1. If a State has reasonable grounds to believe that an activity planned or carried out in the State of origin may involve a risk of causing significant transboundary harm to it, it may request the State of origin to apply the provision of article 8. The request shall be accompanied by a documented explanation setting forth its grounds.

2. In the event that the State of origin nevertheless finds that it is not under an obligation to provide a notification under article 8, it shall so inform the requesting State within a reasonable time, providing a documented explanation setting forth the reasons for such finding. If this finding does not satisfy that State, at its request, the two States shall promptly enter into consultations in the manner indicated in article 9.

3. During the course of the consultations, the State of origin shall, if so requested by the other State, arrange to introduce appropriate and feasible measures to minimize the risk and, where appropriate, to suspend the activity in question for a reasonable period.

Commentary

(1) Article 11 addresses the situation in which a State, although it has received no notification about an activity in accordance with article 8, becomes aware that an activity is being carried out in the State of origin, either by the State itself or by a private operator, and believes, on reasonable grounds, that the activity carries a risk of causing it significant harm.

(2) The expression “a State” is not intended to exclude the possibility that more than one State could entertain the belief that a planned activity could adversely affect them in a significant way. The words “apply the provision of article 8” should not be taken as suggesting that the State which intends to authorize or has authorized an activity has necessarily failed to comply with its obligations under article 8. In other words, the State of origin may have made an assessment of the potential of the planned activity for causing significant transboundary harm and concluded in good faith that no such effects would result therefrom. Paragraph 1 allows a State to request that the State of origin take a “second look” at its assessment and conclusion, and does not prejudge the question whether the State of origin initially complied with its obligations under article 8.

(3) The State likely to be affected could make such a request, however, only upon satisfaction of two conditions. The first is that the requesting State must have “reasonable grounds to believe” that the activity in question may involve a risk of causing significant transboundary harm. The second is that the requesting State must provide a “documented explanation setting forth its grounds”. These conditions are intended to require that the requesting State have more than a vague and unsubstantiated apprehension. A serious and substantiated belief is necessary, particularly in view of the possibility that the State of origin may be required to suspend implementation of its plans under paragraph 3 of article 11.

(4) The first sentence of paragraph 2 deals with the case in which the planning State concludes, after taking a “second look” as described in paragraph (2) of the present commentary, that it is not under an obligation to provide a notification under article 8. In such a situation, paragraph 2 seeks to maintain a fair balance between the interests of the States concerned by requiring the State of origin to provide the same kind of justification for its finding as was required of the requesting State under paragraph 1. The second sentence of paragraph 2 deals with the case in which the finding of the State of origin does not satisfy the requesting State. It requires that, in such a situation, the State of origin promptly enter into consultations with the other State (or States), at the request of the latter. The consultations are to be conducted in the manner indicated in paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 9. In other words, their purpose is to achieve “acceptable solutions” regarding measures to be adopted in order to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof, and that the solutions to be sought should be “based on an equitable balance of interests”. These phrases are discussed in the commentary to article 9.

(5) Paragraph 3 requires the State of origin to introduce appropriate and feasible measures to minimize the risk and, where appropriate, to suspend the activity in question for a reasonable period, if it is requested to do so by the other State during the course of consultations. States concerned could also agree otherwise.

(6) Similar provisions have been provided for in other legal instruments. Article 18 of the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses, and article 3, paragraph 7, of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context also contemplate a procedure whereby a State likely to be affected by an activity can initiate consultations with the State of origin.

Article 12. Exchange of information

While the activity is being carried out, the States concerned shall exchange in a timely manner all available information concerning that activity relevant to preventing significant transboundary harm or at any event minimizing the risk thereof. Such an exchange of information shall continue until such time as the States concerned consider it appropriate even after the activity is terminated.

Commentary

(1) Article 12 deals with steps to be taken after an activity has been undertaken. The purpose of all these steps is the same as previous articles, viz. to prevent significant transboundary harm or at any event to minimize the risk thereof.

(2) Article 12 requires the State of origin and the States likely to be affected to exchange information regarding the activity after it has been undertaken. The phrase “concerning that activity” after the words “all available information” is intended to emphasize the link between the information and the activity and not any information. The duty of prevention based on the concept of due diligence is not a one-time effort but requires continuous effort. This means that due diligence is not terminated after granting authorization for the activity and undertaking the activity; it continues in respect of monitoring the implementation of the activity as long as the activity continues.

(3) The information that is required to be exchanged, under article 12, is whatever would be useful, in the particular instance, for the purpose of prevention of risk of significant harm. Normally, such information comes to the knowledge of the State of origin. However, when the State that is likely to be affected has any information which might be useful for prevention purposes, it should make it available to the State of origin.

(4) The requirement of exchange of information is fairly common in conventions designed to prevent or reduce environmental and transboundary harm. These conventions provide for various ways of gathering and exchanging information, either between the parties or through providing the information to an international organization which makes it available to other States.<sup>930</sup> In the context of these articles, where the activities are most likely to involve a few States, the exchange of information is effected between the States directly concerned. Where the information might affect a large number of States, relevant information may be exchanged through other avenues, such as, for example, competent international organizations.

(5) Article 12 requires that such information should be exchanged in a timely manner. This means that when the State becomes aware of such information, it should inform the other States quickly so that there will be enough time for the States concerned to consult on appropriate preventive measures or the States likely to be affected will have sufficient time to take proper actions.

<sup>930</sup> For example, article 10 of the Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution from Land-based Sources, article 200 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea and article 4 of the Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer speak of individual or joint research by the States parties on prevention or reduction of pollution and of transmitting to each other directly or through a competent international organization the information so obtained. The Convention on Long-Range Transboundary Air Pollution provides for research and exchange of information regarding the impact of activities undertaken by the States parties. Examples are found in other instruments such as section VI, para. 1 (b) (iii), of the Code of Conduct on Accidental Pollution of Transboundary Inland Waters (see footnote 871 above), article 17 of the Convention on Biological Diversity and article 13 of the Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes.

(6) There is no requirement in the article as to the frequency of exchange of information. The requirement of article 12 comes into operation only when States have any information which is relevant to preventing transboundary harm or at any rate to minimizing the risk thereof.

(7) The second sentence of article 12 is designed to ensure exchange of information under this provision not only while an activity is “carried out”, but even after it ceases to exist, if the activity leaves behind by-products or materials associated with the activity which require monitoring to avoid the risk of significant transboundary harm. An example in this regard is nuclear activity which leaves behind nuclear waste even after the activity is terminated. But it is a recognition of the fact that the consequences of certain activities even after they are terminated continue to pose a significant risk of transboundary harm. Under these circumstances, the obligations of the State of origin do not end with the termination of the activity.

Article 13. Information to the public

States concerned shall, by such means as are appropriate, provide the public likely to be affected by an activity within the scope of the present articles with relevant information relating to that activity, the risk involved and the harm which might result and ascertain their views.

Commentary

(1) Article 13 requires States, whenever possible and by such means as are appropriate, to provide the public likely to be affected, whether their own or that of other States, with information relating to the risk and harm that might result from an activity to ascertain their views thereon. The article therefore requires States (a) to provide information to the public regarding the activity and the risk and the harm it involves; and (b) to ascertain the views of the public. It is, of course, clear that the purpose of providing information to the public is to allow its members to inform themselves and then to ascertain their views. Without that second step, the purpose of the article would be defeated.

(2) The content of the information to be provided to the public includes information about the activity itself as well as the nature and the scope of risk and harm that it entails. Such information is contained in the documents accompanying the notification which is effected in accordance with article 8 or in the assessment which may be carried out by the requesting State under article 11.

(3) This article is inspired by new trends in international law, in general, and environmental law, in particular, of seeking to involve, in the decision-making processes, individuals whose lives, health, property and environment might be affected by providing them with a chance to present their views and be heard by those responsible for making the ultimate decisions.

(4) Principle 10 of the Rio Declaration provides for public involvement in decision-making processes as follows:

Environmental issues are best handled with the participation of all concerned citizens, at the relevant level. At the national level, each individual shall have appropriate access to information concerning the environment that is held by public authorities, including information on hazardous materials and activities in their communities, and the opportunity to participate in decision-making processes. States shall facilitate and encourage public awareness and participation by making information widely available. Effective access to judicial and administrative proceedings, including redress and remedy, shall be provided.<sup>931</sup>

(5) A number of other recent international instruments dealing with environmental issues have required States to provide the public with information and to give it an opportunity to participate in decision-making processes. Section VII, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Code of Conduct on Accidental Pollution of Transboundary Inland Waters is relevant in that context:

1. In order to promote informed decision-making by central, regional or local authorities in proceedings concerning accidental pollution of transboundary inland waters, countries should facilitate participation of the public likely to be affected in hearings and preliminary inquiries and the making of objections in respect of proposed decisions, as well as recourse to and standing in administrative and judicial proceedings.

2. Countries of incident should take all appropriate measures to provide physical and legal persons exposed to a significant risk of accidental pollution of transboundary inland waters with sufficient information to enable them to exercise the rights accorded to them by national law in accordance with the objectives of this Code.<sup>932</sup>

Article 3, paragraph 8, of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context; article 17 of the Convention on the Protection of the Marine Environment of the Baltic Sea Area; article 6 of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change; the Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes (art. 16); the Convention on the Transboundary Effects of Industrial Accidents (art. 9 and annex VIII); article 12 of the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses; the Convention on Access to Information, Public Participation in Decision-making and Access to Justice in Environmental Matters; the European Council directives 90/313/EEC on the freedom of access to information on the environment<sup>933</sup> and 96/82/EC on the control of major-accident hazards involving dangerous substances;<sup>934</sup> and OECD Council recommendation C(74)224 on Principles concerning transfrontier pollution<sup>935</sup> all provide for information to the public.

(6) There are many modalities for participation in decision-making processes. Reviewing data and information on the basis of which decisions will be based and having an opportunity to confirm or challenge the accuracy of the facts, the analysis and the policy considerations either through administrative tribunals, courts, or groups of concerned citizens is one way of participation in decision-making. This form of public involvement enhances the efforts to prevent transboundary and environmental harm.

(7) The obligation contained in article 13 is circumscribed by the phrase “by such means as are appropriate”, which is intended to leave the ways in which such information could be provided to the States, their domestic law requirements and the State policy as to, for example, whether such information should be provided through media, non-governmental organizations, public agencies and local authorities. In the case of the public beyond a State’s borders, information may be provided, as appropriate, through the good offices of the State concerned, if direct communication is not feasible or practical.

(8) Further, the State that might be affected, after receiving notification and information from the State of origin and before responding to the notification shall, by such means as are appropriate, inform those parts of its own public likely to be affected.

(9) “Public” includes individuals, interest groups (non-governmental organizations) and independent experts. General “public”, however, refers to individuals who are not organized into groups or affiliated to specific groups. Public participation could be encouraged by holding public meetings or hearings. The public should be given the opportunity for consultation and their participation should be facilitated by providing them with necessary information on the proposed policy, plan or programme under consideration. It must, however, be understood that requirements of confidentiality may affect the extent of public participation in the assessment process. It is also common that the public is not involved, or only minimally involved, in efforts to determine the scope of a policy, plan or programme. Public participation in the review of a draft document or environmental impact assessment would be useful in obtaining information regarding concerns related to the proposed action, additional alternatives and potential environmental impact.<sup>936</sup>

(10) Apart from the desirability of encouraging public participation in national decision-making on vital issues regarding development and the tolerance levels of harm in order to enhance the legitimacy of and compliance with the decisions taken, it is suggested that, given the development of human rights law, public participation could also be viewed as a growing right under national law as well as international law.<sup>937</sup>

be withheld, but the State of origin shall cooperate in good faith with the State likely to be affected in providing as much information as possible under the circumstances.

Commentary

(1) Article 14 is intended to create a narrow exception to the obligation of States to provide information in accordance with articles 8, 12 and 13. States are not obligated to disclose information that is vital to their national security. This type of clause is not unusual in treaties which require exchange of information. Article 31 of the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses also provides for a similar exception to the requirement of disclosure of information vital to national defence or security.

(2) Article 14 includes industrial secrets and information protected by intellectual property in addition to national security. Although industrial secrets are a part of the intellectual property rights, both terms are used to give sufficient coverage to protected rights. In the context of these articles, it is highly probable that some of the activities which come within the scope of article 1 might involve the use of sophisticated technology involving certain types of information which are protected under the domestic law. Normally, domestic laws of States determine the information that is considered an industrial secret and provide protection for them. This type of safeguard clause is not unusual in legal instruments dealing with exchange of information relating to industrial activities. For example, article 8 of the Convention on the Protection and Use of Transboundary Watercourses and International Lakes and article 2, paragraph 8, of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context provide for similar protection of industrial and commercial secrecy.

(3) Article 14 recognizes the need for balance between the legitimate interests of the State of origin and the States that are likely to be affected. It therefore requires the State of origin that is withholding information on the grounds of security or industrial secrecy to cooperate in good faith with the other States in providing as much information as possible under the circumstances. The words "as much information as possible" include, for example, the general description of the risk and the type and the extent of harm to which a State may be exposed. The words "under the circumstances" refer to the conditions invoked for withholding the information. Article 14 essentially encourages and relies on the good-faith cooperation of the parties.

Article 15. Non-discrimination

Unless the States concerned have agreed otherwise for the protection of the interests of persons, natural or juridical, who may be or are exposed to the risk of significant transboundary harm as a result of an activity within the scope of the present articles, a State shall not discriminate on the basis of nationality or residence or place where the injury might occur, in granting to such persons, in accordance with its legal system, access to judicial or other procedures to seek protection or other appropriate redress.

Commentary

(1) This article sets out the basic principle that the State of origin is to grant access to its judicial and other procedures without discrimination on the basis of nationality, residence or the place where the injury might occur. The content of this article is based on article 32 of the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses.

(2) Article 15 contains two basic elements, namely, non-discrimination on the basis of nationality or residence and non-discrimination on the basis of where the injury might occur. The rule set forth obliges States to ensure that any person, whatever his nationality or place of residence, who might suffer significant transboundary harm as a result of activities referred to in article 1 should, regardless of where the harm might occur, receive the same treatment as that afforded by the State of origin to its nationals in case of possible domestic harm. It is not intended that this obligation should affect the existing practice in some States of requiring that non-residents or aliens post a bond, as a condition of utilizing the court system, to cover court costs or other fees. Such a practice is not "discriminatory" under the article, and is taken into account by the phrase "in accordance with its legal system".

(3) Article 15 also provides that the State of origin may not discriminate on the basis of the place where the damage might occur. In other words, if significant harm may be caused in State A as a result of an activity referred to in article 1 in State B, State B may not bar an action on the grounds that the harm would occur outside its jurisdiction.

(4) This rule is residual, as indicated by the phrase "unless the States concerned have agreed otherwise". Accordingly, States concerned may agree on the best means of providing protection or redress to persons who may suffer a significant harm, for example through a bilateral agreement. States concerned are encouraged under the present articles to agree on a special regime dealing with activities with the risk of significant transboundary harm. In such arrangements, States may also provide for ways and means of protecting the interests of the persons concerned in case of significant transboundary harm. The phrase "for the protection of the interests of persons" has been used to make it clear that the article is not intended to suggest that States can decide by mutual agreement to discriminate in granting access to their judicial or other procedures or a right to compensation. The purpose of the inter-State agreement should always be the protection of the interests of the victims of the harm.

(5) Precedents for the obligation contained in this article may be found in international agreements and in recommendations of international organizations. For example, the Convention on the Protection of the Environment between Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden in its article 3 provides as follows:

Any person who is affected or may be affected by a nuisance caused by environmentally harmful activities in another contracting State shall have the right to bring before the appropriate Court or Administrative Authority of that State the question of the permissibility of such activities, including the question of measures to prevent damage, and to appeal against the decision of the Court or the Administrative Authority to the same extent and on the same terms as a legal entity of the State in which the activities are being carried out.

The provisions of the first paragraph of this article shall be equally applicable in the case of proceedings concerning compensation for damage caused by environmentally harmful activities. The question of compensation shall not be judged by rules which are less favourable to the injured Party than the rules of compensation of the State in which the activities are being carried out.<sup>938</sup>

(6) The OECD Council has adopted recommendation C(77)28(Final) on implementation of a regime of equal right of access and non-discrimination in relation to trans-frontier pollution. Paragraph 4, subparagraph (a), of the annex to that recommendation provides as follows:

Countries of origin should ensure that any person who has suffered transfrontier pollution damage or is exposed to a significant risk of transfrontier pollution shall at least receive equivalent treatment to that afforded in the Country of origin in cases of domestic pollution and in comparable circumstances, to persons of equivalent condition or status ...<sup>939</sup>

Article 16. Emergency preparedness

The State of origin shall develop contingency plans for responding to emergencies, in cooperation, where appropriate, with the State likely to be affected and competent international organizations.

Commentary

(1) This article contains an obligation that calls for anticipatory rather than responsive action. The text of article 16 is based on article 28, paragraph 4, of the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses which reads:

When necessary, watercourse States shall jointly develop contingency plans for responding to emergencies, in cooperation, where appropriate, with other potentially affected States and competent international organizations.

The need for the development of contingency plans for responding to possible emergencies is well recognized.<sup>940</sup>

<sup>938</sup> Similar provisions may be found in article 2, paragraph 6, of the Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context; the Guidelines on responsibility and liability regarding transboundary water pollution, part II.E.8, prepared by the ECE Task Force on responsibility and liability regarding transboundary water pollution (document ENVWA/R.45, annex); and paragraph 6 of the Draft ECE Charter on environmental rights and obligations, prepared at a meeting of experts on environmental law, 25 February to 1 March 1991 (document ENVWA/R.38, annex I).

This is also the main thrust of principle 14 of the Principles of conduct in the field of the environment for the guidance of States in the conservation and harmonious utilization of natural resources shared by two or more States (see footnote 862 above). A discussion of the principle of equal access may be found in S. van Hoogstraten, P.-M. Dupuy and H. Smets, "L'égalité d'accès: pollution transfrontière", Environmental Policy and Law, vol. 2, No. 2 (June 1976), p. 77.

It is suggested that the duty to prevent environmental disasters obligates States to enact safety measures and procedures to minimize the likelihood of major environmental accidents, such as nuclear reactor accidents, toxic chemical spills, oil spills or forest fires. Where necessary, specific safety or contingency measures are open to States to negotiate and agree in matters concerning management of risk of significant transboundary harm, such safety measures could include: (a) adoption of safety standards for the location and operation of industrial and nuclear plants and vehicles; (b) maintenance of equipment and facilities to ensure ongoing compliance with safety measures; (c) monitoring of facilities, vehicles or conditions to detect dangers; and (d) training of workers and monitoring of their performance to ensure compliance with safety standards. Such contingency plans should include establishment of early warning systems.

(2) While States of origin bear the primary responsibility for developing contingency plans, in many cases it will be appropriate to prepare them in cooperation with other States likely to be affected and competent international organizations. For example, the contingency plans may necessitate the involvement of other States likely to be affected, as well as international organizations with competence in the particular field.<sup>941</sup> In addition, the coordination of response efforts might be most effectively handled by a competent international organization of which the States concerned are members.

(3) Development of contingency plans are also better achieved through establishment of common or joint commissions composed of members representing all States concerned. National points of contact would also have to be established to review matters and employ the latest means of communication to suit early warnings.<sup>942</sup> Contingency plans to respond to marine pollution disasters are well known. Article 199 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea requires States to develop such plans. The obligation to develop contingency plans is also found in certain bilateral and multilateral agreements concerned with forest fires, nuclear accidents and other environmental catastrophes.<sup>943</sup> The Convention for the Protection of the Natural Resources and Environment of the South Pacific Region provides in article 15 that the "Parties shall develop and promote individual

Article 17. Notification of an emergency

The State of origin shall, without delay and by the most expeditious means, at its disposal, notify the State likely to be affected of an emergency concerning an activity within the scope of the present articles and provide it with all relevant and available information.

Commentary

(1) This article deals with the obligations of States of origin in responding to an actual emergency situation. The provision is based on article 28, paragraph 2, of the Convention on the Law of the Non-navigational Uses of International Watercourses which reads:

A watercourse State shall, without delay and by the most expeditious means available notify other potentially affected States and competent international organizations of any emergency originating within its territory.

Similar obligations are also contained, for example, in Principle 18 of the Rio Declaration;<sup>944</sup> the Convention on Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident;<sup>945</sup> article 198 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea; article 14, paragraph 1 (d) of the Convention on Biological Diversity; article 5, paragraph 1 (c), of the International Convention on Oil Pollution Preparedness, Response and Cooperation, 1990 and a number of other agreements concerning international watercourses.<sup>946</sup>

(2) According to this article, the seriousness of the harm involved together with the suddenness of the emergency's occurrence justifies the measures required. However, suddenness does not denote that the situation

<sup>945</sup> Article 5 of this Convention provides for detailed data to be notified to the States likely to be affected: “(a) the time, exact location where appropriate, and the nature of the nuclear accident; (b) the facility or activity involved; (c) the assumed or established cause and the foreseeable development of the nuclear accident relevant to the transboundary release of the radioactive materials; (d) the general characteristics of the radioactive release, including, as far as is practicable and appropriate, the nature, probable physical and chemical form and the quantity, composition and effective height of the radioactive release; (e) information on current and forecast meteorological and hydrological conditions, necessary for forecasting the transboundary release of the radioactive materials; (f) the results of environmental monitoring relevant to the transboundary release of the radioactive materials; (g) the off-site protective measures taken or planned; (h) the predicted behaviour over time of the radioactive release.”

needs to be wholly unexpected. Early warning systems established or forecasting of severe weather disturbances could indicate that the emergency is imminent. This may give the States concerned some time to react and take reasonable, feasible and practical measures to avoid or at any event mitigate ill effects of such emergencies. The words “without delay” mean immediately upon learning of the emergency and the phrase “by the most expeditious means, at its disposal” indicates that the most rapid means of communication to which a State may have recourse is to be utilized.

(3) Emergencies could result from natural causes or human conduct. Measures to be taken in this regard are without prejudice to any claims of liability whose examination is outside the scope of the present articles.

Article 18. Relationship to other rules of international law

The present articles are without prejudice to any obligation incurred by States under relevant treaties or rules of customary international law.

Commentary

(1) Article 18 intends to make it clear that the present articles are without prejudice to the existence, operation or effect of any obligation of States under international law relating to an act or omission to which these articles apply. It follows that no inference is to be drawn from the fact that an activity falls within the scope of these articles, as to the existence or non-existence of any other rule of international law as to the activity in question or its actual or potential transboundary effects.

(2) The reference in article 18 to any obligation of States covers both treaty obligations and obligations under customary international law. It is equally intended to extend both to rules having a particular application, whether to a given region or a specified activity, and to rules which are universal or general in scope. This article does not purport to resolve all questions of future conflict of overlap between obligations under treaties and customary international law and obligations under the present articles.

Article 19. Settlement of disputes

1. Any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the present articles shall be settled expeditiously through peaceful means of settlement chosen by mutual agreement of the parties to the dispute, including negotiations, mediation, conciliation, arbitration or judicial settlement.

2. Failing an agreement on the means for the peaceful settlement of the dispute within a period of six months, the parties to the dispute shall, at the request of any of them, have recourse to the establishment of an impartial fact-finding commission.

3. The Fact-finding Commission shall be composed of one member nominated by each party to the dispute and in addition a member not having the nationality of any of the parties to the dispute chosen by the nominated members who shall serve as Chairperson.

4. If more than one State is involved on one side of the dispute and those States do not agree on a common member of the Commission and each of them nominates a member, the other party to the dispute has the right to nominate an equal number of members of the Commission.

5. If the members nominated by the parties to the dispute are unable to agree on a Chairperson within three months of the request for the establishment of the Commission, any party to the dispute may request the Secretary-General of the United Nations to appoint the Chairperson who shall not have the nationality of any of the parties to the dispute. If one of the parties to the dispute fails to nominate a member within three months of the initial request pursuant to paragraph 2, any other party to the dispute may request the Secretary-General of the United Nations to appoint a person who shall not have the nationality of any of the parties to the dispute. The person so appointed shall constitute a single-member Commission.

6. The Commission shall adopt its report by a majority vote, unless it is a single-member Commission, and shall submit that report to the parties to the dispute setting forth its findings and recommendations, which the parties to the dispute shall consider in good faith.

Commentary

(1) Article 19 provides a basic rule for the settlement of disputes arising from the interpretation or application of the regime of prevention set out in the present articles. The rule is residual in nature and applies where the States concerned do not have an applicable agreement for the settlement of such disputes.

(2) It is assumed that the application of this article would come into play only after States concerned have exhausted all the means of persuasion at their disposal through appropriate consultation and negotiations. These could take place as a result of the obligations imposed by the present articles or otherwise in the normal course of inter-State relations.

(3) Failing any agreement through consultation and negotiation, the States concerned are urged to continue to exert efforts to settle their dispute, through other peaceful means of settlement to which they may resort by mutual agreement, including mediation, conciliation, arbitration or judicial settlement. These are means of peaceful settlement of disputes set forth in Article 33 of the Charter of the United Nations, in the second paragraph of the relevant section of the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations<sup>947</sup> and in paragraph 5 of section I of the Manila Declaration on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes,<sup>948</sup> which are open to States as free choices to be mutually agreed upon.<sup>949</sup>

(4) If the States concerned are unable to reach an agreement on any of the means of peaceful settlement of disputes within a period of six months, paragraph 2 of article 19 obliges States, at the request of one of them, to have recourse to the appointment of an impartial fact-finding commission. Paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 of article 19 elaborate the compulsory procedure for the appointment of the fact-finding commission.<sup>950</sup> This compulsory procedure is useful and necessary to help States to resolve their disputes expeditiously on the basis of an objective identification and evaluation of facts. Lack of proper appreciation of the correct and relevant facts is often at the root of differences or disputes among States.

(5) Resort to impartial fact-finding commissions is a well-known method incorporated in a number of bilateral or multilateral treaties, including the Covenant of the League of Nations, the Charter of the United Nations and the constituent instruments of certain specialized agencies and other international organizations within the United Nations system. Its potential to contribute to the settlement of international disputes is recognized by General Assembly resolution 1967 (XVIII) of 16 December 1963 on the "Question of methods of fact-finding" and the Declaration on Fact-Finding by the United Nations in the Field of the Maintenance of International Peace and Security adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 46/59 of 9 December 1991, annex.

(6) By virtue of the mandate to investigate the facts and to clarify the questions in dispute, such commissions usually have the competence to arrange for hearings of the parties, the examination of witnesses or on-site visits.

(7) The report of the Commission usually should identify or clarify "facts". Insofar as they involve no assessment or evaluation, they are generally beyond further contention. States concerned are still free to give such weight as they deem appropriate to these "facts" in arriving at a resolution of the dispute. However, article 19 requires the States concerned to give the report of the fact-finding commission a good-faith consideration at the least.<sup>951</sup>

In international law, attribution fulfils a double function in the theory of responsibility. The first consists of designating a responsible person (legal or natural) who will bear the consequences of this responsibility, even though the person in question may not necessarily be the direct author of the act. The second function lies in the triggering of the application of a particular regime of responsibility: international responsibility of a State or an international organization, where the conduct at issue is attributable to one of these legal persons, or criminal responsibility of the individual where the conduct is attributable to a natural person. The application of the two regimes of responsibility can be simultaneous, as the two cases relating to the Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide<sup>1</sup> at the International Court and the trial of Slobodan Milosevic, former president of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia before the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, show. In this instance there is a parallelism which results in no confusion. The two regimes have their own rules and pursue different objectives. Here, we will only discuss the international responsibility of the State, that is to say the situations in which an internationally wrongful act can be attributed to the State.

(p. 258) A reading of classical authors shows that, for the main part, the general principles of State responsibility for or in relation to the conduct of private individuals have hardly changed. But the theoretical assumptions which underpin these principles have been altered, so that the solutions maintained by the ILC Articles do not bear any resemblance to those proposed by Hugo Grotius.

The essentials of the subject can nevertheless be found in The Rights of War and Peace.<sup>2</sup> In this work Grotius approached the question of attribution from two perspectives. In search of causes for which wars are undertaken Grotius distinguished between two types of acts that give rise to reparation or punishment.<sup>3</sup> The first type related to what would today be called civil responsibility, while the second was more concerned with criminal responsibility. One can be a priori surprised that academic authors refer only to the discussion relating to criminal law contained in Chapter XXI (Of the Communication of Punishments) of Book II and neglect Grotius' reflections on reparation for injuries in Chapter XVII (Of the Damage done By an Injury, and of the Obligation Thence Arising); it seems evident that the latter are more easily transferrable to international law, where the system or responsibility has more the character of civil than criminal responsibility. But on the one hand, Grotius himself wrote that the rules on attribution are fairly similar in the criminal and civil field: 'For generally, by the same Means a Man may be Partaker of another's Crime, as he is made liable to the Reparation of such Damages'.<sup>4</sup> On the other hand, the specific topic of the responsibility of any kind of group for the act of an individual is not dealt with until Chapter XXI, which makes the formulations that can be found there a priori more interesting for an internationalist in search of teachings on the issue of State responsibility for the acts of individuals. In reality, this specificity is only evident through the intermediary of the person of the sovereign, having its own will. It is in Chapter XXI that the key idea can be found, stating that where the act in question does not have any link with the State, it should not be imputed to it as a collectivity:

No civil Society, or other publick Body, is accountable for the Faults of its particular Members, unless it has concurred with them, or has been negligent in attending to its Charge.<sup>5</sup>

Grotius, as always, relies on the practice and on the writings of classic thinkers. He notes in particular that:

And the Rhodians beg of the Senate to distinguish betwixt the Fact of the Publick, and the Fault of particular Men; affirming that there is no State which has not sometimes wicked Subjects and always an ignorant Mob to deal with. So neither is a Father responsible for his Children's Crimes, nor a Master for his Servants, nor any other Superior for the Faults of those under his Care; if there be nothing criminal in his conduct, with respect to the Faults of those, over whom he has Authority.<sup>6</sup>

The principle of irresponsibility is thus nuanced by the theory of active or passive complicity of the State, to which the idea of co-responsibility in Chapter XVII corresponds. Grotius distinguishes complicity/co-responsibility by action where a person contributes by his own act to the act from complicity/co-responsibility by omission where it shows negligence.

Besides the Person that doth the Injury himself, there are others also who may be responsible for it, either by doing what they ought not, or not doing what they ought to have done. By doing what they ought not to have done, Primarily, or Secondarily. Primarily, as he who commands it to be done, he who gives the necessary Consent for doing it, he who assists in the Action, he who protects him that committed it, or becomes in any other manner a Party in doing the Injury. Secondarily, He that advises the doing it, or commends and flatters him who does it.<sup>7</sup>

As for responsibility for negligence, it does not apply under the same conditions for acts that are subject to punishment and acts entailing reparation.

The lack of action in relation to acts subject to punishment automatically engages responsibility in the form of passive complicity. According to Grotius, this negligence can occur in two forms: tolerance (patientia) and the offer of a retreat (receptus) or, in other words, the act of on the one side not having prevented the commission of a delict while having knowledge of the existence of this delict; and on the other hand the act of not having punished or handed over the criminal.<sup>8</sup>

On the other hand, negligence in relation to an act giving rise to reparation only engages responsibility in so far as the omission breaches an obligation of its author:

By not doing what he ought, a Man is likewise bound to make Reparation, primarily, or secondarily. Primarily, when by his Station or Office he ought to hinder the doing it, by giving his Commands to the contrary, or to succour him that has the Wrong done him, and does it not ...

Secondarily, He that doth not dissuade when he ought, or conceals the Fact when he ought to have discovered it. In all which Cases the word ought, has Respect to that Right which is properly so called, and is the Object of expletive Justice whether it arise from the Law or from a certain Quality in the Person.

For if it be due only by the Rules of Charity, the Omission of it is indeed a Fault, but not such an one as obliges one to make reparation; which, as I have already said, arises only from Right properly so called.<sup>9</sup>

In this theory, there is thus no co-responsibility in the sense of shared responsibility for the same act. The co-responsibility which is envisaged here is understood to be two responsibilities for two distinct acts, the first original and the second intervening in relation with the first. We find here the premises of the responsibility by catalysis later described by Roberto Ago.

Grotius' reflections on the question of attribution are, as we can see, rich and complex and the past and current presentations of the law in the area owe much to it. As for the past, the transposition of the Grotian doctrine to the modern framework of international law can be attributed to Emmerich de Vattel, whose work on the topic has enriched the doctrine and jurisprudence of the 19th and early 20th century.

(p. 260) In his masterpiece<sup>10</sup> Vattel follows, on the subject of attribution, a two-fold approach. The first consists in the confirmation of the irresponsibility of the State for the acts of individuals:

However, as it is impossible for the best regulated state, or for the most vigilant and absolute sovereign, to model at his pleasure all the actions of his subjects, and to confine them on every occasion to the most exact obedience, it would be unjust to impute to the nation or the sovereign every fault committed by the citizens. We ought not then to say in general, that we have received an injury from a nation, because we have received it from one of its members.<sup>11</sup>

More than Grotius who adhered above all to the description of the 'practice', Vattel underlines the substantive foundation of the rule: it rests on the requirement of retributive justice linked to a recognition of the free will of the State, in other words a subjective conception of responsibility. This is in fact only possible from the moment that, to paraphrase Dionisio Anzilotti,<sup>12</sup> there exists a relationship between the material fact that is complained of and a determined subject. The transposition to international law naturally happens through the recognition of the State as a legal person, which constitutes the premise for the modern theory of international law, Vattel being the first to formulate it in a coherent manner.<sup>13</sup>

The second step in Vattel's analysis resides in the listing of 'exceptions' to the rule of irresponsibility. Here he takes up again the theory of complicity/co-responsibility put forward by Grotius, nevertheless restricting it to situations where the State has not participated directly in the alleged acts. Responsibility can thus result from the action of the State:

But if a nation or its chief approves and ratifies the act of the individual, it then becomes a public concern and the injured party is to consider the nation as the real author of the injury, of which the citizen was perhaps only the instrument.<sup>14</sup>

Or its omission:

The sovereign who refuses to cause reparation to be made for the damage done by his subject, or to punish the offender, or finally, to deliver him up, renders himself in some measure an accomplice in the injury, and becomes responsible for it.<sup>15</sup>

Beyond their own complexity, these writings immediately allow us to discern the essence of the subject that we are concerned with, which has hardly changed since 1625.

The basic rule appeared clearly in the writings of past and current authors: the State should not be held responsible for acts committed by private persons. Here, we can see that the regime of international responsibility was and remains a regime that is mainly articulated around a subjective conception of responsibility. Responsibility results from the imputation of an act to a subject of the international legal order, in other words a legal (p. 261) person endowed with sovereignty, this being nothing more than the equivalent for the State on the international level of the liberty of the individual on the domestic level.<sup>16</sup> The process of 'objectivization' of this regime by erasing harm and fault under the influence of ILC Special Rapporteur Ago has certainly weakened this subjective character, but has not completely eliminated it.<sup>17</sup> There are two 'exceptions' which are not really exceptions at all, in the sense that they do not really constitute special cases where the responsibility of the State is engaged by the act of individuals in derogation from the general rule, but rather situations where the responsibility of the State is engaged in an autonomous manner, following classical principles of imputation. The first situation is where the responsibility of the State is engaged by acts which are a priori attributable to individuals but which eventually turn out to be attributable to the State, because of the existence of a factual link between these acts and State activity.

The second situation concerns the case where the responsibility of the State is catalysed by the act of a private person: the responsibility of the State is engaged not on the basis of this act, but on the basis of an act of the State by which it violates its own obligations in international law.

1 The rule of non-attribution of the conduct of private persons to the State

First the statement of the rule must be examined, both from a theoretical and legal point of view, before determining its exact scope.

(a) The exposition of the rule

In international law, the State as a person is only responsible for acts which are attributable to it. This autonomy of the State as a person makes it in theory impossible to attribute to the State acts of persons or things that it does not 'watch over'. The rule thus ensues above all from a theoretical requirement: attribution can only occur in relation to an autonomous person and autonomy requires that only acts resulting from an exercise of free will can be attributed to it. Objectified, this condition implies that only acts that can be attached to a State objectively through a legal, functional, or factual link or through an organ can be attributed to that State.

In addition to this theoretical foundation, the rule is based on an important practical consideration: it cannot be required of a State that it is in control of all the events which take place on its territory, short of obliging it to become a totalitarian State. As a result, as the International Court held in Corfu Channel,<sup>18</sup> territorial sovereignty should not be considered as immediately entailing the responsibility of the State for all wrongful acts committed on its territory, or as implying a shift of the burden of proof of this responsibility.<sup>19</sup>

Such a systematic link between territorial sovereignty and responsibility can only result from a regime of objective responsibility 'for risk'. But responsibility on this basis is no longer based on the attribution of a wrongful act to the State. The rules which govern this (p. 262) type of responsibility do not have the character of 'secondary' rules, in other words rules the implementation of which is subordinate to the previous occurrence of a wrongful act, that is to say a breach of a 'primary' obligation. The rule which lays down the principle of objective responsibility is as such a new primary rule which prescribes reparation by the State for all harm caused on the territory, whoever the perpetrator of the harm may be.<sup>20</sup> From then on, there is no 'imputation' to the State of wrongful acts by private persons who are potentially the source of the harm, since responsibility does not require a wrongful act or the imputation of the act to this person for it to be engaged.

