry, without prejudice to a subsequent examination of the merits in order to check whether the undertaking in question has in fact been breached.

79 However, in the present case, the Court holds that the October 1997 report, in particular its final entries, suggested that [Fresh Marine] had complied with its undertaking...

80 It was after it had amended that report on its own initiative, without taking the precaution of asking [Fresh Marine] what possible impact its unilateral action might have on the reliability of the information which [Fresh Marine] had provided, that the Commission concluded that there had been an apparent breach of the undertaking by [Fresh Marine]. The data contained in the October 1997 report, amended in that way, evidently cannot therefore be considered the best information, within the meaning of the provisions referred to in paragraph 77 above, available to the Commission at the time on which to base its conclusion as to whether [Fresh Marine] had complied with its undertaking.

82 It must therefore be held that, when analysing the October 1997 report, the Commission committed an error which would not have been committed in similar circumstances by an administrative authority exercising ordinary care and diligence.

...

84 However, it must be pointed out that [Fresh Marine]'s conduct is not blameless either....

89 In view of the complexity of its October 1997 report, the lack of obvious links between the erroneous lines and those containing negative values and the ambiguity of those values, [Fresh Marine], without being prompted, should have sent to the Commission, with the report, the explanations necessary in order to understand that report. By sending the October 1997 report without any comment to that effect, [Fresh Marine] was guilty of negligence which, as the letter which the Commission sent it on 5 January 1998 shows..., confused the Commission's officials....

91 ... the Court holds that [Fresh Marine] and the Commission were equally at fault during the investigation as to whether [Fresh Marine] had complied with its undertaking during the third quarter of 1997 and at the end of which the Commission found that there had been an apparent breach of the undertaking making it necessary to take provisional measures against imports of [Fresh Marine]'s products in the framework of Regulation No 2529/97. For its part, [Fresh Marine], by failing of its own accord to append to its October 1997 report the explanations required for the correct understanding of the negative values appearing in it, showed such negligence as would never have been committed by a trader exercising ordinary care and diligence. Even taking into consideration such irregular conduct on the part of [Fresh Marine] and the confusion which such conduct may have caused when the report was read, the Court holds that the Commission's reaction, in unilaterally amending that report even though it suggested, prima facie, that [Fresh Marine] had complied with its undertaking during the period in question, was disproportionate and therefore unlawful, and could not be excused in any circumstances.

92 If the damage alleged by [Fresh Marine] is proved, even in part, and if it is apparent that a causal link exists between that damage and the events leading to the imposition of provisional measures on imports of its products, the question which must now be considered, it will be appropriate, when determining the Commission's obligation to make reparation, to take account of the fact that each party bears half of the responsibility for those events.

The alleged damage and the causal link between it and the wrongful conduct of the Commission

...

106 So far as concerns, first, loss of profit between 18 December 1997 and 25 March 1998, it must be observed that the figures given by the Commission for exports of farmed Atlantic salmon by [Fresh Marine] to the Community between July 1997 and September 1998 show that [Fresh Marine] wholly suspended its exports during the period from approximately mid-December 1997 to the end of March 1998....

...

109 In light of those circumstances, it is necessary to assess the amount of the loss of profit suffered by [Fresh Marine] as a result of the suspension of its exports to the Community between 18 December 1997 and 25 March 1998. That loss of profit must be considered to equate to the profit which it would have made if it had continued to export to the Community during that period.

115 The loss of profit suffered by [Fresh Marine] will therefore be fixed at NOK 292 000 in respect of the period between 18 December 1997 and 31 January 1998, NOK 135 000 in respect of February 1998 and NOK 150 000 in respect of the period from 1 to 25 March 1998.

117 It is necessary now to determine whether there is a causal link between the loss or damage to [Fresh Marine]'s business... and the wrongful conduct of the Commission, confirmed by Regulation No 2529/97...

118 There is a causal link for the purposes of the second paragraph of Article 215 of the Treaty where there is a direct causal nexus between the fault committed by the institution concerned and the injury pleaded, the burden of proof of which rests on the applicant (Case T-149/96 Coldiretti and Others v Council and Commission [1998] ECR II-3841, paragraph 101, and the cited case-law). The Community cannot be held liable for any damage other than that which is a sufficiently direct consequence of the misconduct of the institution concerned (see, in particular, Joined Cases 64/76 and 113/76, 167/78 and 239/78, 27/79, 28/79 and 45/79 Dumortier and Others v Council [1979] ECR 3091, paragraph 21; Case T-168/94 Blackspur and Others v Council and Commission [1995] ECR II-2627, paragraph 52, and [Case T-13/96] TEAM v Commission [[1998] ECR II-4073], paragraph 68).

119 In the present case,... the period during which [Fresh Marine] suspended its exports to the Community coincides with that during which the provisional measures imposed by Regulation No 2529/97 applied to imports of its products. That must be interpreted as evidence of the existence of a causal link between the irregularities, in particular those committed by the Commission, giving rise to the imposition of provisional measures, on the one hand, and the loss of profit, on the other.

120 It is, indeed, undeniable that, were it not for such irregularities and the provisional measures which followed them, [Fresh Marine] would have continued its exports to the Community in compliance with its undertaking. It would thus have suffered no loss of profit on the Community market. The misconduct of the Commission, when analysing the October 1997 report, and which was confirmed by Regulation No 2529/97, is therefore causally linked, within the meaning of the case-law referred to in paragraph 118 above, with the loss or damage to [Fresh Marine]'s business.

121 ... In that regard, it is necessary to ascertain whether, as the case-law requires, [Fresh Marine] showed reasonable diligence in limiting the extent of the damage which it claims to have suffered, a matter which the Commission disputes (see, Joined Cases C-104/89 and C-37/90 Mulder and Others v Council and Commission [1992] ECR I-3061, paragraph 33; Joined Cases C-46/93 and C-48/93 Brasserie du Pêcheur and Factortame [1996] ECR I-1029, paragraph 85; and Case C-284/98 P Parliament v Bieber [2000] ECR I-1527, paragraph 57).

122 The Commission's argument is that, in view of the fact that the duties imposed by Regulation No 2529/97 were provisional, [Fresh Marine] could, by providing a modest amount for the setting-up of a bank guarantee, have continued to export to the Community at unchanged prices.

124 However, even supposing that [Fresh Marine], which has not disputed the Commission's statements regarding the cost of such a bank guarantee, had obtained one, the Court holds that it would have run an unusual commercial risk, beyond the level of risk inherent in any commercial enterprise, by exporting to the Community during the period when Regulation No 2529/97 was applicable to imports of its products. If, once that bank guarantee had been issued, it had, as the Commission suggests, decided to export to the Community at unchanged prices without passing on to its Community customers the amount of the provisional duties through the prices it charged, it would have run the risk of having to bear on its own the burden of those duties should they ever have been collected definitively. Since it was not able to tell at that time whether that would eventually be the case, it therefore had no option but to increase its export prices by the amount of those provisional duties. Having regard in particular to competition from Community companies selling salmon and from the numerous Norwegian exporters which had been able to continue to sell on the Community market within the terms of their undertakings during the period in question, [Fresh Marine] could reasonably have taken the view that there was no chance of finding an outlet for its products on that market during that period.

125 In view of those circumstances, the absence of any attempt by [Fresh Marine] to export its products to the Community during the period in question cannot be regarded as a failure to fulfil the obligation, laid down in the case-law referred to in paragraph 121 above, to show reasonable diligence in mitigating the extent of the damage which it claims to have suffered.

131 ... the Court holds, on reading the letters of 30 January and 2 February 1998..., that the Commission did not take the necessary and appropriate measures which the party causing the damage must take where damage, such as that at issue here, is ongoing (see, to that effect, Parliament v Bieber, cited in paragraph 121 above, paragraph 57) in order to limit the extent of the damage to which its misconduct, when it was verifying compliance by [Fresh Marine] with its undertaking, had contributed.

132 It is clear from the case-file that, following the explanations provided by [Fresh Marine] at the beginning of January 1998... and the investigation carried out at its premises at the end of that month..., the Commission had become convinced, at least as from 30 January 1998, as attested by its letter of that date, that [Fresh Marine] had complied with its undertaking in the course of the third quarter of 1997. However, the Commission, which, in its own words... and as is shown moreover by the fact that it adopted Regulation No 651/98, was alone entitled in the present case to lift the provisional measures imposed on imports of [Fresh Marine]'s products by Regulation No 2529/97, for no obvious reason delayed until 25 March 1998 before giving [Fresh Marine], by means of Regulation No 651/98, the formal legal reassurance which it could have given at the end of January 1998. Although it could have realised during the abovementioned investigation at the [Fresh Marine]'s premises that [Fresh Marine] was suffering considerable commercial loss as a result of the application of those provisional measures..., by its letter of 2 February 1998 it unjustifiably perpetuated the doubts as to the final outcome regarding the provisional duties imposed by Regulation No 2529/97. It thus dissuaded [Fresh Marine] from resuming commercial activities on the Community market.

134 For having thus failed to take the necessary measures as soon as the irregularities giving rise to the imposition of provisional measures on imports of [Fresh Marine]'s products were definitively rectified, the Commission must be held solely responsible for [Fresh Marine]'s loss of profit, at least as from the end of January 1998.

135 It must therefore be held that, although, as is apparent from the grounds set out in paragraphs 73 to 92 above, [Fresh Marine] contributed to the same extent as the Commission in causing loss or damage to its business, continuation of that loss after the end of January 1998 is, on the other hand, exclusively due to a failure by the Commission to exercise due care; even though the explanations which it had obtained from [Fresh Marine] had definitely made it possible to correct their respective prior errors and removed any reason to continue to believe that the undertaking had been breached, the Commission delayed, for no apparent reason, in regularising [Fresh Marine]'s situation by withdrawing the provisional measures originally imposed against it.

136 It follows that the Commission must be held to be liable for one half of the loss of profit suffered by [Fresh Marine] between 18 December 1997 and 31 January 1998 and for all the loss caused to [Fresh Marine] from 1 February to 25 March 1998...

137 In conclusion, the Commission will be ordered to pay to [Fresh Marine], first, one half of NOK 292 000 in respect of [Fresh Marine]'s loss of profit between 18 December 1997 and 31 January 1998 and, second, NOK 285 000 (NOK 135 000 + NOK 150 000) as compensation for the damage caused to [Fresh Marine] from 1 February to 25 March 1998, that is a total amount of NOK 431 000. The remainder of the application will be dismissed.'

Forms of order sought before the Court of Justice

9 The Commission claims that the Court should:

- set aside the contested judgment;

- in giving final judgment itself, dismiss Fresh Marine's application at first instance and order it to pay the costs;

- in the alternative, refer the case back to the Court of First Instance.

10 Fresh Marine contends that the Court should:

- dismiss the Commission's appeal in its entirety;

- set aside the contested judgment in that it held that Fresh Marine bore half of the responsibility for the events that caused the damage;

- accordingly, order the Commission to pay Fresh Marine damages of NOK 577 000;

- order the Commission to bear the costs incurred by Fresh Marine both at first instance and on appeal;

- order the Commission to pay interest at the annual rate of 8% from the date of the contested judgment on the sum of NOK 577 000 and on the costs of Fresh Marine to be paid by the Commission.

The main appeal

The first and second grounds of appeal, relating to the cause of the damage and to the seriousness of the breach of Community law

Arguments of the parties

- <sup>11</sup> By its first two grounds of appeal, which it is appropriate to examine together, the Commission submits that the Court of First Instance erred in law by holding, first, at paragraph 57 of the contested judgment, that the damage pleaded by Fresh Marine arose from the allegedly unlawful conduct of the Commission when examining the October 1997 report and, second, at paragraphs 59 and 60 of the contested judgment, that the judgments of the Community judicature cited by the Commission in the proceedings at first instance, in which anti-dumping measures are characterised as legislative acts involving choices of economic policy, concerned cases with a 'radically different' background and by concluding therefore, at paragraph 61 of the contested judgment, that mere infringement of Community law was sufficient, in the present case, to lead to liability of the Community under Article 215 of the Treaty.

- 12 According to the Commission, the administrative act of analysing the October 1997 report could not, in itself, have been the cause of any damage suffered by Fresh Marine since it was only on the entry into force of Regulation No 2529/97 that the undertaking from which its exports had benefited was withdrawn and that anti-dumping and countervailing duties were imposed. It is well established that an action for damages can be brought under Article 215 of the Treaty only where the loss is 'actual and certain' (see Joined Cases 67/75 to 85/75 Lesieur Cotelle and Others v Commission [1976] ECR 391). The Commission submits that any loss suffered by Fresh Marine could have become actual and certain only on adoption of Regulation No 2529/97.

- 13 Moreover, it is clear from the wording of Article 8(10) of Regulation No 384/96 that, with respect to the imposition of provisional duties, the Commission has a wide discretion in determining the circumstances in which it has reason to believe that an undertaking has been breached. That point was not addressed by the Court of First Instance since it found, at paragraph 57 of the contested judgment, that the analysis of the October 1997 report 'did not involve any choices of economic policy and conferred on the Commission only very little or no discretion'. The contested judgment is therefore inconsistent with the Court of First Instance's own case-law (see Case T-489/93 Unifruit Hellas v Commission [1994] ECR II-1201 and Case T-51/96 Miwon v Council [2000] ECR II-1841).

- 14 According to the Commission, the decisive question is whether the act adopted by it was the result of an exercise of discretion since, under Community law, a loss flowing from such an act leads to liability only if the act satisfies the criterion laid down in Case 5/71 Zuckerfabrik Schöppenstedt v Council [1971] ECR 975, namely a sufficiently serious breach of a superior rule of law for the protection of individuals.

- 15 Fresh Marine contends that the damage was clearly caused by the unlawful conduct of the Commission when examining the October 1997 report. The adoption of Regulation No 2529/97 merely triggered the damage. Its adoption was the logical and inevitable consequence of the act of maladministration committed by the Commission when it unilaterally altered the October 1997 report without taking the precaution of asking Fresh Marine what impact that alteration might have on the reliability of the information provided by it. The fact that the loss became actual following the adoption of Regulation No 2529/97 does not imply per se that the adoption caused the damage to Fresh Marine.
- 16 Fresh Marine also submits that, from the point of view of exporters, a regulation imposing anti-dumping measures has all the characteristics of a decision affecting them individually. Regulation No 2529/97 is therefore not a legislative act but, on the contrary, an administrative act adopted in the course of an administrative procedure which specifically and exclusively concerned particular exporters. The fact that the Commission imposed a provisional duty on Fresh Marine is merely the logical consequence of the erroneous finding that it had failed to comply with its undertaking. As the Court of First Instance found at paragraph 58 of the contested judgment, the Commission, in adopting Regulation No 2529/97, did no more than draw provisional conclusions from its analysis of the October 1997 report.

Findings of the Court

- 17 In order for the Community to incur liability under the second paragraph of Article 215 of the Treaty, a number of conditions, including the existence of a causal link between the conduct alleged against the institution concerned and the damage complained of, must be satisfied (see, inter alia, Case 4/69 Lütticke v Commission [1971] ECR 325, paragraph 10).

18 The Court of First Instance observed, at paragraph 119 of the contested judgment, that the period during which Fresh Marine suspended its exports to the Community coincided with that during which the provisional measures imposed by Regulation No 2529/97 applied to imports of its products. It also found, at paragraph 120 of the contested judgment, that it was undeniable that, were it not for the irregularities committed by the Commission and the provisional measures which followed them, Fresh Marine would have continued to export to the Community in compliance with its undertaking.

19 Moreover, at paragraph 58 of the contested judgment, the Court of First Instance, after having found that the alleged unlawfulness of the Commission's conduct caused the damage alleged only when, and because, it was confirmed by the adoption of provisional measures against imports of Fresh Marine's products within the framework of Regulation No 2529/97, ruled that, in that regulation, the Commission had done no more with regard to Fresh Marine than draw the appropriate provisional conclusions from its analysis of the October 1997 report, in particular from the level of the average export price charged by Fresh Marine during the period covered by the report.

20 Even if the latter finding is correct, the fact remains that it is only because Regulation No 2529/97 was adopted by the college of Commissioners that provisional duties were imposed and that Fresh Marine found it necessary to cease its exports to the Community.

21 It is therefore undisputed that it was only after the entry into force of Regulation No 2529/97 that the loss suffered by Fresh Marine became actual and certain.

- 22 At paragraph 57 of the contested judgment, the Court of First Instance held, however, that the damage at issue arose from the allegedly unlawful conduct of the Commission when it examined the October 1997 report.
- 23 Even if that finding is vitiated by an error of law, such an error will remain irrelevant provided the Court of First Instance correctly assessed the conditions under which the Community may incur non-contractual liability.
- 24 In that regard, the system of rules which the Court of Justice has worked out in relation to the non-contractual liability of the Community takes into account, inter alia, the complexity of the situations to be regulated, difficulties in the application or interpretation of the legislation and, more particularly, the margin of discretion available to the author of the act in question (see Brasserie du Pêcheur and Factortame, cited above, paragraph 43; Bergaderm and Goupil, cited above, paragraph 40; and Case C-312/00 P Commission v Camar and Tico [2002] ECR I-11355, paragraph 52).
- 25 According to settled case-law, Community law confers a right to reparation where three conditions are met: the rule of law infringed must be intended to confer rights on individuals; the breach must be sufficiently serious; and there must be a direct causal link between the breach of the obligation resting on the author of the act and the damage sustained by the injured parties (see Brasserie du Pêcheur and Factortame, paragraph 51, Bergaderm and Goupil, paragraphs 41 and 42, and Commission v Camar and Tico, paragraph 53).
- 26 As regards the second condition, the decisive test for finding that a breach of Community law is sufficiently serious is whether the Community institution concerned manifestly and gravely disregarded the limits on its discretion. Where that institution has only considerably reduced, or even no, discretion, the mere infringement of Community law may be sufficient to establish the existence of a sufficiently serious breach (see, inter alia, Bergaderm and Goupil, paragraphs 43 and 44, and Commission v Camar and Tico, paragraph 54).

- 27 Therefore, the determining factor in deciding whether there has been such an infringement is not the general or individual nature of the act in question but the discretion available to the institution concerned (see, to that effect, Bergaderm and Goupil, paragraph 46, and Commission v Camar and Tico, paragraph 55).
- 28 Since the provisional anti-dumping and countervailing duties were imposed on the basis of Article 8(10) of Regulation No 384/96 and Article 13(10) of Regulation No 2026/97 respectively, the limits to which the Commission's discretion was subject in this case must be determined.
- 29 The provisions referred to in the preceding paragraph, while granting the Commission the power to impose provisional anti-dumping and countervailing duties, require at the same time that there be reason to believe that the undertaking has been breached and that the decision imposing such duties be taken on the basis of the best information available.
- 30 In the present case, the Commission, when adopting Regulation No 2529/97, which imposed provisional duties on Fresh Marine's imports, relied solely on the analysis of a report which, as the Court of First Instance found at paragraphs 79 and 80 of the contested judgment, gave reason to believe that that company had complied with its undertaking not to make sales on the Community market below a minimum average price, but which the Commission had amended on its own initiative, without taking the precaution of asking Fresh Marine what impact its unilateral action might have on the reliability of the information which Fresh Marine had provided to it.

- 31 It follows that the Commission clearly did not comply with its obligation to impose provisional duties only where there is reason to believe that the undertaking has been breached. In the circumstances of the present case, such conduct must be regarded as a sufficiently serious breach of a rule of Community law satisfying one of the conditions for the incurring of non-contractual liability by the Community (see, inter alia, Bergaderm and Goupil, paragraphs 42 to 44, and Commission v Camar and Tico, paragraphs 53 and 54).
- 32 Accordingly, the first two grounds of appeal must be rejected.

The third ground of appeal, relating to the Commission's actions in assessing the October 1997 report

Arguments of the parties

- 33 The Commission complains that the Court of First Instance erred in law in finding that the October 1997 report suggested that Fresh Marine had complied with its undertaking and in holding, therefore, that the Commission's reaction in amending that report had been disproportionate and that it had committed an error which it would have avoided if it had exercised ordinary care and diligence.

34 The Commission submits, first, that if the Court of First Instance had properly understood the nature of the final entries in the October 1997 report, it would not have described it, at paragraph 79 of the contested judgment, as a document suggesting that Fresh Marine had complied with its undertaking.

35 Second, according to the Commission, the Court of First Instance did not evaluate its conduct within the context of Article 8(10) of Regulation No 384/96. Since that provision lays down a test to be applied by the Commission in these circumstances, it is submitted that, by failing to have regard to that test, the Court of First Instance erred in law. In the Commission's view, it was essential that the Court of First Instance determine which party was to bear the burden of proof as to Fresh Marine's compliance with its undertaking before deciding whether or not the October 1997 report contained the best information available.

36 Fresh Marine contends that the Commission's argument concerning the Court of First Instance's alleged misunderstanding of the final entries in the October 1997 report is inadmissible since appeals are limited to points of law and thus exclude points of fact.

37 Finally, Fresh Marine submits that the discretion conferred on the Commission by Article 8(3) of Regulation No 384/96 with respect to the decision whether or not to accept an undertaking cannot be stretched to allow it to manipulate unilaterally a monitoring report and to conclude, on that basis, that an exporter has apparently breached its undertaking.

Findings of the Court

38 It need only be stated that, even if the third ground of appeal is admissible, it is of no consequence.

39 The Court has held, at paragraph 31 of the present judgment, that, in imposing provisional anti-dumping and countervailing duties, the Commission committed a sufficiently serious breach of Community law for non-contractual liability to be incurred by the Community.

40 Accordingly, it is irrelevant whether or not the Court of First Instance's assessment of the Commission's actions when analysing the October 1997 report is vitiated by an error.

41 Consequently, the third ground of appeal must be rejected.

The fourth ground of appeal, relating to the diligence shown by Fresh Marine in mitigating the loss

Arguments of the parties

42 The Commission submits that the Court of First Instance erred in law in finding that, despite its not providing a bank guarantee to cover the payment of the provisional duties imposed by Regulation No 2529/97 and to continue to export to the Community, Fresh Marine was not in breach of its duty to mitigate the loss suffered.

43 The Commission observes that the Court of First Instance justified that finding by stating, at paragraph 124 of the contested judgment, that, if Fresh Marine had continued to export, it would have run the risk of having to bear on its own the burden of those duties should they ever have been collected definitively. In the Commission's view, that reasoning is contradicted by the other findings made by the Court of First Instance. If, as the Court of First Instance held, the conduct giving rise to the Commission's liability was the unilateral amendment of the October 1997 report even though the report suggested that Fresh Marine had complied with its undertaking, the contested judgment does not explain how the Court of First Instance was therefore able to find that there was a risk of the provisional duty being collected definitively in such circumstances.

- 44 Fresh Marine contends that this ground of appeal is inadmissible on the ground that it relates solely to a point of fact. In any event, if it were so obvious, in the present case, that the provisional duties imposed by Regulation No 2529/97 would not be collected definitively, the Commission should explain why it considered it necessary to impose them in the first place. The Commission's reasoning is likewise flawed in that it fails to take into account the fact that it is for the Council and not the Commission to decide to collect provisional duties definitively.

Findings of the Court

- 45 Under Article 225 EC and Article 58 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, an appeal lies on a point of law only. It follows that, save where the clear sense of the evidence has been distorted, the Court has no jurisdiction to review the assessment of the facts made by the Court of First Instance (see, inter alia, Joined Cases C-280/99 P, C-281/99 P and C-282/99 P Moccia Irme and Others v Commission [2001] ECR I-4717, paragraph 78, and Case C-104/00 P DKV v OHIM [2002] ECR I-7561, paragraph 22).

- 46 The Commission's arguments seek to call into question the Court of First Instance's assessment of the facts in the light of which it held that Fresh Marine had not breached its duty to show the necessary diligence in mitigating the extent of its loss.
- 47 In the present case, the Court of First Instance made a number of findings of fact at paragraph 124 of the contested judgment. It pointed out, in the first place, that if, having provided a bank guarantee, Fresh Marine had decided to export to the Community at unchanged prices without passing on to its Community customers the amount of the provisional duties through the prices it charged, it would have run the risk of having to bear on its own the burden of those duties should they ever have been collected definitively. Since it was not able to tell at that time whether that would eventually be the case, Fresh Marine would have had no option, according to the Court of First Instance, but to increase its export prices by the amount of those provisional duties. However, the Court of First Instance further held that having regard, in particular, to competition from Community companies selling salmon and from the numerous Norwegian exporters which had been able to continue to sell on the Community market within the terms of their undertakings during the period in question, it was reasonable for Fresh Marine to take the view that there was no chance of finding an outlet for its products on that market during that period. The Court of First Instance concluded accordingly that Fresh Marine would have run an unusual commercial risk going beyond the level of risk inherent in the pursuit of any economic activity if it had continued to export to the Community over the period during which Regulation No 2529/97 applied to imports of its products.
- 48 It is clear that the Commission has failed to demonstrate how those findings constitute a distortion of the sense of the evidence submitted to the Court of First Instance.
- 49 Consequently, the fourth ground of appeal must be rejected as inadmissible.

The fifth ground of appeal, relating to infringement of the rights of the defence

Arguments of the parties

- 50 At paragraph 132 of the contested judgment, the Court of First Instance, after having found that the Commission had become convinced, at least from 30 January 1998, that Fresh Marine had complied with its undertaking, held that the Commission had, for no obvious reason, delayed until 25 March 1998 before giving Fresh Marine, by means of Regulation No 651/98, the formal legal reassurance which it could have given it at the end of January 1998.
- 51 By its fifth ground of appeal, the Commission submits that the Court of First Instance infringed its rights of defence by failing to give it an opportunity to explain the alleged delay in adopting Regulation No 651/98.
- 52 Fresh Marine submits that the Commission has misinterpreted the contested judgment. Contrary to what it claims, the Court of First Instance did not hold, at paragraphs 132 and 134 of the contested judgment, that the Commission should have adopted and published Regulation No 651/98 after it had decided that the undertaking should be reinstated, but reproached it for not having provided Fresh Marine at the end of January 1998 with a formal legal reassurance that its undertaking would be reinstated. Such a reassurance did not have to take the form of a Commission regulation, and a letter stating clearly that the provisional duties would not be collected would have been sufficient. Instead of doing so, the Commission, by its letter of 2 February 1998, unjustifiably perpetuated the doubts as to the collection of the provisional duties.

Findings of the Court

- 53 As is clear from paragraph 132 of the contested judgment, the Court of First Instance found that, although the Commission alone was competent to lift the provisional measures imposed on imports of Fresh Marine's products by Regulation No 2529/97 and although it had become convinced, at least from 30 January 1998, that that company had complied with its undertaking, it unjustifiably perpetuated, by its letter of 2 February 1998, the doubts as to the final outcome of the provisional duties imposed by that regulation, thus dissuading Fresh Marine from resuming its commercial activity on the Community market.
- 54 The Commission has made no submissions in these appeal proceedings which might call into question either the Court of First Instance's findings or the validity of its reasoning.
- 55 Both during the written procedure and at the hearing before the Court, the Commission submitted merely that, if the Court of First Instance had given it an opportunity to explain the procedural requirements for adopting Regulation No 651/98, it would not have found, as it did, that there had been an unjustifiable delay on the basis of the unfounded principle that, once it had been decided at a purely administrative stage to reinstate Fresh Marine's undertaking, the Commission should have adopted Regulation No 651/98 on the same day.
- 56 The fifth ground of appeal must therefore be rejected as unfounded.

57 It follows from all the above findings that the main appeal must be dismissed.

The cross-appeal

Arguments of the parties

58 Fresh Marine submits that the Court of First Instance erred in law in holding, at paragraphs 91 and 92 of the contested judgment, that it bore half of the responsibility for the damage suffered by it between 18 December 1997 and 31 January 1998 because it failed to append to the October 1997 report explanations of the negative entries appearing in that report.

59 The absence of such explanations did not, in Fresh Marine's submission, cause the damage which it suffered as a result of the Commission's conduct. Fresh Marine takes the view that the Commission was obliged under Article 18(4) of Regulation No 384/96 to inform it of its intention to delete the negative entries from the October 1997 report before imposing provisional duties. Had the Commission complied with that provision, no damage would have been suffered by Fresh Marine as it would have immediately explained the meaning of the negative entries to the Commission. The Court of First Instance thus erred in law in failing to draw the appropriate conclusions from the Commission's failure to comply with its obligation under Article 18(4) of Regulation No 384/96 to inform Fresh Marine of the amendments which it intended to make to the report.

60 Fresh Marine also claims that the Court should order the Commission to pay it interest, from the date of the contested judgment, on the sums which are to be paid to it.

- 61 The Commission contends that Fresh Marine has misinterpreted the contested judgment in claiming that, according to that judgment, Article 18(4) of Regulation No 384/96 is applicable to the present case. Given that no reference is made to that provision either in the pleadings submitted to the Court of First Instance or in the contested judgment, the cross-appeal must be declared inadmissible because it is based on a plea not raised before the Court of First Instance.
- 62 Alternatively, the Commission submits that Article 18(4) of Regulation No 384/96 is inapplicable to the circumstances of the present case. It is intended to govern situations where a party provides an unsatisfactory response to a questionnaire during an investigation and the Commission intends to reject the evidence supplied and rely on the best evidence available. In the present case, the Commission did not reject the October 1997 report.
- 63 Furthermore, the Court of First Instance's finding that Fresh Marine contributed to the damage through its own negligence is not contradictory. The Court of First Instance having, at paragraphs 84 to 89 of the contested judgment, contradicted Fresh Marine's contention that the October 1997 report was clear, it is established that Fresh Marine was negligent in failing to attach any explanation to that report.
- 64 Finally, the Commission contends that the claim for interest is inadmissible because Fresh Marine does not rely on any error in law on the part of the Court of First Instance. Alternatively, the Commission submits that such a claim is admissible only in relation to an award of damages which the Court might uphold, to the exclusion of any award of costs.

Findings of the Court

- 65 Since Fresh Marine complains that the Court of First Instance erred in law in its assessment that Fresh Marine was partly responsible for its loss, the cross-appeal is admissible.
- 66 As regards the substance, the Court of First Instance's reasoning, at paragraphs 91 and 92 of the contested judgment, is not contradictory. Having found that the Commission's reaction in unilaterally amending the October 1997 report was unlawful and that Fresh Marine's submission to the Commission of a report which did not contain the explanations necessary to understand it correctly was negligent, the Court of First Instance rightly held that, when determining the Commission's obligation to make reparation, account should be taken of the fact that each party bears half of the responsibility for the events.
- 67 With respect to infringement by the Commission of Article 18(4) of Regulation No 384/96 and any error in law which the Court of First Instance may have committed in failing to draw the appropriate conclusions from such an infringement, it should be pointed out that Article 18(4) deals with failure to cooperate where evidence or information provided by traders is rejected by the Commission. Consequently, since Article 18(4) of Regulation No 384/96 concerns other aspects of the anti-dumping procedure, it is inapplicable to the facts of the present case.

68 The claim for payment of interest is inadmissible on two grounds. First, it does not satisfy the requirements of Article 112(1)(c) of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of Justice because it does not refer to the provisions or principles of Community law alleged to have been infringed by the Court of First Instance. Second, it must be regarded as a new claim which cannot be presented for the first time in an appeal (see, to that effect, Case C-282/98 P Enso Española v Commission [2000] ECR I-9817, paragraph 62). Before the Court of First Instance, Fresh Marine claimed only that the Commission should be ordered to make good the damage it suffered and to pay the costs.

69 It follows from the above that the cross-appeal must be dismissed in its entirety.

Costs

70 Under the first paragraph of Article 122 of the Rules of Procedure, where the appeal is unfounded or where the appeal is well founded and the Court of Justice itself gives final judgment in the case, the Court is to make a decision as to costs. Under Article 69(2) of those Rules, which apply to appeal proceedings by virtue of Article 118, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since Fresh Marine has asked for the Commission to be ordered to pay the costs and the latter has been unsuccessful in its grounds of appeal, the Commission must be ordered to pay the costs relating to the main appeal. On the other hand, since the Commission has asked for Fresh Marine to be ordered to pay the costs of the cross-appeal and the latter has been unsuccessful in its grounds of appeal, Fresh Marine must be ordered to pay the costs relating to the cross-appeal.

On those grounds,

hereby:

1. Dismisses the main appeal and the cross-appeal;
2. Orders the Commission of the European Communities to pay the costs relating to the main appeal;
3. Orders Fresh Marine Company A/S to pay the costs relating to the cross-appeal.

I. PROCEDURE

1. Registration of the Request for Arbitration

1. By letter of June 26, 2001, MTD Equity Sdn (“MTD Equity”), a Malaysian company, and MTD Chile S.A (“MTD Chile”), a Chilean company, (collectively “the Claimants” or “MTD”) filed a request for arbitration with the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (“ICSID” or “the Centre”) against the Republic of Chile (“the Respondent” or “Chile”). The request, invoked the ICSID Arbitration provisions of the 1992 Agreement between the Government of Malaysia and the Government of the Republic of Chile for the Promotion and Protection of Investments (“the BIT”).

2. The Centre, on June 27, 2001, in accordance with Rule 5 of the ICSID Rules of Procedure for the Institution of Conciliation and Arbitration Proceedings (“Institution Rules”) acknowledged receipt of the request and on the same day transmitted a copy to the Republic of Chile and to the Chilean Embassy in Washington, D.C.

3. On July 17, 2001, the Centre requested further information from the Claimants, with regard to the fulfillment by both Claimants of the requirement set forth in Articles 6(3)(i) and (ii) of the BIT concerning an attempt to resolve the dispute amicably through consultation and negotiation at least three months before the request for arbitration. The Centre also sought confirmation from the Claimants that neither of them had submitted the dispute to courts or administrative tribunals of Chile, as precluded by Article 6(3)(ii) and (iii) of the BIT; and that the majority of the shares in the second Claimant, MTD Chile were, for purposes of Article 6(2) of the BIT, owned by investors of Malaysia before the dispute arose. The Claimants responded by a letter of July 30, 2001.

4. The request was registered by the Centre on August 6, 2001, pursuant to Article 36(3) of the ICSID Convention, and on the same day the Acting Secretary-General, in accordance with Institution Rule 7, notified the parties of the registration and invited them to proceed to constitute an Arbitral Tribunal as soon as possible.

2. Constitution of the Arbitral Tribunal and Commencement of the Proceeding

5. There were two successive arbitral tribunals in this case, the present Tribunal having been appointed upon the joint resignation of the first set of arbitrators.

6. Following the registration of the request for arbitration by the Centre, the parties agreed on a three-member Tribunal. The parties had agreed that each would appoint an arbitrator and that the third arbitrator, who would be the president of the Tribunal, would be appointed by agreement of the parties.

7. The Claimants appointed Mr. James H. Carter Jr., a national of the United States of America, and the Respondent appointed Professor W. Michael Reisman, also a national of the United States of America. By agreement, the parties appointed Mr. Guillermo Aguilar Alvarez, a national of Mexico, as the presiding arbitrator.

8. All three arbitrators having accepted their appointments, the Centre by a letter of March 5, 2002, informed the parties of the constitution of the Tribunal, consisting of Mr. James H. Carter Jr., Professor W. Michael Reisman, and Mr. Guillermo Aguilar Alvarez (“the first Tribunal”), and that the proceeding was deemed to have commenced on that day, pursuant to ICSID Arbitration Rule 6(1).

9. As agreed between the first Tribunal and the parties, in consultation with the Centre, the first Tribunal held its first session in New York on May 29, 2002, with the parties attending.

10. In advance of that session, the parties, by a joint letter dated May 24, 2002, communicated to the Tribunal their agreement on several items on the agenda proposed for the session. Those agreements by the parties were affirmed at the meeting and incorporated in the minutes.

11. Arbitrators had requested a rate of remuneration higher than the Centre’s current rate. The Respondent and the Claimants, by letters dated September 17, 2002 and September 24, 2002, respectively, advised the Tribunal that they were unable to offer the rate of remuneration proposed by the Tribunal members.

12. By a letter dated October 2, 2002, the Tribunal notified the parties that it would not be able to serve on the basis of the fees agreed by the parties and that each of its members would be resigning his appointment. By a joint letter of October 17, 2002, members of the first Tribunal tendered their resignation to the Secretary-General of the Centre.

13. On October 18, 2002, the Centre notified the parties of the resignations of Mr. Aguilar Alvarez, Mr. Carter and Professor Reisman and informed them that the proceeding was suspended pursuant to ICSID Arbitration Rule 10(2). In accordance with Arbitration Rule 11, the parties were by that letter invited to appoint new arbitrators by the same method by which the initial arbitrators were appointed.

3. Appointment of the present Tribunal

14. By a letter of November 26, 2002, the Claimants informed the Centre of their appointment of Mr. Marc Lalonde, a Canadian national, to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Mr. James H. Carter, and invited the Respondent to appoint a replacement for Professor W. Michael Reisman and to engage in consultations aimed at reaching an agreement on the person to replace Mr. Guillermo Aguilar Alvarez as the presiding arbitrator.

15. By a letter of December 16, 2002, the Respondent notified the Centre that it had appointed Mr. Rodrigo Oreamuno Blanco, a national of Costa Rica, to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Professor W. Michael Reisman.

16. The parties, by separate letters of January 23, 2003, notified the Centre of their appointment, by agreement, of Mr. Andrés Rigo Sureda, a national of Spain, to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Mr. Guillermo Aguilar Alvarez as the presiding arbitrator.

17. All three arbitrators accepted their appointments and, on January 29, 2003, the Centre notified the parties that the Tribunal had been reconstituted and the proceeding recommenced on that day, in accordance with ICSID Arbitration Rule 12.

4. Written and Oral Procedure

18. At the first session of the first Tribunal on May 29, 2002, it was agreed that the proceeding would be in English and Spanish. Documents filed in one language would be followed within five business days by a translation in the other language. The procedural arrangements agreed by the first Tribunal have been adhered to by the Tribunal.

19. The following schedule was also agreed for the exchange of written submissions: the Claimants to file their Memorial by October 1, 2002; the Respondent to file its Counter-Memorial by February 1, 2003; the Claimants to file their Reply by April 15, 2003; and the Respondent to file its Rejoinder by July 1, 2003.

20. It was also agreed that a hearing would be held from Monday August 4 to Thursday, August 14, 2003, including Saturday, August 9, 2003.

21. The Claimants filed their Memorial on October 1, 2002, followed on October 8, 2002 by a Spanish language translation. These submissions were not transmitted to the first Tribunal but were sent to the present Tribunal after it was constituted.

22. Upon the resignation of the members of the first Tribunal, the proceeding was suspended on October 18, 2002, pursuant to ICSID Arbitration Rule 10(2) which provides:

“Upon the notification by the Secretary-General of a vacancy on the Tribunal, the proceeding shall be or remain suspended until the vacancy has been filled.”

23. Arbitration Rule 12 further provides:

“As soon as a vacancy on the Tribunal has been filled, the proceeding shall continue from the point it had reached at the time the vacancy occurred. ...”

24. On December 26, 2002, the Respondent wrote to the Centre suggesting that the effect of ICSID Arbitration Rules 10(2) and 12 was that suspension of the proceeding upon the resignation of the first Tribunal meant a suspension of the schedule established for the filing of submissions, and requested an extension for the filing of its Counter-Memorial. The Claimants in a letter of January 10, 2003 rejected the Respondent’s interpretation of Arbitration Rule 10(2), but agreed with the Respondent that the matter should be determined by the new Tribunal upon its constitution.

25. After the present Tribunal was constituted, by Procedural Order No. 1 of February 3, 2003, issued in English and Spanish, the Tribunal requested the parties to present, no later than by February 14, 2003, any observations that they may have on the effect of the suspension of the proceeding on time limits for filing pleadings. On that day, the parties simultaneously filed submissions.

26. On February 18, 2003, the Claimants requested the Tribunal “to address one new argument” asserted in the Respondent’s submission of February 14, 2003.

27. By Procedural Order No. 2, dated February 20, 2003, the Tribunal decided:

“that the meaning of the term ‘suspension’ in Rules 10 and 12 of the [ICSID] Arbitration Rules applies to all matters related to the proceeding, including time limits, and not only to matters related to action required from the Tribunal, that the time limit to present the counter-memorial originally fixed [for] February 1, 2003 [be] extended by 103 days [the duration of the suspension] to May 15, 2003.”

28. The Tribunal in that Order then directed the parties:

“(a) to consult each other on the subsequent schedule of the proceeding and other pending matters, including the matter related to business records, and

(b) advise the Tribunal of the result of their consultations not later than March 14, 2003.”

29. By a letter of March 14, 2003, the Claimants notified the Tribunal that the parties were still in discussions on the modified schedule.

30. By a letter of March 17, 2003, the Claimants advised the Tribunal of their agreed schedule for the submission of the remaining pleadings and notified the Tribunal that the parties had resolved the matter related to the business records referred to in Procedural Order No. 2. The Respondent in a letter of March 18, 2003, confirmed the agreement of the parties as communicated in the Claimants’ letter of the previous day.

31. Following a request by the Tribunal that the hearing commence a day later than that proposed by the parties, and correspondence with the parties in that regard, the Tribunal, by a letter dated April 21, 2003, formally took note of the agreed schedule for the submission of the remaining pleadings and proposed dates of the hearing from December 9, 2003 to December 19, 2003, including Saturday, December 13.

32. On June 9, 2003, the Respondent filed its Counter-Memorial in English and the Spanish version on June 16, 2003.

33. By letters of July 11, 2003 and July 14, 2003, respectively, the Claimants and the Respondent notified the Tribunal of each other's witnesses and experts that should be made available for cross examination at the oral hearing.

34. On September 15, 2003, the Claimants filed their Reply in English language, followed on September 23, 2003 by Spanish translations.

35. On October 14, 2003, counsel for the Respondent wrote to the Tribunal concerning their participation in the proceeding stating that:

“due solely to budgetary constraints faced by the Republic of Chile, White & Case LLP must withdraw as counsel of record for the Respondent in respect of [this] case. For the avoidance of doubt we wish to emphasize that our withdrawal does not relate in any way to the merits of the issues raised in the case. We shall assume limited role as advisor to the Republic of Chile with regard to this matter.

All communications and service of documents henceforth may continue to be addressed to us, as well as the other advisors of the Republic in regard to this matter”.

36. On November 21, 2003, the Respondent filed its Rejoinder in Spanish language, followed by the English language version on December 1, 2003.

37. As previously agreed, the hearing on merits was held from December 9 to 19, 2003, in Washington, D.C., at the seat of the Centre. The hearing was conducted in English and Spanish and full verbatim transcripts in both languages were made and distributed to the parties.

38. Pursuant to Rule 38(1) of the Arbitration Rules, on March 26, 2004, the Tribunal declared the proceeding closed, having deliberated by various means.

II. THE FACTS

39. The facts described below follow the narrative of the Claimants and, unless noted, have not been contested by the Respondent.

40. In 1994 Dato'<sup>1</sup> Nik of MTD visited Chile as a member of a trade delegation organized by the Malaysian Ministry of Public Works. During this visit, he met with government officials and business leaders who emphasized Chile's encouragement of foreign investment. Dato' Nik so reported to the Management Committee of MTD. He also met with Mr. Musa Muhamad, the Malaysian External Trade Commissioner in the Malaysian embassy in Santiago, who encouraged MTD to invest in Chile.<sup>2</sup>

41. In April 1996, Dato' Nik heard from Mr. Muhamad about "an opportunity to build a large planned community near Santiago." Dato' Nik informed Dato' Azmil Khalid who at the time was traveling in the United States. Dato' Azmil Khalid traveled directly from the United States to Chile to investigate this opportunity. There he met with Messrs. Muhamad and Antonio Arenas, a local businessman. They informed Dato' Khalid that they had found "the perfect location for a planned community."<sup>3</sup>

42. Dato' Khalid visited the site in the small town of Pirque and met with the owner of the land, Mr. Jorge Fontaine Aldunate. Mr. Fontaine is reported to have said that "he would like to work with MTD to build a mixed-use planned community on the Malaysian model". Although the site was zoned for agricultural use, Mr. Fontaine is alleged to have said that the land was unproductive and “could readily be rezoned, particularly if it would attract foreign investment.”<sup>4</sup>

43. Dato’ Khalid returned to Malaysia and reported to MTD’s Management Committee about this opportunity in Chile. The Management Committee decided to investigate it further. For this purpose, Messrs. Lee Leong Yow (Vincent Lee), MTD’s Group General Manager and Head of Operations, and Nazri Shafiee, expert in land valuation, traveled to Chile from May 14 to May 18, 1996. Dato’ Nik was also in Chile on May 16-17, 1996. He visited the project site and met with Mr. Fontaine and his family.<sup>5</sup>

44. Messrs. Lee and Shafiee visited the Foreign Investment Commission (FIC) on May 16, 1996. There they met with Mr. Joaquín Morales Godoy, Senior Legal Counsel.<sup>6</sup> The next day, Mr. Shafiee met with Mr. Fernando Guerra Francovich, the head of Servicio de Vivienda y Urbanización (“SERVIU”).<sup>7</sup> After these meetings, Messrs. Lee and Shafiee concluded that MTD should pursue the investment opportunity and so reported to MTD’s Management Committee.<sup>8</sup> Based on their report, the Management Committee decided “to pursue negotiations with Mr. Fontaine while continuing to study the feasibility of a joint venture to develop the Project.”<sup>9</sup>

45. MTD engaged Banco Sud Americano in Santiago to appraise the land. In September 1996, the appraisers submitted their report valuing the land of Mr. Fontaine, 3000 hectares, at $34,385,487. The appraisal assumed that the land could be developed as an upscale community after changing the existing zoning for agricultural use.<sup>10</sup>

46. In September 1996, the negotiations of MTD with Mr. Fontaine appeared to have reached a dead end because of disagreement on which hectares to develop and the control of the joint venture: Mr. Fontaine wanted: (i) to develop all 3000 hectares while MTD wished to develop first the 600 located at the lowest elevations; and (ii) a 50/50 split of the equity while for MTD it was essential to have control.<sup>11</sup>

47. Negotiations resumed in November 1996. The law firm Vial & Palma represented MTD, specifically attorneys Alberto Labbé Valverde and José Miguel Olivares. The parties prepared a “Promissory Contract” dated as of November 21, 1996.<sup>12</sup>

48. On November 6, 1996, according to the Respondent, a meeting took place between Mr. Edmundo Hermosilla, Minister of MINVU, Mr. Sergio González Tapia, Secretario Regional Ministerial (“SEREMI”), and representatives of MTD.<sup>13</sup> That this meeting took place, who attended and what was said at the meeting is a matter of controversy between the parties.

49. In December 1996, Messrs. Dato' Azmil Khalid and Lee negotiated the documents implementing the Promissory Contract and signed them on December 13, 1996.<sup>14</sup> The Promissory Contract would take effect only after FIC's approval of the MTD's investment and provided for: (i) development of the land at first in two tranches of 600 and 630 hectares, the second tranche at the option of MTD; and (ii) the creation of a Chilean corporation, "El Principal Inversiones S.A." ("EPSA"), to be owned 51 per cent by MTD Chile S.A. and 49 per cent by Mr. Fontaine.<sup>15</sup>

50. On December 13, 1996, after signature of the Promissory Contract, Dato' Khalid and Mr. Labbé met with Mr. Eduardo Moyano, Executive Vice President of the FIC.<sup>16</sup>

51. On January 14, 1997, MTD filed an application with the FIC for approval of an initial investment of US$ 17.136 million. The application described the project as follows:

“[D]evelop a township of 600 hectares of Fundo El Principal de Pirque, which will be a self-sufficient satellite city, with houses, apartments for diverse socioeconomic strata, schools, hospitals, universities, supermarkets, commerce of all sorts, services, and all other components necessary for self-sufficiency” (Exhibit 12 at 3. Translation of the Claimants).”

52. The application specified the location as “Pirque, Metropolitan Region” and that “the investment would provide initial capital to a newly formed corporation named

MTD Chile S.A., which would use the capital to acquire a 51 percent stake in El Principal S.A., which would own the land and develop the Project.”<sup>17</sup>

53. The application was approved by the FIC at its session of March 3, 1997. The following members of FIC attended: the President of FIC (the Minister of Economy, Development and Reconstruction), the President of the Central Bank, the Undersecretary of Finance, the Undersecretary of Mining, and the Undersecretary of Planning and Cooperation. The FIC informed MTD of the approval by letter dated March 6, 1997 and enclosed the standard contract used by Chile for these purposes.<sup>18</sup>

54. The Foreign Investment Contract was signed on March 18, 1997 by the President of FIC on behalf of Chile and Mr. Labbé on behalf of MTD. The Foreign Investment Contract provides that MTD will develop “a real estate project on 600 hectares of Fundo El Principal de Pirque. The aforementioned project consists of the construction of a self-sufficient satellite city, with houses, apartments, schools, hospitals, commerce, services, etc.” (“the Project”).<sup>19</sup>

55. After signature of the Foreign Investment Contract, MTD injected US$ 8.4 million into EPSA as a capital contribution and with US$ 8.736 million MTD purchased 51% of the EPSA shares from Mr. Fontaine “who was receiving them in return for his contribution to EPSA of 600 hectares of land.”<sup>20</sup> The funds contributed by MTD came from the resources of the MTD group and US$ 12 million from a loan made to MTD by the Arab-Malaysian Bank in Kuala Lumpur.<sup>21</sup>

56. In March 1997, MTD representatives met three architectural firms of Santiago “to assist in the design work, performing engineering studies and obtaining regulatory approvals”<sup>22</sup>: Darraidou, Larrain & Uranga (DLU), San Martín & Pascal and URBE. In April 1997, MTD selected DLU “to assist in obtaining zoning changes, subdividing the land, and designing prototype models of the houses and other structures.”<sup>23</sup> According to the Claimant, all three firms confirmed that the process to change the zoning would need to be initiated by the Municipality of Pirque and the change would need to be endorsed by the Ministry of Housing and Urban Development (“MINVU”).<sup>24</sup>

57. MTD submitted a second application to FIC on April 8, 1997 for approval to invest additional working capital of US$ 364,000. The second application was approved by FIC and MTD informed by letter dated April 22, 1997. The letter of approval enclosed the form of the standard foreign investment contract. The contract for this additional investment was signed on May 13, 1997. Its second clause provides that the investment will be used “[t]o make capital contributions and/or increases to the Chilean receiving company called MTD Chile S.A., which is developing a real estate project on 600 hectares of the Fundo El Principal de Pirque.”<sup>25</sup>

58. On April 22, 1997, representatives of MTD and Mr. Labbé met with Messrs. Alberto Carbacho Duarte, the MINVU architect with overall responsibility for the Southern region of Santiago, which includes Pirque, and Mr. Sergio Lepe Corvalán, an official in the same office. According to the Claimants, Messrs. Carbacho and Lepe explained that “because Pirque was covered by the Plano Regulador Metropolitano de Santiago (PMRS) [...] the MINVU would need to coordinate and approve the necessary zoning changes for the Project...the review process would be handled at the MINVU by the Secretario Regional Ministerial (SEREMI).”<sup>26</sup>

59. On May 16, 1997, representatives of MTD met with the Mayor of Pirque, Mr. Manuel José Ossandón.<sup>27</sup>

60. On May 20, 1997, Dato’ Azmil Khalid met with Minister Edmundo Hermosilla. The same day, the MTD team met with Mr. Ricardo Lagos Escobar, then Minister of Public Works.

61. The Mayor of Pirque formally endorsed the Project by a letter dated August 14, 1997 and offered his assistance in obtaining approvals.<sup>28</sup>

62. During this period, Minister Hermosilla was replaced by Mr. Sergio Henríquez Díaz.

63. On September 29, 1997, at an official state dinner on the occasion of the visit of the Prime Minister of Malaysia to Chile, President Eduardo Frei Ruiz-Tagle of Chile delivered a toast making reference, inter alia, to “the innovative real estate project in Pirque” Memorial, para. 51.<sup>29</sup> The next day appearance of the President at the inauguration of the Project was cancelled because of an alleged meeting with the President of Brazil. According to the Respondent, the speech to be read by the President, that was already in the hands of the Claimants, was withdrawn. This fact is contested by the Claimants.

64. Around November, 1997, “MTD heard from its consultants that SEREMI González of the MINVU was showing reluctance about modifying the PMRS for Pirque.”<sup>30</sup>

65. On December 12, 1997, the Diario Oficial published the approval of the modification of the PMRS to include the Chacabuco area, North of Santiago, in order to permit its development under the system of Zonas de Desarrollo Urbano Condicionado (“ZDUCs”).<sup>31</sup>

66. In early 1998, MTD engaged the services of Mr. Pablo Heilenkötter, an attorney with expertise in land use regulation and real estate development. Since SEREMI González was unwilling to initiate the process to change the zoning, Mr. Heilenkötter and other consultants considered other alternatives under the Ley General de Urbanismo y Construcción (“LGUC”): “(i) the preparation of a sectional plan limited to a modification for the zoning in the area of the Project; (ii) the preparation of a communal plan for the Municipality of Pirque that would also include a zoning change for the area of the Project; and (iii) an application under article 55 for the construction of housing to complement a pre-existing activity.”<sup>32</sup>

67. Mr. Heilenkötter met with Mr. Lepe on March 6, 1998, and two weeks later with Mr. González together with other consultants of MTD. According to the Claimants, Mr. González informed them that he did not wish to undertake another modification to the PMRS “because it had just been changed in December 1997 to incorporate the Chacabuco area.”<sup>33</sup>

68. As MTD understood the LGUC, it was possible to pursue a change by way of a sectional plan and the Consejo Regional de la Región Metropolitana (“CORE”) would “ultimately decide whether to approve the sectional plan, and it could do so over the MINVU’s objection.”<sup>34</sup>

69. At this point, the Mayor of Pirque proposed to the Municipal Council to prepare a sectional plan to obtain a change in zoning. The Council approved such approach and the Mayor informed EPSA on March 31, 1998.

70. On April 13, 1998, MTD representatives and consultants met with Mr. Quintana, the CORE President. He suggested that, since Pirque did not have a Communal

Regulatory Plan, the Municipality should submit with its sectional plan a strategic plan outlining Pirque's anticipated growth.<sup>35</sup>

71. Sometime in April 1998, Dato' Azmil Khalid met with FIC Executive Vice-President Moyano "to discuss the slow progress of the zoning change request". Mr. Moyano reportedly said that he would make inquiries.<sup>36</sup>

72. On April 16, 1998, the Mayor of Pirque, and MTD representatives and consultants met with Mr. Sergio González who informed them that the Project was inconsistent with MINVU's urban development policy<sup>37</sup>. After the meeting, the Mayor wrote to SEREMI González asking for "guidance about presenting a sectional plan to the MINVU for the development of the Project."<sup>38</sup>

73. On April 20 1998, Mayor Ossandón requested a meeting with the new MINVU Minister, Mr. Henríquez. The meeting took place on May 6, 1998 and it was also attended by representatives and consultants of MTD.<sup>39</sup>

74. The SEREMI's office responded to the letter of April 16 on June 3, 1998 and explained: that "it would be inconvenient to initiate any changes to the PMRS pending completion of studies aimed at revising the Plan Regional de Desarrollo Urbano (PRDU)"; that "a sectional plan could not be used to obtain a change in zoning for the Project because only the SEREMI could initiate changes to the PMRS"; and that "before the investment contracts were signed, Minister Hermosilla had informed Mr. Fontaine and the Malaysian businessmen that it would not be possible to develop the Project in Pirque.”<sup>40</sup>

75. At the request of MTD and as a consequence of the letter of June 3, another meeting with Minister Henríquez took place on June 12, 1998. The Minister endorsed the letter of SEREMI González and confirmed that the MINVU would “neither initiate nor support any modification to the PMRS that would allow the Project to proceed.”<sup>41</sup>

76. The same day, Mr. Heilenkötter met with Mr. Banderas of the FIC who informed him that “the FIC could not assist MTD and that its role is strictly limited to approving the inflow of foreign investment funds into Chile”.<sup>42</sup> At the request of Mr. Labbé, another meeting took place with Messrs. Moyano and Banderas. Mr. Moyano confirmed at the meeting that the approval of the FIC was without prejudice to other necessary approvals and that the FIC’s authority was limited to the approval of the flow of funds into the country.<sup>43</sup>

77. The Council of the Municipality of Pirque approved the Sectional Plan on July 3, 1998 and the Mayor submitted it to the SEREMI of MINVU on August 11, 1998. On September 8, 1998, the Mayor also submitted an Environmental Impact Study (“EIS”) to the Comisión Regional del Medio Ambiente, Región Metropolitana (“COREMA”). On

September 15, 1998, the COREMA informed the Municipality that it would review the EIS and announced the review in a public statement.<sup>44</sup>

78. MTD's representatives held meetings with Mr. José Miguel Insulza, Minister of Foreign Affairs, who suggested that the Malaysian Government write him and President Frei requesting assistance to address MTD's situation. The Minister of Foreign Affairs of Malaysia wrote to Mr. Insulza and the Malaysian Prime Minister to President Frei on September 11 and September 15, 1998, respectively.<sup>45</sup>

79. On September 25, 1998, the SEREMI of the MINVU returned the sectional plan to the Mayor of Pirque without evaluating the plan on its merits. The letter of SEREMI González indicated that "only the SEREMI could change the PRMS, that doing so would be 'inconvenient', and that a sectional plan could not be used to modify the PMRS."<sup>46</sup>

80. On October 19, 1998, MTD's representatives and their advisors met with the MINVU Minister, Mr. Henríquez, and SEREMI González. Mr. Henríquez re-affirmed that the policy of the Government was to encourage development of Santiago towards the North and not the South where Pirque is located. Hence, he would not support the required zoning change, and the Project should be built elsewhere in Chile. On October 27, 1998, Mr. Shafiee sent Mr. Henríquez a letter thanking him for the meeting and including draft minutes of the meeting. The Minister responded on November 4, 1998 formally rejecting the Project. He stated that the SEREMI of the MINVU “will not initiate a change to the Regulating Plan for the Santiago Metropolitan Region to make this project possible”. In a press release of the same day, MINVU indicated that it had rejected the Project because it conflicted with existing urban development policy and that the Mayor of Pirque no longer supported the Project.<sup>47</sup>

81. On November 26, 1998, the COREMA rejected the EIS because the sectional plan was incompatible with the existing zoning for the land.<sup>48</sup>

82. On December 15, 1998, the MINVU issued a more detailed press release about the rejection of the Project.<sup>49</sup>

83. On June 2, 1999, MTD notified the Respondent that an investment dispute existed under the Malaysia-Chile Bilateral Investment Treaty (the BIT). At the end of the three-month negotiation period required by the BIT before the dispute may be brought to arbitration, no solution to the dispute had been found.<sup>50</sup> At the request of the Respondent, the parties agreed to a 30-day extension of the negotiation period. Negotiations continued without an agreement being reached at the expiry of the extension.<sup>51</sup>

84. On September 9, 1999, a third Foreign Investment Contract was signed between Chile and MTD for the purpose of providing an additional US$ 25,000 of working capital to MTD Chile. As stated in the Memorial, “The third Contract was executed after the State of Chile had announced that the Project was incompatible with its urban-development policy and does not reference the Project in Pirque.”<sup>52</sup>

85. On October 8, 1999, MTD informed representatives of the Respondent that it would pursue this matter in formal dispute settlement proceedings under the auspices of ICSID. MTD continued to meet with representatives of the Respondent until it filed the request for arbitration in June 2001.<sup>53</sup>

III. PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS

1. Applicable Law

86. Article 42(1) of the Convention is the relevant provision for determining the law applicable to the merits of the dispute between the parties. This article requires the Tribunal to “decide a dispute in accordance with such rules of law as may be agreed by the parties”. This being a dispute under the BIT, the parties have agreed that the merits of the dispute be decided in accordance with international law. Applicable law has not been a matter of controversy between the parties except as it pertains to the issue of whether the Respondent has failed to meet its obligations, under the Foreign Investment Contracts, to grant the necessary permits for the Claimants to carry out their investment in Chile. The Claimants argue that the alleged failure of the Respondent has to be considered under international law because Article 3(1) of the Bilateral Investment Treaty between Chile and Denmark (the “Denmark BIT”) has the effect of internationalizing the obligations of the Respondent under the Foreign Investment

Contracts. The Respondent denies that Article 3(1) of the Denmark BIT had such effect and maintains that Chilean law applies on the basis of Article 42(1) of the Convention. The Respondent affirms that, in the absence of agreement between the parties, “The applicable law in regard to the foreign investment contracts is Chilean domestic legislation, according to the provisions of the Washington Convention.”<sup>54</sup>

87. At this point, the Tribunal will limit itself to note that, for purposes of Article 42(1) of the Convention, the parties have agreed to this arbitration under the BIT. This instrument being a treaty, the agreement to arbitrate under the BIT requires the Tribunal to apply international law. The Tribunal will analyze further this issue when considering the effect of Article 3(1) of the Denmark BIT.

2. Significance of an Investment Dispute

88. At the beginning of its Counter-Memorial, Chile has made statements and provided statistics in support of Chile as “a place to invest”. Indeed, between 1974 and 2001, US$ 82.9 billion in foreign investment were authorized, and more than four thousand companies invested in Chile. Chile has also pointed out that the case before the Tribunal is the first time that foreign investors appear before ICSID claiming that Chile violated DL 600<sup>55</sup> and engaged in discriminatory practices.<sup>56</sup>

89. The Tribunal, in noting the success of the Respondent in attracting foreign investment, wishes to record its understanding that a dispute before an ICSID Tribunal is not necessarily a black mark on the record of a country or an investor. Bilateral

investment treaties are relatively new and it is not unreasonable that their application or the many factors that affect foreign investment be a source of disagreement. The fact that disagreements are brought to the decision of a third party, such as an ICSID arbitral tribunal, and that a country has offered to do so in a treaty strengthens rather than detracts from a country's endeavor to attract foreign investment and treat investors fairly and equitably.

3. Jurisdiction

90. As regards the jurisdiction of the Centre and the competence of this Tribunal, the Claimants maintain that their dispute with the Respondent is a legal dispute that arises out of an investment made in Chile by a national of another Contracting State, Malaysia. The Respondent has not raised any objections about this matter.

91. The Respondent consented to ICSID arbitration under the BIT and the Claimants consented when they filed their request for arbitration.

92. Article 6(1) of the BIT provides:

“Each Contracting Party consents to submit to the International Centre for the Settlement of Investment Disputes [...] any dispute arising between that Contracting Party and an investor of the other Contracting Party which involves: (i) an obligation entered into by that Contracting Party with the investor of the other Contracting Party regarding an investment by such investor, or (ii) an alleged breach of any right conferred or created by this Agreement with respect to an investment by such investor.”

93. MTD Equity is a “national of another Contracting State”: it is a corporation organized under the laws of Malaysia and has its seat and operations in Malaysia. It is also an “investor” under the terms of Article 1(c)(ii) of the BIT, which defines investor as including: “any corporation, partnership, trust, joint venture, organization, association or enterprise incorporated or duly constituted in accordance with applicable laws of that Contracting Party and have their seat and operations in the territory of that same Contracting Party.”

94. MTD Chile is wholly owned by MTD Equity and is a corporation organized under the laws of Chile. Under Article 25(2)(b) of the ICSID Convention and Article 6(2) of the BIT, such a corporation is to be deemed as a Malaysian national for purposes of arbitration proceedings under the ICSID Convention.

95. The dispute between the parties qualifies as a dispute under each of the categories of Article 6(1) of the BIT. It involves an obligation entered into by the Respondent with the Claimants regarding their investment in Chile and an alleged breach of their rights under the BIT in respect of such investment.

96. The requirement of Article 6(3)(i) of the BIT that the parties try to solve the dispute “amicably through consultation and negotiation” for at least three months before resorting to arbitration has also been satisfied. Negotiations took place for a period exceeding three months and through a one-month extension after the Claimants notified, on June 2, 1999, the President of Chile and the Minister of Economy that a dispute had arisen and invoked Article 6 of the BIT.

97. The Tribunal is satisfied that the dispute between the parties arises out of an investment made by MTD Equity, a national of Malaysia, in Chile and that the investment so made qualifies as such under the Convention and the BIT.