Within the ILC, the rule of non-attribution was drawn up by Special Rapporteur Ago in his Fourth Report in 1972.<sup>21</sup> The Special Rapporteur proposed to state it in the first paragraph of the draft article headed 'Conduct of private individuals'. The second paragraph had the purpose of specifying that this rule is without prejudice to the engagement of the responsibility of the State for the breach of its own obligations in relation to the acts of individuals: '[t]he conduct of a private individual or group of individuals, acting in that capacity, is not considered to be an act of the State in international law'.<sup>22</sup> The discussions of draft article 11 took place in 1975.<sup>23</sup> All the members agreed on the relevance of the principle stated in paragraph 1. Several members nevertheless highlighted the not very appropriate character of the term 'individual' and moved the Special Rapporteur and the Drafting Committee to replace it with the word 'person', which covers both legal and physical persons.

More profoundly, Paul Reuter observed during the discussion that draft article 11, as a whole, did not contribute anything to the draft articles in the sense that 'its only purpose was to explain the consequences of what had been stated in preceding articles and what would be stated in subsequent articles'. Therefore, 'if it did not appear in the draft articles, the substance of international law would not be changed'.<sup>24</sup>

Despite this lucid observation, draft article 11 was provisionally maintained in the draft and adopted by the Commission as revised by the Drafting Committee: '[t]he conduct of a person or a group of persons not acting on behalf of the State shall not be considered as an act of the State under international law'.<sup>25</sup> At the presentation of the text, the president of the Drafting Committee explained that 'for the sake of precision, and in order to employ the language already used in [draft] article 8' which dealt with the attribution to the State of the conduct of persons acting in fact on behalf of the State, the Committee preferred 'to replace the phrase "acting in a purely private capacity" by the phrase "not acting on behalf of the State"'.<sup>26</sup>

In this form, draft article 11(1) in fact appeared to be the converse of article 8(a). This explains why, in 1980 Chile proposed in its comments on the draft articles to merge the provisions of draft article 11(1) with draft article 8(a),<sup>27</sup> while in 1998, the United States proposed the simple deletion of draft article 11. This option was preferred by the new Special Rapporteur James Crawford, and subsequently also by the ILC itself. In his report, the Special Rapporteur notes the lack of autonomous content of draft article 11:

(p. 263) On analysis, it says nothing more than that the conduct of private individuals or groups is not attributable to the State unless that conduct is attributable under other provisions of chapter II. This is both circular and potentially misleading.<sup>28</sup>

James Crawford thus proposed the deletion of article 11, while suggesting that the substance of the commentary to the article should be maintained and redeployed elsewhere.

With the deletion of article 11(1), the draft articles have become undoubtedly less educational but more logical, in the sense that the subject of this part of the draft consists of the description of cases of attribution of conduct of private persons to the State. In fact, article 11(1) fulfilled no function because of its negative wording.

(b) The scope of the rule

The rule of non-attribution covers all acts of all private persons who do not act on behalf of the State, including acts of persons who, although they have the status of State agents, when they act do so in their personal capacity.<sup>29</sup> In essence, we can find here the old distinction of French administrative law between personal faults and faults in service (fautes de service).<sup>30</sup>

But the whole difficulty consists in drawing the line between purely private acts and ultra vires acts, or in other words the act committed by a person under the cover of his official function but in excess of his authority or in contradiction to instructions given to him. The stakes are not low: while purely private acts of a State agent should not be attributed to the State, ultra vires acts will always be attributable by virtue of a well-established rule of international law, which is codified in article 7 of the ILC Articles, headed 'Excess of authority or contravention of instructions':

The conduct of an organ of a State or of a person or entity empowered to exercise elements of the governmental authority shall be considered an act of the State under international law if the organ, person or entity acts in that capacity, even if it exceeds its authority or contravenes instructions.<sup>31</sup>

To resolve this problem, international law uses the 'theory of appearance'. Thus in the Commentary by the ILC to the predecessor to article 7 adopted on first reading (then draft article 10) it was stated:

In international law, the State must recognize that it acts whenever persons or groups of persons whom it has instructed to act in its name in a given area of activity appear to be acting effectively in its name.<sup>32</sup>

The 'theory of appearance' apparently fulfils a protective function for the person or the victim State following 'an excusable error, that is to say done in good faith', in relation to an act of a functionary which appeared to be an official act.<sup>33</sup> It should thus not serve as a basis for the institution of a form of objective responsibility 'for risk'. In fact, the theory (p. 264) of appearance does not exclude the wrongful act of the State: it constitutes it through a fiction the purpose of which it is to protect the interests of the person and the State injured by the act having the appearance of an official act.

We now understand the necessity of defining 'the excusable error'—to draw the limit between what can reasonably be considered as an act of the State following appearances, and what is manifestly not State activity. Three awards given by the US/Mexico General Claims Commission deal with this difficulty by distinguishing between a 'simple fraud' and situations where one can speak of an 'excess of power'.<sup>34</sup> Inspired by this jurisprudence and other precedents, Special Rapporteur Ago distinguished the case where 'the individual organ obviously acts in an individual capacity and commits acts which have nothing to do with its place in the State machinery' from that of 'the individual organ' which 'is manifestly acting in the discharge of State functions and not in a purely personal capacity' but whose acts are:

although allegedly committed in the name of the State, are so completely and manifestly outside his competence, or fall within the scope of State functions so visibly different from those of the official in question, that no one could be mistaken on that score.<sup>35</sup>

We can see here a development in international law of a distinction which in French administrative law would correspond to 'degrees' of personal fault, ranging from pure personal fault to personal fault which is not without any link to the service. Ago translated this 'exception' to the rule of attribution of the ultra vires act into the text of his draft article 10(2), which is worded:

However, such conduct is not considered to be an act of the State if, by its very nature, it was wholly foreign to the specific functions of the organ or if, even from other aspects, the organ's lack of competence was manifest.<sup>36</sup>

Unfortunately, this important specification is not taken up in the version of the article adopted by the ILC on first reading, or in the current article 7, even though one can find a trace of it in the Commentary to article 7<sup>37</sup> and even though the words 'if the organ, person or entity acts in that capacity' can potentially be interpreted as excluding the case of manifest incompetence.<sup>38</sup>

The rule of non-attribution being so stated and specified in its scope, it is now necessary to see in what cases an act which is prima facie attributable to an individual can nevertheless engage the responsibility of the State. A first group of situations concerns the case where the act of the private person considered is linked in some way to the State activity.

2 The attribution to the State of conducts of private person linked to the activity of the State

According to the ILC 'attribution of conduct to the State as a subject of international law is based on criteria determined by international law and not on the mere recognition of a link of factual causality'.<sup>39</sup>

(p. 265) Here, Dionisio Anzilotti's imprint can be seen: for him attribution can only be in any legal order 'an effect of the norms that compose it'.<sup>40</sup> Attribution thus constitutes a question of law before being a question of fact: it can only occur in the application of rules and fixed criteria of international law. Furthermore, these rules and criteria are defined in an autonomous manner by international law and take precedence over the rules of domestic law. That being the case, the domestic rules of attribution of competences should not determine the attribution of an act to the State, at least where international law does not designate them as relevant criteria.

As we have seen, the fundamental rule is that the acts that relate to the decision of the State as an autonomous person must be attributed to the State. This power of decision is presumed where the author of the act is an organ of the State, even though this presumption can be rebutted by showing that the organ-individual has acted in its personal capacity (on the other hand, as we have seen above, the fact that the organ acts ultra vires does not suffice). This is the sense of article 4 ARSIWA 'Conduct of organs of a State'. Outside this situation, the power of decision can be established in two different ways: either by showing that the State has made the reproached conduct a priori his own: this is the situation envisaged by ARSIWA, article 11 'Conduct acknowledged and adopted by a State as its own'; or by showing a link between the individual perpetrator of the act and the State (understood as the organ apparatus or as function): this link may be de jure or de facto. The first situation, the de jure link, is illustrated by ARSIWA article 5 'Conduct of persons or entities exercising elements of governmental authority' as far as the person or entity concerned is, according to this article, 'empowered by the law of that State to exercise elements of the governmental authority'. The second situation is illustrated by ARSIWA articles 6 'Conduct of organs placed at the disposal of a State by another State', 8 'Conduct directed or controlled by a State', and 9 'Conduct carried out in the absence or default of the official authorities'.

Of these different situations, only three interest us in this study: on the one hand, the two cases of attribution based on a de facto link where the acts of private persons are taken into account (ARSIWA, articles 8 and 9); and on the other hand the a posteriori endorsement of conduct which is originally not attributable to the State (ARSIWA, article 11).

(a) Control of the State: the de facto organ (ARSIWA, article 8)

The original version of article 8 presented by Ago in 1974, as well as that adopted by the ILC in 1974, included the different concepts of the fonctionnaire de fait (the person who exercises elements of governmental authority in the absence or default of the official authorities) and of the de facto organ. The dissociation only took place at a later stage, under the initiative of James Crawford, and the current text comprises article 8 on de facto organs and article 9 on the fonctionnaire de fait.

It is nevertheless true that these two situations are based on similar logic: in both cases, international law bases the attribution of acts committed by private persons to the State on the existence of certain given facts, as opposed to an attribution based on an institutional or legal link. Ago's first draft takes note of this similarity in approach, but also of the substantial difference which divides the two concepts:

(p. 266) The conduct of a person or group of persons who, under the internal legal order, do not formally possess the character of organs of the State or of a public institution separate from the State, but in fact perform public functions or in fact act on behalf of the State, is also considered to be an act of the State in international law.<sup>41</sup>

In the first situation, it is the nature of the function which makes the act attributable to the State. In the second, it is the existence of a factual link between the private person and the State which allows one to deduce from it that the former acts on behalf of the latter.

The whole complexity of the notion of de facto organ lies in the explication of this notion of action undertaken 'on behalf' of the State, which can be found in the second version of the text, adopted by the Commission in 1974:

The conduct of a person or group of persons shall also be considered as an act of the State under international law if

(a) it is established that such person or group of persons was in fact acting on behalf of that State ...<sup>42</sup>

In the commentary adopted in relation to this article, the ILC explains that it intended to bring together two distinct phenomena: the first concerns cases where 'the organs of the State supplement their own action and that of their subordinates by the action of private persons or groups who act as "auxiliaries" while remaining outside the official structure of the State'.<sup>43</sup> The second regroups the cases where the State entrusts private persons with the execution of 'duties and tasks' which it does not want to carry out directly: in other words, as Paul Reuter explains (with fewer circumlocutions), 'the lower work of the State: spying, provocation, sabotage, etc'.<sup>44</sup>

But the ILC provided only few elements to define the notion of an act completed on behalf of the State. It confined itself to drawing attention to the difficulty of showing proof for the de facto link:

The Commission wishes nevertheless to make it quite clear that, in each specific case in which international responsibility of the State has to be established, it must be genuinely proved that the person or group of persons were actually appointed by organs of the State to discharge a particular function or to carry out a particular duty, that they performed a given task at the instigation of those organs.<sup>45</sup>

It was on exactly this point that the efforts of the new Special Rapporteur James Crawford would focus. In truth, he had more material to work with than Roberto Ago: between 1980 and 1998, several courts, quasi-courts, and tribunals had decided on the issue of imputation relating to a situation of fact.

Thus, in his first report, Crawford cited several 'precedents': the judgment on the merits by the ICJ in Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua,<sup>46</sup> the award of the Iran-US Claims Tribunal in Yeager;<sup>47</sup> the case of Loizidou where the European Court of Human Rights delivered two judgments on the preliminary objections<sup>48</sup> and the (p. 267) merits;<sup>49</sup> and finally the Tadić case which gave rise to two decisions of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in which the issue of the de facto organ is dealt with: a judgment of the Trial Chamber on 7 May 1997 and a judgment of the Appeals Chamber of 15 July 1999 (Tadić II).<sup>50</sup>

To this list we can add the report of the European Commission of Human rights on the case of Stocké v Germany<sup>51</sup> on the collusion between an informer and the German police with view to the arrest of a criminal, the judgments in A v France<sup>52</sup> and MM v The Netherlands<sup>53</sup> concerning phone tapping carried out by private persons upon the instigation and under the direction of the police, the judgments and decisions of the European Court of Human Rights that confirm the Loizidou case<sup>54</sup> as well as the decision of the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention in relation to the 'Handling of communications concerning detention at the Al-Khiam prison (southern Lebanon)' that bases its conclusions on the reasoning of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Tadić II judgment.<sup>55</sup>

Here, 'jurisdictionalization of international law' is at work! And, in light of this jurisprudence, it is easier to understand why some are concerned about the risks of 'fragmentation' which this multiplication of international courts could create for the international legal order.<sup>56</sup> In fact, the solutions devised for the same problem are very diverse and even sometimes contradictory. If we wanted to draw a rough sketch of the debate, we would say that there are the supporters of a strict conception of the de facto organ, based on the notion of 'complete dependence' or, at least, effective control of the State over the person or group of private persons on the one side, and the supporters of a supple conception based on the notion of global control on the other.

The former position was defined by the Court in Nicaragua in 1986 in relation to the link that the United States had with the 'Unilaterally Controlled Latino Assets' ('UCLAs') on the one side, and the contras on the other.<sup>57</sup> As for the former, the Court recognized that their acts were imputable to the United States in so far as they were 'paid by, and acting on the direct instructions of, United States military or intelligence personnel'.<sup>58</sup> But the Court refused on the other hand to recognize the latter as de facto organs, even though they were financed, aided and supported in various ways by the United States: on the one hand, the contras were not a pure creation of the United States and were not, as such, in a state of 'complete dependence' that would permit them to be assimilated with an organ of the State; on the other hand, the United States did not exercise 'effective control' over (p. 268) them in all their military or paramilitary operations. Nothing in fact proved that the United States had specifically 'directed or enforced the perpetration of the acts contrary to human rights and humanitarian law alleged by the applicant State'.<sup>59</sup> In the absence of any effective control, the contras could have committed these acts outside of the control of the United States.<sup>60</sup>

This position was energetically supported by Roberto Ago who had become a judge of the Court, in his separate opinion. For Ago, the position of the Court agreed perfectly with the ILC draft articles on the subject. According to him, it was impossible to attribute prima facie the acts of the contras to the United States:

Only in cases where certain members of those forces happened to have been specifically charged by United States authorities to commit a particular act, or carry out a particular task of some kind on behalf of the United States, would it be possible so to regard them.<sup>61</sup>

In this context, the determination of the quality as de facto organ depends on the fulfilment of two conditions:

- the existence of a de facto link between the State and the person or group of private persons, in the form of, for example, 'United States participation ... in the financing, organizing, training, supplying and equipping of the contras, the selection of its military or paramilitary targets, and the planning of the whole of its operation' <sup>62</sup> ; and
- either a complete dependence of the person or group of private persons on the State; or the exercise by the State of an effective control over those persons or groups, that allows to deduce from it that the acts in question have been ordered or imposed on this person by the State.

The existence of the second condition—which supplements the finding of a simple factual link—is in the end only the symptom or the consequence of a conception of responsibility that is still subjective, in which fault continues to play a role as a generating fact. It is the idea that the act must come from the free will of the State which translates the condition of 'effective control', in other words, it must be wanted by the State-person. In a subjective conception of responsibility, this will is presumed where the author of the act is an organ of the State from a legal point of view or because of the organ structure. On the other hand, where the author is only linked to the State by an objective factual attachment that does not in itself suffice to determine attribution, this will must be demonstrated. This explains why, for Roberto Ago, the attribution of an ultra vires act may be possible in one case (where there is a State organ de jure), and impossible in the other case (where there is a de facto organ):<sup>63</sup> since the ultra vires act is by definition committed without the control of the State, by going beyond or breaching its orders or instructions.

It is to be noted that this strict conception of attribution has been repeated by the Court in its more recent ruling of 26 February 2007 in the case of the Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. However, the Court took a slightly different stand by distinguishing between the hypothesis of the 'de facto organ' and that of a private person acting under the 'effective control' or instructions by the State. The Court considered the former under the heading of article 4 of the ILC Articles and (p. 269) the latter under the heading of article 8. This approach does not convince us, as it mixes two distinct cases of attribution, the one being based on legal or institutional links, and the other on factual links.

Contrary to what was suggested in Crawford's First Report, the Loizidou judgments of the European Court of Human Rights are not on the same level as the Nicaragua judgment.<sup>64</sup> In this case, the Greek Cypriot applicant complained of a breach of her right for the respect for her possessions as guaranteed under Article 1 of the Protocol 1 to the European Convention, following the occupation and persistent control of the Northern part of Cyprus by Turkish armed forces that had prevented several attempts to access her home. The Turkish government alleged that the acts raised by the applicant were not within its competence but in that of the 'Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus' (TRNC), created in 1983 and recognized on an international level only by Turkey.

The Court did not at any time consider the question of classifying the TRNC as a de facto organ of Turkey. It immediately classified it as 'subordinate local administration' which echoes article 4 ARSIWA, rather than article 8:

Bearing in mind the object and purpose of the Convention, the responsibility of a Contracting Party may also arise when as a consequence of military action—whether lawful or unlawful—it exercises effective control of an area outside its national territory. The obligation to secure, in such an area, the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention derives from the fact of such control whether it be exercised directly, through its armed forces, or through a subordinate local administration.<sup>65</sup>

Even though it invokes the notion of 'global control', this is not the point:

It is obvious from the large number of troops engaged in active duties in northern Cyprus

[...] that her army exercises effective overall control over that part of the island. Such control, according to the relevant test and in the circumstances of the case, entails her responsibility for the policies and actions of the 'TRNC' [...]. Those affected by such policies or actions therefore come within the 'jurisdiction' of Turkey for the purposes of Article 1 of the Convention (art. 1). Her obligation to secure to the applicant the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention therefore extends to the northern part of Cyprus.<sup>66</sup>

The use of the notion 'overall control' really aims at determining the factual sway of Turkey outside its national frontiers, on a territory and a population that does not belong to it. Within the context of the Convention, this test fulfils a double function: at the stage of admissibility, it is about knowing whether the persons who are in the Northern part of Cyprus fall within the 'jurisdiction' of Turkey within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention; at the merits stage, the existence of overall control allows one to establish that all acts committed by its organs de jure or de facto on this territory are attributable to Turkey. 'Overall control' thus expresses the extraterritorial dimension of the responsibility of State Parties to the Convention. But it has nothing to do with the definition of a de facto organ.

On this point, the contribution of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia is more useful, even though it may seem unlikely if one relates it to the internal logic and the mandate of the Tribunal. It may be questioned why a court which is responsible for establishing the responsibility of individuals in international criminal law has reflected on (p. 270) the criteria of attribution in the framework of international State responsibility. In fact, the Tribunal has resorted to these criteria as a complement in the interpretation of the notions of humanitarian law, ie the concept of the protected person and the distinction between international and internal armed conflicts. It has thus ruled that after the retreat of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia from the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina on 19 May 1992, the Bosnian conflict could not be classified as international and the Muslim Bosnians subject to the power of the Serbs considered as protected persons under the Geneva Convention IV unless the acts of the Bosnian Serb Army (VRS) were in fact attributable to the FRY, in other words if the VRS was a de facto organ of the FRY.

This means that the two regimes have been mixed up; in doing so the Tribunal ignored the specificity of the question of attribution, the criteria of which are only established for the purpose of establishing international responsibility of a State. The classification of a conflict as internal or international for the purposes of the application of international humanitarian law is a mere question of fact which calls for the evaluation of the degree of intervention of a State in an internal conflict. The forms of intervention can be very different, and, in any case, may have aspects other than 'control' exercised over one of the parties of the internal conflict.<sup>67</sup>

Even though it is possible to contest the opportunity of intrusion of the ICTY into the field of attribution, one cannot as such deny that its reasoning constitutes a useful approach to the question. The jurisprudence is set by the Appeals Chambers in its judgment in Tadić II.<sup>68</sup> In that judgment, the Appeals Chamber overruled the judgment of the Chamber at first instance of 7 May 1997, insofar as it had resorted to the criterion of 'effective control' enunciated in the Nicaragua judgment to determine if the VRS could be considered as de facto organ of the FRY. The appeals chamber considered that this criterion could not be reconciled with either the 'Logic of the Law on Responsibility'<sup>69</sup> nor with 'Judicial and State Practice'.<sup>70</sup> In its place, it substituted a three-pronged criterion according to the type of situation that is encountered: 'specific instructions', approval or endorsement ex post facto for isolated persons or armed bands that are not structured; 'overall control', where we are dealing with a hierarchical group which is well organized, which means that the State has organized, coordinated, or planned the military action of the armed group, and has financed, trained, equipped, or supplied it with operational support; finally, the Chamber envisaged a last situation, drawn from precedents in criminal law: where a person who is not formally part of the administration of the State participates in its activities with all the appearances of the organ of the State.<sup>71</sup>

individuals or non-hierarchical groups. It is questionable what justifies this distinction. One can without doubt explain it with an argument of opportunity—it is more difficult to prove that the act has been committed on behalf of the State within the framework of a nonhierarchical group—and by a logical argument—there is a presumption of intention within the framework of a hierarchical structure. But in the end, the Tribunal remained in the same conceptual area as the International Court: requiring proof of control, whether ‘effective’ (p. 271) control or ‘overall’ control, relates to a subjective conception of State responsibility that does not really have a place any more, as from the moment where it was decided to objectivize responsibility by excluding fault and harm as conditions for responsibility.

From this point of view, the formulation that was chosen in the end by the ILC is a good compromise, in the sense that it is sufficiently vague to allow different interpretations. James Crawford was in favour of a more subjective conception of attribution, in keeping with Roberto Ago. His draft was worded as follows:

The conduct of a person or group of persons shall also be considered as an act of the State under international law if:

- (a) The person or group of persons was in fact acting on the instructions of, or under the direction and control of, that State in carrying out the conduct.<sup>72</sup>

The solution chosen by the ILC in article 8 ARSIWA consisted of replacing the ‘and’ between ‘direction’ and ‘control’ with ‘or’:

The conduct of a person or group of persons shall be considered an act of a State under international law if the person or group of persons is in fact acting on the instructions of, or under the direction or control of, that State in carrying out the conduct.

The criterion of ‘control’ thus becomes an autonomous criterion, alternative in relation to two others.<sup>73</sup>

The ILC also abstained from qualifying the type of control that is required: that being the case, it can thus be understood either as a subjective condition of attribution—‘effective’ or ‘overall’ control—or as an objective condition, a form of factual link, just like an ‘instruction’ given or ‘directives’.

The attempt of the ILC to settle the question of the ultra vires act of the de facto organ is less convincing:

In general a State, in giving lawful instructions to persons who are not its organs, does not assume the risk that the instructions will be carried out in an internationally unlawful way. On the other hand, where persons or groups have committed acts under the effective control of a State, the condition for attribution will still be met even if particular instructions may have been ignored. The conduct will have been committed under the control of the State and it will be attributable to the State in accordance with article 8.<sup>74</sup>

The theory of objective responsibility for a risk here erupts in an inopportune manner to distinguish two cases which are in the end not very different, if it is accepted that attribution is founded on the existence of a factual link between the State and the private person. The only notable difference is in fact temporal: in one case a factual link at a particular point, while in the other, ‘control’ constitutes a continuous factual link.

(b) The use of public power in the absence or default of the State (ARSIWA, article 9)

Unlike the previous hypothesis, the use of public power hardly raises any difficulties. It has always been broadly agreed by the ILC, both in relation to its principle and the conditions of its application. Attribution rests mainly on the finding of the exercise of State functions (p. 272) by a private person in circumstances which make this exercise legitimate. This action is purely spontaneous: the individual acts from his own initiative.

The criterion of State activity which can be found in several places in the draft articles lies in the exercise of prerogatives of public power. The problem of incompetence is covered by the absence or default of the official authorities and by the fact that public functions would, in one way or another, be called for 'though not necessarily the conduct in question'. The ILC states in its Commentary to article 9:

Such cases occur only rarely, such as during revolution, armed conflict or foreign occupation, where the regular authorities dissolve, are disintegrating, have been suppressed or are for the time being inoperative.<sup>75</sup>

In other words, public action is necessary as a principle considering the circumstances, which does not as such make the act of the individual who has intended to substitute himself for the failing public authorities lawful. This nuance was badly conveyed by the expression 'in circumstances which justified the exercise of those elements of authority' which was used in the version of the text adopted on first reading.<sup>76</sup> This is why Crawford proposed to replace 'which justified' with 'call for' to better express the idea that the conduct itself could not be 'justified', that is to say rendered lawful because of the circumstances. In the final version of the text, the ILC adopted an expression which translates the same idea 'in circumstances such as to call for the exercise of those elements of authority'.

In this form, what the successive Special Rapporteurs themselves have assimilated to the theory of the fonctionnaire de fait is not so much grounded on the theory of appearance, but rather on a particular form of the state of necessity—not that which is recognized by the ILC text in article 25 ARSIWA, insofar as the effect of necessity is not, here, to exclude the wrongfulness of the act, but simply to proceed to the attribution to the State of a wrongful act committed under certain conditions. In fact, according to the text, it is not decisive that the private person is apparently competent to exercise public functions. Rather, the attribution results from the conjunction of the absence or insolvency of the authorities and from the necessity for the individual who is confronted with an exceptional situation, to act immediately by using the prerogatives that flow from public power.

Under these conditions, it may be asked whether article 9 includes the classic situation of the act which is adopted by an incompetent authority which nevertheless has, in the eyes of others, the appearance of authority normally vested with the exercised competence, when such an act is adopted under perfectly normal circumstances.<sup>77</sup> Roberto Ago had envisaged this case, but it seems that he lost sight of it afterwards. The same observation can be made concerning the theory of 'gestion d'affaire', where an individual finds himself in the position to make use of public finances and manages them.

Even though the principle was familiar to all national legal traditions, the examples in international law, as they emerge from the ILC reports, are not uniform. The theory of the fonctionnaire de fait seems to have been received first in international humanitarian law, (p. 273) through the idea of the levée en masse, which is expressed in article 2 of the Regulations concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, annexed to Hague Convention II of 1899 and Hague Convention IV of 1907 respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land, and in article 4(A)(6) of the Geneva Convention (III) relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War.<sup>78</sup> These two provisions extend the category of 'belligerent' to the population of a non-occupied territory which, on approach by the enemy, spontaneously takes to the arms to fight invading troops. The acts of this improvised army are attributed to the attacked State.

The second 'precedent' cited by the ILC in its commentary to article 9 is the award given by the Iran-US Claims Tribunal in Yeager. But if the Tribunal had recourse to this hypothesis, then it was by reference to draft article 8 adopted in 1980. The hypothesis of the fonctionnaire de fait is not invoked exclusively, but is coupled with that of the de facto organ, the two paragraphs of draft article 8 thus constituting alternative foundations for the attribution to Iran of the acts of the 'Komitehs' or 'Revolutionary Guards' who had harmed the applicant.<sup>79</sup>

(c) A posteriori endorsement of conduct by a State (ARSIWA, article 11)

The singularity of this last hypothesis was highlighted by Crawford in his first report to the ILC. Roberto Ago had not clearly distinguished it from the cases where a State does not show the diligence required to prevent or punish a wrong attributable to private persons, in accordance with its international obligations. The analysis of the award by the British-Colombian Mixed Commission in the Cotesworth and Powell case of 5 November 1875, presented in Ago's Fourth Report, shows that he skimmed over the question, without reflecting on it as a separate issue. He cites the following thought-provoking passage from the award:

One nation is not responsible to another for the acts of its individual citizens, except when it approves or ratifies them. It then becomes a public concern, and the injured party may consider the nation itself the real author of the injury. And this approval, it is apprehended, need not be in express terms; but may fairly be inferred from a refusal to provide means of reparation when such means are possible; or from its pardon of the offender when such pardon necessarily deprives the injured party of all redress.<sup>80</sup>

The barely modified passages from Droit des gens by Vattel can be recognized (it was cited in the introduction to this chapter). But where Vattel carefully distinguished the two situations of co-responsibility for action and for omission, the award confuses them. What is worse, it makes the latter a modality of the former! The passage only interested Roberto Ago because of this contradiction: he is keen to show that the award goes astray by attributing the act of the individual to the State, while it is responsible only because of its own act, for having been negligent to punish or for having given amnesties to guilty parties. But then, he sidesteps the first hypothesis of attribution which is evoked by Vattel, based on the approval or ratification of the act of the individual by the State. It is this hypothesis that Crawford resurrected and that the ILC integrated in article 11 as finally adopted.

(p. 274) In the case of negligence as in the case of endorsement, the State does not directly participate in the commission of the act: it is committed by a third party entirely. But while responsibility is based in the former case on inaction in breach of international obligations of the State which is faced with the act of the private person, it results in the latter case from this act itself, that the State has made its own by approving it.

The case of United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran<sup>81</sup> perfectly illustrates the passage from one hypothesis to the other. The International Court of Justice carefully distinguished two phases in the attack and occupation of the United States embassy in Tehran. In a first phase, it is evident that the militants who attacked the embassy did not have the status of agents of the State, whether de jure or de facto. Their acts are thus not imputable to Iran.<sup>82</sup> As such, the Court specifies, this does not excuse Iran from its responsibility for its own conduct in relation to its acts, conduct which was incompatible with its international obligations under various provisions of the 1961 and 1963 Vienna Conventions on diplomatic and consular relations: Iran in fact took no measures to protect the premises, staff, and archives of the mission of the United States against the attack of the militants. It also did not do anything to prevent this attack or to stop it from succeeding.

In a second phase, Iran not only did nothing to resolve the situation, but endorsed the acts of 'students' through the ministry of foreign affairs and through the Ayatollah Khomeini himself:

The approval given to these facts by the Ayatollah Khomeini and other organs of the Iranian State, and the decision to perpetuate them, translated continuing occupation of the Embassy and detention of the hostages into acts of that State. The militants, authors of the invasion and jailers of the hostages, had now become agents of the Iranian State for whose acts the State itself was internationally responsible.<sup>83</sup>

In its commentary to article 11, the ILC sought to prevent errors such as that in the Cotesworth and Powell award by affirming the contrast between approval-tolerance and approval-endorsement. The least that one can say is that there is a difference in degree that is not always easy to grasp:

The phrase 'acknowledges and adopts the conduct in question as its own' is intended to distinguish cases of acknowledgement and adoption from cases of mere support or endorsement.... [A]s a general matter, conduct will not be attributable to the State under article 11 where a State merely acknowledges the factual existence of conduct or expresses its verbal approval of it. In international controversies States often take positions which amount to 'approval' or 'endorsement' of conduct in some general sense but do not involve any assumption of responsibility. The language of 'adoption', on the other hand, carries with it the idea that the conduct is acknowledged by the State as, in effect, its own conduct.<sup>84</sup>

But how should adoption and simple approval be distinguished in practice? The commentaries of the ILC lack concrete illustrations in this regard to enlighten the reader. The impression of confusion is even more accentuated by this proposal, the substance of which is taken from old commentaries:

(p. 275) Acknowledgement and adoption of conduct by a State might be express (as for example in the Diplomatic and Consular Staff case), or it might be inferred from the conduct of the State in question.<sup>85</sup>

If oral 'approval' does not suffice, it is difficult to see how simple 'conduct', even an ostensible one, could be so as to manifest the intention of the State to adopt the reproached conduct. Here again there is a lack of examples.

The originality of this case of attribution is due to the fact that it takes place a posteriori, after the commission of the act or during this commission, if it is a continuous act. In the latter case, the question of the temporal scope of the attribution may be raised: does the State assume it from the moment onwards when it makes it its own, or ab initio, in a retroactive fashion? For Crawford, 'If the adoption is unequivocal and unqualified ... there is good reason to give it retroactive effect.'<sup>86</sup> The Special Rapporteur cites in this sense the Lighthouses arbitration where an arbitral tribunal declared Greece responsible for breaching a concession agreement concluded by Crete when it was an autonomous territory of the Ottoman Empire, partly because the breach was 'endorsed by [Greece] as if it had been a regular transaction ... and eventually continued by her, even after the acquisition of territorial sovereignty over the island'.<sup>87</sup>

Another question is the material scope of attribution. This may vary depending on the content of the act by which the State takes position on the act of the individual. The State may in fact intend to assume only a part of this act. This idea is precisely translated in article 11 by the words 'if and to the extent that'.

In all the situations that we have just considered, the act which is prima facie attributable to a private person is in fine imputed to the State, because the deeper study of the situation reveals a link between this act and the State. These situations must thus be carefully distinguished from those where the act that is imputable to the private person only has the function of a catalyst for State responsibility. Responsibility is then the result of an act that pertains to the latter.

3 'Catalysis' of international State responsibility for conducts of private persons

The use of the notion of 'complicity' by a certain number of authors of the 19th century allow the establishment of an additional case of attribution of acts by natural persons to the State. Its rejection by the voluntarist doctrine at the beginning of the 20th century has the effect of excluding this issue from the framework of this chapter: in the future, it is clearly recognized that the act of the individual can at the very most catalyse the responsibility of the State which is engaged on the basis of a distinct foundation.

(a) Rejection of the theory of complicity

The notion of complicity is employed by certain authors of the 19th century to establish State responsibility where it refuses to prosecute or where it grants amnesty to an act that causes harm to a foreigner: this acquiescence or tolerance is interpreted as a form of (p. 276) participation in the act, a contribution which engages State responsibility for this act.<sup>88</sup> From then on, the amount of reparation owed by the State is calculated on the basis of the harm caused by the act itself and on the degree of participation of the State in the commission of the act.

According to Paul Reuter<sup>89</sup> the Anglo-Saxon doctrine has thus come to distinguish two types of responsibility:

- primary (original) responsibility of the State where the act committed emanates from the government or a person acting as its agent; and
- derived (vicarious) responsibility where the act emanates from any other person but the State has not taken the necessary measures to prevent or punish this conduct.

The notion of complicity is fiercely criticized by the voluntarist authors at the beginning of the 20th century in the name of a dualist conception of the legal orders. The international and internal legal orders constitute two separate spheres, with their own subjects. As a result, the individual, subject of internal law, cannot breach international law under which he has no obligations. In the same way, the State should not be co-responsible or accomplice to a breach of internal law of the State by an individual. The duality of these legal orders leads to a watertight nature for the systems of responsibility. But that does not exclude that State responsibility can arise at the commission of a breach of internal law by an individual, as Dionisio Anzilotti explains:

These acts, as done by individuals, are not contrary to international law, since individuals, being foreign to the rules of this law, should not breach its precepts; it is thus in the conduct of the State, that has omitted to prohibit these acts or to take measures necessary to prevent them, that the breach of international law is found: the wrongful act, from the point of view of international law, is, in such a case, the omission of the State and not the positive act of individuals; and the State is thus obliged because of its act, but not in its quality as accomplice of individuals, as has often been said since Grotius.<sup>90</sup>

Special Rapporteur Roberto Ago explained this mode of engaging responsibility with the idea of catalysis. The individual act is foreign to the act of the State. But it constitutes a catalytic element for its responsibility, insofar as, when confronted with such an act, the State breaches its international obligations.<sup>91</sup>

linked to a dualist conception of the legal orders. It simply follows from the classical structure of normativity in international law which is articulated around the obligations, the only subjects of which are States and which are imposed on a more or less large circle of States which are bound by the same norm. Going beyond the dualist explanation seems necessary if one wishes to envisage certain phenomena that Anzilotti maybe could not distinguish clearly in his time.

(p. 277) First, contemporary international law directly imposes obligations on individuals, the breach of which can be the subject of criminal sanctions, this being the cases regardless of the position—official or not—of the author of the breach. So, a system of specific responsibility is associated with these obligations. The duality can thus be found at the level of international law: if the individual cannot be an ‘accomplice’ to a wrongful act of the State, the State can conversely not be the accomplice of an international crime within the meaning of international criminal law. However, this can find a clear exception when the norms that are breached do address both individuals and State at the same level. According to the ICJ, this is the case for the prohibition of genocide: in Application of the Convention on Genocide, the Court accepted the idea—although its conclusion was negative—that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia could be found complicit in the crime of genocide perpetrated by the Republika Sprska—a non-State actor—in Srebrenica.<sup>92</sup>

In the same way, one cannot exclude that the notion of complicity can find a place in international law, if the renewed forms of normativity induced by the institutionalization and centralization of the international society are taken into account. More and more, international organizations in fact tend to formulate norms which equally address private persons and States. If a private person and a State are bound by the same norm of international law, why should they not be capable of being considered as accomplices in its breach? It is still necessary that they are effectively bound by this norm, whether they have both accepted it voluntarily, or whether it is imposed on them in an ‘authoritarian’ manner, a situation which mainly concerns, in the case of States, the norms enacted by the UN Security Council where it acts under the terms of Chapter VII of the Charter.<sup>93</sup>

If these situations resulting from the recent evolution of international law are taken aside, it is certain that the idea of complicity has not adapted in the great majority of norms of public international law, the only subject of which is the State.