4. The Right of States to adopt Policy and enact Legislation

98. The Tribunal concurs with statements made by the Respondent to the effect that it has a right to decide its urban policies and legislation. Indeed, the States parties to the BIT have agreed that their commitment to encourage and create favorable conditions for investors and admit their investments is “subject to [each party’s] rights to exercise powers conferred by its laws, regulations and national policies.”<sup>57</sup> Furthermore, in the definition of investment, the term “investment” is understood to refer to “all investments approved by the appropriate Ministries or authorities of the Contracting Parties in accordance with its legislation and national policies.”<sup>58</sup>

99. Thus, by entering into the BIT, the Contracting Parties did not limit the exercise of their authority under their national laws or policies except to the extent that this exercise would contravene obligations undertaken in the BIT itself. An arbitral tribunal in the specific case of ICSID would not consider the policies or legislation of a country and changes thereto unless a connection can be established with the investment concerned. This connection may be “established if those general measures are adopted in violation of specific commitments given to the investor in treaties, legislation or contracts. What is brought under the jurisdiction of the Centre is not the general measures in themselves but the extent to which they may violate those specific commitments.”<sup>59</sup>

5. The Most-Favored-Nation (MFN) Clause

100. The Claimants have based in part their claims on provisions of other bilateral investment treaties and have alleged that these provisions apply by operation of the MFN clause of the BIT. The Respondent has not argued against the application of these provisions but, in the case of Article 3(1) of the Denmark BIT and Article 3(3) and (4) of the bilateral investment treaty between Chile and Croatia (“the Croatia BIT”), the Respondent has qualified its arguments by stating that, even in the event that the clause concerned would apply, the facts of the case are such that it would not have been breached. Because of this qualification in the Counter-Memorial and the Rejoinder, the Tribunal considers it appropriate to examine the MFN clause in the BIT and satisfy itself that its terms permit the use of the provisions of the Denmark BIT and Croatia BIT as a legal basis for the claims submitted to its decision.

101. The first paragraph of the MFN clause of the BIT - (Article 3(1)) - reads as follows:

“1. Investments made by investors of either Contracting Party in the territory of the other Contracting Party shall receive treatment which is fair and equitable, and not less favourable than that accorded to investments made by investors of any third State.”

102. The other provisions of this Article extend the clause to compensation related to losses suffered because of wars or like events or limit its application by excluding benefits provided in regional cooperation and taxation related agreements.

103. The question for the Tribunal is whether the provisions of the Croatia BIT and the Denmark BIT which deal with the obligation to award permits subsequent to approval of an investment and to fulfillment of contractual obligations, respectively, can be considered to be part of fair and equitable treatment.

104. The Tribunal considers the meaning of fair and equitable treatment below and refers to that discussion. The Tribunal has concluded that, under the BIT, the fair and equitable standard of treatment has to be interpreted in the manner most conducive to fulfill the objective of the BIT to protect investments and create conditions favorable to investments. The Tribunal considers that to include as part of the protections of the BIT those included in Article 3(1) of the Denmark BIT and Article 3(3) and (4) of the Croatia BIT is in consonance with this purpose. The Tribunal is further convinced of this conclusion by the fact that the exclusions in the MFN clause relate to tax treatment and regional cooperation, matters alien to the BIT but that, because of the general nature of the MFN clause, the Contracting Parties considered it prudent to exclude. A contrario sensu, other matters that can be construed to be part of the fair and equitable treatment of investors would be covered by the clause.

IV. CONSIDERATIONS ON THE MERITS

105. The Claimants allege that the Respondent has breached:

- (i) Articles 2(2) and 3(1) of the BIT and Article 4(1) of the Croatia BIT by treating their investment unfairly and inequitably;
- (ii) Article 3(1) of the Denmark BIT by breaching the Respondent's obligations under the Foreign Investment Contracts;
- (iii) Article 3(2) and (4) of the Croatia BIT by impairing through unreasonable and discriminatory measures the use and enjoyment of the Claimants' investment and by failing to grant the necessary permits to carry out an investment already authorized; and

(iv) Article 4 of the BIT by expropriating their investment.

106. The alleged breaches of the Denmark and Croatia BITs are based on the MFN clause of the BIT. The Tribunal will now consider each of these claims and the allegation made by the Respondent that the Claimants acted irresponsibly and contrary to the prudent and diligent standard of behavior expected from an experienced investor.

1. Fair and equitable treatment

107. Article 2(2) of the BIT requires that “Investments of investors of either Contracting Party shall at all time be accorded fair and equitable treatment [...]” The Croatia BIT provides that the right to fair and equitable treatment shall “not be hindered in practice” (Article 4(1)). There is no dispute between the parties about the applicability of these provisions, but they disagree on key facts to determine whether the standard of fair and equitable treatment has been breached. They also disagree on the significance of actions taken by the Respondent in relation to the approval of the investment and the execution of the Foreign Investment Contracts, and the significance of the conduct of the Claimants in reaching and executing their decision to invest in Chile.

108. The parties appear to agree on the meaning of fair and equitable treatment, but in view of comments made by them in the memorials, the Tribunal will address this matter first and then will consider the facts underlying the Claimants’ submission for purposes of applying this standard of treatment.

(i) Meaning of “fair and equitable treatment”

109. The parties agree that there is an obligation to treat investments fairly and equitably. The parties also agree with the statement of Judge Schwebel that “the meaning of what is fair and equitable is defined when that standard is applied to a set of specific facts”<sup>60</sup> As defined by Judge Schwebel, “fair and equitable treatment” is “a broad and widely-accepted standard encompassing such fundamental standards as good faith, due process, nondiscrimination, and proportionality”<sup>61</sup>.

110. The parties have commented on whether the fair and equitable standard is part of customary international law or additional to customary international law in reference to recent awards of arbitral tribunals established under NAFTA before and after the interpretation of Article 1105(1) by the NAFTA Free Trade Commission. The Free Trade Commission has interpreted “fair and equitable treatment” as not requiring treatment in addition to or beyond that which is required by the international law minimum standard.

111. The Tribunal notes that Chile has not argued that this is how “fair and equitable treatment” should be understood under the BIT. Chile has simply drawn attention to this interpretation and the consequences it had on the application of the standard of fair and equitable treatment by NAFTA arbitral tribunals. The Tribunal further notes that there is no reference to customary international law in the BIT in relation to fair and equitable treatment.

112. This being a Tribunal established under the BIT, it is obliged to apply the provisions of the BIT and interpret them in accordance with the norms of interpretation established by the Vienna Convention on the Law of the Treaties, which is binding on the

State parties to the BIT. Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention requires that a treaty be “interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.”

113. In their ordinary meaning, the terms “fair” and “equitable” used in Article 3(1)<sup>62</sup> of the BIT mean “just”, “even-handed”, “unbiased”, “legitimate”.<sup>63</sup> These terms are also used in Article 2(2) of the BIT entitled “Promotion and Protection of Investments”<sup>64</sup>. As regards the object and purpose of the BIT, the Tribunal refers to its Preamble where the parties state their desire “to create favourable conditions for investments by investors of one Contracting Party in the territory of the other Contracting Party”, and the recognition of “the need to protect investments by investors of both Contracting Parties and to stimulate the flow of investments and individual business initiative with a view to the economic prosperity of both Contracting Parties”. Hence, in terms of the BIT, fair and equitable treatment should be understood to be treatment in an even-handed and just manner, conducive to fostering the promotion of foreign investment. Its terms are framed as a pro-active statement –“to promote”, “to create”, “to stimulate”- rather than prescriptions for a passive behavior of the State or avoidance of prejudicial conduct to the investors.

114. Faced with a similar task, the tribunal in TECMED described the concept of fair and equitable treatment as follows:

<sup>62</sup> Article 3(1): “Investments made by investors of either Contracting Party in the territory of the other Contracting Party shall receive treatment which is fair and equitable, and not less favourable than that accorded to investments made by investors of any third State.”

“[...] to provide to international investments treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment. The foreign investor expects the host State to act in a consistent manner, free from ambiguity and totally transparently in its relations with the foreign investor, so that it may know beforehand any and all rules and regulations that will govern its investments, as well as the goals of the relevant policies and administrative practices or directives, to be able to plan its investment and comply with such regulations. Any and all State actions conforming to such criteria should relate not only to the guidelines, directives or requirements issued, or the resolutions approved thereunder, but also to the goals underlying such regulations. The foreign investor also expects the host State to act consistently, i.e. without arbitrarily revoking any preexisting decisions or permits issued by the state that were relied upon by the investor to assume its commitments as well as to plan and launch its commercial and business activities. The investor also expects the state to use the legal instruments that govern the actions of the investor or the investment in conformity with the function usually assigned to such instruments, and not to deprive the investor of its investment without the required compensation.”<sup>65</sup>

115. This is the standard that the Tribunal will apply to the facts of this case.

The facts or their significance are controversial and the Tribunal will first describe the allegations of the parties as they relate to them.

(ii) Allegations of the Parties

116. According to the Claimants, the Respondent breached the fair and equitable treatment provisions of the BIT and the Croatia BIT when it “created and encouraged strong expectations that the Project, which was the object of the investment, could be built in the specific proposed location and entered into a contract confirming that location, but then disapproved that location as a matter of policy after MTD irrevocably committed its investment to build the Project in that location.”<sup>66</sup>

Furthermore, to the extent that, as alleged by MINVU, the Respondent was always opposed to the Project even before the signing of the Foreign Investment Contracts, then the Respondent acted “dupliciously and in bad faith, for at that time - according to the MINVU’s argument - the State of Chile had already made a decision to block the Project.”<sup>67</sup> The Respondent disputes such allegations by referring to meetings the Claimants had with Government officials and by questioning the significance attributed by the Claimants to the approval of their investment by the FIC.

117. The Respondent places great significance on the November 6, 1996 meeting with Minister Hermosilla and SEREMI González. The Claimants deny that such meeting ever took place. According to the Respondent, in this meeting, the Chilean officials warned Claimants’ representatives that “the PMRS, which categorically forbade urban development in Pirque, posed a serious impediment to the Project”, and that “because the Project was inconsistent with the goals of the PMRS, one of which was to promote urban densification, the office of the SEREMI would not be able to sponsor the project before the CORE.”<sup>68</sup> The Respondent concludes the narrative of the November 6 meeting by saying that that meeting “should have left MTD with grave doubts about the viability of a real estate project in Pirque. At this point, a reasonable investor would have undertaken rigorous due diligence as to whether, among other things, any further developmental costs were warranted. Instead, despite having been put on clear notice that its proposed Project faced serious risks, MTD proceeded to enter into a joint venture agreement, further solidifying its commitment to the El Principal Project.”<sup>69</sup>

118. The Respondent maintains that, through the many meetings that representatives of the Claimants had with officials of the Chilean Government, the Claimants were informed about the difficulty of achieving a change in the PMRS, that the SEREMI of MINVU had the initiative to propose such change, and that a sectional plan was not the proper vehicle to change the PMRS because it is an instrument hierarchically lower from a normative point of view. The meetings that the Claimants had with various urban planning firms in March 1997 and related correspondence show that already at that time they were aware of the need to re-zone El Principal.<sup>70</sup>

119. The Respondent further alleges that the role of the FIC is only to approve the capital transfer and not the details of the project itself, hence the limited nature of the description of the purpose of the investment. The Foreign Investment Contracts guarantee the foreign investor the same treatment as a national investor and provide that the authorization to import capital into Chile is “without prejudice to any others which, pursuant to such laws and regulations must be granted by the competent authorities.” Therefore, the Foreign Investment Contracts required “MTD to obtain zoning permits, environmental approvals and other applicable authorizations relating to the Project.”<sup>71</sup>

120. As regards claims of Chile’s extra-contractual liability, the Respondent alleges that they “betray a fundamental misunderstanding of the FIC approval process and other provisions of Chilean law”, and contests even the existence of a possibility of extra-contractual liability: if a contract exists, “a claim may only be brought alleging the contractual breach; an additional claim alleging quasi-contractual liability is inadmissible.”<sup>72</sup>

121. According to the Respondent, the FIC is not obliged under article 15(c) of DL 600, as the Claimants maintain, to obtain reports prior to deciding on foreign investment applications except in limited circumstances required by legislation other than DL 600 itself. There is no legal norm or regulation that imposes upon the FIC the obligation to obtain from any other authority a report or pre-approval of a real estate project such as the proposed investment of the Claimants.<sup>73</sup> The FIC is not required either to seek a change in the PMRS after the approval of the foreign investment application. If this were the case, then Article 9 of DL 600 and Clause Four of the foreign investment contracts would be rendered meaningless and the FIC would operate outside the scope of its authority.<sup>74</sup>

122. The Respondent explains that the FIC’s jurisdiction does not “extend to determining the legal, administrative, technical or economic feasibility of those investments, nor does it restrict or limit the authority or jurisdiction of any government agency. The jurisprudence of domestic courts has uniformly recognized the limited jurisdiction of the Committee and the limited scope of the Investment Contract.”<sup>75</sup> According to the Respondent, the Claimants have completely misrepresented the functions of the FIC by assigning to it the character of a “one-stop window”. As explained by expert Feliú, in public law the “principle of lawfulness” requires that, in order for a public body to act as a “one-stop window”, it needs to be so authorized.<sup>76</sup> It was not the FIC’s “duty to reject MTD’s Foreign Investment Application due to restrictions of land use, because the Committee did not have the legal authority to carry out such an evaluation. MTD chose to take the risk associated with its investment, which involved executing an urban development project in a restricted area, while speculating that the policies regarding land use in Chile would be modified in its favor.”<sup>77</sup> The Respondent maintains that the reference to the Municipality of Pirque in the Application does not modify “the authority of the Committee, nor does it make the Committee the underwriter of the viability of the project.”<sup>78</sup>

123. The Respondent also dismisses the argument that it is extra-contractually liable because the Minister of MINVU, as “relevant Minister” under article 13(d) of the DL 600, did not attend the meeting which approved the Claimants’ request. The Respondent maintains that this argument has no basis because under Article 14 the only requirement for a meeting is that a certain quorum be achieved with or without the “relevant Minister”. In any case, it is the SEREMI of MINVU who is responsible for recommending the modification of the PMRS and the SEREMI acts independently of the MINVU Minister. The Respondent affirms further that, if the Minister of MINVU had attended the meeting, the outcome would have remained the same. He would presumably have commented that the project was risky but that in itself would not have been grounds for rejecting the application since the investor had the right to seek a modification of the PMRS: “It is not within the FIC’s authority or mandate to perform a risk assessment with respect to the investments that are the subject of the capital inflows it approves. The resolution of questions involving risk is wholly within the investor’s sphere, and such issues have no bearing on the FIC’s approval or disapproval of foreign investment applications.”<sup>79</sup>

124. The Claimants deny that the November 6, 1996 meeting ever took place and consider that the meeting is “crucial to the Respondent’s case: this is the sole warning that MTD is alleged to have received before committing its investment”. The documents presented as evidence of what was said at the meeting were written in 1998, not in 1996.<sup>80</sup> There are no contemporaneous records of the meeting except for the word “Malaysia” in the appointment book of Minister Hermosilla. The Claimants note that “It is striking that the Respondent’s witnesses – without contemporaneous documentary record of the meeting – now remember details of the discussion so well seven years later, but are unable to recall who attended.”<sup>81</sup>

125. The Claimants point out that the warnings that MTD allegedly received from architects, urban planners and government officials after signing the first Foreign Investment Contract would have come too late.<sup>82</sup> The Claimants also note that, in its Reply, the Respondent does not acknowledge that the President of Chile praised the Project as innovative in September 1997 and the Claimants were never informed that the cancellation of the President's appearance the next day related to the withdrawing of support for the Project.<sup>83</sup> In fact, the reason given was that the President could not attend because of a conflicting meeting with the President of Brazil.

126. According to the Claimants, it was only in 1998 that they were informed about the meeting of November 6, 1996, and that the approval of the investment application only meant that MTD could import funds and that Chilean officials first began to raise environmental concerns: "The Respondent does not explain why these supposedly long-standing and important governmental positions and policies were not communicated to MTD before 1998."<sup>84</sup>

127. The Claimants address the Respondent's assertion that, if they had acted diligently, they "would quickly have discovered that its [their] Project was unfeasible" by pointing out the following flaws: "First, if it was indeed so clear that the Project was not feasible, why did none of the many officials with whom MTD representatives met inform MTD of this impossibility until 1998? Second, the Respondent's 'due diligence' argument is premised on the warnings supposedly given to MTD at the phantom meeting of 6 November 1996."<sup>85</sup> In any case, "If the Project was in fact 'unfeasible' from the beginning, the State of Chile should not have misled MTD by approving MTD's investment application and entering into Foreign Investment Contracts with MTD based on the illusory promise of a housing project in Pirque. If, on the other hand, the Project

was not an impossibility, the Respondent should not have rejected MTD's requests for necessary approvals on the pretext that the applicable norms necessarily preclude any urban development in Pirque."<sup>86</sup>

128. The Claimants also note that the Counter-Memorial overlooks the description of the Project in the application to the FIC, and, instead, focuses on the capital contribution section. It is clear from the project description section and the Second Clause of the Foreign Investment Contract, which are essentially the same, that the project and its location are clearly identified and the contract states that the purpose of the investment is exclusive and it could only be modified with the prior authorization of FIC.<sup>87</sup>

129. The Claimants address the Respondent's explanation that the specific identification of the project in a foreign investment contract lacks significance and state that: "No Governmental official told MTD of any such limitation before signing the Foreign Investment Contracts." The opinions of the experts submitted with the Counter-Memorial and the testimony of Mr. Moyano focus on the fact that a foreign investment contract does not automatically provide all governmental approvals necessary to realize a project, but "they do not address the different question presented by this case: Whether the state of Chile may properly enter into a binding foreign investment contract that specifies the purposes and location of a particular investment project while, at the same time, knowing (and not telling the investor) that the Government will never allow the investor to carry out the project that is the premise of the contract.”<sup>88</sup>

130. The Claimants point out that although the Respondent refused to provide copies of the minutes of the FIC meetings, it did provide records of attendance that show that Ministers who were not permanent members of the FIC attended some meetings, “presumably to discuss and vote upon foreign investment applications that were relevant to their areas of responsibility, as required by Article 13 of DL 600.”<sup>89</sup> According to the Claimants, if “the role of the FIC were simply to approve the inflow of funds (as opposed to approving an investment for a particular project), then it would have been unnecessary and illogical for DL 600: (i) to provide that a Minister who is not a permanent member of the FIC is nevertheless a member for purposes of considering applications that are relevant to that Ministry’s work; and (ii) to require the Executive Vice President of the FIC to coordinate with other government agencies concerning information and authorizations.”<sup>90</sup> Furthermore, the Respondent is obliged to ensure under article 15(a) of the DL 600 that the FIC coordinates and consults with Ministries concerned. Although requested by the Claimants, the Respondent was not able to find any “responsive” documents.<sup>91</sup>

131. The Claimants argue that the Respondent’s position is inconsistent with the availability of other procedures for bringing foreign capital into Chile without signing

a foreign investment contract and without necessarily identifying the object and purpose of their investment: “If the FIC’s role were limited to approval of the inflow of funds there would be no need for the FIC, because the Central Bank of Chile already has authority to [sic] the inflow of funds without consideration of the underlying project.”<sup>92</sup> The position of the Respondent is also inconsistent with the terms of the Foreign Investment Contract: “If the object of the contract were limited to the inflow of funds, the contract would not need to specify the purpose of the investment, or provide that the purpose of the investment can be changed only with the FIC’s approval.”<sup>93</sup>

132. As regards Clause Four of the Foreign Investment Contract, the Claimants point out that “It is one thing to argue that MTD must still satisfy norms and other requirements in the process of realizing the [P]roject – which MTD always understood. It is quite another matter for the Respondent to argue that Clause Fourth [sic] entitled it to approve and accept MTD’s investment in Chile while knowing that the premise of the contract could never be realized.”<sup>94</sup>

133. The Claimants note that the Respondent has not presented contemporaneous evidence to support the alleged actual reasons for the withdrawal of the speech of the President at the inauguration of the Project: “If the President’s office had “withdrawn” the text of a presidential speech that he sent to be read at the inauguration ceremony, it would be reasonable to expect some record of such withdrawal. And if MTD had used a presidential speech without permission, surely the Chilean Government would

have taken some action at least to indicate its displeasure. By contrast, the Claimants have submitted to the Tribunal a copy of the fax that they received from the Government with the approved words of President Frei's message."<sup>95</sup>

134. The Claimants take issue with the statement of the Respondent that "the laws and regulations that govern urban planning and development in Chile – and in particular modifications to the PMRS – are simple and transparent."<sup>96</sup> It is the opinion of the Claimants that contrary to what the Respondent maintains, a sectional plan was an appropriate instrument to modify the PMRS. According to them, this instrument proposed by a municipality is not dependent on the MINVU for its initiation or completion: "When a sectional plan is filed with the MINVU, the SEREMI is required to analyze the request and forward it to the CORE with a favorable or unfavorable report."<sup>97</sup>

135. The Claimants point out that uncertainty and confusion in the urban planning and development are also evident in respect of the recently proposed Modification No. 48 to the PMRS.<sup>98</sup> The CORE approved said modification by Resolution No. 14/2003. However, the Contraloría General has refused to accept the legality of the resolution "ruling that the CORE exceeded its authority by attempting to regulate rural lands located outside of the established urban limits."<sup>99</sup> The decision has been appealed by CORE..

136. In the opinion of the Claimants, Modification No. 48 contradicts the arguments of the Respondent as regards the uniqueness of Pirque from an environmental point of view: “It demonstrates that Pirque is not a unique “key sector” that must be exempted from urban development to protect the so called “environmental filter” of the Santiago metropolitan region.”<sup>100</sup> The Claimants point out that it is striking that “MINVU chose to submit a Declaración de Impacto Ambiental (“DIA”), which involves a lower level of environmental analysis than an EIS, even though Modification No. 48 would introduce sweeping changes to the use of land throughout the Santiago Metropolitan Region, affecting over 34,000 hectares in comparison with the 600 hectares covered by the Municipality of Pirque’s sectional plan. Further, the MINVU’s DIA is much more vague and general than the EIS submitted with the sectional plan. Yet, in stark contrast to the way the COREMA treated the EIS submitted by the Municipality of Pirque, the COREMA concluded, after evaluating the DIA submitted by MINVU, that the proposed modification of the PMRS would not generate any relevant adverse environmental impacts.”<sup>101</sup>

137. The Claimants consider “disingenuous” the argument put forward by the Respondent to the effect that the Claimants should have requested an amendment of the PMRS instead of designing a sectional plan “because the Respondent made clear that it would not allow realization of the Project under any procedure. MTD and the Municipality of Pirque attempted the procedure of a sectional plan only after the MINVU indicated that it would not initiate such a change itself and the Respondent, through the

MINVU, declined repeatedly to provide any guidance regarding the proper procedures to be followed to modify the PMRS.”<sup>102</sup>

138. The Respondent argues that the Claimants cannot excuse their failure to comply with the law by alleging ignorance of the law. The law was clear, the plot of land in the Fundo El Principal was exclusively for silvoagropecuaria use and the foreign investment contracts grant investors only the authorizations provided therein.<sup>103</sup> Referring to the cases decided by other arbitral tribunals relied on by the Claimants, the Respondent affirms that “[i]n contrast, MTD never had any right to carry out its Project, which was always contingent on the obtaining of the relevant authorizations by means of the procedure established by law. MTD did not understand or did not want to understand the regulations in force, choosing instead to follow procedures clearly contrary to the law.”<sup>104</sup>

139. The Respondent points out that the two communications of 1998 that refer to the November 6, 1996 meeting “were prepared and sent before any controversy existed between MTD and the Government, which thus belying [sic] MTD’s argument that this meeting has been fabricated by the Government.”<sup>105</sup> The Respondent also addresses the Claimants’ assertion that they did not receive any warning regarding the feasibility of their investment project before signing the Foreign Investment Contract and that if “MTD had been told in 1996 that the Project was not feasible, it would never have invested in the Project.” The Respondent comments that “this argument is based on an erroneous assumption that the Government of Chile had the obligation to warn MTD about the feasibility of its project before it invested. In fact, it was MTD that had the obligation to obtain the necessary information regarding the legal and technical feasibility of its project. This is particularly true, given that this information was public, transparent, and readily available.”<sup>106</sup> The Respondent points out the failure of the Claimants to mention that, “under the legislation in force at that time, it was possible, though difficult and not guaranteed, to obtain a modification of the PMRS, and that MTD tried to obtain such a modification by means of an erroneous procedure that necessarily led to its rejection.”<sup>107</sup>

140. The Respondent rebuts the argument that their officials were unresponsive to the Claimants’ requests for assistance. In fact, “Due to the evident lack of competence of MTD’s consultants, Mr. Carvacho and Mr. Leppe offered to assist the company by guiding them through the steps necessary to attempt a modification of the PMRS, but MTD never took them up on this offer.”<sup>108</sup>

141. The Respondent reaffirms that it had no obligation to modify the PMRS and to allow the Project to proceed. Every step taken by the Respondent’s officials was taken in accordance to the law, including the rejection of the Sectional Plan. Sectional plans cannot alter or modify the norm established by instruments of a higher hierarchy and the modification of the PMRS was inconvenient because the MINVU SEREMI was undertaking the study of the Regional Plan of Urban Development (“PRDU”). As

explained by the Respondent, “The PRDU is the urban planning instrument that establishes the roles of the urban centers, their gravitational areas of reciprocal influence, gravitational relations, and growth targets, among others.”<sup>109</sup> The study of PRDU for the Santiago Metropolitan Region had began in 1994 after the entry into force of the PMRS, and “it was being analyzed in 1998.”<sup>110</sup>

142. The contention that, according to Chilean law, the SEREMI had an obligation to forward the sectional plan to the CORE contradicts the LGUC which establishes the legal procedure for the elaboration of the norms of the PMRS, “what the CORE approved or rejected was a proposal of the SEREMI and not a proposal of any other agency. The CORE did not have the power to consider or approve planning proposals of any other entities, including the sectional plans presented by the municipalities.”<sup>111</sup>

143. The Respondent admits that “Chilean urban planning regulations are complex, given their highly technical nature, but they are comprehensible, a diligent investor would require competent professional assistance, as would a domestic investor.”<sup>112</sup> In any case, the Respondent argues that “complexity neither excuses MTD’s negligence nor justifies MTD’s attempts to circumvent the legally established procedures. MTD never followed these procedures but rather chose to evade them. MTD presented a Sectional Plan, through the Municipality of Pirque, to modify the provisions of the PMRS, even though it was well informed that [sic] procedure was contrary to the regulations in force.”<sup>113</sup>

144. Respondent defends Modification No. 48 as proof of the evolution of the urban planning framework in Santiago: “Land use regulation and the policies adopted in these matters in the Santiago Metropolitan Area can evolve over time. That evolution is carried out within a transparent administrative system, which mandates consultation with, and approval of, multiple government agencies [...] All the modifications [between 1997 and 2002] were the result of the procedures established under Chilean law and sought the public welfare of all the population.”<sup>114</sup>

145. Chile argues that “The fact that the General Finance office of the Republic<sup>115</sup> has formulated observations to the resolution [sic] approves [sic] that Modification No. 48 does not demonstrate to the ‘uncertainty and confusion related to the rules governing development and urban planning in Chile, [...] it demonstrates the functioning of the administrative regime and the Chilean democracy, and that the mere fact that the authority proposes modifications to the norm is no guarantee they will be implemented. This does not imply arbitrary conduct, but the normal process of creation of standards under a democratic and transparent system.”<sup>116</sup>

146. According to the Respondent, it is wrong to characterize Modification No. 48 as a means to allow large-scale urban development in the area of Pirque. The Respondent maintains that “MTD diminishes the impact of the conditions imposed on the development of new projects. In fact, Modification No. 48 would eventually allow the implementation of Conditional Urban Development Projects, only after the fulfillment of much stricter requirements than those previously imposed on any other housing project in the Santiago Metropolitan Area; the projects would have to be subjected to feasibility studies regarding basic conditions of location, size and profile of the proposal. These studies would be carried out by the municipalities where the project is located, by the SEREMI of Agriculture and the SEREMI of Housing. Subsequently, with the unanimous approval of those three agencies, the project would enter a technical evaluation phase by the SEREMI of Housing, which would have to determine if seven determinant conditions are fulfilled...the mere fulfillment of the requirements established in Modification No. 48 would not authorize the modification of land use.”<sup>117</sup>

147. For the Respondent, it is clear that Modification No. 48 would make it more difficult for large-scale real estate projects to be carried out in areas currently outside urban limits, since, as the Respondent explains, they “would have to go through two different and consecutive stages: first, they will have to fulfill the new requirements established in Modification No. 48 and, second, they will have to abide by the rules currently in place for PMRS modification. Between 1996 and 1998, however, MTD would only have had to fulfill this second stage.”<sup>118</sup>

148. In the Rejoinder, Chile re-affirms its right to require that MTD comply with Chilean environmental and urban planning regulations. The Project “constituted an inappropriate attempt to use a Sectional Plan to modify the land use restrictions established by the PMRS for that Municipality”. This was correctly pointed out by the COREMA and “under article 16 of the General Law on the Environment, COREMA had the obligation to reject it.”<sup>119</sup>

149. From these allegations, three key issues emerge: the significance of the November 6, 1996 meeting, the scope of the approval by the FIC, and the conduct of the Claimants as diligent investors. The Tribunal will now consider them in that sequence.

(iii) The November 6, 1996 meeting

150. The Respondent has attributed particular importance to the meeting allegedly held with “Malaysian businessmen” on November 6, 1996 in order to show the reckless behavior of the Claimants in proceeding to invest notwithstanding warnings of the obstacles that their investment would face. The Claimants contest that such meeting ever took place. As proof of that meeting, there is the word “Malaysia” in the calendar of Minister Hermosilla and reference made to the meeting in two documents of the Respondent dated two years later. There are no briefings prior to the meeting, nor written record of what was discussed, nor any contemporaneous written record of who attended the meeting. Neither Minister Hermosilla nor SEREMI González could determine whether any of the MTD representatives who attended the hearings in Washington were one of the “Malaysian businessmen” that allegedly attended the November 6, 1996 meeting.

151. This notwithstanding, the Respondent has described in considerable detail the terms of the exchanges that took place at such meeting in the Counter-Memorial and the Rejoinder and so did Messrs. Hermosilla and González in their testimony. The Malaysian representatives of the Claimants, except for Mr. Lee, have presented their passports as proof that none of them was in Chile at the time. Mr. Lee lost his passport, but he was present at the Washington hearings when Messrs. Hermosilla and González testified.

152. Given the factual controversy surrounding this meeting, the Tribunal will analyze the situation with and without the meeting and to what extent the conduct of the parties is consequent with the statements allegedly made by Chilean officials and the Claimants’ representatives.

153. The alleged meeting of November 6, 1996 is one of many meetings that took place before and after that date between representatives of the Claimants and Chilean Government officials. Representatives of the Claimants met with Mr. Morales of the FIC on May 16 and with Mr. Guerra of SERVIU on May 17, 1996. The timing of the November 6 meeting coincides with the resumption during that month of negotiations of MTD, through the firm Vial & Palma, with Mr. Fontaine, which led to the signature of the Promissory Contract on November 21, 1996. Hence, the importance attributed to the meeting by the Respondent to show that the Claimants had been warned about the existing difficulties to build the Project by Chilean officials at the highest level and at an early stage of the Claimants' decision-making on the Project.

154. According to the Counter-Memorial, "Upon hearing that MTD had selected Pirque as the location for its Project, SEREMI González informed Minister Herмосilla that the Project was not feasible. Minister Herмосilla conveyed this point to MTD, explaining that the PMRS, which categorically forbade urban development in Pirque, posed a serious impediment to the Project. He added that the PMRS could not be circumvented and that the only way to develop a real estate project in Pirque was by modifying the PMRS."<sup>120</sup> Allegedly, the process for modifying the PMRS was explained to the Claimants at their own request. SEREMI González, "the official with sole authority to initiate the modification process,"<sup>121</sup> explained that "because the Project was inconsistent with the goals of the PMRS, one of which was to promote urban densification, the office of the SEREMI would not be able to sponsor the project before CORE."<sup>122</sup> Mr. Herмосilla also suggested that "MTD find an alternative location for its Project."<sup>123</sup>

155. This record of the meeting provided by the Respondent will be considered by the Tribunal in the context of the subsequent conduct of the parties.

156. The FIC approved the first request of the Claimants for foreign investment related to the Project on March 3, 1997. On March 18, 1997, the corresponding Foreign Investment Contract was signed. A second request for investment was approved by the FIC on April 8, 1997 and another Foreign Investment Contract signed on May 13, 1997. On September 29, 1997, the President of Chile at a state dinner in honor of the Prime Minister of Malaysia praised the Project as innovative and “a tangible demonstration that people may fully profit from the favorable conditions that the governments are creating”. Then the next day the office of the President of Chile sent a public statement in similar terms to be read at the ceremony to inaugurate the Project in Pirque after canceling his appearance because of a meeting with the President of Brazil.

157. The Respondent alleges that the statement of the President intended to be read at the inauguration had been officially withdrawn. There is no evidence of such withdrawal nor of any disclaimer to this effect after the statement was actually read at the inauguration. It is also claimed now by the Respondent that the President cancelled his attendance at the inauguration at the request of the new Minister of MINVU, Mr. Henríquez, and that the actual reason for the cancellation of the President’s attendance was that: “Having learned of the difficulties that MTD’s project faced and of the warnings that his predecessor had imparted to MTD, Minister Henríquez believed that President Frei’s presence at the ceremony could be misinterpreted, and therefore urged the President not to attend.”<sup>124</sup> It is undisputed that the Claimants were not informed at the time of the real reason for the cancellation of the President’s appearance or the alleged withdrawal of his statement. They have apparently learned about it during the course of these proceedings. Given that President Frei spoke at the state dinner only the evening before, there was no reason to suspect that there were other reasons for the cancellation of the President's appearance. The Respondent does not seem to have acted in accordance with the allegedly clear warnings given to representatives of the Claimants on November 6, 1996.

158. The Claimants' own actions contradict also the allegation of what was said at the November 6 meeting assuming that it took place. Irrespective of the inconsequent business decisions taken notwithstanding the alleged clear warnings of the Respondent, a matter to which the Tribunal will turn later, the Claimants, in their dealings with Mr. Fontaine, sought protection in respect of the approval of their investment by the FIC. They conditioned the taking effect of the Promissory Contract to the FIC's approval of the transfer of funds. It would seem reasonable to assume that, if the statements made to them by Minister Hermosilla and SEREMI González had been as clear as alleged, the Claimants would have protected themselves accordingly by looking for another site or canceling the proposed investment altogether. It would have been equally inconsequential for the Claimants to seek the FIC's approval for an investment considered unfeasible by high level officials of the Respondent. The Tribunal will have further to say about the Claimants' diligence.

159. The scope of the approval of the first two investments of the Claimants by the FIC is a key element in the consideration of whether the Respondent fulfilled its obligation to treat the Claimants fairly and equitably and the Tribunal will turn to this question now. At this point, the Tribunal is only concerned with the actual approval of the inflow of funds for the Project and with the fact that Chile entered into the Foreign Investment Contracts with the Claimants. The Tribunal will discuss later the claim that Chile breached the Foreign Investment Contracts and, by operation of the MFN clause, the BIT.

(iv) Significance of the Approval of the FIC

160. The parties disagree on the meaning of the approval of the investment by the FIC under DL 600 and the significance of the absence of the Minister responsible for the sector of the proposed investment from the meeting where the investment was approved. Chile maintains that approval by the FIC does not mean more than an authorization to import funds into the country. The description of the project in the application to the FIC is too brief for it to be significant to the approval of the investment and it would be, in any case, beyond the scope of the FIC's authority to attribute to its approval any other meaning.

161. According to Chile, who attends the meeting of the FIC is not important provided there is a quorum for the meeting and the provisions of DL 600 do not require that the sector Minister concerned be part of the quorum. In fact, according to the Respondent, the practice of the FIC is that the sector Ministers do not attend the FIC meetings except in the case of some sectors, e.g. mining, and that the documents related to an investment are not distributed to the sector Ministers before a FIC meeting nor is notice of the meeting sent to the non-permanent members of the FIC. In any case, argues Chile, even if the Minister of MINVU had attended, the outcome would have been the same given the limited role that the FIC plays. On the other hand, the Claimants consider the approval of the FIC to be the approval of the investment and of the Project at the described location, and to give them the right to develop the site. They attribute to the absence of the Minister of MINVU from the meeting of the FIC that approved the Project, the subsequent obstacles against which otherwise they would have been alerted.

162. DL 600 confers on the FIC the power to approve on behalf of “the Chilean State the inflow of foreign capital under this Decree-Law and to stipulate the terms and conditions of the corresponding contracts” (Article 12). The FIC members are all at the ministerial level except for the president of the Central Bank (Article 13). Decisions are taken by simple majority and a quorum for a meeting requires only the presence of any three members (Article 14). In order for the FIC to exercise its functions, the Executive Vice-Presidency is responsible, inter alia, for the coordination of foreign investments and to carry out and expedite the procedures required by public institutions that must report or grant their authorization prior to the approval of the applications submitted to the FIC (Article 15). The applications require the investor to specify the location of the investment and the requirement is repeated in the non-negotiable standard foreign investment contract. It is this contract that, in terms of DL 600, evidences the authorization of the FIC (Article 3). A change in the location of the investment would require a change in the contract and hence, the approval of the FIC.

163. The Tribunal considers that the ministerial membership of the FIC is by itself proof of the importance that Chile attributes to its function, and it is consequent with the objective to coordinate foreign investment at the highest level of the Ministries concerned. It is also evident from the DL 600 that the FIC is required to carry out a minimum of diligence internally and externally. Approval of a Project in a location would give prima facie to an investor the expectation that the project is feasible in that location from a regulatory point of view. The practice whereby the non-permanent member of the FIC is not notified of the FIC meetings and no information is distributed to the Minister concerned prior to the meetings, when followed consistently, may impair seriously the coordination function of the FIC. This is not to say that approval of a project in a particular location entitles the investor to develop that site without further governmental approval. The Foreign Investment Contracts are clear in that respect and this matter is dealt with separately in this award. What the Tribunal emphasizes here is the inconsistency of action between two arms of the same Government vis-à-vis the same investor even when the legal framework of the country provides for a mechanism to coordinate. This is even more so, if, as affirmed by the Respondent, the presence of the MINVU Minister in the FIC meeting where the investment was approved would not have made a difference.

164. Chile has argued that each organ of the Government has certain responsibilities, that it is not its function to carry out due diligence regarding the legal and technical feasibility of a project for investors, and that this is the investors' responsibility. The Tribunal agrees that it is the responsibility of the investor to assure itself that it is properly advised, particularly when investing abroad in an unfamiliar environment. However, in the case before us, Chile is not a passive party and the coherent action of the various officials through which Chile acts is the responsibility of Chile, not of the investor. Whether the Claimants acted responsibly or diligently in reaching a decision to invest in Chile is another question.

165. The Claimants contacted officials of the Respondent from the very beginning in May 1996. It is only in June 1998, almost two years after the supposed November 6, 1996 meeting, that the SEREMI González informed the Claimants in writing about the policy against changing the zoning of El Principal and modifying the PMRS, and Minister Henríquez rejected the Project. Chile claims that it had no obligation to inform the Claimants and that the Claimants should have found out by themselves what the regulations and policies of the country were. The Tribunal agrees with this statement as a matter of principle, but Chile also has an obligation to act coherently and apply its policies consistently, independently of how diligent an investor is. Under international law (the law that this Tribunal has to apply to a dispute under the BIT), the State of Chile needs to be considered by the Tribunal as a unit.

166. The Tribunal is satisfied, based on the evidence presented to it, that approval of an investment by the FIC for a project that is against the urban policy of the Government is a breach of the obligation to treat an investor fairly and equitably. In this respect, whether the meeting of November 6, 1996 took place or not does not affect the outcome of these considerations. In fact, if it did take place, it is even more inexplicable that the FIC would approve the investment and the first two Foreign Investment Contracts would be signed. Minister Hermosilla and the FIC were different channels of communication of the Respondent with outside parties, but, for purposes of the obligations of Chile under the BIT, they represented Chile as a unit, as a monolith, to use the Respondent's term.

167. This conclusion of the Tribunal does not mean that Chile is responsible for the consequences of unwise business decisions or for the lack of diligence of the investor. Its responsibility is limited to the consequences of its own actions to the extent they breached the obligation to treat the Claimants fairly and equitably. The Tribunal will now address the alleged Claimants' lack of diligence and of prudent business judgment raised by the Respondent.

(v) *The issue of the Claimants' diligence

168. The lack of diligence of the Claimants alleged by the Respondent rests on the trust placed in Mr. Fontaine, the lack of adequate professional advice in the urban sector and the acceptance of an exorbitant land valuation at the time they made the investment.

169. The Respondent contends that the Claimants decided to invest in Chile without conducting meaningful due diligence. They relied on self-serving statements of Mr. Fontaine that the land was unproductive and could be readily re-zoned, "particularly if it would attract foreign investment."<sup>125</sup> If the Claimants had made "even the most rudimentary of inquiries" they would have learned that Pirque actually possesses high-quality agricultural land and plays an important role in the environmental health of the Metropolitan Region. They would have also learned about the PMRS adopted just two years earlier which "expressly prohibited urban development in Pirque and designated it as an exclusive silvoagropecuaria zone."<sup>126</sup> The Respondent finds it striking that the two-man team of the Claimants arrived at its favorable recommendation to invest in Chile after only four days in the country, particularly when it is considered that the investment in El Principal “appears to have been MTD’s first venture outside of Southeast Asia.”<sup>127</sup>

170. The Respondent contrasts the practices of the Claimants with those followed by diligent foreign investors. Normally, “foreign investors routinely seek contractual protections against losses arising from difficulties in obtaining governmental authorizations by incorporating related representations and warranties, covenants, conditions precedent or subsequent, or other protective provisions”.<sup>128</sup> The Claimants proceeded to enter into the Promissory Contract “despite a cursory understanding of Chile’s foreign investment laws, a flawed land appraisal, warnings from government officials regarding land use issues, and apparently no additional professional advice regarding the risks inherent to its proposed development of a satellite city on land restricted to urban development.”<sup>129</sup>

171. The Respondent draws attention to other arbitral awards not mentioned in Judge Schwebel’s opinion. The Respondent refers to the need of an arbitral tribunal to take into account, quoting from the award in American Manufacturing & Trading v. Republic of Zaire, the “existing conditions of the [host] country”<sup>130</sup> when applying the standards of a bilateral investment treaty: “In Chile, zoning modifications, such as those required for the PMRS, involve a lengthy administrative process –a process that Chilean

Government officials explained to MTD at length.”<sup>131</sup> The Respondent also refers to Azinian<sup>132</sup> to emphasize that the Claimants, like the claimants in that case, were “alien to the host State’s business environment, had not secured the resources and services needed to implement the Project, and had not commissioned “any feasibility study worth the name.”<sup>133</sup>

172. The Respondent emphasizes that the Claimants accepted as true the representations made by Mr. Fontaine that the land use restrictions on the Fundo El Principal could be modified and did not carry any further investigation to verify their validity.<sup>134</sup> They also accepted the valuation of the land done by Banco Sud Americano on the assumption that the land would be re-zoned for urban use and without specific identification of the 600 hectare plot that the Claimants were interested in buying.<sup>135</sup>

173. The Respondent criticizes the assumptions underlying the valuation of Mr. Fontaine’s land done by Banco Sud Americano. In the first place, the valuation ignored the limitations imposed by the PMRS and “the appraisers assumed, without any analysis or explanation, that the land in El Principal would be re-zoned for urban use.” According to the Respondent, had the Claimants made “even the most primitive attempt to conduct reasonable due diligence and consult with any urban planner, environmental expert, architect, or, at the very least, a lawyer experienced in real estate development issues, the erroneous nature of the appraisal's re-zoning assumption would have been imparted to MTD's representatives."<sup>136</sup>

174. The appraisal also assumed that the road known as the Paseo Pie Andino would be built within five years, and "improperly suggested that the mere proposal of the unrealized Project raised the value of the land and erroneously assumed that the land could be divided into "parcelas de agrado" of 0.5 hectares." In fact, after the passage of the PMRS, the minimum subdivision possible was four hectares.<sup>137</sup>

175. The Claimants decided on the value of the land only on the basis of that appraisal without considering the specific value of the 600 hectares that would be the basis of the initial investment, or how the value of the land was affected by the existing road system, or applicable zoning restrictions. According to the Respondent, if a more "exacting land appraisal" had been conducted, the Claimants, would have discovered that the value of the 600-hectare area proposed for development under the Project was between US$ 4.1 and US$ 4.6 million.<sup>138</sup>

176. It is clear from the record that no specialist in urban development was contacted by the Claimants until the deal had been closed. The firms contacted thereafter, to the extent that there is a contemporary written record, do not seem to have been as clear as they are now in their testimony about the difficulty of changing the zoning. The only thing that emerges with certainty is that the Claimants were in a hurry to start the Project.

177. The Claimants apparently did not appreciate the fact that Mr. Fontaine may have had a conflict of interest with the Claimants for purposes of developing El Principal. He played lightly to them the significance of the zoning changes and they seem to have accepted at first hand Mr. Fontaine's judgment. The price paid for the land was based on the Project going ahead and it was paid up-front without any link to the progress of the Project.

178. The BITs are not an insurance against business risk<sup>139</sup> and the Tribunal considers that the Claimants should bear the consequences of their own actions as experienced businessmen. Their choice of partner, the acceptance of a land valuation based on future assumptions without protecting themselves contractually in case the assumptions would not materialize, including the issuance of the required development permits, are risks that the Claimants took irrespective of Chile's actions.

2. Breach of the BIT by Breach of the Foreign Investment Contracts

179. The Claimants argue that the Respondent's failure to observe its contractual obligations, "constitutes a breach of its treaty obligation to observe the contractual obligations it undertook regarding MTD's investment. Because the breach at issue is a breach of an international obligation, the matter is governed, first and foremost, by international law. To the extent that the issue turns on the scope of the obligations arising out of the Foreign Investment Contracts, the Contract must be interpreted in accordance with its plain language and the general principles of contract law, in keeping with the internationalization of contract obligations [...] This conclusion is particularly relevant in this case, because the Foreign Investment Contracts do not contain a choice-of-law clause.”<sup>140</sup>

180. The Claimants emphasize the fact that the Foreign Investment Contracts were contracts of adhesion because their terms were not negotiable.<sup>141</sup> The location of the Project in Pirque was “a fundamental assumption of the bargain between MTD and the State of Chile. MTD had a right to that location, and the State of Chile had a correlative obligation to take such steps as might be necessary to permit the use of that location for the development of the Project. The State of Chile breached that obligation by blocking the development of the Project on the ground that it was to be located in the very place designated in the Contracts.”<sup>142</sup> The refusal of the Respondent to re-zone the area concerned “frustrated the rights and legitimate expectations of MTD under the Foreign Investment Contracts and treated the entire Foreign Investment Application procedure as an empty formality.”<sup>143</sup>

181. The Claimants also argue that the approval of the investment in Pirque has the effect of approving the location of the Project and that the reference in clause Four of the Foreign Investment Contracts to “other” authorizations refers to authorizations other

than those granted in the Foreign Investment Contracts themselves: “it would be the height of bad faith to construe Clause Fourth [sic] as giving the State of Chile the power to destroy the basis of the bargain by erasing, after the fact, the very object of the investment as specified in the Contracts.”<sup>144</sup>

182. As regards the obligation to grant the necessary permits for an authorized investment, the Claimants affirm that “the Respondent is obligated under the Treaty to grant the necessary permits to the extent that doing so is consistent with its laws and regulations. The Respondent cannot seriously contend that modifying the PMRS to permit large-scale urban development project in Pirque would have been inconsistent with Chilean laws and regulations, for that is precisely what the Respondent is trying to do, on a far larger scale, through Modification No. 48.”<sup>145</sup>

183. Chile argues that, even if Article 3(1) of the BIT between Chile and Denmark were applicable, it has not been proven by the Claimants that Chile has violated its obligations under that provision and “under international law, the violation of a contract does not suppose an ipso facto violation of an international treaty.”<sup>146</sup>

184. Chile considers that it has complied with its obligations under the Foreign Investment Contracts and that the mere mention of El Principal in the Foreign Investment Contracts did not grant the Claimants an unfettered right to develop the Project in that location. The authorization granted by the FIC under DL 600 is only an authorization to

transfer capital and it is without prejudice and independent from other authorizations that may be required under Chilean law. Foreign investors have no right to a preferential treatment vis-à-vis local investors: “Just as a domestic investor cannot obtain a waiver of the PMRS by executive fiat, neither could MTD.”<sup>147</sup>

185. Based on statements made by Chile in the Counter-Memorial, the Claimants point out that the Respondent refused “for reasons of ‘inconvenience’” even “to consider taking the administrative actions necessary to permit urban development on the piece of land designated in the Contracts, a result that was entirely in its power and discretion to achieve [...] To this it may now be added that, under the Respondent’s own version of the facts, the State of Chile entered into Foreign Investment Contracts with the intent that it would not allow the Project to be built in Pirque.”<sup>148</sup>

186. The Claimants contest that the scope of the Foreign Investment Contracts is governed by Chilean law and that under that law the FIC did not have “the capacity or authority to approve the nature and location of the investment project”.<sup>149</sup> The Claimants state that “Under basic principles of international law, the State of Chile may not evade its international responsibility by invoking any alleged insufficiency in the authority of the organ through which it acted.”<sup>150</sup> The Claimants also contest the argument that DL 600 guarantees treatment as a national investor and that they would have received better treatment if authorization of the investment and the Foreign Investment Contract would

have given them the right to the modification of the PMRS. The Claimants argue that, under the BIT, they are “entitled to certain standards of treatment even if the State of Chile chooses not to extend the same treatment to its own national investors [...] [L]ocal investors are not eligible to enter into foreign investment contracts and hence cannot receive any of the special guarantees or advantages that DL 600 authorizes [...] [T]he principle of non-discrimination under Article 9 of DL 600 protects foreign investors from worse treatment than that accorded to national investors; it does not prevent them from receiving the benefits provided in the foreign investment contracts.”<sup>151</sup>

187. The Tribunal considers the legal basis of the claim valid based on the wide scope of the MFN clause in the BIT, as already discussed. The Tribunal notes the statement of the Respondent that under international law the breach of a contractual obligation is not ipso facto a breach of a treaty. Under the BIT, by way of the MFN clause, this is what the parties had agreed. The Tribunal has to apply the BIT. The breach of the BIT is governed by international law. However, to establish the facts of the breach, it will be necessary to consider the contractual obligations undertaken by the Respondent and the Claimants and what their scope was under Chilean law.

188. The Tribunal has found that Chile treated unfairly and inequitably the Claimants by authorizing an investment that could not take place for reasons of its urban policy. The Claimants have based their arguments on the fact that “the location of the Project was a fundamental assumption of the bargain between MTD and the State of Chile. MTD had a right to that location, and the State of Chile had a correlative obligation to take such steps as might be necessary to permit the use of that location for the development of the Project.”<sup>152</sup> The Tribunal accepts that the authorization to invest in Chile is not a blanket authorization but only the initiation of a process to obtain the necessary permits and approvals from the various agencies and departments of the Government. It also accepts that the Government has to proceed in accordance with its own laws and policies in awarding such permits and approvals. Clause Four of the Foreign Investment Contracts would be meaningless if it were otherwise. Therefore, the Tribunal finds that Chile did not breach the BIT on account of breach of the Foreign Investment Contracts.

189. As already discussed under fair and equitable treatment, what is unacceptable for the Tribunal is that an investment would be approved for a particular location specified in the application and the subsequent contract when the objective of the investment is against the policy of the Government. Even accepting the limited significance of the Foreign Investment Contracts for purposes of other permits and approvals that may be required, they should be at least in themselves an indication that, from the Government’s point of view, the Project is not against Government policy.

3. Unreasonable and Discriminatory Measures

190. The argument of the Claimants regarding unreasonable and discriminatory measures is based on Article 3(3) of the Croatia BIT. This Article provides:

“Each Contracting Party shall protect within its territory investments made in accordance with its laws and regulations by investors of the other Contracting

Party and shall not impair by unreasonable or discriminatory measures the management, maintenance, use, enjoyment, extension, sale and liquidation of such investments.”

191. The Claimants allege that the unfair and inequitable measures described earlier are also unreasonable and that the Respondent’s “refusal to re-zone the El Principal Estate in Pirque to permit construction of the Project is discriminatory because the State of Chile has permitted construction of other large-scale real-estate projects in the Chacabuco area, north of Santiago.”<sup>153</sup>

192. Furthermore, the Claimants maintain that the acceptance and approval of an environmental impact declaration (DIA) by COREMA in support of Modification No. 48 “illustrates the State of Chile’s unreasonable and discriminatory treatment of the EIS submitted by the Municipality of Pirque in support of the proposed Sectional Plan.”<sup>154</sup>

193. According to the Respondent, none of the modifications to the PMRS referred to by the Claimants were achieved through sectional plans and followed the standard PMRS modification procedure. Furthermore, Modification No. 48 “will make the completion of large real estate projects more – rather than less – difficult in the Metropolitan Region of Santiago.”<sup>155</sup>

194. The Respondent finds also inadmissible the comparison of the EIS with the DIA prepared for Modification No. 48. An EIS is only required by the existing

environmental regulation when projects entail significant environmental impacts.<sup>156</sup> In contrast to the environmental consequences of the Project, “Modification No. 48 would not generate direct impacts on the environment, it would set out conditions for the development of future Urban Conditional Development Projects”. Projects presented under Modification No. 48 will still need an EIS and satisfy “a more demanding environmental evaluation than that applied to the Sectional Plan for Pirque.”<sup>157</sup>

195. The Respondent explains the justification given by COREMA to reject the EIS. First of all, the COREMA followed the prescribed procedure. It accepted the EIS for review within five days of receipt because prima facie there were no evident administrative errors. The next step was to consult with other Government agencies with jurisdiction over environmental matters. This is what COREMA did in the case of MTD’s EIS. COREMA issued a negative evaluation regarding the substance of the EIS only after “consulting with other agencies about the environmental impacts of MTD’s Project.”<sup>158</sup> The Project was inconsistent with the PMRS, which for purposes of evaluating an environmental impact study is considered an environmental regulation, and, hence, the Project failed to comply with environmental regulations. The EIS also failed to address identified environmental obstacles and was extremely vague.<sup>159</sup>

196. To a certain extent, this claim has been considered by the Tribunal as part of the fair and equitable treatment. The approval of an investment against the Government urban policy can be equally considered unreasonable. On the other hand, the changes of the PMRS related to Chacabuco or more recently Modification 48, as explained by the Respondent, do not dispense with specific changes of the PMRS when the land is zoned of “silvoagropecuario interest”. Therefore, there is no basis for considering the modifications made to PMRS as discriminatory. The Tribunal is also satisfied by the explanation regarding the rejection of the EIS by COREMA.

4. Failure to Grant Necessary Permits

197. This claim is based on the Croatia BIT by way of the MFN clause of the BIT. Article 3(2) of the Croatia BIT reads as follows: “When a Contracting Party has admitted an investment in its territory, it shall grant the necessary permits in accordance with its laws and regulations.”

198. The Claimants consider that this “clause obligates the State, once the investment is approved, to grant the necessary permits to the investor, in accordance with the country’s laws and regulations.”<sup>160</sup> And further, “At the very minimum, this provision obligates the [S]tate of Chile to grant to MTD such permits as may be necessary to cover those aspects of the investment that were specifically considered by the [S]tate in admitting the investment. Accordingly, if a formal re-zoning permit is required for the development of the Project and if that permit can only take the form of an amendment of the PMRS, the [S]tate of Chile is required by the quoted provision [Article 3(2)] to grant such permit by adopting such an amendment to the PMRS.”<sup>161</sup>

199. While the Claimants realize that permits must be granted in accordance with the laws and regulations of the State and that the PMRS is one such regulation, they consider that, to use such reasoning, misses the point: “It is the modification of the PMRS – which is entirely within the State of Chile’s discretion – that is at issue here. There is nothing in the State of Chile’s laws or regulations that would prevent the [S]tate of Chile from modifying the PMRS to allow the Project to be fulfilled [...] The State of Chile refused to make such modification not because it lacked the power to do so, but because it chose not to do it for reasons of policy. Any interpretation that allowed the State to do just that would turn the treaty obligation to grant necessary permits for an approved investment into a dead letter.”<sup>162</sup> On the other hand, when Chile had the will to modify the PMRS, it found a way to justify it.

200. The Respondent dismisses the Claimants’ statement that no legal norm prevented Chile from modifying the PMRS to allow the carrying out of the Project.<sup>163</sup> If the argument presented by the Claimants were correct, it would “render meaningless that clause of the Chile-Croatia Treaty and the Foreign Investment Contracts – clauses found in countless other bilateral investment treaties and foreign investment contract worldwide – requiring foreign investors to comply with domestic laws and regulations.”<sup>164</sup> Under such theory, “a foreign investor would be able [sic] circumvent the PMRS modification process, while domestic investors could not – a result that would contravene the non-discrimination provision of DL 600.”<sup>165</sup>

201. As to the modifications made to the PMRS, the Respondent affirms that they reflect minor changes that underscore the firm commitment of Chile to respect this instrument. The most significant modification of land use involved re-designating land at La Platina from Ecological Preservation to a Complementary Green Area to allow the construction of a zoological park. The modification introduced by Resolution 39 in 1997 incorporated new lands in the PMRS rather than changed the use of land already in the PMRS, the municipalities of Colina, Lampa and Til-Til in the Province of Chacabuco. Furthermore, “The incorporation of Chacabuco [...] was wholly consistent with the original purpose of the PMRS, which was to allow urban development in Santiago’s north, where Chacabuco is located, rather than in the southeast, where Pirque is located.”<sup>166</sup> Chile does not deny that it can change the PMRS but asserts that it is not obliged to do so, “[t]he simple fact that the PMRS could be modified did not mean that MTD was entitled to its proposed modification.”<sup>167</sup>

202. Chile points out that it is an unexplained indictment of the Claimants that Chile adhered to its urban planning policy: Chile – like any other sovereign State - has the power to establish its policies. In fact, it is a Government’s raison d’être to enact laws that reflect policy choices. MTD was aware of Chile’s policy before it purchased El Principal and has “no credibility to decry that policy now and argue –without support –

that Chile was somehow automatically obligated as a matter of law to change a policy benefiting the millions of residents of [sic] Metropolitan Region.”<sup>168</sup>

203. The Respondent contests the argument that it failed to give the necessary permits and hence it violated Article 3(2) of the Croatia BIT: “Even assuming that article 3(2) [...] is applicable to the present case, Chile has not violated that obligation. Chile has demonstrated that the actions of its officials were not carried for [sic] for extra-legal reasons such as the particular preferences or whims of government officials.”<sup>169</sup> The permits needed for the Project, as found by the tribunal in TECMED in interpreting a similar provision, need to be granted in accordance with the laws of the State concerned,<sup>170</sup> and there is no merit to the contention of the Claimants that, “Because the breach at issue is a breach of an international obligation, the matter is governed, first and foremost, by international law.”<sup>171</sup>

204. The Tribunal considers the legal basis of the claim valid based on the wide scope of the MFN clause in the BIT, as already discussed. The Tribunal disagrees with the Respondent’s statement that there is no merit to the contention of the Claimants that, if there is a breach of an international obligation, “the matter is governed, first and foremost, by international law”. The breach of an international obligation will need, by definition, to be judged in terms of international law. To establish the facts of the breach, it may be necessary to take into account municipal law. In the instant case, the Tribunal will need to establish first whether the Respondent's failure to modify the PMRS to the benefit of the Claimants was in accordance with its own laws.

205. The Tribunal draws a distinction between permits to be granted in accordance with the laws and regulations of the country concerned and those actions that require a change of said laws and regulations. To the extent that the application for a permit meets the requirements of the law, then, in accordance with the BIT and Article 3(2) of the Croatia BIT, the investor should be granted such permit. On the other hand, said provision does not entitle an investor to a change of the normative framework of the country where it invests. All that an investor may expect is that the law be applied.

206. As explained by the Respondent, the carrying out of the investment would have required a change in the norms that regulate the urban sector in Chile. The PMRS forms part of this normative framework, as repeatedly stated by the Respondent. Laws and regulations may be changed by a country but it is not an entitlement that can be based in Article 3(2) of the Croatia BIT. This clause is an assurance to the investor that the laws will be applied, and to the State a confirmation that its obligation under that article is confined to grant the permits in accordance with its own laws. The Tribunal concludes that the Respondent did not breach the BIT by not changing the PMRS as required for the Project to proceed.

5. Expropriation

207. The Claimants affirm that MTD made its investment "after receiving authorization to do so from the State; was forced to halt the execution of its project because it was informed that it lacked a necessary permit; attempted to obtain such permit but the attempts were rebuffed; as a result it was unable to continue with the Project and essentially lost the value of its investment. In these circumstances, the treatment suffered by the investor constitutes an indirect expropriation.”<sup>172</sup>

208. The Claimants argue that their investment has been expropriated by the Respondent in breach of Article 4 of the BIT. The Claimants allege indirect expropriation resulting from actions and failure to act by the Respondent, irrespective of whether “the State intended or not to cause an indirect expropriation.”<sup>173</sup> In making this argument, the Claimants rely on definitions of indirect expropriation by arbitral tribunals in the cases of Metalclad Corp. v. United Mexican States<sup>174</sup> and CME Czech Republic B.V. (The Netherlands) v. Czech Republic<sup>175</sup> and consider that the facts of their case are analogous to Metalclad and Biloune<sup>176</sup>: in these two cases “arbitral tribunals have found that the failure or refusal of the host State to provide a necessary permit to the investor constituted an indirect expropriation.”<sup>177</sup>

<sup>174</sup> “covert or incidental interference with the use of property which has the effect of depriving the owner, in whole or in significant part, of the use or reasonably-to-be-expected economic benefit of property even if not necessarily to the obvious benefit of the host state.” (Metalclad Corp. v. United Mexican States, ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/97/1, Award, 30 August 2000, 103, 16 ICSID Rev.-FILJ 165 (2001)).

<sup>175</sup> “De facto expropriation or indirect expropriation, i.e. measures that do not involve an overt taking but that effectively neutralize the benefit of property of the foreign owner, are subject to expropriation claims. This is undisputed under international law.” (CME Czech Republic B.V. (The Netherlands) v. Czech Republic, Partial Award, 13 September 2001, 604 available at <http://www.cnts.cz/doc10/en/pdf/cme-cr-eng.pdf> (citing Sacerdoti, J., Bilateral Treaties and Multilateral Instruments on Investment Protection, 1997 Recueil des Cours 382 (1998)).

209. Chile is “bewildered” by this claim because “MTD continues to enjoy full ownership of its interest in EPSA, and still has the right to seek zoning and other permits and approvals required under Chilean law [...] MTD remains able to explore investment opportunities in Pirque and has the right to seek a modification of the PMRS, and other urban planning regulations.”<sup>178</sup> The Respondent draws attention to the award in Feldman v. Mexico which found that “not all governmental regulatory activity that makes it difficult or impossible for an investor to carry out a particular business, change in the law or change in the application of existing laws that makes it uneconomical to continue a particular business, is an expropriation.”<sup>179</sup> The instant case does not concern “the change of an existing law or the application thereof. To the contrary, this case merely involves the Republic of Chile’s consistent application of its policies, regulations and laws.”<sup>180</sup>

210. In the same vein, the Respondent contests the reliance of the Claimants on Biloune. There the arbitral tribunal held that “the combination of measures used against the investor constituted constructive expropriation”. In the case before this Tribunal, the Respondent argues that “Biloune simply does not support the theory that the denial of a permit alone or, as in the case of MTD, the absence of a change in zoning, constitutes a constructive expropriation [...] contrary to the facts in Biloune, Chilean Government officials never assured MTD that a change in zoning would be unnecessary or that MTD could proceed with its Project without modifying the PMRS.”<sup>181</sup>

211. The Claimants respond to Chile’s bewilderment about their expropriation claim by pointing out that, by definition, an indirect expropriation claim “takes place when the State deprives the investor of the use and benefit of the investment without formally depriving the investor of title.”<sup>182</sup>

212. The Claimants also contest the interpretation given by the Respondent to Metalclad and Biloune: “MTD received authorization from the [S]tate of Chile to make an investment to develop a project in Pirque, but was denied the ability to proceed with the development because the State denied a key permit [...] Biloune is not a case about the number of acts that a State must undertake against an investment [...] It is the overall impact of the state action on the investment that determines the existence of indirect expropriation. In this case, the refusal of the State of Chile to provide the key permit to allow the development of the Project in Pirque resulted in a complete frustration of the Project and a complete loss of in [sic] the value of MTD’s investment.”<sup>183</sup>

213. The Respondent contests again in the Rejoinder the arguments presented by the Claimants on expropriation and insists on the irrelevance of the cases relied on by the Claimants (Middle East Cement, TECMED) because no license was revoked or permit renewal denied: “MTD has not identified any property right that has been seized by Chile. Moreover, MTD has admitted that it has been judicially compelled to accept an offer ‘approximately equivalent to US $10.069.206’ for its shares in EPSA, which hardly supports their claim that these are essentially without value.’<sup>184</sup>

214. As already stated, the Tribunal agrees with the argument of the Respondent that an investor does not have a right to a modification of the laws of the host country. As argued by the Respondent, “every State has the power to amend any of its laws. The mere fact that Chile can change the PMRS does not mean, however, that Chile is obligated to do so.”<sup>185</sup> The issue in this case is not of expropriation but unfair treatment by the State when it approved an investment against the policy of the State itself. The investor did not have the right to the amendment of the PMRS. It is not a permit that has been denied, but a change in a regulation. It was the policy of the Respondent and its right not to change it. For the same reason, it was unfair to admit the investment in the country in the first place.