(b) Responsibility of the State for its own act

Generally speaking the State thus does not make itself an accomplice to the act of the individual. But it may be that it breaches its own obligations in relation to such an act. The classic foundation for the form of ‘responsibility by catalysis’ can be found in the obligation of due diligence which falls on any State with regard to nationals of foreign States that are on its territory.<sup>94</sup> This general obligation conceals two main obligations: the obligation to prevent attacks on persons and the obligation to punish the perpetrators of such attacks. And these two main obligations come in a variety of contextualized obligations, specified by treaty law (for example the Vienna Conventions on diplomatic and consular relations) or even by the international judge, depending on the case submitted to the court.

In the subject matter of human rights the jurisprudence has transposed the classic doctrine of due diligence to give rise to the general obligation of the State to protect individuals (p. 278) who fall within its jurisdiction against acts committed by private persons and who would be susceptible to being qualified as a breach of their rights, in the sense of the considered treaty (this is thus not in any way a ‘horizontal’ effect of the Convention).<sup>95</sup> Under this logic, the judge recognizes implicit ‘positive obligations’ for the State party for every human right.

So, for example, in Osman v The United Kingdom<sup>96</sup> the European Court of Human Rights had to determine if the responsibility of the United Kingdom was engaged under article 2 of the Convention (the right to life) because of an omission of the police that could not prevent the murder of a private person by another private person. The Court considered on this occasion the extent of the obligation of due diligence that falls on States under article 2:

The Court notes that the first sentence of Article 2 § 1 enjoins the State not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction [...]. It is common ground that the State's obligation in this respect extends beyond its primary duty to secure the right to life by putting in place effective criminal-law provisions to deter the commission of offences against the person backed up by law-enforcement machinery for the prevention, suppression and sanctioning of breaches of such provisions.<sup>97</sup>

Having stated the problem, the Court defined the following standard:

In the opinion of the Court where there is an allegation that the authorities have violated their positive obligation to protect the right to life in the context of their above-mentioned duty to prevent and suppress offences against the person [...] it must be established to its satisfaction that the authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life of an identified individual or individuals from the criminal acts of a third party and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk. [...] For the Court, and having regard to the nature of the right protected by Article 2, a right fundamental in the scheme of the Convention, it is sufficient for an applicant to show that the authorities did not do all that could be reasonably expected of them to avoid a real and immediate risk to life of which they have or ought to have knowledge. This is a question which can only be answered in the light of all the circumstances of any particular case.<sup>98</sup>

In this particular context of the Convention, the State party that has to exercise due diligence—that is to say that to take all measures that can reasonably be expected of it—to prevent and sanction an act of a private person that intervenes in breach of article 2. But in fine, it is not the act of the private person that engages the responsibility of the State party, but rather the fact that the State itself is not in accordance with the required standard and thus with the positive obligation that falls upon it under article 2 of the Convention.<sup>99</sup>

even in the absence of effective control over the Transdnistrian region, Moldova still has a positive obligation under Article 1 of the Convention to take the diplomatic, economic, judicial or other measures that it is in its power to take and are in accordance with international law to secure to the applicants the rights guaranteed by the Convention.<sup>101</sup>

More recently, the ICJ applied the same kind of reasoning on the basis of the obligations to 'prevent' and 'punish' under the Genocide Convention.<sup>102</sup>

Did the rule of responsibility by catalysis have a place in the Articles on State responsibility? At first, the ILC responded positively to this question, under the influence of Special Rapporteur Ago. He considered it necessary to accompany the statement of the rule of non-attribution of acts of natural persons to the State under draft article 11(1) with a 'reservation' or a type of safeguard clause. This was situated in draft article 11(2) and specified that notwithstanding the rule of non-attribution, the State remained responsible 'by their passive attitude towards the action of individuals'.<sup>103</sup> At the same time, Ago observed that it was necessary that 'no attempt whatsoever must be made to define, in this context, the content of the various obligations of protection incumbent upon the State with regard to foreign States, their official representatives or simply their nationals'.<sup>104</sup>

But during the discussions of this article, Ushakov remarked with clear-sightedness that the proposition of the Special Rapporteur contained a contradiction in terms:

In referring to the way in which an organ ought to have acted according to a primary rule of international law—which required it to prevent or punish the conduct of an individual—the Commission was taking a subjective element into consideration and leaving the sphere of 'acts of the State' to enter that of wrongful acts of the State.<sup>105</sup>

Ago rejected Ushakov's criticism but recognized that it was possible to detect in draft article 11 'a shift from the subjective element of attribution to the State, to the objective element of breach of an international obligation'.<sup>106</sup> During the discussion of the revised article by the Drafting Committee, Kearney observed that the paragraph could be deleted and replaced in the text of paragraph 1 with the idea that the rule of nonattribution does not prejudice the previously listed cases of attribution. But Ago stood fast and defended his paragraph with the help of explanations that Kearney judged to be 'not (p. 280) ... entirely satisfactory'.<sup>107</sup> The ILC thus adopted the article as revised by the Committee, with paragraph 2 worded as follows:

2. Paragraph 1 [which stated the rule of non-attribution of acts by private persons to the State] is without prejudice to the attribution to the State of any other conduct which is related to that of the persons or groups of persons referred to in that paragraph and which is to be considered as an act of the State, by virtue of articles 5 to 10.<sup>108</sup>

Ushakov and Kearney were right: with this paragraph 2, Ago derogated from the distinction which he himself had carefully elaborated between primary and secondary obligation—a distinction which both constituted the starting point and in a way the parapet of the new codification attempt that was undertaken under his leadership.

But as we know, some twenty years later, the new Special Rapporteur Crawford decided to offer a radical solution to these problems by purely and simply eliminating draft article 11 from the Articles. Since it is not as such a case of attribution of a wrongful act to the State, the idea of responsibility by catalysis has its place in textbooks of international law rather than in the codification of international law.

The present Chapter concentrates on the elements of an internationally wrongful act, which will be examined comprehensively: first, the role played by the notion of the internationally wrongful act in the theory of international responsibility will be considered (Section 1), before examining the relationship between its constitutive elements (Section 2). Finally, its two constitutive elements— attribution to a State (Section 3) and breach of an international obligation (Section 4)—will be addressed in detail.

1 The internationally wrongful act of a subject of international law: the sole constituent element of international responsibility

It is well known that traditionally international responsibility was considered as resting on three pillars: an internationally wrongful act; damage; and a causal link between the two. On closer examination, that conception in fact consisted of just two pillars, the link between (p. 194) them constituting the lynchpin of the whole structure. However, new developments have completely overturned the traditional approach to international responsibility.

(a) The traditional conception

The traditional conception of international responsibility is evidenced in the Dictionnaire Basdevant, which defines international responsibility as being:

the obligation, under international law, of the State to which an act or an omission contrary to its international obligations is imputable, to make reparation to the State which was the victim, either itself or through the person or property of its nationals.<sup>1</sup>

The obligation to make reparation therefore goes hand in hand with international responsibility. Charles de Visscher expressed this concept very clearly in these terms: 'International responsibility is a fundamental notion reducible to the obligation of a State to make reparation for the consequences for a wrongful act that is imputable to it.'<sup>2</sup>

If it is considered, as is the case today, that there exist some aspects of international responsibility other than the obligation to make reparation, it is advisable to expand the definition of what is included in the notion of responsibility, rather than to characterize those other aspects as the 'legal consequences' of responsibility. Here reference may be made to Decencière-Ferrandière who, well before the innovations introduced by Ago, wrote that 'responsibility may be defined as the entirety of the obligations that arise for a subject as the result of an act, action or omission which is imputable to it'.<sup>3</sup>

The obligation to make reparation (and nowadays the other consequences of an internationally wrongful act) is not the 'consequence' of international responsibility. International responsibility is the obligation to make reparation (and also now the other consequences of an internationally wrongful act identified by the ILC).

(b) The current conception

In contrast to the traditional concept of international responsibility, reference may be made to article 1, which was not modified from the draft provision adopted on first reading.<sup>4</sup> It provides: 'Every internationally wrongful act of a State entails the international responsibility of that State.' As is apparent, no mention is made of either damage nor of the necessary causal link. All but one of the three—or two—pillars have disappeared from the Articles, which obviously casts a very different light on things. Without doubt, there was a desire that responsibility should arise as soon as an international obligation was breached, or in other words, to introduce a certain objective review of legality into the institution of international responsibility. However, the ILC did not take this logic to its natural conclusion—even if Arangio-Ruiz tried—because it did not accept the (very simple) idea that legal injury arises without more as the result of the simple breach of an obligation; that step, if achieved, would have meant that this normative advance did not remain half-achieved, or at least, in the realm of the unsaid.

In reality, the ILC changed its position considerably in respect of the introduction of an objective control of legality into the theory of international responsibility. Although starting with the idea, contained in the first reading draft, that States could be injured in (p. 195) different ways—as the result of material or moral damage or, in certain cases, by the fact of the simple breach of an obligation—under the guidance of the final Special Rapporteur, it abandoned this approach and rather introduced a dichotomy between the notions of the injured State and 'the State other than the injured State'.<sup>5</sup>

Draft article 40 of the 1996 draft, although far from perfect, nevertheless went further than the final text in taking account of what one may refer to as 'legal injury'. Due to its complexity, draft article 40 bears citation in full:

Article 40 Meaning of injured State

- 1. For the purposes of the present Articles, 'injured State' means any State a right of which is infringed by the act of another State, if that act constitutes, in accordance with Part One, an internationally wrongful act of that State.
- 2. In particular, 'injured State' means:
  - (a) if the right infringed by the act of a State arises from a bilateral treaty, the other

State party to the treaty;

(b) if the right infringed by the act of a State arises from a judgement or other binding dispute settlement decision of an international court or tribunal, the other State or States parties to the dispute and entitled to the benefit of that right;

(c) if the right infringed by the act of a State arises from a binding decision of an international organ other than an international court or tribunal, the State or States which, in accordance with the constituent instrument of the international organization concerned, are entitled to the benefit of that right;

(d) if the right infringed by the act of a State arises from a treaty provision for a third State, that third State;

(e) if the right infringed by the act of a State arises from a multilateral treaty or from a rule of customary international law, any other State party to the multilateral treaty or bound by the relevant rule of customary international law, if it is established that:

(i) the right has been created or is established in its favour;

(ii) the infringement of the right by the act of a State necessarily affects the enjoyment of the rights or the performance of the obligations of the other States parties to the multilateral treaty or bound by the rule of customary international law; or

(iii) the right has been created or is established for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

(f) if the right infringed by the act of a State arises from a multilateral treaty, any other State party to the multilateral treaty, if it is established that the right has been expressly stipulated in that treaty for the protection of the collective interests of the States parties thereto.

3. In addition, 'injured State' means, if the internationally wrongful act constitutes an international crime, all other States.

The first paragraph recalled the well-established rule according to which only the violation of a right gives rise to a right to reparation. The second paragraph made explicit that generic formulation, setting out different types of relations between States in the framework of which a breach of a right may occur. It is, however, clear that the enumeration of situations contained in the provision was not truly systematic. There were dealt with in turn rights arising under bilateral treaties, judgments or international arbitral awards, (p. 196) binding decisions of international organs, provisions of treaties in favour of third States, multilateral treaties, rules of customary international law, as well as, finally, the situation where an international crime had been committed. The text mixed a formal analysis based on the types of relations between States capable of giving rise to a breach, with a material analysis which had regard to the content of the norms in question. There is no need to dwell in any detail upon the first four situations envisaged: it is not contested that, in the case of a breach, a State party to a bilateral treaty (paragraph 2(a)), the beneficiary of a judicial decision or an international arbitral award (paragraph 2(b)), the beneficiary of a right conferred by the binding decision of an international organ (paragraph 2(c)), or the beneficiary of a provision in a treaty provision between other states and stipulated in its favour (paragraph 2(d)) may claim reparation as the result of the violation of the right breached. As regards the other situations, relating to rights under a rule of customary international law or a treaty, there were two possibilities: either the case fell into the general category, in which case a State could only invoke the responsibility of the State which was the author of the violation if it could show that it was directly injured, either because the right breached was created or established in its favour (paragraph 2(e)(i)) or because the violation 'affected' either its rights or the obligations deriving from the customary or treaty rule violated (paragraph 2(e)(ii)). Or the case fell within the specific situations in which an actio popularis was to be recognized, although draft article 40 carefully avoided using that term. That situation arose in three hypotheses: first, where the breach infringed a customary or treaty rule protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms (paragraph 2(e)(iii)); second, where the breach infringed an obligation arising under a multilateral treaty providing for the protection of the collective interests of the States parties (paragraph 2(f)); or, finally, where the violation constituted an international crime (paragraph 3). Despite its complexity, the 1996 draft appears to be far more coherent than the approach finally followed in 2001: the 1996 draft proceeded on the basis that a State could be injured if it suffered material or moral damage, but equally that it could be injured solely in its legal interests, for example, when an international crime had been committed which, by definition, infringes the legal interests of all States making up the international community. Draft article 40 thus introduced an innominate concept of legal injury. However, it was necessary to go much further. But, in the final Articles as adopted in 2001, the contrary occurred, as the notion of injured State was considerably narrowed and as a result, for instance, all States are no longer considered injured when a serious violation of obligations arising under peremptory norms of general international law is committed.

In fact, in the final Articles of 2001 the category of 'injured State' has been fragmented and it is therefore necessary to distinguish injured States from 'States other than injured States'. Accordingly, article 42 is devoted to 'Invocation of responsibility by an injured State' while article 48 concerns 'Invocation of responsibility by a State other than an injured State'. It is at the least curious that some States may invoke the responsibility of another State even if they are not injured. If a State is the beneficiary of an obligation which is violated, it is difficult to see why it should not be considered to be an injured State. It is well established— and the ICJ has clearly affirmed—that, in the case of an international obligation towards the international community as a whole, all States have a legal interest in ensuring that there is compliance.<sup>6</sup> In other words, it seems that all States able to invoke international responsibility should be considered to be injured States; if that is not the case, what is the justification (p. 197) for the fact that they may have a cause of action against the author of the internationally wrongful act? The illogical nature of the approach finally adopted by the ILC results clearly from a passage from a work by Alexandros Kolliopoulos, according to whom:

States other than a State affected by the wrongful act can invoke the international responsibility of the author State if the norm violated breaches their legal interests, either due to its importance for the international community or because it constitutes an essential norm for all parties under a multilateral treaty.<sup>7</sup>

There could not be clearer proof that, in reality, 'States other than injured States' are merely States which are injured differently; if their legal interests were not injured they would have no basis upon which they could invoke the responsibility of the responsible State.

Certain commentators see a step forward as the result of this new conception; thus Alain Pellet considers that it is part of:

a 're-conceptualisation' of the very notion of international responsibility, which, by the elimination of injury as a condition for its existence, finds itself 'objectivised', in the sense that, from a purely inter-state approach we have passed to a more 'communitarian' or 'societal' vision: responsibility exists in and of itself, independently of its effects.<sup>8</sup>

However, that progress would have been just as significant, if not even more so, at the symbolic level, if the ILC had considered that every breach of an international obligation constitutes a legal injury for which reparation was to be made by the re-establishment of the legal order which had been violated.

Eventually, the ILC arrived at this result, albeit by a somewhat round-about path. That approach required it, on the one hand, to introduce, in addition to the obligation to make reparation, other obligations deriving from the existence of an internationally wrongful act, and on the other hand, to give rights to States 'other than the injured State', despite the fact that it is difficult to see on what basis they can act, if not on the basis of the declaration contained in article 48, the legal value of which is not at all clear. Undoubtedly, in the Articles, there is an affirmation of the existence of responsibility as soon as there is a wrongful act; however the affirmation takes the limited form of the (perfectly logical) right to request cessation of the wrongful act. What is less logical is that the right to invoke responsibility is not founded on the existence of what could be considered legal injury, recognized as such, and that cessation of the wrongful act is not analysed as constituting reparation for that legal injury.

Would it not have been better to recognize clearly that, in the absence of any legal personification of the international community, as a result of which it is impossible to implement the responsibility of a State which violates a norm owed to that community, all members thereof are injured by the simple breach of such a norm? That would have constituted recognition of a strong form of solidarity, of the fusion of all States in the concept of international community; an affirmation that an attack against the whole is an attack against each party and that each party is accountable to each of the others as regards compliance with the fundamental norms of international law. This is the idea expressed (p. 198) by Alexandros Kolliopoulos, when he analyses the case of breach of an erga omnes norm. In his view:

One might ... consider that the interest of all States in relation to obligations erga omnes consists not only of an interest for the purposes of bringing a claim for the sole benefit of the international community in the case of a breach, but also as associated with a real right based in primary legality: a right to demand that all States respect those obligations.<sup>9</sup>

Far from being oriented towards the simple protection of subjective interests and State sovereignty, to the extent that 'States have a legal interest in seeing such or such international rules respected, responsibility will play the role of a guarantor of the international legal order'.<sup>10</sup> In other words, the recognition of legal injury would have been an even more significant advance towards a communitarian vision than the approach which was eventually adopted: a recognition that States have not only a right to act in the name of the international community, but also that, due to their close participation in the international community, they act in their own capacity, as fundamentally affected in their legal interests by any violation of norms which are fundamental for that community.

The concept of legal injury, if it thus translates the concern of all States for the respect of certain fundamental international legal rules, in fact permits a reunification of the concept of responsibility which at present seems to be separated into disparate elements which it is difficult to regroup together. Under the scheme of the Articles, in some cases, if there is an injured State, responsibility consists of cessation of the breach (and possibly the provision of guarantees of non-repetition) together with the obligation to make reparation. In other cases, if there is no injured State, States other than the injured State may request the cessation of the wrongful act (and possibly guarantees of non-repetition), but nothing else. Finally, in certain cases in which there is an injured State, States other than the injured State may request cessation of the wrongful act (and possibly guarantees of non-repetition), and, perhaps, implementation of the obligation to make reparation to the injured State or the individuals who are the beneficiaries of the obligation. From this description of articles 42 and 48 as finally adopted, it is obvious that the content of international responsibility is not uniform.

The notion of legal injury permits the reunification of the concept of responsibility from two points of view. On the one hand, there would be only one single concept, that of the injured State, which can be injured in different ways, material, moral or legal; on the other, there would be only a single aspect of responsibility (or a single consequence of the internationally wrongful act), the obligation to make reparation.

In the first place, the recognition of legal injury removes the laborious distinction introduced by the ILC between injured States and 'States other than the injured State', which are not even 'States having a legal interest'. If one considers, as seems obvious, that all breaches of international law create a legal injury suffered by those to whom the obligation breached is owed (whether a single State, a group of States or the international community as a whole), then responsibility can always be invoked by an injured State. Using the notion of legal injury, there would never be a situation in which there would be both (p. 199) an injured State as well as 'States other than the injured State'. There would always be one (or more) injured State(s) which have suffered legal injury—whether alone, or accompanied by material or moral injury. There would thus always be one (or more) State(s) which could demand by way of reparation (whether in their own name, or that of a group of States or of the international community as a whole) the re-establishment of the legal order which has been violated, whether or not accompanied by a claim for reparation in relation to material or moral injury.

In the second place, using the concept of legal injury allows the consequences of the internationally wrongful act to be characterized as one obligation—the obligation to make reparation. To the extent that all wrongful acts which cause material or moral damage also imply the existence of a legal injury inherent in the violation of the right, it is logical that responsibility entails reparation of not only the material or moral damage, but also equally of the legal injury. In this regard, it may be argued that cessation of the internationally wrongful act (article 30) has been unduly isolated as being a consequence different from the obligation to make reparation, although it can be seen as simply the obligation of restitution of the legal order violated, that is, reparation for the legal injury. Further, as concerns assurances and guarantees of non-repetition (likewise contained in article 30),<sup>11</sup> if it is necessary at all costs to integrate such measures into the concept of the obligation to make reparation, such measures may be regarded as contributing to the goal of reestablishment of the legal order violated, although for the future rather than for the past. It is also worth recalling that this is consistent (in part) with the view taken by the ILC in the 1996 draft, where assurances and guarantees of non-repetition were included as part of the full reparation to which the injured State was entitled under draft article 42.

Responsibility would accordingly no longer be a series of disparate obligations, as is presently the case; rather those obligations could in sum be defined simply as the obligation to make reparation for the injury suffered by an injured State. This is so whether the injury suffered was solely legal (the situation envisaged by article 48), in which case the obligation to make reparation merges with the right to require the restoration of the legal order, or if the injury suffered was material or moral, necessarily accompanied by a legal injury, in which case, logically, at the same time there is both a right to claim the restoration of the legal order (article 30) and a right of reparation for the material and/or moral injury suffered (article 31). Accordingly, reparation would have inevitably included an obligation to re-establish the legal order, as reparation for the legal injury, in all instances.

On the analysis presented here, where there is a wrongful act which causes material or moral damage there exists an obligation to make reparation for the legal injury (cessation of the wrongful act, article 30) and an obligation to make reparation for the material or moral damage (article 31) to which the different modalities would apply: restitution (article 35), compensation (article 36), or satisfaction (article 37).

When there is a wrongful act which has caused only legal injury, the obligation to make reparations translates into restitutio (article 48(2)(a)), ie cessation of the wrongful act, if the wrongful act persists, or in reparation in kind, ie an explicit declaration of the wrongful character, where the internationally wrongful act has terminated. That latter (p. 200) consequence is, of course, always implicit where reparation for material or moral injury resulting from an internationally wrongful act is required.

What the ILC calls an 'injured State', that is to say a State which is individually or specially affected, suffers both legal injury and material and/or moral injury, and could therefore ask for full reparation, in conformity with articles 30 and 31. Such reparation would include restitution of the violation of the legal order as reflected in cessation of the wrongful act as well as assurances and guarantees of non-repetition, which form part of the same logic aimed at ensuring international legality and restitution, compensation or satisfaction for the material or moral damage caused.

What the ILC calls a 'State other than an injured State' suffers solely a legal injury, which permits it to demand precisely what the Articles grant it the right to invoke under article 48, although on an unknown legal basis, namely the re-establishment of the legal order by cessation of the wrongful act and possibly the provision of assurances and guarantees of non-repetition.

In reality, it appears that the distinction between injured States and 'others' was adopted by the ILC in order to avoid the unforeseeable and potentially damaging consequences of the decision to integrate countermeasures into the theory of international responsibility. It may be noted in passing that this decision is equally open to criticism, given that the attempt to subject countermeasures to a dispute settlement procedure in the draft adopted on first reading,<sup>12</sup> abandoned in the Articles as finally adopted, was the only acceptable justification for the indirect legitimation of countermeasures. Moreover, that problem could have been avoided either by entirely eliminating countermeasures from the theory of international responsibility altogether (which would have been by far the most preferable solution), or by indicating that countermeasures are not available to States which suffer only legal injury as the result of an internationally wrongful act.

2 The constituent elements of an internationally wrongful act committed by a subject of international law

Given that it is an institution of the international legal system, international responsibility may only be invoked by and against a subject of international law. Only subjects of international law are subjected to the international legal order and therefore only they are capable of invoking a breach of its norms<sup>13</sup> or of violating them.<sup>14</sup> Article 2, which sets out the 'Elements of an internationally wrongful act of a State', explains the conditions under which a State incurs responsibility:

There is an internationally wrongful act of a State when conduct consisting of an action or omission:

- (a) is attributable to the State under international law; and
- (b) constitutes a breach of an international obligation of the State.

(p. 201) (a) The necessary conjunction of two elements

Article 2 sets out the legal conditions necessary for it to be established that a State has committed an internationally wrongful act. Those conditions are two: behaviour which is attributable to the State (to which Chapter II of Part One, comprising articles 4 to 11, is devoted); and the breach of an international obligation by a State as the result of such behaviour (to which Chapter III, comprising articles 12 to 15, is devoted). In other words, on the one hand, there must be conduct which is attributable to a State, and on the other hand, that conduct must be wrongful. These two conditions are naturally determined by the international legal order, and by the international legal order alone.

When reference is made to international responsibility, most often what is being referred to is the responsibility of States, as the first and primary subjects of international law. However international organizations, as derivative subjects of international law, may also incur responsibility,<sup>15</sup> just as they can invoke the responsibility of other subjects of international law.<sup>16</sup> Article 57 expressly reserves the question of the responsibility of international organizations, and the ILC has recently adopted on first reading draft Articles on the Responsibility of International Organizations.<sup>17</sup>

The necessity for these two elements of international responsibility has been frequently recalled by the Permanent Court of International Justice and the International Court of Justice. In the Phosphates in Morocco case, the PCIJ indicated that international responsibility arose from an 'act being attributable to a State and described as contrary to the treaty right of another State'.<sup>18</sup> Even if the restriction to violations of treaties is clearly no longer an accurate reflection of the law, the assertion that the two elements of attribution and international wrongfulness are required to give rise to international responsibility is still valid.

(b) The order of the two elements

In the Tehran Hostages case, the International Court indicated the necessity of the presence of these two elements, making it clear that there were two necessary steps in the process of determining the existence of international responsibility:

First it must determine how far, legally, the acts in question, may be regarded as imputable to the Iranian State. Second, it must determine the compatibility or incompatibility with the obligations of Iran under treaties in force or any other rules of international law that may be applicable.<sup>19</sup>

It may be noted that, although there is a reference to all international norms, and not only treaty obligations, there is no change in relation to the basic elements from which international responsibility arises. This sequence is logical since an act on its own cannot be assessed against the rules of public international law; it is first necessary to ensure that an act is attributable to the State before examining whether that act is in conformity with what is required from that State under international law.

(p. 202) Certain authors consider, however, that the two elements contained in article 2 are 'paradoxically inverted'. Pierre-Marie Dupuy considers that it is possible to determine first whether international law has been breached and, only thereafter, examine the question of whether this breach is attributable to a subject of international law. The example he gives is that it is possible to objectively determine an infringement of international law, committed, for example, by armed groups committing acts in violation of international humanitarian law, without it being possible thereafter to attribute those acts to a subject of international law which is capable of incurring international responsibility.<sup>20</sup> In this regard, it is to be noted that the ICJ in Bosnian Genocide followed this order; that approach is to be welcomed, insofar as it constitutes a means of recording for history all the atrocities committed during the ethnic cleansing in Bosnia, even if those atrocities were thereafter held either not to constitute genocide, or not attributable to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY).

The two elements have sometimes been characterized as objective (the breach of an obligation) and subjective (attribution); however, this terminology is not really pertinent (for example, there are subjective elements in the breach of the law prohibiting genocide) and it was for good reason that it was not retained by the ILC.

The ascertainment of the existence of an internationally wrongful act of a State therefore requires two cumulative steps: '[a]s a normative operation, attribution must be clearly distinguished from the characterization of conduct as internationally wrongful.'<sup>21</sup> This is implied in article 2. The implications of these two normative operations will be examined in the following sections.

3 The question of attribution

Traditionally, the term 'imputation' was more often used than 'attribution'. The ILC justified its substitution of the term 'attribution' as follows: 'the term "attribution" avoids any suggestion that the legal process of connecting conduct to the State is a fiction, or that the conduct in question is "really" that of someone else'.<sup>22</sup> It is necessary to be conscious, however, of the fact that even when using the term 'attribution', the legal fiction does not become any less necessary, given that the process of attribution consists of attributing the acts of a physical person to the State, a legal person.

Attribution deals with a classic problem, that of imputing acts which are necessarily committed by physical persons to the legal person constituted by the State. In this area, the ILC has only codified well-established customary rules which are hardly in dispute, or at least so it appears from the debates. States, as abstract entities, do not act directly. States cannot act other than through the intermediary of physical persons—whether acting in isolation or in a group—who have a certain relationship with the State. The PCIJ had already recognized this obvious fact at the beginning of the last century: ‘States can act only by and through their agents and representatives’.<sup>23</sup> Even if the idea of representatives is interpreted broadly, a sovereign State will only be considered responsible for acts which are sufficiently linked to it, to its sovereignty, such that it must account for their (p. 203) consequences. The extent of the attributability of certain acts to a State therefore traces the limits of its sovereignty.

(a) Organs of the State and persons or entities exercising elements of governmental authority

It is, according to the ICJ, a ‘well-established rule, one of the cornerstones of the law of State responsibility, that the conduct of any State organ is to be considered an act of the State under international law’.<sup>24</sup>

No problems are posed by the attribution to the State of the acts of its agents and organs (article 4) —whether they exercise constitutional, executive, legislative or judicial power, or are agents and organs of territorial units or subdivisions;<sup>25</sup> or are public or private entities exercising elements of governmental authority (article 5).<sup>26</sup>

Article 5, entitled ‘Conduct of persons or entities exercising elements of governmental authority’, states that:

The conduct of a person or entity which is not an organ of the State under Article 4 but which is empowered by the law of that State to exercise elements of the governmental authority shall be considered an act of the State under international law, provided the person or entity is acting in that capacity in the particular instance.

To the extent that ‘what is regarded as governmental depends on the particular society, its history and traditions’,<sup>27</sup> article 5 does not provide a precise definition of its field of application. The decisive test here is whether the organ exercises elements of governmental authority.

As foreseen by article 7, these rules of attribution apply even if these entities act ultra vires, so long as they act in that capacity;<sup>28</sup> the only acts excluded are purely private acts, having no connection with official functions, committed by an agent or civil servant of the State, or a person or entity exercising governmental authority.

A single exception to this rule exists in time of war, a situation which is itself exceptional. In such a situation, the responsibility of the State is reinforced and all the wrongful acts of the military, whatever they may be, engage its responsibility.<sup>29</sup> Although the point is not mentioned in the Articles, it can be considered that this rule applies as lex specialis, the application of which is permitted by article 55.

Similarly, because of a strong link with the structure of the State, the acts of persons or entities who de facto exercise elements of governmental authority;<sup>30</sup> or the acts of (p. 204) victorious revolutionaries who have installed themselves in power<sup>31</sup> likewise does not pose any difficulty.

Special mention should also be made in relation to the attribution to a State of acts of an organ placed at its disposal by another State.<sup>32</sup> The ICJ referred to the rules in this regard in Bosnian Genocide; although it concluded that the ‘Scorpions’, a paramilitary group which had strong links with the Ministry of Defence of the FRY, could not be considered an organ of the FRY, whether de jure or de facto, the Court noted that 'in any event the act of an organ placed by a State at the disposal of another public authority shall not be considered an act of that State if the organ was acting on behalf of the public authority at whose disposal it had been placed'.<sup>33</sup>

The rule of attribution of the acts of organs follows from the principle of the unity of a State under international law and is simply the expression of a well-established principle of customary international law, as recalled by the ICJ in its advisory opinion on Difference Relating to Immunity from Legal Process of a Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights: 'According to a well-established rule of international law, the conduct of any organ of a State must be regarded as an act of that State. This rule ... is of a customary character.'<sup>34</sup> The Court also affirmed the customary character of the principle in its 2005 decision in Armed Activities on the Territory of the Congo,<sup>35</sup> and applying it to the facts of the case concluded that the Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces, part of the army of Uganda, was a State organ and accordingly its conduct was attributable to the State.<sup>36</sup>

The question whether a person or entity is an organ of the State depends in principle on its characterization as such by the structure of the municipal law of the State; however, international law permits one to consider that any institution which fulfils one of the traditional functions of the State, even if such functions have been privatized, should be considered as an organ of the State from the point of view of international law and for the purposes of the law of responsibility. The idea is that, once again, 'international law does not permit a State to escape its international responsibilities by a mere process of internal subdivision'.<sup>37</sup> Thus the mere fact that a State confers management of its prisons or control of immigration in its airports, or even certain police functions, to private entities, does not mean that the State can absolve itself from all international responsibility when those entities commit acts contrary to the State's international obligations.

In LaGrand, the ICJ recognized the general principle of attribution of the acts of its organs to a State, whether the organs are those of its central government or territorial entities of a unitary State, or even the constituent entities making up a federal State:

Whereas the international responsibility of a State is engaged by the action of the competent organs and authorities acting in that State, whatever they may be; whereas the United States should take all measures at its disposal to ensure that Walter LaGrand is not executed pending the final decision in these proceedings; whereas, according to the information available to the Court, implementation of the measures indicated in the present Order falls within the jurisdiction of the Governor of Arizona; (p. 205) whereas the Government of the United States is consequently under the obligation to transmit the present Order to the said Governor; whereas the Governor of Arizona is under the obligation to act in conformity with the international undertakings of the United States.<sup>38</sup>

In Bosnian Genocide, the ICJ also discussed the possible participation of organs of the FRY in the genocide; as is well-known, only the acts committed in Srebrenica in July 1995 were found to constitute genocide. Thus, the question of attribution of those acts was raised. The Court explained the steps of its reasoning as follows:

This question has in fact two aspects, which the Court must consider separately. First, it should be ascertained whether the acts committed at Srebrenica were perpetrated by organs of the Respondent, i.e., by persons or entities whose conduct is necessarily attributable to it, because they are in fact the instruments of its action. Next, if the preceding question is answered in the negative, it should be ascertained whether the acts in question were committed by persons who, while not organs of the Respondent, did nevertheless act on the instructions of, or under the direction or control of, the Respondent.<sup>39</sup>

After examining all the elements, the ICJ considered that none of Republica Srpska itself, the officers of the VRS (the army of the Republica Srpska), nor the paramilitary groups such as the 'Scorpions' could be considered to constitute organs de jure of the FRY.

However, the ICJ did not stop its reasoning there, given the pleadings of the Parties, which it summarized in the following manner:

The argument of the Applicant however goes beyond mere contemplation of the status, under the Respondent's internal law, of the persons who committed the acts of genocide; it argues that Republika Srpska and the VRS, as well as the paramilitary militias known as the 'Scorpions', the 'Red Berets', the 'Tigers' and the 'White Eagles' must be deemed, notwithstanding their apparent status, to have been 'de facto organs' of the FRY, in particular at the time in question, so that all of their acts, and specifically the massacres at Srebrenica, must be considered attributable to the FRY, just as if they had been organs of that State under its internal law; reality must prevail over appearances. The Respondent rejects this contention, and maintains that these were not de facto organs of the FRY.

The ICJ, therefore examined first the theoretical question of '... whether it is possible in principle to attribute to a State conduct of persons or groups of persons who, while they do not have the legal status of State organs, in fact act under such strict control by the State that they must be treated as its organs for purposes of the necessary attribution leading to the State's responsibility for an internationally wrongful act'.<sup>40</sup> The answer was positive. According to the Court, persons, groups of persons or entities not forming part of the structure of the State may exceptionally be assimilated to de facto organs, such that their acts are attributable to the State; such assimilation is possible where they 'act in "complete dependence" on the State, of which they are ultimately merely the instrument', although such assimilation is exceptional. The Court observed:

... persons, groups of persons or entities may, for purposes of international responsibility, be equated with State organs even if that status does not follow from internal law, provided that in (p. 206) fact the persons, groups or entities act in 'complete dependence' on the State, of which they are ultimately merely the instrument. In such a case, it is appropriate to look beyond legal status alone, in order to grasp the reality of the relationship between the person taking action, and the State to which he is so closely attached as to appear to be nothing more than its agent: any other solution would allow States to escape their international responsibility by choosing to act through persons or entities whose supposed independence would be purely fictitious.

However, so to equate persons or entities with State organs when they do not have that status under internal law must be exceptional, for it requires proof of a particularly great degree of State control over them, a relationship which the Court's judgment quoted above expressly described as 'complete dependence'.<sup>41</sup>

The ICJ seems thus to have created a new category of organs de facto, under article 4, defined as persons or entities acting in 'complete dependence' upon the State. However, that category is somewhat difficult to distinguish from the persons and entities on which the State exercises effective control under article 8, and therefore appears to constitute a redundant category. Applying that test to the facts of the case, the Court did not consider that any of the involved entities could be considered to constitute de facto organs.

(b) Persons and entities acting on behalf of the State

However, the State may also be considered responsible for the actions of certain private persons or groups formally outside the structure of the State and who are not authorized to exercise elements of governmental authority, if in one way or another such persons or groups can be considered as acting on its behalf. Different hypothetical situations can be considered in which these private individuals are to be considered as acting for the State. The acts of persons or groups of persons may be attributable to the State, if, by explicitly or implicitly adopting or acknowledging those acts, the State makes them its own by approving the actions of certain persons or groups after the event.<sup>42</sup> Further, if the State entirely controls these persons or groups of people and can therefore be considered as having authorized their acts before the event, whether these persons or groups have acted 'on the instructions of, or under the direction or control of, that State', as stated in article 8, their acts will be attributable.<sup>43</sup> As the Commentary explains, '[i]n the text of Article 8, the three terms instructions, direction and control are disjunctive; it is sufficient to establish any one of them'.<sup>44</sup>

The test of control has given rise to debates in the jurisprudence. The question of control was at the heart of important cases: Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua<sup>45</sup> before the ICJ and the case of Tadić before the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY).<sup>46</sup> The position taken by the ICJ in Bosnian Genocide of course followed the position previously taken by the ICJ.