V. DAMAGES

215. The Claimants seek “full compensation for the damage they have sustained as a consequence of the State of Chile’s treaty violations, so that the Claimants are restored to the position they would be in had those treaty violations not occurred.”<sup>186</sup>. This entails the recovery of : “(i) the full cost of their investment (minus any remaining value), (ii) pre-award compound interest at a commercially reasonable rate, and (iii) the costs and expenses associated with this proceeding.”<sup>187</sup>

216. Chile contends that the Claimants have failed to prove the alleged losses and their causal link to the alleged breaches. Chile points out several fundamental flaws in their claim. First, they failed to mitigate their losses by entering into the Promissory Contract notwithstanding Minister Hermosilla’s warning in the November 6, 1996 meeting that their project faced serious regulatory obstacles and without protecting themselves against the risks posed by these obstacles. The failure of the Claimants to mitigate losses is a cause of loss not attributable to the Republic of Chile.<sup>188</sup>

217. Chile affirms that preparatory expenses till March 18, 1997 (date of signature of the first Foreign Investment Contract) should not be recoverable. As regards the other claimed losses, almost 80% occurred by transferring the funds to Chile between March 19, 1997 and the meeting held with Minister Hermosilla on May 20, 1997. During that period, architects, urban planners and governmental officials warned MTD that the Project faced serious difficulties and Mr. Hermosilla repeated his early warning.<sup>189</sup> After May 20, 1997 and until September 25, 1998 when the SEREMI confirmed that the sectional plan could not be used to amend the PMRS, the Claimants spent more than US$ 1.4 million: “any reasonable investor would have long since developed serious reservations about allocating additional funds to a questionable investment”.<sup>190</sup> Even after

September 25, 1998, the Claimants continued to spend more than US$ 3.2 million on the Project and then declined to take advantage of an opportunity to recover about half their losses when they rejected the offer made by Mr. Fontaine to buy their shares of EPSA on November 24, 2001.<sup>191</sup>

218. Chile also questions whether the Claimants themselves actually incurred the losses: “Most of the alleged losses – including equity injections, debt servicing, salary payments and various other expenses – are supported by documents relating to MTD Construction or MTD Capital.”<sup>192</sup> Chile also finds that the Claimants have failed to substantiate the fate of the amount injected in EPSA or “explain whether the use of those funds constitutes recoverable losses.”<sup>193</sup>

219. The Respondent contends that there is no legal basis for the claim of interest or bank guarantee charges related to the loan used to finance the investment. Chile relies on the finding of the tribunal in Middle East Cement that “denied costs related to a bank loan taken out by the claimant itself because such costs ‘are normal commercial risks for the Claimant. They could only be claimed if, it were shown that they were caused by conduct of the Respondent which was in breach of the BIT’”<sup>194</sup>. Chile argues that, “[i]n the present case, Claimants not only did not take out the bank loan, but they also failed to demonstrate how a ‘loss’ relating to debt service was a direct result of actions or in actions by the Republic of Chile. Claimants fail to show that they incurred any losses related to debt servicing.”<sup>195</sup>

220. Chile contests the entitlement of Claimants to pre-award interest and maintains that “international law, as a rule, does not allow compound interest”, and that, if the Tribunal should find that compound interest is allowed, then it would be “required to take into account the circumstances of the case and not award compound interest.”<sup>196</sup>

221. As regards the level of the rate of interest, Chile offers the alternative of the average dollar-based “interés corriente”<sup>197</sup> used for bank lending in Chile or the annual average of the London Inter-Bank Offering Rate (“LIBOR”) as more reasonable alternatives to the 8% claimed by the Claimants.<sup>198</sup>

222. Chile also argues that it is unclear how expenses under “salaries”, “travel expenses” or “other” relate to the Project, and why they should be its responsibility.<sup>199</sup>

223. The Respondent considers that the Claimants grossly understate the current value of their investment, particularly the value of the land that according to the valuation of the Claimants’ expert is twenty times less than it was at the time they bought it.<sup>200</sup>

224. The Respondent requests that “the Tribunal order Claimants to bear the expenses incurred by the Republic of Chile in connection with these proceedings, the fees and expenses of the members of the Tribunal and the charges for the use of the facilities of the Centre, in their entirety.”<sup>201</sup>

225. The Claimants note that the Respondent does not dispute the standard of compensation advanced in the Memorial.<sup>202</sup> They object to the interpretation given by the Respondent to the Mihaly award on the issue of preparatory costs. In that case, the tribunal found that “certain preparatory expenses incurred by the investor did not give rise to an ‘investment’ for purposes of ICSID jurisdiction, in circumstances in which the State had made it clear that it did not intend to admit any investment from the claimant until execution of a binding investment contract.”<sup>203</sup> In the instant case, there is no dispute that the investment was approved and three Foreign Investment Contracts executed.

226. The Claimants also comment on the issue of mitigation of damages that precisely “because the great majority of MTD’s expenses are evidenced by its initial investment in early 1997, it was reasonable and consistent with MTD’s obligation to mitigate damages for MTD to continue seeking Government approvals even after it became apparent that Government officials were opposing the Project.”<sup>204</sup> As for the failure to accept the buy-out offer of Mr. Fontaine, the Claimants maintain that such offer

was illusory because of the terms of payment. In neither of the payment alternatives offered by Mr. Fontaine, the Claimants would be able to “cash out” their holdings in EPSA.<sup>205</sup>

227. The Claimants reaffirm that MTD Equity and MTD Chile directly made the initial investment with funds supplied to MTD Equity by MTD Capital: “Contrary to the Respondent’s assertions, MTD Equity directly incurred all other Project-related expenses, either directly through its owned subsidiary MTD Construction or by incurring legally enforceable obligations to its parent, MTD Capital, to repay expenditures that it made on MTD Equity’s behalf.”<sup>206</sup>

228. The Claimants maintain that the debt service and bank guarantee fees claimed as part of the damages are “directly related to the State of Chile’s actions destroying the value of MTD’s investment and denying MTD any opportunity to recoup its costs and earn a return on capital. Because the Respondent’s conduct breached its obligations to MTD under the Treaty, these payments fall squarely into the exception the Middle East Cement tribunal carved out for commercial risk costs that are incurred as a direct result of the State’s misconduct.”<sup>207</sup>

229. The Claimants argue that compound interest is not unfair or inappropriate in the circumstances of this case because “the State of Chile cannot escape the fact that it approved MTD’s application to invest in a project in Pirque and then frustrated that investment. MTD's possession of the land does not diminish its losses. In contrast to the land owner in the Santa Elena case, which was 'able to use and exploit [the property] to some extent,' MTD has not been able to use its investment in the land held by EPSA for any kind of profitable activity."<sup>208</sup>

230. As regards the interest rate applicable to pre-award interest, the Claimants recall that the dispute is not governed by Chilean law and therefore the interés corriente applied by Chilean courts is not appropriate. Similarly, it is not appropriate to apply LIBOR since they invest their dollars in local Malaysian markets: "At a minimum, MTD should be awarded US$ 8.782 million in simple interest at its requested rate of 8 percent."<sup>209</sup> The Claimants also find no merit to "Chile's argument that the 'constructive value' of MTD's 51 percent share in EPSA should be US$ 12.8 million, which is based on a highly inflated estimate of land values and disallowance of most of MTD's investment expenses."<sup>210</sup>

231. The Claimants contest the current valuation of the land in the Sánchez Report commissioned by the Respondent. They allege that the Sánchez Report relies on valuation data for land that is not comparable to the land that EPSA owns. In particular, "Sánchez relies on land values that he acknowledges have been affected by speculation about the pending Modification No. 48, which would permit urban development in Pirque."<sup>211</sup> The Claimants argue that "by relying on prices that may reflect speculation about potential opportunities for urban development if Modification No. 48 comes into effect, the Respondent is permissibly trying to capitalize on the effects of its own actions upon market values. Having denied MTD the opportunity to develop its Project on the ground that no urban development may be allowed, it cannot now take actions encouraging a speculative increase in price and thereby reduce MTD's compensation."<sup>212</sup> The Claimants allege that the "PIX assessment,<sup>213</sup> which values land at US$ 1.27 million, is a more reliable measure of the impact of the State of Chile's refusal to allow development on the land."<sup>214</sup>

232. The Claimants consider faulty the argument that MTD overpaid for its shares in EPSA based on 1996 land values: "To begin with, MTD did not simply buy land; it bought stock in a joint venture engaged in development of a business. The 1996 Palma Kitzing<sup>215</sup> value analysis was based on the valuation of the assets to be used in such a venture, not bare land values, and assumed that the Project would be built. Ironically, the Respondent itself submitted (for very different purposes) the 1995 URBE Report, which estimated the value of the land for investment purposes in 1995-1996 at more than US$ 25 million."<sup>216</sup> In any case, "relying on the Sánchez Report's post hoc analysis as a basis to assess the value of the land in 1996 would be inconsistent with the practice of other international tribunals, which have rejected appraisals that were not prepared at the time the investor was injured."<sup>217</sup>

233. As regards Claimants' costs, the Claimants consider that the Respondent should bear all the costs associated with them because MTD's large investment losses were caused by the Respondent's improper actions.<sup>218</sup>

234. In its Rejoinder, the Respondent contests the additional claim of US$ 3.2 million in interest for "delay resulting from Chile's request for an extension to file its Counter-Memorial."<sup>219</sup> The Respondent argues that "the Tribunal decided [...] that by application of Rules 10 and 12 of the Rules of Arbitration, the 'suspension' included all the issues related to the procedure, including time limits and the actions of the Tribunal. For that reason, the sum of US$ 3.2 million in interest that the Claimants attribute to the State must be rejected, since the procedure was suspended for all the 'issues related to the procedure.'"<sup>220</sup>

235. The Respondent also points out that: (i) the Claimants are entitled to collect damages from their partner, Mr. Fontaine, in the amount offered by him to buy the Claimants' shares of EPSA; and (ii) the Claimants' concerns about the economic difficulties and solvency issues of their partner are of no relevance. The sum offered by Mr. Fontaine must be deducted from the amount claimed, as well as interest from November 24, 2001, the date of Mr. Fontaine's offer.<sup>221</sup>

236. The Respondent clarifies that, in the URBE report, the land was not appraised and this report only calculated the value of the project minus the costs, including the cost of land, a fact omitted by MTD. In contrast, Mr. Sánchez appraised the 600 hectares in El Principal and not the current value of the project, therefore, a comparison between the two is “deceptive and inaccurate.”<sup>222</sup> The Respondent also finds that MTD has not been able to substantiate the fate of the US$ 8.4 million injected into EPSA.<sup>223</sup>

237. The Tribunal will address the following issues regarding damages that emerge from the parties’ allegations:

- (i) Eligible expenses for purposes of calculating damages;
- (ii) Damages attributable to business risk;
- (iii) Date from which interest should accrue; and
- (iv) Applicable rate of interest.

238. The Tribunal first notes that the BIT provides for the standard of compensation applicable to expropriation, “prompt, adequate and effective” (Article 4(c)). It does not provide what this standard should be in the case of compensation for breaches of the BIT on other grounds. The Claimants have proposed the classic standard enounced by the Permanent Court of Justice in the Factory at Chorzów: compensation should “wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and re-establish the situation which would, in all probability, have existed if that had not been committed.”<sup>224</sup> The Respondent has not objected to the application of this standard and no differentiation has been made about the standard of compensation in relation to the grounds on which it is justified. Therefore, the Tribunal will apply the standard of compensation proposed by the Claimants to the extent of the damages awarded.

1. Eligible Expenditures

239. The Tribunal considers that the Claimants have proven that the expenditures related to the Project were made by them or on their behalf and that they were made for purposes of the investment in Chile.

240. The Tribunal considers as eligible for purposes of the calculation of damages the following expenditures:

(i) Expenditures related to the initial investment in the amount of US$ 17,345,400.00.

(ii) The Tribunal has found that Chile's responsibility is related to the approval of the transfer of funds by the FIC in spite of the policy of the Government not to change the PMRS. Therefore, the Tribunal considers that expenditures for the Project prior to the execution of the first Foreign Exchange Contract on March 18, 1997 are not eligible for purpose of the calculation of damages even if they could be considered part of the investment. For the same reason, expenditures made after November 4, 1998– the date on which Minister Henríquez informed the Claimants in writing that the PMRS would not be changed – are also to be excluded from said calculation. The total of expenditures during this period on account of salaries, travel, legal services and miscellaneous items, as detailed in Exhibit 93A submitted with the Reply, amount to US$ 235,605.37.

(iii) The Tribunal considers the financial costs related to the investment made to be part of a business decision on how to finance the investment. As stated by the tribunal in Middle East Cement and referred to by the parties in their allegations: “They could be claimed, if it were shown that they were caused by conduct of the Respondent which was in breach of the BIT.”<sup>225</sup> Since the Tribunal has found that Chile breached its obligation to treat the Claimants’ investment fairly and equitably and this treatment is related to the decision of the Claimants to invest in Chile, the Tribunal considers that the financial costs related to the investment in the amount of US$ 3,888,582.95 are part of the eligible expenditures for purposes of the calculation of damages.

241. The aggregate of the above eligible expenditures amounts to US$ 21,469,588.32. However, the residual value of the investment and the damages that can be attributed to business risk need to be deducted from such amount. The Tribunal will now turn its attention to these matters.

2. Damages Attributable to Business Risk. Residual value of the Investment

242. The Tribunal decided earlier that the Claimants incurred costs that were related to their business judgment irrespective of the breach of fair and equitable treatment under the BIT. As already noted, the Claimants, at the time of their contract with Mr. Fontaine, had made decisions that increased their risks in the transaction and for which they bear responsibility, regardless of the treatment given by Chile to the Claimants. They accepted to pay a price for the land with the Project without appropriate legal protection. A wise investor would not have paid full price up-front for land valued on the assumption of the realization of the Project; he would at least have staged future payments to project progress, including the issuance of the required development permits.

243. The Tribunal considers therefore that the Claimants should bear part of the damages suffered and the Tribunal estimates that share to be 50% after deduction of the residual value of their investment calculated on the basis of the following considerations.

244. Mr. Fontaine has made an offer for MTD's EPSA shares of US$ 10,069,206. The Claimants are, by the terms of their shareholders' arrangements with Mr. Fontaine and as decided by an arbitral tribunal and confirmed by the Chilean courts, obliged to accept this offer or buy him out. For this reason, the Tribunal considers that the price offered by Mr. Fontaine for the shares of EPSA currently held by the Claimants constitutes the residual value of the investment. Because only part of the offer is in cash, the cash value of the remainder on a present value basis is US$ 9,726,943.48.<sup>226</sup>

245. The Tribunal notes that the Claimants had not accepted Mr. Fontaine's offer because it is not a full cash offer and are concerned about the uncertain financial situation of Mr. Fontaine. This is of no relevance to this Tribunal, since the risk of having chosen Mr. Fontaine as a partner should be borne by the Claimants. Chile had no participation in his selection nor has it been claimed that the financial difficulties of Mr. Fontaine can be attributed to Chile. The Claimants themselves have manifested that they knew all along about his financial difficulties. This is a business risk that the investors shall bear.

<sup>226</sup> For purposes of this calculation, the Tribunal has used the US dollar two-year swap rate of May 6, 2004 for a two-year swap effective May 21, 2004 published by Bloomberg. The two-year swap rate represents an interest rate at which semiannual cash flows may be discounted until the maturity of the swap. There are no LIBOR rates for period of more than one year.

246. To conclude, the Claimants should bear the risk inherent in Mr. Fontaine's offer and 50% of the damages after deducting the present value of such offer from the total amount calculated in Section 1 above.

3. Date from which pre-award interest should accrue

247. The Tribunal considers that interest on the amount of damages for which Chile is responsible should accrue from November 5, 1998, the day after Minister Henríquez notified the Claimants that it was against his Government's policy to modify the PMRS.

248. The Claimants in their Reply increased the amount of their claim with the interest accrued during the extension granted by the Tribunal to the Respondent to file the Counter-Memorial. Chile has argued that the additional interest should not be awarded since the suspension was for all the "issues related to the procedure."<sup>227</sup> The Tribunal has awarded interest from November 5, 1998 for the reasons stated above and considers that the extension of the term for the submission of the Counter-Memorial does not have a bearing on this matter.

4. Applicable Rate of Interest

249. The Claimants have requested that the Tribunal apply a compound annual interest rate of 8%. The Respondent has proposed the dollar-based annual rate of interest applicable in Chile or the average annual LIBOR. The Respondent has objected to a compound interest rate as not being in accordance with international law.

250. This being an international tribunal assessing damages under a bilateral investment treaty in an internationally traded currency related to an international transaction, it would seem in keeping with the nature of the dispute that the applicable rate of interest be the annual LIBOR on November 5 of each year since November 5, 1998 until payment of the awarded amount of damages. Based on the rates published daily by Bloomberg, the annual LIBOR on November 5 of each year since November 5, 1998 are as follows: (i) 5.03813 % in 1998, (ii) 6.16 % in 1999, (iii) 6.71625 % in 2000, (iv) 2.24625 % in 2001, (v) 1.62 % in 2002, and (vi) 1.4925 % in 2003.

251. The Tribunal considers that compound interest is more in accordance with the reality of financial transactions and a closer approximation to the actual value lost by an investor. As expressed by the tribunal in Santa Elena: “Where an owner of property has at some earlier time lost the value of his asset but has not received the monetary equivalent that then became due to him, the amount of compensation should reflect, at least in part, the additional sum that his money would have earned, had it, and the income generated by it, been reinvested each year at generally prevailing rates of interest.”<sup>228</sup>

VI. COSTS

252. Taking into account that neither party has succeeded fully in its allegations, the Tribunal decides that each party shall bear its own expenses and fees related to this proceeding and 50 % of the costs of ICSID and the Tribunal.

VII. DECISION

253. For the reasons above stated the Tribunal unanimously decides that:

1. The Respondent has breached its obligations under Article 3(1) of the BIT.

2. The Claimants failed to protect themselves from business risks inherent to their investment in Chile.

3. The Respondent shall pay the Claimants the amount of US$ 5,871,322.42.

4. The Respondent shall pay compound interest on such amount from November 5, 1998 and determined as set forth in paragraphs 249- 251 above until such amount has been paid in full.

5. The parties shall bear all their respective expenses and fees related to this proceeding.

6. The parties shall share equally the fees and expenses incurred by ICSID and the Tribunal.

7. All other claims filed in this arbitration shall be considered dismissed.

Pursuant to Article 7(1) of the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules, the two party-appointed arbitrators appointed Dr Michael Pryles as the third and presiding member of the Tribunal on 11 May 2007. All members of the Tribunal signed an Arbitrators Engagement Agreement.
7. On 17 July 2008, the members of the Tribunal, at the consent of the parties, appointed Ms Leah Ratcliff as the Tribunal Secretary.

Procedural Background

8. This arbitration arises from alleged violations of the Agreement on Encouragement and Reciprocal Protections of Investments between The Kingdom of the Netherlands ("Netherlands") and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic dated 29 April 1991 (the "BIT" or the "Treaty"). On 8 December 1994, the Czech Republic confirmed to the Netherlands that the Treaty remains in force for the Czech Republic as a successor state to the Czech and Slovak Republic. Article 8 of the BIT provides for the settlement of disputes as follows:

Article 8

1) All disputes between one Contracting Party and an investor of the other Contracting Party concerning an investment of the latter shall if possible, be settled amicably.

2) Each Contracting Party hereby consents to submit a dispute referred to in paragraph (1) of this Article, to an arbitral tribunal, if the dispute has not been settled amicably within a period of six months from the date either party to the dispute requested amicable settlement.

3) The arbitral tribunal referred to in paragraph (2) of this Article will be constituted for each individual case in the following way: each party to the dispute appoints one member of the tribunal and the two members thus appointed shall select a national of a third State as Chairman of the tribunal. Each party to the dispute shall appoint its member of the tribunal within two months, and the Chairman shall be appointed within three months from the date on which the investor has notified the other Contracting Party of his decision to submit the dispute to the arbitral tribunal.

4) If the appointments have not been made in the above mentioned periods, either party to the dispute may invite the President of the Arbitration Institute of the Chamber of Commerce of Stockholm to make the necessary appointments. If the President is a national of either Contracting Party or if he is otherwise prevented from discharging the said function, the Vice-President shall be invited to make the necessary appointments. If the Vice-President is a national of either Contracting Party or if he too is prevented from discharging the said function, the most senior member of the Arbitration Institute who is not a national of either Contracting Party shall be invited to make the necessary appointments.

5) The arbitration tribunal shall determine its own procedure applying the arbitration rules of the United Nations Commission for International Trade Law (UNCITRAL).

6) The arbitral tribunal shall decide on the basis of the law, taking into account in particular though not exclusively:

- the law in force of the Contracting Party concerned;
- the provisions of this Agreement, and other relevant Agreements between the Contracting Parties;
- the provisions of special agreements relating to the investment;
- the general principles of international law.

7) The tribunal takes its decision by majority of votes; such decision shall be final and binding upon the parties to the dispute.

9. Disputes having arisen between the parties, the Claimant filed a Notice of Arbitration dated 14 February 2007.
10. In its Notice of Arbitration the Claimant stated that attempts to settle the dispute amicably began on 29 July 2003, including a meeting held with the representatives of the Czech Republic in Prague on 24 October 2003, and that there appeared to be little prospect for an amicable settlement of the dispute.
11. Following constitution of the Tribunal a preliminary hearing was convened on 24 August 2007. At the hearing the claimant was represented by Mr Kenneth Fleuriet and Mr Craig Miles of King and Spalding LLP. The Respondents were represented by Ludek Vrana and Dr Rupert Bellinghausen of Linklaters.
12. Following the preliminary hearing the Tribunal made Procedural Order No 1 dated 30 August 2007 which provided, inter alia, that the language of the arbitration is English and, whilst the place of the arbitration is Paris, France, the hearing will be held in London, England.
13. Procedural Order No 1 also set out the following procedural timetable:

STEP IN PROCEEDING	DATE
Claimant's statement of claim together with all documents upon which it relies and witness statements (fact and expert)	10 December 2007
Respondent's statement of defence together with all documents upon which it relies and witness statements (fact and expert) by 10 December 2007	25 March 2008
Parties to request the production of individual or defined categories of documents, in each instance explaining the relevance and materiality of the request	4 April 2008
Parties to produce the requested documents or provide reasons for non-production	By 18 April 2008
Parties may seek an order for production of a document or documents not produced by the other parties	On or before 23 April 2008
Tribunal to endeavour to decide applications for the production of documents	2 May 2008

Hearing	10–19 November 2008

14. The parties, having each been granted brief extensions of time, provided the following submissions:

Statement of Defence dated 27 March 2008

Reply Memorial dated 18 July 2008

Statement of Rejoinder dated 6 October 2008

16. The Statement of Claim was also accompanied by the following expert reports:

Professor Hyun Song Shin

Associate Professor Raj Desai

PricewaterhouseCoopers

17. The Claimant's Reply Memorial was accompanied by Second Witness Statements from each of the Claimant's fact witnesses and supplementary expert reports from each expert.

18. The Respondent provided witness statements from the following:

Mr Pavel Racoča

Mr Pavel Řežábek

Mr Bohuslav Sobotka

Mr Zdeněk Tůma

19. The Respondent provided expert reports from the following:

Dr Milan Hulmák

Dr Petr Kotáb

Professor Claus-Dieter Ehlermann

Professor Anthony Saunders

Mr Pavel Závitkovský (KPMG)

Mr Jean Luc Guitera (KPMG)

20. The Respondent's Reply Memorial was accompanied by Second Witness Statements from each of the Respondent's witnesses of fact and Second Expert Reports from Professor Saunders, Professor Ehlermann and KPMG (prepared by Mr Pavel Závitkovský).

Discovery/document production

21. On 4 April 2008, both parties requested that the other produce certain categories of documents pursuant to section 6(a) of Procedural Order No 1 dated 30 August 2007.

22. Both parties responded to these requests on 18 April 2008, largely without objection. The Claimant, whilst stating that the "categories of documents requested by the Czech Republic appear overly broad, and the relevance of a number of the categories is neither apparent nor adequately explained", confirmed by letter dated 23 April 2004 that it had produced all of the documents in its possession that were covered by the categories identified by the Respondent. Similarly, by letter dated 18 April 2004 the Respondent produced all documents in its possession that were responsive to the categories, except for documents held by the Czech Office of the Protection of Competition or UOHS to use the Czech acronym ("OPC"), which were subject to formal administrative procedures to facilitate their release. These documents were provided to the Claimant on 16 June 2008.

Security for Costs

23. On 27 March 2008, the Respondent submitted an Application to the Tribunal seeking orders that the Claimant provide security for the Respondent's costs likely to be incurred in this arbitration.
24. On 21 May 2008, the Claimant submitted a Response to this Tribunal objecting to this application.
25. On 3 July 2008, the Tribunal made an Order that it did not have authority to make the order sought in the Respondent's application of 27 March 2008.

Procedural steps as requested by the Chairman to the Tribunal

26. On 3 July 2008, the Chairman of the Tribunal wrote to the Respondent requesting that they provide a table of abbreviations covering all abbreviations used in the Statement of Defence. The Chairman also asked the parties to provide the Tribunal with a list of persons referred to in their respective submissions.
27. On 4 July 2008, the Chairman of the Tribunal requested that the parties provide to the Tribunal, prior to the hearing:
  - (a) an agreed statement of facts;
  - (b) an agreed chronology; and
  - (c) a list of issues to be determined by the Tribunal.
28. On 10 July 2008, the Respondent provided to the Tribunal a list of persons referred to in the Statement of Defence. The Respondent also suggested that the Parties be required to provide the other documents requested by the Tribunal at a date following the second round of Parties' Submissions. The Claimant concurred.
29. By email dated 10 July 2008, the Chairman of the Tribunal deferred consideration of this issue.
30. On 19 September 2008, the Chairman of the Tribunal wrote to the parties requesting that the agreed statement of facts be provided to the Tribunal by 10 October 2008.
31. The Parties were not able to agree upon a statement of facts prior to the Case Management Conference. The provision of this document to the Tribunal was deferred until after the Case Management Conference.

Case Management Conference

32. By the agreement of the parties, the Tribunal postponed the Case Management Conference until 20 October 2008.
33. At this conference, the Tribunal considered a series of procedural matters as listed in the provisional agenda circulated by the Secretary prior to the Conference.
34. Specifically, the matters considered at the conference were the procedure to be followed at the hearing including, inter alia, opening statements, order of witnesses, examination of witnesses, sitting times, equal allocation of hearing time between the parties, restrictions on new evidence, interpreters, transcription, document bundles and restrictions on witness attendance.
35. In respect of the agreed statement of facts the Tribunal decided, by agreement of the parties, that negotiations on an agreed statement of facts would resume and that, where the parties' opinions diverged, their separate assessments of a particular fact were to be set out in the Statement.
36. On 24 October 2008, the parties provided to the Tribunal an agreed statement of facts and detailed hearing schedule.

Claimant's extraordinary submission dated 4 November 2008

37. On 4 November 2008, the Claimant made an extraordinary submission to the Tribunal in relation to allegations made by the Respondent in its Statement of Rejoinder that Principal of Invesmart B.V. submitted to the Czech National Bank ("CNB") "false minutes" of a meeting of Invesmart's shareholders on 16 October 2002.
38. On 5 November 2008, the Respondent submitted a short statement to the Tribunal in reaction to the Claimant's submission.
39. Consideration of the matters raised by the Claimant were deferred until the hearing.

The hearing

40. A hearing took place at the International Dispute Resolution Centre in Fleet Street, London. It commenced on 10 November 2008 and concluded on 18 November 2008. Verbatim transcripts were produced and made available concurrently with the aid of LiveNote computer software.
41. At the hearing the following persons appeared as legal counsel for the Claimant:

Mr Reginald Smith (King & Spalding)

Mr Ken Fleuriet (King & Spalding)

Mr Tom Childs (King & Spalding)

Mr Craig Miles (King & Spalding)

42. , Principal of Invesmart B.V. also attended the hearing as a representative of the Claimant.

43. The following persons appeared as legal counsel for the Respondent:

Ms Karolina Horakova (Weil, Gotshal & Manges)

Ms Barbora Balaptikova (Weil, Gotshal & Manges)

Professor James Crawford

Mr Zachary Douglas

44. Mr Radek Snabl, Ms Marketa Skypalova and Mr Vaclav Rombald attended the hearing as representatives of the Czech Ministry of Finance.

45. Both sides made an oral presentation at the opening of the hearing. At the close of the hearing, the Tribunal decided, by the agreement of the parties, that neither side would make post hearing submissions, except for those relating exclusively to costs.

46. At the hearing all of the above listed witnesses gave evidence and were cross-examined by opposing counsel, with the exception of Mr Milan Hulmák and Dr Kotáb. The Claimant waived its right to cross-examine these witnesses and as a consequence they did not appear at the hearing.

Factual Background

47. In 1990, as a primary step in Czechoslovakia's transition from a communist to a market economy, the Czechoslovakian banking system was reformed. The "monobank" system, in which the central bank was responsible for both monetary policy and commercial banking, was disestablished and privately owned commercial banks commenced operation in Czechoslovakia. Union Banka, which commenced operations in 1991, was one of a number of small banks that were established at this time.

48. The Czech banking system was plagued by instability and severe liquidity issues throughout the 1990s and a number of banks collapsed. In an attempt to address these crises the Czech government initiated three state aid programs, including two Consolidation Programs between 1991 and 1994, and between 1994 and 1995 and a Stabilisation Program between 1995 and 1998.

49. Under the First Consolidation Program the Czech government (and its successors, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic) strengthened the balance sheets of the four largest banks (Komerčno banka, Česká sporitelna, Investicni a Postovno banka (IPB), and Ceskolovenska obchodni banka).
50. On 1 January 1993, Czechoslovakia peacefully dissolved into its constituent states: the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic. The Second Consolidation Program was thus implemented by the newly formed government of the Czech Republic. It was similarly structured to the First Consolidation Program and directed state aid to mid tier and small Czech Banks. A number of insolvent small banks were acquired by other banks with the assistance of the CNB as part of the program.
51. Under the Stabilisation Program state aid was provided to failing banks through Česká Finanční, s.r.o ("CF"), a wholly owned Czech Government entity. Under the stabilisation program the CF purchased participant banks' poor quality (non-performing) assets at nominal value, – a maximum of 110 per cent of the bank's registered capital. In return the bank would, after seven years, repurchase at nominal value any assets that remained uncollected. This arrangement had the effect of offering participant banks a seven year interest free loan. Further, the banks had an obligation to accept and subsequently observe the terms and conditions of a stabilisation plan.
52. The banks were obliged to allocate the funds received from the CF preferentially to well-performing assets having higher liquidity and bearing fewer risks. The implementation of a cautious investment policy should have improved the banks' liquidity and enabled them, in the course of a seven year period, to create sufficient resources to re-transfer the non-performing assets from the CF. A total of six small Czech banks participated in the Stabilisation Programme.

The expansion of Union Banka

53. Against this back-drop, Union Banka expanded its operations within the Czech Republic. In 1995 it underwent internal restructure through the establishment, by Union Banka's shareholders, of Union Group. This became the holding company of Union Banka.
54. Between 1996 and 1998, Union Banka acquired four distressed banks, Ekoagrobanka, Evrobanka, BDS and Foresbank. The acquisitions of Ekoagrobanka, Evrobanka and BDS took place under the aegis of the Second Consolidation Program. These acquisitions were made pursuant to agreements with the CNB whereby the CNB agreed to compensate Union Banka for the difference between the assets recorded on the banks' accounts and the value of those assets as determined by independent audits. The purpose of this agreement was to mitigate the losses Union Banka would have otherwise borne as a consequence of absorbing the non-performing loan books of other banks.

55. In 1998, a dispute arose between Union Banka and the CNB about the terms of their agreement in relation to Union Banka's acquisition of BDS. This matter was settled in December 1999 pursuant to the "BDS Settlement Agreement". The CNB had agreed to compensate Union Banka for 85 percent of the difference between the book value of BDS' balance sheet liabilities and the value of its assets and goodwill, to be established by an independent audit. Compensation was paid but Union Banka subsequently claimed a further amount. When the CNB refused, the bank commenced and succeeded in an arbitral claim. The CNB complied with the arbitral award but in doing so required Union Banka to sign a settlement agreement recording their agreement that the settlement was final and binding.<sup>1</sup>
56. In September 2002, while the principal events at issue in this arbitration were occurring, Union Banka initiated further arbitral proceedings against the CNB in relation to the terms of the BDS Settlement Agreement. Union Banka valued this claim at CZK 1.762 billion. This was recorded in its books on 23 September 2002 (the "CNB Receivable") as is discussed further below at paragraph 110. The CNB won that arbitration in April 2003.
57. Meanwhile, in late 1997, Union Banka entered into an agreement with CF, the state consolidation agency, to acquire Foresbank as part of the broader Stabilisation Program. However, in 1998 Foresbank was taken out of the Stabilisation Program and an alternative set of agreements were concluded between Union Banka and CF.
58. Pursuant to these agreements, Foresbank repurchased its assets from the CF at the nominal value of the uncollected assets, discounted from the original 2004 payment at 11.5 percent per annum (a rate derived from the then prevailing market interest rate). The discounting of the purchase price allowed Union Banka to retain the economic value of the interest free loan. In addition it was agreed that (1) CF would deposit the proceeds from the sale of the loans back to Union Banka, (2) the deposit (known as the "Fores Deposit") would mature on the original 2004 payment date and bear the same 11.5 percent per annum interest rate, and (3) the deposit would be fully secured by Government Bonds. Under the terms of these agreements the Fores Deposit, plus interest, would be worth CZL 1.591 billion to CF at maturity in December 2004.
59. By 2002, market interest rates had fallen to below 4 percent in the Czech Republic and Union Banka was incurring significant losses on the Fores Deposit.

No. 55/98, dated 1 April 1999; Exhibit R-6, Settlement Agreement entered into by the CNB and Union Banka on 27 December 1999 ("BDS Settlement Agreement").

Union Banka's accumulation of related party loans

60. Throughout this same period Union Banka entered into a number of related party loans ("RPLs") with its shareholders or related parties for the purpose of purchasing shares in Union Banka. The majority of these loans were under-secured and non-performing.
61. In its 1998 Audit Report, Union Banka valued the RPLs at approximately CZK 4.5 billion.<sup>2</sup> The CNB took remedial action against Union Banka. However, Union Banka's practice of granting RPLs continued. By June 2000, the CNB quantified the RPLs at CZK 5.461 billion.<sup>3</sup>
62. In January 2001, the CNB took further remedial action against Union Banka and requested that it confine its investment of the proceeds received from repayment of the RPLs or from the sale of Union Group's shareholdings in other companies to assets with zero-risk weighting.<sup>4</sup> On 31 May 2001, Union Banka was fined CZK 2.5 million by the CNB for providing new RPLs to finance the purchase of Union Group shares.<sup>5</sup>
63. As a result of problems inherited from the acquired problem banks compounded with the RPLs, Union Banka became a problem bank itself. It sought to address these issues through state aid.

State aid discussions between Union Banka and CF in 2001

64. During 2001, Union Banka put forward three separate proposals for state aid. Each involved the assistance of CF in cleansing Union Banka's balance sheets.
65. First, in February 2001, Union Banka proposed that CF buy 100 percent of the shares of Foresbank for its liquidation value thereby terminating the Foresbank Deposit early.<sup>6</sup>
66. Secondly, in October 2001, Union Banka proposed that Foresbank would purchase certain of the assets of Union Banka, including a number that Union Banka acquired through the takeovers of Ekoagrobanka, Evrobanka and Foresbank. CF would then acquire the Foresbank for a purchase price of CZK 1.2 billion.<sup>7</sup>

67. Thirdly, in December 2001, Union Banka proposed the transaction which is referred to as the CF Transaction whereby CF would relinquish its deposit arising from Union Banka's acquisition of Foresbank in exchange for a portfolio of under-performing loans.<sup>8</sup> This was effectively a debt for cash swap which was premised on the Government having greater leverage to recover under these loans than Union Banka. The Government could also seek to acquire equity in the debtor companies (which were mostly state owned entities) in service of the loans.

68. In these proceedings the CF Transaction was also referred to as the Foresbank Settlement.

Invesmart retained by Union Banka

69. In late 2001, Union Banka opted for a strategy whereby it would implement a restructuring plan. The primary aim of the plan was to clean up Union Banka's balance sheet, bring its internal governance in line with western banking standards and improve its profitability. In particular, the management of Union Banka aimed to redevelop both its corporate and retail banking enterprises by attracting additional customers and offering a broader range of services including insurance and leasing services.<sup>9</sup>

70. In order to achieve this, Union Banka, with the support of the Czech Government, sought to find an investor that would acquire Union Banka and assist with its restructuring.

71. Invesmart was hired as a consultant to Union Banka on 8 November 2001 to assist with this process. Under the terms of the consultancy agreement between Union Banka and Invesmart, Invesmart was to:

- (i) assist Union Banka in restructuring its debts;
- (ii) conduct due diligence of the bank and its loan portfolio; and
- (iii) prepare the bank for sale to a strategic investor.

72. Invesmart simultaneously entered into a share sale and purchase agreement ("SPA") with certain shareholders of Union Group, effectively acquiring an option to buy their 70 percent shareholding.<sup>10</sup> The Claimant made submissions that the purpose of this agreement was to ensure that initiatives proposed by Invesmart could not be frustrated by shareholders of Union Group or Union Banka.

<sup>10</sup> Exhibit C-38, Share Sale and Purchase Agreement between Certain Shareholders of Union Group a.s. and Invesmart B.V. as purchaser, dated 6 November 2001.

73. Shortly after being appointed as Invesmart's CEO, [redacted] met with Union Bank's President, Ms Marie Parmová. At that meeting Ms Parmová informed [redacted] that the Government and Union Banka were:

in the final stages of negotiating a deal with Česká finanční (the Foresbank Settlement) that would address the problem of the underperforming loans that Union Banka has unherited under the Czech Government's Consolidation and Stabilization Programs and which would also rectify the issue of the excess interest that Union Banka was having to pay on the Česká finanční deposit.<sup>11</sup>

74. In December 2001, Invesmart commenced due diligence to determine the value of the bank. Invesmart hired Ernst & Young to undertake due diligence of Union Banka's loan portfolio. Deloitte & Touche, Union Banka's external auditor, was retained to conduct additional reviews of the bank's accounts, including an audit of Union Banka's books ("2001 Audit").

75. By February 2002, Invesmart was aware as a result of this due diligence that Union Banka had neither properly characterised its RPLs as unsecured nor made adequate provision for the unsecured credit it had extended. Ernst & Young also established that a number of commercial loans made by Union Banka required higher provision than Union Banka had recorded in its accounts.<sup>12</sup>

Invesmart's decision to acquire Union Banka

76. Notwithstanding these disclosures, in March 2002 Invesmart decided to acquire Union Banka in its own right. It planned to restructure the bank itself and then sell it to a strategic investor in the short to medium term.<sup>13</sup>

77. It was from this time onwards that the events that form the basis of Invesmart's complaints in this arbitration transpired. These events include a complex array of communications between Invesmart, Union Banka and various organs of the Czech Government regarding the provision of state aid to Union Banka, as well as regulatory and private contractual steps that were taken by Invesmart to acquire a controlling interest in Union Banka. In order to assess Invesmart's claim it is necessary to consider the various "strands" of events that ultimately led to the revocation of Union Banka's license.

78. These are:

- (a) Invesmart's contractual arrangements with Union Banka and Union Group to acquire a controlling interest in both entities;

---

<sup>12</sup> Exhibit C-40, Ernst & Young Phase II Report on the Proposed Acquisition of Union Group Holding, a.s., dated 12 February 2002.

- (b) Invesmart's applications to the CNB for regulatory approval to acquire a controlling interest in Union Banka;
- (c) Union Banka's growing financial problems throughout 2002; and
- (d) MOF's consideration of Invesmart's request to provide state aid to Union Banka.

The material facts are considered in turn below.

Invesmart's contractual arrangements to acquire Union Banka

79. Invesmart contracted to acquire an indirect interest in the bank through two SPAs ("SPA A" and "SPA B").<sup>14</sup> These were concluded with different groups of shareholders of Union Group on 9 and 10 May 2002. The transactions contemplated by both SPA A and SPA B were structured with the specific purpose of cleansing the balance sheet of Union Banka and addressing the RPL problem.
80. What was known as "SPA A" was an agreement with the selling shareholders to, in the future, purchase 36.24 percent of the shares in Union Group.<sup>15</sup> Invesmart was to pay two of the shareholders CZK 600 million for their shares. Both of these shareholders were debtors of Union Banka and Invesmart was to pay this part of the purchase price to Union Banka and the remainder (approximately CZK 1 billion) to a third selling shareholder. This agreement was unconditional. Invesmart was to place the purchase price in escrow by 17 June 2002 and to unconditionally close the transaction on 24 June 2002, subject to the payment by Invesmart of a contractual penalty of CZK 60,000,000 in case of failure to close by such date.
81. Under "SPA B" Invesmart agreed with the selling shareholders to, in the future, acquire 33.82 percent of the shares of Union Group.<sup>16</sup> Four of the shareholders selling shares under SPA B were also debtors of Union Banka. Their share of the purchase price (approximately CZK 660 million) was to be used to repay the RPLs owed to Union Banka. The remainder (i.e., approximately CZK 500 million) was to be released to the selling shareholders. Under the terms of SPA B, Invesmart was to post a letter of credit under which it would pay the selling shareholders by 17 June 2002. The payment itself was to take place by 9 December 2002.

<sup>16</sup> Exhibit C-46, Share Sale and Purchase Agreement "B" between Certain Shareholders of Union Group, a.s. as Sellers and Invesmart B.V. as Purchaser.

Simultaneously with the posting of the letter of credit, the selling shareholders would move the shares into escrow.

82. Completion of the transaction was conditional on the provision of state aid by 2 December 2002.<sup>17</sup> Relevantly, the agreement contained the following provision:

If by December 2, 2002, Purchaser fails to receive:

a) the approval statement of Government of the Czech Republic to the proposal of the Ministry of Finances of the Czech republic of settlement of the relationship between Česká Finanční, s.r.o and Union Banka, a.s. concerning the programme of stability reinforcement and consolidation of Foresbank, a.s. (now Fores a.s.) then this Contract shall expire on the date of December 3, 2002.

b) the approval statement of the Czech National Bank to indirect acquisition of Union Banka, a.s. ...then this Contract shall expire on the date of December 3, 2002.

83. Together SPA A and SPA B constituted an agreement to acquire 70 percent of Union Group for CZK 2.833 billion.

84. In the following months SPA A and SPA B were amended.

85. In particular, on 27 May 2002 the SPAs were amended such that a cash payment, instead of the letter of credit, was to be deposited in escrow under SPA B on 17 June 2002 and the closing date under SPA A was postponed to 30 September 2002.

86. On 14 August 2002, Invesmart and Union Group's selling shareholders entered into Addendum No 4 to the SPAs. Instead of making payment to the shareholders in exchange for their shares, Invesmart would assume the shareholders' debts under the RPLs "as soon as the CNB gives the approval with the taking over of debts by [Invesmart]". The Addendum was to become effective upon approval by the shareholders of Invesmart. Thus, SPA A had also become conditional.<sup>18</sup>

87. On 14 October 2002, Invesmart and the selling shareholders entered into Addendum No 5 to the SPAs. Invesmart was to assume the debts of the selling shareholders to Union Banka without undue delay. Addendum No 5 was to become effective upon (1) the CNB's approval of Invesmart's acquisition of control over Union Banka and assumption for selling shareholders' debts and (2) approval of Invesmart's shareholders.<sup>19</sup>

Invesmart's applications to the CNB for regulatory approval to acquire Union Banka

88. On 4 April 2002, Invesmart submitted to the CNB the first of three formal applications to acquire a controlling interest in Union Banka.
89. Much is made in the Claimant's submissions about the CNB's ultimate decision to approve Invesmart's acquisition of Union Banka on 24 October 2002. For this reason, it is worthwhile setting out the surrounding facts to enable the CNB's decision to be viewed in context.
90. Pursuant to Czech Law No 215/89 Col. on Banks, Invesmart was required to obtain the CNB's approval before it could acquire a controlling interest in Union Banka.
91. In 2002, Invesmart made three separate applications to the CNB to acquire Union Banka.
92. The first two applications, dated 4 April 2002 and 4 June 2002 respectively, were both rejected by the CNB on the grounds that Invesmart had failed to furnish essential information relating to the source of the funds with which it proposed to acquire Union Banka. This was a significant omission because under Section 9(3)(c) of Decree of CNB No. 166/2002 Coll., dated 8 April 2002, an applicant seeking to acquire an interest in a Czech Bank was required to submit:
- documents on the origin of the applicant's funds from which the purchase of shares of the bank or purchase of a share in an entity through which is acquired indirect share in the bank...is to be covered.<sup>20</sup>
93. The CNB's decisions to reject Invesmart's first two applications were both subject to 15 day appeal periods. These expired on 3 July 2002 and 22 October 2002 respectively. Despite frequent requests by the CNB, Invesmart was unable to provide evidence of the provenance of its funds. Instead, it sought to secure further government support and alternative forms of finance to strengthen Union Banka's ailing balance sheets and complete the acquisition.
94. The following exchange of correspondence in relation to Invesmart's second application is illustrative of this conduct:
- (a) On 2 September 2002, CNB wrote to Invesmart requesting further information regarding the source of Invesmart's funding for the acquisition of Union Banka.<sup>21</sup>
- (b) On 12 September 2002, Invesmart met with the CNB. At this meeting the CNB warned that if Invesmart could not adduce evidence regarding the provenance of its funds its application would be rejected.<sup>22</sup> The minutes of this meeting show that Invesmart informed the CNB that its investors would not commit funds for the transaction until a final decision regarding state aid was taken.

- (c) On this same day Union Banka wrote to CNB proposing that it would fund Invesmart's acquisition of itself by replacing its existing RPLs with a new RPL to Invesmart.<sup>23</sup> This structure was rejected by CNB.<sup>24</sup>
- (d) On 16 September 2002, Invesmart wrote to the CNB requesting additional forms of support from the Czech Government. Specifically, Invesmart requested that the Czech Government "define" the financial commitment it would make to support Union Group's Polish banking subsidiary, Bank Przemyslowy.<sup>25</sup> It also requested a guarantee from the CNB not to withdraw Union Banka's banking licence unless there is a deterioration "of the Bank's financials" related to the activity of the new management. By this letter Invesmart also informed the CNB that:

The Union Group acquisition will therefore be entirely covered by Invesmart with its own asset [sic]. A Board Meeting and a Shareholder Meeting have been called to increase the capital of the company of additional 90 million euro.

- (e) In response to Invesmart's 16 September 2002 letter the CNB informed Invesmart that:

...any [state assistance] is primarily a matter for the Ministry of Finance, requires approval of the Czech Government and must have the support of the Office for Protection of Economic Competition.

95. On 4 October 2002, the CNB denied Invesmart's second application to acquire a controlling interest in Union Banka on the basis that it had not received sufficient information about the source of the funds that Invesmart would use to finance the acquisition. On the advice of Governor Tůma, Invesmart did not appeal this decision. Rather, it waited until the expiration on 21 October 2004 of the 15 day appeal period for appeal of the decision dated 4 October 2002 to submit a new application.<sup>26</sup>

96. On 22 October 2002, Invesmart submitted its third application for approval by CNB for it to acquire a controlling interest in Union Banka.<sup>27</sup> The application included Minutes of an Extraordinary General Meeting of Shareholders that was convened by Invesmart on 16 October 2002.<sup>28</sup> The application stipulated that the meeting was duly held and a resolution was validly approved for a capital increase of "EUR 90 million by way of share premium upon sole request of the Board of Managing Directors of the Company". . . . further signed and contemporaneously submitted to the CNB a declaration by Invesmart that:

The acquisition of 70% of Union Group, a.s. of the value of approximately EUR 90 million will be entirely funded by Invesmart B.V. with its own capital which has been increased by the Shareholders Meeting of the Company on October 16, 2002 and it will be entirely subscribed by shareholders.<sup>29</sup>

97. This was the only information submitted by Invesmart to the CNB as evidence of the provenance of the funds that it would use to acquire a controlling interest in Union Banka.

98. The expiration of the appeal period and the consequential failure of Invesmart's second application received significant public attention in the Czech Republic on 22 October 2002.

99. On that day Mlada fronta Dnes, one of the Czech national daily newspapers, reported that Invesmart had confirmed that it did not appeal against the negative decision of the CNB.<sup>30</sup>

. . . was quoted as saying: "It is very complicated. It cannot be definitively said that we do not continue in our negotiations. We are in contact with the CNB".

100. The CNB also publicly commented on the situation at Union Banka. In the afternoon on 22 October 2002 a spokesperson for the CNB, Ms Alice Frišaufová, made the following comment to the Czech media:

In this administrative proceeding the CNB did not grant its approval to Invesmart for the acquisition of qualified interest in Union Banka because the investor failed to provide the source of funding for the acquisition. As far as this proceeding is concerned, the decision is final. This does not, however, preclude Invesmart from filing a new application and commencing new administrative proceedings on granting the approval with the transfer of the shares.<sup>31</sup>

101. The parties agree that depositors of Union Banka commenced a run on Union Banka on 23 October which caused Union Banka to lose approximately CZK 1.7 billion in deposits.

Invesmart attributes this event to the comments made by Ms Frišaufová. The Czech Republic argues that the run was caused by public uncertainty generated as a result of the expiration of the appeal period of Invesmart's second application.

102. It was in these circumstances that on 24 October 2002 the CNB approved Invesmart's application to acquire a controlling interest in Invesmart.<sup>32</sup>

Union Banka's growing financial problems throughout 2002

103. The October 2002 run occurred at the end of a period of declining financial fortunes for Union Banka. In June 2002 it became apparent, as a result of Invesmart's due diligence, that its financial situation remained impaired by RPLs to the value of CZK 2.5 billion.<sup>33</sup>
104. On 6 June 2002, CNB delivered a report to Union Banka indicating that Union Banka had extended new RPLs to certain of its shareholders and that, as a consequence, significant additional funds (between CZK 160 billion and 1.878 billion) needed to be created by the bank.
105. Invesmart responded by requesting replacement of Union Banka's board of directors. The CNB was informed of this request<sup>34</sup> and by letter dated 4 July 2002 informed Union Banka that it too required that it replace all of the members of its Board of Directors.<sup>35</sup>
106. Union Banka's financial situation continued to deteriorate as Deloitte & Touche sought to finalise its Union Banka's 2001 auditor's report. In the end an acceptable auditor's report for the bank was only secured as a result of two transactions that Invesmart entered to support the balance sheet of Union Banka.
107. First, on 13 August 2002, Invesmart entered into the Receivables Assignment Agreement with Union Banka (the "Receivables Assignment Agreement") under which Invesmart unconditionally agreed to purchase the portfolio of loans earmarked for assignment to CF for a cash payment of CZK 1.2 billion, if by 1 December 2002 CF did not take assignment of these loans. As security for its promise to pay, Invesmart agreed to post a CZK 300 million bank guarantee on the date of signing the Receivables Assignment Agreement. Invesmart's commitment under the Receivables Assignment Agreement, combined with the bank guarantee, thus 'replaced' provisions on the loan portfolio earmarked for transfer to CF for the purposes of the audit. In effect, the Receivables Assignment Agreement removed the CF loans from Union Banka's balance sheet.

108. Secondly, on 14 August 2002, and as is discussed at paragraph 86 above, Invesmart and Union Group's selling shareholders entered into Addendum No 4 of the SPAs. Instead of making payment to the shareholders in exchange for their shares, Invesmart would assume the shareholders' debts under the RPLs "as soon as the Czech National Bank gives the approval with the taking over of debts by [Invesmart]". The effect of this agreement, having been entered into simultaneously with the Receivables Assignment Agreement, was to remove the CF Transaction as a condition precedent to the acquisition of Union Group share by Invesmart.
109. The 2001 audit of Union Banka, dated 16 August 2002, was issued in explicit reliance on the Receivables Assignment Agreement and Addendum No 4.<sup>36</sup> Specifically, the report was qualified by a statement that in Deloitte & Touche's opinion Union Banka might not be able to continue as a going concern absent Invesmart's capital entry into the bank.<sup>37</sup> However, Invesmart did not issue the bank guarantee required under the RAA on 13 August 2002 or at any time thereafter.<sup>38</sup> Moreover, when the 1 December 2002 deadline for the contemplated assignment of the loan portfolio to CF passed and Invesmart became liable under the Receivables Assignment Agreement to pay the CZK 1.2 billion it had agreed to pay, it failed to do so.
110. Union Banka's balance sheets were further supported by the entry of the "CNB Receivable" on its books on 23 September 2002. This "receivable" was based on an amount sought by Union Banka from the CNB which, having been rejected by the latter, resulted in an arbitration claim quantified by Union Banka at CZK 1.762 billion against it.<sup>39</sup> (Union Banka ultimately lost the arbitration in April 2003.) On 22 October 2002, the same day that Invesmart submitted its third application to the CNB and the day before the run on Union Banka took place, the CNB requested that Union Banka de-recognise the CNB receivable in its accounts by 25 October 2002.<sup>40</sup> Union Banka never took this action, even though the recording of a contingent asset such as the CNB receivable was contrary to IFRS Standards.<sup>41</sup>

111. Union Banka also failed to respond to the CNB's 4 July 2002 request to replace its Board of Directors. Consequently on 27 September 2002 the CNB requested that Union Banka replace all members of the Supervisory Board.
112. Mr de Sury and Mr Piga were subsequently appointed to Union Banka's board on 27 September 2002. On 8 October 2002 Mr Vávra was appointed CEO of Union Banka and commenced further due diligence of the bank's loan portfolio.<sup>42</sup>

Negotiations for state aid between Invesmart and Czech Government agencies

113. The documentary record clearly shows that throughout 2002 the MOF was favourably disposed to consider making a grant of state aid to Union Banka. In particular, on 12 April 2002, based on assessments of Union Banka's 2001 proposals, the MOF prepared a draft proposal to Cabinet for the solution of the relationship between Union Banka and CF. This proposal was based on the proposed CF Transaction.<sup>43</sup> The MOF decided not to submit this proposal to Cabinet. Union Banka was informed of this decision in May 2002.<sup>44</sup>
114. Parliamentary elections took place in the Czech Republic on 14 and 15 June 2002.
115. Notwithstanding the parliamentary elections, [redacted] wrote to Minister of Finance Rusnok on 28 June 2008. In this letter [redacted] reiterated Invesmart's intention to proceed with its investment in Union Banka and asked Minister Rusnok to reconsider if the relationship between Union Banka and CF relating to the Fores Deposit could be resolved.<sup>45</sup>
116. Following the elections, with effect from 15 July 2002 a new Minister of Finance, Mr Bohuslav Sobotka, took office. After the change in leadership in July 2002, the MOF was favourably disposed to considering a grant of state aid to Union Banka. On 25 July 2008 First Deputy Minister of Finance, Eduard Janota, wrote to Invesmart stating that:

[The Government]...appreciates [Invesmart's] activity and I may confirm we are ready to discuss your proposal in detail. Please do not hesitate and sent [sic] to the Ministry of Finance and authorised a detailed project prepared in collaboration with Union Banka. Ministry is going to submit it to the Czech government and expects it will make final decision.<sup>46</sup>

117. In August 2001, Invesmart initiated more regular contact with Czech Government agencies and negotiations with the newly elected Czech Government for the provision of state aid to Union Banka commenced in earnest.
118. Invesmart submitted a three part proposal to the Czech Government on 20 August 2002 (the "20 August Proposal"). The key parts of this proposal were as follows:
- (i) settle Union Bank's obligations under the Fores Deposit immediately by payment of CZK 1,134 million (as opposed to the CZK 1,591 million which Union Banka was obligated to pay on 31 December 2004 under the existing contract);
  - (ii) sell problem loans taken over from the 4 small banks in aggregate nominal value of CZK 1.6 billion (purchase price was not specified); and
  - (iii) invest the amount freed by the early termination of the Fores Deposit (i.e., CZK 1,134 million) into subordinated debt of Union Banka of unspecified maturity and bearing an 8 percent rate of interest, to be modified on an annual basis.<sup>47</sup>
119. This proposal was rejected by the MOF on 24 September 2002 at a meeting between the MOF, CKA and CNB. At that meeting Minister Sobotka informed the officials of the CKA and CNB that the MOF would not accept the 20 August Proposal, but that it would be willing to submit an alternatively structured state aid proposal to the Czech Cabinet. Specifically:
- ...the lowering of prospective interest to market rate was proposed for discussion. The MOF was also willing to discuss a reduction in the principal amount of the Fores Deposit by some CZK 400 million through a transfer of problem assets of that amount.<sup>48</sup>
120. Minister Sobotka also indicated that any grant of state aid would be subject to OPC approval.<sup>49</sup>
121. Invesmart was informed of the outcome of the 24 September meeting by letter from the CNB dated 25 September 2002.<sup>50</sup>

122. On 25 October 2002, the day after CNB issued its regulatory approval, discussions resumed between the MOF and Invesmart about the provision of state aid to Union Banka. A meeting took place between Euro-Trend, the consulting group hired by Union Banka on 16 October 2002 to conduct the state aid negotiations,<sup>51</sup> and First Deputy Minister of Finance Dr Doruška.<sup>52</sup> At this meeting Dr Doruška suggested possible forms of state aid. Specifically, a combination of:
- (a) lowering the interest rate on the Fores deposit; and
  - (b) the acquisition by CKA of a portfolio of non-performing loans at a value to be determined by an independent expert plus a mark-up of CZK 650 million, less cost of administration of the portfolio.<sup>53</sup>
123. On 1 November 2002, Union Banka submitted a state aid proposal to the MOF which totalled CZK 1.2 billion (the "First Euro-Trend Proposal").<sup>54</sup> The proposal envisaged:
- (a) lowering the interest rate on the Fores Deposit of 11.5 percent to a rate between PRIBOR and a standard commercial rate;
  - (b) acquisition by CKA of a portfolio of non-performing assets at a price determined by independent experts plus an additional amount of state aid; and
  - (c) withdrawal of the arbitration claim which Union Banka filed against the CNB on 25 October 2002 in connection with Union Banka's takeover of the BDS ( the "BDS Arbitration Claim") discussed above at paragraph 110.<sup>55</sup>
124. On 5 November 2002, a meeting took place between Union Banka, the MOF and the CKA which was attended by Messrs Vávra (CEO of Union Banka), Nekovar (Euro-Trend), Oklestek (Eurotrend), Janota (First Deputy Minister of Finance, Doruška (MOF), Majer (MOF), Řežábek (CKA) and Svoboda (CKA). At this meeting the parties mooted the possibility of a commercial settlement of the BDS Arbitration Claim as an alternative to the First Euro-Trend Proposal.<sup>56</sup> The parties also discussed the regulatory requirement that any grant of state aid would have to be approved by the OPC. Invesmart claims that this was the first time at which this requirement was specified by the Czech Government.<sup>57</sup>

125. On 8 November 2002, the CNB, which had already informed Union Banka that it refused to pay the "BDS Receivable" and had requested the bank to de-recognise it in its accounts by 22 October 2002, again advised Union Banka that it would not recognise nor settle the BDS Arbitration Claim.<sup>58</sup> Due to the CNB's objections, the BDS claim was subsequently removed from consideration as a means of providing state aid. (It was later resurrected by Union Banka in its Restructuring Plans.)
126. On 13 November 2002, the CEO of Union Banka, Mr Vávra, again met with staff of the CNB. At this meeting, Mr Vávra informed officials of the CNB that the new Euro-Trend proposal that was about to be circulated would not include the settlement of the BDS Arbitration claim and that Union Banka would limit its request for state aid to CZK 650 million. According to the statement of Mr Vávra, Union Banka was prepared to limit its request for state aid to CZK 650 million in order to avoid any further delay to the completion of the Foresbank settlement.
127. On 14 November 2002 Euro-Trend submitted to the MOF an amended proposal (the "Second Euro-Trend proposal") for the provision of state aid. This proposal was for the Czech Republic to provide aid in an amount not exceeding CZK 650 million on the following terms:
- (a) the lowering of the interest rate applied to the Fores Deposit to a floating market rate;
  - (b) early termination of the Fores Deposit and its transformation into a five year subordinated debt;
  - (c) the acquisition by the Czech Consolidation Agency ("CKA") of a portfolio of non-performing assets at a price determined by independent experts plus an additional amount of state aid; and
  - (d) a state guarantee of a portfolio of loans.<sup>59</sup>

Invesmart's takeover of Union Banka and Union Group

129. On 18 November 2002, Invesmart officially acquired approximately 60 percent of the shares of Union Group, which owned approximately 75 percent of Union Banka at that time. Invesmart also directly acquired approximately 22 percent of the shares in Union Banka. At the CNB's request, the purchase price paid by Invesmart for the shares in Union Banka was to be used exclusively to pay back Union Banka's RPLs.<sup>61</sup>
130. Invesmart never paid for the shares it acquired in Union Banka.

Continued negotiations regarding State Aid

131. On 28 November 2002, Mr Vávra met with officials of the CNB. At that meeting the CNB informed Mr Vávra that the OPC would provide its opinion on the feasibility of state aid. The CNB informed Mr Vávra that there were three obstacles to the provisions of state aid:
- (a) the "one time, last time" rule, meaning that prior recipients would be denied future grants of state aid;
  - (b) the prohibition against state aid where losses were the result of intra-group transfers; and
  - (c) the aid provided must be sufficient for the bank to continue as a going concern.<sup>62</sup>
132. On 29 November 2002, another meeting took place between representatives of the Ministry for Finance, the OPC, the CNB, the CKA, Union Banka and Euro-Trend. At that meeting the OPC informed Union Banka that it would assess the Second Euro-Trend Proposal against the EC Guidelines on State Aid for Rescuing and Restructuring Firms in Difficulty. The OPC also offered rescue aid to Union Banka. Union Banka did not accept this offer but asked for three months to prepare a restructuring plan that would be verified by its auditor.<sup>63</sup>
133. Following the meeting of 29 November 2002, Union Banka began drafting a new restructuring plan that was directly based on the various EU guidelines relating to state aid.<sup>64</sup>
134. Between 7 January 2003 and 12 February 2003, Invesmart submitted three alternative restructuring plans to the MOF and CNB.
135. The first of these was submitted on 8 January 2003 ("The First Draft Restructuring Plan") along with a third proposal for the provision of state aid (the "Third Euro-Trend Proposal").

The Third Euro-Trend Proposal envisaged that the Czech Government would implement one or more of the following measures:

- (a) a significant decrease of the fixed interest rate on the Fores Deposit or its reduction to zero;
- (b) the early termination of the Fores Deposit and its transformation into five year subordinated debt;
- (c) the acquisition by CKA of a portfolio of non-performing assets at a price determined by independent experts; and
- (d) the purchase of the BDS Arbitration Claim by CF.<sup>65</sup>

136. The First Draft Restructuring Plan identified the settlement of the BDS Arbitration Claim as the proposed mechanism through which the Czech Government would provide state aid to Union Banka.<sup>66</sup>

137. On 23 January 2003, Union Banka delivered a "Second Draft Restructuring Plan" which envisaged the provision of state aid to the value of CZK 1.691 billion which was to be provided via:

- (a) settlement of the BDS Arbitration Claim; or
- (b) a guarantee from the Czech Republic covering a portfolio of non-performing loans.<sup>67</sup>

138. The MOF provided comments on both the First and Second Restructuring Plans at a meeting held on 28 January 2003.<sup>68</sup>

139. On 12 February 2003, Union Banka submitted its third and final restructuring plan to the MOF ("Third Restructuring Plan") in which Union Banka proposed settlement of the BDS Arbitration Claim or, in the alternative, a state guarantee. The settlement of the BDS arbitration was proposed notwithstanding the CNB's clear statement of 8 November 2002 that it would not recognise or settle the BDS Arbitration Claim on a commercial basis.<sup>69</sup> The amount of state aid requested totalled CZK 1.762 billion.<sup>70</sup>

140. The Third Restructuring Plan demonstrated that Union Banka's new management led by new CEO Mr Vávra had carried out an in depth inspection of the bank and had decided to create extra adjustments to cover bad loans worth CZK 1.8 billion.<sup>71</sup> It specifically noted that:

The proposed figures for adjustments and provisions to be created considerably exceeds the previously anticipated figures, primarily as a result of the more realistic approach towards the quality of the assets and risk of the Bank's portfolio adopted by the new management team for restructuring.<sup>72</sup>

The plan acknowledged that new management were of the opinion that Union Banka's situation was more dire than originally expected.