The decision of the ICJ in Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua illustrates perfectly the difficulties raised by the determination of the extent of control (p. 207) justifying the attribution of responsibility. If the acts of the UCLA (Unilaterally Controlled Latino Assets), isolated individuals receiving their instructions and remuneration from the United States, were attributed without difficulty, the same did not apply to the acts of the contras despite their very strong reliance on the support of the United States: '[t]he Court holds it established that the United States authorities largely financed, trained, equipped, armed and organized' the contras.<sup>47</sup> Nevertheless, their acts were held not to be attributable to the United States; according to the Court, in order for the acts of private persons to be attributed to a State, there has to be on the one hand, general control by the State over the group and on the other hand a precise order or injunction to commit the acts in question. This has come to be known as the 'effective control' test:

The Court has taken the view ... that United States participation, even if preponderant or decisive, in the financing, organizing, training, supplying and equipping of the contras, the selection of its military or paramilitary targets, and the planning of the whole of its operation, is still insufficient in itself, on the basis of the evidence in the possession of the Court, for the purpose of attributing to the United States the acts committed by the contras in the course of their military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. All the forms of United States participation mentioned above, and even the general control by the respondent State over a force with a high degree of dependency on it, would not in themselves mean, without further evidence, that the United States directed or enforced the perpetration of the acts contrary to human rights and humanitarian law alleged by the applicant State. Such acts could well be committed by members of the contras without the control of the United States. For this conduct to give rise to legal responsibility of the United States, it would in principle have to be proved that that State had effective control of the military or paramilitary operations in the course of which the alleged violations were committed.

The use of such strict criteria gave rise to intense debates in the Tadić case before the ICTY, both before the Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber.<sup>48</sup> To demonstrate that the army of the Republika Srpska was not controlled by the Yugoslavian army, or rather the FRY, the majority judges in the Trial Chamber (with the President giving a dissenting opinion) rigorously applied the test set out by the ICJ in Military and Paramilitary Activities and considered that the forces of the Bosnian-Serbs were not in a situation of dependence on Belgrade, such that all their acts could be imputed to the FRY. The Appeals Chamber reversed this decision, concluding that the Bosnian-Serb army should be considered as controlled by the Yugoslavian army and therefore by the FRY. The Appeals Chamber criticized the decision of the ICJ in Military and Paramilitary Activities, considering that this position was not consonant with the logic of State responsibility: 'A first ground on which the Nicaragua test as such may be held unconvincing is based on the very logic of the entire system of international law on State responsibility'.<sup>49</sup> That logic renders the State responsible for everything that it controls in fact or in law; if, in relation to isolated individuals or informal groups of individuals, it may be necessary to establish control for each of the acts of the entity which is de facto controlled, the situation is different as regards the control of a hierarchically organized military or para-military group. According to the Appeals Chamber, overall control suffices without it being necessary to prove that specific (p. 208) orders have been given in relation to each action (here the acts of violence by the Bosnian-Serb army committed in the Prijedor region) undertaken by the group. According to the Appeals Chamber:

In order to attribute the acts of a military or paramilitary group to a State, it must be proved that the State wields overall control over the group, not only by equipping and financing the group, but also by coordinating or helping in the general planning of its military activity. Only then can the State be held internationally accountable for any misconduct of the group. However, it is not necessary that, in addition, the State should also issue, either to the head or to members of the group, instructions for the commission of specific acts contrary to international law.<sup>50</sup>

Applying that test to the facts of the case, the Appeals Chamber concluded that the army of the Republika Srpska was to be considered as being controlled by the FRY.

In Bosnian Genocide the question was again squarely before the Court and it explicitly preferred the formulation previously adopted in Military and Paramilitary Activities.<sup>51</sup> The Court, indeed, strongly criticized the approach of the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY in Tadić, qualified as 'the doctrine laid down in the Tadić case', while it reiterated its 'settled jurisprudence', concerning the effective control test.<sup>52</sup>

A final point which may be addressed quickly—although it is not mentioned in the ILC's text—is that of the consequences for international responsibility of the control exercised by a State over a company through a shareholding. That question is hardly controversial: it is accepted that the distinct personality of the company creates a corporate veil, which excludes acts of the company from being attributed to the State. This is true for companies having activities jure gestionis, but does not apply to entities which are engaged in activities jure imperii for the purposes of which they exercise elements of governmental authority, in which case their acts can be attributed to the State, not by virtue of article 8, but by virtue of article 5.

Finally, it is hardly controversial—even if, again, it is not mentioned in the ILC's text, because it derives from primary rules—that the State has to account for the consequences of acts of private persons where it is obliged to prevent or punish those acts. But here the question is less one of attributing to the State the acts of private individuals but rather of making the State responsible for its own breach of an obligation of 'due diligence', the classic example being the obligation to protect foreign embassies. In a sense, it could be said that when the obligation of due diligence is violated, there is an attribution to the State not of the acts but of the consequences of the acts of the private persons.

(c) Attributable acts: actions and omissions

Conduct of whatever character may be attributable to the State, if it falls within one or other of the rules of attribution sketched above, and examined in more detail in the other contributions in this Part. Put more precisely, conduct may consist of either acts or omissions, depending upon whether the State violates an obligation prohibiting particular conduct, or requiring the adoption of particular measures. Acts of omission play a particular role, to the extent that such acts are always in play when a State is made responsible as the (p. 209) result of the acts of private individuals due to the fact that it has failed to comply with its obligations of due diligence, ie its obligations to prevent or punish certain acts which damage the person or property of foreign nationals. But where there is an omission to act in violation of an obligation of due diligence, it is not a question of attribution of the act of a private party, but rather a failure of the State itself to comply with its primary obligations. This aspect is clearly highlighted by Jean Combacau who observed that:

In relation to what appears on the face of it to be an 'activity' of an individual, international law only has regard to the 'passivity' of the State. What the State is responsible for is therefore not the act of another, which by definition may not to be attributed to it, but its own act, in the form of an omission. Here, responsibility enforces the obligation of diligence which international law imposes on the State.<sup>53</sup>

4 The breach of an international obligation

There is an internationally wrongful act when behaviour attributable to a State or other subject of international law constitutes a failure to comply with an international obligation of that State or that subject of international law. Any breach has to be analysed in terms of the primary rule violated, although consideration of the primary rules which may give rise to international responsibility was explicitly excluded from the work of the ILC on State responsibility. The Articles set out only the secondary rules which define the contours of the concept of breach of an international obligation.

(a) The abandonment of the idea of fault

According to article 12, '[t]here is a breach of an international obligation by a State when an act of that State is not in conformity with what is required of it by that obligation'. According to the Commentary:

The essence of an internationally wrongful act lies in the non-conformity of the State's actual conduct with the conduct it ought to have adopted in order to comply with a particular international obligation.<sup>54</sup>

We are dealing here with an objective idea of non-conformity: whatever may have been the subjective intention of the perpetrator of the internationally wrongful act is irrelevant. In other words, the idea of fault is not a necessary element in the commission of an internationally wrongful act in international law.

The abandonment of the notion of fault in the law of international responsibility is not recent; it occurred under the influence of the positivist voluntarist doctrine, of which one of the best known theoreticians was Anzilotti, according to whom:

the notion of a wrongful act implies the existence of two elements: an act, that is to say, a material fact, external and identifiable, and the rule of law with which it finds itself in contradiction ... An internationally wrongful act is an act contrary to positive international law.<sup>55</sup>

(p. 210) It is therefore clear that it is the objective contradiction between the action of a State and its international obligations which gives rise to its international responsibility, independently of any concept of fault or wrongful intention. Sovereign States are in fact sovereign legal persons and accordingly the notion of fault (culpa) does not seem appropriate to qualify their acts. The ILC Articles make no reference to intention or fault, preferring an objective approach, eliminating any subjective analysis in terms of whether or not a violation is intentional.

Despite this approach, it cannot be ignored that international law does not completely eliminate an analysis of the intentions of a State as being relevant to the determination of a breach of international law in all domains. First, it may be noted that intention may sometimes be a constituent element of a breach of international law. Thus, massive and systematic attacks against a civilian population only constitute genocide if they are accompanied by the intention to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial, or religious group, as such. Similarly, some unilateral economic sanctions that are lawful in themselves, may become unlawful if the intention of the State which adopts them is to override the sovereign will of another State and to intervene in its domestic affairs.<sup>56</sup> Likewise, any fault or negligence by the State victim of a wrongful act may be taken into consideration in the determination of the quantum of the reparation which the responsible State must make.<sup>57</sup>

(b) The existence of a breach of an international obligation

In the classic international law of State responsibility, the breach of international law was a necessary condition for international responsibility, even if it was not in and of itself sufficient. The decision in Dickson Car Wheel Company, rendered in 1931 by the United States-Mexico Claims Commission may be cited:

Under international law, apart from any convention, in order that a State may incur responsibility it is necessary that an unlawful international act be imputed to it, that is, that there exists a violation of a duty imposed by an international juridical standard.<sup>58</sup>

Although articles 2 and 12 speak of a breach of an international obligation and not a breach of a rule or norm of international law, the test of international responsibility is whether the act is contrary to international law. This is what article 3, entitled 'Characterization of an act of a State as internationally wrongful', makes clear:

The characterization of an act of a State as internationally wrongful is governed by international law. Such characterization is not affected by the characterization of the same act as lawful by internal law.

This article recalls that there is a distinction between the international legal order and the various domestic legal orders. An act may be contrary to a rule of international law even if it is perfectly consistent with the domestic law of the State to which it is attributable, or even if it is required by that domestic law. The corollary of this affirmation is of course (p. 211) that a State may never invoke its domestic law to override its international obligations, whether primary or secondary (as is emphasized by article 32). Conversely, an act may be in conformity with international law, even if it is in breach of the domestic legal order.

These two aspects of the same principle—the disjunction between the international and domestic legal orders—have been affirmed frequently in international jurisprudence. That an act in conformity with domestic law can be a breach of international law was affirmed by the PCIJ in the Advisory Opinion in Treatment of Polish Nationals:

a State cannot adduce as against another State its own Constitution with a view to evading obligations incumbent on it under international law or treaties in force ... The application of the Danzig Constitution may ... result in the violation of an international obligation incumbent on Danzig towards Poland, whether under treaty stipulations or under general international law ... However, in cases of such a nature, it is not the Constitution and other laws, as such, but the international obligation that gives rise to the responsibility of the Free City.<sup>59</sup>

That an act which breaches domestic law may be perfectly consistent with international law was stated by the ICJ in the ELSI case:

Yet it must be borne in mind that the fact that an act of a public authority may have been unlawful in municipal law does not necessarily mean that that act was unlawful in international law, as a breach of treaty or otherwise.<sup>60</sup>

In order to determine whether the behaviour of a State is contrary to its international obligations, it is necessary to look to the content of the primary rule. As the Commentary indicates:

in the final analysis, whether and when there has been a breach of an obligation depends on the precise terms of the obligation, its interpretation and application, taking into account its object and purpose and the facts of the case.<sup>61</sup>

Finally, if the wrongful character of an act may arise from an act which is objectively contrary to an international obligation, it can also result from the abusive exercise of a right which is recognized by international law.<sup>62</sup>

International responsibility can arise whatever the international obligation breached, that is to say, whatever the origin, character, or content of the international obligation. The unitary character of international responsibility is thus clearly affirmed.

International responsibility may arise from all breaches of an obligation, regardless of the origin of the obligation.<sup>63</sup> As the Commentary states: '[t]he formula 'regardless of its origin' refers to all possible sources of international obligations'.<sup>64</sup> Article 12 takes a clear position as regards 'formal sources' of international obligations; as the Commentary notes, alluding to the never-ending debate between international lawyers on the distinction between the 'formal sources' and the 'material sources' of international law, the term (p. 212) 'origin' rather than 'source' is used to avoid 'the doubts and doctrinal debates the term source has provoked'.<sup>65</sup>

This generally accepted principle was expressed in particularly clear terms in the arbitral decision in the case of the Rainbow Warrior, where the Arbitral Tribunal declared that 'any violation by a State of any obligation, of whatever origin, gives rise to State responsibility, and consequently entails the duty to make reparation'.<sup>66</sup> It matters little whether the obligation breached has its origin in customary or treaty law. In other words, there is no differentiation in international law between the responsibility which arises from a failure to execute a treaty or an international agreement and the responsibility which results from the breach of customary rules of international law. Equally, it matters little whether the obligation results from another source, such as a general principle of law recognized by civilized nations, a unilateral act through which a State assumes an obligation, a binding decision of an international organization, an international judicial decision, or an award in an international arbitration.

Further, there is no differentiation resulting from the nature of the norm breached.<sup>67</sup> Certainly, the introduction of the notion of an 'international crime' in the first reading draft, and in particular draft article 19 (which was abandoned in favour of the wording 'serious violation of essential obligations towards the international community' in the 2000 draft and then 'serious breaches of obligations under peremptory norms of general international law' in the Articles finally adopted in 2001), might have been taken to indicate that there exists a distinction between 'civil' and 'criminal' responsibility, even if it has often been reaffirmed by States during the course of the debates in the ILC that the notion of a crime does not imply the introduction of criminal responsibility. However, this—it seems—was the initial idea of Roberto Ago, in whose view:

Up to the present ... in international law responsibility meant, essentially, civil responsibility. But it should now be decided whether internationally wrongful acts as a whole did not include a category of acts, the nature and consequences of which could be different—acts for which, in particular, it was unthinkable that reparation could be made by mere indemnification. That applied, for example, to some international crimes such as the violation of certain obligations essential to the maintenance of peace—in particular, aggression or genocide.<sup>68</sup>

For him, the mere obligation to make reparation was insufficient for the most serious attacks on the values of international society:

the obligation to make reparation ... envisages restoring the situation that would have existed if the wrong had not been committed. It thus involves a simple function of reintegration or compensation ... Punishment has a totally different nature ... To the contrary, its nature is afflictive or repressive.<sup>69</sup>

In his work in the ILC, from the outset, Ago seems to have proceeded with the concept of a criminal responsibility of States in the background. But when his proposal for draft article 19 was discussed and adopted in 1996 (unanimously, it should be recalled), the focus was only on a 'aggravated' responsibility for crimes—compared to that arising in relation to other international wrongs—without qualifying it as criminal. The difference (p. 213) was that in the case of a crime, it was the international community as a whole which was concerned, and thus there could be envisaged either a collective reaction to the crime or a reaction from all States (including the adoption of countermeasures), in addition to the obligation to make reparation which arises in the case of all internationally wrongful acts. The idea of a criminal, or even simply a 'different' responsibility was, however, little by little abandoned in the face of the reticence of States in relation to the possibility of being subjected to an international sanction—individual or collective—for crimes. As early as 1996, in the context of the debates as to the consequences of crimes, the additional measures envisaged did not involve a responsibility different in nature from the responsibility for any other internationally wrongful act, but rather a responsibility of the same nature, but very slightly aggravated. This called into question considerably the utility of the proposed distinction.

In the face of the opposition of a number of States, the final Special Rapporteur proposed in the draft of August 2000 to delete the notion of international crimes and to speak rather of 'grave violations of essential obligations towards the international community'. But the August 2000 draft was hardly more satisfying from the point of view of the consequences to be drawn from these grave violations of essential obligations towards the international community as a whole. Besides the vague obligations under former draft article 53, what the ILC had envisaged in the case of a grave breach of obligations owed to the international community was the idea of payment of 'compensation corresponding to the gravity of the breach', that is to say, punitive damages, an approach which appeared both inappropriate and derisory; after so many years, the only consequence of an international crime was that the responsible State would have to provide an 'indemnity'. The inappropriateness of the solution retained resulted in a new formulation: international crimes became 'serious breaches of obligations under peremptory norms of general international law', in other words, what had been an international crime became a breach of jus cogens. But the so-called 'particular consequences' foreseen in article 41 in its final version are not in fact particular. The idea of punitive damages has, fortunately, not been kept in the final text and the only explicit supplementary consequences are that 'States should cooperate to put an end to grave breaches' of norms of jus cogens and should not recognize the situation that arises from these breaches. Both the idea of an additional criminal responsibility of States and the idea of a 'aggravated' responsibility for certain violations were therefore abandoned in the course of the ILC's work.

No one would deny that there are more and less serious breaches of international law. It is indisputable that there are acts which are more or less damaging to the values of the international society. As has been suggested elsewhere:

No one would dispute that not all wrongful acts are of the same seriousness. Who would not feel that there is little in common (apart from the formal legal characterisation still used today as a matter of positive law) between on the one hand, a minor [or even major] violation of a commercial treaty and on the other, a genocide?<sup>70</sup>

But sovereign States, too wary of the idea that they could face 'punishment', although accepting in the first instance the distinction between crimes and 'delicts'<sup>71</sup> and in the final version the concept of 'serious breaches of obligations under peremptory norms of general (p. 214) international law', would not accept the drawing of any decisive consequences from those distinctions.

The interest of the distinction between different categories of breaches introduced by the ILC appears in effect extremely limited when seen in the light of the differentiation of the consequences which result for the responsibility incurred. However, some differentiation— new and not based on existing customary international law—was already present in the August 2000 text, as already indicated, in the forms which reparation could take: a serious breach of essential obligations owed to the international community as a whole could entail an obligation to pay punitive damages corresponding to the seriousness of the breach, even though in principle the compensation payable is a function of the gravity of the injury. This proposition, with its distinctly punitive flavour, was, however, abandoned in the Articles as finally adopted. The absence of development of a criminal responsibility for States was explicitly confirmed by the decision of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia:

Under present international law it is clear that States, by definition, cannot be the subject of criminal sanctions akin to those provided for in national criminal systems.<sup>72</sup>

Finally, there is no differentiation even deriving from the content of the norm breached, whether relating to the type of norm or its subject matter. For example, there is no difference from the point of view of international responsibility whether the State is bound by an obligation of means ('obligation de moyens') or an obligation of result ('obligation de résultat'): this distinction might be only relevant in determining the moment when international responsibility, and thus the obligation to make reparation, arises. Moreover, obligations may concern whatever subject matter, and a breach may result from whatever type of act. In this regard, the Commentary states that:

the breach by the State of an international obligation constitutes an internationally wrongful act, whatever the subject matter or content of the obligation breached, and whatever description may be given to the non-conforming conduct.<sup>73</sup>

The example given in support of this position is that of an obligation in the domain of economic relations which may be violated not only by the adoption of specific contrary economic measures, but also by the use of force.<sup>74</sup>

(c) The extension in time of a breach of an international obligation

Numerous questions are posed by the temporal character of a wrongful act, including both problems relating to the duration of an international obligation and problems relating to the time of commission of an internationally wrongful act. Those issues are dealt with in articles 13 to 15.

On the problem of the application of inter-temporal law, the well-established customary principles can be recalled, which all derive from the basic principle set out by Arbitrator Huber in the Island of Palmas case: 'A juridical fact must be appreciated in the light (p. 215) of the law contemporary with it and not of the law in force at the time when a dispute in regard to it arises or falls to be settled.'<sup>75</sup>

It is evident first of all that for conduct of a State to be considered wrongful, it must be in conflict with an international obligation in force. This means that behaviour cannot violate an international obligation either before it has entered into force, or after it has expired. In this regard, article 13 affirms that: '[a]n act of a State does not constitute a breach of an international obligation unless the State is bound by the obligation in question at the time the act occurs'. This is a simple affirmation of common sense.

The fact that the Genocide Convention would not have entered into force at the time it was allegedly violated was invoked by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) before the International Court of Justice in Bosnian Genocide, in order to argue that Bosnia-Herzegovina could not invoke its responsibility. According to the FRY, the Court could not base its jurisdiction on article IX of the Genocide Convention, which, under the rules of State succession to treaties, as they were interpreted by the FRY, had not been in force for Bosnia-Herzegovina at the relevant time. At the preliminary objections stage, the Court rejected that argument, considering that the Genocide Convention had been in force.<sup>76</sup>

However, in 2004, the Court dismissed the separate claims filed in 1999 by Serbia and Montenegro against eight NATO member States (Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, Portugal, and the United Kingdom) on the basis that the applicant State 'was not a Member of the United Nations, and in that capacity a State party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice, at the time of filing its Application to institute present proceedings before the Court on 29 April 1999'.<sup>77</sup> The key factor in the Court's decision was that the Former Republic of Yugoslavia (as it then was) had formally applied anew for membership of the UN, thus clarifying that it had not succeeded to the SFRY's UN membership.<sup>78</sup>

In 2007, in dealing with the merits of the dispute in Bosnian Genocide, the Court concluded that its 1996 Judgment constituted res judicata both in relation to the contention that the respondent was not a State with capacity to appear before the Court under the terms of its Statute and the question whether the respondent was, at the time of institution of proceedings, a party to the Genocide Convention.<sup>79</sup> Further, in 2008, when addressing its jurisdiction in the application brought by Croatia against Serbia, the Court rejected Serbia's argument that it did not have capacity to appear before the Court at the time when Croatia's application was filed on 2 July 1999. In reaching its conclusion, the Court relied on the principle that where a procedural defect can be cured by subsequent action, considerations of judicial economy may justify its assessment at a later date. If the Court (p. 216) had found that it did not have jurisdiction on the ground that Serbia was not a member of the UN on 2 July 1999, Croatia would have been obliged to re-submit its application; in the circumstances, the sound administration of justice would not be served by dismissing the application.<sup>80</sup>

The principle that an obligation must be in force at the time of the alleged violation is also important in the context of contemporary problems raised by the slave trade and the requests for compensation sometimes advanced in this context. In the 19th century, arbitrators drew a distinction between periods where the trade was not forbidden by international law and periods when it had become a prohibited activity: for example, when Great Britain liberated slaves seized from American boats, that act engaged the responsibility of Great Britain for having violated the principle of respect for foreign property during the former period, but did not engage its responsibility in the later period, when the slave trade had become 'contrary to the law of nations'.<sup>81</sup>

The rule according to which responsibility is appreciated according to the law in force at the moment of the commission of the act in question is applicable even when a norm of jus cogens has emerged. A norm of jus cogens is no more retroactive than any other international norm.

When an international obligation is extinguished, responsibility for a continuing violation also disappears from the moment of the disappearance of the obligation, but the responsibility already incurred for the period when the obligation was in force is not erased. There is a kind of vested right to reparation, which cannot be suppressed, even if the wrongful act would not necessarily give rise to a right to reparation if it were committed at a later time.

This does not mean that a norm must always be interpreted in the light of the prevailing law at the moment it is elaborated; however this is not contrary to the rule enunciated in article 13. Rather, at the moment at which it is necessary to ascertain whether any given conduct is in conformity with an international obligation, an evolutionary interpretation may be applied, in light of the development of international law at the moment of the application of the rule in the particular case.<sup>82</sup>

To the extent that international responsibility arises only when an act attributable to a State is contrary to international law, it is necessary to know at what point a violation takes place and for how long it lasts. Issues of the moment at which an internationally wrongful act occurs and its extension in time are dealt with in articles 14 and 15. Article 14 distinguishes between breaches which are produced in an instantaneous way and do not extend in time (even if their consequences are lasting), such as the assassination of an ambassador, from continuing violations, for instance, the adoption of legislation contrary to the international obligations of the State. That characterization may result in some important consequences from the point of view of the jurisdiction of a tribunal or in relation to prescription. Notably, in the case of the proceedings in relation to crimes committed by the Chilean regime under Pinochet's rule, torture followed by forced disappearance has been considered to constitute a continuing act which lasts as long as the person is not found, so that any statute of limitations which might prevent proceedings is not applicable. The (p. 217) moment at which a composite act takes place—that is to say an act composed of a series of actions or omissions, the accumulation or the combination of which create a wrongful act (genocide or apartheid notably come to mind)—is determined by article 15.

The more precise distinctions which were included in the 1996 draft between violation of obligations requiring particular behaviour and obligations requiring a particular result, or between compound and complex internationally wrongful acts, were abandoned in the adoption of the final text.

In that regard, it should be mentioned that one of the new aspects introduced by the final Special Rapporteur, James Crawford, may be characterized as a step away from the 'Latin' approach in favour of a more 'Anglo-Saxon' approach, or rather from a relatively abstract and Cartesian approach in favour of a more concrete and pragmatic one. A whole series of elaborate concepts, including those to which reference has already been made, which had been forged, little by little, over the years, were consigned to the waste heap of history, denounced as being too complex. Thus in relation to the distinction between obligations of means (or behaviour), obligations of result and obligations of prevention, James Crawford wrote that 'they appear to be circular'.<sup>83</sup> The position which he thus adopted responded to the concerns of certain States. The United Kingdom, for example, stated (in a comment which should be read in the light of the characteristic British phlegm) that it was concerned that 'the fineness of the distinctions drawn ... between different categories of breach may exceed that which is necessary, or even helpful'.<sup>84</sup> Japan was not far behind in considering that certain aspects of the draft were supported by 'excessively abstract concepts ... laid down in unclear language'.<sup>85</sup> Germany agreed wholeheartedly, similarly highlighting that there is a certain danger in establishing provisions that are too abstract in nature, since it is difficult to anticipate their scope and application ... They may also seem impractical to States less rooted in the continental European legal tradition, because such abstract rules do not easily lend themselves to the pragmatic approach normally prevailing in international law.<sup>86</sup>

Nevertheless, certain of the abandoned distinctions were perfectly usable, and useful.

Whether one is dealing with an instantaneous act or a continuing act, it is necessary to clearly identify the moment when behaviour becomes wrongful. The ICJ recalled this necessary distinction between the before and after of wrongfulness in its judgment in Gabčíkovo-Nagymaros Project, observing that: 'A wrongful act or offence is frequently preceded by preparatory actions which are not to be confused with the act or offence itself.'<sup>87</sup>

(d) Circumstances precluding wrongfulness

(p. 218) Nevertheless, the view may be expressed that it would have been better to speak of circumstances excluding responsibility: that is, excluding essentially the obligation to make reparation, which seems to conform to the formulation adopted by the ICJ in Gabčíkovo-Nagymaros Project. While Hungary maintained that the wrongfulness of its behaviour was excluded by a state of necessity, the Court declared that:

The state of necessity claimed by Hungary—supposing it to have been established— ... could not permit of the conclusion that ... it had acted in accordance with its obligations under the 1977 Treaty or that those obligations had ceased to be binding upon it. It would only permit the affirmation that, under the circumstances, Hungary would not incur international responsibility by acting as it did.<sup>94</sup>

The Court, although clearly affirming that the existence of certain circumstances may excuse the conduct of a State but does not result in the extinction of its existing obligations (although it is not clear why this should be the case), also declared clearly that Hungary had not acted in conformity with its obligations, even if this might not have engaged its responsibility. Would it not be better to state that what is at issue are not circumstances precluding wrongfulness, but circumstances precluding responsibility, in spite of wrongfulness? The ICJ had in any case stated this clearly a few lines previously, stating that 'a state of necessity ... may only be invoked to exonerate from its responsibility a State which has failed to implement a treaty'.<sup>95</sup>

However, the exact consequences of 'circumstances precluding wrongfulness' remain uncertain at the level of the obligation to make reparation, to the extent that Article 27 provides that:

The invocation of a circumstance precluding wrongfulness... is without prejudice to:

(b) The question of compensation for any material loss caused by the act in question ...

The Commentary highlights the fact that 'material loss' is a more restrictive notion than that of 'damage', and that '[a]lthough the Article uses the term "compensation", it is not concerned with compensation within the framework of reparations provided for in Article 34.'<sup>96</sup> However, it is difficult to see that any 'compensation' payable constitutes anything other than compensation for the damage suffered by the fact of a wrongful act, and this even though the wrongfulness of that act was precluded.

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

20 February
General List:
Nos. 51 & 52

20 February 1969

NORTH SEA CONTINENTAL SHELF CASES

(FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY/DENMARK; FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY/NETHERLANDS)

Continental shelf areas in the North Sea—Delimitation as between adjacent States—Advantages and disadvantages of the equidistance method—Theory of just and equitable apportionment—Incompatibility of this theory with the principle of the natural appurtenance of the shelf to the coastal State—Task of the Court relates to delimitation not apportionment.

The equidistance principle as embodied in Article 6 of the 1958 Geneva Continental Shelf Convention—Non-opposability of that provision to the Federal Republic of Germany, either contractually or on the basis of conduct or estoppel.

Equidistance and the principle of natural appurtenance—Notion of closest proximity—Critique of that notion as not being entailed by the principle of appurtenance—Fundamental character of the principle of the continental shelf as being the natural prolongation of the land territory.

Legal history of delimitation—Truman Proclamation—International Law Commission—1958 Geneva Conference—Acceptance of equidistance as a purely conventional rule not reflecting or crystallizing a rule of customary international law—Effect in this respect of reservations article of Geneva Convention—Subsequent State practice insufficient to convert the conventional rule into a rule of customary international law—The opinio juris sive necessitatis, how manifested.

Statement of what are the applicable principles and rules of law—Delimitation by agreement, in accordance with equitable principles, taking account of all relevant circumstances, and so as to give effect to the principle of natural prolongation—Freedom of the Parties as to choice of method—Various factors relevant to the negotiation.

COUR INTERNATIONALE DE JUSTICE

20 février 1969

20 février
nos 51 & 52

AFFAIRES DU PLATEAU CONTINENTAL
DE LA MER DU NORD

(RÉPUBLIQUE FÉDÉRALE D'ALLEMAGNE/DANEMARK; RÉPUBLIQUE FÉDÉRALE D'ALLEMAGNE/PAYS-BAS)

Le principe de l'équidistance résultant de l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève de 1958 sur le plateau continental — Inopposabilité de cette disposition à la République fédérale d'Allemagne que ce soit à titre contractuel, à raison du comportement ou par le jeu de l'estoppel.

Historique du droit de la délimitation — Proclamation Truman — Commission du droit international — Conférence de Genève de 1958 — Acceptation de l'équidistance en tant que règle purement conventionnelle ne consacrant ou ne cristallisant pas une règle de droit international coutumier — Effet à cet égard de l'article de la Convention de Genève relatif aux réserves — La pratique ultérieure des Etats ne suffit pas à transformer une règle conventionnelle en une règle de droit international coutumier — L'opinio juris sive necessitatis et ses manifestations.

Principes et règles de droit applicables — Délimitation par voie d'accord, conformément à des principes équitables, effectuée compte tenu de toutes les circonstances pertinentes et afin de donner effet au principe du prolongement naturel — Liberté des Parties quant au choix de la méthode — Divers facteurs présentant de l'intérêt pour les négociations.

Par lettre du 16 février 1967, reçue au Greffe le 20 février 1967, le ministre des Affaires étrangères des Pays-Bas a adressé au Greffier :

- a) un exemplaire original d'un compromis, signé à Bonn le 2 février 1967 pour les Gouvernements du Danemark et de la République fédérale d'Allemagne, soumettant à la Cour un différend entre ces deux États relatif à la délimita-tion du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre eux ;
- b) un exemplaire original d'un compromis, signé à Bonn le 2 février 1967 pour les Gouvernements de la République fédérale d'Allemagne et des Pays-Bas, soumettant à la Cour un différend entre ces deux États relatif

- two States concerning the delimitation, as between them, of the continental shelf in the North Sea;
- (c) an original copy, signed at Bonn on 2 February 1967 for the three Governments aforementioned, of a Protocol relating to certain procedural questions arising from the above-mentioned Special Agreements.

Articles 1 to 3 of the Special Agreement between the Governments of Denmark and the Federal Republic of Germany are as follows:

“Article 1

- (1) The International Court of Justice is requested to decide the following question:

What principles and rules of international law are applicable to the delimitation as between the Parties of the areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea which appertain to each of them beyond the partial boundary determined by the above-mentioned Convention of 9 June 1965?

- (2) The Governments of the Kingdom of Denmark and of the Federal Republic of Germany shall delimit the continental shelf in the North Sea as between their countries by agreement in pursuance of the decision requested from the International Court of Justice.

- (1) The Parties shall present their written pleadings to the Court in the order stated below:

1. a Memorial of the Federal Republic of Germany to be submitted within six months from the notification of the present Agreement to the Court;
2. a Counter-Memorial of the Kingdom of Denmark to be submitted within six months from the delivery of the German Memorial;
3. a German Reply followed by a Danish Rejoinder to be delivered within such time-limits as the Court may order.

- (2) Additional written pleadings may be presented if this is jointly proposed by the Parties and considered by the Court to be appropriate to the case and the circumstances.

- (3) The foregoing order of presentation is without prejudice to any question of burden of proof which might arise.

The present Agreement shall enter into force on the day of signature thereof.”

Articles 1 to 3 of the Special Agreement between the Governments of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Netherlands are as follows:

- (1) The International Court of Justice is requested to decide the following question:

à la délimitation du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre eux;

- c) un exemplaire original d'un protocole, signé à Bonn le 2 février 1967 pour les trois gouvernements précités, relatif à certaines questions de procédure résultant des compromis ci-dessus mentionnés.

Les articles 1 à 3 du compromis entre les Gouvernements du Danemark et de la République fédérale d'Allemagne sont ainsi conçus :

1) La Cour internationale de Justice est priée de trancher la question suivante:

Quels sont les principes et les règles du droit international applicables à la délimitation entre les Parties des zones du plateau continental de la mer du Nord relevant de chacune d'elles, au-delà de la ligne de délimitation partielle déterminée par la convention susmentionnée du 9 juin 1965?

2) Les Gouvernements du Royaume du Danemark et de la République fédérale d'Allemagne délimiteront le plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre leurs pays par voie d'accord conclu conformément à la décision demandée à la Cour internationale de Justice.

1) Les Parties déposeront devant la Cour les pièces de la procédure écrite dans l'ordre suivant :

1. mémoire de la République fédérale d'Allemagne devant être soumis dans les six mois qui suivront la notification du présent accord à la Cour;
2. contre-mémoire du Royaume du Danemark devant être soumis dans les six mois qui suivront la remise du mémoire allemand;
3. réplique allemande suivie d'une duplique danoise, devant être soumise dans des délais à fixer par la Cour.

2) Des pièces écrites supplémentaires pourront être présentées si les Parties le proposent en commun et si la Cour l'estime approprié à l'affaire et aux circonstances.

3) L'ordre indiqué ci-dessus pour le dépôt des pièces ne préjuge en rien de la charge de la preuve.

Le présent accord entrera en vigueur le jour de sa signature. »

The present Agreement shall enter into force on the day of signature thereof.”

The Protocol between the three Governments reads as follows:

“Protocol

At the signature of the Special Agreement of today’s date between the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Governments of the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of the Netherlands respectively, on the submission to the International Court of Justice of the differences between the Parties concerning the delimitation of the continental shelf in the North Sea, the three Governments wish to state their agreement on the following:

1. The Government of the Kingdom of the Netherlands will, within a month from the signature, notify the two Special Agreements together with the present Protocol to the International Court of Justice in accordance with Article 40, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the Court.
2. After the notification in accordance with item 1 above the Parties will ask the Court to join the two cases.
3. The three Governments agree that, for the purpose of appointing a judge ad hoc, the Governments of the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of the Netherlands shall be considered parties in the same interest within the meaning of Article 31, paragraph 5, of the Statute of the Court.”

Pursuant to Article 33, paragraph 2, of the Rules of Court, the Registrar at once informed the Governments of Denmark and the Federal Republic of Germany of the filing of the Special Agreements. In accordance with Article 34, paragraph 2, of the Rules of Court, copies of the Special Agreements were transmitted to the other Members of the United Nations and to other non-member States entitled to appear before the Court.

2) Les Gouvernements de la République fédérale d'Allemagne et du Royaume des Pays-Bas délimiteront le plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre leurs pays par voie d'accord conclu conformément à la décision demandée à la Cour internationale de Justice.

1) Les Parties déposeront devant la Cour les pièces de la procédure écrite dans l'ordre suivant :

1. mémoire de la République fédérale d'Allemagne devant être soumis dans les six mois qui suivront la notification du présent accord à la Cour;
2. contre-mémoire du Royaume des Pays-Bas devant être soumis dans les six mois qui suivront la remise du mémoire allemand;
3. réplique allemande suivie d'une duplique néerlandaise, devant être soumises dans des délais à fixer par la Cour.

2) Des pièces écrites supplémentaires pourront être présentées si les Parties le proposent en commun et si la Cour l'estime approprié à l'affaire et aux circonstances.

3) L'ordre indiqué ci-dessus pour le dépôt des pièces ne préjuge en rien de la charge de la preuve.

Le présent accord entrera en vigueur le jour de sa signature. »

Le protocole entre les trois gouvernements est ainsi conçu :

En signant les compromis intervenus ce jour entre le Gouvernement de la République fédérale d'Allemagne et les Gouvernements du Royaume du Danemark et du Royaume des Pays-Bas aux termes desquels sont soumis à la Cour internationale de Justice les différends entre les Parties concernant la délimitation du plateau continental de la mer du Nord, les trois gouvernements tiennent à déclarer leur accord sur ce qui suit :

1. Le Gouvernement du Royaume des Pays-Bas notifiera, dans le mois de la signature, les deux compromis et le présent protocole à la Cour internationale de Justice, conformément à l'article 40, paragraphe 1, du Statut de la Cour.