Union Banka's liquidity crisis and the denial of state aid

141. By 19 February 2003, it was clear that there was a growing liquidity crisis at Union Banka. On that day the assistant to Union Banka's CEO, Mr Vávra, sent a letter on his behalf to the Minister's secretary, requesting a meeting with Minister Sobotka within the next 48 hours "in a very urgent and pressing matter 'Crisis in Union banka'".<sup>73</sup>
142. On the same day that his assistant requested the meeting with the Finance Minister, Mr Vávra met with CNB officials. The meeting's minutes reveal the bank's deteriorating situation:

Mr. Vávra referred to the current development in the area of liquidity as to catastrophic (sic). During the last two weeks (i.e., since the beginning of February), the Bank registers a continuous drain of liquidity. The liquidity cushion of the Bank is currently represented only by ca. CZK 550 mln and if the situation doesn't change fundamentally, it will run down completely next week, according to the judgment of Mr. Vávra. (Note: in mid January, the liquidity cushion of the Bank was around ca. CZK 1.1 mln).

According to the statement of Mr. Vávra, corporate clients are leaving the Bank, whereas deposits in the retail area grow; however, the total amount of deposits drain represents ca. CZK 40 mln per day.

Mr. Vávra resumed the measures taken by the Bank to date:

- holdback of credit transactions since October 2002
- active effort to increase deposits by means of advertisement and interest rates increase. (Note: the current deposits interest rates at the Union Bank are in rank 2x higher than those by other banks with the highest rates on the market!)

However, the Bank is not currently able to prevent the deposits drain by the means of the standard market mechanism...<sup>74</sup> [Underlining added; italics and bolding in original]

143. Thus, on the bank's own view, its liquidity situation was "catastrophical". It was plainly facing peril, and if no action was taken to stem the outflow of deposits, it faced the imminent prospect of having to close down.

144. The minutes continue, recording Mr Vávra as advising that:

If reversion in the liquidity situation did not occur and no hope for public support existed, there would be no other choice left than to "return the licence".

In this respect, he [Mr. Vávra] was warned by the CNB that optional termination of banking activities was possible only under the condition of settlement of all obligations. Thus in the current situation would come into question only administrative hearing about the licence withdrawal, because for example legal causes for the introduction of sequestration were not met (the stability of the banking system was not endangered) (sic).<sup>75</sup> [Emphasis added.]

145. Mr Vávra's 19 February 2003 request for liquidity support from the CNB was denied.

146. At 3 pm on the following day, 20 February 2003, Union Banka's Supervisory Board, comprising [redacted] and Mr de Sury, met with Governor Tůma and three colleagues from the CNB.<sup>76</sup> At that meeting, Governor Tůma read them his copy of the Minister's letter denying the aid which he had himself just received. The minutes record that the members of the bank's Supervisory Board were not able to express their opinion regarding the impact of this development on Invesmart's affiliation with Union Banka, "nor the possibility of the bank's shareholders securing its liquidity".<sup>77</sup> They indicated that they would keep the CNB informed of their actions in the next few days.<sup>78</sup>

147. This meeting was followed by a meeting between the CNB and Mr. Vávra at 4 p.m. He too was informed of the Minister's rejection of the restructuring plan. According to the minutes, Mr Vávra informed the CNB of:

...the critical situation of the bank with respect to its liquidity, when deposit withdrawals by particularly corporate clients increased and in average, the value of deposit values is daily decreased by approx. CZK 40 million. By October 2002, the bank had already used all commercial measures, particularly limitation of loan transactions in an active attempt to increase deposits through promotions and increase of interest rates and the sale of quickly liquid assets, but it unable to prevent further outflow of deposits. Other measures, particularly in the area of sale of receivables or repo operations with respect to receivables, are not feasible within the near future and do not resolve the situation of the bank.

...With regard to the above-mentioned situation, the bank is unable to fulfil its legal obligation to maintain solvency and further operation of the bank would only harm the position of its depositors.

The above statement is to be treated as notice under Section 26b of the Act No. 21/1992 Coll., as amended.

3. Mr. Vávra promised to discuss further steps by the bank at a meeting of the board of directors immediately following this meeting and to inform shareholders and the CNB.

4. The CNB acknowledged the above-mentioned facts and considers the eventual decision of the bank to close its branches to be rational. If the bank decides to close its branches, the CNB will immediately notify the Deposit Insurance Fund in order to start the pay-outs of compensation to depositors as soon as possible to minimize the impact on the depositors. Maximum information provided to the public is considered important by the CNB and the CNB is ready to cooperate with the bank in this area.

The CNB is interested in the most orderly exit of the bank from the sector with minimum impact on the bank's depositors and the banking sector ...<sup>79</sup> [Emphasis added.]

148. In the evening of 20 February 2003, Union Banka's management met and decided not to open branches the next day. They informed the CNB about this decision by letter prepared later that same evening, with the time of 7 p.m., in which Mr Vávra and two senior bank officers stated:<sup>80</sup>

...In a situation where the liquidity of the bank is continuously declining and this trend has continued culminating for the last two weeks, we were informed today of the decision of the State not to grant the bank the requested state aid. The decision was publicized during the afternoon and makes a real possibility, according to our recent experience, that a run on the bank will start on 21 February 2003. In accordance with Section 26b of the Banking Act, we have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the bank shall, as a result of the above-mentioned circumstances, in all likelihood become insolvent tomorrow and we give you this information pursuant to the above-mentioned Section 26b.

At the same time, in view of the last consultations with the Czech National Bank, we are taking immediate measures pursuant to Section 26 of the Banking Act and shall limit certain permanent activities, especially, with immediate effect, i.e., with effect from the next following business day – 21 February 2003 – we shall close all branches of Union banka, the clearing centre, etc.<sup>81</sup> [Emphasis added.]

149. The following day, Union Banka closed all of its branches and the CNB initiated administrative proceedings to revoke the bank's licence.<sup>82</sup> The Deposit Insurance Fund was notified that it might be required to compensate the bank's depositors and the CNB commenced administrative proceedings to revoke the bank's licence.<sup>83</sup>
150. It is evident that this notification did not find favour with Invesmart. Three days later, two of the three signatories to the letter, Messrs Vávra and Roman Truhlář, were dismissed and replaced by Mr Michal Gaube and Mr Roman Mentlík. It appears that the reason for their dismissal lay in what [redacted] considered to be "the fact that [the] members of the board of directors whose dismissal was proposed, may take irreversible steps, measures or legal acts that would contradict the interests of Union banka, a.s., its shareholders and clients of Union banka, a.s."<sup>84</sup>
151. There is further evidence of a disagreement between Mr Vávra and [redacted] as to the proper way to proceed. An article in the Czech publication, Týden, dated 10 March 2003, later quoted Mr Vávra as saying that the depositors in Union Banka:
- ...should hope for a quick revocation of Union banka's licence and quick payout from the deposit insurance funds. ... This was precisely my logic, why I closed the bank's branches, because the head of Invesmart [redacted] and the CNB did not do it. The branches were closed by me in order for as much money as possible to be saved. ... [redacted] wanted to continue to keep the bank open. He did everything to make that happen, gave me various orders from his post as the head of the Supervisory Board. I firmly stood behind my view that under no circumstance would I do that.<sup>85</sup> [Emphasis added.]
152. On 24 February 2003, the first two applications for declaration of bankruptcy of Union Banka were filed by creditors with the Regional Court in Ostrava.<sup>86</sup>

Union Banka's attempts to renew its operation

153. On 27 February 2003, Union Banka presented a salvage plan to the CNB for the renewal of its operations.<sup>87</sup> This plan was supplemented on three occasions during March 2003.

154. First, on 3 March 2003, Union Banka filed the plan with the CNB and commented on the CNB's notice of the commencement of administrative proceedings to revoke Union Banka's licence.<sup>88</sup> This plan was based on unverified data. It included a statement that the plan was subject to change pending an external audit to verify the correctness of assumptions and information presented therein.
155. Secondly, on 10 March 2003, Union Banka submitted a supplement to its plan to the CNB.<sup>89</sup> This proposal envisaged Union Banka continuing to operate on a limited licence whereby it would be prohibited from taking further deposits. It would pay out 100 percent of claims by depositors itself and would finance payment of claims by depositors in excess of CZK 5 million per client under a five year loan agreement with the Bank Deposit Insurance Fund ("FPV"). The Czech Government was not satisfied that Union Banka had funds to implement this plan. Further, the proposal was inconsistent with provisions of the Czech Banking Act and the law establishing the FPV.<sup>90</sup>
156. Thirdly, on 18 March 2003, [redacted] informed the CNB that Invesmart had entered into a memorandum of understanding with MTGLQ investors, L.P., a wholly owned subsidiary of Goldman Sachs, to cooperate on a new plan.<sup>91</sup> The CNB was informed of this plan once it had already made its decision to proceed with the revocation of Union Banka's banking license, which occurred on that same day.
157. On 27 March 2003, the FMV applied for Union Banka's bankruptcy before the Regional Court in Ostrava. On 31 March 2003, Union Banka created provisions for debts assumed by Invesmart as requested by CNB, resulting in negative capital of CZK1.29 billion.<sup>92</sup>

The fraudulent bankruptcy proceedings of Union Banka

158. The orderly bankruptcy of Union Banka was interrupted by proceedings commenced on 31 March 2003 before the Commercial Court in Ústí Nab Labem. On that same day Judge Berka, the presiding Judge, declared Union Banka bankrupt and appointed Daniel Thonat as the bank's bankruptcy trustee. On 1 April 2003, Mr Thonat and a group of armed men forcibly entered Union Banka's main office in Prague.

159. It is common ground that these proceedings were fraudulent and were only sustained on the basis of forged documents. For this reason, Judge Berka annulled his bankruptcy decision on 4 April 2004. Further, on 8 April 2003, the President of the Czech Republic and Prime Minister approved the removal of Judge Berka's immunity.<sup>93</sup> Judge Berka was subsequently prosecuted for abuse of power by a public official.
160. On 14 April 2003, Union Banka filed an application for a voluntary composition with its creditors with the Bankruptcy Court in Ostrava and a voluntary bankruptcy petition. The members of Union Banka's Board of Directors who filed the voluntary bankruptcy petition were recalled the same day and the petition for voluntary bankruptcy was withdrawn the same day.<sup>94</sup>
161. On 24 April 2003, Union Banka lost the BDS Arbitration Claim.<sup>95</sup>
162. On 28 April 2003, the Czech Securities Commission ("CSC") requested Invesmart to honour its obligations to purchase shares in Union Banka tendered to it by the minority shareholders who accepted Invesmart's mandatory tender offer.<sup>96</sup>

The revocation of Union Banka's banking licence and the liquidation of Union Banka

163. On 30 April 2003, the CNB Board rejected Union Banka's appeal of the CNB's decision of 18 March 2003 to revoke its banking licence. The revocation of Union Banka's licence became effective on 2 May 2003.<sup>97</sup>
164. On 9 May 2003, the CNB filed a petition with the Regional Court in Ostrava to dissolve Union Banka and appoint a liquidator.<sup>98</sup> On the same day, the Regional Court in Ostrava declared Union Banka to have entered liquidation and appointed Value Added S.R.O. as liquidator.<sup>99</sup> The decision came into effect on 19 May 2003. Union Banka did not appeal the decision.
165. On 17 May 2003, the FTV began making payments to Union Banka's depositors.<sup>100</sup>

167. On 29 May 2003, the Regional Court in Ostrava declared Union Banka bankrupt and appointed Ms Michaela Huserová as bankruptcy trustee.<sup>102</sup> Ms Huserová immediately commenced liquidation of the banks assets, a process which continued until Ms Huserová was removed as Union Banka's trustee following a decision of the High Court in Olomouc that she had been involved in unlawfully selling the assets of Union Banka.<sup>103</sup>
168. On 13 June 2003, Union Banka appealed the declaration of bankruptcy and the decision rejecting its application for composition.<sup>104</sup> Both appeals were rejected.

Invesmart's refusal to pay for shares it acquired in Union Banka

169. Invesmart's refusal to pay for the shares it acquired in Union Banka has been the subject of litigation both in the Netherlands and in the Czech Republic.
170. On 9 June 2004, a bankruptcy application lodged by Union Banka's then bankruptcy trustee Ms Huserová was rejected based on debts owing to Union Banka which Invesmart had assumed as consideration for the shares in Union Group.<sup>105</sup>
171. On 9 August 2004, Invesmart applied to the Municipal Court in Prague to annul its assumption of debts pertaining to Union Banka, claiming the assumption void on account of breach of the Banking Act by Union Banka. This claim is still pending. Invesmart in the same submission sued the CNB for EUR188 million in damages allegedly caused to Invesmart by wrongful official procedure applied by the CNB.<sup>106</sup>
172. On 23 April 2004, Ms Huserová on Union Banka's behalf filed three claims against Invesmart in court for a total of CZK670 million in connection with Invesmart's debt assumption.<sup>107</sup>

173. On 23 February 2005, the Regional Court in Ostrava ordered Invesmart to pay CZK670 million in connection with Invesmart's debt assumption following Ms Huserová's claim filed on 23 April 2004. Invesmart did not pay.
174. On 31 May 2005, Ms Huserová filed a further 15 claims against Invesmart totalling CZK 2.67 billion based on debts assumed by Invesmart as consideration for the shares in Union Group. These claims are still pending.

Jurisdiction

Introduction

175. The Respondent has asserted that the Tribunal does not have jurisdiction to decide the case. In its Statement of Defence, Statement of Rejoinder and at the hearing the Respondent put forward several contentions for its assertion of lack of jurisdiction. In essence, three discrete arguments have been raised:

- (i) the Claimant is not a Dutch investor;
- (ii) the Claimant did not make an investment in the Czech Republic; and
- (iii) the Claimant, through its actions in the Czech courts, is precluded from arguing that it validly acquired the shares in Union Banka and its holding company.

176. The Tribunal will deal with each of these arguments in turn.

Nationality

177. Article 1(b) of the BIT defines "investors" as follows:

- (b) the term 'investors' shall comprise:
  - i. natural persons having the nationality of one of the Contracting Parties in accordance with its law;
  - ii. legal persons constituted under the law of one of the Contracting Parties.

178. It is not doubted that Invesmart is a legal person constituted under the law of The Netherlands. However, the Respondent argues that the Claimant does not have any real connection to the Netherlands and for that reason does not satisfy the notion of an "investor" pursuant to the BIT. The Respondent argues that the Claimant has no real presence and no management in the Netherlands, it being physically located in Italy and controlled by Italian nationals.

179. For its part, the Claimant relies on the wording of Article 1(b) of the BIT and on the fact that it is constituted under the law of the Netherlands. The Claimant argues that there is no "origin of capital" requirement in the BIT and no such requirement may be implied. It notes that the Czech Republic's "origin of capital" argument was rejected by another tribunal's Decision on Jurisdiction of 29 April 2004 in Tokios Tokelés v Ukraine.<sup>108</sup>
180. This Tribunal considers that the words of Article 1(b) of the BIT are clear and that, in the case of legal persons, the only requirement is that the legal person is constituted under the law of one of the Contracting Parties. There is no basis for implying any further requirement. Accordingly the Tribunal decides that the Claimant is an investor within the meaning of Article 1(b) of the BIT.

Investment

181. In its Statement of Defence the Respondent contended that the Claimant never acquired beneficial ownership of the shares in Union Banka and Union Group and made no substantive investment in the sense of committing capital. The Respondent contended that:

[a]s the Respondent has already shown in this Statement of Defence, Invesmart (i) paid no purchase price for the shares, (ii) having agreed (at a shareholder meeting held on 16 October 2002) to a EUR 90 million capital increase in order to allow the Union Banka transaction to proceed, did not increase its capital, (iii) entered into debt assumption agreements in return for the transfer of shares but never met its obligations to Union Banka and Union Group under those debts, (iv) defaulted on its obligation to pay for shares of minority shareholders in Union Banka, which Czech law required it to offer to acquire and (v) is still a party to the Czech Repudiation Claim proceedings in which it argues that the debt assumptions were void ab initio as a matter of Czech law.

As a result, even if it could be established that Invesmart had legal title to the shares in Union banka and Union Group (which is denied for the reasons detailed above), the Claimant never became the beneficial owner of the shares in question because it never performed the obligations which were the quid pro quo of its acquisition of those shares. Accordingly, Invesmart cannot be said to have invested any assets in the Czech Republic as required under Article 1(a) of the BIT. Therefore, Invesmart made no investment protected by the BIT.<sup>109</sup>

182. In its subsequent Statement of Rejoinder, and at the hearing, the Respondent appeared to retreat from its first contention, that the Claimant did not become the owner of the shares, and emphasised the second aspect of its argument, namely that there had been no investment of capital. As far as ownership of the shares in concerned, the decisions of the Czech courts, which are referred to below, would appear to establish, or at least are consistent with, the proposition that the Claimant did in fact become the legal owner of the shares in Union Banka and Union Group.

183. The second aspect of the Respondent's argument focuses on the substance of the investment. The Respondent refers to the preamble to the BIT which states that the Treaty's object is to "stimulate the flow of capital and technology and the economic development of the Contracting Parties". The Respondent maintains that merely acquiring legal title over any kind of asset is not sufficient to bring that asset under the protection of the BIT. The Respondent contends that there must be a commitment of money to earn a financial return. The Respondent states that the Claimant has not paid for the shares and that throughout the lifetime of its activities in the Czech Republic, the Claimant has outlayed no expenditure for the benefit of Union Banka. Indeed the Claimant has instead been reimbursed for its due diligence work and for the living expenses of its representatives operating in the Czech Republic.

184. In support of its argument the Respondent refers to a number of cases including Salini Costruttori S.p.A and Italstrade S.p.A v Kingdom of Morocco,<sup>110</sup> Joy Mining Machinery Limited v Arab Republic of Egypt,<sup>111</sup> amongst others.

185. The Claimant contends that the cases cited by the Respondent are ICSID cases that examine the meaning of the term "investment" in Article 25 of the ICSID Convention, which was purposely left undefined by the drafters. However, the Claimant argues that the definition of investment for the purposes of the BIT is defined and is exclusive.

186. Article 1(a) of the BIT defines "investments" as follows:

- (a) the term 'investments' shall comprise every kind of asset invested either directly or through an investor of a third State and more particularly, though not exclusively:
  - i. movable and immovable property and all related property rights;
  - ii. shares, bonds and other kinds of interests in companies and joint ventures, as well as rights derived therefrom;
  - iii. title to money and other assets and to any performance having an economic value;
  - iv. rights in the field of intellectual property, also including technical processes, goodwill and know-how;
  - v. concessions conferred by law or under contract, including concessions to prospect, explore, extract and win natural resources.

<sup>110</sup> ICSID Case No. ARB/00/4, Decision on Jurisdiction of 23 July 2001; ILM, vol. 42 (2003), p. 609, para 52.

187. It will be seen that Article 1(a)ii expressly includes "shares" in the definition of "investments". The Respondent's contention would require the Tribunal to read in a qualification that there be payment or other consideration for the acquisition of the shares. Moreover it would seem to follow that any consideration however small may not suffice. Would a nominal consideration of say one cent or a peppercorn be any different, in substance, from no consideration? The Respondent referred to the aim of the BIT, as set out in its preamble, which is to stimulate the flow of capital and economic development. If the shares were acquired for a nominal value this could hardly be regarded as sufficient to stimulate the flow of capital and economic development.
188. It would seem, then, that the Respondent's submission, if accepted, would require the Tribunal to embark on an inquiry as to whether the consideration paid for the shares was adequate or perhaps substantial. Such an enquiry would necessitate the Tribunal undertaking an assessment of the value of the investment and the consideration paid with no criteria to guide it. Moreover even if the consideration paid was adjudged to be 'adequate', would there have to be a further assessment as to whether the total amount invested was sufficiently substantial having regard to the aim of the BIT to stimulate the flow of capital and economic development?
189. The Respondent's submission would require the Tribunal to qualify the express words of Article 1 by implying an additional requirement of a qualitatively adequate investment. The Tribunal sees no compelling reason for doing so. The Tribunal considers that Article 1 should be given its plain and literal meaning and that the express inclusion of "shares" as an investment means that the acquisition of shares constitutes an investment without further inquiry.

Preclusion

190. The consideration which the Claimant agreed to provide for its acquisition of the shares was an unconditional promise to pay EUR 90 million to discharge Union Banka's related party loans. The Claimant never made the payment, contending that the whole arrangement was conditional on the Czech Government providing aid to the bank. Subsequently Union Banka were placed in liquidation and the bankruptcy trustees commenced some 18 proceedings against the Claimant seeking payment of the EUR 90 million. The Claimant contended that the share acquisition agreements, and in particular its obligation to pay the EUR 90 million, were void or otherwise unenforceable. Three of these cases have been decided. In each, the Czech courts decided that the share purchase agreements were valid and that Invesmart consequently had an obligation to pay the EUR 90 million consideration.

191. The Respondent argues that the Claimant has adopted fundamentally inconsistent positions in the Czech court proceedings and in this arbitration. In this arbitration the Claimant states that it has made an investment in the Czech Republic and seeks relief against the Czech Government with respect to its alleged breaches of obligations under the BIT concerning that investment. However in the Czech court proceedings the Claimant contends that the debt assumptions, and in turn the share acquisitions, were void with the logical consequence that there could never have been an investment.
192. The share acquisition agreements were entered into between the Claimant and third persons who are not parties to this arbitration. Neither party to this arbitration has asked this Tribunal to determine whether the share acquisition agreements are valid and the Tribunal has not heard argument as to whether it has jurisdiction to do so.
193. In the circumstances, the Tribunal assumes the validity of the share purchase agreements unless and until it is established that another court or tribunal with authority has determined that the share purchase agreements are void as a matter of Czech law. Moreover, the evidence before this Tribunal is that in three decided cases, the Czech courts have held that the share purchase agreements as well as the obligation of the Claimant to pay the consideration of EUR 90 million are valid and enforceable. Therefore, this Tribunal has no basis for considering the agreements to be void. The Claimant is not precluded from contending that it made a valid investment in the Czech Republic.

Applicable Law

194. Article 8(6) of the BIT provides:

The arbitral tribunal shall decide on the basis of the law, taking into account in particular though not exclusively:

- the law in force of the Contracting Party concerned;
- the provisions of this Agreement, and other relevant Agreements between the Contracting Parties;
- the provisions of special agreements relating to the investment;
- the general principles of international law.

195. The application of this provision was clarified by representatives of the Netherlands and the Czech Republic who held consultations pursuant to Article 9 of the BIT. As a result of these consultations, Agreed Minutes dated 1 July 2002 provided:

- (i) On the issue of investment disputes and interpretation of Article 8.6 of the Agreement [i.e., the Treaty]:

The arbitral tribunal shall decide on the basis of the law. When making its decision, the arbitral tribunal shall take into account, [in particular] though not exclusively, each of the four sources of law set out in Article 8.6. The arbitral tribunal must therefore take into account as far as they are relevant to the dispute the law in force of the contracting party concerned and the other sources of law set out in Article 8.6. To the extent that there is a conflict between national law and international law, the arbitral tribunal shall apply international law.<sup>112</sup>

196. The Claimant submits that in practice this means that the Tribunal must apply the substantive legal provision set forth in the Treaty, the applicable international law instrument to the merits of this dispute, along with any relevant general rules of international law.<sup>113</sup> According to the Claimant Czech law plays two roles. First, the Treaty itself provides that Czech law is relevant to the extent that it is more favourable to the investor than the Treaty. Secondly, it is a well-established principle of international law that, before an international tribunal, the host state's domestic law is relevant with respect to factual issues.<sup>114</sup>
197. The Respondent proposes that Czech law enforced during the events described in the Statement of Claim must be applied to the extent relevant to this dispute and to the extent not contrary to international law. According to the Respondent Article 3(5) certainly does not mean that the law of the host state should be disregarded and limited only to cases where it affords better treatment to the investor. There are good reasons why national law needs to be examined before turning to international law. The Respondent further claims that whether the existence of a "commitment" to provide state aid to the Claimant could have arisen in the circumstances must be based upon or consistent with Czech law as in effect.<sup>115</sup>
198. The Tribunal observes that the difference in the position of the Claimant and the Respondent is more apparent than real. The Claimant concedes that a host state's domestic law is relevant with respect to factum and refers to Oppenheim's International Law (9th Edition 1996 by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts). In the Tribunal's opinion, Czech law is relevant insofar as it prescribes the requirements for making an investment and obtaining state aid. The difference in result if Czech Law is applied as factum or as a governing law is immaterial and to some extent academic. However, the Tribunal notes that Czech law is a governing law under the treaty, although its application as a governing law is always subject to the qualification that in the event of conflict between national law and international law, international law prevails.

Fair and equitable treatment

General standard

199. Chief amongst Invesmart's claims is its submission that the Czech Republic violated the fair and equitable treatment standard which is set out at Article 3(1) of the BIT. This article provides that "each Contracting Party shall ensure fair and equitable treatment to the investments of investors of the other Contracting Party".
200. The Tribunal notes that there has been a growing jurisprudence and case law dealing with the notion of fair and equitable treatment in recent years. The content of this obligation has been variously and not consistently described as including the different strands of protection of an investor's legitimate expectations, protection against manifestly arbitrary or grossly unfair treatment, requiring consistency of governmental decision-making, transparency, due process and adequate notice, protection against discrimination that does not amount to a breach of the national treatment standard and protection against acts of bad faith.
201. The tribunal in Waste Management v Mexico sought to bring together various NAFTA awards and to state the law in summary terms:
- [F]air and equitable treatment is infringed by conduct attributable to the State and harmful to the claimant if the conduct is arbitrary, grossly unfair, unjust or idiosyncratic, is discriminatory and exposes the claimant to sectional or racial prejudice, or involves lack of due process leading to an outcome which offends judicial propriety... in applying the standard it is relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host state which were reasonably relied on by the Claimant.<sup>116</sup>
202. In its Statement of Defence the Respondent correctly noted that the two most fundamental features of the fair and equitable treatment standard are:
- (i) the fact that the violation of that standard occurs only when a certain minimum level of inappropriateness of the host state's conduct is exceeded; and
  - (ii) that the dominant feature of that standard is the protection of the investor's expectations which must, however, be legitimate and reasonable and follow from the state of the domestic law at the time of the investment and the totality of the business environment at the time.
203. In support of these observations the Respondent drew the Tribunal's attention to the Saluka Partial Award where that tribunal endorsed and commended ("as a useful guide") Waste Management's threshold for infringement of the fair and equitable treatment standard when interpreting the instant Treaty. Saluka went on to quote the comments of tribunals in the

<sup>116</sup> Exhibit C-193, Waste Management, Inc. v The United Mexican States (No.2), ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/00/3, Award of 30 April 2004, para 98.

Tecmed, CME, Waste Management and the Occidental Petroleum cases as to the relationship between the notion of “legitimate expectations” and the fair and equitable treatment standard, and stated its view that:

304. This Tribunal would observe, however, that while it subscribes to the general thrust of these and similar statements, it may be that, if the terms were taken too literally, they would impose upon host States’ obligations which would be inappropriate and unrealistic. Moreover, the scope of the Treaty’s protection of foreign investment against unfair and unequitable treatment cannot exclusively be determined by foreign investors’ subjective motivations and considerations. Their expectations, in order for them to be protected, must rise to the level of legitimacy and reasonableness in light of the circumstances.

305. No investor may reasonably expect that the circumstances prevailing at the time the investment is made remain totally unchanged. In order to determine whether frustration of the foreign investor’s expectations was justified and reasonable, the host State’s legitimate right subsequently to regulate domestic matters in the public interest must be taken into consideration as well. As the S.D. Myers tribunal has stated, the determination of a breach of “fair and equitable treatment” by the host State must be made in the light of the high measure of deference that international law generally extends to the right of domestic authorities to regulate matters within their own borders.<sup>117</sup>

Legitimate Expectations

The Claimant

204. The central plank of Invesmart's fair and equitable treatment claim was its contention that it formed a legitimate expectation that the Respondent committed to provide state aid having a certain financial effect upon Union Banka. This expectation was said to have crystallised on 24 October 2002 when, after extensive written and oral communications with various Czech agencies, Invesmart’s third application to acquire control of the bank was approved by the CNB.
205. Invesmart submitted that throughout its discussions with the Czech Government it stated that its investment in the bank was contingent upon a grant of state aid and that its investment was based on an express, or in the alternative an implied, commitment of state aid. The Czech financial authorities were fully aware of its position as Invesmart had communicated this to them. The express promise came from governmental officials and the implicit promise lay in the CNB’s approval which, in the Claimant’s view, would not have been granted had the Ministry of Finance not committed to provide state aid. Therefore, when the CNB approved the acquisition of a controlling shareholding in the bank on 24 October 2002, a promise of state aid enforceable at international law was said to have crystallised.

206. Accordingly, Invesmart argued that the Tribunal should find in its favour if it finds that the Czech Republic made an express representation that state aid would be granted, or, alternatively, if the Czech Republic induced Invesmart to acquire the bank and assume the related party loans under circumstances where Invesmart held a legitimate expectation of state aid.<sup>118</sup>
207. The Claimant adduced several categories of evidence in support of its characterisation of the CNB's approval of its acquisition, including:
- (a) written communications between Invesmart, the CNB and the MOF which Invesmart offered as proof that it had stated that its acquisition of Union Banka was subject to state aid being granted;
  - (b) internal government documents which Invesmart offered as proof of the CNB's understanding that Invesmart would not invest in Union Banka absent state aid; and
  - (c) communications surrounding internal government meetings held on 24 September 2002 and 24 October 2002, which Invesmart claimed were pivotal points in its negotiations concerning Union Banka.
208. In developing its submissions it went on to characterise the state aid negotiations following the CNB's approval as changing the rules of engagement once the acquisition had been made.
209. The specific items of evidence adduced by Invesmart in support of its submissions are described in more detail in the paragraphs directly below.

Correspondence between Invesmart and the CNB and MOF

210. The Claimant referred to five examples of written communications with the CNB and the Ministry of Finance where it stated that it would acquire control of Union Banka only if state aid were granted. For example, the minutes of a meeting held on 5 December 2001 between the CNB and Union Banka, just after Invesmart became involved with the bank, noted the contemplated sale of shares in Union Group to Invesmart and recorded that the sale was subject to conditions such as CNB approval and "resolving the Fores (Česká finanční project)" ("CF Transaction").<sup>119</sup>

<sup>119</sup> Exhibit R-34, minutes of a meeting held at the premises of the CNB on 5 December 2001 between the CNB, Union banka, and Union Group.

211. Likewise, by letter dated 26 March 2002 to Pavel Racoča and Vladimír Krejča of the CNB, copied to Marie Parmová (then President of Union Banka), Invesmart's Giuseppe Roselli stated the company's intention to purchase 70 percent of Union Group's shares. Mr Roselli's letter recorded Invesmart's position on the need for the CF Transaction:

In [sic] the same time we are preparing, in cooperation with our advisors, the reconstructing plans for both Union Group and Union banka. We want to finalise the whole transaction in the shortest time, as soon as your approval will be granted, therefore we would appreciate any support for the conclusion of the "Fores-Česká Finanční" deal, which constitutes condition precedent for the contract's completion [sic].<sup>120</sup>

212. Three letters to similar effect followed during the course of the spring and summer of 2002.<sup>121</sup>
213. The Claimant noted that the CNB itself believed that given Union Banka's poor condition, if state aid were not granted, Invesmart would not invest in it. For example, a report prepared by the CNB's Banking Supervision Division, dated 5 September 2002, noted:

Even though Invesmart B.V. has in no written material ever stated entirely unambiguously that if aid is not provided to Union Banka, a.s. it will have no interest at all in acquiring it, it is highly likely, given the bank's situation, that state aid is absolutely essential for the profitability of the whole operation from the point of view of the applicant, and thus also for its decision whether to enter Union Banka, a.s.<sup>122</sup>

214. The Claimant also highlighted a draft unsigned letter that was annexed to the record of the CNB's 5 September 2002 meeting from Governor Tůma to Finance Minister Sobotka. Invesmart argued that the Government "induced" it to acquire the bank through the promise of state aid, citing the draft letter in support of its contention. The draft letter stated:

... it appears that before making a definitive decision on the issue of financing its purchase of a stake in Union Banka, Invesmart B.V. is waiting to find out the Finance Ministry's opinion on the proposal for dealing with the 'Fores problem' that the bank has put forward. The Finance Ministry's decision on this issue is thus likely to have significant consequences for the situation in Union Banka, a.s. The Czech National Bank believes it is unacceptable for the uncertainty concerning the bank's future to be further prolonged for an unlimited time, and so it would welcome if steps could be taken that would induce the applicant to make a decisive statement.<sup>123</sup> [Emphasis added.]

Meeting of 24 September 2002

215. Invesmart also relied upon two meetings held in the autumn of 2002. The first, held on 24 September 2002, involved the CNB, CKA and Finance Ministry officials, including the newly appointed Finance Minister Bohuslav Sobotka. The troubled state of Union Banka and Invesmart's possible equity participation in the bank was discussed at this meeting.
216. Under the heading "Conclusions", the minutes recorded that the loss from the credit agreement between CF and Union Banka should be covered by the National Property Fund in conformity with the 1996 government stabilisation fund, and in case of a change to the agreement, the Office for the Protection of Economic Competition (OPC) "will need to be consulted and government approval will be required". There was also a discussion of the form of state aid, namely, a reduction of the interest rate for the CF deposit in Union Banka from 11.5 percent to approximately 3.5 percent and the purchase of bad quality loans "according to selection by CKA against a decrease of the Česká Finanční deposits".<sup>124</sup>
217. The Claimant placed particular emphasis on the recording in the minutes that "the minister of finance is ready to submit a document for the state aid defined in this way for the government session".<sup>125</sup> The Claimant submits that this demonstrated that the amount and structure of state aid had been agreed; that, as matters stood, the consent of the OPC was not needed for its granting; and that the Minister undertook as of 24 September 2002 to submit the initiative to the government for its approval.<sup>126</sup>
218. The minutes proceeded to set out the next steps to be taken. These were that the Ministry of Finance and the CKA "will discuss the state aid with Invesmart by 25 October 2002 at the latest", the CNB "will notify Invesmart on necessity of submitting the documents" to obtain CNB approval, and the Ministry of Finance and the CKA "will discuss the form of the state aid with OPC as settlement of the stabilization programme following return of OPC representatives from Brussels by 1 October 2002 at the latest".<sup>127</sup>
219. Although Invesmart was not represented at the 24 September 2002 inter-agency meeting, it adduced evidence that the contents of the discussion and the decisions taken were communicated to it the next day.<sup>128</sup> This was acknowledged by the CKA's Mr. Pavel Řežábek in his second witness statement.<sup>129</sup>

220. Following the 24 September 2002 meeting, there were a number of communications on the Invesmart proposal between senior Czech officials. These documents were disclosed to the Claimant in response to its request for production of documents. For example, by letter dated 7 October 2002, Minister Sobotka wrote to the CNB Governor advertizing to Invesmart's earlier proposal and noting that the conditions of the entry of the investor to the bank had since been "mutually defined". He referred to the CF matter and noted that on 25 September 2002, a meeting was held at the office of the First Deputy Minister of Finance's office at which representatives of Invesmart gave a binding promise to provide the documents that had been missing in Invesmart's first application for acquisition of control of Union Banka.<sup>130</sup>

221. A reply to Minister Sobotka's letter, dated 11 October 2002, was sent by Oldřich Dědek of the CNB. Referring to the CNB's rejection on 4 October 2002 of Invesmart's second application to acquire the bank due to the missing documents, Mr Dědek noted that while Invesmart had stated that it would supply the requested documents and it had also confirmed that its entry into the bank was "still subject to the state aid in resolving the problem of the receivable of Česká Finanční, s.r.o. due from this bank". Mr. Dědek continued: "Given the above, we may state that, if the state aid is refused, Invesmart B.V. will most probably cease its effort to enter into Union banka, a.s." He thus requested the Ministry of Finance to communicate "its clear standpoint to the representatives of Invesmart B.V."<sup>131</sup> The Claimant construed these letters as confirming its view that the CNB would not have later approved its share acquisition without the Ministry of Finance's having first agreed to provide state aid.

Meeting of 24 October 2002

222. The second meeting upon which Invesmart relied took place on 24 October 2002, the same day as the CNB approved Invesmart's acquisition of indirect control of Union Banka. This was a meeting of the CNB's Bank Board which the Minister of Finance also attended. An excerpt of the record of the meeting, produced by the Respondent in response to the Claimant's request for production of documents, recorded that Union Banka was discussed. The minutes, which were in summary form, noted:

The Bank Board noted the oral details provided by Mr. Sobotka about the Czech Finance Ministry's point of view with regard to negotiations with the foreign investor and the Banking Supervision Department's approach to dealing with Invesmart's latest application for approval to its purchasing of a stake in Union Group, a.s. and Union Banka, a.s.<sup>132</sup>

223. The Claimant acknowledged that the minutes did not record what the Minister actually said at the meeting, but contended that it could be inferred from the surrounding circumstances that he must have stated his intention to obtain the required state aid package at that meeting.
224. Those circumstances included: (i) Invesmart's application had been expressly conditioned throughout on that requirement; (ii) Invesmart's third application for the CNB's approval had been submitted only two days previously; (iii) the CNB had been pressing the Ministry of Finance for its "clear standpoint" on state aid; (iv) the bank's situation was serious due to a run on the bank after a CNB spokeswoman had commented on the rejection of Invesmart's second application on 22 October 2002; and (v) the fact that CNB's approval of the third application occurred after the Finance Minister made his comments to the Bank Board.<sup>133</sup> The totality of the circumstances, Invesmart argued, allow the Tribunal to infer that the Minister must have stated his support for the requested state aid and Invesmart reasonably formed the expectation that that was the case when its third application was approved only two days after it was submitted to the CNB.<sup>134</sup>
225. Invesmart observed further that the day after the CNB approved its acquisition, a meeting was held between a Finance official, Josef Doruška, and two Euro-Trend representatives and the only form of state aid discussed there was the CF Transaction. The minutes record Mr Doruška asserting that "the only hope, in view of time pressure as well, is to proceed" with an amendment to the loan contract with CF.<sup>135</sup> This indicated, in Invesmart's view, that the form of state aid had been agreed.<sup>136</sup>
226. From the submissions made at the hearing, it appears that for the Claimant the significance of the CNB's approval was twofold. First, it was said to constitute a commitment by the

Respondent that state aid would be granted. Secondly, it was asserted that the CNB approved the acquisition knowing that Invesmart would be taking on a €90 million obligation in connection with the assumption of certain related-party loans.<sup>137</sup> Invesmart pointed out that appended to its 22 October 2002 application to the CNB were its Share Purchase Agreements with the selling shareholders, together with various addenda thereto.<sup>138</sup>

Claimant's characterisation of negotiations following CNB approval

227. During the hearing, the Claimant developed the point that after the CNB's approval was granted, the Czech authorities changed the rules of engagement and began to impose new conditions on the granting of state aid. This culminated in the denial of state aid to Invesmart, contrary to its expectation. The Claimant argued that it was only after the CNB acted and Invesmart had bound itself to acquire the shares in Union Banka and Union Group that these conditions were brought to its attention. Invesmart argued that at this point the structure of what was acceptable to the government changed and hurdles began to be raised that were inconsistent with its expectation that the CNB's prior approval of 24 October had resolved the issue of state aid in its favour.
228. This argument relates both to the legitimate expectations claim and to the separate alleged violation of Article 3, namely, the claimed inconsistent treatment of Invesmart's investment by the Czech authorities. Insofar as the legitimate expectation argument is concerned, the Claimant referred principally to two events.
229. First, it noted that unbeknownst to Invesmart, the Deputy Prime Minister of the Czech Republic had represented to the European Union that the Republic would not grant any new state aid to the banking sector.<sup>139</sup>
230. Secondly, Invesmart adverted to the meeting between the Ministry of Finance, CKA and Invesmart representatives on 5 November 2002 at which the bank's First Plan was reviewed and Invesmart was informed of the internal discussions that had been held with the OPC. It was advised that any aid had to be "targeted, limited and pre-approved by the OPC" and had to be approved by the government. In addition, it was told that if the solution proposed in the material presented was chosen, the material required further work.<sup>140</sup> Invesmart asserted that this marked the beginning of a series of demands for more detail and shifting mechanisms of delivering state aid, the effect of which was inconsistent with what it had been led to believe would occur after the CNB approved its acquisition of indirect control of Union Banka and its shareholders authorised the capital increase. The Claimant emphasised that the 5 November 2002 meeting occurred the day after Invesmart's shareholders had ratified their 16 October 2002 decision to increase the company's share capital by €90 million, i.e., after one of the conditions precedent for the completion of the SPAs with the selling shareholders was removed.<sup>141</sup>

231. By way of example, Invesmart pointed to the discussion at the 5 November 2002 meeting where the CKA's Mr Řežábek raised the possibility of whether the CNB (not represented at the meeting) could recognise the BDS Arbitration Claim as a mechanism for providing state aid. Mr Řežábek suggested that this possibility offered a "purely commercial solution" that would bail out the bank but not require the competition authorities' approval.<sup>142</sup> This proposal was rejected by the CNB on 8 November 2002. The Claimant saw this as a troubling sign of inconsistent treatment (a point to which the Tribunal will return below).
232. With the BDS Receivable suggestion off the table, the discussions reverted to variations on the CF transaction and another possibility, which was to issue a state guarantee for the repayment of a selected group of debts. These were examined at another meeting between the Ministry of Finance, the OPC, the CNB, the CKA, Union Banka, Euro-Trend and Invesmart held on 29 November 2002. The meeting "aimed to achieve consensus" on how the Finance Ministry and Invesmart should proceed in relation to the OPC. The minutes noted that a decision from the OPC was a necessary condition for the government's final decision on the granting of state aid.<sup>143</sup>
233. The competition authorities also advised at this meeting that the request and its accompanying material, particularly the restructuring plan, would have to fully respect the EC's Guidelines on State Aid for Rescuing and Restructuring Firms in Difficulty. It would also have to be shown why the bank could not survive in the market without state aid and the reasons why its existence should be preserved, "in other words, that state aid was essential (including why the shareholders or other parties could not rescue the bank themselves)".<sup>144</sup> The Claimant also asserted that the record showed that the Minister of Finance's requests for state aid regularly succeeded in being approved by Cabinet.<sup>145</sup> This confirmed, in Invesmart's view, the reasonableness of its expectation that once the 24 September 2002 meeting's results had been communicated to it, with the CNB then having approved its acquisition of indirect control of Union Banka, state aid had been promised.

Amount of state aid

234. The disputing parties disagreed as to whether the amount of state aid discussed between August and September 2002 was CZK 650 million in total, or a (larger) grant of state aid that conferred a net benefit of CZK 650 million on the bank. In this regard, Invesmart observed that although the CZK 650 million figure was discussed, from the outset, the Czech authorities understood that the cost to the State would be greater than that sum and that any risk associated with the quality of the CF loan portfolio was clearly to be borne by the government.<sup>146</sup> It pointed to a memorandum dated 10 September 2002 prepared by the Czech Consolidation Agency for Finance Minister Sobotka, which set out the CKA's position on the proposed settlement of relations between CF and Union Banka presented by Invesmart in August 2002. The memorandum noted that the reduction in the interest rate on the Fores deposit would create a retroactive loss to CF of approximately CZK 207 million and a future interest loss of approximately CZK 251. As for the assumption of problem receivables, this would result in a loss of approximately CZK 330–771 million.<sup>147</sup> At the upper end of the estimate, the state aid would cost the government more than CZK 1 billion. Invesmart pointed to this as proof that the parties had previously distinguished between the net impact of the grant of state aid on Union Banka and the cost to the government of providing such aid.
235. The Claimant stressed its view that notwithstanding the Respondent's position in this arbitration, in September-October 2002 the parties were in agreement as to the effect of the state support in connection with Invesmart's acquisition, namely, support in the form of the CF Transaction which would result in an uplift to the net asset value of Union Banka of CZK 650 million.<sup>148</sup>
236. As noted in the Facts, on 20 February 2003, the Minister of Finance decided against recommending state aid for Union Banka. The bank closed its doors the next day and an administrative proceeding for the revocation of its licence was immediately initiated by the CNB. The Tribunal will address these events in its discussion of the expropriation claim. For present purposes, it is not necessary to enter into a discussion of the reasons for the denial of state aid because the consideration of the legitimate expectations claim simply requires the Tribunal to proceed on the basis that the expectation said to have crystallised on 24 October 2002 was not met.

The Respondent

237. The Respondent argued that neither the factual record nor the governing law supported the legitimate expectations claim.
238. It began by asserting that as a matter of Czech law and European Union (EU) law, there was no right to state aid; indeed, state aid is forbidden unless its granting is permitted by the relevant competition authorities. Noting that Article 8(6) of the BIT specifies that the Tribunal must decide “on the basis of the law, taking into account in particular though not exclusively”, inter alia, “the law in force of the Contracting Party concerned” and “the provisions of ... other relevant Agreements between the Contracting Parties”, the Respondent asserted that under both its own domestic law and under the various agreements to which The Netherlands and the Czech Republic were party at the time, including the treaty of accession governing the Czech Republic’s admission to the EU, there were prohibitions on the granting of state aid in 2002. Therefore, there could be no legally enforceable right to the grant of state aid.<sup>149</sup>
239. Given that the law of the host state did not confer a general right to state aid, but rather prohibited aid unless an exemption was granted, the Respondent argued that there could be no legitimate expectation which is contrary to the law of the host state:
- No investor, can hold, at least not legitimately and not in the absence of the clearest possible commitment made by the state concerned, an expectation which the law of the host state contradicts.<sup>150</sup>
240. On a related point, the Respondent challenged the Claimant’s general approach to the governing law in this proceeding which, in the Respondent’s view, had avoided dealing in particular with the Czech law aspects of the case. In the Respondent’s view, the Czech law was extremely important in terms of the governing law.<sup>151</sup>
241. The Respondent also took issue with the Claimant’s characterisation of the acts of various Czech entities as constituting a promise or commitment of state aid. In its submission, there must be a concrete, specific promise in writing and there was no such document on the record.<sup>152</sup> With no explicit promise in writing unequivocally promising state aid to Union Banka, the Respondent argued that there could also be no expectation of state aid based upon an implied or constructive promise.<sup>153</sup> In its view, the Claimant was calling upon the Tribunal to construct a promise out of the materials before it. This was not possible because the granting of aid was a voluntary matter and could only be enforced as a legitimate expectation if the State made an actual promise to deliver the aid.<sup>154</sup> One would fully expect in a matter as important as this that the representation sought to be enforced would be in writing and be unequivocal.

242. Insofar as the Claimant sought to tie the CNB's approval of Invesmart's application for approval of its acquisition of control of Union Banka to a commitment of state aid by the Ministry of Finance, the Respondent argued that the CNB's approval was simply an approval of a shareholding interest, a "prior approval" in a multi-stage acquisition process and nothing more.<sup>155</sup> One of the Respondent's Czech law experts, Dr Petr Kotáb, had opined that under Czech law, the CNB's approval is designed to prevent the entry into the banking sector of persons whose activities may be detrimental to the system's stability.<sup>156</sup> This supported the Respondent's view that what the CNB did on 24 October 2002 was no more than a prior approval. The Respondent is, and was at the time, a party to the Convention on Laundering, Search, Seizure and Confiscation of the Proceeds of Crime which requires it to ensure that funds invested in its financial institutions were bona fide.<sup>157</sup> The CNB had to satisfy itself that Invesmart's funds met this requirement. Beyond that, the CNB's approval was a necessary step in Invesmart's acquisition of indirect control of the bank, but the approval did not oblige Invesmart to complete that acquisition. Therefore, when the CNB issued its approval on 24 October 2002, that act could not reasonably be viewed to be a commitment to grant state aid by another state entity vested with that power, i.e., the Ministry of Finance.<sup>158</sup>
243. The Respondent argued further that there was a fundamental distinction to be drawn between a binding promise and a legitimate expectation. In its closing submission, the Respondent argued that a binding promise occurred when it could be clearly established that the state made a commitment of a particular kind, which was sufficiently specific that the investor could rely on it. A legitimate expectation was, on the other hand, "a modality of fair and equitable treatment", not to be equated with anything analogous to a contract. Even assuming arguendo that, on the facts of this case, the Respondent had given the Claimant an expectation of aid in the amount sought in the Third Restructuring Plan, CZK 1.762 billion, the state could give an investor an expectation of a certain treatment but in the end, that still did not mean that in failing to accord such treatment, the state had breached the fair and equitable treatment standard. Situations can change and an expectation is not a guarantee; nor is it an estoppel by a government that it could not act in light of changed circumstances.<sup>159</sup>

244. As for the terms of the alleged promise the Claimant sought to enforce, the Respondent argued that there cannot be a commitment without the content being sufficiently agreed. Even if there could have been a legitimate expectation of aid, it had to be a precise expectation and in the Respondent's view, the content and conditions of the alleged commitment changed materially after the date on which the expectation was said to have crystallised.<sup>160</sup> The Respondent took issue with the Claimant's argument that the amount of state aid was agreed as of that date. It also challenged the suggestion made at the hearing that the objective of the exercise had been to return Union Banka to a capital adequacy ratio ("CAR") of 14 percent. In the Respondent's view, there was nothing in the record evidence that made any reference to achieving that capital adequacy ratio.<sup>161</sup> The Respondent suggested that the reason why the Claimant had advanced the 14 percent CAR result was that nothing else would have sufficed. The evidence showed that as the new management of Union Banka familiarised themselves with the bank's finances, they discovered that the problems were greater than they had thought.<sup>162</sup>
245. The Respondent also took issue with the Claimant's contention that the amount and form of state aid had been agreed by 24 October 2002. In its view, the evidence showed that the amount and conditions for the granting of the state aid at issue changed over time and materially so after the CNB's grant of approval which had allegedly crystallised the commitment. Pointing to the Third Restructuring Plan, submitted to the Ministry of Finance on 12 February 2003, the Respondent noted that the amount of aid then being sought was considerably higher than what had been sought by Invesmart in its initial 20 August 2002 letter to the Ministry of Finance.<sup>163</sup>
246. The Respondent also disputed a number of the factual elements of the Claimant's case. It pointed to contemporaneous documents which showed that Invesmart was aware of the need for the OPC's approval months before it filed its third application with the CNB.<sup>164</sup> It asserted that, contrary to its pleading in this proceeding, Invesmart did not make its investment contingent upon the CNB's approval and the implicit approval of state aid now claimed to be bound up in that approval. In this regard, the Respondent reviewed the documents amending the Share Purchase Agreements and argued that Invesmart had become an obligor with liabilities under the amended Share Purchase Agreements in mid-August 2002 (six weeks before Invesmart's second application was rejected by the CNB and over two months before its third application was approved) and hence, contrary to Invesmart's plea in this proceeding, it did not condition its acquisition of liabilities in connection with its assuming indirect control of Union Banka upon the granting of state aid.<sup>165</sup>

247. The Respondent also noted that the legitimate expectation claim had to be evaluated having regard to the state's "margin of appreciation" recognised by international law. This margin is particularly wide, it was argued, when it comes to state aid and there was no case where a breach of fair and equitable treatment had been found as a result of a regular exercise of inherently discretionary governmental powers such as a refusal of state aid.<sup>166</sup>

248. Finally, insofar as the Basel Committee's Guidelines had been relied upon in support of the legitimate expectations claim, the Respondent did not see such standards as being relevant to determining a breach of the fair and equitable treatment standard. The Guidelines addressed "best practices" and were by their own terms non-binding. They could not be equated with an international legal obligation, breach of which gave rise to a breach of Article 3 of the Treaty.

<sup>167</sup>

The Tribunal's analysis - General Approach

249. In the Tribunal's view, six propositions are relevant to its consideration of this claim.

250. First, although an investor's expectation is subjective, i.e., what the investor believed to be the import of its dealings with government officials on which it claims to have relied, for the Tribunal, the test of whether such an expectation can give rise to a successful claim at international law is an objective one. It is not enough that a claimant have sincerely held an expectation; the expectation must be reasonable and the Tribunal must make the determination of reasonableness in all of the circumstances. If the expectation was unreasonable (for example, ill-informed or overly optimistic), it matters not that the investor held it and it will not form the basis for a successful claim.

251. Secondly, a source of contemporaneous evidence of the investor's expectation can be the contractual documents by which it acquired its investment or otherwise dealt with the seller of the investment where it purchased an existing investment.
252. Thirdly, there is a temporal dimension to evaluating a claimed expectation. To the extent that the expectation is based upon the investor's reliance upon the acts and/or statements of the responsible government officials, it must be based on how the officials actually dealt with the investor at the time.
253. For example, in the Tribunal's view, it is not appropriate to base a claimed expectation upon the content of internal governmental discussions to which the investor was not privy at the time. If the contents of a particular governmental discussion or deliberative process to which the investor was not a party were nevertheless disclosed to it, they can contribute to the investor's expectation. However, if it was not privy to a discussion nor informed of its results, the investor cannot use documents disclosed in a subsequent arbitration as proof of its expectation at the time. Such documents can confirm a claimed expectation, but they cannot be used to establish a particular factual element of a claimed expectation if such element was unknown to the investor at the time.<sup>168</sup>
254. Fourthly, the due diligence performed when the investor made its investment plays an important role in evaluating its expectation. A putative investor, especially one making an investment in a highly regulated sector such as financial services, as in the instant case, has the burden of performing its own due diligence in vetting the investment within the context of the operative legal regime.
255. Fifthly, and related to the fourth point, an investor's expectations must be based on the legal regulatory regime in place in the host state. Although there has been a suggestion in some cases that the investor's subjective expectations are to be given substantial weight, they are not to be the definitive source of the host state's obligations. In this regard, the Tribunal agrees with the point made in Saluka that:

The scope of the treaty's protection of foreign investment against unfair and inequitable treatment cannot exclusively be determined by the foreign investor's subjective motivations and expectations. Their expectations in order to be protected must rise to the level of legitimacy and reasonableness in light of the circumstances.<sup>169</sup>

256. As noted in the decision of the ad hoc Annulment Committee in MTD v Republic of Chile:

... The obligations of the host State towards foreign investors derive from the terms of the applicable investment treaty and not from any set of expectations investors may have or claim to have. A tribunal which sought to generate from those expectations a set of rights different from those contained in or enforceable under the BIT might well exceed its powers, and if the difference were material might do so manifestly.<sup>170</sup>

257. The Tribunal agrees with that statement and observes that when ascertaining the Respondent's obligations under the Treaty, the Tribunal must have regard to the governing law which, in the instant case, includes the law of the host state and other relevant international agreements to which the Contracting States are party. It is the Treaty which guides the Tribunal in determining whether an investor's subjective expectation is legitimate.

258. Sixthly, it is important to distinguish between the various entities of the state. While the acts of governmental entities are attributable to the state for the purposes of international responsibility, the fact of attribution cannot be used to obscure the allocation of different competencies between different entities of the state when the issue of breach is determined. The investor deals with the state in its various emanations. Barring some kind of agency relationship, one entity of the state not vested with actual decision-making authority cannot be taken to bind the entity which by law possesses the actual authority. In the instant case, to the investor's knowledge, there was a division of jurisdiction, powers and responsibilities between the Ministry of Finance, the CKA, the OPC and the Czech National Bank, a point to which the Tribunal will revert below.

Detailed analysis

259. As noted above, Invesmart's case is that it received an express, or in the alternative, an implicit commitment of state aid from the Respondent. With respect to the latter, Invesmart claims that it held a legitimate expectation that given its repeated prior statements that state aid was an essential condition of its investment and its understanding of what the internal thinking of the Czech financial authorities was (or must have been), the CNB could only have given its approval on 24 October 2002 on the basis of a prior commitment by the Ministry of Finance to provide the requisite state aid. Invesmart claims that it was reasonable on its part to have then ratified its earlier approval of the capital increase and to assume the related party loans.

260. Before proceeding with its detailed analysis of the claim, the Tribunal finds it helpful to summarise certain points elicited from [redacted] because his testimony had the effect, in the Tribunal's view, of narrowing the legitimate expectations claim from the way in which it was advanced in the written pleadings. The Tribunal was struck by three points elicited from [redacted] on: (i) whether an express promise of aid was made to Invesmart; (ii) what the CNB's role in the events at issue was; and (iii) the Claimant's awareness of the potential role of the OPC.

261. [redacted] admitted that Invesmart received no written promise of state aid from the Respondent.<sup>171</sup> In terms of an oral promise, [redacted] was, in the Tribunal's view, vague about who made such a promise. He testified that "several people within the Czech Government" made such a promise.<sup>172</sup> But when asked to name someone who did so, he responded "there was – the information we were given by the Minister of Finance"<sup>173</sup> and when asked whether he was referring to Minister Sobotka, he responded:

Yes. Not directly; from his office. We also consider – and I didn't have the chance to finish what I was saying, but we also consider that the approval from the Czech National Bank to our acquisition of Union banka was implicitly a binding promise or commitment of state aid.<sup>174</sup>

262. He testified further that:

Someone promised me, or we understood a commitment was to help Union banka to increase its value of 650 million.<sup>175</sup>

263. This testimony is not sufficiently cogent and precise to support the claimed express promise of state aid. The witness could reasonably be expected to have a precise recollection of specifically who in the government promised state aid because that is such a material fact for this limb of the Claimant's case. The witness should have been able to specify names and the circumstances in which such an important commitment was claimed to have been given. Yet the testimony on this point was vague and tentative. This, combined with [redacted]'s retreating to the CNB's approval as an implicit promise of aid, leads the Tribunal to view the legitimate expectations claim as being more properly founded upon an alleged implicit promise of state aid.

264. That implicit promise was said to be bound up in the CNB's approval on 24 October 2002. Reflecting Investmart's awareness at the material time of the allocation of different jurisdictions, powers and responsibilities between the various state entities, conceded that the CNB could not promise state aid because it was a banking regulator.<sup>176</sup> When asked whether Governor Tůma had ever stated that “we understand that by giving permission we accept a commitment to pay state aid”, [redacted] responded, “No, no, he never said that”.<sup>177</sup> Insofar as the period prior to 24 October 2002 was concerned, when asked whether there was any document from the CNB promising state aid if Invesmart obtained CNB approval, [redacted] testified, “No, I don’t remember specifically”.<sup>178</sup>

265. This means, in the Tribunal’s view, that the CNB’s approval in itself cannot be taken to have amounted to an implicit commitment because Invesmart understood that it had no role in the decision whether to grant state aid. This in turn narrows the inquiry to the Claimant’s contention that the CNB would only have approved its application if it had had a concrete statement from the Minister of Finance that state aid was going to be granted. The Tribunal will revert to this below.
266. As for the role of the OPC [redacted] acknowledged that when Invesmart was debriefed about the 24 September 2002 inter-agency meeting, he was told that the advice of the OPC was being sought “in order to get their advice on the viability as far as the EU issues were concerned”.<sup>179</sup> He agreed that the OPC was the entity of the Czech Republic that was to decide whether the reduction of the interest rate on the Fores deposit would constitute state aid.<sup>180</sup> He also acknowledged that he was told by Union Banka’s consultants, Euro-Trend, on 25 October 2002 (one day after the CNB had approved Invesmart’s acquisition of indirect control of the bank) of the commitment made in writing to the EU by Deputy Prime Minister Rychetský that the Respondent did not anticipate providing any further state aid to the Czech banking sector.<sup>181</sup>
267. [redacted]’s testimony that he was made aware of the OPC’s role as a result of the 24 September 2002 meeting, that it would determine whether lowering the Fores interest rate constituted state aid, and that Euro-Trend was informed of the Rychetský letter to the EU on 25 October 2002 – eleven days before Invesmart’s shareholders ratified their earlier approval of the €90 million capital increase – is also relevant to the Tribunal’s consideration of the legitimate expectation claim.

268. With these points in mind, the Tribunal now turns to what it considers to be the key issues bearing on the claim.

The law on state aid

269. There is no legal entitlement to state aid at international law. As an exercise of its sovereignty, leaving aside any treaty obligations it may have, a State has the discretion to decide whether or not to grant aid. On the facts of this case, there was nothing in Czech law which affirmatively stated that state aid would be granted upon request and a properly advised investor would understand that to be the case.

270. In fact, rather than obliging signatory states to grant aid, the member States of the EU have to the contrary undertaken not to grant it within the common market. That is, they have agreed to constrain their previously unfettered right to grant aid in order to achieve the goal of free competition. As an aspiring member of the EU, the Czech Republic was one such state at the material time in this case.

271. Under Article 8(6) of the BIT, the Tribunal must have regard both to Czech law and the provisions of "other relevant Agreements between the Contracting Parties". The relevant EU instruments and the Czech law implementing them fall within these categories. Under those regimes (the national and the supranational, which were consistent with each other in 2002 as the Czech Republic moved towards full accession to the Treaty of Rome), there could be no prima facie legal right to the granting of state aid. To the contrary, Section 2 of the Law on state aid affirms that aid is forbidden if the OPC does not authorise an exemption from the prohibition.<sup>182</sup>

Due diligence

272. One element relevant to judging a legitimate expectation claim is whether the investor could have made itself aware of the regulatory issues that faced its investment. Some tribunals have characterised this as an issue of transparency. International agreements that have contained express transparency obligations have cast them in terms of a duty imposed on the state to publish its laws and regulations so as to allow a private party to familiarise itself with them and be able to conduct its business affairs accordingly.<sup>183</sup>

273. Czech law and the relevant international agreements between the two Contracting States to the Treaty were both readily discoverable by the Claimant in 2001-2002. The regulatory practice of the Czech Republic in the area of state aid was becoming more stringent in view of its impending accession to the Treaty of Rome. In the Tribunal's view, this too was discoverable to the Claimant. The expert evidence of Professor Claus-Dieter Ehlermann adduced by the Respondent shows that the relevant law and guidelines were available to be consulted had Invesmart decided to retain counsel on this matter.<sup>184</sup> Those materials posited relatively stringent requirements for granting an exemption to the prohibition on state aid. Counsel would have been able to examine publicly available information on the materials needed to request state aid and the types of considerations applied by national and supranational agencies when evaluating state aid proposals.

274. During the hearing, [redacted] acknowledged that Invesmart did not retain legal counsel to advise it on the competition law issues governing the grant of state aid.<sup>185</sup> The Tribunal found this surprising because the evidence shows that Invesmart knew fairly early on that competition law and the enforcement agency, the OPC, both had a role to play in the resolution of the bank's hoped-for state support.

275. In a letter dated 28 June 2002, addressed to the then-Minister of Finance, Jirí Rusnok, requesting him to "reconsider the possibility to realize the project of 'Finalisation of the Foresbank stabilisation program'", [redacted] recognised that the state aid being sought by Invesmart could be refused on the objection of the competition authorities. He noted in this regard that:

... We are also working on submission of another expert's opinion for selected assets' portfolio and the Economic Competition Office standpoint so that the Office will not prevent us from the realisation of our project.<sup>186</sup> [Emphasis added.]

276. Beyond [redacted], noting the fact that Invesmart was seeking an expert's opinion, there is no record evidence of what that advice amounted to. In the Tribunal's view, [redacted] letter shows an awareness as of 28 June 2002 that the OPC could block the aid.

277. In the Tribunal's view, Invesmart should have sought legal advice on the EU and Czech law so that it understood precisely what the requirements were for making out the case for the granting of an exemption to the restrictions on granting state aid. Had it done so, it could have determined for itself that the law imposed strict guidelines on what information would be required to be submitted to the relevant authorities in order to maximise its chances of obtaining the requested aid to be granted.

278. [redacted] conceded that “looking back, we should have” obtained legal advice on the state aid issue.<sup>187</sup> His explanation was that Invesmart did not do so because it found an existing transaction on the table and it took it from there and that “my understanding, my shareholders’ understanding throughout the whole process, has been that it was in the primary interest of the Czech Government and the Czech Republic to rescue and save Union Banka”.<sup>188</sup> This does not assist the Claimant because, while the Claimant did indeed receive positive signals from the Respondent, the record shows that they were not all in that direction. There had been attempts by the bank’s existing management to resolve the problem, but those had been unsuccessful.

279. Indeed, when [redacted] approached the newly-appointed Minister of Finance in July 2002 after the parliamentary elections there was no “existing transaction” on the table because Minister Sobotka’s predecessor had rejected Invesmart’s approach in May 2002. This is what had led [redacted] to send his letter of 28 June 2002 to Minister Rusnok asking him to reconsider. His reference in that letter to Invesmart’s seeking an expert opinion so that the OPC would not block the project shows an understanding that state aid was not automatic even if the Minister of Finance were inclined to recommend its granting. Likewise, after the Ministry of Finance indicated that it was willing to look at the issue of state aid, as [redacted] 16 September 2002 letter shows, Invesmart’s 12 September 2002 meeting with the CNB was not entirely positive from the investor’s perspective. [redacted] recorded the CNB’s Mr Jíříček as stating that “he sees no or very little chances for the transaction to be completed”.<sup>189</sup> The CNB’s reply to [redacted] while not prejudging the outcome of the state aid issue, emphasised the MOF’s and OPC’s roles in approving the aid and pointed out that determining whether to grant aid was not the CNB’s responsibility.<sup>190</sup> The information conveyed to Invesmart after the 24 September 2002 intra-governmental meeting highlighted the OPC’s role. In short, even the positive statements made by government officials during the material period did not in any way purport to vary the legal regime applicable to state aid.

280. [redacted] position, though not entirely unreasonable, did not show the prudence that could be expected of an investor whose investment was being conditioned upon the government’s financial support.

281. The Tribunal considers that Czech counsel would have been aware of the tightening of the Czech rules on state aid and the increasing oversight of the EC. Not surprisingly, as the state aid regime became more stringent for the Czech Republic, the onus upon a party seeking such aid and indeed upon a state inclined to grant it became heavier. What might have passed muster in the mid-1990s would not necessarily pass muster in 2002.

282. The failure to seek legal advice reflected an underlying feature of the case: that the entire venture seemed to be driven by frequent requests for state aid bound up in undoubted enthusiasm and drive to secure ownership of a cleaned up bank which he could then sell to an established Western European bank. While the Tribunal considers that and de Sury brought financial acumen to the project, there appears to have been relatively little substantive legal due diligence performed by Invesmart. This is also reflected in Invesmart's contractual dealings with the bank and the selling shareholders, a matter to which the Tribunal now turns.

Invesmart's contractual relations with Union Banka and the selling shareholders

283. An important theme of the Claimant's case was that at all material times, it informed various government entities that it would not proceed with the investment unless the state provided aid resulting in an uplift to the net asset value of the bank of some CZK 650 million.<sup>191</sup> There is ample correspondence and records of meetings that demonstrates that this position was communicated by Invesmart throughout the period leading up to 24 October 2002.
284. In the Tribunal's view, however, there is something of a disjuncture between those statements and the legal documents relating to Invesmart's relationship with Union Banka and Union Group, some of which show that Invesmart did not act consistently with its position as articulated to the Czech Republic.
285. First, the Receivables Assignment Agreement was executed on 13 August 2002. At this point in time, according to the Agreed Statement of Facts, Invesmart had been communicating its interest in acquiring control of the bank for over eight months. Invesmart's Gert H Rienmüller informed the CNB by letter dated 12 August 2002 that it had decided to "support" the bank "without closing the purchase of the bank".<sup>192</sup>
286. The text of the letter warrants reproducing because it shows that prior to even submitting its first summary proposal for the resolution of the bank's issues with Česká Finanční, Invesmart assumed obligations in relation to the Česká Finanční loan portfolio. Mr Rienmüller stated:

... with reference to your letter dated 25 July 2002 ... I would like to inform you that in the above mentioned matter intense talks between the current shareholders and the investor, Invesmart, B.V. regarding the financial statements for the year <sup>192</sup> Exhibit R-52, letter dated 12 August 2002 from Gert H. Rienmüller to Vladimír Krejča of the CNB.

2001 have taken place. The result of the talks is that without closing the purchase of the bank Invesmart has decided to support Union banka by a grant of a guarantee in the amount of CZK 300 million in order to secure an acceptable auditor's report on the bank for 2001.

***

Meantime, Invesmart was also acquainting itself with the Česká Finanční case. After unsuccessful attempts of the existing shareholders of the bank Invesmart is attempting to solve this problem itself through direct negotiations with the CNB, Česká finanční and the MOF. The results of these contacts cannot be predicted at this time. However, taking into account that Invesmart increased its purchase price by CZK 300 million, it cannot be expected that it would assume additional obligations against Česká finanční, which were represented by the seller in negotiations as solved.<sup>193</sup> [Emphasis added.]

287. Although Mr Rienmüller's letter referred to a CZK 300 million guarantee being issued by Invesmart, that was only one aspect of the transaction. In the Receivables Assignment Agreement, Invesmart and Union Banka recognised that the bank was attempting to sell the loan portfolio to CF.<sup>194</sup> Invesmart agreed to an irrevocable assumption and purchase of that portfolio if it was not transferred to CF, subject to the proviso that Union Banka would only be able to require such assumption if and after it had failed to, for any reason whatsoever, assign the receivables to CF by 1 December 2002.<sup>195</sup> In that event, Invesmart agreed to pay CZK 1.2 billion for the portfolio and the CZK 300 million guarantee to which Mr Rienmüller referred was to secure that obligation. In the event that it failed to take over the loan portfolio, the guarantee, valid until 15 December 2002, was enforceable by the bank after its having given notice to Invesmart.<sup>196</sup>
288. The Receivables Assignment Agreement appears to have had at least two effects.
289. First, as Mr Rienmüller anticipated in his 12 August 2002 letter to the CNB, it permitted the bank to secure the issuance of the auditor's report for the year ending 31 December 2001.<sup>197</sup> On 16 August 2002, Deloitte & Touche issued its audit report on the bank's 2001 financial statements. Without such an audit report, the evidence showed, the bank's situation would have been extremely tenuous.

<sup>193</sup> Id.

<sup>197</sup> In Exhibit C-31, Audit Report of Union Banka for 2001 issued by Deloitte & Touche on 16 August 2002, p. 2, Deloitte & Touche noted that the bank might not be able to continue as a going concern absent Invesmart's capital entry into the bank.

290. Secondly, the Receivables Assignment Agreement evidently led to an amendment of the SPAs because on 14 August 2002, the day after its execution, Invesmart entered into Addendum No 4 to the two SPAs. In the Tribunal's view, the importance of these contractual developments is this: Invesmart assumed the obligation to pay for the CF loan portfolio – a key element of the state aid that it was seeking – 7 days before submitting its proposal on the settlement of the bank's relationship with CF to the MOF. That is, Invesmart's first proposal to the MOF was made on 20 August 2002, seven days after it executed the Receivables Assignment Agreement.<sup>198</sup>

291. In the Tribunal's view the Receivable Assignment Agreement and Addendum No 4 tend to undermine the Claimant's contention that it made its participation in Union Banka conditional upon the grant of state aid. In mid-August 2002, it bound itself to having to deliver the substantial part of what it later proposed the state should grant. Moreover, although Addendum No 4 still reserved the power to approve the share purchase to Invesmart's shareholders, its conditions for completing the transaction did not reflect the position that Invesmart was consistently articulating to different government agencies. When asked by the Chairman as to whether Invesmart sought legal advice on the amendments to the SPAs, I answered:

I believe it was not very much a legal issue at the time, it was very much contained in a business decision at the time.<sup>199</sup>

292. The Tribunal recognises that it is not privy to the negotiating history of the entire transaction and it is loath to impose legal perfection on an evolving situation after the fact. However, it considers that the Claimant exposed itself in a sense in the way in which it structured the conditions for the acquisition of the shares and the assumption of the related-party loans and when it assumed the CF loan portfolio.

293. If the grant of state aid was the sine qua non of Invesmart's acquisition of control of Union Banka, it might have been expected that it would have either: (i) completed its acquisition of control of the bank only upon receipt of a written undertaking from the Minister of Finance that the requested state aid would be provided; or (ii) to be even more certain, have completed the acquisition simultaneously with the aid being granted. Invesmart did not follow either course of action.

<sup>198</sup> As noted in the Agreed Statement of Facts, at p. 8, on that date, "Invesmart submitted its state aid proposal to the Ministry of Finance ... Invesmart proposed the following measures: (i) the early termination of the Fores Deposit; (ii) the investment of the proceeds from the Fores Deposit in subordinated debt of Union banka; and (iii) CF's purchase of a CZK 1.6 billion portfolio of non-performing loans."

294. [redacted] frankly admitted that they had erred in not obtaining a written promise of state aid, testifying that “stupidly enough, looking back, we didn’t ask for it”.<sup>200</sup> Invesmart’s failure to relate its requirements for completing the transaction, as communicated to various Czech agencies, to its contractual documents with the selling shareholders and the bank created exposure in the event that state aid was not granted. Such exposure is precisely what has forced the Claimant to argue that if there was no express promise of state aid, the CNB’s approval constituted an implicit promise to grant it. It would have been more prudent for Invesmart to have formally conditioned its obligation to assume the related-party loans upon the grant of state aid rather than rely upon what it now contends was an implicit promise of aid bound up in the CNB’s approval.
295. The Tribunal will discuss the last amendment to the SPAs, Addendum No 5, in the course of its discussion of the events of October 2002 below.

The Claimant’s general awareness of the domestic competition law regime prior to 24 October 2002

296. Consistent with its view as to the related roles of due diligence and the host State’s law and relevant international agreements between the investment Treaty’s Contracting Parties, the Tribunal now turns to consider the role of competition law and the competition authorities in the events at issue. This is an important issue when considering the legitimate expectations claim, because the regulatory approval structure for state aid provides the legal context in which the various government entities and indeed Union Banka and Invesmart itself operated at the time.
297. The Claimant’s legitimate expectations claim emphasised that it was only after Invesmart’s application was approved by the CNB that the role of the OPC in approving any aid and what it saw as increasingly onerous conditions for the aid’s granting became clear.<sup>201</sup>
298. The Tribunal has already noted at paragraphs 274-276 that Invesmart was aware by June 2002 that the OPC would have a role in approving state aid. By letter dated 25 June 2002 to the Acting Secretary of CF, [redacted] noted that Invesmart was trying “to get a standpoint of the Economic Competition Office”.<sup>202</sup> A letter dated three days later addressed to the then-Minister of Finance explicitly recognised that the aid being sought could be prevented by the competition authorities and for that reason Invesmart was “working on submission of another expert's opinion for selected assets' portfolio and the Economic Competition Office standpoint "so that the Office will not prevent us from the realisation of our project"<sup>203</sup>.

299. The minutes of the 24 September 2002 meeting at the Ministry of Finance, on which the Claimant placed significant reliance, also show that the state aid issue and the need to consult the competition authorities was part of the government's internal discussions. The testimony is that the substance of this meeting was accurately and fully communicated to Invesmart the next day and [redacted] acknowledged that he was told that the advice of the OPC was being sought "in order to get their advice on the viability as far as the European Union issues were concerned".<sup>204</sup>

The issue of "old" versus "new" aid

300. One issue that arose during the hearing concerned whether the OPC had to consent to a resolution of the bank's issues with CF. The Claimant contended that that was not seen as state aid that required the OPC's approval because it was settling a previous arrangement that dated back to the mid-1990s.<sup>205</sup> There was no new state aid being discussed, in its view, and the statements of government officials seemed to show that they likewise held that view, at least until after Invesmart decided to acquire the shares of Union Group.
301. In the Tribunal's view, looked at on their own, the 24 September meeting's minutes are not clear on precisely what the Ministry of Finance believed the competition authorities' role to be in relation to the CF Transaction then being discussed.
302. Strictly speaking, the Ministry of Finance could not speak for the OPC. But on the basis that Invesmart thought that significant progress was being made towards a grant of state aid, the Tribunal will examine what was conveyed to Invesmart on the issue of state aid prior to its increasing its share capital and approving the SPAs.
303. On the one hand, the 24 September 2002 meeting's minutes record that "in case ... [there is a] change to the agreement" the "Office for the Protection of Competition will need to be consulted and government approval will be required". This, as the Claimant argued, suggests that the then-contemplated form of state aid (i.e., reduction of the Fores deposit interest rate and the purchase of bad loans at book value or something closely related to book value) did not have to be approved by the OPC.

304. On the other hand, as the Respondent pointed out, the "next steps" identified by officials in the same minutes record that the "Ministry of Finance and CKA will discuss the form of the state aid with OPC as settlement of the stabilisation programme following return of OPC representatives from Brussels by 1 October 2002 at the latest". This suggests that the competition authorities had to be consulted on any deal that might constitute state aid and that they might determine that the Finanční interest rate and receivables deal did fall within their mandate.
305. The minutes are ambiguous on the issue of whether the competition authorities had to approve the CF deal sought by Union Banka and Invesmart. Since the substance of the discussions was disclosed to Invesmart, it would have been told that the OPC had some role to play in the approval of state aid (a point which was already known to it. However, the Tribunal cannot infer one way or the other whether the description of the meeting accorded with the part of the minutes that the Claimant emphasised or the part that the Respondent emphasised (or both).
306. Were this to be the only contemporaneous document that discussed the state aid issue, the Tribunal would be unable to judge what was conveyed to Invesmart. Further light can be shed on this issue, however, by two other contemporaneous documents showing that the competition authorities would play a role in a decision to grant state aid of any kind.
307. The first document was generated after the 12 September 2002 meeting between Invesmart representatives and the CNB. The meeting had evidently not gone well from Invesmart's perspective because of the CNB officials' statements about Invesmart's second application for approval and what its rejection might mean for Union Banka's licence. (As shall be seen (at paragraphs 543-546), a representative of certain shareholders in Invesmart attended the meeting and evidently formed a less than positive view of the bank's prospects.) In a letter dated 16 September 2002 sent after the meeting to the Governor of the CNB and four of his colleagues, [redacted] stated that the CNB's Mr Jirí Jířicek had informed them that if enough information on the financial aspects of the acquisition was not received by 16 September 2002, he would start the process to deny authorisation of the acquisition by Invesmart. [redacted] also recorded Jířicek's stating that in such a case he will also start the proceeding to withdraw the banking licence to Union Banka".<sup>206</sup>
308. [redacted] letter spurred a reply from the CNB dealing with among other issues the process by which the requested state aid would be addressed. At point 3 of its letter, the CNB recorded the fact that its representatives had informed Invesmart that:

[redacted] to Zdeněk Tůma, Pavel Racoča, Vladimír

3. As regards the CNB's standpoint concerning the successful completion of the transaction to acquire a qualifying holding and the possibility of the Bank's receiving state assistance, the CNB stated that any such assistance is primarily a matter for the Ministry of Finance, requires the approval of the Czech Government and must have the support of the Office for the Protection of Economic Competition, which is also assessing this matter in the context of the preparations for the Czech Republic's accession to the European Union. The CNB's opinion on the completion of the overall transaction was not expressed at the meeting.<sup>207</sup> [Emphasis added.]

309. This passage is instructive because it expressly brought to [redacted] attention the division of competencies between the CNB, Ministry of Finance and the OPC, the need for Czech government approval above and beyond the Minister's approval, the need for the support of the competition authorities, and the fact that the proposal was "also" being assessed within the context of the accession to the EU, the plain implication being that EU issues would be taken into consideration. At the hearing, [redacted] acknowledged that by this letter Invesmart was told by the CNB, before it approved the share acquisition, what the requirements for the granting of state aid were.<sup>208</sup>

310. The second document, a letter from Minister Sobotka to Governor Tůma, dated 7 October 2002, referred back to the meeting with Invesmart on 25 September 2002 at which the government's deliberations were disclosed to it. The Minister noted that:

On 25 September 2002 a meeting was held in the office of the First Deputy Minister of Finance with the representatives of Invesmart B.V. (Mr. Roselli, Mr. Rienmüller, Mr. Braun) in the presence of CEO of the Czech Consolidation Agency. In the context of the meeting, the representatives of Invesmart B.V. were informed of the requirements of the Bank Supervision Department for completion of the documents needed for grant of approval with entry of the investor to the bank with the deadline of 4 October 2002. Mr. Roselli gave a binding promise to provide the missing documents to the Bank Supervision Department in due course. At the same time the representatives of Invesmart B.V. were informed of the planned meeting with the Office for the Protection of Economic Competition in Brno with the aim to assess the procedure and options for resolution of the investor's requirement for settlement of the problems of Union Banka a.s. with regard to public support.<sup>209</sup> [Emphasis added.]

311. Any ambiguity in the 24 September 2002 minutes as to the state of thinking within the Government and as to what was communicated to Invesmart is thus resolved by a clear statement in writing sent to Invesmart just before the 25 September meeting and corroborated by the letter sent by the Finance Minister to the CNB Governor recapitulating what occurred in the meeting held the preceding day.

312. In the Tribunal's view, the role of the competition authorities in vetting any proposed state aid, including a settlement of the bank's relations with CF, was brought to the Claimant's attention before it submitted its third application on 22 October 2002.

The Czech Republic's commitment to the European Union

313. The Claimant argued further that the Respondent did not advise it prior to its shareholders approving the capital increase on 16 October 2002 that a statement had been made to the EC that the Czech Republic did not expect any further provision of state aid to the banking sector.<sup>210</sup> It also complained that it was not until a meeting held on 29 November 2002 that Invesmart was advised that Union Banka needed to submit a Restructuring Plan in accordance with the EU's Guidelines on State Aid for Rescuing and Restructuring Firms in Difficulty.<sup>211</sup>
314. In this regard, the Claimant pointed to a document which showed that at a meeting held on 16 May 2002 between the Ministry of Finance, the CNB, CF, and the Czech Consolidation Commission, Invesmart's potential acquisition of control of Union Banka was discussed by officials and in light of the undertaking given to the EU and the participants' view that there was little reason to provide state aid to the bank, it was resolved that CNB would proceed with the approval procedures but the "Ministry of Finance will inform the investor about the infeasibility of provision of state aid".<sup>212</sup> [Emphasis added.] The Claimant argued that it was not informed of this complicating factor until after it approved the capital increase.
315. The consideration of this complaint requires the Tribunal to first take note of the amendment to the SPAs that was effected just before Invesmart's shareholders approved the €90 million capital increase at a meeting held on 16 October 2002. Addendum No 5, which cancelled its predecessor, No 4, was concluded on 14 October 2002. The purchaser and the sellers agreed in this addendum that Invesmart would assume the debts of the selling shareholders without undue delay. The assumption of debts obligation was made conditional upon (i) the CNB's approval of Invesmart's application to acquire control of the bank and its assumption of the selling shareholders' debts; and (ii) the approval of Invesmart's shareholders.<sup>213</sup>
316. Two features of this addendum are salient. First, consistent with its predecessor's removal of Clause 3.3 from SPA B (the condition precedent relating to state aid), nothing in this addendum expressly made the completion of the Share Purchase Agreements conditional upon the granting of state aid. Secondly, Invesmart nevertheless still had a right not to complete the deal because its shareholders had to approve the transaction before it could bind the company.

317. The second point is relevant to the legitimate expectations argument because there is a temporal issue relating to the Claimant's decision to approve the SPAs. The Claimant argued that it did not know about the Respondent's commitment to the EC until after its shareholders approved the capital increase.<sup>214</sup> This may be so, but it is not the end of the matter.
318. Due to Invesmart's failure to properly convene the 16 October 2002 meeting at which its shareholders approved the capital increase, that decision had to be put to another vote on 4 November 2002 whereupon the shareholders ratified their earlier decision.<sup>215</sup> It was at this same meeting that the SPAs were approved.<sup>216</sup> Thus, the relevant time for determining whether Invesmart irrevocably committed to its investment in the bank without knowledge of the Czech Government's undertaking to the EC is not 16 October, but 4 November 2002.
319. It is clear from the record that Invesmart was advised in the CNB's letter of 19 September 2002 that the aid issue was being considered in "the context of the preparations for the Czech Republic's accession to the European Union".<sup>217</sup> To the extent that this failed to fully disclose the Minister's undertaking, the Tribunal notes that at a meeting held on 25 October 2002, ten days before Invesmart's shareholders approved the SPAs, the company's advisors, Euro-Trend, were informed of the Rychecký letter to the EC that there would be no more public subsidisation of the banks.<sup>218</sup>
320. Thus, although the Claimant correctly points out that this discussion occurred one day after the CNB approved the acquisition, this information was conveyed to Invesmart's representatives well before Invesmart held its second shareholders meeting on 4 November 2002 at which the shareholders approved the Share Purchase Agreements.
321. The Tribunal also notes that with respect to the need to draw up a Restructuring Plan, it appears from the record that that was explicitly discussed for the first time at a meeting held on 29 November 2002. The Claimant has sought to attribute responsibility for this to the Respondent in the sense that this was "sprung" on Invesmart after it completed its acquisition of its shareholding interests. The Tribunal notes however that at the 25 November meeting, <sup>218</sup> Exhibit C-60, minutes of a meeting held on 25 October 2002 between Josef Doruška of the Ministry of Finance and Euro-Trend representatives.

Union Banka's new Director, Mr Radovan Vávra, provided a different explanation. The minutes record him informing the meeting that:

... The UB's director then explained why the former management has not made any efforts for granting of state aid earlier and had not prepared a restructuring plan – the reason was that they had assumed that the bank would win the arbitration against the CNB regarding the compensation of damages of CZK 1.9 billion.<sup>219</sup> [Emphasis added.]

322. Mr Vávra's remark must have been directed to the management personnel who held senior positions prior to his joining Union Banka in the autumn of 2002.
323. There is also record evidence that suggests that Invesmart had reason to appreciate that competition law considerations pertaining to EU accession could thwart its request for state aid for some months. As noted earlier, the inter-agency meeting which discussed the EU commitment was held on 16 May 2002. Invesmart met with the then-Minister of Finance shortly thereafter. The precise message conveyed to Invesmart when the Ministry of Finance then refused to consider granting state aid is not on the record, although the fact of that rejection is. [redacted] wrote to the CNB's Pavel Racoča by letter dated 20 May 2002 (four days after the inter-agency meeting was held), noting that:

... As you probably already know our meeting with the Minister of Finance was not particularly positive.

The Minister stressed that at this time they do not consider to conclude the acquisition of Fores by Česká Finanční.

As I mentioned to you last Friday we consider that transaction a main condition for completing our acquisition of 70 per cent of Union Group.

Nevertheless, considering the upcoming elections and the fact that Union Banka application at Česká Finanční has not been formally rejected, we have decided to follow up with our application with the Central Bank and to confirm our commitment to the project...<sup>220</sup>

324. The Tribunal has already adverted to [redacted] 28 June 2002 letter which recognised that the OPC could block the transaction.
325. Thus, although there is no direct evidence of precisely what was communicated to Invesmart by the Respondent after the inter-agency meeting of 16 May 2002, it can be inferred from [redacted] contemporaneous letters that Invesmart was informed of issues relating to competition law as it affected the granting of state aid to Union Banka. There would have been no reason for                      to advert to the OPC's role had that not been brought to Invesmart's attention.

326. Finally, assuming arguendo that the Czech authorities did not inform Invesmart of the undertaking to the EU in May 2002 and instead referred only to competition law issues generally, the question is whether that undertaking was materially different from what Invesmart knew or should have known was the situation under Czech and EU law.
327. Here the Tribunal is of the view that: (i) the Czech Republic's accession to the Treaty of Rome was well known; (ii) Invesmart knew from June 2002 that the OPC could, to use Mr Catalfamo's words, "prevent us from the realisation of our project"; (iii) Invesmart was advised in mid-September 2002 that the state aid was being assessed "in the context of the preparations for the Czech Republic's accession to the European Union"; (iv) Invesmart's advisors were informed on 25 October 2002 of the Rychetský letter; (v) reasonable due diligence into the governing Czech and EU law would have confirmed that state aid is prohibited unless an exemption is granted; and (vi) the Czech Republic's undertaking was communicated to Invesmart at the latest by 25 October 2002, prior to 4 November 2002 when its shareholders approved the Share Purchase Agreements. The Claimant was in a position to understand that state aid had to be justified because it would be scrutinised by both Czech and EU competition authorities.

What did the Ministry of Finance commit to do?

328. The Tribunal turns to the seminal issue, namely; what did the Minister of Finance agree to do at the 24 September 2002 meeting? The parties disagree over the meaning and import of the 24 September 2002 meeting minutes' statement that "the minister of finance is ready to submit a document for the state aid defined in this way for the government session". The question is whether a document which by its own words indicates a willingness to follow a process of seeking approval of aid constituted a promise, to deliver that aid, enforceable under the Treaty.
329. The disagreement centres on whether the Minister undertook an obligation of result such that, beginning with the debriefing on 25 September 2002 and crystallising on 24 October 2002, the Claimant formed a legitimate expectation that state aid was approved (the Claimant's view), or whether the Minister undertook an obligation of process, i.e., that he would evaluate the bank's planned restructuring and if he formed the view that it had a reasonable prospect of success, he would submit it to the Cabinet and the OPC for approval (the Respondent's view).
330. In the Tribunal's view, the weakness for the Claimant's case is that the evidence shows that as of 24 October 2002, the form of state aid and the modalities of getting approvals from the Ministry of Finance, the Cabinet and the OPC were not fully defined. Put simply, on 24 October 2002, the bail-out plan was a proposal from Invesmart dating back to 20 August 2002 which lacked the kind of detail and definition that would be required to obtain regulatory approval.

331. The Tribunal finds support for this finding in the following facts derived mainly from contemporaneous documents prepared prior to and after 24 October 2002.

332. First, although the Claimant relied upon the inter-agency meeting of 24 September 2002 as proof of the Minister's commitment to deliver state aid in a particular form,<sup>221</sup> the evidence strongly suggests that the CNB did not consider that the Finance Minister had made such a commitment at that meeting. Otherwise, there would have been no reason for the CNB's Mr Dědek to write to Minister Sobotka on 11 October 2002 to outline the CNB's subsequent discussions with Invesmart, noting that the investor had stated its intention to deliver all of the missing documents (pertaining to the source of its funds for the acquisition of its shareholding in the bank) very soon, and to "ask you, dear Minister, that the Ministry of Finance of the Czech Republic ... [communicate] its clear standpoint to the representatives of Invesmart B.V."<sup>222</sup> Had the Ministry already promised to deliver state aid, a letter from the CNB requesting him to communicate his clear standpoint on the aid issue would have been unnecessary.

333. Secondly, the testimony of both Governor Tůma and former Minister Sobotka was consistent that up to 24 October 2002, including at the meeting of the CNB's Bank Board that day, the Ministry of Finance had indicated its willingness to proceed with the process of considering state aid, but that no commitment to deliver state aid had been undertaken by the Ministry up to and including that date.<sup>223</sup>

334. The minutes recording the Bank Board's 24 October 2002 meeting are cryptic in that they record the fact of that the Minister spoke but not what he said. Due to the seminal importance of this issue, the Tribunal has examined the contemporaneous documents with care in order to determine whether there is any document that corroborates the witnesses' testimony on this point. It notes that after the CNB approved Invesmart's entry into Union Banka, the minutes of the meeting of 5 November 2002 record the Ministry of Finance's view that the CNB's approval of 24 October 2002 had been the MOF's pre-condition for the resumption of negotiations between the Ministry and Invesmart. The minutes record him as stating that:

The MOF's condition for negotiations to be reopened was an unambiguous position of CNB on the approval of the investor Invesmart B.V. entry into Union banka, a.s. This condition was fulfilled.<sup>224</sup> [Emphasis added.]

335. This record, from a document prepared two weeks after the Bank Board meeting but prepared well before the instant dispute arose, is in the Tribunal's view, corroboration of the two Respondent witnesses' testimony on this point. It is consistent with Governor Tůma's testimony that prior to 24 October, a certain deadlock had arisen between the CNB and the Finance Ministry: "On the one hand, the Finance Ministry wanted to know whether Invesmart was acceptable for us, and once again we are back to the question that Invesmart was not a substantial company and so on". He continued, "... on the other hand, we certainly would prefer to know from the State whether they would have been willing to provide the state aid or not". Somebody had to break the deadlock, he testified, "... so we said, 'Okay, this investor is acceptable for the Czech National Bank', and then it was up to the Finance Ministry to decide".<sup>225</sup> The Tribunal also notes that there is no record of anyone representing Union Banka or Invesmart taking issue with the Ministry of Finance's characterisation of its "condition for negotiations to be reopened".
336. Thirdly, roughly one week before the CNB issued its approval, on 16 October 2002, Union Banka retained Euro-Trend to advise it on the state aid issue.<sup>226</sup> The letter of authorisation specifically contemplated Euro-Trend's conducting negotiations "aimed at the restructuring" with "the Ministry of Finance of the Czech Republic, the Czech Consolidation Agency, Česká finanční s.r.o. and other state institutions".<sup>227</sup> Reference to the terms of the contract shows that Union Banka's objective was to negotiate "the restructuring of its balance sheet with the participation of the Czech State", and Euro-Trend was to "perform ... all necessary negotiations with all involved parties, in particular with the Czech Ministry of Finance, Česká konsolidační agentura, and Česká finanční s.r.o. in order to successfully implement the objective" just described.<sup>228</sup> [Emphasis added.] The Agreement further provided that Euro-

During the hearing, former Minister Sobotka adhered to the position that throughout the September–October 2002 period, although Invesmart had a proposal on the table in the form of its 20 August 2002 letter, the negotiations were not advanced and since Invesmart's application had twice been rejected by the CNB, the Ministry was interested in whether the CNB would approve its entry into Union Banka.

Trend would be paid a fixed monthly amount of CZK 100,000 and a contingency fee of CZK 5 million in "the event the Customer's objective is successful".<sup>229</sup>

337. The timing and content of this agreement indicates that having received a debriefing of the 24 September 2002 inter-agency meeting and having appointed Mr Vávra as its new CEO, Union Banka then retained professional advisors to negotiate on its behalf.<sup>230</sup> The retention of advisors to assist in negotiations is indicative that a state aid package had not been agreed, even in Union Banka's view. Moreover, with the contract's heavy weighting of compensation towards a success fee, both parties explicitly recognised that the substantial part of Euro-Trend's fee would be paid only upon the attainment of the objective, i.e., the grant of the aid being sought.

338. This contract, executed on the same day as the shareholders of Invesmart initially voted on the capital increase, supports the finding that all parties, including Union Banka and Invesmart, considered that they were about to engage in a process of negotiation, the outcome of which was plainly hoped-for by the bank and the Claimant, but which could not be guaranteed.

339. Although it does not place great weight upon it, the Tribunal notes that an interview given by [redacted] on 24 February 2003, after the aid was refused, was consistent with its finding. The interview quoted [redacted] as stating that:

After obtaining a majority stake in Union banka, our first steps quite logically led to the Ministry of Finance, where we wanted to begin discussion on what would happen with the bank from now on. We received a letter signed by Mr. Janota stating that the Ministry of Finance was ready and willing to look for a solution and to assist in the restructuring of Union banka. In November, we therefore started negotiations...<sup>231</sup> [Emphasis added.]

340. This was put to [redacted] during cross examination. He testified that he could not remember what was said on 24 February 2003 because the situation was very hectic and he participated in many press interviews. He asserted that the quote attributed to him, that there had been no negotiations before November 2002, was not accurate. He did accept, however, that there were "many differences, absolutely" between the story published by Euro magazine on 24 February 2003 and the case pleaded before the Tribunal.<sup>232</sup>

341. Fourthly, the Tribunal notes that Euro-Trend's First Proposal for Union Banka, dated 4 November 2002, was submitted to the Ministry of Finance 11 days after the Claimant says that its expectation crystallised. The Plan set out the proposed CF Transaction (lowering of the interest rate and the sale of the loan portfolio to CF) but also noted that there was a potential connection between this aid (which Euro-Trend argued could not be characterised as a grant of new state aid as suggested by what it called a "potential opinion" of the OPC<sup>233</sup>) and the resolution of Union Banka's arbitration claim against the CNB:

The proposed grant of state aid may be further connected to the resolution of the existing dispute between Union banka, a.s. and CNB, concerning the additional reimbursement of losses from transactions of overtaken banks amounting to approx. CZK 1.9 billion, such that no further requirement on fiscal funds would arise.<sup>234</sup>

342. This indicates that the form of the aid was still up for consideration even from Union Banka's perspective. Indeed, the BDS "receivable" can be seen as an attempt by the bank to find an alternative to the CF Transaction, because Euro-Trend had been told on 25 October that that transaction raised competition law issues.

343. Fifthly, the view of government officials who reviewed the First Proposal was that it required more work. The minutes of the 5 November 2002 meeting recorded the view that "any aid must be targeted, limited and pre-negotiated with the UOHS [OPC]" and that the "submitted document, if the solution proposed therein is chosen, must be further supplemented by the description of evaluation method, averaging of gained values, if appropriate, and by the clarification of procedure used in 'final calculation of the aid up to CZK 1.2 billion'".<sup>235</sup>

344. Sixthly, the Tribunal notes that in the meetings held on 25 October, 5 November and 29 November 2002, there is no record of Union Banka, Euro-Trend or Invesmart ever complaining that the issues then being discussed by the participants were inconsistent with their earlier expectation that a concrete state aid package had been promised when the CNB approved the share acquisition on 24 October 2002. The bank's representatives did express concern at the length of time that it would take to obtain the OPC's approval, but there is no suggestion in the minutes that the government was being accused of renegeing on a prior promise to deliver an agreed amount of state aid.

345. In brief, the documentary evidence surrounding 24 October 2002 indicates that the form of state aid was not agreed and that negotiations were expected by all sides of the proposed transaction. If there is any doubt on this point, it is put to rest by the next meeting of the parties at which Euro-Trend's Second Plan was discussed. This proposed changing the form of state aid, envisaging that the state would implement one or more of the following measures: (i) the lowering of the fixed interest rate on the Fores Deposit of 11.5 percent to a floating market rate; (ii) the early termination of the Fores Deposit and its transformation into five-year subordinated debt; (iii) the acquisition by CKA of a portfolio of non-performing assets at a price determined by independent experts plus an additional amount of state aid; and (iv) a state guarantee of a portfolio of loans.<sup>236</sup> The possibility of a state guarantee was raised by Euro-Trend. There is no indication from the record that it had been discussed previously.

346. Having regard to all the evidence, the Tribunal considers that although Invesmart could reasonably have held the view after 24 September 2002 that the Minister supported a potential bail out of Union Banka, it could not have a legitimate expectation either as of that date or as of 24 October 2002, when the CNB approved its acquisition of control of the bank, that the Czech government had promised to grant state aid. Had it retained counsel to advise on the competition law aspects of the state aid issue, it would have understood that the aid proposed through the settlement of the bank's relations with CF almost certainly did constitute state aid under EU and Czech law and that the process of preparing a detailed justification for its granting was necessary and without such a document the Minister and the Cabinet, let alone the OPC, could not approve it.

Conclusion on legitimate expectations

347. Before concluding on the legitimate expectations claim, the Tribunal wishes to address one other limb of the Claimant's case.
348. It appeared to the Tribunal that the Claimant argued that to the extent that the evidence showed that the Respondent had undertaken a commitment to a process as opposed to a result (the latter being the Claimant's primary position), the Respondent could not take advantage of its own failure to comply with its domestic laws in failing to obtain the requisite approvals of the Czech Cabinet and the OPC.<sup>237</sup> In its closing submissions, Invesmart argued that its case was not that state aid would be supported in violation of Czech or EU law, but rather that the Respondent "would take such steps needed to lawfully supply the promised state support."<sup>238</sup> At another point, it asserted that its legitimate expectation was "a clean bank with a combination of the Česká Financní transaction and a contribution of the assumption of the related-party loans with a net asset value of CZK 1.162 million".<sup>239</sup>

349. No matter how the proposition is put, in the Tribunal's view, the Claimant's legitimate expectation argument presupposed the approval of the Cabinet and the OPC. That is, on the basis of what was communicated to Invesmart prior to 24 October 2002, state aid would have been granted if the Minister had only submitted the request.
350. In the Tribunal's view, this was not the case. Having regard to the legal framework that governed the granting of state aid, the Minister could not simply rubberstamp the bank's application without evaluating its merits in terms of its potential to meet the requirements of Czech and EU law.<sup>240</sup> For an application to be submitted to the Cabinet, let alone be approved by the OPC, the Minister had to be satisfied that it had a reasonable prospect of achieving the goal of stabilising the bank. This required the applicant to submit a restructuring plan that met the requirements of the law, and the Minister, the Cabinet and the OPC had to agree that the plan met those requirements.
351. The Tribunal does not see how the Claimant's legitimate expectation that the Ministry of Finance would follow a process meant that such expectation would deliver the desired result. At the time that the expectation was said to have crystallised, the Respondent was not, in the Tribunal's view, in a position to promise that state aid would be granted. It could, and did, undertake a commitment of process, but not of result and the Claimant should have understood that to be the case. As the evidence shows, ultimately, the Minister concluded that the Restructuring Plan did not have a reasonable prospect of success.

Inconsistency and ambiguity

The Claimant

352. The Claimant relied on a recent line of case law to argue that the Czech Republic breached the fair and equitable treatment standard by failing to treat its investments "consistently" and "without ambiguity".<sup>241</sup>
353. Specifically, the Claimant submitted that the Respondent had acted inconsistently by:

<sup>240</sup> By the end of the hearing, it was common ground between the parties that the CNB is not vested with the authority or power to decide whether state aid should be granted. That falls within the remit of the Minister of Finance. Even then, the evidence is that the Minister does not possess final decision-making power; rather, having evaluated a proposal, he decides whether to put it to Cabinet for its approval and by virtue of Czech law implementing EU law, the Cabinet decision is not effective without the approval of the OPC. This is fundamental to, and expressed in, the operation of the host state's law on state aid and the Tribunal must have due regard to it.

- (a) Approving Invesmart's acquisition of Union Banka and then simultaneously causing a run on Union Banka by making irresponsible comments to the Czech media on 22 October 2002;<sup>242</sup>
- (b) Adopting inconsistent positions towards Invesmart and Union Banka after Invesmart's assumption of Union Banka's RPLs. Invesmart submitted that it had invested in Union Banka and Union Group in the belief that the Government would provide state aid under the CF Transaction. Following the Invesmart's acquisition of Union Banka and Union Group the CNB continued to support the CF Transaction whilst the Ministry of Finance and the CKA did not;<sup>243</sup>
- (c) Further, Invesmart submitted that it was caught between the inconsistent proposals of different organs of the Czech Government in relation to the form of state aid.<sup>244</sup> Specifically, at the 5 November 2002 meeting, discussed at paragraph 124 above, the CKA supported the settlement of the BDS Arbitration Claim as a "purely commercial solution that should not meet with a negative response from the UOHS".<sup>245</sup> However, the CNB was not prepared to settle the BDS Arbitration Claim;<sup>246</sup>
- (d) Resiling from its position held prior to Invesmart's acquisition of Union Banka that the OPC need only be "consulted" with respect to state aid. Following the investment, the Czech Republic "changed the rules of engagement" by requiring that the OPC "pre-approve" any grant of state aid;<sup>247</sup>
- (e) After Invesmart prepared the restructuring plan, the MOF failed to submit it for review and approval by the OPC as promised;<sup>248</sup>
- (f) Failing to publicly declare its support for Invesmart and Union Banka through the making of a Resolution as it had promised to do on 29 November 2002, which would have aided the bank.<sup>249</sup>

The Respondent

355. The factual basis for each of these allegations was rejected by the Respondent. Its defence of these claims can be summarised thus:

- (a) The run on Union Banka was not caused by inaccurate statements made by the CNB to the media but arose instead from the public's loss of confidence in Union Banka's capacity to resolve its long-standing difficulties when the deadline for Invesmart to appeal the rejection of its Second Application for state aid expired. This was of common public knowledge;<sup>251</sup>
- (b) It did not adopt conflicting positions toward Invesmart and Union Banka for it was Invesmart and Union Banka, and not the Government, who introduced the CNB Receivable as a potential mechanism to secure delivery of state aid in January 2003 even though the CNB Receivable had been discussed and rejected by the Government a full two months earlier;<sup>252</sup>
- (c) The requirement that state aid be "pre-approved" by the OPC was not arbitrary; rather it flowed from the then applicable Czech and EU law with which it was not erroneous of the Government to insist compliance on the part of Invesmart. Failure to comply warranted the denial of state aid;<sup>253</sup>
- (d) The Czech Republic was under no obligation to publicly declare its support of Union Banka before a decision on the grant of state aid was given just as it was similarly under no obligation to grant state aid.<sup>254</sup>

356. With respect to the Claimant's allegation that the Czech Republic failed to provide adequate notice of its decision not to grant state aid, the Respondent points out that Invesmart was given notice of the decision not to grant aid orally on the day the decision was taken.<sup>255</sup> Further a letter informing Invesmart of the decision in writing was sent to Union Banka's official

Tribunal's analysis

Inconsistency - OPC approval

357. At the core of Invesmart's claim that is the allegation that the Government changed the rules of engagement and following its assumption of the RPL's introduced a new requirement: that state aid be subject to OPC approval.
358. This issue was also raised in the context of legitimate expectations. The Tribunal concludes at paragraph 327 that the role of the competition authorities in vetting any proposed state aid, including in respect of the CF transaction, was brought to the Claimant's attention before it submitted its third application to acquire Union Banka on 22 October 2002. It follows from this conclusion that when the Government informed Invesmart on 5 November 2002 that the CF Transaction constituted "new" state aid and would be subject to OPC approval that there was no change in position as the Claimant alleges.<sup>257</sup>

The run on Union Banka

359. At the hearing the parties agreed as to the specific wording of the comment Ms Frišaufová made to the Czech media on 22 October 2002. Specifically, Ms Frišaufová made the following statement:

In this administrative proceeding the CNB did not grant its approval to Invesmart for the acquisition of qualified interest in Union Banka because the investor failed to provide the source of funding for the acquisition. As far as this proceeding is concerned, the decision is final. This does not, however, preclude Invesmart from filing a new application and commencing new administrative proceedings on granting the approval with the transfer of the shares.<sup>258</sup>

360. The Tribunal's considers that these comments were ill-considered, given Union Banka's already weak financial position. In late October 2002 the uncertainty surrounding Union Banka was, in part, a consequence of the CNB Governor's advice to Invesmart submit a new application to acquire a controlling interest in Union Banka rather than appeal the CNB's rejection of Invesmart's second application during the appeal period 4 - 22 October 2002. The CNB was aware that Invesmart had submitted a revised submission on 22 October 2002 and this was recognised by the CNB spokeswoman. In consequence, the CNB's approval of the new application and the OPC's approval of state aid were, at that time, open issues.

361. The destabilising impact of the CNB's comments is illustrated by the way the issue was reported by the Czech media. In particular, a report published by Česká Tisková Kancelár included the following sentence "Frišaufová said she did not want to anticipate future developments, but did not rule out that taking away the bank's license was one possibility".<sup>259</sup>
362. That the run on Union Banka might have been avoided is shown by the fact that it was ended when on 24 October 2002, the CNB approved Claimant's application to acquire a share in Union Banka and Union Group.
363. The statements in question, having been made publicly by the CNB spokeswoman, are imputable to the CNB; the conduct of a state entity such as the CNB being attributable to the Czech Republic. The Respondent cannot escape criticism in view of the recognised sensitivity of public announcements in the banking sector.
364. That being said, the Tribunal holds that this conduct cannot amount, per se, in isolation, to a violation of fair and equitable treatment. The Tribunal notes that at the time this statement was made it was, strictly speaking, factually accurate. The purpose of making the statement was explained by Governor Tůma in cross-examination:
- Everybody knew at that time that Union banka was in [a] difficult position, and the pressure for the bank didn't occur after the statement by Mrs Frišaufová. The pressure was long -- longer, for a longer period. We decided, and everybody knew, or the general public knew that -- and by the way, it was used as the argument that the investor is applying and there is a chance that the investor would take over, and this is -- so it was used also by the Union banka as the argument for the general public that the situation would calm down.<sup>260</sup>
365. These comments by Governor Tůma are persuasive. In particular, that the problems at Union Banka existed many months prior to October 2002 and that the comments made by Ms Frišaufová are capable of being characterised as an attempt to reassure the public. Whilst these comments may be criticised in retrospect, given the run that occurred on 23 October 2002, the Tribunal is not satisfied that the conduct constitutes a breach of fair and equitable treatment.
366. The Respondent also asserted that the information contained in Ms Frišaufová's statement was already in the public domain. This contention is strongly supported by public statements made by _____ prior to the comments made by Ms Frišaufová. The Respondent tendered evidence that on 22 October 2002 Mlada fronta Dnes, one of the principal Czech National dailies, reported that Invesmart had confirmed that it did not appeal against the decision of the CNB to deny its second application to acquire Union Banka. This paper quoted as saying "It is very complicated. It cannot be definitively said that we do not continue in our negotiations. We are in contact with the CNB".<sup>261</sup>

367. Ultimately, the run on Union Banka occurred as a result of public perception that the prospects of Union Banka being acquired by a foreign investor had declined. It may be equally fair to speculate that this perception existed as a result of _____ comments, or both _____ and the CNB's comments taken together.

The CKA's proposal to settle the BDS arbitration claim

368. At the 5 November meeting CKA proposed settlement of the BDS Arbitration Claim for CZK 1.8 billion as a means of conferring a benefit on Union Banka "that would not meet with a negative response from the UOHS".<sup>262</sup> The minutes of the meeting record that the proposal would be put to the CNB expeditiously,<sup>263</sup> the latter having not attended the meeting. However, few days later, at a meeting held on 29 November 2002, the CNB rejected the proposal since it "did not admit the Union Banka's claim".<sup>264</sup> Mr Vávra for Union Banka, present at the meeting together with a representative of Invesmart, took note of the CNB's position, no remarks or objection on his part being reflected by the minutes of the meeting.
369. Thus, Union Banka and Invesmart were made aware, about three weeks after the CKA's proposal, that the same could not be implemented due to the CNB's opposition. The Tribunal considers that a governmental entity against which an arbitral claim had been made, and which was not represented at the meeting at which the settlement of the claim against it was discussed, was entitled to state its objection when it became apprised of the discussion.
370. This conduct by the various entities of the Czech Republic does not amount to a violation of Article 3.

The MOF's failure to submit the Third Restructuring Plan to the OPC

371. The reasons for the MOF's rejection of the Third Restructuring Plan were given by Minister Sobotka in his letter to Union Banka dated 20 February 2003.<sup>265</sup> The application for state aid having been rejected, there was no reason for the MOF to submit Union Banka's application to the OPC for an exemption from state aid prohibition, as mentioned by Minister Sobotka in the same letter. The MOF's prior approval was in fact a necessary pre-condition of the OPC's review of state aid proposals. Further, the MOF, after the many months spent in an attempt to find a solution to the state aid issue, had no obligation to meet again with Union Banka to explore alternative solutions. Union Banka's financial situation at that point in time, as confirmed by its CEO, Mr Vávra, on 19 February 2003, was so critical ("catastrophical", regarding the liquidity situation) as to suggest that no time was left for further discussions.<sup>266</sup>

The MOF's "undertaking" to issue a resolution in support of Union Banka

372. The minutes of the 29 November 2002 meeting do not appear to reflect the Claimant's assertion that the Government undertook "to issue a public commitment in the form of a resolution allowing an exemption on the ban on State aid" with the view of reassuring the public and Union Banka's customers that the bank had the full support of the Government.<sup>267</sup> The record shows that Mr Vávra proposed that:

Given the time needed to draw up a restructuring plan and the time it would take the UOHS to issue a decision, the UB CEO asked if it would be possible to make use of this period by submitting all the necessary material to the government, which would then issue a resolution stating that the government had considered the issue and would only assess the possibility of providing state aid to the bank on condition that the UOHS allowed such aid to be provided under Law 59/2000 on State aid - in other words, issue a decision allowing an exemption from the ban on state aid.<sup>268</sup>

373. The somewhat confused record of this part of the minutes prompted a clarification by the First Deputy Finance Minister (present at the meeting), who suggested that the exemption by the MOF was not meant to refer to the ban on state aid but rather "to the comments procedure".<sup>269</sup>
374. Following that meeting, based on its understanding that the Government had accepted to issue a resolution allowing an exemption on the ban on state aid, Union Banka circulated a draft of the Government's resolution to that effect.<sup>270</sup> The draft resolution was unacceptable to the Government since it amounted to the approval of state aid to Union Banka on condition of a positive decision of the OPC,<sup>271</sup> providing further that the amount and form of state aid resulting from UB's restructuring plan "shall be accepted by the Office for the Protection of Competition".<sup>272</sup> [Emphasis added.]

The Czech Republic's renewed commitment to the EC

375. As already mentioned, the Czech Republic cannot be reproached for its alleged failure to alert Invesmart about the need of the OPC's approval of the state aid. The Claimant contends that the Respondent should have informed Invesmart in a timely manner that obtaining such approval had become more difficult following the Deputy Prime Minister's commitment to the EC that the Czech Republic would not provide any new aid to banks. Due to the terms of the commitment so made (as reflected in the minutes of 29 November 2002 meeting),<sup>273</sup> the prospects of obtaining the EC's approval of new state aid by the Czech Republic were reduced.
376. The minutes mention that "possible further aid to UB would mean a violation of the commitment made by Deputy Prime Minister Pavel Rychetsky that the Czech Republic would not provide any new aid to banks".<sup>274</sup> In the Claimant's view, this wording underlines the fact that a serious additional obstacle existed to the granting of state aid to Union Banka, although the OPC's representatives indicated at the meeting that "they would not rule out the provision of aid to the bank on principle".<sup>275</sup>
377. According to the Claimant, the significance of the Czech Republic's failure to inform Union Banka and Invesmart in a timely manner is made manifest by the fact that by 29 November 2002 Invesmart had already completed its acquisition of Union Banka and Union Group. The Debt Assumption Agreements signed by Invesmart on 17 November 2002 had in fact become effective upon the transfer of shares in Union Banka and Union Group to Invesmart on 18 November 2002.<sup>276</sup>
378. The Claimant's complaint is misplaced in more than one respect. As already indicated at paragraph 319 above, the Deputy Prime Minister's commitment to the EC that there would be no more public subsidisation to the banks had been disclosed to Union Banka's advisors, Euro-Trend, at a meeting held on 25 October 2002.<sup>277</sup>

379. Further, as also already discussed at paragraph 318 above, the relevant time for determining whether Invesmart irrevocably committed to its investment in the bank without knowledge of the Respondent's commitment to the EC is not 16 October, but 4 November 2002.
380. The facts at hand may therefore be distinguished from the cases to which Invesmart referred in making its claim. In the present case, no decisions or permits had been issued by the State on which Claimant could reasonably rely to assume its commitments. This was the case in Tecmed and MTD. No such reliance was justified by the CNB's approval of Invesmart's acquisition of shares in Union Banka and Union Group since state aid had still to be cleared by the OPC. Contrary to the Saluka case, where the tribunal found that the Czech Republic had "acted inconsistently in its overall communications with IPB and Saluka/Nomura",<sup>278</sup> no such inconsistency may be imputed in the present case to the Czech Republic.
381. In the light of the foregoing, the Tribunal holds that Claimant's claim of breach by the Czech Republic of fair and equitable treatment for inconsistency and ambiguity of conduct fails.

Discrimination

The Claimant

382. With regard to its fair and equitable treatment claim, Invesmart also submitted that the Czech Republic's denial of state aid to Invesmart was discriminatory. The basis of this claim was Invesmart's contention that between 1990 and 2004 the Czech Republic routinely provided state aid to Czech banks whose circumstances were comparable to those of Union Banka whether viewed in terms of size, the amount of aid to be provided, the form of aid or the purpose of aid.<sup>279</sup>
383. Invesmart also argued that several of these banks had received emergency liquidity loans from the Czech Republic and that the Czech Republic's refusal to provide similar support to Union Banka was discriminatory.
384. In developing its submissions Invesmart referred the Tribunal to the Saluka arbitration in which the Czech Republic was found to have discriminated against a large Czech bank (IBP) without justification when it denied IBP's requests for state aid while granting state aid to three of the four other major Czech banks. In Saluka the tribunal accepted that this discrimination violated the fair and equitable treatment standard and the impairment clause. The Claimant argued that Union Banka's circumstances were analogous to those of IBP and that it was similarly discriminated against.

385. Invesmart went on to refer the Tribunal to its own analysis of state aid provided by the Czech Republic, and its predecessor state, to banks between 1990 and 2004.<sup>280</sup> This analysis was largely derived from information provided to the EC by the Czech Republic.<sup>281</sup> The Claimant's submissions on discrimination were also supplemented by Appendix A of the Statement of Claim which summarised the main forms of state aid that the Czech Republic provided to banks between 1990 and 2004. This evidence was summarised in the following way by the Claimant in opening submissions:

- (a) 12 mid-sized and small Czech banks received state aid from 1996 to 2001, including Prago Banka (1997), Agrobanka (1998) and PMB (2000, 2001);
- (b) Four Czech banks received state aid from 2001 to 2005 including PMB, Ceska Sportielna, Komerčni Banka and CSOB;
- (c) The Czech Republic provided vast amounts of state aid to promote restructuring and onward sales to strategic investors including IPB, Komerčni Banka, Ceska Sportielna, CSOB and Agrobanka.<sup>282</sup>

386. Invesmart also tendered expert evidence in support of its discrimination claim in the form of two reports by Associate Professor Raj M Desai dated 6 December 2007 and 11 July 2008. Professor Desai's first report was on the "relevant policies, methods and interests used in the provision of state support and assistance to the banking sector in the Czech Republic between the mid 1990s and mid 2000s".<sup>283</sup> Professor Desai's second report was in the form of a reply opinion which sought to evaluate the submission made in the Statement of Defence that Union Banka "could not be reasonably compared with other banks that received direct or implicit state budgetary or off-budgetary assistance".<sup>284</sup>

387. Professor Desai's first report described the state aid provided to Czech banks under the first and second Consolidation Programs and the Stabilisation Program in the 1990s. He opined that from 1998 onwards it was the policy of the Czech Republic to find a strong private "strategic investor" to assist with the privatisation and restructure of banks.<sup>285</sup> A number of Czech banks were privatised during this period and acquired by foreign investors, including IBP, Komerční Banka, Ceska Sporitelna, COB and Agro Banka. Each was provided with state aid in various forms.<sup>286</sup> Finally, Professor Desai described a number of small and medium sized banks that were granted state aid in the 1990s.<sup>287</sup>

388. In Professor Desai's second report much was made of the similarities between Nomura's acquisition of IBP, that was the subject of the Saluka arbitration, and Invesmart's acquisition of Union Banka. This was based on the contention that the problems afflicting both banks were typical of those experienced by Czech Banks throughout the 1990s. The report stated:

Insufficient capital adequacy, related lending, non-transparency in ownership, and consequent asset stripping and non-performing loans, were common across all types of Czech Banks in the 1990s -big and small, formerly state-owned or de novo.<sup>288</sup>

389. Professor Desai also opined that state aid was provided to numerous Czech banks from 2000 onwards. In paragraph 13 he states:

State aid was provided to numerous Czech banks after 2000. In particular, state support to Česká Spořitelna, a.s., took the form of bad-asset transfers (in March 2000) and contingent guarantees (June 2000 and June 2001). In the case of Komerční Banka, a.s. (KB), state aid was provided through rescue and restructuring support (March 2000) and guarantees as part of a sale of stock (October 2001). Československé Obchodní Banka, a.s., (CSOB) received state aid in conjunction with its acquisition of IPB (in June 2000), as well as through state-supported rescue and restructuring operations (throughout 2000, 2001, and 2002).<sup>289</sup>

The Respondent

390. The Respondent submitted that the factual record did not support Invesmart's discrimination claim.
391. The Respondent referred the Tribunal to the test for discrimination enunciated by the Saluka tribunal, namely as being whether (i) similar cases are (ii) treated differently (iii) without reasonable justification.<sup>290</sup>
392. The Respondent submitted that the Tribunal should distinguish Union Banka's circumstances from the facts in Saluka on the basis that in Saluka there was differential treatment between four clearly analogous banks. The Respondent pointed to a number of similarities between IBP and the three other major Czech banks: the four banks were all of a similar size; all had portfolios of non-performing loans; all were undergoing a process of privatisation; the failure of any of the banks would have had systemic consequences for the Czech banking sector.<sup>291</sup>

393. The Respondent went on to argue that no Czech banks operated under conditions similar to those of Union Banka. It submitted that:

(a) Union Banka was one of a more diverse group of small privately owned banks, some of which had been allowed to fail without the provision of state aid or following the provision of state aid,<sup>292</sup>

(b) Union Banka's balance sheet problems were the unique consequence of its acquisition of the four smaller banks in the 1990s;<sup>293</sup> and

(c) No similarly situated Czech bank was granted state aid in 2002 or 2003.<sup>294</sup>

394. The Respondent's submissions were supported by two expert opinions prepared by Professor Dr Dr h.c. Claus-Dieter Ehlermann dated 25 March 2008 and 2 October 2008, respectively.

395. In particular, Professor Elhermann's analysis introduced a temporal aspect to the discrimination case. Professor Ehlermann opined that "the situation in February 2003 was different from and not comparable to the situation in which earlier privatisations and takeover operations had taken place".

396. Professor Elhermann advanced two main arguments in support of this position.

397. First, the Czech Act on state aid, which was enacted on 1 April 2000 and entered into force on 1 January 2001, restricted the Czech Republic's legal right to grant state aid unless the OPC approved the grant.<sup>295</sup> The implementation of the new law had a significant impact on the preparedness of the Czech Government to make grants of state aid. Professor Elhermann acknowledged that the Czech Republic made grants of state aid after the implementation of the Act between January and June 2001. However, he suggested that these grants of state aid related to 'older' negotiations that pre-dated the Act.<sup>296</sup>

398. Secondly, state aid controls were imposed on the Czech Republic as part of its accession to the EU. Large sections of Professor Elhermann's first report were dedicated to describing how the

EC required that state aid control be implemented by the Czech Republic. These requirements were not strictly observed by the Czech Republic between 1998 and 2001. However, Professor Elhermann opined that the observance of these controls crystallised during the pre-accession period which coincided with Invesmart's and Union Banka 's negotiations with Czech government officials concerning state aid.<sup>297</sup>

399. At the core of Professor Elhermann's analysis was the distinction between the granting and payment of aid. As Professor Elhermann stated in his second report:

... there is a fundamental difference between the act of entering into a legally binding commitment, i.e. the grant, on the one hand, and the acts of implementation, i.e. the payments etc., on the other. These two different acts do not have the same character and should therefore not be characterised to be "alike" for a meaningful comparison under the principle of non-discrimination.<sup>298</sup>

400. The Respondent conceded that since 2000 there have been many examples of state aid being paid pursuant to arrangements made prior to 2001. However, the Respondent submitted that from 2001 onwards only two grants of state aid were made to banks by the Czech Republic.<sup>299</sup>

401. In closing submissions these grants were described by Professor Crawford in the following terms:

Since 2001 State aid was given to two banks and this aid was subsequently notified to the European Commission in the document exhibits C17 and C18. Each of those transactions has special features.

First in relation to PNB, this was a small bank in which the City of Prague had an interest, and under an indemnity of 27 December 2001 an amount of [CZK] 3.43 million was paid by way of aid. That amounts to €114,000 by my calculation.

Secondly, Komerční Banka was granted a tax relief in relation to State aid previously granted in an earlier year, which gave it an extraordinary profit. So in effect the government accepted the argument that the earlier aid shouldn't, as it were, be taken away in the form of taxation.<sup>300</sup>

402. In closing submissions the Respondent also tendered, without objection from the Claimant, a table listing 21 examples where OPC denied requests for state aid between 2001 and 2004.<sup>301</sup> Similarly, in the Statement of Defence the Respondent listed four small and medium sized banks that had been allowed to fail without the provision of state assistance.<sup>302</sup>

The Tribunal's analysis

403. On the basis that the parties adverted to Saluka, when making submissions on the discrimination issue and without engaging in an analysis of the correctness of that tribunal's treatment of discrimination as a part of the fair and equitable treatment standard, the Tribunal will consider whether the evidence other Czech banks were (i) similarly situated to Union Banka, yet (ii) treated differently (iii) without reasonable justification.

Were the other recipients of state aid similarly situated to Union Banka?

404. The Tribunal is not satisfied that Union Banka was similarly situated to other Czech Banks who received state aid at the time Union Banka sought it.
405. In its submissions the Claimant referred the Tribunal to numerous banks that received state aid following the State's transition from a communism, many as part of the Consolidation and Stabilisation Programs during the 1990s. The Tribunal notes that the parties agreed that throughout the 1990s the Czech banking system was in crisis and that as a result the Czech Republic, and its predecessor state, implemented three state aid programs to restructure and stabilise the banking system.<sup>303</sup> The parties also agreed that following the end of the Stabilisation Program in 1998 aid was provided to Czech banks in order to avert the failure of banks and to facilitate the sale of banks to foreign "strategic" investors.<sup>304</sup>
406. The Claimant placed significant emphasis on the state aid provided to Czech Banks during the Second Consolidation Program in 1995-1996 and the Stabilisation Program between 1996 and 1998. For example, in its opening submissions Invesmart referred the Tribunal to 12 mid-sized and small Czech banks that received state aid from 1996 to 2001. However, based on the evidence contained in the first report of Professor Desai it is apparent that the arrangements for the provision of this state aid were made between 1996 and 1998.
407. The Claimant said that Union Banka's problems were similar to those experienced by these other Banks because they were typical of systemic problems that plagued the Czech banking system throughout the 1990s. To wit, the key element of the Claimant's discrimination case was that the Czech Republic, in denying state aid, including emergency liquidity loans, had treated Union Banka differently to other banks that had similar problems.
408. In the Tribunal's opinion there are four key factors that arise from the Respondent's rebuttal of the discrimination claim which contradict this analysis.

409. First, the Respondent's claim that the policy of the Czech Republic towards the granting of state aid changed as a consequence of its accession to the EU significantly. The entry into force of the Czech Act on State Aid on January 2001 was a critical step in this process and it was clear that after this time there was a marked reluctance by the Czech Republic to grant state aid. This is supported by the fact that only two grants of state aid were made to banks between 2001 and 2003. It is also supported by the numerous denials of requests for state aid made by the OPC between 2001 and 2004. Further, it seems logical that the onus would be on the Czech Republic to strictly observe its commitments to the EU in the pre-accession period, particularly in respect of state aid control. No evidence was advanced by the Claimant that contradicted this claim.

410. Secondly, the Respondent was correct to draw a distinction between the granting and the paying of state aid. It is necessary for the Tribunal to compare the Government's decision to deny state aid with other instances where the state aid was granted. The point at which the decision was made and the Czech Republic assumed an obligation to pay state aid is the relevant factor in the Tribunal's inquiry in respect of discrimination.

411. The Tribunal notes that questions regarding the relevance of the distinction between granting and paying aid were put to Professor Desai in cross-examination. However, it is apparent from the following exchange that Professor Desai did not incorporate this distinction or specifically compare Union Banka's circumstances with those of banks who were granted state aid in 2002 and 2003.

Professor Crawford: You say in paragraph 13 of your opinion: "State aid was provided to numerous Czech Banks after 2000". If, by that, you mean State aid was disbursed to a number of Czech Banks after 2000, then I can agree with you. I think that is certainly true. But do you give any example of - and, of course, the words "after 2000" need clarification as well. By "after 2000" I mean any event after 1st January 2001.

Professor Desai: I understand.

Professor Crawford: So after the end of the calendar year 2000. Do you give any example in your opinion of a decision to grant State aid made after the end of the calendar year 2000?

Professor Desai: In this section I wasn't trying to make a distinction between grants and payments, which I do appreciate is a distinction that is important, as you've presented it. However, there are examples. From my understanding of the record, there are examples of grants, new grants, made. I believe in - certainly in 2000, you say --

Professor Crawford: I said after the end of 2000

Professor Desai: One, my understanding, for the record, is that there were some cases of grants made in 2001 I did not draw a distinction between them in this paragraph because I was not trying to make the distinction for the legal basis.<sup>305</sup>

412. Thirdly, the circumstances of the two banks that received state aid in 2002-2003 can be readily distinguished from the circumstances of Union Banka. In this regard, the distinction drawn by the Respondent in closing submissions seems sound. The Claimant did not seek to contradict this analysis, despite having been given the opportunity to do so.

413. Fourthly, it is highly relevant that there were other banks that were denied state aid and allowed to fail between 2000 and 2004. There can be no finding of discrimination if banks similarly situated to Union Banka are found to have been treated similarly to Union Banka. The fact that other banks were denied aid suggests this may be the case. Neither party made detailed submissions on the similarities between the small and medium banks that were denied aid, other than by reference to their size and the widespread problems affecting numerous Czech banks. The Claimant did not seek to distinguish Union Banka's circumstances from the banks that failed.