2. Une fois faite la notification prévue au paragraphe précédent, les Parties demanderont à la Cour de joindre les deux instances.

3. Les trois gouvernements conviennent qu'aux fins de la désignation d'un juge ad hoc les Gouvernements du Royaume du Danemark et du Royaume des Pays-Bas seront considérés comme faisant cause commune au sens de l'article 31, paragraphe 5, du Statut de la Cour. »

Conformément à l'article 33, paragraphe 2, du Règlement de la Cour, le Greffier a immédiatement notifié le dépôt des compromis aux Gouvernements du Danemark et de la République fédérale d'Allemagne. Conformément à l'article 34, paragraphe 2, dudit Règlement, copie des compromis a été transmise aux autres Membres des Nations Unies, ainsi qu'aux autres Etats non membres admis à ester devant la Cour.

By Orders of 8 March 1967, taking into account the agreement reached between the Parties, 21 August 1967 and 20 February 1968 were fixed respectively as the time-limits for the filing of the Memorials and Counter-Memorials. These pleadings were filed within the time-limits prescribed. By Orders of 1 March 1968, 31 May and 30 August 1968 were fixed respectively as the time-limits for the filing of the Replies and Rejoinders.

Pursuant to Article 31, paragraph 3, of the Statute of the Court, the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany chose Dr. Hermann Mosler, Professor of International Law in the University of Heidelberg, to sit as Judge ad hoc in both cases. Referring to the agreement concluded between them according to which they should be considered parties in the same interest within the meaning of Article 31, paragraph 5, of the Statute, the Governments of Denmark and the Netherlands chose Dr. Max Sørensen, Professor of International Law in the University of Aarhus, to sit as Judge ad hoc in both cases.

By an Order of 26 April 1968, considering that the Governments of Denmark and the Netherlands were, so far as the choice of a Judge ad hoc was concerned, to be reckoned as one Party only, the Court found that those two Governments were in the same interest, joined the proceedings in the two cases and, in modification of the directions given in the Orders of 1 March 1968, fixed 30 August 1968 as the time-limit for the filing of a Common Rejoinder for Denmark and the Netherlands.

The Replies and the Common Rejoinder having been filed within the time-limits prescribed, the cases were ready for hearing on 30 August 1968.

Pursuant to Article 44, paragraph 2, of the Rules of Court, the pleadings and annexed documents were, after consultation of the Parties, made available to the Governments of Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Finland, France, Honduras, Iran, Norway, Sweden, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, United States of America and Venezuela. Pursuant to paragraph 3 of the same Article, those pleadings and annexed documents were, with the consent of the Parties, made accessible to the public as from the date of the opening of the oral proceedings.

Hearings were held from 23 to 25 October, from 28 October to 1 November, and on 4, 5, 7, 8 and 11 November 1968, in the course of which the Court heard, in the order agreed between the Parties and accepted by the Court, the oral arguments and replies of Professor Jaenicke, Agent, and Professor Oda, Counsel, on behalf of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany; and of Mr. Jacobsen and Professor Riphagen, Agents, and Sir Humphrey Waldock, Counsel, on behalf of the Governments of Denmark and the Netherlands.

In the course of the written proceedings, the following Submissions were presented by the Parties:

On behalf of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany,
in the Memorials:

“May it please the Court to recognize and declare:

1. The delimitation of the continental shelf between the Parties in the North Sea is governed by the principle that each coastal State is entitled to a just and equitable share.

Par ordonnances du 8 mars 1967, les délais pour le dépôt des mémoires et contre-mémoires ont été fixés, en tenant compte de l'accord intervenu entre les Parties, aux 21 août 1967 et 20 février 1968 respectivement. Ces pièces de procédure ont été déposées dans les délais prescrits. Par ordonnances du 1<sup>er</sup> mars 1968, les délais pour le dépôt des répliques et dupliques ont été fixés aux 31 mai et 30 août 1968 respectivement.

En application de l'article 31, paragraphe 3, du Statut de la Cour, le Gouvernement de la République fédérale d'Allemagne a désigné M. Hermann Mosler, professeur de droit international à l'Université de Heidelberg, pour siéger comme juge ad hoc dans les deux affaires. Se référant à l'accord conclu entre eux et aux termes duquel ils devaient être considérés comme faisant cause commune au sens de l'article 31, paragraphe 5, du Statut, les Gouvernements du Danemark et des Pays-Bas ont désigné M. Max Sørensen, professeur de droit international à l'Université de Aarhus, pour siéger comme juge ad hoc dans les deux affaires.

Les répliques et la duplique commune ayant été déposées dans les délais prescrits, les affaires se sont trouvées en état le 30 août 1968.

En application de l'article 44, paragraphe 2, du Règlement, les pièces de la procédure écrite ont, après consultation des Parties, été mises à la disposition des Gouvernements du Brésil, du Canada, du Chili, de la Colombie, des Etats-Unis d'Amérique, de l'Equateur, de la Finlande, de la France, du Honduras, de l'Iran, de la Norvège, du Royaume-Uni de Grande-Bretagne et d'Irlande du Nord, de la Suède et du Venezuela. En application du paragraphe 3 du même article, ces pièces ont, avec l'assentiment des Parties, été rendues accessibles au public à dater de l'ouverture de la procédure orale.

Des audiences ont été tenues du 23 au 25 octobre, du 28 octobre au 1<sup>er</sup> novembre et les 4, 5, 7, 8 et 11 novembre 1968, durant lesquelles ont été entendus en leurs plaidoiries et réponses, dans l'ordre convenu entre les Parties et accepté par la Cour: pour le Gouvernement de la République fédérale d'Allemagne, M. Jaenicke, agent, et M. Oda, conseil; et pour les Gouvernements du Danemark et des Pays-Bas, MM. Jacobsen et Riphagen, agents, et sir Humphrey Waldoock, conseil.

Dans la procédure écrite, les conclusions ci-après ont été présentées par les Parties:

Au nom du Gouvernement de la République fédérale d'Allemagne,

dans les mémoires:

«Plaise à la Cour reconnaître et dire:

1. Que la délimitation du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre les Parties est régie par le principe selon lequel chacun des Etats riverains a droit à une part juste et équitable.

between the Parties which could not be settled by detailed negotiations, regarding the further course of the boundary beyond the partial boundary determined by the Convention of 9 June 1965;

Considering that under the terms of Article 1, paragraph 1, of the Compromis the task entrusted to the Court is not to formulate a basis for the delimitation of the continental shelf in the North Sea as between the Parties ex aequo et bono, but to decide what principles and rules of international law are applicable to the delimitation as between the Parties of the areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea which appertain to each of them beyond the partial boundary, determined by the above-mentioned Convention of 9 June 1965;

In view of the facts and arguments presented in Parts I and II of this Counter-Memorial,

May it please the Court to adjudge and declare:

1. The delimitation as between the Parties of the said areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea is governed by the principles and rules of international law which are expressed in Article 6, paragraph 2, of the Geneva Convention of 1958 on the Continental Shelf.

2. The Parties being in disagreement, unless another boundary is justified by special circumstances, the boundary between them is to be determined by application of the principle of equidistance from the nearest points of the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of each State is measured.

3. Special circumstances which justify another boundary line not having been established, the boundary between the Parties is to be determined by application of the principle of equidistance indicated in the preceding Submission."

On behalf of the Government of the Netherlands,

in its Counter-Memorial:

"Considering that, as noted in the Compromis, disagreement exists between the Parties which could not be settled by detailed negotiations, regarding the further course of the boundary beyond the partial boundary determined by the Treaty of 1 December 1964;

Considering that under the terms of Article 1, paragraph 1, of the Compromis the task entrusted to the Court is not to formulate a basis for the delimitation of the continental shelf in the North Sea as between the Parties ex aequo et bono, but to decide what principles and rules of international law are applicable to the delimitation as between the Parties of the areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea which appertain to each of them beyond the partial boundary determined by the above-mentioned Treaty of 1 December 1964;

In view of the facts and arguments presented in Parts I and II of this Counter-Memorial,

May it please the Court to adjudge and declare:

1. The delimitation as between the Parties of the said areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea is governed by the principles and rules of international law which are expressed in Article 6, paragraph 2, of the Geneva Convention of 1958 on the Continental Shelf.

les Parties un désaccord qui n'a pu être réglé par des négociations approfondies, quant au prolongement de la ligne de délimitation au-delà de la ligne de délimitation partielle déterminée par la convention du 9 juin 1965;

Considérant que, aux termes de l'article premier, paragraphe 1, du compromis, la tâche qui incombe à la Cour n'est pas de formuler une base pour la délimitation du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre les Parties ex aequo et bono, mais de décider quels sont les principes et les règles du droit international applicables à la délimitation entre les Parties des zones du plateau continental de la mer du Nord relevant de chacune d'elles, au-delà de la ligne de délimitation partielle déterminée par la convention susmentionnée du 9 juin 1965;

Vu les faits et arguments exposés dans les première et deuxième parties du présent contre-mémoire,

Plaise à la Cour dire et juger:

1. Que la délimitation entre les Parties desdites zones du plateau continental de la mer du Nord est régie par les principes et les règles du droit international énoncés à l'article 6, paragraphe 2, de la Convention de Genève de 1958 sur le plateau continental.

2. Que les Parties étant en désaccord, et à moins que des circonstances spéciales ne justifient une autre délimitation, la délimitation entre elles doit être opérée par application du principe de l'équidistance des points les plus proches des lignes de base à partir desquelles est mesurée la largeur de la mer territoriale de chacun de ces Etats.

3. Que, des circonstances spéciales justifiant une autre délimitation n'ayant pas été établies, la délimitation entre les Parties doit être opérée par application du principe de l'équidistance mentionné dans la conclusion précédente.»

dans son contre-mémoire:

Considérant que, aux termes de l'article premier, paragraphe 1, du compromis, la tâche qui incombe à la Cour n'est pas de formuler une base pour la délimitation du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre les Parties ex aequo et bono, mais de décider quels sont les principes et les règles du droit international applicables à la délimitation entre les Parties des zones du plateau continental de la mer du Nord relevant de chacune d'elles, au-delà de la ligne de délimitation partielle déterminée par la convention susmentionnée du 1<sup>er</sup> décembre 1964;

Vu les faits et arguments exposés dans les première et deuxième parties du présent contre-mémoire,

1. Que la délimitation entre les Parties desdites zones du plateau continental de la mer du Nord est régie par les principes et les règles du droit international énoncés à l'article 6, paragraphe 2, de la Convention de Genève de 1958 sur le plateau continental.

2. The Parties being in disagreement, unless another boundary is justified by special circumstances, the boundary between them is to be determined by application of the principle of equidistance from the nearest points of the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of each State is measured.

3. Special circumstances which justify another boundary line not having been established, the boundary between the Parties is to be determined by application of the principle of equidistance indicated in the preceding Submission.”

On behalf of the Governments of Denmark and the Netherlands, in the Common Rejoinder:

“May it further please the Court to adjudge and declare:

4. If the principles and rules of international law mentioned in Submission 1 of the respective Counter-Memorials are not applicable as between the Parties, the boundary is to be determined between the Parties on the basis of the exclusive rights of each Party over the continental shelf adjacent to its coast and of the principle that the boundary is to leave to each Party every point of the continental shelf which lies nearer to its coast than to the coast of the other Party.”

In the course of the oral proceedings, the following Submissions were presented by the Parties:

On behalf of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany,
at the hearing on 5 November 1968:

“1. The delimitation of the continental shelf between the Parties in the North Sea is governed by the principle that each coastal State is entitled to a just and equitable share.

2. (a) The method of determining boundaries of the continental shelf in such a way that every point of the boundary is equidistant from the nearest points of the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of each State is measured (equidistance method) is not a rule of customary international law.

(b) The rule contained in the second sentence of paragraph 2 of Article 6 of the Continental Shelf Convention, prescribing that in the absence of agreement, and unless another boundary is justified by special circumstances, the boundary shall be determined by application of the principle of equidistance, has not become customary international law.

(c) Even if the rule under (b) would be applicable between the Parties, special circumstances within the meaning of that rule would exclude the application of the equidistance method in the present case.

3. (a) The equidistance method cannot be used for the delimitation of the continental shelf unless it is established by agreement, arbitration, or otherwise, that it will achieve a just and equitable apportionment of the continental shelf among the States concerned.

(b) As to the delimitation of the continental shelf between the Parties in the North Sea, the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of the Netherlands cannot rely on the application of the equidistance method, since it would not lead to an equitable apportionment.

2. Que les Parties étant en désaccord, et à moins que des circonstances spéciales ne justifient une autre délimitation, la délimitation entre elles doit être opérée par application du principe de l'équidistance des points les plus proches des lignes de base à partir desquelles est mesurée la largeur de la mer territoriale de chacun de ces Etats.

3. Que, des circonstances spéciales justifiant une autre délimitation n'ayant pas été établies, la délimitation entre les Parties doit être opérée par application du principe de l'équidistance mentionné dans la conclusion précédente.»

Au nom des Gouvernements du Danemark et des Pays-Bas,
dans la duplique commune :

«Plaise à la Cour dire et juger :

4. Que, si les principes et les règles du droit international mentionnés à la conclusion n° 1 des contre-mémoires ne sont pas applicables entre les Parties, la délimitation doit s'opérer entre elles sur la base des droits exclusifs de chacune des Parties sur le plateau continental adjacent à ses côtes et du principe selon lequel la délimitation doit laisser à chacune des Parties tous les points du plateau continental qui sont plus près de ses côtes que des côtes de l'autre Partie.»

Au cours de la procédure orale, les conclusions ci-après ont été présentées par les Parties :

à l'audience du 5 novembre 1968 :

«1. La délimitation du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre les Parties est régie par le principe selon lequel chacun des Etats riverains a droit à une part juste et équitable.

2. a) La méthode consistant à déterminer les limites du plateau continental de telle sorte que tous les points de la ligne de délimitation soient équidistants des points les plus proches des lignes de base à partir desquelles est mesurée la largeur de la mer territoriale de chacun des Etats (méthode de l'équidistance) n'est pas une règle de droit international coutumier.

b) La règle énoncée dans la deuxième phrase de l'article 6, paragraphe 2, de la Convention sur le plateau continental, stipulant qu'à défaut d'accord, et à moins que des circonstances spéciales ne justifient une autre délimitation, celle-ci s'opère par application du principe de l'équidistance, n'est pas devenue une règle de droit international coutumier.

c) Même si la règle mentionnée à l'alinéa b) était applicable entre les Parties, des circonstances spéciales au sens de cette règle s'opposeraient à l'application de la méthode de l'équidistance dans la présente affaire.

3. a) La méthode de l'équidistance ne saurait être utilisée pour délimiter le plateau continental à moins qu'il ne soit établi par voie d'accord, d'arbitrage, ou autrement, qu'elle assurera une répartition juste et équitable du plateau continental entre les Etats intéressés.

b) En ce qui concerne la délimitation du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre les Parties, le Royaume du Danemark et le Royaume des Pays-Bas ne peuvent se fonder sur l'application de la méthode de l'équidistance, car elle n'aboutirait pas à une répartition équitable.

4. Consequently, the delimitation of the continental shelf, on which the Parties must agree pursuant to paragraph 2 of Article 1 of the Special Agreement, is determined by the principle of the just and equitable share, based on criteria relevant to the particular geographical situation in the North Sea.”

On behalf of the Government of Denmark, at the hearing on 11 November 1968, Counsel for that Government stated that it confirmed the Submissions presented in its Counter-Memorial and in the Common Rejoinder and that those Submissions were identical mutatis mutandis with those of the Government of the Netherlands.

On behalf of the Government of the Netherlands,

at the hearing on 11 November 1968:

“With regard to the delimitation as between the Federal Republic of Germany and the Kingdom of the Netherlands of the boundary of the areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea which appertain to each of them beyond the partial boundary determined by the Convention of 1 December 1964.

May it please the Court to adjudge and declare:

1. The delimitation as between the Parties of the said areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea is governed by the principles and rules of international law which are expressed in Article 6, paragraph 2, of the Geneva Convention of 1958 on the Continental Shelf.

2. The Parties being in disagreement, unless another boundary is justified by special circumstances, the boundary between them is to be determined by application of the principle of equidistance from the nearest points of the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of each State is measured.

3. Special circumstances which justify another boundary line not having been established, the boundary between the Parties is to be determined by application of the principle of equidistance indicated in the preceding Submission.

4. If the principles and rules of international law mentioned in Submission 1 are not applicable as between the Parties, the boundary is to be determined between the Parties on the basis of the exclusive rights of each Party over the continental shelf adjacent to its coast and of the principle that the boundary is to leave to each Party every point of the continental shelf which lies nearer to its coast than to the coast of the other Party.”

4. En conséquence la délimitation du plateau continental dont les Parties doivent convenir conformément à l'article 1, paragraphe 2, du compromis est déterminée par le principe de la part juste et équitable, en fonction de critères applicables à la situation géographique particulière de la mer du Nord.»

à l'audience du 11 novembre 1968, le conseil de ce Gouvernement a déclaré qu'il confirmait les conclusions présentées dans son contre-mémoire et dans la duplique commune et que ces conclusions étaient identiques mutatis mutandis à celles du Gouvernement des Pays-Bas.

à l'audience du 11 novembre 1968:

«Pour ce qui est de la délimitation entre la République fédérale d'Allemagne et le Royaume des Pays-Bas des zones du plateau continental de la mer du Nord relevant de chacun d'eux, au-delà de la ligne de délimitation partielle déterminée par la convention du 1<sup>er</sup> décembre 1964,

Plaise à la Cour dire et juger:

2. Que les Parties étant en désaccord, et à moins que des circonstances spéciales ne justifient une autre délimitation, la délimitation entre elles doit être opérée par application du principe de l'équidistance des points les plus proches des lignes de base à partir desquelles est mesurée la largeur de la mer territoriale de chacun de ces Etats.

3. Que, des circonstances spéciales justifiant une autre délimitation n'ayant pas été établies, la délimitation entre les Parties doit être opérée par application du principe de l'équidistance mentionné dans la conclusion précédente.

4. Que, si les principes et les règles du droit international mentionnés à la conclusion n° 1 ne sont pas applicables entre les Parties, la délimitation doit s'opérer entre elles sur la base des droits exclusifs de chacune des Parties sur le plateau continental adjacent à ses côtes et du principe selon lequel la délimitation doit laisser à chacune des Parties tous les points du plateau continental qui sont plus près de ses côtes que des côtes de l'autre Partie.»

1. Par les deux compromis respectivement conclus entre le Royaume du Danemark et la République fédérale d'Allemagne et entre la République fédérale d'Allemagne et le Royaume des Pays-Bas, la Cour est saisie de certaines divergences concernant «la délimitation entre les tion as between the Parties of the areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea which appertain to each of them”—with the exception of those areas, situated in the immediate vicinity of the coast, which have already been the subject of delimitation by two agreements dated 1 December 1964, and 9 June 1965, concluded in the one case between the Federal Republic and the Kingdom of the Netherlands, and in the other between the Federal Republic and the Kingdom of Denmark.

2. It is in respect of the delimitation of the continental shelf areas lying beyond and to seaward of those affected by the partial boundaries thus established, that the Court is requested by each of the two Special Agreements to decide what are the applicable “principles and rules of international law”. The Court is not asked actually to delimit the further boundaries which will be involved, this task being reserved by the Special Agreements to the Parties, which undertake to effect such a delimitation “by agreement in pursuance of the decision requested from the . . . Court”—that is to say on the basis of, and in accordance with, the principles and rules of international law found by the Court to be applicable.

3. As described in Article 4 of the North Sea Policing of Fisheries Convention of 6 May 1882, the North Sea, which lies between continental Europe and Great Britain in the east-west direction, is roughly oval in shape and stretches from the straits of Dover northwards to a parallel drawn between a point immediately north of the Shetland Islands and the mouth of the Sogne Fiord in Norway, about 75 kilometres above Bergen, beyond which is the North Atlantic Ocean. In the extreme north-west, it is bounded by a line connecting the Orkney and Shetland island groups; while on its north-eastern side, the line separating it from the entrances to the Baltic Sea lies between Hanstholm at the north-west point of Denmark, and Lindesnes at the southern tip of Norway. Eastward of this line the Skagerrak begins. Thus, the North Sea has to some extent the general look of an enclosed sea without actually being one. Round its shores are situated, on its eastern side and starting from the north, Norway, Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and France; while the whole western side is taken up by Great Britain, together with the island groups of the Orkneys and Shetlands. From this it will be seen that the continental shelf of the Federal Republic is situated between those of Denmark and the Netherlands.

4. The waters of the North Sea are shallow, and the whole seabed consists of continental shelf at a depth of less than 200 metres, except for the formation known as the Norwegian Trough, a belt of water 200-650 metres deep, fringing the southern and south-western coasts of Norway to a width averaging about 80-100 kilometres. Much the greater part of this continental shelf has already been the subject of delimitation Parties des zones du plateau continental de la mer du Nord relevant de chacune d'elles», à l'exception des zones situées à proximité immédiate de la côte qui ont déjà été délimitées par deux accords signés les 1<sup>er</sup> décembre 1964 et 9 juin 1965 entre la République fédérale et le Royaume des Pays-Bas et entre la République fédérale et le Royaume du Danemark.

2. C'est à propos de la délimitation des zones du plateau continental prolongeant vers le large les zones déjà délimitées que la Cour est priée dans chacun des deux compromis de décider «quels sont les principes et les règles du droit international applicables». Il n'est pas demandé à la Cour d'établir effectivement les limites prolongées dont il s'agit; aux termes des compromis, cette tâche est réservée aux Parties qui s'engagent à procéder à la délimitation «par voie d'accord conclu conformément à la décision demandée à la Cour», c'est-à-dire sur la base et en conformité des principes et des règles de droit international tenus par la Cour pour applicables.

3. La mer du Nord, telle qu'elle est décrite à l'article 4 de la convention du 6 mai 1882 sur la police de la pêche dans la mer du Nord, a en gros la forme d'un ovale limité à l'est par le continent européen et à l'ouest par la Grande-Bretagne; à partir du Pas de Calais, elle s'étend vers le nord jusqu'au parallèle passant immédiatement au nord des Shetland et rencontrant la Norvège à l'embouchure du Sognefjord (à soixante-quinze kilomètres environ au nord de Bergen), qui marque le début de l'Atlantique nord. Elle est bornée à son extrémité nord-ouest par la ligne qui joint les Orcades aux Shetland et, au nord-est, elle est séparée des détroits de la Baltique par une ligne allant de Hanstholm (points nord-ouest du Danemark) au cap Lindesnes (extrémité méridionale de la Norvège); au-delà commence le Skagerrak. Ainsi, sans constituer réellement une mer fermée, la mer du Nord en présente dans une certaine mesure l'apparence générale. Elle est bordée à l'est et en partant du nord par la Norvège, le Danemark, la République fédérale d'Allemagne, les Pays-Bas, la Belgique et la France, tout le côté ouest étant occupé par la Grande-Bretagne, avec les archipels des Orcades et des Shetland. Le plateau continental de la République fédérale est donc situé entre les plateaux continentaux du Danemark et des Pays-Bas.

4. La mer du Nord est peu profonde et son lit est entièrement constitué par un plateau continental à une profondeur de moins de deux cents mètres, à l'exception d'une bande de deux cents à six cent cinquante mètres de profondeur, dite fosse norvégienne, qui longe les côtes sud et sud-ouest de la Norvège sur une largeur moyenne de quatre-vingts à cent kilomètres. La majeure partie de ce plateau continental a déjà by a series of agreements concluded between the United Kingdom (which, as stated, lies along the whole western side of it) and certain of the States on the eastern side, namely Norway, Denmark and the Netherlands. These three delimitations were carried out by the drawing of what are known as "median lines" which, for immediate present purposes, may be described as boundaries drawn between the continental shelf areas of "opposite" States, dividing the intervening spaces equally between them. These lines are shown on Map 1 on page 15, together with a similar line, also established by agreement, drawn between the shelf areas of Norway and Denmark. Theoretically it would be possible also to draw the following median lines in the North Sea, namely United Kingdom/Federal Republic (which would lie east of the present line United Kingdom/Norway-Denmark-Netherlands); Norway/Federal Republic (which would lie south of the present line Norway/Denmark); and Norway/Netherlands (which would lie north of whatever line is eventually determined to be the continental shelf boundary between the Federal Republic and the Netherlands). Even if these median lines were drawn however, the question would arise whether the United Kingdom, Norway and the Netherlands could take advantage of them as against the parties to the existing delimitations, since these lines would, it seems, in each case lie beyond (i.e., respectively to the east, south and north of) the boundaries already effective under the existing agreements at present in force. This is illustrated by Map 2 on page 15.

5. In addition to the partial boundary lines Federal Republic/Denmark and Federal Republic/Netherlands, which, as mentioned in paragraph 1 above, were respectively established by the agreements of 9 June 1965 and 1 December 1964, and which are shown as lines A-B and C-D on Map 3 on page 16, another line has been drawn in this area, namely that represented by the line E-F on that map. This line, which divides areas respectively claimed (to the north of it) by Denmark, and (to the south of it) by the Netherlands, is the outcome of an agreement between those two countries dated 31 March 1966, reflecting the view taken by them as to what are the correct boundary lines between their respective continental shelf areas and that of the Federal Republic, beyond the partial boundaries A-B and C-D already drawn. These further and un-agreed boundaries to seaward, are shown on Map 3 by means of the dotted lines B-E and D-E. They are the lines, the correctness of which in law the Court is in effect, though indirectly, called upon to determine. Also shown on Map 3 are the two pecked lines B-F and D-F, representing approximately the boundaries which the Federal Republic would have wished to obtain in the course of the negotiations that took place between the Federal Republic and the other two Parties prior to the submission of the matter to the Court. The nature of these negotiations must now be described.

été délimitée par une série d'accords conclus entre le Royaume-Uni (qui, comme on l'a vu, le borde en totalité du côté ouest) et certains des Etats riverains du côté est: la Norvège, le Danemark et les Pays-Bas. Ces trois délimitations ont été réalisées par le tracé de lignes dites « médianes » qui, pour le moment, peuvent être décrites comme divisant en parties égales un plateau continental situé entre des Etats « se faisant face ». Ces lignes apparaissent sur la carte 1 (page 15), de même qu'une ligne analogue également établie par voie d'accord et délimitant les zones de plateau continental de la Norvège et du Danemark. En théorie, l'on pourrait aussi tracer dans la mer du Nord des lignes médianes entre le Royaume-Uni et la République fédérale (à l'est de l'actuelle ligne Royaume-Uni/Norvège-Danemark-Pays-Bas), entre la Norvège et la République fédérale (au sud de l'actuelle ligne Norvège/Danemark) et entre la Norvège et les Pays-Bas (au nord de la ligne, quelle qu'elle soit, qui sera finalement retenue comme délimitant le plateau continental entre la République fédérale et les Pays-Bas). Mais, si ces lignes médianes étaient tracées, la question se poserait de savoir si le Royaume-Uni, la Norvège et les Pays-Bas pourraient s'en prévaloir à l'encontre des parties aux accords de délimitation en vigueur, car elles seraient, semble-t-il, situées au-delà (c'est-à-dire respectivement à l'est, au sud et au nord) des limites déjà convenues dans les accords actuellement existants. Cela ressort de la carte 2 (page 15).

5. Outre les lignes de délimitation partielle République fédérale/Danemark et République fédérale/Pays-Bas qui, comme il est dit au paragraphe 1 ci-dessus, ont été respectivement établies par les accords du 9 juin 1965 et du 1<sup>er</sup> décembre 1964 et qui sont représentées par les lignes A-B et C-D sur la carte 3 (page 16), une autre ligne a été tracée dans cette partie de la mer du Nord: elle est figurée sur la même carte par la ligne E-F. Cette ligne, qui sépare des zones, revendiquées au nord par le Danemark et au sud par les Pays-Bas, résulte d'un accord du 31 mars 1966 entre les deux pays et correspond à la conception qu'ils se faisaient des limites entre leurs zones de plateau continental et celle de la République fédérale au-delà de la délimitation partielle déjà effectuée suivant A-B et C-D. Ces limites, qui n'ont pas été reconnues, sont représentées sur la carte 3 par les lignes pointillées B-E et D-E. Ce sont les lignes sur le bien-fondé juridique desquelles la Cour est en fait, encore qu'indirectement, appelée à se prononcer. On peut aussi voir sur la carte 3 deux lignes de tirets B-F et D-F indiquant approximativement les limites que la République fédérale aurait voulu obtenir au cours des négociations menées avec les deux autres Parties avant que la Cour soit saisie. Il convient d'indiquer ici en quoi ont consisté ces négociations.

Croquis illustratifs des situations géographiques décrites au paragraphe 8 de l'arrêt

6. Under the agreements of December 1964 and June 1965, already mentioned, the partial boundaries represented by the map lines A-B and C-D had, according to the information furnished to the Court by the Parties, been drawn mainly by application of the principle of equidistance, using that term as denoting the abstract concept of equidistance. A line so drawn, known as an "equidistance line", may be described as one which leaves to each of the parties concerned all those portions of the continental shelf that are nearer to a point on its own coast than they are to any point on the coast of the other party. An equidistance line may consist either of a "median" line between "opposite" States, or of a "lateral" line between "adjacent" States. In certain geographical configurations of which the Parties furnished examples, a given equidistance line may partake in varying degree of the nature both of a median and of a lateral line. There exists nevertheless a distinction to be drawn between the two, which will be mentioned in its place.

7. The further negotiations between the Parties for the prolongation of the partial boundaries broke down mainly because Denmark and the Netherlands respectively wished this prolongation also to be effected on the basis of the equidistance principle,—and this would have resulted in the dotted lines B-E and D-E, shown on Map 3; whereas the Federal Republic considered that such an outcome would be inequitable because it would unduly curtail what the Republic believed should be its proper share of continental shelf area, on the basis of proportionality to the length of its North Sea coastline. It will be observed that neither of the lines in question, taken by itself, would produce this effect, but only both of them together—an element regarded by Denmark and the Netherlands as irrelevant to what they viewed as being two separate and self-contained delimitations, each of which should be carried out without reference to the other.

8. The reason for the result that would be produced by the two lines B-E and D-E, taken conjointly, is that in the case of a concave or recessing coast such as that of the Federal Republic on the North Sea, the effect of the use of the equidistance method is to pull the line of the boundary inwards, in the direction of the concavity. Consequently, where two such lines are drawn at different points on a concave coast, they will, if the curvature is pronounced, inevitably meet at a relatively short distance from the coast, thus causing the continental shelf area they enclose, to take the form approximately of a triangle with its apex to seaward and, as it was put on behalf of the Federal Republic, "cutting off" the coastal State from the further areas of the continental shelf outside of and beyond this triangle. The effect of concavity could of course equally be produced for a country with a straight coastline if the coasts of adjacent countries protruded immediately on either side of it. In contrast to this, the effect of coastal projections, or of convex or outwardly curving coasts such as are, to a moderate extent, those of Denmark and the Netherlands, is to cause boundary lines drawn on an equidistance basis to leave the

6. Dans les accords susmentionnés de décembre 1964 et juin 1965, les limites partielles représentées sur la carte par les lignes A-B et C-D avaient été tracées, selon les indications données à la Cour par les Parties, essentiellement par application du principe de l'équidistance — cette expression étant employée pour désigner le concept abstrait d'équidistance. La ligne construite suivant ce principe, ou « ligne d'équidistance », peut être définie comme celle qui attribue à chacune des parties intéressées toutes les portions du plateau continental plus proches d'un point de sa côte que de tout point situé sur la côte de l'autre partie. La ligne d'équidistance peut être soit une ligne « médiane » entre Etats « se faisant face », soit une ligne « latérale » entre Etats « limitrophes ». Dans certaines configurations géographiques dont les Parties ont fourni des exemples, la ligne d'équidistance peut revêtir à des degrés divers le double caractère d'une ligne médiane et d'une ligne latérale. Une distinction existe néanmoins entre ces deux types de lignes, ainsi qu'il sera indiqué par la suite.

7. Les négociations reprises entre les Parties en vue de prolonger les limites partielles ont échoué principalement parce que le Danemark et les Pays-Bas souhaitaient que le prolongement s'effectuât aussi d'après le principe de l'équidistance, ce qui aboutissait à un tracé correspondant aux lignes pointillées B-E et D-E de la carte 3; or la République fédérale jugeait ce résultat inéquitable parce qu'il réduisait exagérément ce qu'elle estimait devoir être sa juste part de plateau continental en proportion de la longueur de son littoral sur la mer du Nord. Il est à noter que ce résultat n'était pas attribuable à l'une ou l'autre des lignes prise isolément, mais à l'effet combiné des deux lignes prises ensemble, effet que le Danemark et les Pays-Bas considéraient comme sans pertinence, s'agissant à leur avis de deux délimitations distinctes et autonomes dont chacune devait être effectuée sans qu'il soit tenu compte de l'autre.

8. L'effet combiné des deux lignes B-E et D-E s'explique comme suit. Dans le cas d'une côte concave ou rentrante comme celle de la République fédérale sur la mer du Nord, l'application de la méthode de l'équidistance tend à infléchir les lignes de délimitation vers la concavité. Par suite, quand deux lignes d'équidistance sont tracées à partir d'une côte très concave, elles se rencontrent inévitablement à une distance relativement faible de la côte; la zone de plateau continental qu'elles encadrent prend donc la forme d'une sorte de triangle au sommet dirigé vers le large, ce qui, pour reprendre le terme de la République fédérale, « ampute » l'Etat riverain des zones de plateau continental situées en dehors du triangle. Il est évident que le même effet de concavité peut se produire si un Etat ayant une côte droite est encadré par deux Etats dont les côtes les plus proches font saillie par rapport à la sienne. A l'opposé, si la côte d'un Etat présente des saillants ou a une configuration convexe, ce qui est dans une certaine mesure le cas des côtes du Danemark et des Pays-Bas, les lignes de délimitation tracées d'après la méthode de l'équidistance s'écartent l'une de l'autre, de sorte que la zone de plateau continental coast on divergent courses, thus having a widening tendency on the area of continental shelf off that coast. These two distinct effects, which are shown in sketches I-III to be found on page 16, are directly attributable to the use of the equidistance method of delimiting continental shelf boundaries off recessing or projecting coasts. It goes without saying that on these types of coasts the equidistance method produces exactly similar effects in the delimitation of the lateral boundaries of the territorial sea of the States concerned. However, owing to the very close proximity of such waters to the coasts concerned, these effects are much less marked and may be very slight,—and there are other aspects involved, which will be considered in their place. It will suffice to mention here that, for instance, a deviation from a line drawn perpendicular to the general direction of the coast, of only 5 kilometres, at a distance of about 5 kilometres from that coast, will grow into one of over 30 at a distance of over 100 kilometres.

9. After the negotiations, separately held between the Federal Republic and the other two Parties respectively, had in each case, for the reasons given in the two preceding paragraphs, failed to result in any agreement about the delimitation of the boundary extending beyond the partial one already agreed, tripartite talks between all the Parties took place in The Hague in February-March 1966, in Bonn in May and again in Copenhagen in August. These also proving fruitless, it was then decided to submit the matter to the Court. In the meantime the Governments of Denmark and the Netherlands had, by means of the agreement of 31 March 1966, already referred to (paragraph 5), proceeded to a delimitation as between themselves of the continental shelf areas lying between the apex of the triangle notionally ascribed by them to the Federal Republic (point E on Map 3) and the median line already drawn in the North Sea, by means of a boundary drawn on equidistance principles, meeting that line at the point marked F on Map 3. On 25 May 1966, the Government of the Federal Republic, taking the view that this delimitation was res inter alios acta, notified the Governments of Denmark and the Netherlands, by means of an aide-mémoire, that the agreement thus concluded could not “have any effect on the question of the delimitation of the German-Netherlands or the German-Danish parts of the continental shelf in the North Sea”.

10. In pursuance of the tripartite arrangements that had been made at Bonn and Copenhagen, as described in the preceding paragraph, Special Agreements for the submission to the Court of the differences involved were initialled in August 1966 and signed on 2 February 1967. By a tripartite Protocol signed the same day it was provided (a) that the Government of the Kingdom of the Netherlands would notify the two Special Agreements to the Court, in accordance with Article 40, paragraph 1, of the Court's Statute, together with the text of the Protocol itself; (b) that after such notification, the Parties would ask the Court to join the two cases; and (c) that for the purpose of the appointment devant cette côte tend à aller en s'élargissant. Ces deux effets distincts, représentés sur les croquis I à III (page 16), sont directement imputables à l'application de la méthode de l'équidistance lorsque le plateau continental à délimiter s'étend devant une côte rentrante ou saillante. Il va sans dire que la méthode de l'équidistance a exactement les mêmes effets lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer devant le même genre de côte les limites latérales de la mer territoriale des Etats intéressés. Etant donné cependant que les eaux territoriales sont à proximité immédiate de la terre, l'effet est beaucoup moins marqué, voire très faible, et d'autres éléments entrent en jeu, qui seront examinés en temps utile. Il suffira pour le moment d'observer que par exemple un écart, par rapport à une ligne tracée perpendiculairement à la direction générale de la côte, qui ne serait que de cinq kilomètres à une distance de cinq kilomètres environ de la côte dépasserait trente kilomètres à plus de cent kilomètres.

9. Pour les raisons indiquées aux deux paragraphes précédents, les négociations menées séparément entre la République fédérale et chacune des deux autres Parties n'ont pu aboutir à aucun accord sur la fixation de limites au-delà des lignes de délimitation partielle déjà convenues. Des pourparlers tripartites se sont ensuite tenus en 1966, à La Haye en février-mars puis à Bonn en mai et à Copenhague en août. Ces pourparlers s'étant également révélés infructueux, il a été décidé de soumettre le problème à la Cour. Entre-temps, par l'accord du 31 mars 1966 déjà mentionné au paragraphe 5, les Gouvernements du Danemark et des Pays-Bas avaient procédé à une délimitation, entre leurs deux pays, des zones de plateau continental comprises entre le sommet du triangle qu'ils attribuaient théoriquement à la République fédérale (point E de la carte 3) et la ligne médiane qui avait déjà été tracée dans la mer du Nord; pour ce faire, ils avaient tracé suivant le principe de l'équidistance une limite rencontrant la ligne médiane au point F de la carte 3. Le 25 mai 1966, estimant que cette délimitation était res inter alios acta, le Gouverneur de la République fédérale a adressé aux Gouvernements du Danemark et des Pays-Bas un aide-mémoire par lequel il leur notifiait que l'accord ainsi conclu ne saurait «en rien affecter la question de la délimitation des parties germano-néerlandaise ou germano-danoise du plateau continental de la mer de Nord».

10. A la suite de la décision prise à Bonn et à Copenhague par les trois Etats et évoquée au paragraphe précédent, des compromis soumettant à la Cour les divergences entre les Parties ont été paraphés en août 1966 et signés le 2 février 1967. Un protocole tripartite signé le même jour prévoyait: a) que le Gouvernement du Royaume des Pays-Bas notifierait les deux compromis à la Cour, conformément à l'article 40, paragraphe 1, du Statut de la Cour, en même temps que le texte du protocole lui-même; b) qu'une fois cette notification faite les Parties demanderaient à la Cour de joindre les deux instances; c) qu'aux fins de la désignation d'un juge ad hoc les Royaumes du Danemark et des of a judge ad hoc, the Kingdoms of Denmark and the Netherlands should be considered as being in the same interest within the meaning of Article 31, paragraph 5, of the Court's Statute. Following upon these communications, duly made to it in the implementation of the Protocol, the Court, by an Order dated 26 April 1968, declared Denmark and the Netherlands to be in the same interest, and joined the proceedings in the two cases.

11. Although the proceedings have thus been joined, the cases themselves remain separate, at least in the sense that they relate to different areas of the North Sea continental shelf, and that there is no a priori reason why the Court must reach identical conclusions in regard to them,—if for instance geographical features present in the one case were not present in the other. At the same time, the legal arguments presented on behalf of Denmark and the Netherlands, both before and since the joinder, have been substantially identical, apart from certain matters of detail, and have been presented either in common or in close co-operation. To this extent therefore, the two cases may be treated as one; and it must be noted that although two separate delimitations are in question, they involve—indeed actually give rise to—a single situation. The fact that the question of either of these delimitations might have arisen and called for settlement separately in point of time, does not alter the character of the problem with which the Court is actually faced, having regard to the manner in which the Parties themselves have brought the matter before it, as described in the two preceding paragraphs.

12. In conclusion as to the facts, it should be noted that the Federal Republic has formally reserved its position, not only in regard to the Danish-Netherlands delimitation of the line E-F (Map 3), as noted in paragraph 9, but also in regard to the delimitations United Kingdom/Denmark and United Kingdom/Netherlands mentioned in paragraph 4. In both the latter cases the Government of the Federal Republic pointed out to all the Governments concerned that the question of the lateral delimitation of the continental shelf in the North Sea between the Federal Republic and the Kingdoms of Denmark and the Netherlands was still outstanding and could not be prejudiced by the agreements concluded between those two countries and the United Kingdom.

13. Such are the events and geographical facts in the light of which the Court has to determine what principles and rules of international law are applicable to the delimitation of the areas of continental shelf involved. On this question the Parties have taken up fundamentally different positions. On behalf of the Kingdoms of Denmark and the Netherlands it is contended that the whole matter is governed by a

Pays-Bas seraient considérés comme faisant cause commune au sens de l'article 31, paragraphe 5, du Statut de la Cour. Ces communications lui ayant été dûment faites en exécution du protocole, la Cour a constaté, par ordonnance du 26 avril 1968, que le Danemark et les Pays-Bas faisaient cause commune et elle a joint les instances dans les deux affaires.

11. Malgré la jonction des instances, les affaires restent distinctes en ceci au moins qu'elles ont trait à des zones différentes du plateau continental de la mer du Nord et qu'il n'y a pas de raison a priori que la Cour parvienne à leur égard à des conclusions identiques: il se pourrait, par exemple, que certaines particularités géographiques existent dans l'un des cas, mais non dans l'autre. Il reste qu'avant comme après la jonction des instances les arguments juridiques du Danemark et des Pays-Bas ont été en substance les mêmes, sauf sur certains points de détail, et qu'ils ont été présentés soit en commun, soit en étroite coopération. Dans cette mesure les deux affaires peuvent donc être traitées comme une seule et l'on doit constater que, si deux délimitations distinctes sont en cause, elles concernent — on peut même dire qu'elles créent — une situation unique. S'il est vrai que les questions relatives à ces deux délimitations auraient pu se présenter et être réglées à des moments différents, cela ne modifie en rien la nature du problème qui se pose en fait à la Cour, vu la façon dont les Parties elles-mêmes l'ont saisie (voir les deux paragraphes précédents).

12. Pour achever l'exposé des faits, il convient de rappeler que la République fédérale a formellement réservé sa position non seulement à l'égard de la délimitation dano-néerlandaise suivant la ligne E-F de la carte 3 comme il a été indiqué au paragraphe 9, mais également au sujet des délimitations entre le Royaume-Uni et le Danemark et entre le Royaume-Uni et les Pays-Bas mentionnées au paragraphe 4. Dans ces deux derniers cas, le Gouvernement de la République fédérale a attiré l'attention de tous les gouvernements intéressés sur le fait que la question de la délimitation latérale du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre la République fédérale et les Royaumes du Danemark et des Pays-Bas n'était pas encore réglée et que les accords conclus entre ces deux pays et le Royaume-Uni ne pouvaient en préjuger la solution.

mandatory rule of law which, reflecting the language of Article 6 of the Convention on the Continental Shelf concluded at Geneva on 29 April 1958, was designated by them as the “equidistance-special circumstances” rule. According to this contention, “equidistance” is not merely a method of the cartographical construction of a boundary line, but the essential element in a rule of law which may be stated as follows,—namely that in the absence of agreement by the Parties to employ another method or to proceed to a delimitation on an ad hoc basis, all continental shelf boundaries must be drawn by means of an equidistance line, unless, or except to the extent to which, “special circumstances” are recognized to exist,—an equidistance line being, it will be recalled, a line every point on which is the same distance away from whatever point is nearest to it on the coast of each of the countries concerned—or rather, strictly, on the baseline of the territorial sea along that coast. As regards what constitutes “special circumstances”, all that need be said at this stage is that according to the view put forward on behalf of Denmark and the Netherlands, the configuration of the German North Sea coast, its recessive character, and the fact that it makes nearly a right-angled bend in mid-course, would not of itself constitute, for either of the two boundary lines concerned, a special circumstance calling for or warranting a departure from the equidistance method of delimitation: only the presence of some special feature, minor in itself—such as an islet or small protuberance—but so placed as to produce a disproportionately distorting effect on an otherwise acceptable boundary line would, so it was claimed, possess this character.

14. These various contentions, together with the view that a rule of equidistance-special circumstances is binding on the Federal Republic, are founded by Denmark and the Netherlands partly on the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf already mentioned (preceding paragraph), and partly on general considerations of law relating to the continental shelf, lying outside this Convention. Similar considerations are equally put forward to found the contention that the delimitation on an equidistance basis of the line E-F (Map 3) by the Netherlands-Danish agreement of 31 March 1966 (paragraph 5 above) is valid erga omnes, and must be respected by the Federal Republic unless it can demonstrate the existence of juridically relevant “special circumstances”.

15. The Federal Republic, for its part, while recognizing the utility of equidistance as a method of delimitation, and that this method can in many cases be employed appropriately and with advantage, denies its obligatory character for States not parties to the Geneva Convention, and contends that the correct rule to be applied, at any rate in such circumstances as those of the North Sea, is one according to which each of the States concerned should have a “just and equitable share” of the available continental shelf, in proportion to the length of its coastline or sea-frontage. It was also contended on behalf of the Federal Republic toire qu'ils appellent règle «équidistance-circonstances spéciales», en s'inspirant des termes de l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève du 29 avril 1958 sur le plateau continental. Selon cette thèse, l'équidistance n'est pas simplement une méthode de construction cartographique, mais l'élément essentiel d'une règle de droit qui peut s'énoncer ainsi: à défaut d'un accord entre les parties en vue d'employer une autre méthode ou de se fonder sur les éléments de fait de l'espèce, toute délimitation de plateau continental doit suivre la ligne d'équidistance, sauf dans la mesure où l'existence de «circonstances spéciales» est reconnue — la ligne d'équidistance étant, comme l'on sait, une ligne dont chaque point est à égale distance du point le plus proche de la côte de chacun des pays intéressés ou, plus précisément, de la ligne de base de la mer territoriale bordant cette côte. Quant à ce qu'il faut entendre par «circonstances spéciales», il suffira de dire pour le moment que, d'après le Danemark et les Pays-Bas, la concavité de la côte allemande de la mer du Nord, qui change de direction en son milieu presque à angle droit, ne constitue en soi, ni pour l'une ni pour l'autre des deux lignes de délimitation en cause, une circonstance spéciale appelant ou justifiant une dérogation à la méthode de délimitation fondée sur l'équidistance. A leur avis, seule pourrait constituer une telle circonstance spéciale une particularité mineure en soi, comme un îlot ou un léger saillant, mais produisant sur une limite par ailleurs acceptable un effet de déviation disproportionné.

14. C'est en partie sur la Convention de Genève de 1958 sur le plateau continental, mentionnée au paragraphe précédent, et en partie sur des considérations juridiques de caractère général ayant trait au plateau continental mais extérieures à la Convention que le Danemark et les Pays-Bas font reposer ces diverses thèses et notamment leur opinion selon laquelle une règle équidistance-circonstances spéciales lierait la République fédérale. Ils se fondent sur des considérations analogues pour dire que la délimitation opérée d'après l'équidistance, suivant la ligne E-F de la carte 3, par l'accord du 31 mars 1966 entre les Pays-Bas et le Danemark (voir paragraphe 5 ci-dessus) est valable erga omnes et doit être respectée par la République fédérale, à moins que celle-ci puisse démontrer l'existence de «circonstances spéciales» juridiquement admissibles.

15. Sans méconnaître l'utilité de l'équidistance comme méthode de délimitation ni le fait que cette méthode puisse être appropriée et présenter des avantages dans de nombreux cas, la République fédérale lui refuse pour sa part tout caractère obligatoire à l'égard des Etats qui ne sont pas parties à la Convention de Genève. Elle affirme que la véritable règle à appliquer, au moins dans les circonstances propres à la mer du Nord, est la règle suivant laquelle chacun des Etats en cause devrait obtenir une «part juste et équitable» du plateau continental disponible, proportionnellement à la longueur de son littoral ou de son front de mer. Elle that in a sea shaped as is the North Sea, the whole bed of which, except for the Norwegian Trough, consists of continental shelf at a depth of less than 200 metres, and where the situation of the circumjacent States causes a natural convergence of their respective continental shelf areas, towards a central point situated on the median line of the whole seabed—or at any rate in those localities where this is the case—each of the States concerned is entitled to a continental shelf area extending up to this central point (in effect a sector), or at least extending to the median line at some point or other. In this way the “cut-off” effect, of which the Federal Republic complains, caused, as explained in paragraph 8, by the drawing of equidistance lines at the two ends of an inward curving or recessed coast, would be avoided. As a means of giving effect to these ideas, the Federal Republic proposed the method of the “coastal front”, or façade, constituted by a straight baseline joining these ends, upon which the necessary geometrical constructions would be erected.

16. Alternatively, the Federal Republic claimed that if, contrary to its main contention, the equidistance method was held to be applicable, then the configuration of the German North Sea coast constituted a “special circumstance” such as to justify a departure from that method of delimitation in this particular case.

17. In putting forward these contentions, it was stressed on behalf of the Federal Republic that the claim for a just and equitable share did not in any way involve asking the Court to give a decision ex aequo et bono (which, having regard to the terms of paragraph 2 of Article 38 of the Court’s Statute, would not be possible without the consent of the Parties),—for the principle of the just and equitable share was one of the recognized general principles of law which, by virtue of paragraph 1 (c) of the same Article, the Court was entitled to apply as a matter of the justitia distributiva which entered into all legal systems. It appeared, moreover, that whatever its underlying motivation, the claim of the Federal Republic was, at least ostensibly, to a just and equitable share of the space involved, rather than to a share of the natural resources as such, mineral or other, to be found in it, the location of which could not in any case be fully ascertained at present. On the subject of location the Court has in fact received some, though not complete information, but has not thought it necessary to pursue the matter, since the question of natural resources is less one of delimitation than of eventual exploitation.

18. It will be convenient to consider first the contentions put forward on behalf of the Federal Republic. The Court does not feel able to accept them—at least in the particular form they have taken. It considers soutient également qu'étant donné la forme de la mer du Nord, dont le lit est entièrement constitué, à l'exception de la fosse norvégienne, par un plateau continental à une profondeur de moins de deux cents mètres et où la situation des Etats circonvoisins a pour conséquence naturelle de faire converger leurs zones de plateau continental vers un point central situé sur la ligne médiane divisant tout le lit de la mer, chacun des Etats intéressés peut, au moins dans la partie où cette convergence existe, prétendre à ce que sa zone aille jusqu'à ce point central (formant ainsi un secteur) ou atteigne en tout cas un point quelconque de la ligne médiane. Ainsi disparaîtrait l'effet d'«amputation» dont se plaint la République fédérale et qui résulte, comme on l'a vu au paragraphe 8, du tracé de lignes d'équidistance aux deux extrémités d'une côte concave ou rentrante. Pour mettre ces idées en pratique, la République fédérale propose la méthode de la «façade maritime», qui serait constituée par la ligne de base droite réunissant les extrémités de la côte et à partir de laquelle s'effectueraient les constructions géométriques nécessaires.

16. Subsidiairement la République fédérale soutient que, dans le cas où, contrairement à sa thèse principale, la méthode de l'équidistance serait considérée comme applicable, la configuration de la côte allemande de la mer du Nord constituerait une circonstance spéciale justifiant que l'on s'écarte de cette méthode en l'espèce.

17. Dans l'exposé de ces thèses, la République fédérale a souligné qu'en revendiquant une part juste et équitable elle n'invitait nullement la Cour à statuer ex aequo et bono, ce qui, vu l'article 38, paragraphe 2, du Statut de la Cour, ne serait possible qu'avec l'assentiment des Parties; elle considère en effet que le principe de la part juste et équitable est l'un des principes généraux de droit reconnus qu'en vertu du paragraphe 1 c) du même article de son Statut la Cour est habilitée à appliquer au titre de la justice distributive, partie intégrante de tous les systèmes juridiques. Il semble en outre que la demande de la République fédérale, quels qu'en soient les motifs réels, porte, du moins dans sa présentation, sur une part juste et équitable de l'espace en cause plutôt que sur une part des ressources minérales ou autres ressources naturelles que l'on pourrait y trouver et dont l'emplacement ne saurait de toute manière être exactement déterminé pour le moment. La Cour a obtenu certains renseignements, encore qu'incomplets, sur cette dernière question mais elle n'a pas jugé nécessaire d'insister, car cela concerne l'exploitation éventuelle des ressources du plateau continental plus encore que sa délimitation.

18. Pour la commodité de l'exposé, il est préférable d'examiner en premier lieu les thèses présentées au nom de la République fédérale. La Cour n'estime pas pouvoir les accepter, du moins sous la forme qui that, having regard both to the language of the Special Agreements and to more general considerations of law relating to the régime of the continental shelf, its task in the present proceedings relates essentially to the delimitation and not the apportionment of the areas concerned, or their division into converging sectors. Delimitation is a process which involves establishing the boundaries of an area already, in principle, appertaining to the coastal State and not the determination de novo of such an area. Delimitation in an equitable manner is one thing, but not the same thing as awarding a just and equitable share of a previously undelimited area, even though in a number of cases the results may be comparable, or even identical.

19. More important is the fact that the doctrine of the just and equitable share appears to be wholly at variance with what the Court entertains no doubt is the most fundamental of all the rules of law relating to the continental shelf, enshrined in Article 2 of the 1958 Geneva Convention, though quite independent of it,—namely that the rights of the coastal State in respect of the area of continental shelf that constitutes a natural prolongation of its land territory into and under the sea exist ipso facto and ab initio, by virtue of its sovereignty over the land, and as an extension of it in an exercise of sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring the seabed and exploiting its natural resources. In short, there is here an inherent right. In order to exercise it, no special legal process has to be gone through, nor have any special legal acts to be performed. Its existence can be declared (and many States have done this) but does not need to be constituted. Furthermore, the right does not depend on its being exercised. To echo the language of the Geneva Convention, it is “exclusive” in the sense that if the coastal State does not choose to explore or exploit the areas of shelf appertaining to it, that is its own affair, but no one else may do so without its express consent.

20. It follows that even in such a situation as that of the North Sea, the notion of apportioning an as yet undelimited area, considered as a whole (which underlies the doctrine of the just and equitable share), is quite foreign to, and inconsistent with, the basic concept of continental shelf entitlement, according to which the process of delimitation is essentially one of drawing a boundary line between areas which already appertain to one or other of the States affected. The delimitation itself must indeed be equitably effected, but it cannot have as its object the awarding of an equitable share, or indeed of a share, as such, at all,—for the fundamental concept involved does not admit of there being anything undivided to share out. Evidently any dispute about boundaries must involve that there is a disputed marginal or fringe area, to which both parties are laying claim, so that any delimitation of it which does not leave it wholly to one of the parties will in practice divide it between them in certain shares, or operate as if such a division had been made.

19. Ce qui est plus important encore, c'est que la doctrine de la part juste et équitable semble s'écarter totalement de la règle qui constitue sans aucun doute possible pour la Cour la plus fondamentale de toutes les règles de droit relatives au plateau continental et qui est consacrée par l'article 2 de la Convention de Genève de 1958, bien qu'elle en soit tout à fait indépendante: les droits de l'Etat riverain concernant la zone de plateau continental qui constitue un prolongement naturel de son territoire sous la mer existent ipso facto et ab initio en vertu de la souveraineté de l'Etat sur ce territoire et par une extension de cette souveraineté sous la forme de l'exercice de droits souverains aux fins de l'exploration du lit de la mer et de l'exploitation de ses ressources naturelles. Il y a là un droit inhérent. Point n'est besoin pour l'exercer de suivre un processus juridique particulier ni d'accomplir des actes juridiques spéciaux. Son existence peut être constatée, comme cela a été fait par de nombreux Etats, mais elle ne suppose aucun acte constitutif. Qui plus est, ce droit est indépendant de son exercice effectif. Pour reprendre le terme de la Convention de Genève, il est «exclusif» en ce sens que, si un Etat riverain choisit de ne pas explorer ou de ne pas exploiter les zones de plateau continental lui revenant, cela ne concerne que lui et nul ne peut le faire sans son consentement exprès

20. Il en découle que, même dans la situation de la mer du Nord, l'idée de répartir une zone non encore délimitée considérée comme un tout, idée sous-jacente à la doctrine de la part juste et équitable, est absolument étrangère et opposée à la conception fondamentale du régime du plateau continental, suivant laquelle l'opération de délimitation consiste essentiellement à tracer une ligne de démarcation entre des zones relevant déjà de l'un ou de l'autre des Etats intéressés. Certes la délimitation doit s'effectuer équitablement, mais elle ne saurait avoir pour objet d'attribuer une part équitable ni même simplement une part, car la conception fondamentale en la matière exclut qu'il y ait quoi que ce soit d'indivis à partager. Il est évident qu'un différend sur des limites implique nécessairement l'existence d'une zone marginale litigieuse réclamée par les deux parties et que toute délimitation n'attribuant pas entièrement cette zone à l'une des parties aboutit en pratique à la partager ou à faire comme s'il y avait partage. Mais cela ne signifie pas qu'il y ait répartition de

But this does not mean that there has been an apportionment of something that previously consisted of an integral, still less an undivided whole.

21. The Court will now turn to the contentions advanced on behalf of Denmark and the Netherlands. Their general character has already been indicated in paragraphs 13 and 14: the most convenient way of dealing with them will be on the basis of the following question—namely, does the equidistance-special circumstances principle constitute a mandatory rule, either on a conventional or on a customary international law basis, in such a way as to govern any delimitation of the North Sea continental shelf areas between the Federal Republic and the Kingdoms of Denmark and the Netherlands respectively? Another and shorter way of formulating the question would be to ask whether, in any delimitation of these areas, the Federal Republic is under a legal obligation to accept the application of the equidistance-special circumstances principle.

22. Particular attention is directed to the use, in the foregoing formulations, of the terms “mandatory” and “obligation”. It has never been doubted that the equidistance method of delimitation is a very convenient one, the use of which is indicated in a considerable number of cases. It constitutes a method capable of being employed in almost all circumstances, however singular the results might sometimes be, and has the virtue that if necessary,—if for instance, the Parties are unable to enter into negotiations,—any cartographer can de facto trace such a boundary on the appropriate maps and charts, and those traced by competent cartographers will for all practical purposes agree.

23. In short, it would probably be true to say that no other method of delimitation has the same combination of practical convenience and certainty of application. Yet these factors do not suffice of themselves to convert what is a method into a rule of law, making the acceptance of the results of using that method obligatory in all cases in which the parties do not agree otherwise, or in which “special circumstances” cannot be shown to exist. Juridically, if there is such a rule, it must draw its legal force from other factors than the existence of these advantages, important though they may be. It should also be noticed that the counterpart of this conclusion is no less valid, and that the practical advantages of the equidistance method would continue to exist whether its employment were obligatory or not.

24. It would however be ignoring realities if it were not noted at the same time that the use of this method, partly for the reasons given in paragraph 8 above and partly for reasons that are best appreciated by reference to the many maps and diagrams furnished by both sides in the course of the written and oral proceedings, can under certain circumstances produce results that appear on the face of them to be extraordinary, unnatural or unreasonable. It is basically this fact which unquelque chose qui constituait auparavant un tout, et encore moins de quelque chose d'indivis.

21. La Cour en vient maintenant aux thèses avancées au nom du Danemark et des Pays-Bas. Leur caractère général a déjà été indiqué aux paragraphes 13 et 14; pour en faciliter l'examen, on peut partir de la question suivante: le principe équidistance-circonstances spéciales constitue-t-il, en vertu d'une convention ou du droit international coutumier, une règle obligatoire applicable à toute délimitation du plateau continental de la mer du Nord entre la République fédérale et les Royaumes du Danemark et des Pays-Bas respectivement? En bref la République fédérale a-t-elle l'obligation juridique d'accepter en la matière l'application du principe équidistance-circonstances spéciales?

22. Il convient de noter l'emploi des termes obligatoire et obligation dans les formules qui précèdent. On n'a jamais douté que la méthode de délimitation fondée sur l'équidistance soit une méthode extrêmement pratique dont l'emploi est indiqué dans un très grand nombre de cas. Elle peut être utilisée dans presque toutes les circonstances, pour singulier que soit parfois le résultat; elle présente l'avantage qu'en cas de besoin, par exemple si une raison quelconque empêche les parties d'entreprendre des négociations, tout cartographe peut tracer sur la carte une ligne d'équidistance de facto et que les lignes dessinées par des cartographes qualifiés coïncideront pratiquement.

23. En somme il est probablement exact qu'aucune autre méthode de délimitation ne combine au même degré les avantages de la commodité pratique et de la certitude dans l'application. Toutefois cela ne suffit pas à transformer une méthode en règle de droit et à rendre obligatoire l'acceptation de ses résultats chaque fois que les parties ne se sont pas mises d'accord sur d'autres dispositions ou que l'existence de «circonstances spéciales» ne peut être établie. Juridiquement, si une telle règle existe, sa valeur en droit doit tenir à autre chose qu'à ces avantages, si importants soient-ils. La réciproque n'est pas moins vraie: que l'application de la méthode de l'équidistance soit obligatoire ou non, ses avantages pratiques resteront les mêmes.

24. Ce serait cependant méconnaître les réalités que de ne pas noter en même temps que, pour les raisons indiquées au paragraphe 8 ci-dessus et pour d'autres raisons qui apparaissent clairement si l'on se reporte aux cartes et croquis fournis en grand nombre par les Parties au cours des procédures écrite et orale, l'emploi de cette méthode peut dans certains cas aboutir à des résultats de prime abord extraordinaires, anormaux ou déraisonnables. C'est ce fait, fondamentalement, qui est à derlies the present proceedings. The plea that, however this may be, the results can never be inequitable, because the equidistance principle is by definition an equitable principle of delimitation, involves a postulate that clearly begs the whole question at issue.

25. The Court now turns to the legal position regarding the equidistance method. The first question to be considered is whether the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf is binding for all the Parties in this case—that is to say whether, as contended by Denmark and the Netherlands, the use of this method is rendered obligatory for the present delimitations by virtue of the delimitations provision (Article 6) of that instrument, according to the conditions laid down in it. Clearly, if this is so, then the provisions of the Convention will prevail in the relations between the Parties, and would take precedence of any rules having a more general character, or derived from another source. On that basis the Court's reply to the question put to it in the Special Agreements would necessarily be to the effect that as between the Parties the relevant provisions of the Convention represented the applicable rules of law—that is to say constituted the law for the Parties—and its sole remaining task would be to interpret those provisions, in so far as their meaning was disputed or appeared to be uncertain, and to apply them to the particular circumstances involved.

26. The relevant provisions of Article 6 of the Geneva Convention, paragraph 2 of which Denmark and the Netherlands contend not only to be applicable as a conventional rule, but also to represent the accepted rule of general international law on the subject of continental shelf delimitation, as it exists independently of the Convention, read as follows:

“1. Where the same continental shelf is adjacent to the territories of two or more States whose coasts are opposite each other, the boundary of the continental shelf appertaining to such States shall be determined by agreement between them. In the absence of agreement, and unless another boundary line is justified by special circumstances, the boundary is the median line, every point of which is equidistant from the nearest point of the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of each State is measured.

2. Where the same continental shelf is adjacent to the territories of two adjacent States, the boundary of the continental shelf shall be determined by agreement between them. In the absence of agreement, and unless another boundary line is justified by special circumstances, the boundary shall be determined by application of the principle of equidistance from the nearest points of the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea of each State is measured.”

l'origine de la présente instance. Affirmer que de toute façon les résultats ne peuvent jamais être inéquitables parce que l'équidistance est par définition un principe de délimitation équitable revient de toute évidence à une pétition de principe.

25. La Cour étudiera à présent quelle est la situation juridique en ce qui concerne la méthode de l'équidistance. Il convient d'examiner d'abord si la Convention de Genève de 1958 sur le plateau continental lie toutes les Parties à la présente affaire, c'est-à-dire si, comme le Danemark et les Pays-Bas le soutiennent, l'article 6 de cette Convention relatif à la délimitation rend l'application de la méthode de l'équidistance obligatoire en l'espèce, dans les conditions qu'il prévoit. Si tel était le cas, les dispositions de la Convention régiraient manifestement les relations entre les Parties et prendraient le pas sur toute règle d'un caractère plus général ou découlant d'une autre source. A la question posée dans les compromis, la Cour devrait alors nécessairement répondre que les dispositions pertinentes de la Convention représentent les règles de droit applicables entre les Parties, autrement dit qu'elles constituent le droit pour les Parties, et il ne lui resterait plus qu'à interpréter ces dispositions, dans la mesure où leur sens serait contesté ou paraîtrait incertain, et à les appliquer aux faits de l'espèce.

26. Les dispositions pertinentes de l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève, dont le paragraphe 2, selon le Danemark et les Pays-Bas, ne serait pas seulement applicable en tant que règle conventionnelle mais représenterait en outre la règle consacrée par le droit international général en matière de délimitation du plateau continental, indépendamment de la Convention, se lisent comme suit:

«1. Dans le cas où un même plateau continental est adjacent aux territoires de deux ou plusieurs Etats dont les côtes se font face, la délimitation du plateau continental entre ces Etats est déterminée par accord entre ces Etats. A défaut d'accord, et à moins que des circonstances spéciales ne justifient une autre délimitation, celle-ci est constituée par la ligne médiane dont tous les points sont équidistants des points les plus proches des lignes de base à partir desquelles est mesurée la largeur de la mer territoriale de chacun de ces Etats.

The Convention received 46 signatures and, up-to-date, there have been 39 ratifications or accessions. It came into force on 10 June 1964, having received the 22 ratifications or accessions required for that purpose (Article 11), and was therefore in force at the time when the various delimitations of continental shelf boundaries described earlier (paragraphs 1 and 5) took place between the Parties. But, under the formal provisions of the Convention, it is in force for any individual State only in so far as, having signed it within the time-limit provided for that purpose, that State has also subsequently ratified it; or, not having signed within that time-limit, has subsequently acceded to the Convention. Denmark and the Netherlands have both signed and ratified the Convention, and are parties to it, the former since 10 June 1964, the latter since 20 March 1966. The Federal Republic was one of the signatories of the Convention, but has never ratified it, and is consequently not a party.

27. It is admitted on behalf of Denmark and the Netherlands that in these circumstances the Convention cannot, as such, be binding on the Federal Republic, in the sense of the Republic being contractually bound by it. But it is contended that the Convention, or the régime of the Convention, and in particular of Article 6, has become binding on the Federal Republic in another way,—namely because, by conduct, by public statements and proclamations, and in other ways, the Republic has unilaterally assumed the obligations of the Convention; or has manifested its acceptance of the conventional régime; or has recognized it as being generally applicable to the delimitation of continental shelf areas. It has also been suggested that the Federal Republic had held itself out as so assuming, accepting or recognizing, in such a manner as to cause other States, and in particular Denmark and the Netherlands, to rely on the attitude thus taken up.

28. As regards these contentions, it is clear that only a very definite, very consistent course of conduct on the part of a State in the situation of the Federal Republic could justify the Court in upholding them; and, if this had existed—that is to say if there had been a real intention to manifest acceptance or recognition of the applicability of the conventional régime—then it must be asked why it was that the Federal Republic did not take the obvious step of giving expression to this readiness by simply ratifying the Convention. In principle, when a number of States, including the one whose conduct is invoked, and those invoking it, have drawn up a convention specifically providing for a particular method by which the intention to become bound by the régime of the convention is to be manifested—namely by the carrying out of certain prescribed formalities (ratification, accession), it is not lightly to be presumed that a State which has not carried out these formalities, though at all times fully able and entitled to do so, has nevertheless somehow become bound in another way. Indeed if it were a question not of obligation but of rights,—if, that is to say, a State which, though entitled

La Convention a été signée par quarante-six Etats et elle a reçu à ce jour trente-neuf ratifications ou adhésions. Elle est entrée en vigueur le 10 juin 1964, ayant obtenu les vingt-deux ratifications ou adhésions exigées (article 11); elle était donc en vigueur au moment où les Parties ont effectué les diverses délimitations du plateau continental évoquées aux paragraphes 1 et 5 ci-dessus. Toutefois, selon ses clauses finales, la Convention n'est en vigueur à l'égard d'un Etat que si celui-ci, après l'avoir signée dans les délais prévus, l'a ratifiée ou, sans l'avoir signée dans les délais, y a adhéré ultérieurement. Le Danemark et les Pays-Bas ont signé et ratifié la Convention et y sont parties depuis le 10 juin 1964 et le 20 mars 1966 respectivement. La République fédérale a signé la Convention mais elle ne l'a jamais ratifiée et n'y est donc pas partie.

27. Le Danemark et les Pays-Bas admettent que dans ces conditions la Convention ne saurait en tant que telle être obligatoire pour la République fédérale, c'est-à-dire la lier contractuellement. Ils soutiennent que la Convention, ou le régime de la Convention et de son article 6 en particulier, est néanmoins devenue obligatoire pour la République fédérale d'une autre manière: en raison notamment de son comportement, de ses déclarations publiques et de ses proclamations, la République fédérale aurait assumé unilatéralement les obligations de la Convention, ou manifesté son acceptation du régime conventionnel, ou reconnu ce régime comme généralement applicable en matière de délimitation du plateau continental. Il a été avancé aussi que la République fédérale se serait présentée comme assumant les obligations de la Convention, comme acceptant le régime conventionnel ou comme reconnaissant l'applicabilité de ce régime, d'une façon qui aurait amené d'autres Etats, en particulier le Danemark et les Pays-Bas, à tabler sur cette attitude.

28. Il est clair que la Cour ne serait justifiée à accepter pareilles thèses que dans le cas où le comportement de la République fédérale aurait été absolument net et constant; et même dans cette hypothèse, c'est-à-dire si elle avait eu vraiment l'intention de manifester qu'elle acceptait le régime conventionnel ou en reconnaissait l'applicabilité, on devrait se demander pourquoi la République fédérale n'a pas pris la mesure qui s'imposait, à savoir exprimer sa volonté en ratifiant purement et simplement la Convention. En principe, lorsque plusieurs Etats, y compris celui dont le comportement est invoqué et ceux qui l'invoquent, ont conclu une convention où il est spécifié que l'intention d'être lié par le régime conventionnel doit se manifester d'une manière déterminée, c'est-à-dire par l'accomplissement de certaines formalités prescrites (ratification, adhésion), on ne saurait présumer à la légère qu'un Etat n'ayant pas accompli ces formalités, alors qu'il était à tout moment en mesure et en droit de le faire, n'en est pas moins tenu d'une autre façon. D'ailleurs, s'il s'agissait de droits et non d'obligations, en d'autres termes si un Etat essayait de revendiquer des droits en vertu d'une convention à to do so, had not ratified or acceded, attempted to claim rights under the convention, on the basis of a declared willingness to be bound by it, or of conduct evincing acceptance of the conventional régime, it would simply be told that, not having become a party to the convention it could not claim any rights under it until the professed willingness and acceptance had been manifested in the prescribed form.

29. A further point, not in itself conclusive, but to be noted, is that if the Federal Republic had ratified the Geneva Convention, it could have entered—and could, if it ratified now, enter—a reservation to Article 6, by reason of the faculty to do so conferred by Article 12 of the Convention. This faculty would remain, whatever the previous conduct of the Federal Republic might have been—a fact which at least adds to the difficulties involved by the Danish-Netherlands contention.

30. Having regard to these considerations of principle, it appears to the Court that only the existence of a situation of estoppel could suffice to lend substance to this contention,—that is to say if the Federal Republic were now precluded from denying the applicability of the conventional régime, by reason of past conduct, declarations, etc., which not only clearly and consistently evinced acceptance of that régime, but also had caused Denmark or the Netherlands, in reliance on such conduct, detrimentally to change position or suffer some prejudice. Of this there is no evidence whatever in the present case.

31. In these circumstances it seems to the Court that little useful purpose would be served by passing in review and subjecting to detailed scrutiny the various acts relied on by Denmark and the Netherlands as being indicative of the Federal Republic's acceptance of the régime of Article 6;—for instance that at the Geneva Conference the Federal Republic did not take formal objection to Article 6 and eventually signed the Convention without entering any reservation in respect of that provision; that it at one time announced its intention to ratify the Convention; that in its public declarations concerning its continental shelf rights it appeared to rely on, or at least cited, certain provisions of the Geneva Convention. In this last connection a good deal has been made of the joint Minute signed in Bonn, on 4 August 1964, between the then-negotiating delegations of the Federal Republic and the Netherlands. But this minute made it clear that what the Federal Republic was seeking was an agreed division, rather than a delimitation of the central North Sea continental shelf areas, and the reference it made to Article 6 was specifically to the first sentence of paragraphs 1 and 2 of that Article, which speaks exclusively of delimitation by agreement and not at all of the use of the equidistance method.

32. In the result it appears to the Court that none of the elements invoked is decisive; each is ultimately negative or inconclusive; all are capable of varying interpretations or explanations. It would be one laquelle il n'aurait donné ni sa ratification ni son adhésion alors qu'il était habilité à le faire, et s'il alléguait à cette fin qu'il a proclamé sa volonté d'être lié par la convention ou a manifesté par son comportement son acceptation du régime conventionnel, on lui répondrait simplement que, n'étant pas devenu partie à la convention il ne peut revendiquer aucun droit à ce titre tant qu'il n'a pas exprimé sa volonté ou son acceptation dans les formes prescrites.