414. Finally, it is necessary for the Tribunal to refer to the analogy drawn by the Claimant between the facts in Saluka and the facts at hand. The Tribunal is of the opinion that the discrimination against IBP in Saluka was fundamentally different to that to the Czech Republic's treatment of Union Banka. This is because of the close comparison that the Saluka tribunal was able to draw between IBP and the three other major Czech banks. In its award, the Saluka tribunal noted that:

... irrespective of whether the bad debt problem with which the Big Four banks were face from 1998 to 2000 may properly be characterised as "systemic" or not, these banks were in a sufficiently comparable situation: All of them had large non-performing loan portfolios resulting in increase provisions and consequently insufficient regulatory capital. None of them was able to absorb the losses by calling on shareholder equity. The survival of all of them was sooner or later seriously threatened unless the Czech State was willing to provide financial assistance. On the other hand, due to the macroeconomic significance of the Big Four banks, the Czech State apparently could not afford to let any one of these banks fail.<sup>306</sup>

415. The Tribunal is not satisfied that Union Banka was in a situation comparable to that of any other Czech bank, let alone to all the other members of an identified class of Czech banks. The question of whether Union Banka was similarly situated to other banks requires more than an identification of single points of similarity, such as size, origin or private ownership. There must be a broad coincidence of similarities covering a range of factors. The comparators must be similarly placed in the market and the circumstances of the request for state aid must be similar. Therefore, the Tribunal concludes that Invesmart has not demonstrated that Union Banka was subject to discrimination by the Czech Republic.

Bad faith

The Claimant

416. The final strand of Invesmart's claim for breach of fair and equitable treatment is its claim that the Czech Republic acted in bad faith. In its Statement of Claim Invesmart advanced several examples of conduct undertaken by the Czech Republic which it claimed were examples of bad faith, including:

- (a) The Respondent induced Invesmart to acquire Union Banka by committing to undertake the CF Transaction in exchange for Invesmart's assumption of the RPLs. It then refused to complete the CF Transaction;
- (b) The Respondent's decision (or effective decision) to deny state aid had the result of saddling Czech taxpayers with a loss of CZK 18.5 billion, rather than providing some CZK 650 million in aid to Union Banka;
- (c) The Respondent mishandled the bankruptcy proceedings against Union Banka in Ústí nad Labem and in Ostrava. These proceedings, combined with criminal prosecutions of senior officials involved with the Ostrava proceedings, constituted a "deliberate conspiracy" by the Czech Republic against Union Banka.<sup>307</sup>

417. In its opening submissions Invesmart also claimed that the Czech Republic had acted in bad faith by engaging in a course of conduct that comprised the following actions:

- (a) failing to provide Invesmart with any notice of its decision to deny state aid;
- (b) leaking the decision to deny state aid to the media the same day that Invesmart was informed of the decision;
- (c) commencing administrative proceedings to revoke Union Banka's banking licence the day after state aid was denied;
- (d) making inflammatory press statements over the course of 21 February 2003; and

- (e) refusing to seriously consider four different plans put together by Invesmart and Union Banka to salvage Union Banka.<sup>308</sup>

The Respondent

418. The Respondent rejected the Claimant's allegation of bad faith. It submitted that the allegation was primarily based on the existence of a commitment of state aid that, in fact, never existed. In all other respects, the Respondent said, the Claimant's allegations of bad faith were unsubstantiated and it was entitled to a presumption of good faith.<sup>309</sup>

The Tribunal's analysis

419. In making its allegation of bad faith the Claimant correctly pointed out that while acts of bad faith violate the fair and equitable treatment standard, bad faith is not required to make out a violation of the standard.

420. This was noted by the tribunal in Mondev International Ltd. v United States of America when it stated that:

To the modern eye, what is unfair or inequitable need not equate with the outrageous or the egregious. In particular, a State may treat foreign investment unfairly and inequitably with out necessarily acting in bad faith.<sup>310</sup>

421. Similar sentiments were expressed by the tribunal in the Loewen case:

Neither state practice, the decisions of international tribunals nor the opinion of commentators support the view that bad faith or malicious intention is an essential element of unfair and inequitable treatment.<sup>311</sup>

422. In the Tribunal's opinion these statements notably draw an appropriate distinction between other forms of unfair and inequitable conduct, such as manifest unreasonableness, inconsistency and arbitrariness, and bad faith conduct, which has malicious or egregious intent, such as deliberate conspiracy, as an essential ingredient.

423. The Tribunal was unable to identify this essential ingredient in the Respondent's conduct on the evidence presented to it.

<sup>311</sup> The Loewen Group, Inc. and Raymond L. Loewen v. United States of America (ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/98/3), Award dated 26 June 2003, para 185.

424. The factual aspects of many of the Claimant's bad faith allegations have been considered by the Tribunal in assessing other aspects of the Claimant's fair and equitable claim and its claims under Article 5.1 of the BIT.

425. Rather than restate this analysis the Tribunal only raises those aspects of the evidence that are specifically pertinent to the Claimant's allegation of bad faith.

Inducement to assume the RPLs

426. For the reasons set out in paragraphs above the Tribunal is not persuaded by the Claimant's submission that the Czech Government induced Invesmart to assume the RPLs by undertaking to complete the CF transaction. At paragraphs 347-351 the Tribunal has already concluded that Invesmart could not have had a legitimate expectation that the Czech Republic would provide any form of state aid.. Further, at paragraphs 290-291 the Tribunal observes that Addendum No 4, which removed the provision of state aid as a pre-condition to SPA B, was dated 14 August 2002, seven days before it made its first proposal to the MOF on 20 August 2002. It follows from these findings that there was no inducement by the Czech Republic and therefore no bad faith.

427. Arguably, Invesmart entered these arrangements on the hope that state aid would be provided. However, this was a commercial judgment, the risk for which must be borne by Invesmart.

Failure to choose the least cost option

428. The Tribunal next turns its attention to Invesmart's contention that in revoking Union Banka's banking license the Czech Republic opted for a more costly alternative than providing the requested state aid to Union Banka.

429. Invesmart raised this same argument in relation to its expropriation claim. Specifically, Invesmart argued that the Czech Republic's expropriatory actions breached the BIT because the revocation of the banking licence was not in the public interest; the Czech Republic opted for the more costly course of action rather than grant state aid.

430. This argument mischaracterises the concept of bad faith. A government cannot be accused of acting in bad faith merely because it chooses one of several policy alternatives. Even where the course of action adopted is capable of criticism there is no showing of bad faith absent egregious intent.

431. The allegation is especially misguided given the evidence that it was not clear that the provision of state aid was the least-cost alternative given the dire financial circumstances of Union Banka in February 2003. It was reasonable, given the fragile liquidity situation of Union Banka, for the Minister of Finance to consider that even if aid were provided the future solvency of Union Banka would still be highly uncertain. It was, by February 2003, a case of putting good money after bad.

The proceedings in Ústí nad Labem and the allegation of deliberate conspiracy

432. In its opening submissions the Claimant described these proceedings thus:

That was a criminal proceeding to steal the bank's assets. The Czech Government itself has prosecuted the judge, the bankruptcy trustee and several other Government official that were involved in the Ústí nad Labem debacle ... As a result of this sham proceeding the bank was actually seized by a band of armed men ... who described himself as the bankruptcy trustee. and others were forced out of the bank. The situation was resolved to the Czech Republic's credit, in four or five days, but it may say something about motive in this case.<sup>312</sup>

433. The Tribunal assumes that the reference to motive in the Claimant's opening submissions is a reference to the allegation that the Ústí nad Labem proceedings represented a deliberate conspiracy against Union Banka pertaining to high levels of the Czech Government.

434. The Tribunal finds that there is no evidence that such a conspiracy existed. Whilst the conduct of the judge in the proceedings is attributable under Article 4 of the BIT to the Czech Republic, the Tribunal notes that the Czech Republic took swift action to ameliorate the situation, that the assets of Union Banka were not in fact looted as a result of the decision, that the judge actually reversed the decision himself and that the Czech Republic has taken criminal action against him. Given the efficiency with which the Czech Republic acted in relation to the Ústí nad Labem proceedings it is impossible to conclude that a conspiracy was afoot.

Impairment clause

Applicable legal standard

435. Article 3(1) provides that with reference to the investments of investors of the other Contracting Party

Each Contracting Party ... shall not impair, by unreasonable or discriminatory measures, the operation, management, maintenance, use, enjoyment or disposal thereof by those investors.

436. Before considering the parties' submissions in respect of alleged breaches of the impairment clause it is necessary to consider whether this standard operates as separate and freestanding protection that offers protection to investors independently of the first limb of Article 3(1) of the BIT, the fair and equitable treatment standard.

437. The Tribunal notes that the parties disagree on this question.

438. In its Statement of Defence the Respondent contended that the impairment standard in Article 3(1) of the BIT "is not, in fact, a separate, free-standing standard that can add anything" to Invesmart's claims under the fair and equitable treatment and expropriation standards.<sup>313</sup>

439. The Respondent based this analysis on comments made in Saluka that

[in] so far as the standard of conduct is concerned a violation of the non-impairment requirement does not therefore differ substantially from a violation of the "fair and equitable treatment" standard. The non-impairment requirements merely identifies more specific effects of any such violations.<sup>314</sup>

440. By contrast the Claimant described the relationship between the standards of protection described in Article 3(1) in the following terms:

The Czech Republic is required to treat the investments of Dutch investors fairly and equitably, and it is additionally prohibited from impairing such investments by unreasonable or discriminatory measures ... Furthermore, since the phrase "unreasonable or discriminatory measures" in Article 3(1) uses the disjunctive "or" instead of the conjunctive "and", it is clear that either "unreasonable" or "discriminatory" measures will violate the impairment clause.<sup>315</sup>

441. In the Tribunal's opinion the Claimant's characterisation of Article 3(1) as comprising two separate standards is correct. It is not for the Tribunal to speculate about the circumstances in which a factual allegation may be held to constitute a breach of the impairment clause but not fair and equitable treatment. However, the Claimant is entitled to invoke the protections afforded by both clauses.

442. The Saluka tribunal acknowledged that the standards of "reasonableness" and "discrimination" contained in the impairment clause have no different meaning than in fair and equitable treatment. However, it also recognised that it offered a separate standard of protection. This is borne out by the tribunal's separate analysis of Saluka's claims under the impairment clause.

443. In the Tribunal's opinion the Claimant was thus correct when it stated:

The plain wording of Article 3(1) demonstrates that it contains two distinct legal standards. Additionally, under cardinal principles of treaty interpretation, the impairment clause must be interpreted in a manner that gives it substance and meaning, rather than as mere surplusage that adds nothing to the fair and equitable treatment clause.<sup>316</sup>

444. The Tribunal further agrees with the Saluka tribunal's analysis about the meaning of the standard enshrined in the impairment clause when it states:

"Impairment" means, according to its ordinary meaning (Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties), any negative impact or effect caused by "measures" taken by the Czech Republic.

The term "measures" covers any action or omission of the Czech Republic. As the ICJ has stated in the Fisheries Jurisdiction Case (Spain v Canada)...

[I]n its ordinary sense the word is wide enough to cover any act, step or proceeding, and imposes no particular limit on their material content or on the aim pursued thereby ...

The standard of "reasonableness" therefore requires, in this context as well, a showing that the State's conduct bears a reasonable relationship to some rational policy, whereas the standard of "non-discrimination" requires a rational justification of any differential treatment of a foreign investor.

445. The Tribunal need not replicate its analysis of the Claimant's discrimination claim here. It will limit its analysis to those aspects of the unreasonableness claim that have not been dealt with above.

Unreasonableness

The Claimant

446. In its Statement of Claim Invesmart listed more than a dozen actions or courses of conduct taken by the Czech Republic which it claimed were unreasonable and, in consequence, in breach of the impairment clause.

447. These actions included:

- (a) approving an investment predicated on the CF Transaction without confirming its ability and willingness to carry out that commitment;
- (b) approving an investment predicated on state aid and then failing to provide any form of state assistance;
- (c) causing a run on the bank by suggesting that it was struggling to find an acceptable investor at the very moment it was approving Invesmart's application;
- (d) insisting upon state aid alternatives and pre-approval from the UOHS, working with Invesmart to put together a new restructuring plan that satisfied those conditions, and then rejecting the plan;
- (e) promising to make a public declaration supporting the bank and then failing to do so;

- (f) refusing to give Invesmart or Union Banka any notice or warning about its decision to reject the restructuring plan and to deny state aid, thereby preventing them from locating alternative sources of capital, and thus ensuring the bank would fail;
- (g) leaking that decision to the press, thereby commencing another run on the bank and further ensuring the bank would fail;
- (h) refusing a liquidity loan on the basis that the bank could not provide "liquid collateral", when the applicable regulations contained no such requirement;
- (i) refusing to seriously consider the salvage plans put together by Invesmart and Union Banka to avoid liquidation, thereby ensuring the complete loss of Invesmart's investments;
- (j) saddling Czech taxpayers with a financial burden, through the liquidation of Union Banka, that was at least 28 times greater than the CZK 650 million in state aid that the Government refused to provide;
- (k) subjecting Union Banka to the fraudulent bankruptcy proceeding in Ústí nad Labem;
- (l) subjecting Union Banka to the corrupt bankruptcy proceedings in Ostrava; and
- (m) failing to notify Invesmart of the bankruptcy proceeding for Union Group.<sup>317</sup>

448. In its Reply Memorial Invesmart reformulated this claim and submitted that four aspects of this conduct were particularly egregious. Specifically:

- (a) The Czech Republic acted unreasonably when the CNB approved Invesmart's acquisition of Union Banka with the understanding that the acquisition was the first step in a three-step restructuring plan, only then to renege on step two, namely, the Government's completion of the Foresbank settlement;
- (b) The various organs of the Czech Republic failed to take a coordinated and consistent position regarding the provision of state aid after approving Invesmart's acquisition of Union Banka;
- (c) The Government's decision to deny state aid was made on grounds that were unreasonable. Invesmart's primary complaint against the Czech Republic was that Mr Sobotka's decision to deny state aid was made on the basis of the Government's strategy in the Saluka arbitration. Invesmart also claimed that the decision to deny state aid was unreasonable because:

---

- (i) Minister Sobotka disregarded the opinion of Governor Tůma, which was given at the request of Minister Sobotka, that "a sufficient media presentation of public support which would lead to a suspension of deposit outflow"; and
  - (ii) Minister Sobotka concluded that the settlement was legally unviable without seeking legal advice.
- (d) The Government failed to give Invesmart adequate notice of its decision to deny state aid.<sup>318</sup>

449. The Claimant has itself acknowledged that these allegations replicate many of those made in respect of fair and equitable treatment and expropriation claims. For this reason the Tribunal will consider only aspects of Invesmart's unreasonableness claim that require elaboration in relation to the application of the reasonableness standard. Specifically, the question of whether it was unreasonable for the CNB to approve Invesmart's acquisition of Union Banka and then for the MOF to deny Invesmart's request for state aid.

The Respondent

450. In answer to the allegation that it had acted unreasonably by renegeing on its obligations under a three-step restructuring plan, the Czech Government denied that such a restructuring plan existed.<sup>319</sup> The Respondent argued that this allegation was unfounded given that Invesmart had no specific expectation of state aid and that such a commitment could not reasonably be gleaned from the CNB's approval of Invesmart's application to acquire Union Banka.

451. The Respondent further argued that Invesmart had failed to demonstrate that this conduct had no rational policy basis when viewed in light of Czech law or international standards of banking regulation. The Respondent submitted:

There could be no doubt at the time the CNB prior approval was issued that all that approval did was a clear and necessary regulatory hurdle for Invesmart to invest in the Czech banking sector. This followed transparently both from a legal provisions establishing a need for such approval (section 20A of the Banking Act at Exhibit R-304) and from the clearly delineated distinction between the role of the CNB as the authority of the State responsible for monetary policy and banking system supervision and that of the MOF as the fiscal authority, delineated not only in Czech Law, but also as a matter of general international practice.<sup>320</sup>

The Tribunal's analysis

The reasonableness of the CNB's approval

452. The question of what the parties understood to be the significance of the CNB's approval is considered in the Tribunal's discussion of legitimate expectations at paragraphs 264-265 above. The Tribunal has concluded that the evidence does not demonstrate that any of the parties, including Invesmart, understood that approval by the CNB constituted a commitment that the Foresbank settlement or any other form of state aid would be provided.
453. The remaining question is therefore whether it was unreasonable for the CNB to approve Invesmart's application to acquire Union Banka and for the MOF to deny its request for state aid.
454. The standard to apply in assessing this question is whether the conduct of the Czech Republic bore a reasonable relationship to some rational policy. This question is to be distinguished from any consideration of the merits of the policy adopted by the Czech Republic.
455. The Tribunal notes that Professor Shin, in his first expert report, suggested that on any view the conduct of the CNB and the MOF fell short of international regulatory best practice.
456. For example, in his first expert report Professor Shin stated:

The CNB as the bank supervisor approved the acquisition of Union Banka by Invesmart on October 24 2002. I see three mutually exclusive possibilities concerning consultations between the CNB and the Ministry of Finance:

- a. Either the CNB did not consult the Ministry of Finance before giving approval of the acquisition;
- b. Or the CNB consulted the Ministry of Finance, but the CNB approved the acquisition without receiving formal approval from the public funding support by the MOF.
- c. Or the CNB consulted the MOF and the CNB received formal approval of public funding support from the MOF before granting approval of the acquisition.

I find (a) inconceivable for a responsible banking supervisor. If the CNB did not consult the MOF at all this would be highly irresponsible, this would be a highly irresponsible act by a banking supervisor. The Basel Committee report makes it clear that such a course of action would run counter to international best practice ....

Leaving (a) to one side, I am left with (b) and (c). Here I am faced with a great deal of uncertainty concerning the facts of the case. However, neither (b) nor (c) put the Czech authorities (collectively) in good light.

a. If (b) is true, so that the CNB gave approval of the acquisition without obtaining formal approval of funding from the Ministry of Finance, then the CNB did not follow international best practice. It sanctioned a course of action that entailed the use of public funds without authorisation from the Ministry of Finance. Thus, if (b) is true, the CNB acted against international best practice.

b. If (c) is true, then the Ministry of Finance gave the formal go-ahead to the CNB to approve the acquisition of Union Banka by undertaking to fund the cost of public support. If this is the case, then I am puzzled by why the MOF did not provide public funding support for the acquisition as contemplated. Thus, if (c) is true, the actions of the Ministry of Finance are at fault.<sup>321</sup>

457. This opinion was rejected by the Respondent, who tendered the expert opinion of Professor Saunders. Professor Saunders stated that:

It is well-established best practice to separate the central banking function from the political and fiscal governmental authorities..

These entities [the MOF and Central Bank] have different policy objectives and potentially different views as to what is least cost policy.<sup>322</sup>

458. Professor Saunders went on to make the following conclusion:

The behaviour of the Czech National Bank was entirely reasonable. In contrast, it would not have been reasonable for the CNB to deny the regulatory approval under the information that was available to it at the time, since it would have eliminated any possibility that Invesmart and the Ministry of Finance could come to an agreement.<sup>323</sup>

459. The Tribunal does not consider that it is required to form an opinion about the merits of the policies that underpinned the decisions made by the MOF and CNB. A state should not be held to an obligation to act in accordance with international best practice. To read such an obligation into a BIT is untenable.

460. The Czech Republic can be held to have acted reasonably so long as, in the Tribunal's view, it did so out of some reasonable policy consideration, as opposed to conduct that was motivated by the intention to deprive an investor of the value of its investment.

461. At paragraph 264 above the Tribunal explained why in its opinion the CNB acted in accordance with its supervisory functions when it approved the acquisition by Invesmart of Union Banka. This involved a number of elements, including that the CNB be satisfied of the providence of Invesmart's funds. Once the CNB was satisfied of Invesmart's bona fides it approved the acquisition because, in the absence of any other investor, Invesmart's involvement was the best chance available of securing the bank's stability. This view point is consistent with evidence given by Governor Tůma at the hearing:

THE CHAIRMAN: Why did you approve its [Invesmart's] acquisition?

GOVERNOR TŮMA: Because in the end we believed they would be able to deliver that money. They committed themselves. It means -- generally speaking, it's not an easy decision to close the bank. So that you look for chances how to avoid that. You look for potential mergers and so on. So there was an investor, and I believed at that time, I trust, that : was fair and honest person. Unfortunately it was my biggest mistake, probably, and -- but in the end we believed that that commitment by the shareholders meeting was fair and that Invesmart would be able to deliver the money. So -- but we are speaking about that wasn't a substantial company, so explaining that at the time this was -- I am just saying this was a crucial issue, but in the end we decided to try it. So it was a chance and we didn't want to kill it.<sup>324</sup>

462. Whilst the merits of this decision may be questioned, this is not a matter for this Tribunal. It is clear that the Czech Republic acted in the interests of legitimate policy concerns, being the ongoing survival of Union Banka, and cannot, therefore be said to have acted unreasonably.
463. Similarly, the evidence clearly suggests that the MOF acted in accordance with rational policy consideration. There is no need to restate the Tribunal's analysis about the justification for the MOF's decision to deny state aid. These actions were clearly reasonable in the circumstances. Any fault that may be found in the Czech Republic's actions falls far short of establishing a breach of the impairment clause.

Expropriation

464. The Claimant alleged that the Respondent expropriated its investment in Union Banka through a combination of measures ranging from the denial of state aid to the revocation of Union Banka's licence, and to various measures taken in the course of the bank's liquidation.
465. Article 5 of the Treaty provides:

Neither Contracting Party shall take any measures depriving, directly or indirectly, investors of the other Contracting Party of their investments unless the following conditions are complied with:

- (a) the measures are taken in the public interest and under due process of law;
- (b) the measures are not discriminatory;
- (c) the measures are accompanied by provision for the payment of just compensation. Such compensation shall represent the genuine value of the investments affected...

466. Although this claim was advanced in the Claimant's written pleadings, it did not figure prominently at the oral hearing.<sup>325</sup> The Claimant did not abandon the claim however and the Tribunal will consider its merits.

The Claimant

467. The Claimant's expropriation claim primarily focused on the Respondent's revocation of Union Banka's licence and placing the bank into bankruptcy and liquidation, which according to the Claimant, amounted to a direct expropriation or, in the alternative, an indirect expropriation.<sup>326</sup> The revocation and ensuing measures "overtly purported to interfere with Invesmart's rights" and as a result it was "legally and practically deprived of its rights in Union Banka".<sup>327</sup> The Claimant also submitted that in taking these measures the Respondent did not comply with the three requirements of Article 5 which, if cumulatively satisfied, make an act of expropriation lawful under the Treaty.

468. In respect of Article 5(a), Invesmart claimed that the measure were not in the public interest because by closing and liquidating Union Banka the Government saddled Czech taxpayers with a financial burden that was many times greater than granting state aid (estimated by the Claimant to be some 28 times as much as the aid sought).<sup>328</sup> Invesmart's expert on banking regulation, Professor Hyun Song Shin, noted that this could not be in the public interest under the "least cost principle", observed in international best practices for the resolution of weak banks.<sup>329</sup> In this case, the Respondent deliberately chose the most expensive solution, thereby acting against the public interest.<sup>330</sup>

469. In Invesmart's view the Respondent also violated Article 5(b) because notwithstanding its majority ownership of Union Group, it received no notice of the bankruptcy petition. Moreover, the bank's assets were then liquidated as part of a fraudulent bankruptcy proceeding in Ostrava.<sup>331</sup>

470. Invesmart further argued that contrary to Article 5(b) the closure and liquidation of the bank and Union Group was discriminatory. The treatment accorded to Union Banka was said to be “markedly less favorable than that received by a number of other similarly situated Czech banks”.<sup>332</sup> (This aspect of the expropriation claim was developed in more detail in the Claimant’s separate discrimination complaint under Article 3).

471. The Claimant also asserted that Article 5(c) was violated since the Czech Government never paid compensation to Invesmart for the expropriation of its investments in the bank and Union Group.<sup>333</sup>

472. In developing its submissions the Claimant endorsed the proposition that foreign investors are not presumptively immune from a host state’s police or regulatory powers:

... a well-founded, non-discriminatory exercise of a state’s police or regulatory power, conducted for the purpose of protecting the public interest and with respect for due process, does not entail an “expropriation” under international law. However, neither of these propositions is responsive to Invesmart’s position in this case, which is that the Czech Republic’s taking of Invesmart’s investments was not a proper exercise of governmental power.<sup>334</sup> [Emphasis in original.]

473. In developing this point, the Claimant referred back to the merits of the Minister’s decision to deny state aid and his failure to provide any notice of that decision, as well as the CNB’s refusal to provide a liquidity loan. The resulting bankruptcy and liquidation process imposed the large financial burden already noted and the measures at issue in this case were said to be very far removed from a proper, legitimate exercise of regulatory power.

474. The Claimant distinguished Union Banka’s situation from the situation that existed in Saluka. Here there was an “abject failure of notice or due process” in relation to the decision to deny state aid, the leaking of that decision to the public which inevitably resulted in the bank’s failure, the revocation of its licence and its liquidation. Moreover, unlike the present case, Saluka did not raise any public interest questions.<sup>335</sup>

475. The Claimant also submitted that the Minister acted on improper grounds, namely its ‘litigation strategy’, in the Saluka arbitration when denying state aid to Union Banka.<sup>336</sup> In support of this assertion, the Claimant relied upon a letter of legal advice dated 3 December 2002, which was produced by the Respondent, advising the MOF that:

From the point of view of the possible impact on the on the [sic] arbitration proceedings in progress between Saluka and the Czech Republic, we feel it would be best if the State aid was not provided. We must stress, though, that this is a very narrowly defined perspective. If, in view of the wider context and economic reasons in particular, the decision is taken to provide aid, we are ready to defend this decision in arbitration proceedings, subject to the condition that the State aid is duly authorized by the Czech Office for the Protection of Economic Competition. In view of the sensitive nature of this matter, we would prefer to let you know the arguments on which our standpoint is based face-to-face.<sup>337</sup>

476. Invesmart listed further procedural complaints, including that:

- (a) the Government failed to communicate with Invesmart and Union Banka for several critical weeks in February 2003;
- (b) the Ministry failed to inform Invesmart of the denial of state aid until after the decision was leaked to the press;
- (c) CNB denied a liquidity loan to Union Banka on spurious grounds in order to ensure that the bank would be forced to close and then commenced revocation proceedings; and
- (d) the proceedings to bankrupt and liquidate Union Banka were marred by procedural irregularities, including the dismissal of the principal trustee for fraud.<sup>338</sup>

The Respondent

477. The Respondent's submissions on the Minister's decision for denying state aid have already been recorded in the Tribunal's discussion of the legitimate expectations claim. They need not be repeated here.

478. Insofar as the licence revocation and the ensuing measures are concerned, the Respondent denied that anything approaching a direct expropriation had occurred. It observed that the revocation of the licence and the bank's subsequent liquidation left intact Invesmart's shareholding in Union Group and Union Banka and did not affect its shareholding as such. This meant that the Claimant was left to argue that the State's actions constituted an indirect expropriation insofar as they deprived it of any value that it might have had.<sup>339</sup>

479. The Respondent also took issue with the Claimant's characterisation of the measures as expropriatory. The Respondent submitted that the CNB's administrative proceeding was a lawful regulatory measure within the state's police powers, for which no compensation was required. The powers pursuant to which the CNB took action were based in published Czech law and pre-dated the Claimant's involvement with Union Banka.<sup>340</sup>

480. Referring to the Saluka case for the proposition that when exercising banking regulatory powers the CNB enjoyed "a margin of discretion" which had to be considered by a tribunal applying Article 5 of the Treaty, the Respondent noted that that tribunal concluded that the deprivation of that claimant's investment constituted a non-compensable deprivation because it was based on an exercise of regulatory powers in the public interest.<sup>341</sup>
481. The Respondent went on to argue that in any event, even if the CNB's measures could be characterised as expropriatory, the steps taken met the various requirements of Article 5 for a lawful expropriation in that they were (i) in the public interest and under due process of law; (ii) not discriminatory; and (iii) since the value of Invesmart's investment (if it actually had made one) was at the time negative, there was no failure to compensate the Claimant for the value of its investment.<sup>342</sup>
482. Finally, in the Respondent's view, the Claimant's reliance on the "least cost principle" was inapposite. Even if it constituted a generally accepted bank regulatory practice and it was violated in the instant case (which was denied), it would not rise to the level of a breach of an international obligation and would not support a claim for breach of the Treaty.<sup>343</sup>

The Minister's decision to deny state aid

483. The expropriation claim has been linked to the fair and equitable treatment claim in that the Minister's reasons for denying state aid and the means by which that information was conveyed to Invesmart (and allegedly to the public) have figured in both claims. The Tribunal has already explained that it does not consider that the denial of state aid amounted to a breach of Article 3.
484. Turning to the expropriation claim, the Tribunal begins with a consideration of the law. It agrees with the Respondent's argument that in relation to ministerial decisions on expenditures of state revenues, a "margin of appreciation" that recognises the discretionary features of such decisions must be accorded to them.<sup>344</sup> Ministers must make often difficult, multi-variable decisions that do not necessarily admit of clear right or wrong answers. For example, a minister who chooses to deny state aid, as in this case, faces questions about the possibly greater expense attached to such a denial. As the Claimant argued forcefully, why deny the aid when the cost of doing so is so much higher than granting it?<sup>345</sup> The answer lies in other policy and legal considerations which a minister must have regard to.

485. The Tribunal also agrees with an observation made by the Saluka tribunal in the context of its fair and equitable treatment discussion:

It is also very doubtful whether a Government can be said to be under an international legal obligation always to choose the least cost alternative and not to waste taxpayers' money.<sup>346</sup>

486. An international tribunal must approach a minister's decision not to spend taxpayers' money with circumspection.
487. This is not to say that the Tribunal considers that the Minister's decision in this case is beyond review, for it is not. Were it convinced that the Minister acted for wholly improper reasons, for example, in denying aid that he and his advisors considered should have been granted to Union Banka solely because granting the aid might complicate the defence of the Saluka claim, the Tribunal would not hesitate to find that the Minister's act attracted international responsibility (though more likely under Article 3 than Article 5).
488. However, the Tribunal is of the view that the Saluka litigation strategy concern was not the primary or even a significant reason for the denial of state aid. In the Tribunal's view, it was likely a factor but not a dominant factor because the legal advice itself was qualified. Furthermore, there are other compelling reasons that explain the Minister's actions.
489. The record shows that by January 2003, before the Third Restructuring Plan was submitted to the Ministry of Finance, grave problems had been identified by the bank's new management.
490. First, the new management had carried out an in-depth inspection of the bank and had decided to create extra adjustments to cover bad loans totalling CZK 1.8 billion.<sup>347</sup> Secondly, in principle this was covered by the "BDS Receivable", but if that claim was "taken off the balance-sheet at Union Banka, a.s., the Bank would not be able to satisfy the basic ratios set for managing a bank and would have to cease operating as a bank".<sup>348</sup> Thirdly, although the amount now being sought from the Respondent was higher than in previous plans, the result of the plan if state aid was granted was modest: after cleaning up its balance sheet, the bank “will be capable of generating an [annual] net profit of between CZK 30 million and CZK 50 million”. The Plan acknowledged that this “figure is wholly insufficient in terms of the bank’s balance-sheet, number of branches, workforce and capital and would not allow the bank to continue to operate in the long-term”.<sup>349</sup> Finally, there was a gap between what Invesmart had committed to in terms of a capital injection, and what was needed to rescue the bank:

<sup>347</sup> Exhibit R-18, Third Restructuring Plan, p. 5. At p. 31, the Plan noted that: "The proposed figures for adjustments and provisions to be created considerably exceeds the previously anticipated figures, primarily as a result of the more realistic approach towards the quality of the assets and risk of the Bank's portfolio adopted by the new management team for restructuring."

The investor has repeatedly stressed that they cannot make any further investments to complete restructuring of the bank’s balance-sheet. Instead they are relying on the repeated assurance that the State would contribute to rectifying the effects of the Consolidation Programme and Stabilisation Programme to a not insignificant extent.

It is unrealistic to assume that another investor could be found who would be willing to intervene as a very minor shareholder and yet contribute to a significant improvement in the bank’s balance-sheet. Invesmart on the other hand is refusing to increase the registered capital because they do not have the funds to invest in increasing the registered capital and they do not agree to their stake being watered down, because this does not form part of their investment strategy and the price of their stake would then cease to make economic sense.<sup>350</sup>

491. In short, the additional work completed on the restructuring plan showed that the bank’s situation was even more grave than had previously been understood and Invesmart was not prepared to contribute more capital than it had stated it was already committed to provide.
492. In making its finding that the denial of state aid does not amount to an expropriation, the Tribunal has not relied principally on the testimony of then-Finance Minister Sobotka (who denied that the Saluka case was the reason that he denied the aid), but rather has examined the contemporaneous documents.<sup>351</sup>
493. The Tribunal considers that the record, viewed in its entirety, shows that:
- (a) the bank’s financial condition was very poor, and indeed if not technically insolvent in January–February 2003, it was perilously close to being so;
  - (b) the Restructuring Plan’s projections, even if the state aid and Invesmart’s €90 million were injected into the bank, showed a minimal improvement in the bank’s fortunes;
  - (c) the bank did not submit an auditor’s opinion with the Plan such that the reliability of the Plan was suspect (particularly in light of the bank’s history of lack of

transparency – a problem which, as just noted, was being dealt with by the bank’s new management); and

- (d) the plan could well fail, in which case the Ministry would be throwing away taxpayers' money on a rescue that was destined to fail.

494. These factors had to be evaluated within the regulatory framework for state aid and the increased scrutiny by the European Union of Czech governmental measures in this area. In short, a review of the Third Restructuring Plan in light of all the surrounding circumstances shows that the Minister not unreasonably found that the Plan did not present a sufficient degree of certainty for the Finance Ministry to support its submission to the Cabinet and the OPC for their respective approvals.

495. Accordingly, that part of the expropriation claim which relies upon the denial of state aid is rejected.

The revocation of Union Banka’s licence

496. Turning to the revocation of the bank’s licence, before addressing the facts and considering this aspect of the claim at the level of principle, the Tribunal observes that it is confronted with a measure taken under a banking statute of general application, which statute predated the Claimant’s investment. Section 26(b) of the Czech Banking Act, the statutory power pursuant to which the CNB acted, provides as follows:

(1) If the Czech National Bank ascertains shortcomings in the operations of a bank or a branch of a foreign bank, depending upon the nature of the ascertained shortcoming(s), it is authorized:

b) to change the banking licence by excluding or restricting certain activities stipulated in the licence;<sup>352</sup>

497. There is no doubt that Section 26(b) is a bona fide non-discriminatory regulation aimed at the general welfare. All states with modern banking regulatory regimes vest a licensing power in their regulators. Inherent in such regimes is the power not only to grant but to revoke the licence.

498. International investment treaties were never intended to do away with their signatories’ right to regulate. As found in Saluka, where the instant Treaty was being applied, notwithstanding the breadth of its prohibition against expropriation and the absence of an express regulatory power exception, Article 5 imports into the Treaty the customary international law notion that a deprivation can be justified if it results from the exercise of regulatory actions aimed at the maintenance of public order.<sup>353</sup> This is common sense. Otherwise, once having granted a licence to operate a bank, the regulator could be constrained from revoking a licence if such action were automatically to be labelled an expropriation at international law.

499. The Tribunal thus agrees with the Saluka tribunal's finding that:

It is now well established in international law that States are not liable to pay compensation to a foreign investor when, in the normal exercise of their regulatory powers, they adopt in a non-discriminatory manner bona fide regulations that are aimed at the general welfare.<sup>354</sup>

500. Although there is no question as to the regulatory bona fide of Section 26(b), the Tribunal must also determine as a matter of international law whether the licence revocation on the facts of this case was improper, which plainly could constitute an expropriation. Reverting to Saluka:

It thus inevitably falls to the adjudicator to determine whether particular conduct by a state "crosses the line" that separates valid regulatory activity from expropriation. Faced with the question of when, how and at what point an otherwise valid regulation becomes, in fact and effect, an unlawful expropriation, international tribunals must consider the circumstances in which the question arises. The context within which an impugned measure is adopted and applied is critical to the determination of its validity.<sup>355</sup> [Italics in original.]

501. A decision to revoke a bank's licence, which takes place within a detailed national legal framework that includes administrative and judicial remedies, is not reviewed at the international law level for its "correctness", but rather for whether it offends the more basic requirements of international law. Numerous tribunals have held that when testing regulatory decisions against international law standards, the regulators' right and duty to regulate must not be subjected to undue second-guessing by international tribunals. Tribunals need not be satisfied that they would have made precisely the same decision as the regulator in order for them to uphold such decisions. The proposition first enunciated in the Myers case (in the context of the fair and equitable treatment standard) that international law extends a "high level of deference to the right of domestic authorities to regulate matters within their own borders" has been adopted in subsequent cases.<sup>356</sup> Indeed, in Saluka, that tribunal observed:

... Even though Article 3 obviously leaves room for judgment and appreciation by the Tribunal, it does not set out totally subjective standards which would allow the Tribunal to substitute, with regard to the Czech Republic's conduct to be assessed

502. This comment, made in the context of that tribunal's interpretation of Article 3 is also applicable to Article 5. The Saluka tribunal noted, after it reviewed the CNB's forced administration of the bank, that:

The Czech State, in the person of its banking regulator, the CNB, had the responsibility to take a decision on 16 June 2000. It enjoyed a margin of discretion in the exercise of that responsibility.<sup>358</sup> [Emphasis added.]

503. The Tribunal agrees.
504. In the Tribunal's view, the decision to revoke the licence cannot be viewed as an expropriation. This was not a case where the regulator arbitrarily decided to deprive a licensee of its licence. To the contrary, the most senior officer of the bank, Mr Vávra, expressly stated his view on 19 February 2003 that due to its illiquidity, the bank could no longer operate and that notice was being given pursuant to the statutory provision under which the CNB subsequently acted. The Tribunal cannot characterize the CNB's acting in response to such notice as a breach of Article 5 of the Treaty.
505. It is true that Union Banka's Supervisory Board dismissed Messrs Vávra and Truhlář shortly after they signed the 20 February 2003 letter and it might be suggested that they did not act in the best interests of the bank. The Tribunal would reject such a contention because the very difficult circumstances in which the bank was operating, combined with the certainty of a catastrophic run had it opened its doors on 21 February 2003 after news of the denial of state aid was publicised, point both to the reasonableness of the opinion expressed by the bank's three senior officers and the CNB's response thereto.
506. The administrative proceeding to revoke the licence was completed on 18 March 2003. As noted in the review of the Claimant's allegations, there were other aspects of the bankruptcy and liquidation process that were said to breach the Treaty. The Tribunal does not consider that these allegations, even if made out, would change its determination under Article 5.
507. Quite apart from the bank's CEO and senior officers giving formal notice of the bank's inability to carry on, the evidence shows that at the point that the revocation proceeding was initiated, having regard to all the circumstances, there is no question that it had been propped up and in imminent risk of collapse for some months.

508. During the hearing the Claimant directed the Tribunal's attention to a letter dated 19 February 2003 to the Minister of Finance (who had solicited Governor Tůma's opinion on the bank's standing) in which the Governor advised that although "there is a danger that the bank may become insolvent as soon as next week", the "capital adequacy of the bank is currently over 8%" and hence it did not fall below the capital adequacy minimum.<sup>359</sup>

509. This letter was put to Governor Tůma during the course of the hearing with counsel pointing out that the bank was not technically insolvent as of 19 February 2003:

Q. So the bank was not insolvent at this point in time; it had a liquidity problem, correct? If the bank had been insolvent, I assume you would have told the Ministry.

A. Technically it wasn't insolvent, that is right, but you must take into account that a part of that, let's say, capital was the receivable against the Czech National Bank.

Q. I understand, Governor Tůma, and I understand that was disputed, but in response to the Minister of Finance's enquiry, you made a note in your letter back to him, which you did not have to put in your letter if you chose not to or didn't agree with, that the capital adequacy ratio of the bank was in excess of 8 per cent; correct?

A. That is what I say here.

Q. So the bank was not insolvent.

A. The bank was not technically insolvent.

Q. It had a liquidity problem, at this point in time.

A. Well, I would disagree with this point. The fact that -- once again, it technically wasn't insolvent; it doesn't mean that the situation is, from the point of view of solvency, sustainable in the medium term. By the way, it was mentioned also by the auditor, in the annual report, that without a strategic investor the situation would not be viable.<sup>360</sup>

510. It appears from the Governor's testimony that whether the bank was technically insolvent or not as of 19 February 2003 depended upon whether one gave any credence to the BDS Receivable which had been recorded in Union Banka's balance sheet in September 2002. This is an important issue to which the Tribunal now turns.

511. In a letter to the First Deputy Minister of Finance dated 22 January 2003, Mr Vávra alluded to the fact that the CNB Receivable had kept the bank from being insolvent throughout the months leading up to the denial of state aid.<sup>361</sup> Mr Vávra sought "a new round of negotiations ... which would result in a formulation of a revised proposal of a material for discussion within your Ministry and later even for the discussion by the Government of the Czech Republic". He indicated that since Invesmart had taken over the bank which "enabled the first complete complex and sufficiently deep assessment of the bank's economic situation," the results showed the "necessity of significant increase of provisions which cannot be solved only by a foreign investor's entry".

Missing funds in the balance, which are for the time being covered by the receivable against the CNB, which are subject to arbitration proceedings, reached the amount of 1.7 billion Czech crowns.<sup>362</sup> [Emphasis added.]

512. Mr Vávra conceded at the hearing that had the bank de-recognised the receivable at the time that the CNB had so requested (22 October 2002, coincidentally the same day that Invesmart filed its third application to acquire indirect control of Union Banka), it would have fallen below the capital adequacy minimum and its banking licence would have had to be withdrawn.

513. In cross examination, the following questions were put to Mr Vávra:

Q. So, Mr. Vávra, the former management, as we have discussed, realised because of the CNB's inspection that there was a provisioning gap of some 1.8 billion [CZK]. Essentially, it sued the CNB for that amount and then recorded that claim as an asset on its books, correct?

A. Correct.

Q. If it hadn't recorded that asset on its books, it would have been below the capital adequacy minimum and the bank's licence would have to be withdrawn. Is that correct?

***

A. Sorry. Yes, the answer is yes.<sup>363</sup>

514. Mr Vávra's testimony was confirmed by the Third Restructuring Plan submitted by Euro-Trend on 12 February 2003, one week before Mr Vávra gave notice to the CNB under Section 26(b) of the Banking Act. The Plan noted that:

If this claim was taken off the balance-sheet at Union banka, a.s., the Bank would not be able to satisfy the basic ratios set for managing a bank and would have to cease operating as a bank.<sup>364</sup>

515. Likewise, the minutes of a meeting held on 28 January 2003 between [redacted] and Mr Racocho of the CNB contain a revealing contemporaneous exchange as to the role of the "receivable" and what the bank's true financial condition was. Mr Racocho's record notes as follows:

1. informed that the biggest risk for the bank was its fragile liquidity situation. The situation resulted, among other things, from resignation of the old management and connected departures of some of the clients.

***

7. According to , booking of the CNB receivable enabled the bank to create necessary provisions to the loan portfolio and provided the bank with some time for solution of the situation. Discussions have been held with the auditor (John Locke – DT) about correctness of the booking of the claim. I called attention to IAS 37, pursuant to which contingent assets should not be included in the balance sheet. I confirmed our interest in meeting with the auditor. I also confirmed determination of the CNB to defend itself against the (in our opinion) unjustified claim.

***

10. I informed him of my opinion that the bank was technically bankrupt and that any other intended steps were generally useless without a solution of the bank's problems with its solvency. Therefore they should focus their attention in that direction in particular. As a supervisory body we shall proceed correctly exactly in accordance with the law.<sup>365</sup> [Emphasis added.]

516. The BDS Receivable was thus critical to propping up Union Banka. In the event, on 24 April 2003, an arbitral tribunal rejected the bank's claim.<sup>366</sup>
517. The Respondent adduced the expert evidence of Dr Milan Hulmák who opined that the BDS Receivable claim was without merit in light of the previous settlement agreement between the parties.<sup>367</sup> The Tribunal examined the settlement agreement concluded by the parties and considers that the CNB took a defensible position in rejecting the bank's claim. Reference to the agreement shows that in Clause 3.5 it is stated:

This Settlement Agreement replaces and supersedes any and all previous agreements and understandings, written or oral, made between CNB and Union banka in connection with the takeover of Bankovní dům SKALA a.s. by Union banka, in particular, the Agreement and Amendment no. 1 thereto. The Parties expressly declare that (i) the settlement hereunder shall regulate ... any and all of their mutual rights and obligations arising out of the takeover by Union banka of Bankovní dům SKALA a.s. ... , and that (ii) upon the execution hereof, none of the Parties shall have against the other Party any other rights and obligations relating to the takeover of Bankovní dům SKALA a.s. by Union banka of any kind and description whatsoever other than the rights and obligations expressly specified herein, not [sic] will they mutually assert against one another any of such rights or obligations.<sup>368</sup>

518. In the Tribunal's view, the CNB was within its rights to demand that a contingency of such doubtful validity not be recorded in full as an asset on the bank's balance sheet nor as profit in its profit and loss account.<sup>369</sup>
519. Had that "asset" been removed when first requested, the bank's real condition would have been exposed even before the CNB's approval was given on 24 October 2002 and well before the deterioration of liquidity that prompted Mr Vávra to seek meetings with the CNB and the Minister of Finance on 19 February 2003.
520. In short, the evidence shows overwhelmingly that the bank was in the most serious of financial straits and the CNB's decision to accept and act upon Mr Vávra's oral and subsequent written notice of Union Banka's inability to meet its obligations vis-à-vis its depositors was a bona fide regulatory measure that does not fall within the scope of Article 5. The measure falls clearly on the bona fide regulation side of the regulation/expropriation divide.

Umbrella clause

521. Article 3(4) of the BIT provides "Each Contracting Party shall observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investments of investors of the other Contracting Party". This provision, which is commonly described as an "umbrella clause" brings obligations of a host state which arise outside the BIT under the protective "umbrella" of the Treaty.
522. The Claimant refers to a number of cases including Eureko v Poland<sup>370</sup> where the Tribunal observed that "'any' obligations is capacious; it means not only obligations of a certain type, but 'any' - that is to say, all-obligations entered into with regard to investments of investors".
523. The Claimant relies on this passage for the proposition that an umbrella clause is not confined to contractual obligations but extends to obligations of any sort.
524. The Respondent asserts that the Eureko case concerned the assumption of contractual obligations and that "umbrella clauses" have never been held to mean anything else than that (at least some) contractual claims might be raised to the level of international investment claims.
525. The Respondent further says that the Claimant does not and cannot have a claim under Article 3(4) of the BIT because it does not even plead the existence of an obligation on the part of the Czech state to grant to it aid. Its case is based on a "legitimate expectation" to receive a grant of aid, not an obligation.

526. The Tribunal is of the opinion that the claim founded on Article 3(4) of the BIT cannot succeed. Even if the existence of an "umbrella clause" elevates breaches of a contract to breaches of the BIT, a point on which tribunals before and after Eureko have reached opposite conclusions, or extends beyond contractual breaches, the Claimant has not established that there was any firm, unconditional undertaking, whether contractual or not, to provide state aid. An "obligation" to provide aid would require the establishment of a clear, unconditional commitment which would specify its essential terms including the amount of aid, the date to be provided and so on. No such obligation has been proven by the Claimant. An encouragement by the state to an investor to apply for aid or an expectation by an investor that aid will be provided is not sufficient by itself to constitute an "obligation" to provide aid.

Concluding comments

Invesmart's financial capacity

527. A factor of some significance, in the Tribunal's estimation, is the Claimant's capacity to effect the transaction which it claims to have been denied the opportunity to consummate. This was not a case where the investor was fully funded and ready to complete the transaction (even according to the "three step plan" that Invesmart contended governed the acquisition<sup>371</sup>).

Invesmart did not pay off the RPLs it assumed

528. It is common ground that although on 17 November 2002, Invesmart assumed the debts of certain Union Banka and Union Group shareholders in the aggregate amount of CZK 2.67 billion and payment obligations towards Union Group in the aggregate amount of CZK 330 million as consideration for 22.6 percent of shares in Union Banka and 60 percent of shares of Union Group, it never paid for the shares.<sup>372</sup>

529. The Claimant argued in this proceeding that it would have paid for them had the Respondent complied with its commitment to grant state aid. It argued further that with the Respondent failing to provide the necessary funds, it made no sense for it to pay for the shares.<sup>373</sup>

<sup>371</sup> Reply Memorial, para 21: "The Government always understood that the restructuring of Union Banka would occur in three steps, that the first step would be Invesmart's assumption of the debts under the DAAs [Debt Assumption Agreements] and its acquisition of the shares under the SPAs [Share Purchase Agreements], that the second step would be the Government's completion of the Foresbank Settlement, and that the third step would be Invesmart's repayment of the debts."

<sup>373</sup> Reply Memorial, paras 21 and 34: "With respect to the capital contribution of €90 million for the RPLs, it is true that once the Czech Republic decided not to honor its commitment to provide state aid, Invesmart decided not to perform the futile act of injecting €90 million into a bank that the Government had just destroyed. But there is no rule of international law – jurisdictional or otherwise – that requires an investor to maximize its damages in order to seek the protection of a BIT."

530. During the hearing, Mr Vávra was cross-examined as to why Union Banka did not call upon Invesmart to pay for its shares after the execution of the debt assumption agreements. It was pointed out that the bank was suffering liquidity problems and the repayment of the RPLs would have been a welcomed source of new capital.<sup>374</sup> A document prepared by the CNB, dated 13 January 2003, which was put to Mr Vávra, noted that the bank rolled over ten related party loans in December 2002, contrary to a CNB regulation.<sup>375</sup> Mr Vávra explained his decision to roll over the loans as follows:

Q. ... The contractual documentation gave Union banka the right to immediate payment. But for your prolongation, they would have had to pay. That is correct, isn't it?

A. Correct.

Q. Can I just ask you: your fiduciary duty was to Union banka and not to Invesmart?

A. Absolutely.

Q. So how could you responsibly have prolonged Invesmart's obligation to pay liquidity into the bank when the bank desperately needed liquidity?

A. Because I knew if we didn't roll those loans over, Invesmart would not have repaid those loans, it would have defaulted on those loans.

Q. Because you were aware Invesmart had no money behind it.

A. No, I was aware that Invesmart's conditions for making this money available was not being met.

Q. Except those conditions aren't reflected in the contractual documents.

A. Correct. But if I may for a minute -- if I may for a minute just say that asking Invesmart to repay those loans at that very point in time would just mean end to an effort of saving Union banka, and we just didn't feel it was in the interest of any investor.<sup>376</sup>

531. Mr Vávra thus decided not to call upon the Claimant to make payment when it was due. Although he did not attribute this to Invesmart's lack of the necessary funds, the Claimant itself has conceded that the shareholders never made the €90 million capital contribution that they authorised and then ratified on 16 October and 4 November 2002 respectively.<sup>377</sup>

The shifting sources of the funds

532. As has already been seen, Invesmart was obliged to include in its application to acquire control of Union Banka information as to the provenance of the funds it would use to effect the acquisition. Invesmart did not have such funds at its disposal during the period leading up to the CNB's approval on 24 October 2002. There is some evidence that it initially intended to borrow the money.<sup>378</sup> It then informed the CNB that it would raise the funds by means of a shareholders' capital contribution.<sup>379</sup>
533. Invesmart's first formal application for the approval of its indirect acquisition of a controlling interest in Union Banka, filed on 4 April 2002, did not include the required information and the application was discontinued on 3 July 2002.<sup>380</sup> Evidently as a means of providing some assurance on the matter, by letter dated 25 June 2002, Mr Gert H Rienmüller of Invesmart wrote to Vladimír Krejča, manager of the CNB's Bank Supervision Section, referring to previous correspondence and discussing the supplementation of the Invesmart's application concerning the origin of funds. Mr Rienmüller informed the CNB that Fortis, a large Benelux international financial group, "has issued a guarantee for the payment of the price in accordance with a contract which matures in September and December 2002".<sup>381</sup>
534. This appears to be the first and last reference in the record of this proceeding to any role that Fortis might play in financing the transaction, including its having issued a guarantee. The representation evidently did not satisfy the CNB which, on 3 July 2002, discontinued the administrative approval proceeding after the expiry of the statutory three month deadline for its decision on the application.<sup>382</sup>
535. Invesmart re-applied for CNB approval on 4 July 2002. Throughout the time that its second application was under consideration, the CNB requested further information on the source of the funds to be used to purchase the shareholding interest.<sup>383</sup> The second application was also rejected for lack of information on the source of the funds.<sup>384</sup> The Tribunal will revert to this below.

Invesmart did not comply with the Receivables Assignment Agreement

536. It will be recalled from the Tribunal's discussion of the legitimate expectations claim that in mid-August 2002, Union Banka's auditors were balking at issuing their report for the bank's financial statements for the year ending 31 December 2001. To resolve the auditors' need for adequate provisioning of loans in light of concerns expressed by the CNB, Invesmart concluded the Receivables Assignment Agreement pursuant to which it assumed the troubled loan portfolio that Union Banka (and Invesmart) hoped to transfer to CF as part of the Fores transaction.<sup>385</sup> This relieved Union Banka from having to record a provision of CZK 300 million against the loans which it hoped to transfer to CF.

537. Under Clause 11.5 of the Agreement, Invesmart agreed, as of the Agreement's execution, to deliver to Union Banka an irrevocable first demand Bank Guarantee issued by a reputable bank for the amount of CZK 300 million valid through 15 December 2002. This was to secure payment of a penalty in the event that Invesmart did not take over the CF loan portfolio after being so requested by the bank.

538. Invesmart did not issue the bank guarantee on 13 August 2002 or at any time thereafter. Mr Catalfamo conceded that although the Agreement required Invesmart to issue the guarantee, it did not so do:

A. Yes, this is very much connected to the Česká Finanční transactions, and actually the value of 1.2 billion was exactly the same value that had been negotiated at the time with CF. And we decided to take this major step because we wanted to show the commitment of Invesmart to the auditors that we really believed that the Česká Finanční will be concluded and the bank will continue as a going concern.

Q. Paragraph 5, you were supposed to deliver as of this day an irrevocable first demand bank guarantee issued by reputable bank for the amount of 300 million Czech crowns, valid through 15th December. That is right, isn't it?

A. Yes.

Q. You didn't do that, did you?

A. No, we didn't.<sup>386</sup>

539. Thus, although the Receivables Assignment Agreement cleaned up the bank's finances enough to secure the issuance of the auditor's report, a key obligation undertaken by Invesmart in mid-August 2002 was not performed.<sup>387</sup>

540. Moreover, when the 1 December 2002 deadline for the contemplated assignment of the loan portfolio to CF passed and Invesmart became liable under the Receivables Assignment Agreement to pay the CZK 1.2 billion it had agreed to pay, it did not do so.

541. was also cross examined on this point:

Q. Why didn't you pay in December?

A. As I said, because we believed that a conclusion of what was the Česká Finanční transaction then – the government changing into another restructuring plan, was very, very close, and there was no need.

Q. This was a private law obligation to Union banka, which was in serious trouble in December. Why didn't you pay?

A. Because we felt it wasn't needed, because without the State support there would be --

Q. No UB?

A. There would be no UB, as we said.<sup>388</sup>

A number of wealthy shareholders withdrew from Invesmart

542. From the outset, Invesmart was held out as an investment company whose shareholders comprised a number of wealthy and prominent Italian individuals and families. Invesmart repeatedly adverted to the shareholders' substantial financial capacity in its dealings with the Czech authorities.<sup>389</sup>

543. One of the representatives of those families, a Mr Ajello (an Invesmart shareholder through C.G.I., S.r.l and also a representative of the interests of the Barilla and Ricci families<sup>390</sup>) joined and Mr Rienmüller in meeting with CNB representatives on 12 September 2002. At this meeting, CNB officials continued to press for further details on the documentation for proof of the source of the funds that was to be submitted with the second application. They noted that the end of the three month approval period was nearing and if the documents were not provided, the administrative proceeding would likely be terminated with a negative decision. The minutes record the CNB observing that:

... proving financial capacity of Invesmart B.V. to realize the transaction and to remove problems of Union banka (particularly paying loans granted to shareholders and persons related to Union Group) is a key feature for CNB to assess the application.<sup>391</sup>

544. The minutes further record Invesmart's position that it did not expect that "the investors would deposit funds with a foreign bank and prove thereby the origin of funds and their actual amount until the final decision is made with respect to the transaction realization". Invesmart's priority was to decide whether to continue with the transaction, but it would "assess another possible method to prove the financial capacity".<sup>392</sup>

545. testified that:

[t]he reason why Mr. Ajello was there and participated in the meeting was for them to understand better what was the status of the Union banka transactions ... [and] we met some of the representatives of the supervisory departments. The reception was not very good, and Mr. Ajello was a little bit surprised that -- not to find the same kind of attitude that I had represented, which was that we were working entirely with the governments.<sup>393</sup>

546. The meeting's significance lies in the fact that the shareholders represented by Mr Ajello decided not to participate further in Invesmart. Indeed, at the very meeting at which Invesmart's shareholders approved the capital increase, some of its shareholders (such as the Barilla family) either abstained from voting on the increase or were unrepresented at the meeting and moreover had decided to sell their shares to _____ and thus withdraw from the company.<sup>394</sup>

decided to complete the acquisition of up to 95 percent of Union Group subject to the resolution of certain matters such as the conclusion of a satisfactory transaction with CF.<sup>395</sup>

548. He noted further that the complexity and “inreliability” (sic) of the project made it impossible for Invesmart to obtain third party financing and that therefore the Union Group acquisition “will be therefore entirely covered by Invesmart with its own asset.” Board and shareholders’ meetings had been called (he attached the notices convening the two meetings on Invesmart letterhead) for 24 September 2002 and 16 October 2002, respectively, “to increase the capital of the company of additional €90 million”.<sup>396</sup>
549. The letter went on to describe some of Invesmart’s shareholders, which described as having “a strong and solid financial weight and reputation”. They included the previously mentioned Barilla and Ricci families and others.<sup>397</sup>
550. Invesmart’s 16 September 2002 letter evidently did not provide sufficient comfort to the CNB as to the source of the funds and consequently on 4 October 2002, for the second time, the CNB denied Invesmart’s application to acquire control of Union Banka.<sup>398</sup> This set the stage for Invesmart’s third application, filed on 22 October 2002 and leading up to that, the holding of the shareholders meeting on 16 October 2002 at which the €90 million capital increase was approved.

capacity to raise the majority of the €90 million capital increase was doubtful

552. The exit of wealthy investors who decided not to participate in Invesmart suggests that experienced investors did not see the upside potential of the Union Banka deal being pursued by . The timing of their decision also warrants note: global financial markets declined after the events of 11 September 2001 and Invesmart's other investment funds were destined to be wound up. In fact, the decision to do so was also taken at the 4 November 2002 shareholders' meeting.<sup>401</sup>

553. There is no documentary evidence to show how the remaining investors, in particular , could have paid for their shares of the €90 million capital increase. testified that he had his own means to make a contribution, but that he was also counting on his family to come up with the necessary funds.<sup>402</sup> Other than testimony there is no record evidence that shows that his family was prepared to contribute the significant funds owed to Union Banka pursuant to the debt assumption and share purchase agreements.

554. While there is no doubt as to enthusiasm for the acquisition and profitable onward sale of Union Banka, having regard to all of the circumstances (particularly Invesmart's failure to issue the CZK 300 million bank guarantee on 13 August 2002 which had led the bank's auditors to issue the audited financial statements for the year ending 31 December 2001), the Tribunal does not consider his hope of familial financial support to be sufficient proof of his ability to finance his majority share of the €90 million needed to complete the deal. There is no indication that at any time after 4 November 2002 any shareholder made its respective contributions so as to enable the company to pay off the RPLs.

555. It also warrants noting that no claim for costs thrown away in the pursuit of the Union Banka acquisition was advanced in this proceeding. Indeed, such evidence as has been adduced shows that Invesmart used its control of the bank to authorise payment to it of the costs of its due diligence in acquiring control of the bank and that at least CZK 35 million of the CZK 65 million authorised by Union Banka's shareholders after Invesmart acquired control was paid out to it.<sup>403</sup> No evidence was adduced of the costs incurred in pursuing the investment, <sup>403</sup> Exhibit R-125, letter dated 2 June 2003 submitted by Union banka "in liquidation" to Silvie Goldscheirová and Jiří Majer of the CNB. At a meeting between : and the CNB held on 22 January 2003 the latter advised that the CZK 65 million payment could be a "possible contradiction" of the Banking Act (Exhibit R-137, minutes of a meeting held on 22 January 2003 between and Messrs Racoča, Štěpánek, and Krejča). A legal opinion rendered on 30 April 2003 stated that the payment was unlawful and the liquidator sought its repayment from Invesmart. No repayment was made.

although in closing submissions, counsel for the Claimant noted that Invesmart had spent close to two years trying to effect the transaction.<sup>404</sup>

556. The Tribunal views from Invesmart's: (i) lax due diligence; (ii) uncertain financial means; (iii) reliance upon the means of wealthy Italian shareholders who were about to sell their shares to<sup>405</sup>; (iv) failure to ensure that the various legal agreements it signed accorded with the conditions that it says governed its acquisition of control of the bank; and (v) failure to either issue the bank guarantee on 13 August 2002 or to pay the consideration for the Receivables Assignment Agreement when it came due in December 2002, collectively to be indicative of the Claimant's approach to the investment opportunity. This was, in the Tribunal's view, to take a "flyer" at gaining ownership of the bank with the assistance of state aid and then sell it at a quick profit.

557. It likewise appears to the Tribunal that recognising that Union Banka was in serious peril, the CNB erred in agreeing to treat with Invesmart. The CNB knew that Invesmart was a new company with no experience in running a bank. In response to the Chairman's question as to why the CNB approved the acquisition in such circumstances, Governor Tůma testified that:

... in the end we believed they would be able to deliver that money. They committed themselves. It means -- generally speaking, it's not an easy decision to close the bank. So that you look for chances how to avoid that. You look for potential mergers and so on.<sup>406</sup>

558. The evidence is that no Western bank would touch Union Banka in its current condition and the testimony was that Invesmart was the bank's only chance. Governor Tůma testified that "in the end we decided to try it. So it was a chance and we didn't want to kill it". He stated further that this was a mistake.<sup>407</sup> The Tribunal agrees.

559. The CNB's willingness to treat with Invesmart goes however to the issue of an award of costs. It is the Tribunal's view that although the claims have been rejected, the CNB bears some responsibility for the bringing of this international proceeding.

Tribunal's determination on costs

Costs of arbitration

560. Article 38 of the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules requires the Arbitral Tribunal to fix the costs of the arbitration in the award. The Claimant's costs (which include its share of the Tribunal's fees and disbursements) amount to €5,899,846. The Respondent's costs (including its share of the Tribunal's fees and disbursements) total €4,116,712.

561. Accordingly the costs of the arbitration amount to €10,016,558.

Allocation of costs

562. Article 40(1) of the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules provides, subject to paragraph 2, that the costs of arbitration shall in principle be borne by the unsuccessful party. However the Arbitral Tribunal may apportion such costs between the parties if it determines that apportionment is reasonable, taking into account the circumstances of the case.

563. With respect to the costs of legal representation and assistance, Article 40(2) provides that the Arbitral Tribunal, taking into account the circumstances of the case, shall be free to determine which party shall bear such costs or may apportion such costs between the parties if it determines that apportionment is reasonable.

564. Thus the general rule under the UNCITRAL Rules that the unsuccessful party shall bear the costs of arbitration does not apply with respect to that portion of the costs of arbitration which comprise the costs of legal representation and assistance. In both instances, however, the Tribunal possesses a discretion. With respect to the costs of arbitration (excluding costs of legal representation and assistance) the unsuccessful party bears the costs but subject to the Tribunal's discretion to apportion such costs taking into account the circumstances of the case. With respect to the costs of legal representation and assistance the Tribunal decides which party shall bear such costs or whether the costs should be apportioned.

Parties' submissions

565. The Respondent submits that the general rule as to the costs of arbitration (excluding costs of legal representation and assistance) referred to in Article 40(1) should apply. Hence it says that the prevailing party should be reimbursed for all non-legal costs. The Respondent further states that this rule has been widely followed by arbitral tribunals in recent investment arbitrations conducted under the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules and is consistent with Czech practice.