29. Un autre point, qui n'est pas en soi décisif, vaut d'être relevé: si la République fédérale avait ratifié la Convention de Genève, elle aurait pu formuler une réserve à l'égard de l'article 6, en usant de la faculté offerte par l'article 12, et elle pourrait encore le faire aujourd'hui si elle ratifiait la Convention. Cette possibilité subsisterait indépendamment du comportement antérieur de la République fédérale, ce qui ne fait qu'ajouter aux difficultés soulevées par la thèse du Danemark et des Pays-Bas.

30. Eu égard à ces considérations de principe, la Cour est d'avis que seule l'existence d'une situation d'estoppel pourrait étayer pareille thèse: il faudrait que la République fédérale ne puisse plus contester l'applicabilité du régime conventionnel, en raison d'un comportement, de déclarations, etc., qui n'auraient pas seulement attesté d'une manière claire et constante son acceptation de ce régime mais auraient également amené le Danemark ou les Pays-Bas, se fondant sur cette attitude, à modifier leur position à leur détriment ou à subir un préjudice quelconque. Rien n'indique qu'il en soit ainsi en l'espèce.

31. Dans ces conditions, il ne semble guère utile à la Cour d'examiner en détail les divers actes de la République fédérale qui, selon le Danemark et les Pays-Bas, traduiraient une acceptation du régime de l'article 6: ainsi, lors de la conférence de Genève, elle n'a pas opposé d'objection formelle à l'article 6 et elle a, pour finir, signé la Convention sans formuler de réserve à l'égard de cet article; elle a annoncé à un certain moment son intention de ratifier la Convention; dans ses déclarations publiques concernant ses droits sur le plateau continental, elle a paru se fonder sur certaines dispositions de la Convention ou elle les a en tout cas citées. A ce sujet on a tiré argument du procès-verbal commun signé à Bonn le 4 août 1964 par les délégations de la République fédérale et des Pays-Bas lors des négociations entre ces deux pays. Mais le texte fait bien ressortir que la République fédérale cherchait un accord sur un partage plutôt que sur une délimitation des zones centrales du plateau continental de la mer du Nord et la mention qu'il fait de l'article 6 vise expressément la première phrase des paragraphes 1 et 2 de cet article, laquelle concerne uniquement la délimitation par voie d'accord et nullement l'emploi de la méthode de l'équidistance.

32. Somme toute, il semble à la Cour qu'aucun des faits invoqués n'est décisif; tous sont en fin de compte négatifs ou non concluants, tous se prêtent à des interprétations ou explications variées. Autre chose thing to infer from the declarations of the Federal Republic an admission accepting the fundamental concept of coastal State rights in respect of the continental shelf: it would be quite another matter to see in this an acceptance of the rules of delimitation contained in the Convention. The declarations of the Federal Republic, taken in the aggregate, might at most justify the view that to begin with, and before becoming fully aware of what the probable effects in the North Sea would be, the Federal Republic was not specifically opposed to the equidistance principle as embodied in Article 6 of the Convention. But from a purely negative conclusion such as this, it would certainly not be possible to draw the positive inference that the Federal Republic, though not a party to the Convention, had accepted the régime of Article 6 in a manner binding upon itself.

33. The dangers of the doctrine here advanced by Denmark and the Netherlands, if it had to be given general application in the international law field, hardly need stressing. Moreover, in the present case, any such inference would immediately be nullified by the fact that, as soon as concrete delimitations of North Sea continental shelf areas began to be carried out, the Federal Republic, as described earlier (paragraphs 9 and 12), at once reserved its position with regard to those delimitations which (effected on an equidistance basis) might be prejudicial to the delimitation of its own continental shelf areas.

34. Since, accordingly, the foregoing considerations must lead the Court to hold that Article 6 of the Geneva Convention is not, as such, applicable to the delimitations involved in the present proceedings, it becomes unnecessary for it to go into certain questions relating to the interpretation or application of that provision which would otherwise arise. One should be mentioned however, namely what is the relationship between the requirement of Article 6 for delimitation by agreement, and the requirements relating to equidistance and special circumstances that are to be applied in "the absence of" such agreement,—i.e., in the absence of agreement on the matter, is there a presumption that the continental shelf boundary between any two adjacent States consists automatically of an equidistance line,—or must negotiations for an agreed boundary prove finally abortive before the acceptance of a boundary drawn on an equidistance basis becomes obligatory in terms of Article 6, if no special circumstances exist?

35. Without attempting to resolve this question, the determination of which is not necessary for the purposes of the present case, the Court draws attention to the fact that the delimitation of the line E-F, as shown on Map 3, which was effected by Denmark and the Netherlands under the agreement of 31 March 1966 already mentioned (paragraphs 5 and 9), to which the Federal Republic was not a party, must have been based on est de déduire des déclarations de la République fédérale qu'elle a admis la conception fondamentale des droits de l'Etat riverain sur le plateau continental; autre chose est d'y voir une acceptation des règles de délimitation prévues par la Convention. Considérées globalement, les déclarations de la République fédérale permettraient tout au plus de penser qu'au début, avant d'être pleinement consciente des effets probables du principe de l'équidistance dans le cas de la mer du Nord, la République fédérale n'était pas expressément opposée au principe énoncé à l'article 6 de la Convention. Or une constatation d'un caractère aussi négatif ne permet certainement pas de tirer la conclusion positive que, sans être partie à la Convention, la République fédérale avait accepté le régime de l'article 6 de façon à se lier.

33. Il est à peine besoin de souligner les dangers que présenterait la thèse ainsi soutenue par le Danemark et les Pays-Bas si on devait lui donner une portée générale en droit international. Au surplus, dans la présente affaire, cette conclusion serait immédiatement démentie par le fait que, sitôt effectuées les premières délimitations du plateau continental de la mer du Nord, la République fédérale a, comme on l'a vu aux paragraphes 9 et 12 ci-dessus, réservé sa position à l'égard de tracés qui, fondés sur l'équidistance, pouvaient nuire à la délimitation de sa propre zone de plateau continental.

34. Les considérations qui précèdent amènent nécessairement la Cour à conclure que l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève n'est pas applicable en tant que tel aux délimitations visées en l'espèce; il devient donc superflu de traiter de certaines questions d'interprétation ou d'application qui pourraient se poser s'il en allait autrement. On peut néanmoins en mentionner une, celle de la relation entre la prescription de l'article 6 relative à la délimitation par voie d'accord et les prescriptions relatives à l'équidistance et aux circonstances spéciales qui sont applicables «à défaut d'accord»: existe-t-il une présomption suivant laquelle, en l'absence d'accord sur la question, toute délimitation d'un plateau continental entre deux Etats limitrophes est automatiquement fondée sur l'équidistance, ou bien des négociations sur les limites doivent-elles avoir définitivement échoué pour que l'acceptation de la délimitation fondée sur l'équidistance devienne obligatoire en vertu de l'article 6 s'il n'y a pas de circonstances spéciales?

35. Sans vouloir trancher cette question, ce qui n'est pas nécessaire aux fins de la présente affaire, la Cour souligne que la délimitation effectuée par le Danemark et les Pays-Bas suivant la ligne E-F de la carte 3, en vertu de l'accord du 31 mars 1966 auquel la République fédérale n'était pas partie (voir paragraphes 5 et 9 ci-dessus), doit avoir reposé tacitement sur l'idée que, puisqu'il n'en avait pas été convenu

the tacit assumption that, no agreement to the contrary having been reached in the negotiations between the Federal Republic and Denmark and the Netherlands respectively (paragraph 7), the boundary between the continental shelf areas of the Republic and those of the other two countries must be deemed to be an equidistance one;—or in other words the delimitation of the line E-F, and its validity erga omnes including the Federal Republic, as contended for by Denmark and the Netherlands, presupposes both the delimitation and the validity on an equidistance basis, of the lines B-E and D-E on Map 3, considered by Denmark and the Netherlands to represent the boundaries between their continental shelf areas and those of the Federal Republic.

36. Since, however, Article 6 of the Geneva Convention provides only for delimitation between “adjacent” States, which Denmark and the Netherlands clearly are not, or between “opposite” States which, despite suggestions to the contrary, the Court thinks they equally are not, the delimitation of the line E-F on Map 3 could not in any case find its validity in Article 6, even if that provision were opposable to the Federal Republic. The validity of this delimitation must therefore be sought in some other source of law. It is a main contention of Denmark and the Netherlands that there does in fact exist such another source, furnishing a rule that validates not only this particular delimitation, but all delimitations effected on an equidistance basis,—and indeed requiring delimitation on that basis unless the States concerned otherwise agree, and whether or not the Geneva Convention is applicable. This contention must now be examined.

37. It is maintained by Denmark and the Netherlands that the Federal Republic, whatever its position may be in relation to the Geneva Convention, considered as such, is in any event bound to accept delimitation on an equidistance-special circumstances basis, because the use of this method is not in the nature of a merely conventional obligation, but is, or must now be regarded as involving, a rule that is part of the corpus of general international law;—and, like other rules of general or customary international law, is binding on the Federal Republic automatically and independently of any specific assent, direct or indirect, given by the latter. This contention has both a positive law and a more fundamentalist aspect. As a matter of positive law, it is based on the work done in this field by international legal bodies, on State practice and on the influence attributed to the Geneva Convention itself,—the claim being that these various factors have cumulatively evidenced or been creative of the opinio juris sive necessitatis, requisite for the formation of new rules of customary international law. In its fundamentalist aspect, the view put forward derives from what might be called the natural law of the con-autrement lors des négociations de la République fédérale avec le Danemark et avec les Pays-Bas (voir paragraphe 7 ci-dessus), la délimitation du plateau continental entre la République fédérale et les deux autres pays devait se fonder sur l'équidistance; autrement dit, la délimitation de la ligne E-F et la validité à l'égard de tous, y compris la République fédérale, que lui attribuent le Danemark et les Pays-Bas présupposent à la fois le tracé et la validité, sur la base de l'équidistance, des lignes B-E et D-E de la carte 3, considérées par le Danemark et les Pays-Bas comme représentant les limites entre leurs zones de plateau continental et celle de la République fédérale.

36. D'autre part, l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève se rapporte uniquement à la délimitation entre Etats «limitrophes» — ce qui n'est manifestement pas le cas du Danemark et des Pays-Bas — ou entre Etats «se faisant face» — ce qui, de l'avis de la Cour, n'est pas non plus applicable à ces deux pays, bien que l'on ait avancé le contraire; la délimitation matérialisée par la ligne E-F sur la carte 3 ne saurait donc de toute manière se justifier par l'article 6, même s'il était opposable à la République fédérale. Cette délimitation devrait donc tirer sa validité d'une autre source de droit. L'une des thèses principales du Danemark et des Pays-Bas est qu'il existe bien une autre source de droit, d'où se dégage une règle justifiant la délimitation dont il s'agit, ainsi que toute autre délimitation effectuée selon l'équidistance, et imposant même cette méthode à moins que les Etats intéressés ne conviennent d'une autre, et cela que la Convention de Genève soit ou ne soit pas applicable. Il convient maintenant d'examiner cette thèse.

37. Le Danemark et les Pays-Bas soutiennent que, quelle que soit sa situation par rapport à la Convention de Genève en tant que telle, la République fédérale est de toute façon tenue d'accepter la méthode équidistance-circonstances spéciales en matière de délimitation car, si l'emploi de cette méthode ne s'impose pas à titre conventionnel, il relève — ou doit désormais être considéré comme relevant — d'une règle de droit international général qui, de même que les autres règles de droit international général ou coutumier, lie la République fédérale automatiquement et indépendamment de tout consentement spécial direct ou indirect. Cette thèse présente deux aspects, l'un de droit positif, l'autre plus fondamentaliste. En ce qui concerne le droit positif, elle se fonde sur les travaux d'organismes juridiques internationaux, sur la pratique des Etats et sur l'effet attribué à la Convention de Genève elle-même: l'ensemble de ces facteurs attesterait ou engendrerait l'opinio juris sive necessitatis indispensable à la formation de règles nouvelles de droit international coutumier. Sous son aspect fondamentaliste, la thèse en question découle de ce qu'on pourrait appeler le droit naturel du plateau tinental shelf, in the sense that the equidistance principle is seen as a necessary expression in the field of delimitation of the accepted doctrine of the exclusive appurtenance of the continental shelf to the nearby coastal State, and therefore as having an a priori character of so to speak juristic inevitability.

38. The Court will begin by examining this latter aspect, both because it is the more fundamental, and was so presented on behalf of Denmark and the Netherlands—i.e., as something governing the whole case; and because, if it is correct that the equidistance principle is, as the point was put in the course of the argument, to be regarded as inherent in the whole basic concept of continental shelf rights, then equidistance should constitute the rule according to positive law tests also. On the other hand, if equidistance should not possess any a priori character of necessity or inherency, this would not be any bar to its having become a rule of positive law through influences such as those of the Geneva Convention and State practice,—and that aspect of the matter would remain for later examination.

39. The a priori argument starts from the position described in paragraph 19, according to which the right of the coastal State to its continental shelf areas is based on its sovereignty over the land domain, of which the shelf area is the natural prolongation into and under the sea. From this notion of appurtenance is derived the view which, as has already been indicated, the Court accepts, that the coastal State's rights exist ipso facto and ab initio without there being any question of having to make good a claim to the areas concerned, or of any apportionment of the continental shelf between different States. This was one reason why the Court felt bound to reject the claim of the Federal Republic (in the particular form which it took) to be awarded a "just and equitable share" of the shelf areas involved in the present proceedings. Denmark and the Netherlands, for their part, claim that the test of appurtenance must be "proximity", or more accurately "closer proximity": all those parts of the shelf being considered as appurtenant to a particular coastal State which are (but only if they are) closer to it than they are to any point on the coast of another State. Hence delimitation must be effected by a method which will leave to each one of the States concerned all those areas that are nearest to its own coast. Only a line drawn on equidistance principles will do this. Therefore, it is contended, only such a line can be valid (unless the Parties, for reasons of their own, agree on another), because only such a line can be thus consistent with basic continental shelf doctrine.

40. This view clearly has much force; for there can be no doubt that as a matter of normal topography, the greater part of a State's continental continental, en ce sens que le principe de l'équidistance serait une expression nécessaire, pour ce qui est de la délimitation, de la doctrine établie d'après laquelle le plateau continental relève exclusivement de l'Etat riverain voisin et aurait donc à priori un caractère en quelque sorte inéluctable sur le plan juridique.

38. La Cour étudiera d'abord ce dernier aspect. Il est en effet plus fondamental et a été présenté comme tel par le Danemark et les Pays-Bas, qui y ont vu un élément dont toute l'affaire dépend. Au surplus, s'il était exact que l'équidistance soit, ainsi qu'on l'a dit en plaidoirie, un principe inhérent à la conception fondamentale du régime juridique du plateau continental, elle devrait aussi constituer la règle applicable d'après les critères du droit positif. En revanche, si l'équidistance n'avait pas à priori un caractère nécessaire ou inhérent, cela n'empêcherait nullement qu'elle soit devenue une règle de droit positif par l'effet d'éléments tels que la Convention de Genève ou la pratique des Etats; il faudrait donc encore examiner cet aspect du problème.

39. L'argument du caractère à priori procède d'une constatation déjà faite au paragraphe 19: le droit de l'Etat riverain sur son plateau continental a pour fondement la souveraineté qu'il exerce sur le territoire dont ce plateau continental est le prolongement naturel sous la mer. De cette notion de rattachement découle l'idée, acceptée par la Cour comme on l'a déjà vu, que les droits de l'Etat riverain existent ipso facto et ab initio sans que la validité de ses revendications doive être établie ou sans qu'il soit besoin de procéder à une répartition du plateau continental entre Etats intéressés. C'est l'un des motifs pour lesquels la Cour a estimé devoir rejeter, sous la forme qui lui a été donnée, la demande de la République fédérale tendant à obtenir une «part juste et équitable» des zones de plateau continental en cause. Le Danemark et les Pays-Bas prétendent quant à eux que le critère du rattachement doit être la «proximité» ou plus exactement la «plus grande proximité»: ils considèrent que toutes les parties du plateau continental plus proches d'un Etat riverain déterminé que de tout point situé sur la côte d'un autre Etat — mais ces parties-là seulement — relèvent du premier Etat. En conséquence la délimitation doit s'opérer selon une méthode attribuant à chacun des Etats intéressés toutes les zones qui sont plus proches de sa propre côte que d'aucune autre. Seule une ligne tracée selon le principe de l'équidistance permet d'y parvenir. Seule donc, prétend-on, une telle ligne peut être valable, à moins que les parties n'en choisissent une autre pour des raisons qui leur sont propres, car seule elle est compatible avec la conception fondamentale du plateau continental.

40. Cet argument a incontestablement du poids; il ne fait pas de doute que, dans des conditions géographiques normales, la plus grande partie shelf areas will in fact, and without the necessity for any delimitation at all, be nearer to its coasts than to any other. It could not well be otherwise: but post hoc is not propter hoc, and this situation may only serve to obscure the real issue, which is whether it follows that every part of the area concerned must be placed in this way, and that it should be as it were prohibited that any part should not be so placed. The Court does not consider that it does follow, either from the notion of proximity itself, or from the more fundamental concept of the continental shelf as being the natural prolongation of the land domain—a concept repeatedly appealed to by both sides throughout the case, although quite differently interpreted by them.

41. As regards the notion of proximity, the idea of absolute proximity is certainly not implied by the rather vague and general terminology employed in the literature of the subject, and in most State proclamations and international conventions and other instruments—terms such as “near”, “close to its shores”, “off its coast”, “opposite”, “in front of the coast”, “in the vicinity of”, “neighbouring the coast”, “adjacent to”, “contiguous”, etc.,—all of them terms of a somewhat imprecise character which, although they convey a reasonably clear general idea, are capable of a considerable fluidity of meaning. To take what is perhaps the most frequently employed of these terms, namely “adjacent to”, it is evident that by no stretch of imagination can a point on the continental shelf situated say a hundred miles, or even much less, from a given coast, be regarded as “adjacent” to it, or to any coast at all, in the normal sense of adjacency, even if the point concerned is nearer to some one coast than to any other. This would be even truer of localities where, physically, the continental shelf begins to merge with the ocean depths. Equally, a point inshore situated near the meeting place of the coasts of two States can often properly be said to be adjacent to both coasts, even though it may be fractionally closer to the one than the other. Indeed, local geographical configuration may sometimes cause it to have a closer physical connection with the coast to which it is not in fact closest.

42. There seems in consequence to be no necessary, and certainly no complete, identity between the notions of adjacency and proximity; and therefore the question of which parts of the continental shelf “adjacent to” a coastline bordering more than one State fall within the appurtenance of which of them, remains to this extent an open one, not to be determined on a basis exclusively of proximity. Even if proximity may afford one of the tests to be applied and an important one in the right conditions, it may not necessarily be the only, nor in all circumstances, the most appropriate one. Hence it would seem that the notion of adjacency, so constantly employed in continental shelf doctrine from the start, only implies proximity in a general sense, and does not imply any fundamental or inherent rule the ultimate effect of which would be to des zones de plateau continental relevant d'un Etat seront en fait, et indépendamment de toute délimitation, plus proches de la côte de cet Etat que d'aucune autre. Le contraire serait étonnant, mais post hoc n'est pas propter hoc et tout cela ne fait qu'obscurcir la véritable question : faut-il réellement que toute partie de la zone relevant d'un Etat soit plus proche de sa côte que d'aucune autre et y a-t-il en quelque sorte un empêchement à ce qu'une partie de cette zone fasse exception? De l'avis de la Cour, cela ne résulte nécessairement ni de la notion même de proximité, ni de la conception plus fondamentale du plateau continental envisagé comme prolongement naturel du territoire, conception invoquée à maintes reprises des deux côtés pendant toute la procédure mais avec des interprétations très différentes.

41. En ce qui concerne la notion de proximité, on peut dire que l'idée d'une proximité absolue ne découle certes pas implicitement de la terminologie plutôt vague et générale employée dans les ouvrages consacrés à la question et dans la plupart des proclamations d'Etats, conventions internationales et autres instruments; on y trouve des termes comme près, proche de ses côtes, au large de ses côtes, faisant face, devant la côte, au voisinage de, avoisinant la côte, adjacent, contigu, etc., qui sont tous assez imprécis et qui, tout en donnant une idée générale suffisamment claire, peuvent avoir un sens très difficile à cerner. Pour prendre l'exemple du terme adjacent, qui est peut-être le plus fréquemment utilisé, il est évident que, même avec beaucoup d'imagination, un point du plateau continental situé à une centaine de milles d'une côte déterminée ou même beaucoup moins loin ne saurait être considéré comme adjacent à cette côte ou à aucune autre côte au sens normal du mot adjacent, bien qu'il soit en fait plus proche d'un littoral que d'un autre. Cela est encore plus vrai des zones où le plateau continental proprement dit commence à faire place aux grands fonds. De même, un point situé plus près de la terre, non loin du lieu où les côtes de deux Etats se rejoignent, peut souvent et à juste titre être qualifié d'adjacent aux deux côtes bien qu'il soit légèrement plus proche de l'une que de l'autre. En fait, la configuration géographique locale peut parfois lui donner un lien physique plus étroit avec la côte dont il n'est pas le plus rapproché.

42. Il ne paraît donc pas y avoir d'identité nécessaire, et en tout cas pas d'identité complète, entre les notions d'adjacence et de proximité; dans ces conditions, la question de savoir quelles parties du plateau continental « adjacent à » un littoral bordant plusieurs Etats relèvent de l'un ou de l'autre reste entière et ne saurait être résolue d'après la seule proximité. Même si la proximité peut être l'un des critères applicables — et un critère important quand les conditions s'y prêtent —, ce n'est pas nécessairement le seul ni toujours le plus approprié. Il semblerait donc que la notion d'adjacence, employée si constamment au sujet de la doctrine du plateau continental et cela dès le début, n'implique la proximité qu'en un sens général, sans postuler une règle fondamentale ou inhérente dont l'effet serait en définitive d'interdire à tout Etat d'exercer, sauf par voie prohibit any State (otherwise than by agreement) from exercising continental shelf rights in respect of areas closer to the coast of another State.

43. More fundamental than the notion of proximity appears to be the principle—constantly relied upon by all the Parties—of the natural prolongation or continuation of the land territory or domain, or land sovereignty of the coastal State, into and under the high seas, via the bed of its territorial sea which is under the full sovereignty of that State. There are various ways of formulating this principle, but the underlying idea, namely of an extension of something already possessed, is the same, and it is this idea of extension which is, in the Court's opinion, determinant. Submarine areas do not really appertain to the coastal State because—or not only because—they are near it. They are near it of course; but this would not suffice to confer title, any more than, according to a well-established principle of law recognized by both sides in the present case, mere proximity confers per se title to land territory. What confers the ipso jure title which international law attributes to the coastal State in respect of its continental shelf, is the fact that the submarine areas concerned may be deemed to be actually part of the territory over which the coastal State already has dominion,—in the sense that, although covered with water, they are a prolongation or continuation of that territory, an extension of it under the sea. From this it would follow that whenever a given submarine area does not constitute a natural—or the most natural—extension of the land territory of a coastal State, even though that area may be closer to it than it is to the territory of any other State, it cannot be regarded as appertaining to that State;—or at least it cannot be so regarded in the face of a competing claim by a State of whose land territory the submarine area concerned is to be regarded as a natural extension, even if it is less close to it.

44. In the present case, although both sides relied on the prolongation principle and regarded it as fundamental, they interpreted it quite differently. Both interpretations appear to the Court to be incorrect. Denmark and the Netherlands identified natural prolongation with closest proximity and therefrom argued that it called for an equidistance line: the Federal Republic seemed to think it implied the notion of the just and equitable share, although the connection is distinctly remote. (The Federal Republic did however invoke another idea, namely that of the proportionality of a State's continental shelf area to the length of its coastline, which obviously does have an intimate connection with the prolongation principle, and will be considered in its place.) As regards equidistance, it clearly cannot be identified with the notion of natural prolongation or extension, since, as has already been stated (paragraph 8), the use of the equidistance method would frequently cause areas which are the natural prolongation or extension of the territory of one State to be attributed to another, when the configuration of the latter's coast makes the equidistance line swing out laterally across the former's d'accord, ses droits relatifs au plateau continental sur des zones plus proches de la côte d'un autre Etat que de la sienne.

43. Plus fondamental que la notion de proximité semble être le principe, que les Parties n'ont cessé d'invoquer, du prolongement naturel ou de l'extension du territoire ou de la souveraineté territoriale de l'Etat riverain sous la haute mer, au-delà du lit de la mer territoriale qui relève de la pleine souveraineté de cet Etat. Il y a plusieurs manières de formuler ce principe mais l'idée de base, celle d'une extension de quelque chose que l'on possède déjà, est la même et c'est cette idée d'extension qui est décisive selon la Cour. Ce n'est pas vraiment ou pas seulement parce qu'elles sont proches de son territoire que des zones sous-marines relèvent d'un Etat riverain. Elles en sont proches certes, mais cela ne suffit pas pour conférer un titre — pas plus que la simple proximité ne constitue en soi un titre au domaine terrestre, ce qui est un principe de droit bien établi et admis par les Parties en l'espèce. En réalité le titre que le droit international attribue ipso jure à l'Etat riverain sur son plateau continental procède de ce que les zones sous-marines en cause peuvent être considérées comme faisant véritablement partie du territoire sur lequel l'Etat riverain exerce déjà son autorité: on peut dire que, tout en étant recouvertes d'eau, elles sont un prolongement, une continuation, une extension de ce territoire sous la mer. Par suite, même si une zone sous-marine est plus proche du territoire d'un Etat que de tout autre, on ne saurait considérer qu'elle relève de cet Etat dès lors qu'elle ne constitue pas une extension naturelle, ou l'extension la plus naturelle, de son domaine terrestre et qu'une revendication rivale est formulée par un autre Etat dont il est possible d'admettre que la zone sous-marine en question prolonge de façon naturelle le territoire, tout en étant moins proche.

44. Dans la présente affaire, on a invoqué des deux côtés le principe du prolongement en le considérant comme fondamental mais on l'a interprété de façons très différentes. Les deux interprétations paraissent inexactes à la Cour. Le Danemark et les Pays-Bas ont assimilé le concept de prolongement naturel à celui de plus grande proximité et ils en ont déduit que le premier exige le tracé d'une ligne d'équidistance; la République fédérale paraît avoir pensé qu'il implique la notion de la part juste et équitable, bien que le rapport soit très lointain. (La République fédérale a cependant invoqué une autre idée, celle de la proportionnalité entre la zone de plateau continental revenant à un Etat et la longueur de son littoral; cette idée, qui a évidemment un lien étroit avec le principe du prolongement, sera examinée le moment venu.) La notion d'équidistance ne peut manifestement pas être identifiée à celle d'extension ou de prolongement naturel car, comme on l'a déjà vu au paragraphe 8, l'emploi de la méthode de l'équidistance aurait souvent pour résultat d'attribuer à un Etat des zones prolongeant naturellement le territoire d'un autre Etat lorsque la configuration côtière du premier fait dévier latéralement la coastal front, cutting it off from areas situated directly before that front.

45. The fluidity of all these notions is well illustrated by the case of the Norwegian Trough (paragraph 4 above). Without attempting to pronounce on the status of that feature, the Court notes that the shelf areas in the North Sea separated from the Norwegian coast by the 80-100 kilometres of the Trough cannot in any physical sense be said to be adjacent to it, nor to be its natural prolongation. They are nevertheless considered by the States parties to the relevant delimitations, as described in paragraph 4, to appertain to Norway up to the median lines shown on Map 1. True these median lines are themselves drawn on equidistance principles; but it was only by first ignoring the existence of the Trough that these median lines fell to be drawn at all.

46. The conclusion drawn by the Court from the foregoing analysis is that the notion of equidistance as being logically necessary, in the sense of being an inescapable a priori accompaniment of basic continental shelf doctrine, is incorrect. It is said not to be possible to maintain that there is a rule of law ascribing certain areas to a State as a matter of inherent and original right (see paragraphs 19 and 20), without also admitting the existence of some rule by which those areas can be obligatorily delimited. The Court cannot accept the logic of this view. The problem arises only where there is a dispute and only in respect of the marginal areas involved. The appurtenance of a given area, considered as an entity, in no way governs the precise delimitation of its boundaries, any more than uncertainty as to boundaries can affect territorial rights. There is for instance no rule that the land frontiers of a State must be fully delimited and defined, and often in various places and for long periods they are not, as is shown by the case of the entry of Albania into the League of Nations (Monastery of Saint Naoum, Advisory Opinion, 1924, P.C.I.J., Series B, No. 9, at p. 10).

47. A review of the genesis and development of the equidistance method of delimitation can only serve to confirm the foregoing conclusion. Such a review may appropriately start with the instrument, generally known as the "Truman Proclamation", issued by the Government of the United States on 28 September 1945. Although this instrument was not the first or only one to have appeared, it has in the opinion of the Court a special status. Previously, various theories as to the nature and extent of the rights relative to or exercisable over the continental shelf had been advanced by jurists, publicists and technicians. The Truman Proclamation however, soon came to be regarded as the starting point of the posiligne d'équidistance et ampute le second de zones situées juste devant sa façade maritime.

46. La Cour conclut de l'analyse qui précède qu'il est inexact de considérer la notion d'équidistance comme logiquement nécessaire, en ce sens qu'elle serait liée de façon inévitable et à priori à la conception fondamentale du plateau continental. On a dit qu'il n'est pas possible de soutenir qu'une règle juridique attribue certaines zones à un Etat au titre d'un droit inhérent et originaire (voir paragraphes 19 et 20) sans admettre en même temps l'existence d'une règle obligatoire quant à la délimitation de ces zones. La Cour ne voit pas la logique de cette thèse. Le problème ne se pose qu'en cas de litige et uniquement à l'égard des zones qui forment les confins. Le fait qu'une zone, prise comme une entité, relève de tel ou tel Etat est sans conséquence sur la délimitation exacte des frontières de cette zone, de même que l'incertitude des frontières ne saurait affecter les droits territoriaux. Aucune règle ne dispose par exemple que les frontières terrestres d'un Etat doivent être complètement délimitées et définies et il est fréquent qu'elles ne le soient pas en certains endroits et pendant de longues périodes, comme le montre la question de l'admission de l'Albanie à la Société des Nations (Monastère de Saint-Naoum, avis consultatif, 1924, C.P.J.I. série B n° 9, p. 10).

47. Un examen de la genèse et de l'évolution de la méthode de délimitation fondée sur l'équidistance ne fait que confirmer la conclusion ci-dessus. Il convient de rappeler tout d'abord l'acte, généralement connu sous le nom de proclamation Truman, que le Gouvernement des Etats-Unis a publié le 28 septembre 1945. Bien que cet acte n'ait été ni le premier ni le seul, il a, selon la Cour, une importance particulière. Auparavant, des juristes, des publicistes et des techniciens avaient avancé diverses théories sur la nature et l'étendue des droits existant à l'égard du plateau continental ou pouvant être exercés sur lui. La proclamation Truman devait cependant être bientôt considérée comme le point de tive law on the subject, and the chief doctrine it enunciated, namely that of the coastal State as having an original, natural, and exclusive (in short a vested) right to the continental shelf off its shores, came to prevail over all others, being now reflected in Article 2 of the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf. With regard to the delimitation of lateral boundaries between the continental shelves of adjacent States, a matter which had given rise to some consideration on the technical, but very little on the juristic level, the Truman Proclamation stated that such boundaries "shall be determined by the United States and the State concerned in accordance with equitable principles". These two concepts, of delimitation by mutual agreement and delimitation in accordance with equitable principles, have underlain all the subsequent history of the subject. They were reflected in various other State proclamations of the period, and after, and in the later work on the subject.

48. It was in the International Law Commission of the United Nations that the question of delimitation as between adjacent States was first taken up seriously as part of a general juridical project; for outside the ranks of the hydrographers and cartographers, questions of delimitation were not much thought about in earlier continental shelf doctrine. Juridical interest and speculation was focussed mainly on such questions as what was the legal basis on which any rights at all in respect of the continental shelf could be claimed, and what was the nature of those rights. As regards boundaries, the main issue was not that of boundaries between States but of the seaward limit of the area in respect of which the coastal State could claim exclusive rights of exploitation. As was pointed out in the course of the written proceedings, States in most cases had not found it necessary to conclude treaties or legislate about their lateral sea boundaries with adjacent States before the question of exploiting the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil arose;—practice was therefore sparse.

49. In the records of the International Law Commission, which had the matter under consideration from 1950 to 1956, there is no indication at all that any of its members supposed that it was incumbent on the Commission to adopt a rule of equidistance because this gave expression to, and translated into linear terms, a principle of proximity inherent in the basic concept of the continental shelf, causing every part of the shelf to appertain to the nearest coastal State and to no other, and because such a rule must therefore be mandatory as a matter of customary international law. Such an idea does not seem ever to have been propounded. Had it been, and had it had the self-evident character contended for by Denmark and the Netherlands, the Commission would have had no alternative but to adopt it, and its long continued hesitations over this matter would be incomprehensible.

départ dans l'élaboration du droit positif en ce domaine et la doctrine principale qu'elle énonçait, à savoir que l'Etat riverain possède un droit originaire, naturel et exclusif, en somme un droit acquis, sur le plateau continental situé devant ses côtes, l'a finalement emporté sur toutes les autres et trouve aujourd'hui son expression dans l'article 2 de la Convention de Genève de 1958 sur le plateau continental. En ce qui concerne la délimitation latérale des plateaux continentaux d'Etats limitrophes, problème qui avait été étudié dans une certaine mesure sur le plan technique mais avait fort peu retenu l'attention sur le plan juridique, la proclamation Truman énonçait que la ligne de délimitation serait « déterminée par les Etats-Unis et l'Etat intéressé conformément à des principes équitables ». De ces deux notions de délimitation par voie d'accord et de délimitation conforme à des principes équitables a procédé toute l'évolution historique postérieure. On en trouve la trace dans des proclamations faites à partir de cette époque par divers autres Etats, ainsi que dans les travaux consacrés depuis lors au problème.

48. C'est à la Commission du droit international des Nations Unies que la question de la délimitation entre Etats limitrophes a été abordée sérieusement pour la première fois dans une étude juridique de caractère général; jusqu'alors en effet les problèmes de délimitation dans le cadre de la doctrine du plateau continental n'avaient guère retenu que l'attention des hydrographes et des cartographes. L'intérêt et la réflexion des juristes s'étaient principalement portés sur des questions comme le fondement juridique et la nature des droits pouvant être éventuellement revendiqués sur le plateau continental. S'agissant de la délimitation, le grand problème n'était pas celui des limites entre Etats mais celui de la limite vers le large de l'étendue sur laquelle l'Etat riverain peut revendiquer des droits d'exploitation exclusifs. Comme il a été observé au cours de la procédure écrite, les Etats n'ont pas jugé nécessaire, dans la plupart des cas, de conclure des traités ou de légiférer pour fixer leurs limites maritimes latérales avec des Etats limitrophes avant que se pose la question de l'exploitation des ressources naturelles du lit de la mer et de son sous-sol. La pratique dans ce domaine était donc peu abondante.

49. A lire les documents de la Commission du droit international, qui s'est occupée de la question de 1950 à 1956, rien n'indique qu'il soit venu à l'esprit d'aucun de ses membres qu'elle dût adopter une règle fondée sur l'équidistance pour le motif qu'une telle règle constituait l'expression linéaire d'un principe de proximité inhérent à la conception fondamentale du plateau continental — d'après lequel toute partie du plateau relèverait de l'Etat riverain le plus proche à l'exclusion de tout autre Etat — et était en conséquence obligatoire en droit international coutumier. Cette idée ne semble jamais avoir été avancée. Si elle l'avait été et si elle avait eu le caractère évident que le Danemark et les Pays-Bas lui prêtent, la Commission n'aurait pu faire autrement que de l'adopter et ses hésitations prolongées à ce sujet seraient incompréhensibles.

50. It is moreover, in the present context, a striking feature of the Commission's discussions that during the early and middle stages, not only was the notion of equidistance never considered from the standpoint of its having a priori a character of inherent necessity: it was never given any special prominence at all, and certainly no priority. The Commission discussed various other possibilities as having equal if not superior status such as delimitation by agreement, by reference to arbitration, by drawing lines perpendicular to the coast, by prolonging the dividing line of adjacent territorial waters (the principle of which was itself not as yet settled), and on occasion the Commission seriously considered adopting one or other of these solutions. It was not in fact until after the matter had been referred to a committee of hydrographical experts, which reported in 1953, that the equidistance principle began to take precedence over other possibilities: the Report of the Commission for that year (its principal report on the topic of delimitation as such) makes it clear that before this reference to the experts the Commission had felt unable to formulate any definite rule at all, the previous trend of opinion having been mainly in favour of delimitation by agreement or by reference to arbitration.