566. As to the costs of legal representation and assistance, the Respondent says that the success of a party in the dispute is a determining factor as recent decisions in investment treaty arbitrations have confirmed.
567. The Claimant also submits that the successful party should be awarded costs including costs of legal representation and assistance.

Determination

568. The Tribunal has already referred to Article 40(1) and (2) of the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules. The general rule as to the costs of arbitration (excluding costs of legal representation and assistance) is that they shall be borne by the unsuccessful party. While no general rule is stated with respect to the costs of legal representation and assistance the Tribunal agrees with the parties' submissions that such costs are also often awarded to the successful party and are therefore borne by the unsuccessful party.
569. However it is abundantly clear that under Article 40 the Tribunal possesses a discretion as to the awarding of costs and their allocation. The concluding words of Article 40(1) require the Tribunal to take into account "the circumstances of the case". Thus decisions of other tribunals in previous cases concerning the awarding of costs are not determinative and do not establish a precedent. They are merely illustrative of the application of Article 40 to the case at hand. In this case the successful party is the Respondent. However upon careful reflection, the Tribunal has concluded that there are special circumstances which make it inappropriate to award the Respondent costs.
570. In the first place the Respondent applied for an order for security for costs which was unsuccessful. This is a relevant factor although the Tribunal acknowledges that the costs incurred in connection with the application comprise only a small percentage of the total costs of arbitration.
571. A much more significant factor concerns the facts established by the Tribunal.
572. The Claimant is a company with extremely limited financial resources and little or no experience or expertise in banking. It was a most unlikely and perhaps inappropriate entity to acquire and manage what had been, at one time, a significant bank within the Czech Republic. And yet it received permission from the CNB to acquire the shares in Union Banka. It is true that the Claimant intended to on-sell Union Banka, after restructuring it, but even an acquisition for a limited time or purpose appears inappropriate, having regard to the financial resources and expertise of the Claimant.
573. At the hearing Mr Tůma, who was the Chairman of the CNB at the time the share acquisition was approved, was called to give evidence. Claimant's counsel asked Mr Tůma what he meant when he said in his witness statement that Invesmart was not a substantial company. Mr Tůma answered:

I think that I already mentioned that today. It means Invesmart was not any Deutsche Bank or Société Générale or other well-known bank, so it was, let's say, no name in the banking sector, having no expertise in running the bank, and no experience in that respect. That is why, as I explained already, the procedure and the procedure for providing licence is -- would differ probably from looking at Deutsche or some other bank. So it is not -- that is one point.

Secondly, it wasn't a wealthy investor. So that I can imagine there are financial investors, so this was some kind of a financial investor, but it wasn't -- we didn't see at that time, at the beginning, enough money behind it. So that is why it was very -- it was one of the crucial issues during that licence procedure.<sup>408</sup>

574. The Chairman of the Tribunal then asked Mr Tůma why he had approved the acquisition to which he responded:

Because in the end we believed they would be able to deliver that money. They committed themselves. It means -- generally speaking, it's not an easy decision to close the bank. So that you look for chances how to avoid that. You look for potential mergers and so on. So there was an investor, and I believed at that time, I trust, that was a fair and honest person. Unfortunately it was my biggest mistake, probably and -- but in the end we believed that that commitment by the shareholders meeting was fair and that Invesmart would be able to deliver the money. So -- but we are speaking about that wasn't a substantial company, so explaining that at the time this was -- I am just saying this was a crucial issue, but in the end we decided to try it. So it was a chance and we didn't want to kill it.<sup>409</sup>

575. Having acquired Union Banka, the Claimant pressed its application for state assistance and argued in this arbitration that the CNB's approval of the share acquisition led it to believe that state aid would be granted.

576. Although this Tribunal has held that there was no breach of the BIT, the actions of the Czech authorities, and in particular the CNB in approving the share acquisition, were perhaps unfortunate or unwise.

577. In these circumstances the Tribunal, although unable to find that there was a breach of the BIT, considers that the Respondent should not recover any of the costs of arbitration which it has incurred and that the costs of arbitration should be allocated between the parties in accordance with the amounts they have paid or the costs incurred.

578. Accordingly the Tribunal makes no order concerning the costs of arbitration.

I. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

1. The procedural background of this proceeding has been long and somewhat convoluted and therefore will only be summarized in its essence.
2. On May 10, 2004, a large number of individuals and companies from several different nationalities submitted a single Request for Arbitration (the “Request”) to the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (“ICSID” or “the Centre”) against the Republic of Costa Rica (“the Respondent” or “Costa Rica”), alleging violations of their rights under at least ten different bilateral investment treaties. The Request included an application for approval by the ICSID Secretary-General of access to the Additional Facility (AF) under Article 4 of the ICSID Additional Facility Rules. Upon receipt of the Request, the Centre requested additional information and sought clarifications regarding a series of errors and defects contained in the Request for Arbitration.
3. Ultimately, on March 27, 2007, after significant revisions, the Secretary-General of ICSID registered the Request for Arbitration, as amended and supplemented<sup>1</sup>, by one hundred thirty seven (137) individual nationals of Canada (hereinafter “the Claimants,” as listed in Appendix A to the present Award) against the Republic of Costa Rica, pursuant to Article 4(2) of the ICSID Arbitration (Additional Facility) Rules (the “Arbitration (AF) Rules”). On the same day, the Secretary-General dispatched the Notice of Registration to the parties and transmitted a copy of the Request for Arbitration and its supplemental letters to the Republic of Costa Rica. The Centre invited the Claimants to submit additional copies of the Request for Arbitration, reflecting the amendments and clarifications made subsequent to May 10, 2004. The case was registered as ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/07/3 with the formal heading of Alasdair Ross Anderson et al. v. Republic of Costa Rica.

<sup>1</sup> By Claimants’ letters of May 11, June 4, July 9, July 23, December 3 and December 23, 2004; January 13, January 26, February 16, March 18, April 18, July 26, August 5, September 13, September 30, October 20, 2005; and January 16, February 22, November 29 and December 18, 2006.

4. Pursuant to Article 5(e) of the Arbitration (AF) Rules, the Secretary-General invited the parties to proceed as soon as possible to constitute the Arbitral Tribunal. The Claimants appointed Professor Jeswald W. Salacuse, an American national, as arbitrator, and the Respondent appointed Professor Professor Raúl E. Vinuesa, a national of Argentina, as arbitrator. Pursuant to Articles 6 and 10 of the Arbitration (AF) Rules, the Chairman of the ICSID Administrative Council appointed Dr. Sandra Morelli Rico, a Colombian national, as President of the Tribunal.
5. By letter of May 2, 2008, the Acting Secretary-General of ICSID notified the parties that all three arbitrators had accepted their appointments and that, in accordance with Article 13(1) of the Arbitration (AF) Rules, the Tribunal was deemed to have been constituted and the proceeding to have begun on that date. On the same date, the parties were also informed that Ms. Natalí Sequeira would serve as Secretary of the Arbitral Tribunal. A first session was subsequently scheduled between the Tribunal and the parties to discuss preliminary procedural matters.
6. In response to the Secretary-General's request dated March 27, 2007, the Claimants filed on May 14, 2008 a Revised Request for Arbitration reflecting the amendments and clarifications to their original Request for Arbitration, along with various supporting documents.
7. On June 27, 2008, the Tribunal held its first session with the parties at the seat of the Centre in Washington, D.C. During the session, the parties confirmed their agreement that the Tribunal had been properly constituted in accordance with Articles 6 and 13 of the Arbitration (AF) Rules and that they did not have any objections in this respect. During the session the parties also agreed on a number of procedural matters reflected in written minutes signed by the President and the Secretary of the Tribunal. In particular, these matters concerned: i) the applicable arbitration rules for the proceeding; ii) the representation of the parties; iii) the apportionment of the procedural costs and the advance payments to the Centre; iv) the fees and expenses of the members of the Tribunal; v) the place of arbitration; vi) the procedural languages; vii) the records of the hearings; viii) the means of communication and copies of the - instruments; ix) the presence and quorum for meetings of the Tribunal; x) the decisions of the Tribunal by correspondence or any other form of communication; xi) the delegation of power to set time limits and sign procedural orders on behalf of the Tribunal; xii) the phases of the proceeding (written and oral); xiii) number, sequence and schedule of written pleadings; xiv) the production of evidence and witnesses' testimony (written and oral); xv) dates and nature of subsequent sessions; and xvi) publication of the award and the decisions related to the proceeding.

8. During the first session, the parties agreed that since the Respondent intended to raise jurisdictional objections, the Tribunal would deal with the question of jurisdiction as a preliminary matter. The schedule of pleadings on jurisdictional objections was agreed as follows: Respondent's Memorial on Jurisdiction: September 26, 2008; Claimants' Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction: December 23, 2008; Respondent's Reply on Jurisdiction: February 27, 2009; Claimants' Rejoinder on Jurisdiction: April 27, 2009. In addition, the parties proposed that the Hearing on Jurisdiction be held between August 3 and 7, 2009.
  9. During the course of the first session, the counsel for the Respondent, Dr. Stanimir A. Alexandrov, expressed the Respondent's intention to submit a request for provisional measures on costs. On this point, the President stated that in the event such request was formally submitted it would be dealt with pursuant to Article 46 of the Arbitration (AF) Rules and it would determine the schedule for the other party to submit observations. On July 8, 2008 the Respondent filed a Request for Provisional measures whereby it requested that: i) the Tribunal order the Claimants to post a bank guarantee (or an escrow account deposit administered by ICSID) equivalent to the ICSID administrative fees that the Respondent might incur during the course of the proceedings on jurisdiction; and ii) that the Tribunal order Claimants to represent that they agree to be held jointly and severally liable for any amounts that the Tribunal may award to cover Respondent's legal fees and expenses. The Claimants' submitted their observations on the Request for Provisional Measures on August 6, 2008. The Tribunal issued a Decision on Provisional Measures on November 5, 2008. The Tribunal concluded that i) the facts presented by the Respondent did not constitute an urgent situation that risked irreparable harm to the Respondent's rights; ii) the Respondent had only a mere expectation and not a right with respect to an eventual award of costs; iii) the request to order the Claimants to be held joint and severally liable for the payment of any costs eventually awarded to the Respondent is not in the nature of a provisional measure to preserve existing rights; and iv) a Tribunal's decision in this respect might constitute a prejudgment on the responsibility of individual parties. Therefore, pursuant to Article 46 of the Arbitration (AF) Rules, the Tribunal denied Respondent's Request for Provisional Measures.

10. As agreed during the first session, the Respondent filed a Memorial on Objections to Jurisdiction and Admissibility on September 26, 2008. By letter of December 18, 2008, the parties agreed to an extension for the filing of the Claimants Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction and Admissibility. According to the revised schedule, the subsequent jurisdictional pleadings were submitted as follows: Claimants Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction and Admissibility, on January 13, 2009; Respondent's Reply on Jurisdiction and Admissibility, on April 10, 2009, and the Claimants' Rejoinder on Jurisdiction and Admissibility on June 10, 2009. By letters of June 8, 2009 the parties agreed to a five day extension for the presentation of the Claimants' Rejoinder on Jurisdiction and Admissibility, which was submitted on June 15, 2009.
11. The hearing on jurisdiction was held as scheduled, from August 3 through August 6, 2009, at the seat of the Centre in Washington D.C. Messrs. Robert Wisner and W. Brad Hanna of the law firm McMillan LLP and Natacha Leclerc of the law firm Cain Lamarre Casgrain Wells s.e.n.c.r.l., were present at the hearing on behalf of the Claimants. Messrs. Stanimir Alexandrov, Patricio Grané, Marinn F. Carlson, and Joshua Robbins of Sidley Austin LLP; Messrs. Esteban Agüero Guier, Mónica Fernández Fonseca, Luis Adolfo Fernández and José Carlos Quirce of the Costa Rican Government as well as Mr. Alan Thompson Chacón, Respondent's legal expert, were present at the hearing on behalf of the Respondent. During the hearing the Tribunal heard the oral examination of the following Claimants' witnesses:

Messrs. Patricia Lucie Fleming, Maurice Wilfrid Laframboise, Norman Albert Barr, and Charles Bergeron, all of whom were also Claimants in this proceeding. The following Respondent's witnesses were also examined: Messrs. Sandra Castro Mora, Walter Espinoza, Elizabeth Flores Calvo and Marietta Herrera Cantillo, all of whom were officials of different Costa Rican state agencies and powers.

12. The Respondent objected to the presence in the hearing room of those Claimants who were to appear also as witnesses prior to providing their oral testimony, on the grounds that Article 39(2)<sup>2</sup> of the Arbitration (AF) Rules referred to the attendance of witnesses only during their testimony, unless otherwise agreed by the parties<sup>3</sup>. The Claimants' counsel strongly objected to the exclusion of any Claimant from the hearing room. They argued that Article 39(2) Arbitration (AF) Rules explicitly gives parties the right to attend the hearing and that a party does not lose its rights simply by being a witness. Moreover, the Claimants argued that to deny a party the right to be present at a hearing in which his or her rights were at stake and to assist counsel in presenting that party's case would constitute a denial of due process.
13. On that point, the Tribunal decided by majority to allow those Claimants who were to testify as witnesses to attend the entire hearing on jurisdiction. Thereafter, the parties informed the Tribunal that they had agreed that the four Claimants scheduled to testify as witnesses would remain in the hearing room until Respondent's witnesses had offered their testimony. When the time came for the four Claimants to testify, <sup>2</sup> Article 39(2) of the Arbitration (AF) Rules provides: "(2) Unless either party objects, the Tribunal, after consultation with the Secretary-General, may allow other persons, besides the parties, their agents, counsel and advocates, witnesses and experts during their testimony, and officers of the Tribunal, to attend or observe all or part of the hearings, subject to appropriate logistical arrangements. The Tribunal shall for such cases establish procedures for the protection of proprietary or privileged information." [emphasis added]

<sup>3</sup>The Respondent had initially raised this objection by letter of July 29, 2009 addressed to the Tribunal, in which it stated that the presence in the hearing room of the Claimants who were also witnesses, would allow them to listen to the testimony of any preceding Respondent's witnesses with the result of possibly influencing their own testimony. That circumstance would give the Claimants an unfair advantage with respect to the Respondent whose witnesses would not have a similar opportunity. Thus, according to the Respondent, to allow the Claimant-witnesses to be present in the hearing prior to their testimony would be contrary to the principles of due process and equality of treatment of the parties. The Respondent had no objection to the presence at the hearing of the other Claimants, who would not be called as witnesses. By letter of July 30, 2009 the Claimants stated that it would be a fundamental violation of Claimants' rights to due process denying them the right to be present, since it is a widely accepted principle in arbitration that an arbitral tribunal may not exclude a party who wishes to be present from any hearing. In the Claimants' view, Article 39(1) of the Arbitration (AF) Rules grants the party an absolute right to be present at the hearing, while Article 39(2) only addresses the need for both parties to consent before the hearing is opened to non-parties. Finally, according to the Claimants, the Respondent's concerns about inequality are not substantiated as Respondent would also have representatives present throughout the hearing to instruct counsel. Therefore Claimants requested the Tribunal to deny Respondent's request.

they were to leave the hearing room, and each testifying Claimant would then be permitted to stay in the hearing room only after that Claimant had testified<sup>4</sup>.

14. The hearing on jurisdiction proceeded to its conclusion on the basis of this agreement. Costa Rica's witnesses namely, Ms. Marietta Cantillo, Mr. Walter Espinosa and Ms. Sandra Castro Mora testified and were cross-examined. Thereafter Claimants Wilfrid Laframboise, Patricia Lucie Fleming, Maurice Norman Albert Barr, and Charles Bergeron testified and were cross-examined.

II. THE FACTS OF THIS CASE

15. This dispute concerns the situation in which the Claimants, 137 individual nationals of Canada, assert separate and distinct claims against Costa Rica for injuries to their alleged individual investments as a result of various breaches of domestic and international law, in particular the Agreement between the Government of the Republic of Costa Rica and the Government of Canada for the Protection and Promotion of Investment, signed on March 18, 1998, in force since September 29, 1999 (hereinafter referred to as "the BIT" or "the Canada-Costa Rica BIT"). Costa Rica is a Contracting Party to the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of Other States, signed in Washington in 1965 (the "ICSID Convention"). As Canada is not a Party to the ICSID Convention, Schedule C of the Rules Governing the Additional Facility for the Administration of Proceedings (hereinafter referred to as "Additional Facility,") shall apply as provided by Article XII 4(b) of the BIT.<sup>5</sup>
16. In particular, Claimants alleged that Costa Rica, by failing to provide proper vigilance and governmental regulatory supervision over the national financial system, had injured their investments in violation of the BIT provisions regarding full protection and security, fair and equitable treatment, due process of law, and protection against expropriation.

<sup>5</sup> Article XII(4) provides that "The dispute may be submitted to arbitration under ... (b) the Additional Facility Rules of ICSID, if either the disputing Contracting Party or the Contracting Party of the investor, but not both, is a Party to the ICSID Convention;..."

17. Luis Enrique Villalobos Camacho and his brother Osvaldo Villalobos Camacho (hereinafter the “Villalobos brothers” or the “brothers”) at the time of the incidents giving rise to this case were Costa Rican nationals engaged in various business activities in Costa Rica. In particular, they owned and operated a currency exchange, known first as Casa de Cambio Hermanos Villalobos (“the Villalobos Brothers Money Exchange”) and later renamed Casa de Cambio Ofinter S.A. (“Ofinter”). From at least 1998 until Ofinter’s collapse in 2002, the Superintendencia General de Entidades Financieras (SUGEF), the Costa Rican governmental financial regulatory agency under the supervision of the Central Bank of Costa Rica, had licensed Ofinter to engage in the money exchange business and regularly included it in the list of authorized money exchanges, which it published periodically for purposes of informing the public. Ofinter had offices in downtown San Jose, the capital city of Costa Rica, and in the San Pedro Mall.
18. Sometime prior to 1996, the Villalobos brothers developed and instituted a scheme whereby individuals and companies would place funds with the brothers in return for a high interest rate on their deposits, as well as the repayment of the principal amount under stipulated conditions. The office in which these transactions were carried out was located in the San Pedro Mall, adjacent to Ofinter’s money exchange business, with a separate entrance from the money exchange business. The Villalobos brothers did not openly undertake a public solicitation of funds, nor did they explain to their clients how they would use the funds raised. Instead, they conducted this part of their business on a highly confidential basis and would accept contributions only from persons introduced to them through recommendations from acquaintances.
19. Individuals or companies placing funds in the scheme were required to make an initial minimum payment of US$10,000. The minimum period of deposit for amounts up to US$99,000 was six months and twelve months for deposits of more than US$100,000. Interest was credited monthly to depositors’ accounts and they were entitled to withdraw interest on a monthly basis. In order to withdraw three or more months’ worth of interest, a depositor had to provide the brothers at least a two-week written notice. All withdrawals of principal required at least one month's written notice. The Villalobos brothers promised to pay those depositing funds with them a minimum of 3% per month or a total of 36% interest per year. Some persons withdrew their interest regularly when paid and others left the interest to accumulate in their accounts with the brothers. Depositors who were willing to forego monthly withdrawals were promised a rate of 2.8% per month, compounded, which was equivalent to an annual interest rate of 39.29%.

20. Although Claimants argued that the deposits made with the Villalobos constituted a form of participation in an enterprise according to Article I(g)ii of the BIT, evidence on the record shows that deposits with the Villalobos brothers under the above scheme were structured as personal loans to Luis Enrique Villalobos<sup>6</sup>. After filling out a deposit form, depositors made payments of their deposits in one of three ways: 1) in cash delivered to a Villalobos brother or a Villalobos employee at the office in the San Pedro Mall; 2) by check, usually made out to Luis Enrique Villalobos, to Ofinter, to their brokerage account, or to another of their related entities; or 3) by wire transfer to one of their bank accounts in Costa Rica, the United States, or another country.
21. In return, as evidence of the transaction and as a receipt of the depositors' funds, the Villalobos brothers or an employee delivered to each depositor what some Claimants referred to as a "guarantee check" drawn on an account in the name of Luis Enrique Villalobos at the Banco Nacional de Costa Rica in the amount of the deposit made with the brothers. The checks were undated and the deposit form filled out by the depositors explained that the check was issued by Luis Enrique Villalobos, a physical person, responsible for the amount shown on the check. At same time, the Villalobos employee receiving the deposit made clear that the checks were not to be cashed and that the account on which they were drawn did not have sufficient funds to pay the amount indicated on the check. In fact, the account on which they were drawn

<sup>6</sup> Claimants' Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction and Admissibility, para. 36: "Claimants do not dispute that the guarantee cheques and the documents accompanying the Beneficiary Statement establish that Enrique Villalobos was personally liable for payment of the principal advanced along with the interest set out on the cheque. In this sense, the investments were personal loans evidenced by a promissory note or debenture issued by the principal shareholder of Ofinter and its related companies."

- remained inactive after 1997 and never had more than US$5,000. Often on the back of the check, a Villalobos employee would write information concerning the interest to be paid on the deposit. If a depositor wished to withdraw principal, he or she would present the guarantee check when requesting payment and surrender it upon payment.
22. Drawn by the high interest rates and the confidential nature of the scheme, more than 6,200 persons deposited a total of approximately US$405 million with the Villalobos brothers over the years of the scheme's operation. Many of the depositors, like the Claimants in this case, were foreign nationals. They often deposited significant sums of money with what appears to be relatively little investigation and research, relying instead on the recommendations of friends and acquaintances who had previously deposited funds with the brothers and attested to the fact that the Villalobos brothers had regularly paid them the high interest rates promised. The Villalobos brothers provided minimal documentation to the persons depositing funds with them, and thereafter issued no periodic reports on the status of the funds received or the enterprises in which the funds were purportedly invested. Moreover, the Villalobos brothers made no reports to the tax or other governmental authorities of Costa Rica or any other government on their operations or on the income earned by depositors in the scheme.
23. It appears that agencies of the Costa Rican government inspected the Villalobos currency exchange operation from time to time. It also appears that such agencies came to suspect that the Villalobos brothers were conducting other unauthorized activities in connection with the currency exchange. Although the authorities pursued such leads, they were unable to gather sufficient evidence to prove wrongdoing. One of the problems they encountered was that the depositors themselves refused to cooperate by revealing to the authorities the nature of their business transactions with the Villalobos brothers.
24. On June 5, 2002, the Costa Rican judicial authorities received a request for cooperation and legal assistance from the Department of Justice of Canada, which suspected that a criminal organization in Canada was using the Villalobos brothers scheme to launder money obtained from criminal activities. Pursuant to this request, Costa Rican law enforcement officials, having obtained a search warrant, raided the Villalobos offices and seized various documents and other items on July 4 and 5, 2002. The operation in the San Pedro Mall was closed as a result, but the Villalobos brothers moved their deposit business to another location in the same shopping mall, where despite public knowledge of the raid, certain persons, including the Claimant Norman Barr, continued to deposit funds with the brothers. After the raid, the Villalobos brothers issued other types of instruments to depositors instead of the so-called “guarantee checks” previously provided.

25. The Costa Rican government’s investigation after the raid revealed that the Villalobos brothers had been engaged in illegal financial intermediation and had operated a fraudulent Ponzi scheme whereby persons were induced to invest in the scheme by promises of a high return. Interest payments were financed not from the investment of such funds but from subsequent deposits by other persons. On November 27, 2002, the Costa Rican authorities ordered the arrest of the brothers, closed Ofinter, and seized the assets and accounts of the Villalobos brothers and their affiliated enterprises. On December 18, 2002, the Central Bank of Costa Rica formally cancelled Ofinter’s authorization to operate a currency exchange.
26. Although Osvaldo Villalobos Camacho was arrested and prosecuted for fraud and illegal financial intermediation, his brother Enrique Villalobos managed to escape capture and still remains a fugitive from justice at this time. Ultimately after a lengthy trial involving many witnesses and voluminous documentation, on May 16, 2007 the Trial Court of the First Circuit of San José found Osvaldo Villalobos Camacho guilty of aggravated fraud and illegal financial intermediation for his participation in operating the brothers’ financial scheme. The Trial Court sentenced him to eighteen years imprisonment for his criminal conduct.<sup>7</sup> In their lengthy decision, the judges of the Trial Court concluded that the Villalobos brothers had put in place and operated a

Ponzi scheme in which they had used funds received from depositors to pay other depositors and themselves, rather than to invest the funds so as to secure a return for use in paying investors. The judges noted that the brothers' scheme was cloaked in secrecy and was designed to avoid notice by the public or detection by the governmental authorities. On June 2, 2008, a decision of the Supreme Court of Costa Rica upheld the conviction and prison sentence of Osvaldo Villalobos.<sup>8</sup>

27. Since the clients who had provided funds to the brothers were considered victims of fraud, they were permitted under Costa Rican law to file a civil complaint for compensation in connection with the criminal case against Osvaldo Villalobos. At the Hearing on Jurisdiction in the present arbitration proceeding, the auxiliary attorney general of Costa Rica, who was the prosecutor in charge of the criminal prosecution against Osvaldo Villalobos, testified that only 300 persons chose to avail themselves of this procedure.<sup>9</sup> It is not clear whether the reason for this limited participation was the desire of most depositors to avoid the scrutiny of governmental and tax authorities or their belief that such participation would be futile in terms of actually securing a repayment of the funds that they had deposited with the brothers. As with the collapse of any Ponzi scheme, relatively few assets remained under the control of the court to satisfy even this relatively small number of claimants who participated in the criminal proceeding.
28. The Claimants, considering that they have lost their deposits with the Villalobos brothers, commenced this arbitration against the Costa Rican government for compensation for their loss on the grounds that such loss had been caused by various actions or omissions of the government of Costa Rica in violation of the Canada-Costa Rica BIT.

III. RESPONDENT’S OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION AND ADMISSIBILITY

29. In response to the Claimants’ Request for Arbitration, the Respondent contends that ICSID and this Tribunal lack jurisdiction to hear this dispute. In support of its position, the Respondent advances five distinct jurisdictional objections, as well as an admissibility objection to Claimants’ claim on expropriation.
30. The Respondent’s first jurisdictional objection is that none of the deposits made by the Claimants with the Villalobos brothers constitute an “investment”, as that term is defined in Article I of the BIT. Therefore, the Claimants are not entitled to seek the protection of the BIT for the funds that they have allegedly lost as a result of their participation in the Villalobos scheme since a tribunal under Article XII of the BIT only has jurisdiction to hear disputes concerning “investments.”
31. The Respondent’s second jurisdictional objection is that certain of the Claimants are not “investors” for purposes of Article I(h) of the BIT, which grants standing to bring a claim against a BIT contracting state only to persons who are investors.
32. The Respondent’s third jurisdictional objection is that the Claimants’ claims arising out of the search and seizure of Villalobos assets by Costa Rica, which Claimants allege constituted an unlawful expropriation and denial of due process, are barred by Article XII(3)(d) of the BIT which provides that a Canadian investor may submit a claim against Costa Rica only if “no judgment has been rendered by a Costa Rican court regarding the measure that is alleged to be a breach of this agreement.” Respondent contends that Costa Rican Courts have authorized and subsequently ratified the seizure of the Villalobos assets by the authorities of that country.
33. The Respondent’s fourth jurisdictional objection is that the majority of the claims in this case are untimely and therefore barred by either Article XII(3)(c) or Article XV of the BIT.
34. The Respondent’s fifth and final jurisdictional objection is that any claims of the Claimants based on alleged violations of international agreements other than the BIT or of Costa Rican law are not covered by the BIT and its dispute settlement provisions.

35. The Respondent also alleges that the Claimants' claims of expropriation are inadmissible and premature since the necessary procedural requirements have not been fulfilled.

IV. CLAIMANTS' OPPOSITION TO OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION AND ADMISSIBILITY

36. Claimants argue that the Tribunal has jurisdiction to entertain the present case on the basis that jurisdiction has to be determined on a prima facie standard and issues of admissibility should not be decided as a preliminary matter.
37. Claimants reject Respondent's main objections to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, arguing: (i) that they made an investment under Article I (g) of the BIT; (ii) that they are "investors" under Article I(h) of the BIT; (iii) that all claims are timely and complied with any necessary procedures under the BIT and (iv) that their claims are not barred by the procedural requirement of Article XII (3)(d) of the BIT.<sup>10</sup>
38. According to the Claimants, the funds provided to the Villalobos brothers are "investments" as they fall within the examples listed in Article I (g)(i)(vi) of the BIT and they meet the general definition of "investments" provided by that same Article I. They also argue that the said funds are not within the exceptions listed in Article I(g). They affirm that their investments were made in accordance with Costa Rican law and within the territory of Costa Rica.
39. In reference to objections ratione personae, Claimants argue that all Claimants are Canadian nationals, some of whom invested in Costa Rica indirectly through non-Canadian holding companies owned and controlled by them. They also maintain that Canadian successors of deceased investors have standing as investors under the BIT, and they assert no claims on behalf of prospective investors.

<sup>10</sup> Article XII(3) of the BIT provides that "An investor may submit a dispute as referred to in paragraph (1) to arbitration in accordance with paragraph (4) only if: ... (d) in cases where Costa Rica is a party to the dispute, no judgment has been rendered by a Costa Rican court regarding the measure that is alleged to be in breach of this Agreement...".

40. Concerning objections ratione temporis, Claimants considered that none of their claims are barred by Article XV which provides that “This Agreement shall apply to any investment made by an investor of one contracting Party in the territory of the other Contracting Party before or after the entry into force of this Agreement...”.
41. They also maintain that all of their claims were submitted within the limitation period provided by Article XII(3) and that all Claimants filed the notices required under Article XII(2) of the BIT. Claimants also argued that Article XII(2) is procedural in nature and not jurisdictional. They assert that obligations under Article XII (2) and Article XII (3) are independent.
42. Finally, Claimants argue that their expropriation claims are admissible on the basis that at the time of submitting their Counter-Memorial on Jurisdiction and Admissibility, six and a half years had elapsed since Costa Rican authorities seized the assets of the Villalobos brothers without making these assets available to satisfy the claims of their creditors, including those of the Claimants. Claimants who participated in criminal proceedings against Osvaldo Villalobos have been unable to collect any of the seized assets. Thus, Claimants argue that the exhaustion of Costa Rican legal proceedings by those Claimants who did not participate in such criminal proceedings would be futile.

V. THE TRIBUNAL’S ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

43. At the outset, it should be noted that each of the five jurisdictional objections advanced by the Respondent would, if established, have differing potential effects on this case. A finding by the Tribunal in support of the first jurisdictional objection would constitute a complete bar to the entire case advanced by all 137 Claimants, since each of them must establish that they have an “investment”, as that term is defined by the BIT, in order to bring an arbitration against Costa Rica. On the other hand, a finding by this Tribunal in support of any or all of the other four jurisdictional objections would have the result that this Tribunal would lack jurisdiction only with respect to certain Claimants or certain issues that they advance. In view of the importance and all-encompassing nature of the Respondent's first jurisdictional objection, the Tribunal will address that objection first.

44. For the Tribunal to have jurisdiction in this case, each of the Claimants, under Article XII(2) has the burden to demonstrate, inter alia that he or she is "an investor" as defined in Article I(h) of the BIT. An "investor" under Article I(h) of the BIT means:

" (i) any natural person possessing the citizenship of one Contracting Party who is not also a citizen or the other Contracting Party; or

(ii) any enterprise as defined by paragraph (b) of this Article, incorporated or duly constituted in accordance with the applicable laws of one Contracting Party; who owns or controls an investment made in the territory of the other Contracting Party."

45. Thus, in addition to their nationality, the Canadian Claimants must demonstrate that they own or control an "investment," as that term is defined in the BIT, in the territory of Costa Rica.

46. Article I(g) of the Canada-Costa Rica BIT states: " 'investment' means any kind of asset owned or controlled either directly, or indirectly through an enterprise or natural person of a third State, by an investor of one Contracting Party in the territory of the other Contracting Party in accordance with the latter's laws..." It then provides that "investment" includes, "though not exclusively", six listed categories of assets, including (i) movable and immovable property and related property rights; (ii) shares, stocks, bonds and debentures or any other form of participation in an enterprise; (iii) money, claims to money, and claims to performance under contract having a financial value; (iv) goodwill; (v) intellectual property rights; and (vi) rights conferred by law or under contract, to undertake any economic and commercial activity, including any rights to search for, cultivate, extract, or exploit natural resources. Article I(g) also stipulates that certain types of assets are not included within the meaning of investment. These include "real estate or other property not acquired in the expectation or used for the purpose of economic benefit or other business purposes” and “claims to money that arise solely from: (i) commercial contracts for the sale of goods or services ... ; or (ii) the extension of credit in connection with a commercial transaction...”<sup>11</sup>

47. Thus, in order for this Tribunal to have jurisdiction over this dispute, the Claimants must, at a minimum, establish that their deposits and resulting legal relationship with the Villalobos brothers constituted “investments” as the term is defined by the Canada-Costa Rica BIT. To do that, they must show that their deposits had three characteristics: 1) that the deposits constituted “assets” under the BIT; 2) that the Claimants owned or controlled those assets in the territory of Costa Rica in accordance with Costa Rica law; and 3) that if the deposits satisfied these two characteristics they did not fall within those categories of assets that the BIT expressly excludes from the definition of investment. Thus, in order to find that the Claimants’ deposits and resulting relationships with the Villalobos brothers constituted an investment, the Tribunal at the outset must answer two basic questions in the affirmative: A) Did the Claimants’ deposits and resulting legal relationships with one or both of the Villalobos brothers constitute “assets” within the meaning of

“(g) “investment” means any kind of asset owned or controlled either directly, or indirectly through an enterprise or natural person of a third State, by an investor of one Contracting Party in the territory of the other Contracting Party in accordance with the latter’s laws and, in particular, though not exclusively, includes:

- i. movable and immovable property and any related property rights, such as mortgages, liens or pledges;
- ii. shares, stock, bonds and debentures or any other form of participation in an enterprise;
- iii. money, claims to money, and claims to performance under contract having a financial value;
- iv. goodwill;
- v. intellectual property rights;
- vi. rights, conferred by law or under contract, to undertake any economic and commercial activity, including any rights to search for, cultivate, extract or exploit natural resources;

but does not mean real estate or other property, tangible or intangible, not acquired in the expectation or used for the purpose of economic benefit or other business purposes.

For further certainty, investment does not mean, claims to money that arise solely from:

- i. commercial contracts for the sale of goods or services by a national or enterprise in the territory of one Contracting Party to a national or an enterprise in the territory of the other Contracting Party; or
- ii. the extension of credit in connection with a commercial transaction, such as trade financing, where the original maturity of the loan is less than three years.

Without prejudice to subparagraph (ii) immediately above, a loan to an enterprise where the enterprise is an affiliate of the investor shall be considered an investment.

For purposes of this Agreement, an investor shall be considered to control an investment if the investor has the power to name a majority of the board of directors or otherwise to legally direct the actions of the enterprise which owns the investment.

Any change in the form of an investment does not affect its character as an investment.

For greater clarity, returns shall be considered a component of investment. For the purpose of this Agreement, “returns” means all amounts yielded by an investment, as defined above, covered by this Agreement and in particular, though not exclusively, includes profits, interest, capital gains, dividends, royalties, fees or other current income.”

the BIT?; and B) If so, did the Claimants own or control those assets “in accordance with the laws of...” Costa Rica?

A) Did the Claimants’ Deposits and Resulting Legal Relationships with either or both of the Villalobos brothers constitute “assets” under the BIT?

48. The Canada-Costa Rica BIT does not define the meaning of the word “asset.” The French version of the BIT refers to “les avoirs de toute nature” and the official Spanish version refers to “cualquier tipo de activo.” The French word “avoirs” is usually translated into English as “asset” and the Spanish word “activo” is also translated in English as asset. In English, the ordinary meaning of the word “asset” is “anything of value” or a “valuable item that is owned.”<sup>12</sup> The Oxford English Dictionary defines “asset” as “an item of value owned” and Webster’s Deluxe Unabridged Dictionary (2nd ed.) defines asset as “anything owned that has exchange value” or a “valuable or desirable thing to have.”<sup>13</sup>
49. On the basis of these definitions, one can say that a Claimant’s deposit of funds resulting in an obligation of Enrique Villalobos to pay interest and principal was an asset since it constituted a thing of value owned by that Claimant. As a result of transferring their funds to Villalobos, the Claimants obtained a promise from Enrique Villalobos to repay the principal amount under certain conditions and further to pay the Claimants a specific amount of interest each month. That asset, embodied in an agreement with Villalobos, promised them a specific return each month according to a pre-determined interest rate and the right to the repayment of their principal deposit upon stated conditions including notice. In fact, many of the Claimants received and withdrew periodic payments of funds from their accounts with the Villalobos brothers.

50. That being so, it is clear to the Tribunal that the obligations of Enrique Villalobos to the Claimants as a result of their deposit of funds constituted “assets” owned by the Claimants within the meaning of the Canada-Costa Rica BIT.

B) Did the Claimants Own and Control Their Assets In Accordance with the Laws of Costa Rica?

51. Under the BIT, not only must the Claimants demonstrate that they own the assets which they assert constitutes an investment, but they must also demonstrate that they own or control those assets in accordance with the laws of Costa Rica. The French text of the BIT requires that the investments be owned “en conformité avec les lois” and the Spanish version specifies that the asset must be owned “de acuerdo con la legislación.”
52. In interpreting the phrases “owned or controlled” and “in accordance with the ...laws...,” it should first be emphasized that the BIT states this requirement in objective and categorical terms. Each Claimant must meet this requirement, regardless of his or her knowledge of the law or his or her intention to follow the law. Thus, the Claimants’ statements that they intended to follow the law or that they did not know the law are irrelevant to a determination of whether they actually owned or controlled their investments in accordance with the laws of Costa Rica.
53. Not all BITs contain a requirement that investments subject to treaty protection be “made” or “owned” in accordance with the law of the host country. The fact that the Contracting Parties to the Canada-Costa Rica BIT specifically included such a provision is a clear indication of the importance that they attached to the legality of investments made by investors of the other Party and their intention that their laws with respect to investments be strictly followed. The assurance of legality with respect to investment has important, indeed crucial, consequences for the public welfare and economic well-being of any country.

54. In order to prevent economic hardship to individual citizens and reduce the risk of financial crises, governments ordinarily seek to protect the savings of the public from fraud and other harms that can do significant injury not only to individuals but to the economy as a whole. They therefore seek to achieve this objective by regulating the actions of individuals and companies who would raise capital from the public or otherwise seek to serve as financial intermediaries.<sup>14</sup> One means employed by Costa Rica to protect the public savings is the Organic Law of the Central Bank of Costa Rica,<sup>15</sup> one of whose objectives, according to Article 2(d), is “to promote a stable, efficient, and competitive system of financial intermediation.” Toward this end, Article 116 of the Law provides that the only entities that may engage in financial intermediation in the country are those that are expressly authorized to do so by law. Furthermore, Article 157 makes it a crime to engage in financial intermediation without authorization.
55. By actively seeking and accepting deposits from the Claimants and several thousand other persons, the Villalobos brothers were engaged in financial intermediation without authorization by the Central Bank or any other government body as required by law. The courts of Costa Rica after a lengthy and extensive legal process determined that Osvaldo Villalobos, because of his involvement in the scheme, committed aggravated fraud and illegal financial intermediation. In securing investments from the Claimants, the Villalobos brothers were thus clearly not acting in accordance with the laws of Costa Rica. The entire transaction between the Villalobos brothers and each Claimant was illegal because it violated the Organic Law of the Central Bank. If the transaction by which the Villalobos acquired the deposit was illegal, it follows that the acquisition by each Claimant of the asset resulting from that transaction was also not in accordance with the law of Costa Rica. Although the Claimants may not have committed a crime by entering into a transaction with the Villalobos,<sup>16</sup> the fact that they gained ownership of the asset in

<sup>14</sup> See for example the United States Securities Act of 1933 which regulates the sale to the public of a “security,” which includes a wide range of financial instruments.

<sup>16</sup> Costa Rica has not prosecuted the Claimants for their participation in the Villalobos scheme. At the Jurisdictional Hearing, the auxiliary violation of the Organic Law of the Central Bank means that their ownership was not in accordance with the laws of Costa Rica and that therefore each of their deposits and resulting relationships with Villalobos did not constitute an “investment” under the BIT.

56. Claimants’ counsel argued that in judging whether the Claimants’ deposits were owned in accordance with the laws of Costa Rica, this Tribunal should look only to whether the Claimants ownership rights in their claim to be paid the agreed-upon interest and principal were legal obligations under Costa Rican law. By accepting the deposits under the conditions outlined earlier in this decision, Enrique Villalobos clearly became subject to that legal obligation. However, this Tribunal believes that the approach suggested by Claimants’ counsel is too narrow and not a correct interpretation of the treaty language “owned ... in accordance with the law” of Costa Rica.
57. The ordinary dictionary meaning of the verb “own” is “to have or hold a property”<sup>17</sup> or “to have or possess a property.”<sup>18</sup> In order to determine whether the ownership of a property is in accordance with the law of a particular country, one must of necessity examine how the possession or ownership of that property was acquired and in particular whether the process by which that possession or ownership was acquired complied with all of the prevailing laws. In the present case, it is clear that that the transaction by which the Claimants obtained ownership of their assets (i.e. their claim to be paid interest and principal by Enrique Villalobos) did not comply with the requirements of the Organic Law of the Central Bank of Costa Rica and that therefore the Claimants did not own their investment in accordance with the laws of Costa Rica. That being the case, the obligations of the Villalobos brother held by the Claimants do not constitute “investments” under the Canada-Costa Rica BIT and

- therefore this Tribunal lacks jurisdiction to hear the Claimants' claims against Costa Rica under the BIT.
58. The Tribunal's interpretation of the words "owned in accordance with the laws" of Costa Rica reflects both sound public policy and sound investment practice. Costa Rica, indeed any country, has a fundamental interest in securing respect for its law. It clearly sought to secure that interest by requiring investments under the BIT to be owned and controlled according to law. At the same time, prudent investment practice requires that any investor exercise due diligence before committing funds to any particular investment proposal. An important element of such due diligence is for investors to assure themselves that their investments comply with the law. Such due diligence obligation is neither overly onerous nor unreasonable. Based on the evidence presented to the Tribunal, it is clear that the Claimants did not exercise the kind of due diligence that reasonable investors would have undertaken to assure themselves that their deposits with the Villalobos scheme were in accordance with the laws of Costa Rica.
59. On the basis of the foregoing analysis, the Tribunal concludes that the Respondent's objection to jurisdiction on the ground that the Claimants did not own or control investments in accordance with the law of Costa Rica is established and that this Tribunal is therefore without jurisdiction to hear and decide the Claimants' claims.
60. In view of the fact that the Tribunal's decision on the Respondent's first objection to jurisdiction is established and justifies a complete dismissal of the Claimants' case, the Tribunal does not consider it necessary or appropriate to consider and decide upon the other objections to jurisdiction and admissibility raised by the Respondent.
61. For the reasons presented and pursuant to Article 45 of the Arbitration (AF) Rules, the Tribunal decides to accept the first objection to jurisdiction raised by the Respondent, and it therefore dismisses the Claimants' Request for Arbitration on the ground that the Tribunal lacks jurisdiction "ratione materiae" to hear the dispute which it presents. Therefore and pursuant to Article 44 of the Arbitration (AF) Rules, the Tribunal declares the proceedings closed.

VI. COSTS

62. Article 58(1) of the Arbitration (AF) Rules provides: “Unless parties otherwise agree, the Tribunal shall decide how and by whom the fees and expenses of the members of the Tribunal, the expenses and charges of the Secretariat and the expenses incurred by the parties in connection with the proceeding shall be borne.” The Tribunal thus has discretion to determine the apportionment of costs between the parties. The Tribunal notes that in reference to the allocation of costs, the practice of ICSID investment arbitration differs from commercial arbitration, which tends to award costs to the successful party.<sup>19</sup> Most ICSID tribunals have determined that each party should bear its own costs.<sup>20</sup> In a few recent investment arbitration cases the principle that “costs follow the event” has been followed by tribunals, which have determined that the losing party should bear all or part of the costs of the proceeding and counsel fees.<sup>21</sup> Such departures from the established previous trend have been justified by tribunals in light of the existence of special reasons or circumstances.

63. In the present case, the Tribunal, in concluding that Claimants’ claims lacked jurisdiction ratione materiae, based its reasoning on a strict interpretation and application of the BIT to the facts alleged by the Claimants. In evaluating the facts presented, the Tribunal has found no evidence for concluding that special circumstances exist, such as procedural misconduct, the existence of a frivolous claim, or an abuse of the BIT process or of the international investment protection regime.

See also Article 40(1) of the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules which provides: “...the costs of arbitration shall in principle be borne by the unsuccessful party. However, the arbitral tribunal may apportion each of such costs between the parties if it determines that apportionment is reasonable, taking into account the circumstances of the case.”

<sup>21</sup> Phoenix Action Ltd v. the Czech Republic (ICSID Case No. ARB/06/05), Award of April 15, 2009.

64. In consequence of the above, the Tribunal, in the application of its discretionary powers conferred by Article 58(1) of the ICSID (AF) Rules concludes that there are no special circumstances that justify a departure from the accepted and rational practice that each party shall bear its own legal costs and expenses and share equally in the costs and charges of the Tribunal and the ICSID Secretariat.

VII. DECISION OF THE TRIBUNAL

65. For reasons stated in the foregoing paragraphs and pursuant to Article 45 of the Arbitration (AF) Rules, the Tribunal decides with unanimity that:
- a) the Respondent's preliminary objection ratione materiae to the Tribunal's jurisdiction must be accepted on grounds that the deposits made by the Claimants with the Villalobos brothers did not constitute an "investment" as that term is defined in Article I of the Canada-Costa Rica BIT;
  - b) the Tribunal is accordingly without jurisdiction to entertain the dispute submitted to it either in part or in whole; and
  - c) the Claimants' Request for Arbitration is therefore dismissed in its entirety.
66. The Tribunal further decides that:
- (a) The costs of the proceedings including the fees and expenses of the Arbitrators and the Secretariat shall be shared by the Parties in equal portion; and that
  - (b) Each Party shall bear its own costs and expenses in respect of legal fees for their counsel and their respective costs for the preparation of the written and the oral proceedings.

after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 11 July 1991, gives the following

Judgment

- 1 By order of 17 July 1990, which was received at the Court on 6 September 1990, the Bundesfinanzhof (Federal Finance Court) referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty a question on the validity of Commission Decision 83/348/EEC of 5 July 1983 establishing that the apparatus described as 'Jeol-Scanning Electron Microscope, Model JSM-35 C' may not be imported free of Common Customs Tariff duties (Official Journal 1983 L 188, p. 22).
- 2 The question was raised in the course of proceedings between the Technische Universität München and the Hauptzollamt München-Mitte.
- 3 The proceedings concern the grant of customs exemption, for a scientific instrument imported into the Community, under Article 3(1)(b) of Council Regulation (EEC) No 1798/75 of 10 July 1975 on the importation free of Common Customs Tariff duties of educational, scientific and cultural materials (Official Journal 1975 L 184, p. 1), as amended by Council Regulation (EEC) No 1027/79 of 8 May 1979 (Official Journal 1979 L 134, p. 1) in force since 1 January 1980.

- 4 Between 1 June 1979 and 23 March 1981 the Technische Universität München brought into free circulation a scanning electron microscope, model JSM-35 C, manufactured by Japan Elektron Optics Laboratory Ltd of Tokyo. The instrument was intended to be used in research work in its chemistry, biology and geology departments. It was to be used in investigating electro-chemical processes, geological, mineralogical and food chemistry problems, and research into plastics, photochemical emulsions and biological systems.
- 5 The Hauptzollamt initially admitted it free of customs duty. However, by notices of 14 and 15 April and 22 June 1982 it then demanded customs duties of DM 31 110 plus import turnover tax of DM 3 746.
- 6 Following the objection procedure commenced by the Technische Universität, the Hauptzollamt requested the intervention of the Commission pursuant to Article 7(2) of Commission Regulation (EEC) No 2784/79 of 12 December 1979 laying down provisions for the implementation of Council Regulation (EEC) No 1798/75 (Official Journal 1979 L 318, p. 32).
- 7 On 5 July 1983, the Commission adopted Decision 83/348, referred to above, according to which the electron microscope in question could not be imported free of Common Customs Tariff duties because apparatus of equivalent scientific value, capable of being used for the same purposes, was being manufactured in the Community, in particular, the PSEM 500 X instrument produced by Philips Nederland BV.

- 8 Following this decision by the Commission, the Hauptzollamt rejected the application for duty-free admission. The Technische Universität then began an action.
- 9 The Bundesfinanzhof, to which the case came at last instance, considers that it raises a question of the validity of Commission Decision 83/348, cited above. In its view, the Court of Justice has always held that it has only a limited power of review in relation to disputes concerning the duty-free importation of scientific apparatus. According to its case-law, given the technical nature of the questions which arise, the Court may only declare a decision of the Commission invalid where there has been a manifest error of appraisal or a misuse of power. The Bundesfinanzhof doubts whether that view can be maintained.
- 10 The Bundesfinanzhof considers that the fact-finding and the application of the legal criteria governing the grant of duty-free admission cannot escape judicial review. That requirement for legal protection is not affected by the fact that the comparative examination of the equivalence of scientific apparatus carried out by the competent customs authorities is mainly technical.
- 11 The Bundesfinanzhof therefore asks the Court whether Commission Decision 83/348 is valid.
- 12 Reference is made to the Report for the Hearing for a fuller account of the facts of the case, the procedure and the written and oral observations submitted to the Court, which are mentioned or discussed hereinafter only in so far as is necessary for the reasoning of the Court.

- 13 It must be stated first of all that, since an administrative procedure entailing complex technical evaluations is involved, the Commission must have a power of appraisal in order to be able to fulfil its tasks.
- 14 However, where the Community institutions have such a power of appraisal, respect for the rights guaranteed by the Community legal order in administrative procedures is of even more fundamental importance. Those guarantees include, in particular, the duty of the competent institution to examine carefully and impartially all the relevant aspects of the individual case, the right of the person concerned to make his views known and to have an adequately reasoned decision. Only in this way can the Court verify whether the factual and legal elements upon which the exercise of the power of appraisal depends were present.
- 15 The Court must therefore examine whether the disputed decision was adopted in accordance with the principles mentioned above.
- 16 With regard to the first point, it should be borne in mind that Regulation No 1798/75, cited above, implemented in the Community the Florence Agreement of 22 November 1950 (see Official Journal 1979 L 134, p. 14) in which the Contracting States undertake not to apply customs duties and import duties on scientific apparatus intended for educational or research purposes, provided that no apparatus of equivalent scientific value is manufactured in the country of importation.
- 17 According to the first recital of the preamble to Regulation No 1798/75, it is necessary to allow, by all possible means, the admission free of Common Customs Tariff duties of educational, scientific and cultural materials in order to facilitate the free exchange of ideas as well as the exercise of cultural activities and scientific research within the Community.

- 18 Article 3(1) of the regulation provides that scientific instruments and apparatus imported exclusively for non-commercial purposes are to be admitted free of Common Customs Tariff duties if no instruments or apparatus of equivalent scientific value are being manufactured in the Community.
- 19 The grant of customs exemption for scientific apparatus imported into the Community can therefore only be refused, on the grounds that apparatus of equivalent scientific value exists in the Community, if the investigation carried out by the authorities responsible for applying Regulation No 1798/75 has established that fact for certain.
- 20 In the procedure laid down by Regulation No 2784/79 the Commission consults the Member States and, if necessary, a group of experts. If this group's examination shows that an equivalent apparatus is manufactured in the Community, the Commission adopts a decision establishing that the conditions for duty-free importation of the apparatus are not met.
- 21 The Commission has admitted that it has always followed the opinions of the group of experts because it has no other sources of information concerning the apparatus being considered.
- 22 In those circumstances, the group of experts cannot properly carry out its task unless it is composed of persons possessing the necessary technical knowledge in the various fields in which the scientific instruments concerned are used or the members of that group are advised by experts having that knowledge. Neither the minutes of the meeting of the group of experts nor the oral proceedings before the Court have shown that the members of the group themselves possessed the necessary knowledge in the fields of chemistry, biology and geographical sciences or that they sought advice from experts in those fields in order to be able to address the technical problems raised by the examination of the equivalence of the scientific instruments in question. Consequently, the Commission has infringed its obligation to examine carefully and impartially all the relevant aspects of the case in point.

- 23 Secondly, it must be stated that Regulation No 2784/79 does not provide any opportunity for the person concerned, the importer of scientific apparatus, to explain his position to the group of experts or to comment on the information before the group or to take a position on the group's recommendation.
- 24 However, it is the importing institution which is best aware of the technical characteristics which the scientific apparatus must have in view of the work for which it is intended. The comparison between the imported apparatus and the instruments originating in the Community must, consequently, be made according to the information about the intended research projects and the actual intended use of the apparatus provided by the person concerned.
- 25 The right to be heard in such an administrative procedure requires that the person concerned should be able, during the actual procedure before the Commission, to put his own case and properly make his views known on the relevant circumstances and, where necessary, on the documents taken into account by the Community institution. This requirement was not met when the disputed decision was adopted.
- 26 Thirdly, and finally, with regard to the statement of reasons required by Article 190 of the Treaty, the Court has consistently held (see, in particular, its judgment in Case 205/85 Nicolet Instrument v Hauptzollamt Frankfurt am Main-Flughafen [1986] ECR 2049) that the statement of reasons must disclose in a clear and unequivocal fashion the reasoning followed by the Community authority which adopted the measure in question in such a way as to make the persons concerned aware of the reasons for the measure and thus enable them to defend their rights and to enable the Court to exercise its supervisory jurisdiction.

- 27 In the instant case, it must be stated that the Commission's decision does not contain a sufficient statement of the scientific reasons capable of justifying the conclusion that the instrument manufactured in the Community is equivalent to the imported instrument. The disputed decision merely reproduces the wording of one of the Commission's previous decisions, Decision 82/86/EEC of 23 December 1981 (Official Journal 1982 L 41, p. 53). It is therefore impossible for the person concerned to ascertain whether the decision is vitiated by an error of appraisal. The decision does not therefore satisfy the requirements laid down by Article 190 of the Treaty.
- 28 It follows from all the considerations set out above that the decision in question was adopted pursuant to an administrative procedure in which the obligation of the competent institution to examine carefully and impartially all the relevant aspects of the individual case before it, the right to be heard and the obligation to provide an adequate statement of reasons for the decision subsequently adopted were infringed.
- 29 Accordingly, the answer to be given to the national court is that Commission Decision 83/348 of 5 July 1983 establishing that the apparatus described as 'Jeol-Scanning Electron Microscope, model JSM-35 C' may not be imported free of Common Customs Tariff duties is invalid.

Costs

- 30 The costs incurred by the Commission of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, in so far as the parties to the main proceedings are concerned, in the nature of a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the question submitted to it by the Bundesfinanzhof, by order of 17 July 1990, hereby rules:

Commission Decision 83/348/EEC of 5 July 1983 establishing that the apparatus described as 'Jeol-Scanning Electron Microscope, model JSM-35 C' may not be imported free of Common Customs Tariff duties is invalid.

Judgment

- 1 By order of 12 December 1989, which was received at the Court on 22 January 1990, the Finanzgericht Bremen (Second Chamber), referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 177 of the EEC Treaty a question on the validity of Council Regulation (EEC) No 725/89 of 20 March 1989 imposing a definitive anti-dumping duty on imports of paint, distemper, varnish and similar brushes originating in the People's Republic of China and definitively collecting the provisional anti-dumping duty on such imports (Official Journal 1989 L 79, p. 24).

NÖLLE

- 2 The question was raised in proceedings between Detlef Nölle, trading as 'Eugen Nölle' (hereinafter referred to as 'Nölle') and the Hauptzollamt Bremen-Freihafen (hereinafter referred to as 'the Hauptzollamt') concerning the definitive anti-dumping duties imposed by the latter on Nölle's imports of paint brushes from China.

- 3 On 21 November 1988 and 8 and 14 February 1989, Nölle applied to the Hauptzollamt for entry for free circulation of three consignments of cleaning and paint brushes falling under Combined Nomenclature code 9603 40 10 originating in the People's Republic of China. The Hauptzollamt first demanded, pursuant to Article 1 of Commission Regulation (EEC) No 3052/88 imposing a provisional anti-dumping duty on imports of paint, distemper, varnish and similar brushes originating in the People's Republic of China (Official Journal 1988 L 272, p. 16), payment of a provisional anti-dumping duty in respect of which Nölle, in pursuance of Article 1(4) of the said regulation, lodged a security in the form of a directly enforceable bank guarantee in the amounts of DM 31 000, DM 17 000 and DM 4 400, a total of DM 52 400 for the three consignments.

- 4 In three notices dated 14 April 1989, the Hauptzollamt requested Nölle to pay DM 29 937.04, DM 16 972.57 and DM 4 307.79, a total of DM 51 217.40, in definitive anti-dumping duty, corresponding, in accordance with Article 1 of the said Regulation No 725/89 (hereinafter referred to as 'the contested regulation'), to 69% of the net price per brush, free-at-Community-frontier, not cleared through customs.

- 5 On 3 May 1989, Nölle lodged an objection with the Hauptzollamt, claiming that the notices of 14 April were illegal on the ground that the contested regulation, on which they were based, was in several respects in breach of higher-ranking Community rules. The objection was dismissed and Nölle then brought an action before the Finanzgericht Bremen for the cancellation of the three notices.

- 6 In those circumstances the national court referred the following question to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

‘Is Council Regulation (EEC) No 725/89 of 20 March 1989 invalid?’

- 7 Reference is made to the Report for the Hearing for a fuller account of the facts of the case, the procedure and the written observations submitted to the Court, which are mentioned or discussed hereinafter only in so far as is necessary for the reasoning of the Court.

- 8 The national court bases its doubts as to the validity of the contested regulation on the grounds pleaded by the plaintiff in the main proceedings, namely infringement of Article 2(5)(a) of Council Regulation (EEC) No 2423/88 of 11 July 1988 on protection against dumped or subsidized imports from countries not members of the European Economic Community (Official Journal 1988 L 209, p. 1) (hereinafter referred to as ‘the basic regulation’).

- 9 That article provides that:

‘In the case of imports from non-market economy countries . . . normal value shall be determined in an appropriate and not unreasonable manner on the basis of one of the following criteria:

- (a) the price at which the like product of a market economy third country is actually sold:

(i) for consumption on the domestic market of that country; or

(ii) to other countries, including the Community;

...’

- 10 First of all it should be stressed that the aim of Article 2(5) of the basic regulation is to prevent account being taken of prices and costs in non-market-economy countries, that is to say, which are not the normal result of market forces (see the judgment in Joined Cases C-305/86 and C-160/87 Neotype Techmashexport v Commission and Council [1990] ECR I-2945).
- 11 It should also be remembered that the choice of reference country is a matter falling within the discretion enjoyed by the institutions in analysing complex economic situations.
- 12 However, the exercise of that discretion is not excluded from review by the Court. The Court has consistently held that in the context of such a review it will verify whether the relevant procedural rules have been complied with, whether the facts on which the choice is based have been accurately stated and whether there has been a manifest error of appraisal or a misuse of powers (judgments in Case 240/84 NTN Toyo Bearing Company Limited and Others v Council [1987] ECR 1809 and Case 258/84 Nippon Seiko KK v Council [1987] ECR 1923).
- 13 As regards in particular the choice of reference country it is desirable to verify whether the institutions neglected to take account of essential factors for the purpose of establishing the appropriate nature of the country chosen and whether the information contained in the documents in the case were considered with all the care required for the view to be taken that the normal value was determined in an appropriate and not unreasonable manner.
- 14 Nölle claims that the normal value was not determined in such a manner since Sri Lanka, the country chosen as the reference country, satisfied none of the conditions of which the Commission, according to its usual practice, has hitherto taken account, namely the existence in the country concerned of a like product of like volume and production methods, of conditions of access to raw materials comparable to those of the exporting country concerned and of prices resulting from the operation of the rules of the market economy.

- 15 In this respect Nölle claims first that China produces round, flat and radiator paint brushes, whereas Sri Lanka produces only flat brushes as well as other brushes not affected by the anti-dumping duty at issue.
- 16 The Commission thinks, however, that the Sri Lankan brushes are similar to the Chinese brushes because they are essentially manufactured from animal hair and have wooden handles of similar thickness, a ferrule and a quantity and weight of hair and bristle similar to those of the Chinese brushes. It is therefore in the Commission's view irrelevant that Sri Lanka produces only flat brushes.
- 17 It should be noted that neither the documents sent by the national court nor the documents and explanations produced during the hearing before the Court show conclusively whether or not the products in question are similar. It is therefore not established that in this respect the institutions made a manifestly incorrect appraisal.
- 18 Nölle claims in the second place that production volumes are not comparable, because in Sri Lanka there are only two major producers, one of whom manufactures practically none of the products in question, whereas in China there are at least 150 small and medium-sized businesses and the production volume there is accordingly at least 200 times as great as that in Sri Lanka.
- 19 According to the Commission the fact that production volume in the People's Republic of China is higher than in Sri Lanka is not relevant since the decisive criterion for calculating the normal value is the production costs of individual firms. In both these countries the firms are small or medium-sized with labour-intensive production in small-scale units with low wage rates.

- 20 It should be recalled that according in particular to paragraph 31 of the judgment in Joined Cases C-305/86 and C-160/87 Neotype, cited above, the size of the domestic market is not in principle a factor capable of being taken into consideration in the choice of a reference country under Article 2(5) of the basic regulation in so far as, during the period of the investigation, there is a sufficient number of transactions to ensure the representative nature of the market in relation to the exports in question. In this respect it should be borne in mind that in paragraphs 12 and 13 of the judgment in Case 250/85 Brother Industries v Council [1988] ECR 5683, the Court rejected a challenge to the institutions' practice of fixing the minimum level of representativity of the domestic market, for the purpose of calculating the normal value, at 5% of the exports in question.
- 21 At the hearing Nölle and the Commission agreed that the volume of exports of Chinese paint brushes to the Community was some 60 million brushes, whereas Sri Lanka's total production was of the order of 750 000 brushes a year, representing 1.25% of the volume of the exports in question.
- 22 It should be emphasized that although the sole fact that the production volume of the reference country is below the minimum level of 5% does not necessarily signify that the choice of that country cannot be regarded as appropriate and not unreasonable, a figure of 1.25% nevertheless amounts to an indication that the market considered is not very representative.
- 23 It must also be noted that the Commission and the Council did not produce during either the written or the oral procedure any figures or details capable of showing that, as they stated, production methods in Sri Lanka consisted in labour-intensive production in small-scale units with low wage rates, so that they were comparable to production methods in China.

- 24 Nölle states in the third place that the Sri Lankan industry is obliged to import pig bristle, wood for the handles, and the ferrules, whilst China has practically 85% of the world market in pig bristle.
- 25 The Commission contends that the alleged advantage resulting from access to raw materials cannot be satisfactorily quantified in a non-market-economy country and that in any event such an advantage may be offset by other competitive advantages existing in a market-economy country. Moreover it claims that, as regards the raw materials imported for paint-brush manufacture, adjustments were made (see recital 20 in the preamble to the contested regulation) and that the Commission deducted 25% of the already adjusted price to take account of quality differences.
- 26 This argument put forward by the Commission cannot be accepted. In the first place it follows from the Community institutions' established practice that the comparability of access to raw materials must be taken into consideration for the choice of reference country (see, for example Council Regulation (EEC) No 407/80 of 18 February 1980 imposing a definitive anti-dumping duty on certain sodium carbonate originating in the Soviet Union, Official Journal 1980 L 48, p. 1). Secondly the advantages resulting from access to raw materials cannot be excluded simply because there is no market economy in the exporting country. Since Article 2(5) of the basic regulation is actually applied only in the case of imports from non-market-economy countries, that argument would be tantamount to making impossible any comparison between the production costs of countries with different market conditions.
- 27 Nölle claims finally that the prices charged in Sri Lanka are not the result of the rules of a market economy since there is no natural competition there. It stresses in this respect that the two producers share roughly 90% of the domestic market and that the one of them who manufactures products comparable to those imported from China is a subsidiary of a Community producer who took a leading part in the anti-dumping proceeding set in motion by the European producers.

- 28 The Commission contends that that does not imply the existence of an agreement, decision or concerted practice on prices or the absence of sufficient competition.
- 29 In this respect it must be emphasized that, although the sole fact that there are only two producers in the reference country does not, of itself, prevent prices from being the result of real competition, Nölle, without any objection from the Commission, drew price comparisons during the written procedure and at the hearing from which it is clear that the Sri Lankan producers charged prices higher than those of two representative Community producers. In addition, Nölle produced two documents from the Sri Lankan firms in question, showing that they could supply the Community only to a very limited extent as the production of brushes is adapted to the needs of the domestic market and that there is no price advantage in comparison with the prices which the parent company is able to offer in Europe.
- 30 It appears from the foregoing that Nölle has produced sufficient factors, already known to the Commission and the Council during the anti-dumping proceeding, to raise doubts as to whether the choice of Sri Lanka as a reference country was appropriate and not unreasonable.
- 31 However, the institutions came to the conclusion that Sri Lanka represented an appropriate and not unreasonable choice and did not therefore consider Taiwan, which had been suggested by the plaintiff.
- 32 It should be pointed out in this connection that although the institutions are not required to consider every reference country suggested by the parties during an anti-dumping proceeding, the doubts which arose in this case with regard to the choice of Sri Lanka ought to have led the Commission to examine the proposal made by the plaintiff in greater depth.

- 33 It may be seen from the preamble to the contested regulation that Taiwan was considered as a possible reference country but that the institutions did not pursue that possibility on the ground that the physical characteristics and the production costs of the products were different and that the Taiwanese producers who were approached refused to cooperate (recitals 16 and 17 in the preamble to the contested regulation).
- 34 These statements were not supported by any details and no facts were produced. As regards, in particular, the Taiwanese producers' alleged refusal to cooperate, it should be noted that the letter addressed to the two main producers in Taiwan, produced by the Commission during the hearing, cannot be regarded as a sufficient attempt to obtain information, regard being had to its wording and the extremely short period allowed for reply, which made it practically impossible for the producers in question to cooperate.
- 35 In view of all the circumstances set out above it appears, on the one hand, that various factors known to the institutions were in any event such as to raise doubts as to the appropriateness of Sri Lanka as a reference country and, on the other hand, that the institutions did not make a serious or sufficient attempt to determine whether Taiwan could be considered as an appropriate reference country.
- 36 In these circumstances it must be considered that the normal value was not determined 'in an appropriate and not unreasonable manner' within the meaning of Article 2(5)(a) of the basic regulation.
- 37 As the anti-dumping duty was therefore imposed in contravention of that provision, the contested regulation must be declared invalid and there is no need to consider the other grounds for invalidity put forward by the national court.

- 38 The answer to the question raised must therefore be that Regulation No 725/89 is invalid.

Costs

- 39 The costs incurred by the Commission and the Council of the European Communities, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT (Fifth Chamber), in answer to the question submitted to it by the Finanzgericht Bremen (Second Chamber), by order of 12 December 1989, hereby rules:

Council Regulation (EEC) No 725/89 of the Council of 20 March 1989 imposing a definitive anti-dumping duty on imports of paint, distemper, varnish and similar brushes originating in the People's Republic of China and definitively collecting the provisional anti-dumping duty in such imports is invalid.

PREVENTION OF TRANSBOUNDARY HARM FROM HAZARDOUS ACTIVITIES

General commentary

(1) The articles deal with the concept of prevention in the context of authorization and regulation of hazardous activities which pose a significant risk of transboundary harm. Prevention in this sense, as a procedure or as a duty, deals with the phase prior to the situation where significant harm or damage might actually occur, requiring States concerned to invoke remedial or compensatory measures, which often involve issues concerning liability.

(2) The concept of prevention has assumed great significance and topicality. The emphasis upon the duty to prevent as opposed to the obligation to repair, remedy or compensate has several important aspects. Prevention should be a preferred policy because compensation in case of harm often cannot restore the situation prevailing prior to the event or accident. Discharge of the duty of prevention or due diligence is all the more required as knowledge regarding the operation of hazardous activities, materials used and the process of managing them and the risks involved is steadily growing. From a legal point of view, the enhanced ability to trace the chain of causation, i.e. the physical link between the cause (activity) and the effect (harm), and even the several intermediate links in such a chain of causation, makes it also imperative for operators of hazardous activities to take all steps necessary to prevent harm. In any event, prevention as a policy is better than cure.

(3) Prevention of transboundary harm arising from hazardous activities is an objective well emphasized by principle 2 of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development (Rio Declaration)<sup>857</sup> and confirmed by ICJ in its advisory opinion on the Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons<sup>858</sup> as now forming part of the corpus of international law.

(4) The issue of prevention, therefore, has rightly been stressed by the Experts Group on Environmental Law of the World Commission on Environment and Development (Brundtland Commission). Article 10 recommended by the Group in respect of transboundary natural resources and environmental interferences thus reads: "States shall, without prejudice to the principles laid down in articles 11 and 12, prevent or abate any transboundary environmental interference or a significant risk thereof which causes substantial harm—i.e. harm which is not minor or insignificant."<sup>859</sup> It must be further noted that the well-established principle of prevention was highlighted in the arbitral award in the Trail Smelter case<sup>860</sup> and was reiterated not only in principle 21 of the Declaration of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment (Stockholm Declaration)<sup>861</sup> and principle 2 of the Rio Declaration, but also in General Assembly resolution 2995 (XXVII) of 15 December 1972 on cooperation between States in the field of the environment. This principle is also reflected in principle 3 of the Principles of conduct in the field of the environment for the guidance of States in the conservation and harmonious utilization of natural resources shared by two or more States, adopted by the Governing Council of UNEP in 1978, which provided that States must:

avoid to the maximum extent possible and ... reduce to the minimum extent possible the adverse environmental effects beyond its jurisdiction of the utilization of a shared natural resource so as to protect the environment, in particular when such utilization might:

- (a) cause damage to the environment which could have repercussions on the utilization of the resource by another sharing State;
- (b) threaten the conservation of a shared renewable resource;
- (c) endanger the health of the population of another State.<sup>862</sup>

Commentary

(1) The preamble sets out the general context in which the topic of prevention is elaborated, keeping in view the mandate given to the Commission to codify and develop international law. Activities covered under the present topic of prevention require States to engage in cooperation and accommodation in their mutual interest. States produced in ILM, vol. 17, No. 5 (September 1978), p. 1098. are free to formulate necessary policies to develop their natural resources and to carry out or authorize activities in response to the needs of their populations. In so doing, however, States have to ensure that such activities are carried out taking into account the interests of other States and therefore the freedom they have within their own jurisdiction is not unlimited.

(2) The prevention of transboundary harm from hazardous activities should also be seen in the context of the general principles incorporated in the Rio Declaration and other considerations that emphasize the close interrelationship between issues of environment and development. A general reference in the fourth preambular paragraph to the Rio Declaration indicates the importance of the interactive nature of all the principles contained therein. This is without prejudice to highlighting specific principles of the Rio Declaration, as appropriate, in the commentaries to follow on particular articles.

Article 1. Scope

The present articles apply to activities not prohibited by international law which involve a risk of causing significant transboundary harm through their physical consequences.

Commentary

(1) Article 1 limits the scope of the articles to activities not prohibited by international law and which involve a risk of causing significant transboundary harm through their physical consequences. Subparagraph (d) of article 2 further limits the scope of the articles to those activities carried out in the territory or otherwise under the jurisdiction or control of a State.

(2) Any activity which involves the risk of causing significant transboundary harm through the physical consequences is within the scope of the articles. Different types of activities could be envisaged under this category. As the title of the proposed articles indicates, any hazardous and by inference any ultrahazardous activity which involves a risk of significant transboundary harm is covered. An ultrahazardous activity is perceived to be an activity with a danger that is rarely expected to materialize but might assume, on that rare occasion, grave (more than significant, serious or substantial) proportions.

(3) Suggestions have been made at different stages of the evolution of the present articles to specify a list of activities in an annex to the present articles with an option to make additions or deletions to such a list in the future as appropriate. States could also be given the option to add to or delete from the list items which they may include in any national legislation aimed at implementing the obligations of prevention.

(4) It is, however, felt that specification of a list of activities in an annex to the articles is not without problems and functionally not essential. Any such list of activities is likely to be under inclusion and could become quickly dated from time to time in the light of fast evolving technology. Further, except for certain ultrahazardous activities which are mostly the subject of special regulation, e.g. in the nuclear field or in the context of activities in outer space, the risk that flows from an activity is primarily a function of the particular application, the specific context and the manner of operation. It is felt that a generic list could not capture these elements.

(5) It may be further noted that it is always open to States to specify activities coming within the scope of the articles in any regional or bilateral agreements or to do so in their national legislation regulating such activities and implementing obligations of prevention.<sup>864</sup> In any case, the scope of the articles is clarified by the four different criteria noted in the article.

(6) The first criterion to define the scope of the articles refers to “activities not prohibited by international law”. This approach has been adopted in order to separate the topic of international liability from the topic of State responsibility.<sup>865</sup> The employment of this criterion is also intended to allow a State likely to be affected by an activity involving the risk of causing significant transboundary harm to demand from the State of origin compliance with obligations of prevention although the activity itself is not prohibited. In addition, an invocation of these articles by a State likely to be affected is not a bar to a later claim by that State that the activity in question is a prohibited activity. Equally, it is to be understood that non-fulfilment of the duty of prevention at any event of the minimization of risk under the articles would not give rise to the implication that the activity itself is prohibited.<sup>866</sup> However, in such a case State responsibility could be engaged to implement the obligations, including any civil responsi-

<sup>864</sup> For example, various conventions deal with the type of activities which come under their scope: the Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution from Land-based Sources; the Protocol for the Protection of the Mediterranean Sea against Pollution from Land-based Sources; the Agreement for the Protection of the Rhine against Chemical Pollution; appendix I to the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, where a number of activities such as the crude oil refineries, thermal power stations, installations to produce enriched nuclear fuels, etc., are identified as possibly dangerous to the environment and requiring environmental impact assessment under the Convention; the Convention on the Protection of the Marine Environment of the Baltic Sea Area; the Convention on the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents; annex II to the Convention on Civil Liability for Damage Resulting from Activities Dangerous to the Environment, where activities such as the installations or sites for the partial or complete disposal of solid, liquid or gaseous wastes by incineration on land or at sea, installations or sites for thermal degradation of solid, gaseous or liquid wastes under reduced oxygen supply, etc., have been identified as dangerous activities; this Convention also has a list of dangerous substances in annex I.

ity or duty of the operator.<sup>867</sup> The articles are primarily concerned with the management of risk and emphasize the duty of cooperation and consultation among all States concerned. States likely to be affected are given the right of engagement with the State of origin in designing and, where appropriate, in the implementation of a system of management of risk commonly shared between or among them. The right thus envisaged in favour of the States likely to be affected however does not give them the right to veto the activity or project itself.<sup>868</sup>

(7) The second criterion, found in the definition of the State of origin in article 2, subparagraph (d), is that the activities to which preventive measures are applicable “are planned or are carried out” in the territory or otherwise under the jurisdiction or control of a State. Three concepts are used in this criterion: “territory”, “jurisdiction” and “control”. Even though the expression “jurisdiction or control of a State” is a more commonly used formula in some instruments,<sup>869</sup> the Commission finds it useful to mention also the concept of “territory” in order to emphasize the importance of the territorial link, when such a link exists, between activities under these articles and a State.

(8) For the purposes of these articles, territorial jurisdiction is the dominant criterion. Consequently, when an activity covered by the present articles occurs within the territory of a State, that State must comply with the obligations of prevention. “Territory” is, therefore, taken as conclusive evidence of jurisdiction. Consequently, in cases of competing jurisdictions over an activity covered by these articles, the territorially based jurisdiction prevails. The Commission, however, is mindful of situations where a State, under international law, has to accept limits to its territorial jurisdiction in favour of another State. The prime example of such a situation is innocent passage of a foreign ship through the territorial sea. In such situations, if the activity leading to significant transboundary harm emanates from the foreign ship, the flag State, and not the territorial State, must comply with the provisions of the present articles.

Études en hommage à Alexandre Kiss*, M. Prieur and C. Lambrechts, eds. (Paris, Frison-Roche, 1998), pp. 269–282.

<sup>868</sup> On the nature of the duty of engagement and the attainment of a balance of interests involved, see the first report on prevention of transboundary damage from hazardous activities, by the Special Rapporteur, Pemmaraju Sreenivasa Rao, Yearbook ... 1998, vol. II (Part One), document A/CN.4/487 and Add.1, paras. 43, 44, 54 and 55 (d).

(9) The concept of “territory” for the purposes of these articles does not cover all cases where a State exercises “jurisdiction” or “control”. The expression “jurisdiction” of a State is intended to cover, in addition to the activities being undertaken within the territory of a State, activities over which, under international law, a State is authorized to exercise its competence and authority. The Commission is aware that questions involving the determination of jurisdiction are complex and sometimes constitute the core of a dispute. This article certainly does not presume to resolve all the questions of conflicts of jurisdiction.

(10) Sometimes, because of the location of the activity, there is no territorial link between a State and the activity such as, for example, activities taking place in outer space or on the high seas. The most common example is the jurisdiction of the flag State over a ship. The Geneva Conventions on the Law of the Sea and the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea have covered many jurisdictional capacities of the flag State.

(11) In cases of concurrent jurisdiction by more than one State over the activities covered by these articles, States shall individually and, when appropriate, jointly comply with the provisions of these articles.

(12) The function of the concept of “control” in international law is to attach certain legal consequences to a State whose jurisdiction over certain activities or events is not recognized by international law; it covers situations in which a State is exercising de facto jurisdiction, even though it lacks jurisdiction de jure, such as in cases of unlawful intervention, occupation and unlawful annexation. Reference may be made, in this respect, to the advisory opinion by ICJ in the Namibia case. In that advisory opinion, the Court, after holding South Africa responsible for having created and maintained a situation which the Court declared illegal and finding South Africa under an obligation to withdraw its administration from Namibia, nevertheless attached certain legal consequences to the de facto control of South Africa over Namibia. The Court held:

The fact that South Africa no longer has any title to administer the Territory does not release it from its obligations and responsibilities under international law towards other States in respect of the exercise of its powers in relation to this Territory. Physical control of a territory, and not sovereignty or legitimacy of title, is the basis of State liability for acts affecting other States.<sup>870</sup>

(13) The third criterion is that activities covered in these articles must involve a “risk of causing significant transboundary harm”. The term is defined in article 2 (see the commentary to article 2). The words “transboundary harm” are intended to exclude activities which cause harm only in the territory of the State within which the activity is undertaken without the possibility of any harm to any other State. For discussion of the term “significant”, see the commentary to article 2.

(14) As to the element of “risk”, this is by definition concerned with future possibilities, and thus implies some element of assessment or appreciation of risk. The mere fact that harm eventually results from an activity does not mean that the activity involved a risk, if no properly informed observer was or could have been aware of that risk at the time the activity was carried out. On the other hand, an activity may involve a risk of causing significant transboundary harm even though those responsible for carrying out the activity underestimated the risk or were even unaware of it. The notion of risk is thus to be taken objectively, as denoting an appreciation of possible harm resulting from an activity which a properly informed observer had or ought to have had.

(15) In this context, it should be stressed that these articles as a whole have a continuing operation and effect, i.e. unless otherwise stated, they apply to activities as carried out from time to time. Thus, it is possible that an activity which in its inception did not involve any risk (in the sense explained in paragraph (14)), might come to do so as a result of some event or development. For example, a perfectly safe reservoir may become dangerous as a result of an earthquake, in which case the continued operation of the reservoir would be an activity involving risk. Or developments in scientific knowledge might reveal an inherent weakness in a structure or materials which carry a risk of failure or collapse, in which case again the present articles might come to apply to the activity concerned in accordance with their terms.

(16) The fourth criterion is that the significant transboundary harm must have been caused by the “physical consequences” of such activities. It was agreed by the Commission that in order to bring this topic within a manageable scope, it should exclude transboundary harm which may be caused by State policies in monetary, socio-economic or similar fields. The Commission feels that the most effective way of limiting the scope of these articles is by requiring that these activities should have transboundary physical consequences which, in turn, result in significant harm.

(17) The physical link must connect the activity with its transboundary effects. This implies a connection of a very specific type—a consequence which does or may arise out of the very nature of the activity or situation in question. That implies that the activities covered in these articles must themselves have a physical quality, and the consequences must flow from that quality. Thus, the stockpiling of weapons does not entail the consequence that the weapons stockpiled will be put to a belligerent use. Yet, this stockpiling may be characterized as an activity which, because of the explosive or incendiary properties of the materials stored, entails an inherent risk of disastrous misadventure.

Article 2. Use of terms

For the purposes of the present articles:

(a) “Risk of causing significant transboundary harm” includes risks taking the form of a high probability of causing significant transboundary harm and a low probability of causing disastrous transboundary harm;

(b) “Harm” means harm caused to persons, property or the environment;

(c) “Transboundary harm” means harm caused in the territory of or in other places under the jurisdiction or control of a State other than the State of origin, whether or not the States concerned share a common border;

(d) “State of origin” means the State in the territory or otherwise under the jurisdiction or control of which the activities referred to in article 1 are planned or are carried out;

(e) “State likely to be affected” means the State or States in the territory of which there is the risk of significant transboundary harm or which have jurisdiction or control over any other place where there is such a risk;

(f) “States concerned” means the State of origin and the State likely to be affected.

Commentary

(1) Subparagraph (a) defines the concept of “risk of causing significant transboundary harm” as encompassing a low probability of causing disastrous transboundary harm or a high probability of causing significant transboundary harm. The Commission feels that instead of defining separately the concept of “risk” and then “harm”, it is more appropriate to define the expression of “risk of causing significant transboundary harm” because of the interrelationship between “risk” and “harm” and the relationship between them and the adjective “significant”.

(2) For the purposes of these articles, “risk of causing significant transboundary harm” refers to the combined effect of the probability of occurrence of an accident and the magnitude of its injurious impact. It is, therefore, the combined effect of “risk” and “harm” which sets the threshold. In this respect inspiration is drawn from the Code of Conduct on Accidental Pollution of Transboundary Inland Waters,<sup>871</sup> adopted by ECE in 1990. Under section I, subparagraph (f), of the Code of Conduct, “‘risk’ means the combined effect of the probability of occurrence of an undesirable event and its magnitude”. A definition based on the combined effect of “risk” and “harm” is more appropriate for these articles, and the combined effect should reach a level that is deemed significant. The obligations of prevention imposed on States are thus not only reasonable but also sufficiently limited so as not to impose such obligations in respect of virtually any activity. The purpose is to strike a balance between the interests of the States concerned.

(3) The definition in the preceding paragraph allows for a spectrum of relationships between “risk” and “harm”, all of which would reach the level of “significant”.

The definition refers to two types of activities under these articles. One is where there is a low probability of causing disastrous harm. This is normally the characteristic of ultrahazardous activities. The other one is where there is a high probability of causing significant harm. This includes activities which have a high probability of causing harm which, while not disastrous, is still significant. But it would exclude activities where there is a very low probability of causing significant transboundary harm. The word “includes” is intended to highlight the intention that the definition is providing a spectrum within which the activities under these articles will fall.

(4) The term “significant” is not without ambiguity and a determination has to be made in each specific case. It involves more factual considerations than legal determination. It is to be understood that “significant” is something more than “detectable” but need not be at the level of “serious” or “substantial”. The harm must lead to a real detrimental effect on matters such as, for example, human health, industry, property, environment or agriculture in other States. Such detrimental effects must be susceptible of being measured by factual and objective standards.

(5) The ecological unity of the planet does not correspond to political boundaries. In carrying out lawful activities within their own territories, States have impacts on each other. These mutual impacts, so long as they have not reached the level of “significant”, are considered tolerable.

(6) The idea of a threshold is reflected in the Trail Smelter award, which used the words “serious consequence[s]”,<sup>872</sup> as well as in the Lake Lanoux award, which relied on the concept “seriously” (gravement).<sup>873</sup> A number of conventions have also used “significant”, “serious” or “substantial” as the threshold.<sup>874</sup> “Significant” has also been used in other legal instruments and domestic law.<sup>875</sup>

<sup>874</sup> See, for example, article 4, paragraph 2, of the Convention on the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resource Activities; articles 2, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context; section I, subparagraph (b), of the Code of Conduct on Accidental Pollution of Transboundary Inland Waters (footnote 871 above); and article 7 of the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses.

<sup>875</sup> See, for example, article 5 of the draft convention on industrial and agricultural uses of international rivers and lakes, prepared by the Inter-American Juridical Committee in 1965 (OAS, Ríos y lagos internacionales (utilización para fines agrícolas e industriales), 4th ed. rev. (OEA/Ser.I/VI, CIJ-75 Rev.2) (Washington, D.C., 1971), p. 132); article X of the Helsinki Rules on the Uses of the Waters of International Rivers (International Law Association, Report of the Fifty-second Conference, Helsinki, 1966 (London, 1967), p. 496); paragraphs 1 and 2 of General Assembly resolution 2995 (XXVII) of 15 December 1972 concerning cooperation between States in the field of the environment; paragraph 6 of the annex to OECD Council recommendation C(74)224 of 14 November 1974 on Principles concerning transfrontier pollution (OECD, OECD and the Environment (Paris, 1986), p. 142, reprinted in ILM, vol. 14, No. 1 (January 1975), p. 246); the Memorandum of Intent Concerning Transboundary Air Pollution, between the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada, of 5 August 1980 (United Nations, Treaty Series, vol. 1274, No. 21009, p. 235) and article 7 of the Agreement between the United States of America and the United Mexican States on Cooperation for the Protection and

(7) The term “significant”, while determined by factual and objective criteria, also involves a value determination which depends on the circumstances of a particular case and the period in which such determination is made. For instance, a particular deprivation at a particular time might not be considered “significant” because at that specific time scientific knowledge or human appreciation for a particular resource had not reached a point at which much value was ascribed to that particular resource. But some time later that view might change and the same harm might then be considered “significant”.

(8) Subparagraph (b) is self-explanatory in that “harm” for the purpose of the present articles would cover harm caused to persons, property or the environment.

(9) Subparagraph (c) defines “transboundary harm” as meaning harm caused in the territory of or in other places under the jurisdiction or control of a State other than the State of origin, whether or not the States concerned share a common border. This definition includes, in addition to a typical scenario of an activity within a State with injurious effects on another State, activities conducted under the jurisdiction or control of a State, for example, on the high seas, with effects on the territory of another State or in places under its jurisdiction or control. It includes, for example, injurious impacts on ships or platforms of other States on the high seas as well. It will also include activities conducted in the territory of a State with injurious consequences on, for example, the ships or platforms of another State on the high seas. The Commission cannot forecast all the possible future forms of “transboundary harm”. However, it makes clear that the intention is to be able to draw a line and clearly distinguish a State under whose jurisdiction and control an activity covered by these articles is conducted from a State which has suffered the injurious impact.

(10) In subparagraph (d), the term “State of origin” is introduced to refer to the State in the territory or otherwise under the jurisdiction or control of which the activities referred to in article 1 are carried out.<sup>876</sup>

(11) In subparagraph (e), the term “State likely to be affected” is defined to mean the State on whose territory or in other places under whose jurisdiction or control there is the risk of significant transboundary harm. There may be more than one such State likely to be affected in relation to any given activity.

(12) In subparagraph (f), the term “States concerned” refers to both the State of origin and the State likely to be affected to which some of the articles refer together.

Improvement of the Environment in the Border Area, of 14 August 1983 (reprinted in ILM, vol. 22, No. 5 (September 1983), p. 1025). The United States has also used the word “significant” in its domestic law dealing with environmental issues; see Restatement of the Law Third, Restatement of the Law, The Foreign Relations Law of the United States (St. Paul, Minn., American Law Institute Publishers, 1987), vol. 2, pp. 111–112.

Article 3. Prevention

The State of origin shall take all appropriate measures to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof.

Commentary

(1) Article 3 is based on the fundamental principle sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, which is reflected in principle 21 of the Stockholm Declaration,<sup>877</sup> reading:

States have, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, the sovereign right to exploit their own natural resources pursuant to their own environmental policies, and the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction.

(2) However, the limitations on the freedom of States reflected in principle 21 are made more specific in article 3 and subsequent articles.

(3) This article, together with article 4, provides the basic foundation for the articles on prevention. The articles set out the more specific obligations of States to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof. The article thus emphasizes the primary duty of the State of origin to prevent significant transboundary harm; and only in case this is not fully possible it should exert its best efforts to minimize the risk thereof. The phrase “at any event” is intended to express priority in favour of the duty of prevention. The word “minimize” should be understood in this context as meaning to pursue the aim of reducing to the lowest point the possibility of harm.

(4) The present article is in the nature of a statement of principle. It provides that States shall take all appropriate measures to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event minimize the risk thereof. The phrase “all appropriate measures” refers to all those specific actions and steps that are specified in the articles on prevention and minimization of transboundary harm. Article 3 is complementary to articles 9 and 10 and together they constitute a harmonious ensemble. In addition, it imposes an obligation on the State of origin to adopt and implement national legislation incorporating accepted international standards. These standards would constitute a necessary reference point to determine whether measures adopted are suitable.

(5) As a general principle, the obligation in article 3 to prevent significant transboundary harm or minimize the risk thereof applies only to activities which involve a risk of causing significant transboundary harm, as those terms are defined in article 2. In general, in the context of prevention, a State of origin does not bear the risk of unforeseeable consequences to States likely to be affected by activities within the scope of these articles. On the other hand, the obligation to “take all appropriate measures” to prevent harm, or to minimize the risk thereof, cannot be confined to activities which are already properly appreciated as involving such a risk. The obligation extends to taking appropriate measures to identify activities which involve such a risk, and this obligation is of a continuing character.

(6) This article, then, sets up the principle of prevention that concerns every State in relation to activities covered by article 1. The modalities whereby the State of origin may discharge the obligations of prevention which have been established include, for example, legislative, administrative or other action necessary for enforcing the laws, administrative decisions and policies which the State of origin has adopted.<sup>878</sup>

(7) The obligation of the State of origin to take preventive or minimization measures is one of due diligence. It is the conduct of the State of origin that will determine whether the State has complied with its obligation under the present articles. The duty of due diligence involved, however, is not intended to guarantee that significant harm be totally prevented, if it is not possible to do so. In that eventuality, the State of origin is required, as noted above, to exert its best possible efforts to minimize the risk. In this sense, it does not guarantee that the harm would not occur.<sup>879</sup>

(8) An obligation of due diligence as the standard basis for the protection of the environment from harm can be deduced from a number of international conventions<sup>880</sup> as well as from the resolutions and reports of international conferences and organizations.<sup>881</sup> The obligation of due diligence was discussed in a dispute which arose in 1986 between Germany and Switzerland relating to the pollution of the Rhine by Sandoz. The Swiss Government acknowledged responsibility for lack of due diligence in preventing the accident through adequate regulation of its pharmaceutical industries.<sup>882</sup>

(9) In the “Alabama” case, the tribunal examined two different definitions of due diligence submitted by the parties. The United States defined due diligence as:

[A] diligence proportioned to the magnitude of the subject and to the dignity and strength of the power which is to exercise it; a diligence which shall, by the use of active vigilance, and of all the other means in the power of the neutral, through all stages of the transaction, prevent its soil from being violated; a diligence that shall in like manner deter designing men from committing acts of war upon the soil of the neutral against its will.<sup>883</sup>

The United Kingdom defined due diligence as “such care as Governments ordinarily employ in their domestic concerns”.<sup>884</sup> The tribunal seemed to have been persuaded by the broader definition of the standard of due diligence presented by the United States and expressed concern about the “national standard” of due diligence presented by the United Kingdom. The tribunal stated that:

[the] British case seemed also to narrow the international duties of a Government to the exercise of the restraining powers conferred upon it by municipal law, and to overlook the obligation of the neutral to amend its laws when they were insufficient.<sup>885</sup>

(10) In the context of the present articles, due diligence is manifested in reasonable efforts by a State to inform itself of factual and legal components that relate foreseeably to a contemplated procedure and to take appropriate measures, in timely fashion, to address them. Thus, States are under an obligation to take unilateral measures to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof arising out of activities within the scope of article 1. Such measures include, first, formulating policies designed to prevent significant transboundary harm or to minimize the risk thereof and, secondly, implementing those policies. Such policies are expressed in legislation and administrative regulations and implemented through various enforcement mechanisms.

(11) The standard of due diligence against which the conduct of the State of origin should be examined is that which is generally considered to be appropriate and proportional to the degree of risk of transboundary harm in the particular instance. For example, activities which may be considered ultrahazardous require a much higher standard of care in designing policies and a much higher degree of vigour on the part of the State to enforce them. Issues such as the size of the operation; its location, special climate conditions, materials used in the activity, and whether the conclusions drawn from the application of these factors in a specific case are reasonable, are among the factors to be considered in determining the due diligence requirement in each instance. What would be considered a reasonable standard of care or due diligence may change with time; what might be considered an appropriate and reasonable procedure, standard or rule at one point in time may not be considered as such at some point in the future. Hence, due diligence in ensuring safety requires a State to keep abreast of technological changes and scientific developments.

(12) It is also necessary in this connection to note principle 11 of the Rio Declaration, which states:

States shall enact effective environmental legislation. Environmental standards, management objectives and priorities should reflect the environmental and developmental context to which they apply. Standards applied by some countries may be inappropriate and of unwarranted economic and social cost to other countries, in particular developing countries.<sup>886</sup>

(13) Similar language is found in principle 23 of the Stockholm Declaration. That principle, however, specifies that such domestic standards are “[w]ithout prejudice to such criteria as may be agreed upon by the international community”.<sup>887</sup> The economic level of States is one of the factors to be taken into account in determining whether a State has complied with its obligation of due diligence. But a State’s economic level cannot be used to dispense the State from its obligation under the present articles.

(14) Article 3 imposes on the State a duty to take all necessary measures to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof. This could involve, inter alia, taking such measures as are appropriate by way of abundant caution, even if full scientific certainty does not exist, to avoid or prevent serious or irreversible damage. This is well articulated in principle 15 of the Rio Declaration and is subject to the capacity of States concerned (see paragraphs (5) to (8) of the commentary to article 10). An efficient implementation of the duty of prevention may well require upgrading the input of technology in the activity as well as the allocation of adequate financial and manpower resources with necessary training for the management and monitoring of the activity.

(15) The operator of the activity is expected to bear the costs of prevention to the extent that he is responsible for the operation. The State of origin is also expected to undertake the necessary expenditure to put in place the administrative, financial and monitoring mechanisms referred to in article 5.

(16) States are engaged in continuously evolving mutually beneficial schemes in the areas of capacity-building, transfer of technology and financial resources. Such efforts are recognized to be in the common interest of all States in developing uniform international standards regulating and implementing the duty of prevention.

(17) The main elements of the obligation of due diligence involved in the duty of prevention could be thus stated: the degree of care in question is that expected of a good Government. It should possess a legal system and sufficient resources to maintain an adequate administrative apparatus to control and monitor the activities. It is, however, understood that the degree of care expected of a State with a well-developed economy and human and material resources and with highly evolved systems and structures of governance is different from States which are not so well placed.<sup>888</sup> Even in the latter case, vigilance, employment of infrastructure and monitoring of hazardous activities in the territory of the State, which is a natural attribute of any Government, are expected.<sup>889</sup>

(18) The required degree of care is proportional to the degree of hazard involved. The degree of harm itself should be foreseeable and the State must know or should have known that the given activity has the risk of significant harm. The higher the degree of inadmissible harm, the greater would be the duty of care required to prevent it.

Article 4. Cooperation

States concerned shall cooperate in good faith and, as necessary, seek the assistance of one or more competent international organizations in preventing significant transboundary harm or at any event in minimizing the risk thereof.

Commentary

(1) The principle of cooperation between States is essential in designing and implementing effective policies to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof. The requirement of cooperation of States extends to all phases of planning and of implementation. Principle 24 of the Stockholm Declaration and principle 7 of the Rio Declaration recognize cooperation as an essential element in any effective planning for the protection of the environment. More specific forms of cooperation are stipulated in subsequent articles. They envisage the participation of the State likely to be affected in any preventive action, which is indispensable to enhance the effectiveness of any such action. The latter State may know better than anybody else, for instance, which features of the activity in question may be more damaging to it, or which zones of its territory close to the border may be more affected by the transboundary effects of the activity, such as a specially vulnerable ecosystem.

(2) The article requires States concerned to cooperate in good faith. Paragraph 2 of Article 2 of the Charter of the United Nations provides that all Members “shall fulfil in good faith the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the present Charter”. The 1969 and 1978 Vienna Conventions declare in their preambles that the principle of good faith is universally recognized. In addition, article 26 and article 31, paragraph 1, of the 1969 Vienna Convention acknowledge the essential place of this principle in the law of treaties. The decision of ICJ in the Nuclear Tests case touches upon the scope of the application of good faith. In that case, the Court proclaimed that “[o]ne of the basic principles governing the creation and performance of legal obligations, whatever their source, is the principle of good faith”.<sup>890</sup> This dictum of the Court implies that good faith applies also to unilateral acts.<sup>891</sup> Indeed, the principle of good faith covers “the entire structure of international relations”.<sup>892</sup>

(3) The arbitration tribunal, established in 1985 between Canada and France in the La Bretagne case, held that the principle of good faith was among the elements that afforded a sufficient guarantee against any risk of a party exercising its rights abusively.<sup>893</sup>

(4) The words “States concerned” refer to the State of origin and the State or States likely to be affected. While other States in a position to contribute to the goals of these articles are encouraged to cooperate, no legal obligations are imposed upon them to do so.

(5) The article provides that States shall “as necessary” seek the assistance of one or more international organizations in performing their preventive obligations as set out in these articles. States shall do so only when it is deemed necessary. The words “as necessary” are intended to take account of a number of possibilities: First, assistance from international organizations may not be necessary in every case. For example, the State of origin or the States likely to be affected may, themselves, be technologically advanced and have the necessary technical capability. Secondly, the term “international organization” is intended to refer to organizations that are competent and in a position to assist in such matters. Thirdly, even if there are competent international organizations, they could extend necessary assistance only in accordance with their constitutions. In any case, the article does not purport to create any obligation for international organizations to respond to requests for assistance independent of its own constitutional requirements.

(6) Requests for assistance from international organizations may be made by one or more States concerned. The principle of cooperation means that it is preferable that such requests be made by all States concerned. The fact, however, that all States concerned do not seek necessary assistance does not free individual States from the obligation to seek assistance. Of course, the response and type of involvement of an international organization in cases in which the request has been lodged by only one State will depend, for instance, on the nature of the request, the type of assistance involved and the place where the international organization would have to perform such assistance.

Commentary

(1) This article states what might be thought to be the obvious, viz. that under the present articles, States are required to take the necessary measures of implementation, whether of a legislative, administrative or other character. Implementation, going beyond formal application, involves the adoption of specific measures to ensure the effectiveness of the provisions of the present articles. Article 5 has been included here to emphasize the continuing character of the obligations, which require action to be taken from time to time to prevent transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof arising from activities to which the articles apply.<sup>894</sup>

(2) The measures referred to in this article include, for example, the opportunity available to persons concerned to make representations and the establishment of quasi-judicial procedures. The use of the term “other action” is intended to cover the variety of ways and means by which States could implement the present articles. Article 5 mentions some measures expressly only in order to give guidance to States; it is left up to them to decide upon necessary and appropriate measures. Reference is made to “suitable monitoring mechanisms” in order to highlight the measures of inspection which States generally adopt in respect of hazardous activities.

(3) To say that States must take the necessary measures does not mean that they must themselves get involved in operational issues relating to the activities to which article 1 applies. Where these activities are conducted by private persons or enterprises, the obligation of the State is limited to establishing the appropriate regulatory framework and applying it in accordance with these articles. The application of that regulatory framework in the given case will then be a matter of ordinary administration or, in the case of disputes, for the relevant courts or tribunals, aided by the principle of non-discrimination contained in article 15.

(4) The action referred to in article 5 may appropriately be taken in advance. Thus, States may establish a suitable monitoring mechanism before the activity in question is approved or instituted.

Article 6. Authorization

1. The State of origin shall require its prior authorization for:

(a) any activity within the scope of the present articles carried out in its territory or otherwise under its jurisdiction or control;

<sup>894</sup> This article is similar to article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, which reads: “Each Party shall take the necessary legal, administrative or other measures to implement the provisions of this Convention, including, with respect to proposed activities listed in appendix I that are likely to cause significant adverse transboundary impact, the establishment of an environmental impact assessment procedure that permits public participation and preparation of the environmental impact assessment documentation described in appendix II.”

(b) any major change in an activity referred to in subparagraph (a);

(c) any plan to change an activity which may transform it into one falling within the scope of the present articles.

2. The requirement of authorization established by a State shall be made applicable in respect of all pre-existing activities within the scope of the present articles. Authorizations already issued by the State for pre-existing activities shall be reviewed in order to comply with the present articles.

3. In case of a failure to conform to the terms of the authorization, the State of origin shall take such actions as appropriate, including where necessary terminating the authorization.

Commentary

(1) This article sets forth the fundamental principle that the prior authorization of a State is required for activities which involve a risk of causing significant transboundary harm undertaken in its territory or otherwise under its jurisdiction or control. The word “authorization” means granting permission by governmental authorities to conduct an activity covered by these articles. States are free to choose the form of such authorization.

(2) The requirement of authorization noted in article 6, paragraph 1 (a), obliges a State to ascertain whether activities with a possible risk of significant transboundary harm are taking place in its territory or otherwise under its jurisdiction or control and implies that the State should take the measures indicated in these articles. It also requires the State to take a responsible and active role in regulating such activities. The tribunal in the Trail Smelter arbitration held that Canada had “the duty ... to see to it that this conduct should be in conformity with the obligation of the Dominion under international law as herein determined”. The tribunal held that, in particular, “the Trail Smelter shall be required to refrain from causing any damage through fumes in the State of Washington”.<sup>895</sup> Article 6, paragraph 1 (a), is compatible with this requirement.

(3) ICJ in the Corfu Channel case held that a State has an obligation “not to allow knowingly its territory to be used for acts contrary to the rights of other States”.<sup>896</sup>

(4) The words “in its territory or otherwise under its jurisdiction or control” are taken from article 2. The expression “any activity within the scope of the present articles” introduces all the requirements specified in article 1 for an activity to fall within the scope of these articles.

(5) Article 6, paragraph 1 (b), makes the requirement of prior authorization applicable also for a major change planned in an activity already within the scope of article 1 where that change may increase the risk or alter the nature or the scope of the risk. Some examples of major changes are: building of additional production capacities, large-scale employment of new technology in an existing activity, re-routing of motorways, express roads or re-routing airport runways. Changing investment and production (volume and type), physical structure or emissions and changes bringing existing activities to levels higher than the allowed threshold could also be considered as part of a major change.<sup>897</sup> Similarly, article 6, paragraph 1 (c), contemplates a situation where a change is proposed in the conduct of an activity that is otherwise innocuous, where the change would transform that activity into one which involves a risk of causing significant transboundary harm. The implementation of such a change would also require State authorization.

(6) Paragraph 2 of article 6 emphasizes that the requirement of authorization should be made applicable to all the pre-existing activities falling within the scope of the present articles, once a State adopts these articles. It might be unreasonable to require States when they assume the obligations under these articles to apply them immediately in respect of existing activities. A suitable period of time might be needed in that case for the operator of the activity to comply with the authorization requirements. The decision as to whether the activity should be stopped pending authorization or should continue while the operator goes through the process of obtaining authorization is left to the State of origin. In case the authorization is denied by the State of origin, it is assumed that the State of origin will stop the activity.

(7) The adjustment envisaged in paragraph 2 generally occurs whenever new legislative and administrative terms are put in place because of safety standards or new international standards or obligations which the State has accepted and needed to enforce.

(8) Paragraph 3 of article 6 notes the consequences of the failure of an operator to comply with the requirement of authorization. The State of origin, which has the main responsibility to monitor these activities, is given the necessary flexibility to ensure that the operator complies with the requirements involved. As appropriate, the State of origin shall terminate the authorization and, where appropriate, prohibit the activity from taking place altogether.

Article 7. Assessment of risk

Any decision in respect of the authorization of an activity within the scope of the present articles shall, in particular, be based on an assessment of the possible transboundary harm caused by that activity, including any environmental impact assessment.

Commentary

(1) Under article 7, a State of origin, before granting authorization to operators to undertake activities referred to in article 1, should ensure that an assessment is undertaken of the risk of the activity causing significant transboundary harm. This assessment enables the State to determine the extent and the nature of the risk involved in an activity and consequently the type of preventive measures it should take.

(2) Although the assessment of risk in the Trail Smelter case may not directly relate to liability for risk, it nevertheless emphasized the importance of an assessment of the consequences of an activity causing significant risk. The tribunal in that case indicated that the study undertaken by well-established and known scientists was “probably the most thorough [one] ever made of any area subject to atmospheric pollution by industrial smoke”.<sup>898</sup>

(3) The requirement of article 7 is fully consonant with principle 17 of the Rio Declaration, which provides also for assessment of risk of activities that are likely to have a significant adverse impact on the environment:

Environmental impact assessment, as a national instrument, shall be undertaken for proposed activities that are likely to have a significant adverse impact on the environment and are subject to a decision of a competent national authority.<sup>899</sup>

The requirement of assessment of adverse effects of activities has been incorporated in various forms in many international agreements.<sup>900</sup> The most notable is the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context.

(4) The practice of requiring an environmental impact assessment has become very prevalent in order to assess whether a particular activity has the potential of causing significant transboundary harm. The legal obligation to conduct an environmental impact assessment under national law was first developed in the United States of America in the 1970s. Later, Canada and Europe adopted the same approach and essentially regulated it by guidelines. In 1985, a European Community directive required member States to conform to a minimum requirement of environmental impact assessment. Since then, many other countries have also made environmental impact assessment a necessary condition under their national law for authorization to be granted for developmental but hazardous industrial activities.<sup>901</sup> According to one United Nations study, the environmental impact assessment has already shown its value for implementing and strengthening sustainable development, as it combines the precautionary principle with the principle of preventing environmental damage and also allows for public participation.<sup>902</sup>

(5) The question of who should conduct the assessment is left to States. Such assessment is normally conducted by operators observing certain guidelines set by the States. These matters would have to be resolved by the States themselves through their domestic laws or as parties to international instruments. However, it is presumed that a State of origin will designate an authority, whether or not governmental, to evaluate the assessment on behalf of the Government and will accept responsibility for the conclusions reached by that authority.

(6) The article does not specify what the content of the risk assessment should be. Obviously, the assessment of risk of an activity can only be meaningfully prepared if it relates the risk to the possible harm to which the risk could lead. This corresponds to the basic duty contained in article 3. Most existing international conventions and legal instruments do not specify the content of assessment. There are exceptions, such as the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, which provides in detail the content of such assessment.<sup>903</sup> The 1981 study of the legal aspects concerning the environment related to offshore mining and drilling within the limits of national jurisdiction, prepared by the Working Group of Experts on Environmental Law of UNEP,<sup>904</sup> also provides, in its conclusion No. 8, in detail the content of assessment for offshore mining and drilling.

(7) The specifics of what ought to be the content of assessment is left to the domestic laws of the State

<sup>903</sup> Article 4 of the Convention provides that the environmental impact assessment of a State party should contain, as a minimum, the information described in appendix II to the Convention. Appendix II (Content of the environmental impact assessment documentation) lists nine items as follows:

“(a) A description of the proposed activity and its purpose;

“(b) A description, where appropriate, of reasonable alternatives (for example, location or technological) to the proposed activity and also the no-action alternative;

“(c) A description of the environment likely to be significantly affected by the proposed activity and its alternatives;

“(d) A description of the potential environmental impact of the proposed activity and its alternatives and an estimation of its significance;

“(e) A description of mitigation measures to keep adverse environmental impact to a minimum;

“(f) An explicit indication of predictive methods and underlying assumptions as well as the relevant environmental data used;

“(g) An identification of gaps in knowledge and uncertainties encountered in compiling the required information;

“(h) Where appropriate, an outline for monitoring and management programmes and any plans for post-project analysis; and conducting such assessment.<sup>905</sup> For the purposes of article 7, however, such an assessment should contain an evaluation of the possible transboundary harmful impact of the activity. In order for the States likely to be affected to evaluate the risk to which they might be exposed, they need to know what possible harmful effects that activity might have on them.

(8) The assessment should include the effects of the activity not only on persons and property, but also on the environment of other States. The importance of the protection of the environment, independently of any harm to individual human beings or property, is clearly recognized.

(9) This article does not oblige the State of origin to require risk assessment for any activity being undertaken within their territory or otherwise under their jurisdiction or control. Activities involving a risk of causing significant transboundary harm have some general characteristics which are identifiable and could provide some indication to States as to which activities might fall within the terms of these articles. For example, the type of the source of energy used in manufacturing, the location of the activity and its proximity to the border area, etc. could all give an indication of whether the activity might fall within the scope of these articles. There are certain substances that are listed in some conventions as dangerous or hazardous and their use in any activity may in itself be an indication that those activities might involve a risk of significant transboundary harm.<sup>906</sup> There are also certain conventions that list the activities that are presumed to be harmful and that might signal that those activities might fall within the scope of these articles.<sup>907</sup>

Article 8. Notification and information

1. If the assessment referred to in article 7 indicates a risk of causing significant transboundary harm, the State of origin shall provide the State likely to be affected with timely notification of the risk and the assessment and shall transmit to it the available technical and all other relevant information on which the assessment is based.

2. The State of origin shall not take any decision on authorization of the activity pending the receipt, within a period not exceeding six months, of the response from the State likely to be affected.

<sup>905</sup> For the format of environmental impact assessment adopted in most legislations, see M. Yeater and L. Kurukulasuriya, loc. cit. (footnote 901 above), p. 260.

<sup>906</sup> For example, the Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution from Land-based Sources provides in article 4 an obligation for the parties to eliminate or restrict the pollution of the environment by certain substances, and the list of those substances is annexed to the Convention. Similarly, the Convention on the Protection of the Marine Environment of the Baltic Sea Area provides a list of hazardous substances in annex I and of noxious substances and materials in annex II, deposits of which are either prohibited or strictly limited; see also the Protocol for the Protection of the Mediterranean Sea against Pollution from Land-based Sources; and the Agreement for the Protection of the Rhine against Chemical Pollution.

Commentary

(1) Article 8 deals with a situation in which the assessment undertaken by a State of origin, in accordance with article 7, indicates that the activity planned does indeed pose a risk of causing significant transboundary harm. This article, together with articles 9, 11, 12 and 13, provides for a set of procedures essential to balancing the interests of all the States concerned by giving them a reasonable opportunity to find a way to undertake the activity with satisfactory and reasonable measures designed to prevent or minimize transboundary harm.

(2) Article 8 calls on the State of origin to notify States likely to be affected by the planned activity. The activities here include both those that are planned by the State itself and those planned by private entities. The requirement of notification is an indispensable part of any system designed to prevent transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof.

(3) The obligation to notify other States of the risk of significant harm to which they are exposed is reflected in the Corfu Channel case, where ICJ characterized the duty to warn as based on "elementary considerations of humanity".<sup>908</sup> This principle is recognized in the context of the use of international watercourses and in that context is embodied in a number of international agreements, decisions of international courts and tribunals, declarations and resolutions adopted by intergovernmental organizations, conferences and meetings, and studies by intergovernmental and international non-governmental organizations.<sup>909</sup>

(4) In addition to the utilization of international watercourses, the principle of notification has also been recognized in respect of other activities with transboundary effects, for example, article 3 of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context<sup>910</sup> and articles 3 and 10 of the Convention on the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents. Principle 19 of the Rio Declaration speaks of timely notification:

States shall provide prior and timely notification and relevant information to potentially affected States on activities that may have a significant adverse transboundary environmental effect and shall consult with those States at an early stage and in good faith.<sup>911</sup>

<sup>909</sup> For treaties dealing with prior notification and exchange of information in respect of watercourses, see paragraph (6) of the commentary to article 12 (Notification concerning planned measures with possible adverse effects), of the draft articles on the law of the non-navigational uses of international watercourses (Yearbook ... 1994, vol. II (Part Two), pp. 119–120).

<sup>910</sup> Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention provides for a system of notification which reads:

"This notification shall contain, inter alia:

"(a) Information on the proposed activity, including any available information on its possible transboundary impact;

"(b) The nature of the possible decision; and

"(c) An indication of a reasonable time within which a response under paragraph 3 of this Article is required, taking into account the nature of the proposed activity;

"and may include the information set out in paragraph 5 of this Article."

(5) The procedure for notification has been established by a number of OECD resolutions. For example, in respect of certain chemical substances, the annex to OECD resolution C(71)73 of 18 May 1971 stipulates that each member State is to receive notification prior to the proposed measures in each other member State regarding substances which have an adverse impact on man or the environment where such measures could have significant effects on the economies and trade of the other States.<sup>912</sup> The annex to OECD Council recommendation C(74)224 of 14 November 1974 on "Some principles concerning transfrontier pollution" in its "Principle of information and consultation" requires notification and consultation prior to undertaking an activity which may create a risk of significant transboundary pollution.<sup>913</sup> The principle of notification is well established in the case of environmental emergencies.<sup>914</sup>

(6) Where assessment reveals the risk of causing significant transboundary harm, in accordance with paragraph 1, the State which plans to undertake such activity has the obligation to notify the States which may be affected. The notification shall be accompanied by available technical information on which the assessment is based. The reference to "available" technical and other relevant information is intended to indicate that the obligation of the State of origin is limited to transmitting the technical and other information which was developed in relation to the activity. This information is generally revealed during the assessment of the activity in accordance with article 7. Paragraph 1 assumes that technical information resulting from the assessment includes not only what might be called raw data, namely fact sheets, statistics, etc., but also the analysis of the information which was used by the State of origin itself to make the determination regarding the risk of transboundary harm. The reference to the available data includes also other data which might become available later after transmitting the data which was initially available to the States likely to be affected.

(7) States are free to decide how they wish to inform the States that are likely to be affected. As a general rule, it is assumed that States will directly contact the other States through diplomatic channels.

(8) Paragraph 1 also addresses the situation where the State of origin, despite all its efforts and diligence, is unable to identify all the States which may be affected prior to authorizing the activity and gains that knowledge only after the activity is undertaken. In accordance with this paragraph, the State of origin, in such cases, is under an obligation to notify the other States likely to be affected as soon as the information comes to its knowledge and it has had an opportunity, within a reasonable time, to determine the States concerned.

(9) Paragraph 2 addresses the need for the States likely to be affected to respond within a period not exceeding six months. It is generally a period of time that should allow these States to evaluate the data involved and arrive at their own conclusion. This is a requirement that is conditioned by cooperation and good faith.

Article 9. Consultations on preventive measures

1. The States concerned shall enter into consultations, at the request of any of them, with a view to achieving acceptable solutions regarding measures to be adopted in order to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof. The States concerned shall agree, at the commencement of such consultations, on a reasonable time frame for the consultations.

2. The States concerned shall seek solutions based on an equitable balance of interests in the light of article 10.

3. If the consultations referred to in paragraph 1 fail to produce an agreed solution, the State of origin shall nevertheless take into account the interests of the State likely to be affected in case it decides to authorize the activity to be pursued, without prejudice to the rights of any State likely to be affected.

Commentary

(1) Article 9 requires the States concerned, that is, the State of origin and the States that are likely to be affected, to enter into consultations in order to agree on the measures to prevent significant transboundary harm, or at any event to minimize the risk thereof. Depending upon the time at which article 9 is invoked, consultations may be prior to authorization and commencement of an activity or during its performance.

(2) There is a need to maintain a balance between two equally important considerations in this article. First, the article deals with activities that are not prohibited by international law and that, normally, are important to the economic development of the State of origin. Secondly, it would be unfair to other States to allow those activities to be conducted without consulting them and taking appropriate preventive measures. Therefore, the article does not provide a mere formality which the State of origin has to go through with no real intention of reaching a solution acceptable to the other States, nor does it provide a right of veto for the States that are likely to be affected. To maintain a balance, the article relies on the manner in which, and purpose for which, the parties enter into consultations. The parties must enter into consultations in good faith and must take into account each other's legitimate interests. The parties should consult each other with a view to arriving at an acceptable solution regarding the measures to be adopted to prevent significant transboundary harm, or at any event to minimize the risk thereof.

(3) The principle of good faith is an integral part of any requirement of consultations and negotiations. The obligation to consult and negotiate genuinely and in good faith was recognized in the Lake Lanoux award where the tribunal stated that:

Consultations and negotiations between the two States must be genuine, must comply with the rules of good faith and must not be mere formalities. The rules of reason and good faith are applicable to procedural rights and duties relative to the sharing of the use of international rivers.<sup>915</sup>

(4) With regard to this particular point about good faith, the judgment of ICJ in the Fisheries Jurisdiction case is also relevant. There the Court stated that “[t]he task [of the parties] will be to conduct their negotiations on the basis that each must in good faith pay reasonable regard to the legal rights of the other”.<sup>916</sup> In the North Sea Continental Shelf cases the Court held that:

(a) [T]he parties are under an obligation to enter into negotiations with a view to arriving at an agreement, and not merely to go through a formal process of negotiation as a sort of prior condition for the automatic application of a certain method of delimitation in the absence of agreement; they are under an obligation so to conduct themselves that the negotiations are meaningful, which will not be the case when either of them insists upon its own position without contemplating any modification of it.<sup>917</sup>

Even though the Court in this judgment speaks of “negotiations”, it is believed that the good-faith requirement in the conduct of the parties during the course of consultation or negotiations is the same.

(5) The purpose of consultations is for the parties to find acceptable solutions regarding measures to be adopted in order to prevent significant transboundary harm, or at any event to minimize the risk thereof. The words “acceptable solutions”, regarding the adoption of preventive measures, refer to those measures that are accepted by the parties within the guidelines specified in paragraph 2. Generally, the consent of the parties on measures of prevention will be expressed by means of some form of agreement.

(6) The parties should obviously aim, first, at selecting those measures which may avoid any risk of causing significant transboundary harm or, if that is not possible, which minimize the risk of such harm. Under the terms of article 4, the parties are required, moreover, to cooperate in the implementation of such measures. This requirement, again, stems from the assumption that the obligation of due diligence, the core base of the provisions intended to prevent significant transboundary harm, or at any event to minimize the risk thereof, is of a continuous nature affecting every stage related to the conduct of the activity.

(7) Article 9 may be invoked whenever there is a question about the need to take preventive measures. Such questions obviously may arise as a result of article 8, because a notification to other States has been made by the State of origin that an activity it intends to undertake may pose a risk of causing significant transboundary harm, or in the course of the exchange of information under article 12 or in the context of article 11 on procedures in the absence of notification.

(8) Article 9 has a broad scope of application. It is to apply to all issues related to preventive measures. For example, when parties notify under article 8 or exchange information under article 12 and there are ambiguities in those communications, a request for consultations may be made simply in order to clarify those ambiguities.

(9) Paragraph 2 provides guidance for States when consulting each other on preventive measures. The parties shall seek solutions based on an equitable balance of interests in the light of article 10. Neither paragraph 2 of this article nor article 10 precludes the parties from taking account of other factors which they perceive as relevant in achieving an equitable balance of interests.

(10) Paragraph 3 deals with the possibility that, despite all efforts by the parties, they cannot reach an agreement on acceptable preventive measures. As explained in paragraph (3) above, the article maintains a balance between the two considerations, one of which is to deny the States likely to be affected a right of veto. In this context, the Lake Lanoux award may be recalled where the tribunal noted that, in certain situations, the party that was likely to be affected might, in violation of good faith, paralyse genuine negotiation efforts.<sup>918</sup> To take account of this possibility, the article provides that the State of origin is permitted to go ahead with the activity, for the absence of such an alternative would, in effect, create a right of veto for the States likely to be affected. The State of origin, while permitted to go ahead with the activity, is still obligated, as measure of self-regulation, to take into account the interests of the States likely to be affected. As a result of consultations, the State of origin is aware of the concerns of the States likely to be affected and is in a better position to seriously take them into account in carrying out the activity. The last part of paragraph 3 preserves the rights of States likely to be affected.

Article 10. Factors involved in an equitable balance of interests

In order to achieve an equitable balance of interests as referred to in paragraph 2 of article 9, the States concerned shall take into account all relevant factors and circumstances, including:

(a) the degree of risk of significant transboundary harm and of the availability of means of preventing such harm, or minimizing the risk thereof or repairing the harm;

(b) the importance of the activity, taking into account its overall advantages of a social, economic and technical character for the State of origin in relation to the potential harm for the State likely to be affected;

(c) the risk of significant harm to the environment and the availability of means of preventing such harm, or minimizing the risk thereof or restoring the environment;

(d) the degree to which the State of origin and, as appropriate, the State likely to be affected are prepared to contribute to the costs of prevention;

(e) the economic viability of the activity in relation to the costs of prevention and to the possibility of carrying out the activity elsewhere or by other means or replacing it with an alternative activity;

(f) the standards of prevention which the State likely to be affected applies to the same or comparable activities and the standards applied in comparable regional or international practice.

Commentary

(1) The purpose of this article is to provide some guidance for States which are engaged in consultations seeking to achieve an equitable balance of interests. In reaching an equitable balance of interests, the facts have to be established and all the relevant factors and circumstances weighed. This article draws its inspiration from article 6 of the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses.

(2) The main clause of the article provides that in order “to achieve an equitable balance of interests as referred to in paragraph 2 of article 9, the States concerned shall take into account all relevant factors and circumstances”. The article proceeds to set forth a non-exhaustive list of such factors and circumstances. The wide diversity of types of activities which is covered by these articles, and the different situations and circumstances in which they will be conducted, make it impossible to compile an exhaustive list of factors relevant to all individual cases. No priority or weight is assigned to the factors and circumstances listed, since some of them may be more important in certain cases while others may deserve to be accorded greater weight in other cases. In general, the factors and circumstances indicated will allow the parties to compare the costs and benefits which may be involved in a particular case.

(3) Subparagraph (a) compares the degree of risk of significant transboundary harm to the availability of means of preventing such harm or minimizing the risk thereof and the possibility of repairing the harm. For example, the degree of risk of harm may be high, but there may be measures that can prevent the harm or reduce that risk, or there may be possibilities for repairing the harm. The comparisons here are both quantitative and qualitative.

(4) Subparagraph (b) compares the importance of the activity in terms of its social, economic and technical advantages for the State of origin and the potential harm to the States likely to be affected. The Commission in this context recalls the decision in the Donauversinkung case where the court stated that:

The interests of the States in question must be weighed in an equitable manner one against another. One must consider not only the absolute injury caused to the neighbouring State, but also the relation of the advantage gained by the one to the injury caused to the other.<sup>919</sup>

McNair and H. Lauterpacht, eds., Annual Digest of Public International Law Cases, 1927 and 1928 (London,

In more recent times, States have negotiated what might be seen as equitable solutions to transboundary disputes; agreements concerning French potassium emissions into the Rhine, pollution of United States–Mexican boundary waters, and North American and European acid rain all display elements of this kind.<sup>920</sup>

(5) Subparagraph (c) compares, in the same fashion as subparagraph (a), the risk of significant harm to the environment and the availability of means of preventing such harm, or minimizing the risk thereof and the possibility of restoring the environment. It is necessary to emphasize the particular importance of protection of the environment. Principle 15 of the Rio Declaration is relevant to this subparagraph. Requiring that the precautionary approach be widely applied to States according to their capabilities, principle 15 states:

Where there are threats of serious or irreversible damage, lack of full scientific certainty shall not be used as a reason for postponing cost-effective measures to prevent environmental degradation.<sup>921</sup>

(6) The precautionary principle was affirmed in the “pan-European” Bergen Ministerial Declaration on Sustainable Development in the ECE Region, adopted in May 1990 by the ECE member States. It stated that: “Environmental measures must anticipate, prevent and attack the causes of environmental degradation. Where there are threats of serious or irreversible damage, lack of full scientific certainty should not be used as a reason for postponing measures to prevent environmental degradation.”<sup>922</sup> The precautionary principle was recommended by the UNEP Governing Council in order to promote the prevention and elimination of marine pollution, which is increasingly becoming a threat to the marine environment and a cause of human suffering.<sup>923</sup> The precautionary principle has also been referred to or incorporated without any explicit reference in various other conventions.<sup>924</sup>

It may be noted that previous treaties apply the precautionary principle in a very general sense without making any explicit reference to it.

(7) According to the Rio Declaration, the precautionary principle constitutes a very general rule of conduct of prudence. It implies the need for States to review their obligations of prevention in a continuous manner to keep abreast of the advances in scientific knowledge.<sup>925</sup> ICJ in its judgment in the Gabčíkovo-Nagymaros Project case invited the parties to “look afresh at the effects on the environment of the operation of the Gabčíkovo power plant”, built on the Danube pursuant to the Treaty on the Construction and Operation of the Gabčíkovo-Nagymaros Barrage System of 1977, in the light of the new requirements of environmental protection.<sup>926</sup>

(8) States should consider suitable means to restore, as far as possible, the situation existing prior to the occurrence of harm. It is considered that this should be highlighted as a factor to be taken into account by States concerned which should adopt environmentally friendly measures.

(9) Subparagraph (d) provides that one of the elements determining the choice of preventive measures is the willingness of the State of origin and States likely to be affected to contribute to the cost of prevention. For example, if the States likely to be affected are prepared to contribute to the expense of preventive measures, it may be reasonable, taking into account other factors, to expect the State of origin to take more costly but more effective preventive measures. This, however, should not underplay the measures the State of origin is obliged to take under these articles.

(10) These considerations are in line with the basic policy of the so-called polluter-pays principle. This principle was initiated first by the Council of OECD in 1972.<sup>927</sup> The polluter-pays principle was given cognizance at the global level when it was adopted as principle 16 of the Rio Declaration. It noted:

<sup>925</sup> On the principle of precaution generally, see H. <sup>926</sup> Gabčíkovo-Nagymaros Project (see footnote 27 above), pp. 77–78, para. 140. However, in this case the Court did not accept Hungary’s claim that it was entitled to terminate the Treaty on the grounds of “ecological state of necessity” arising from risks to the environment that had not been detected at the time of its conclusion. It stated that other means could be used to remedy the vague “peril”; see paragraphs 49 to 58 of the judgment, pp. 39–46.

<sup>927</sup> See OECD Council recommendation C(72)128 on Principles relative to transfrontier pollution (OECD, Guiding Principles concerning International Economic Aspects of Environmental Policies) and OECD environment directive on equal right of access and non-discrimination in relation to transfrontier pollution, mentioned in the “Survey of liability regimes ...” (footnote 846 above), paras. 102–130.

National authorities should endeavour to promote the internalization of environmental costs and the use of economic instruments, taking into account the approach that the polluter should, in principle, bear the cost of pollution, with due regard to the public interest and without distorting international trade and investment.<sup>928</sup>

This is conceived as the most efficient means of allocating the cost of pollution prevention and control measures so as to encourage the rational use of scarce resources. It also encourages internalization of the cost of publicly mandated technical measures in preference to inefficiencies and competitive distortions in governmental subsidies.<sup>929</sup> This principle is specifically referred to in article 174 (ex-article 130r) of the Treaty establishing the European Community as amended by the Treaty of Amsterdam.

(11) The expression “as appropriate” indicates that the State of origin and the States likely to be affected are not put on the same level as regards the contribution to the costs of prevention. States concerned frequently embark on negotiations concerning the distribution of costs for preventive measures. In so doing, they proceed from the basic principle derived from article 3 according to which these costs are to be assumed by the operator or the State of origin. These negotiations mostly occur in cases where there is no agreement on the amount of the preventive measures and where the affected State contributes to the costs of preventive measures in order to ensure a higher degree of protection that it desires over and above what is essential for the State of origin to ensure. This link between the distribution of costs and the amount of preventive measures is in particular reflected in subparagraph (d).

(12) Subparagraph (e) introduces a number of factors that must be compared and taken into account. The economic viability of the activity must be compared to the costs of prevention. The cost of the preventive measures should not be so high as to make the activity economically non-viable. The economic viability of the activity should also be assessed in terms of the possibility of changing the location, or conducting it by other means, or replacing it with an alternative activity. The words “carrying out the activity ... by other means” intend to take into account, for example, a situation in which one type of chemical substance used in the activity, which might be the source of transboundary harm, could be replaced by another chemical substance; or mechanical equipment in the plant or the factory could be replaced by different equipment. The words “replacing [the activity] with an alternative activity” are intended to take account of the possibility that the same or comparable results may be reached by another activity with no risk, or lower risk, of significant transboundary harm.

(13) According to subparagraph (f), States should also take into account the standards of prevention applied to the same or comparable activities in the State likely to be affected, other regions or, if they exist, the international standards of prevention applicable for similar activities. This is particularly relevant when, for example, the States concerned do not have any standard of prevention for such activities, or they wish to improve their existing standards.