51. It was largely because of these difficulties that it was decided to consult the Committee of Experts. It is therefore instructive in the context (i.e., of an alleged inherent necessity for the equidistance principle) to see on what basis the matter was put to the experts, and how they dealt with it. Equidistance was in fact only one of four methods suggested to them, the other three being the continuation in the seaward direction of the land frontier between the two adjacent States concerned; the drawing of a perpendicular to the coast at the point of its intersection with this land frontier; and the drawing of a line perpendicular to the line of the "general direction" of the coast. Furthermore the matter was not even put to the experts directly as a question of continental shelf delimitation, but in the context of the delimitation of the lateral boundary between adjacent territorial waters, no account being taken of the possibility that the situation respecting territorial waters might be different.

52. The Committee of Experts simply reported that after a thorough discussion of the different methods—(there are no official records of this discussion)—they had decided that "the (lateral) boundary through the territorial sea—if not already fixed otherwise—should be drawn according to the principle of equidistance from the respective coastlines". They added, however, significantly, that in "a number of cases this may not lead to an equitable solution, which should be then arrived at by negotiation". Only after that did they add, as a rider to this conclusion, that they had considered it "important to find a formula for drawing the international boundaries in the territorial waters of States, which could also be used for the delimitation of the respective continental shelves of two States bordering the same continental shelf".

50. Au surplus il est frappant de constater à cet égard que, dans les discussions qui se sont déroulées à la Commission au début et vers le milieu de ses travaux, non seulement on n'a jamais considéré que la notion d'équidistance ait à priori un caractère de nécessité inhérente mais encore on ne lui a jamais reconnu une importance spéciale et certainement aucune priorité. La Commission a examiné diverses autres possibilités en leur accordant une valeur égale sinon supérieure: délimitation par voie d'accord, délimitation par voie d'arbitrage, délimitation selon une ligne perpendiculaire à la côte, délimitation par prolongement de la ligne divisant les eaux territoriales adjacentes, dont le principe n'était pas encore établi, et d'autres encore; la Commission a même sérieusement envisagé d'adopter l'une ou l'autre de ces solutions. En fait, c'est seulement après que la question eut été renvoyée à un comité d'experts-hydrographes, dont le rapport a été présenté en 1953, que le principe de l'équidistance a commencé à l'emporter sur les autres possibilités: il ressort nettement du rapport de la Commission pour 1953 (son principal rapport sur le problème de la délimitation proprement dit) qu'avant d'en référer aux experts la Commission ne s'était pas jugée en mesure de formuler une règle précise et qu'elle s'était jusque-là surtout montrée favorable à une délimitation par voie d'accord ou d'arbitrage.

51. Si la Commission a décidé de consulter le comité d'experts, c'est en grande partie à cause de ces difficultés. Il est donc instructif, du point de vue d'une prétendue nécessité inhérente du principe de l'équidistance, d'examiner sur quelle base le problème a été soumis aux experts et comment ils l'ont traité. L'équidistance n'était en réalité que l'une des quatre méthodes qui leur étaient suggérées. Les trois autres étaient les suivantes: prolongement vers le large de la frontière terrestre entre les deux Etats limitrophes intéressés; tracé d'une ligne perpendiculaire à la côte à l'endroit où la frontière entre les deux territoires atteint la mer; tracé d'une ligne perpendiculaire à la «direction générale» de la côte. En outre le problème n'a pas été posé directement aux experts à propos de la délimitation du plateau continental: il l'a été à propos de la délimitation latérale des eaux territoriales de deux Etats limitrophes, sans que l'on se demande si la situation n'était pas différente.

53. In this almost impromptu, and certainly contingent manner was the principle of equidistance for the delimitation of continental shelf boundaries propounded. It is clear from the Report of the Commission for 1953 already referred to (paragraph 50) that the latter adopted it largely on the basis of the recommendation of the Committee of Experts, and even so in a text that gave priority to delimitation by agreement and also introduced an exception in favour of "special circumstances" which the Committee had not formally proposed. The Court moreover thinks it to be a legitimate supposition that the experts were actuated by considerations not of legal theory but of practical convenience and cartography of the kind mentioned in paragraph 22 above. Although there are no official records of their discussions, there is warrant for this view in correspondence passing between certain of them and the Commission's Special Rapporteur on the subject, which was deposited by one of the Parties during the oral hearing at the request of the Court. Nor, even after this, when a decision in principle had been taken in favour of an equidistance rule, was there an end to the Commission's hesitations, for as late as three years after the adoption of the report of the Committee of Experts, when the Commission was finalizing the whole complex of drafts comprised under the topic of the Law of the Sea, various doubts about the equidistance principle were still being voiced in the Commission, on such grounds for instance as that its strict application would be open, in certain cases, to the objection that the geographical configuration of the coast would render a boundary drawn on this basis inequitable.

54. A further point of some significance is that neither in the Committee of Experts, nor in the Commission itself, nor subsequently at the Geneva Conference, does there appear to have been any discussion of delimitation in the context, not merely of two adjacent States, but of three or more States on the same coast, or in the same vicinity,—from which it can reasonably be inferred that the possible resulting situations, some of which have been described in paragraph 8 above, were never really envisaged or taken into account. This view finds some confirmation in the fact that the relevant part of paragraph 2 of Article 6 of the Geneva Convention speaks of delimiting the continental shelf of "two" adjacent States (although a reference simply to "adjacent States" would have sufficed), whereas in respect of median lines the reference in paragraph 1 of that Article is to "two or more" opposite States.

55. In the light of this history, and of the record generally, it is clear that at no time was the notion of equidistance as an inherent necessity of continental shelf doctrine entertained. Quite a different outlook was indeed manifested from the start in current legal thinking. It was, and pourraient en même temps servir pour délimiter les frontières respectives de «plateau continental» concernant les Etats devant les côtes desquels s'étend ce plateau».

53. C'est de cette manière presque improvisée et purement contingente que le principe de l'équidistance a été envisagé pour la délimitation du plateau continental. Il ressort nettement du rapport de la Commission du droit international pour 1953 (voir paragraphe 50 ci-dessus) que la Commission a adopté ce principe essentiellement sur la recommandation du comité d'experts mais que, ce faisant, elle a dans le même texte donné priorité à la délimitation par voie d'accord et a introduit une exception dans le cas de «circonstances spéciales» que le comité n'avait pas formellement proposée. La Cour estime en outre légitime de supposer que les experts ont été mus par le genre de considérations d'ordre pratique et cartographique dont il est fait état au paragraphe 22 ci-dessus et non par des considérations d'ordre juridique et doctrinal. Bien que leurs discussions n'aient pas fait l'objet de procès-verbaux officiels, cette opinion trouve confirmation dans une correspondance échangée entre certains d'entre eux et le rapporteur spécial de la Commission, correspondance déposée au cours de la procédure orale par l'une des Parties sur la demande de la Cour. D'autre part, même après avoir pris une décision de principe en faveur d'une règle fondée sur l'équidistance, la Commission a continué à faire preuve d'hésitation: trois ans après l'adoption du rapport du comité d'experts, au moment où elle mettait la dernière main à l'ensemble des projets concernant le droit de la mer, le principe de l'équidistance suscitait encore des doutes parmi ses membres, motif pris par exemple de ce que son application stricte pourrait prêter à critique dans des cas où la configuration géographique de la côte rendrait inéquitable une limite tracée sur cette base.

54. Un autre élément significatif est à considérer: il semble que ni au comité d'experts, ni à la Commission elle-même, ni ultérieurement à la conférence de Genève la discussion n'ait porté sur les délimitations à effectuer non pas simplement entre deux Etats limitrophes, mais entre trois ou plusieurs Etats bordant la même côte ou situés dans le voisinage les uns des autres; il est raisonnable d'en déduire que les situations pouvant résulter de cet état de choses, et dont certaines ont été décrites au paragraphe 8 ci-dessus, n'ont jamais été véritablement envisagées ou prises en considération. Cette déduction est confirmée par le fait qu'à l'article 6, paragraphe 2, de la Convention de Genève le passage pertinent parle de la délimitation du plateau continental entre «deux» Etats limitrophes — il aurait suffi de dire «des» Etats limitrophes —, alors qu'en ce qui concerne les lignes médianes entre Etats dont les côtes se font face l'article 6, paragraphe 1, dit «deux ou plusieurs» Etats.

55. Compte tenu de ces antécédents et d'une manière plus générale du dossier, il est clair qu'à aucun moment on n'a considéré que la notion d'équidistance soit liée de façon inhérente et nécessaire à la doctrine du plateau continental. L'opinion des juristes s'est même, dès le début, mani-

it really remained to the end, governed by two beliefs;—namely, first, that no one single method of delimitation was likely to prove satisfactory in all circumstances, and that delimitation should, therefore, be carried out by agreement (or by reference to arbitration); and secondly, that it should be effected on equitable principles. It was in pursuance of the first of these beliefs that in the draft that emerged as Article 6 of the Geneva Convention, the Commission gave priority to delimitation by agreement,—and in pursuance of the second that it introduced the exception in favour of “special circumstances”. Yet the record shows that, even with these mitigations, doubts persisted, particularly as to whether the equidistance principle would in all cases prove equitable.

56. In these circumstances, it seems to the Court that the inherency contention as now put forward by Denmark and the Netherlands inverts the true order of things in point of time and that, so far from an equidistance rule having been generated by an antecedent principle of proximity inherent in the whole concept of continental shelf appurtenance, the latter is rather a rationalization of the former—an ex post facto construct directed to providing a logical juristic basis for a method of delimitation propounded largely for different reasons, cartographical and other. Given also that for the reasons already set out (paragraphs 40-46) the theory cannot be said to be endowed with any quality of logical necessity either, the Court is unable to accept it.

57. Before going further it will be convenient to deal briefly with two subsidiary matters. Most of the difficulties felt in the International Law Commission related, as here, to the case of the lateral boundary between adjacent States. Less difficulty was felt over that of the median line boundary between opposite States, although it too is an equidistance line. For this there seems to the Court to be good reason. The continental shelf area off, and dividing, opposite States, can be claimed by each of them to be a natural prolongation of its territory. These prolongations meet and overlap, and can therefore only be delimited by means of a median line; and, ignoring the presence of islets, rocks and minor coastal projections, the disproportionately distorting effect of which can be eliminated by other means, such a line must effect an equal division of the particular area involved. If there is a third State on one of the coasts concerned, the area of mutual natural prolongation with that of the same or another opposite State will be a separate and distinct one, to be treated in the same way. This type of case is therefore different from that of laterally adjacent States on the same coast with no immediately opposite coast in front of it, and does not give rise to the same kind of problem—a conclusion which also finds some confirmation in the dif-festée en un tout autre sens. Elle a procédé, et elle n'a cessé de procéder, de deux convictions: en premier lieu il était peu probable qu'une méthode de délimitation unique donne satisfaction dans toutes les circonstances et la délimitation devait donc s'opérer par voie d'accord ou d'arbitrage; en second lieu la délimitation devait s'effectuer selon des principes équitables. C'est en raison de la première conviction que la Commission a donné priorité à la délimitation par voie d'accord dans le projet qui est devenu l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève et c'est en raison de la seconde conviction qu'elle a introduit l'exception des «circonstances spéciales». Les documents montrent cependant que, même avec ces atténuations, les doutes ont persisté, en particulier sur le point de savoir si le principe de l'équidistance se révélerait équitable dans tous les cas.

56. Dans ces conditions, il semble à la Cour que la thèse du caractère inhérent, telle qu'elle est formulée maintenant par le Danemark et les Pays-Bas, renverse l'ordre réel des choses dans le temps. Loin qu'une règle d'équidistance ait été engendrée par un principe antérieur de proximité inhérent à la conception fondamentale du plateau continental, c'est plutôt ce principe qui est une rationalisation de la règle, une construction à posteriori destinée à fournir une base juridique logique à une méthode de délimitation proposée pour des raisons surtout extra-juridiques, cartographiques en particulier. Etant donné en outre que, pour les motifs déjà exposés aux paragraphes 40 à 46, on ne saurait non plus dire que la théorie présente un caractère de nécessité logique, la Cour n'est pas en mesure de l'accepter.

57. Avant d'aller plus loin, il convient d'examiner brièvement deux questions incidentes. La plus grande partie des difficultés éprouvées par la Commission du droit international concernaient comme ici le cas de la ligne latérale de délimitation entre Etats limitrophes. Les difficultés ont été moindres pour ce qui est de la ligne médiane de délimitation entre Etats dont les côtes se font face, bien qu'il s'agisse là aussi d'une ligne d'équidistance. Il semble à la Cour qu'il y a une bonne raison à cela. En effet les zones de plateau continental se trouvant au large d'Etats dont les côtes se font face et séparant ces Etats peuvent être réclamées par chacun d'eux à titre de prolongement naturel de son territoire. Ces zones se rencontrent, se chevauchent et ne peuvent donc être délimitées que par une ligne médiane; si l'on ne tient pas compte des îlots, des rochers ou des légers saillants de la côte, dont on peut éliminer l'effet exagéré de déviation par d'autres moyens, une telle ligne doit diviser également l'espace dont il s'agit. Si un troisième Etat borde l'une des côtes, la zone où le prolongement naturel de son territoire recoupe celui de l'Etat déjà considéré lui faisant face, ou celui d'un autre Etat lui faisant face, sera distincte et séparée mais devra être traitée de la même manière. Tout différent est le cas d'Etats limitrophes se trouvant sur la ference of language to be observed in the two paragraphs of Article 6 of the Geneva Convention (reproduced in paragraph 26 above) as respects recourse in the one case to median lines and in the other to lateral equidistance lines, in the event of absence of agreement.

58. If on the other hand, contrary to the view expressed in the preceding paragraph, it were correct to say that there is no essential difference in the process of delimiting the continental shelf areas between opposite States and that of delimitations between adjacent States, then the results ought in principle to be the same or at least comparable. But in fact, whereas a median line divides equally between the two opposite countries areas that can be regarded as being the natural prolongation of the territory of each of them, a lateral equidistance line often leaves to one of the States concerned areas that are a natural prolongation of the territory of the other.

59. Equally distinct in the opinion of the Court is the case of the lateral boundary between adjacent territorial waters to be drawn on an equidistance basis. As was convincingly demonstrated in the maps and diagrams furnished by the Parties, and as has been noted in paragraph 8, the distorting effects of lateral equidistance lines under certain conditions of coastal configuration are nevertheless comparatively small within the limits of territorial waters, but produce their maximum effect in the localities where the main continental shelf areas lie further out. There is also a direct correlation between the notion of closest proximity to the coast and the sovereign jurisdiction which the coastal State is entitled to exercise and must exercise, not only over the seabed underneath the territorial waters but over the waters themselves, which does not exist in respect of continental shelf areas where there is no jurisdiction over the superjacent waters, and over the seabed only for purposes of exploration and exploitation.

60. The conclusions so far reached leave open, and still to be considered, the question whether on some basis other than that of an a priori logical necessity, i.e., through positive law processes, the equidistance principle has come to be regarded as a rule of customary international law, so that it would be obligatory for the Federal Republic in that way, even though Article 6 of the Geneva Convention is not, as such, opposable to it. For this purpose it is necessary to examine the status of the principle as it stood when the Convention was drawn up, as it resulted from the effect of the Convention, and in the light of State practice subsequent to the Convention; but it should be clearly understood that in the pronouncements the Court makes on these matters it has in view solely the delimitation provisions (Article 6) of the Convention, not other parts of it, nor the Convention as such.

58. En revanche si, contrairement à l'opinion émise au paragraphe précédent, il était exact de dire qu'il n'y a pas de différence essentielle pour la délimitation du plateau continental entre le cas d'Etats se faisant face et le cas d'Etats limitrophes, les résultats devraient être en principe sinon identiques du moins comparables. Or en fait, alors qu'une ligne médiane tracée entre deux pays se faisant face divise également des zones qui peuvent être considérées comme le prolongement naturel du territoire de chacun d'eux, il est fréquent qu'une ligne latérale d'équidistance laisse à l'un des Etats intéressés des zones qui sont le prolongement naturel du territoire de l'autre.

59. Tout différent aussi est, de l'avis de la Cour, le problème de la délimitation latérale entre les eaux territoriales d'Etats limitrophes faite selon l'équidistance. Ainsi que l'ont démontré de façon convaincante les cartes et croquis fournis par les Parties et ainsi qu'on l'a vu au paragraphe 8, les effets de déviation que produisent certaines configurations côtières sur les lignes latérales d'équidistance sont relativement faibles dans les limites des eaux territoriales mais jouent au maximum à l'emplacement des zones de plateau continental au large. Il existe aussi une corrélation directe entre la notion de proximité par rapport à la côte et la juridiction souveraine que l'Etat riverain a le droit et le devoir d'exercer non seulement sur le lit de la mer au-dessous de ses eaux territoriales mais aussi sur ces eaux mêmes, corrélation qui n'existe pas en ce qui concerne le plateau continental car l'Etat n'a aucune juridiction sur les eaux surjacentes et n'a de juridiction sur le lit de la mer qu'à des fins d'exploration et d'exploitation.

60. Les conclusions précédentes laissent encore sans réponse la question de savoir si le principe de l'équidistance en est venu à être considéré comme une règle de droit international coutumier pour une autre raison que la nécessité logique et à priori, c'est-à-dire par les moyens du droit positif, de sorte qu'il s'imposerait à la République fédérale à ce titre bien que l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève ne lui soit pas opposable en tant que tel. Il faut à cette fin étudier la place qu'occupait ce principe lors de la rédaction de la Convention et celle qui lui a été conférée par la Convention elle-même et par la pratique des Etats postérieure à la Convention; mais il doit être nettement entendu que, dans ses énonciations en la matière, la Cour envisage uniquement la clause sur la délimitation (article 6) et nullement d'autres dispositions de la Convention ni la Convention en tant que telle.

61. The first of these questions can conveniently be considered in the form suggested on behalf of Denmark and the Netherlands themselves in the course of the oral hearing, when it was stated that they had not in fact contended that the delimitation article (Article 6) of the Convention “embodied already received rules of customary law in the sense that the Convention was merely declaratory of existing rules”. Their contention was, rather, that although prior to the Conference, continental shelf law was only in the formative stage, and State practice lacked uniformity, yet “the process of the definition and consolidation of the emerging customary law took place through the work of the International Law Commission, the reaction of governments to that work and the proceedings of the Geneva Conference”; and this emerging customary law became “crystallized in the adoption of the Continental Shelf Convention by the Conference”.

62. Whatever validity this contention may have in respect of at least certain parts of the Convention, the Court cannot accept it as regards the delimitation provision (Article 6), the relevant parts of which were adopted almost unchanged from the draft of the International Law Commission that formed the basis of discussion at the Conference. The status of the rule in the Convention therefore depends mainly on the processes that led the Commission to propose it. These processes have already been reviewed in connection with the Danish-Netherlands contention of an a priori necessity for equidistance, and the Court considers this review sufficient for present purposes also, in order to show that the principle of equidistance, as it now figures in Article 6 of the Convention, was proposed by the Commission with considerable hesitation, somewhat on an experimental basis, at most de lege ferenda, and not at all de lege lata or as an emerging rule of customary international law. This is clearly not the sort of foundation on which Article 6 of the Convention could be said to have reflected or crystallized such a rule.

63. The foregoing conclusion receives significant confirmation from the fact that Article 6 is one of those in respect of which, under the reservations article of the Convention (Article 12) reservations may be made by any State on signing, ratifying or acceding,—for, speaking generally, it is a characteristic of purely conventional rules and obligations that, in regard to them, some faculty of making unilateral reservations may, within certain limits, be admitted;—whereas this cannot be so in the case of general or customary law rules and obligations which, by their very nature, must have equal force for all members of the international community, and cannot therefore be the subject of any right of unilateral exclusion exercisable at will by any one of them in its own

61. Il peut être commode d'examiner la première de ces questions sous la forme que lui ont donnée le Danemark et les Pays-Bas dans leurs plaidoiries: ces deux Etats ont alors indiqué qu'en fait ils n'avaient pas soutenu que l'article de la Convention relatif à la délimitation (article 6) « consacrait des règles déjà reçues de droit coutumier, en ce sens que la Convention était simplement déclaratoire des règles existantes ». Leur thèse était plutôt la suivante: si avant la conférence le droit du plateau continental n'était qu'embryonnaire et si la pratique des Etats manquait d'uniformité, il n'en restait pas moins que « la définition et la consolidation du droit coutumier en voie de formation s'étaient effectuées grâce aux travaux de la Commission du droit international, aux réactions des gouvernements devant l'œuvre de la Commission et aux débats de la conférence de Genève » et que ce droit coutumier en voie de formation s'était « cristallisé du fait de l'adoption de la Convention sur le plateau continental par la conférence ».

62. Si juste que soit cette thèse en ce qui concerne du moins certaines parties de la Convention, la Cour ne saurait la retenir pour ce qui est de la clause sur la délimitation (article 6) dont les dispositions pertinentes sont reprises presque sans changement du projet de la Commission du droit international ayant servi de base de discussion à la conférence. La valeur de la règle dans la Convention doit donc surtout être jugée par rapport aux conditions dans lesquelles la Commission a été amenée à la proposer et qui ont déjà été examinées au sujet de la thèse du Danemark et des Pays-Bas sur le caractère nécessaire et à priori de l'équidistance. La Cour considère que cet examen suffit, aux fins du présent raisonnement, à montrer que le principe de l'équidistance, tel qu'il est actuellement énoncé à l'article 6 de la Convention, a été proposé par la Commission avec beaucoup d'hésitation, à titre plutôt expérimental et tout au plus de lege ferenda, donc certainement pas de lege lata ni même à titre de règle de droit international coutumier en voie de formation. Tel n'est manifestement pas le genre de fondement que l'on pourrait invoquer pour prétendre que l'article 6 de la Convention a consacré ou cristallisé la règle de l'équidistance.

63. La conclusion précédente trouve une confirmation significative dans le fait que l'article 6 est l'un des articles à l'égard desquels tout Etat peut formuler des réserves au moment de la signature, de la ratification ou de l'adhésion, en vertu de l'article de la Convention relatif aux réserves (article 12). Il est en général caractéristique d'une règle ou d'une obligation purement conventionnelle que la faculté d'y apporter des réserves unilatérales soit admise dans certaines limites; mais il ne saurait en être ainsi dans le cas de règles et d'obligations de droit général ou coutumier qui par nature doivent s'appliquer dans des conditions égales à tous les membres de la communauté internationale et ne peuvent donc être subordonnées à un droit d'exclusion exercé unilatéralement et à favour. Consequently, it is to be expected that when, for whatever reason, rules or obligations of this order are embodied, or are intended to be reflected in certain provisions of a convention, such provisions will figure amongst those in respect of which a right of unilateral reservation is not conferred, or is excluded. This expectation is, in principle, fulfilled by Article 12 of the Geneva Continental Shelf Convention, which permits reservations to be made to all the articles of the Convention "other than to Articles 1 to 3 inclusive"—these three Articles being the ones which, it is clear, were then regarded as reflecting, or as crystallizing, received or at least emergent rules of customary international law relative to the continental shelf, amongst them the question of the seaward extent of the shelf; the juridical character of the coastal State's entitlement; the nature of the rights exercisable; the kind of natural resources to which these relate; and the preservation intact of the legal status as high seas of the waters over the shelf, and the legal status of the superjacent air-space.

64. The normal inference would therefore be that any articles that do not figure among those excluded from the faculty of reservation under Article 12, were not regarded as declaratory of previously existing or emergent rules of law; and this is the inference the Court in fact draws in respect of Article 6 (delimitation), having regard also to the attitude of the International Law Commission to this provision, as already described in general terms. Naturally this would not of itself prevent this provision from eventually passing into the general corpus of customary international law by one of the processes considered in paragraphs 70-81 below. But that is not here the issue. What is now under consideration is whether it originally figured in the Convention as such a rule.

65. It has however been suggested that the inference drawn at the beginning of the preceding paragraph is not necessarily warranted, seeing that there are certain other provisions of the Convention, also not excluded from the faculty of reservation, but which do undoubtedly in principle relate to matters that lie within the field of received customary law, such as the obligation not to impede the laying or maintenance of submarine cables or pipelines on the continental shelf seabed (Article 4), and the general obligation not unjustifiably to interfere with freedom of navigation, fishing, and so on (Article 5, paragraphs 1 and 6). These matters however, all relate to or are consequential upon principles or rules of general maritime law, very considerably ante-dating the Convention, and not directly connected with but only incidental to continental shelf rights as such. They were mentioned in the Convention, not in order to declare or confirm their existence, which was not necessary, but simply to ensure that they were not prejudiced by the exercise of continental shelf rights as provided for in the Convention. Another method of volonté par l'un quelconque des membres de la communauté à son propre avantage. Par conséquent, il paraît probable que, si pour une raison quelconque l'on consacre ou l'on entend traduire des règles ou des obligations de cet ordre dans certaines dispositions d'une convention, ces dispositions figureront parmi celles au sujet desquelles le droit de formuler des réserves unilatérales n'est pas accordé ou est exclu. C'est ainsi que l'article 12 de la Convention de Genève sur le plateau continental autorise des réserves « aux articles de la Convention autres que les articles 1 à 3 inclus »; ces trois articles sont ceux que l'on a alors manifestement considérés comme consacrant ou cristallisant des règles de droit international coutumier relatives au plateau continental, règles établies ou du moins en voie de formation et visant notamment la question de l'étendue du plateau continental vers le large, le caractère juridique du titre de l'Etat riverain, la nature des droits pouvant être exercés, le genre de ressources naturelles sur lesquelles portent ces droits, le maintien du régime juridique des eaux surjacentes au plateau continental en tant que haute mer, et le maintien du régime juridique de l'espace aérien situé au-dessus de ces eaux.

64. Il semble donc normal de conclure que les articles à propos desquels la faculté de formuler des réserves n'est pas exclue par l'article 12 n'ont pas été considérés comme déclaratoires de règles de droit pré-existantes ou en voie de formation. Telle est bien, en ce qui concerne l'article 6 sur la délimitation, la déduction tirée par la Cour, qui tient également compte de l'attitude, déjà exposée en termes généraux, de la Commission du droit international à l'égard de cette disposition. Cela ne suffirait évidemment pas à empêcher cette disposition de s'intégrer au droit international coutumier par l'un des moyens considérés aux paragraphes 70 à 81 ci-après. Mais là n'est pas la question. Il s'agit pour l'instant de savoir si la disposition a figuré dès l'origine dans la Convention à titre de règle coutumière.

65. On soutient néanmoins que la déduction dont il est fait état au début du paragraphe précédent n'est pas nécessairement fondée car il ne fait pas de doute que certaines autres dispositions de la Convention, à propos desquelles la faculté de faire des réserves n'est pas exclue non plus, se rapportent en principe à des questions relevant du droit coutumier établi; telles sont notamment l'obligation de ne pas entraver la pose ou l'entretien de câbles ou pipe-lines sous-marins sur le plateau continental (article 4), l'obligation générale de ne pas gêner d'une manière injustifiable la navigation, la pêche, etc. (article 5, paragraphes 1 et 6). Mais ces questions concernent toutes, directement ou indirectement, des principes ou des règles de droit maritime général qui sont très antérieurs à la Convention et se rattachent non pas directement mais de manière incidente au régime juridique du plateau continental en tant que tel. Si on les a mentionnées dans la Convention, ce n'était pas pour déclarer ou confirmer leur existence, ce qui n'était pas nécessaire, mais simplement pour faire en sorte que l'exercice des droits relatifs au plateau continental prévus dans la Convention n'y porte pas atteinte. Une autre rédaction aurait pu éviter l'ambiguïté; il n'en reste pas moins qu'un Etat ayant formulé une réserve ne serait pas dégagé pour autant des obligations imposées par le droit maritime général en dehors et indépendamment de la Convention sur le plateau continental, et notamment des obligations énoncées à l'article 2 de la convention sur la haute mer conclue au même moment et définie par son préambule comme déclaratoire de principes établis du droit international.

66. L'article 6 relatif à la délimitation paraît à la Cour se présenter de manière différente. Il se rattache directement au régime juridique du plateau continental en tant que tel et non à des questions incidentes: puisque la faculté de formuler des réserves n'a pas été exclue à son sujet, comme elle l'a été pour les articles 1 à 3, il est légitime d'en déduire qu'on lui a attribué une valeur différente et moins fondamentale et que, contrairement à ces articles, il ne traduisait pas le droit coutumier préexistant ou en voie de formation. Le Danemark et les Pays-Bas ont pourtant soutenu que le droit d'apporter des réserves à l'article 6 n'était pas censé être illimité et qu'en particulier il n'allait pas jusqu'à exclure totalement le principe de délimitation fondé sur l'équidistance, car les articles 1 et 2 de la Convention, à propos desquels aucune réserve n'est autorisée, impliqueraient la délimitation sur la base de l'équidistance. Il en résulterait que le droit de faire des réserves à l'article 6 ne pourrait être exercé que d'une manière compatible avec, au moins, le maintien du principe fondamental de l'équidistance. On a souligné à cet égard que, sur les quatre seules réserves formulées jusqu'à présent au sujet de l'article 6 et dont l'une au moins a une portée assez large, aucune ne vise une exclusion ou un rejet aussi total.

67. La Cour ne juge pas cet argument convaincant pour plusieurs motifs. En premier lieu, il ne semble pas que les articles 1 et 2 de la Convention de Genève aient un rapport direct avec une délimitation entre Etats en tant que telle. L'article 1 ne vise que la limite extérieure du plateau continental du côté du large et non pas sa délimitation entre Etats se faisant face ou entre Etats limitrophes. L'article 2 ne concerne pas davantage ce dernier point. Or il a été suggéré, semble-t-il, que la notion d'équidistance résulte implicitement du caractère « exclusif » attribué par l'article 2, paragraphe 2, aux droits de l'Etat riverain sur le plateau continental. A s'en tenir au texte, cette interprétation est manifestement inexacte. Le véritable sens de ce passage est que, dans toute zone de plateau continental où un Etat riverain a des droits, ces droits sont exclusifs et aucun autre Etat ne peut les exercer. Mais aucune précision n'y est donnée quant aux zones mêmes sur lesquelles chaque Etat riverain possède des droits exclusifs. Cette question, qui ne peut se poser qu'en ce qui concerne les confins du plateau continental d'un Etat, est exactement, comme on l'a vu au paragraphe 20 ci-dessus in fine, celle que le processus de délimitation doit permettre de résoudre et elle relève de l'article 6, non de l'article 2.

drafting might have clarified the point, but this cannot alter the fact that no reservation could release the reserving party from obligations of general maritime law existing outside and independently of the Convention, and especially obligations formalized in Article 2 of the contemporaneous Convention on the High Seas, expressed by its preamble to be declaratory of established principles of international law.

66. Article 6 (delimitation) appears to the Court to be in a different position. It does directly relate to continental shelf rights as such, rather than to matters incidental to these; and since it was not, as were Articles 1 to 3, excluded from the faculty of reservation, it is a legitimate inference that it was considered to have a different and less fundamental status and not, like those Articles, to reflect pre-existing or emergent customary law. It was however contended on behalf of Denmark and the Netherlands that the right of reservation given in respect of Article 6 was not intended to be an unfettered right, and that in particular it does not extend to effecting a total exclusion of the equidistance principle of delimitation,—for, so it was claimed, delimitation on the basis of that principle is implicit in Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention, in respect of which no reservations are permitted. Hence the right of reservation under Article 6 could only be exercised in a manner consistent with the preservation of at least the basic principle of equidistance. In this connection it was pointed out that, of the no more than four reservations so far entered in respect of Article 6, one at least of which was somewhat far-reaching, none has purported to effect such a total exclusion or denial.

67. The Court finds this argument unconvincing for a number of reasons. In the first place, Articles 1 and 2 of the Geneva Convention do not appear to have any direct connection with inter-State delimitation as such. Article 1 is concerned only with the outer, seaward, limit of the shelf generally, not with boundaries between the shelf areas of opposite or adjacent States. Article 2 is equally not concerned with such boundaries. The suggestion seems to be that the notion of equidistance is implicit in the reference in paragraph 2 of Article 2 to the rights of the coastal State over its continental shelf being “exclusive”. So far as actual language is concerned this interpretation is clearly incorrect. The true sense of the passage is that in whatever areas of the continental shelf a coastal State has rights, those rights are exclusive rights, not exercisable by any other State. But this says nothing as to what in fact are the precise areas in respect of which each coastal State possesses these exclusive rights. This question, which can arise only as regards the fringes of a coastal State’s shelf area is, as explained at the end of paragraph 20 above, exactly what falls to be settled through the process of delimitation, and this is the sphere of Article 6, not Article 2.

68. Secondly, it must be observed that no valid conclusions can be drawn from the fact that the faculty of entering reservations to Article 6 has been exercised only sparingly and within certain limits. This is the affair exclusively of those States which have not wished to exercise the faculty, or which have been content to do so only to a limited extent. Their action or inaction cannot affect the right of other States to enter reservations to whatever is the legitimate extent of the right.

69. In the light of these various considerations, the Court reaches the conclusion that the Geneva Convention did not embody or crystallize any pre-existing or emergent rule of customary law, according to which the delimitation of continental shelf areas between adjacent States must, unless the Parties otherwise agree, be carried out on an equidistance-special circumstances basis. A rule was of course embodied in Article 6 of the Convention, but as a purely conventional rule. Whether it has since acquired a broader basis remains to be seen: qua conventional rule however, as has already been concluded, it is not opposable to the Federal Republic.

70. The Court must now proceed to the last stage in the argument put forward on behalf of Denmark and the Netherlands. This is to the effect that even if there was at the date of the Geneva Convention no rule of customary international law in favour of the equidistance principle, and no such rule was crystallized in Article 6 of the Convention, nevertheless such a rule has come into being since the Convention, partly because of its own impact, partly on the basis of subsequent State practice,—and that this rule, being now a rule of customary international law binding on all States, including therefore the Federal Republic, should be declared applicable to the delimitation of the boundaries between the Parties' respective continental shelf areas in the North Sea.

71. In so far as this contention is based on the view that Article 6 of the Convention has had the influence, and has produced the effect, described, it clearly involves treating that Article as a norm-creating provision which has constituted the foundation of, or has generated a rule which, while only conventional or contractual in its origin, has since passed into the general corpus of international law, and is now accepted as such by the opinio juris, so as to have become binding even for countries which have never, and do not, become parties to the Convention. There is no doubt that this process is a perfectly possible one and does from time to time occur: it constitutes indeed one of the recognized methods by which new rules of customary international law may be formed. At the same time this result is not lightly to be regarded as having been attained.

72. It would in the first place be necessary that the provision con-

69. Eu égard aux considérations qui précèdent, la Cour conclut que la Convention de Genève n'a ni consacré ni cristallisé une règle de droit coutumier préexistante ou en voie de formation selon laquelle la délimitation du plateau continental entre Etats limitrophes devrait s'opérer, sauf si les Parties en décident autrement, sur la base d'un principe équidistance-circonstances spéciales. Une règle a bien été établie par l'article 6 de la Convention, mais uniquement en tant que règle conventionnelle. Il reste à voir si elle a acquis depuis lors un fondement plus large car, comme règle conventionnelle, elle n'est pas opposable à la République fédérale, ainsi que la Cour l'a déjà constaté.

70. La Cour doit maintenant aborder la dernière phase de l'argumentation du Danemark et des Pays-Bas. Leur thèse est celle-ci: même si à la date de la Convention de Genève il n'existait aucune règle de droit international coutumier consacrant le principe de l'équidistance et si l'article 6 de la Convention ne cristallisait aucune règle de ce genre, une telle règle est apparue depuis la Convention, du fait pour une part de l'influence exercée par celle-ci et pour une autre de la pratique ultérieure des Etats: cette règle, devenue règle de droit international coutumier liant tous les Etats, y compris par conséquent la République fédérale, devrait être déclarée applicable à la délimitation des zones de plateau continental relevant de chacune des Parties dans la mer du Nord.

71. En attribuant à l'article 6 de la Convention l'influence et l'effet indiqués, cette thèse revient manifestement à le considérer comme une disposition normative ayant servi de base ou de point de départ à une règle qui, purement conventionnelle ou contractuelle à l'origine, se serait depuis lors intégrée à l'ensemble du droit international général et serait maintenant acceptée à ce titre par l'opinio juris, de telle sorte que désormais elle s'imposerait même aux pays qui ne sont pas et n'ont jamais été parties à la Convention. Certes cette situation est du domaine des possibilités et elle se présente de temps à autre: c'est même l'une des méthodes reconnues par lesquelles des règles nouvelles de droit international coutumier peuvent se former. Mais on ne considère pas facilement ce résultat comme atteint.

72. Il faut d'abord que la disposition en cause ait, en tout cas virtuellecerned should, at all events potentially, be of a fundamentally norm-creating character such as could be regarded as forming the basis of a general rule of law. Considered in abstracto the equidistance principle might be said to fulfil this requirement. Yet in the particular form in which it is embodied in Article 6 of the Geneva Convention, and having regard to the relationship of that Article to other provisions of the Convention, this must be open to some doubt. In the first place, Article 6 is so framed as to put second the obligation to make use of the equidistance method, causing it to come after a primary obligation to effect delimitation by agreement. Such a primary obligation constitutes an unusual preface to what is claimed to be a potential general rule of law. Without attempting to enter into, still less pronounce upon any question of jus cogens, it is well understood that, in practice, rules of international law can, by agreement, be derogated from in particular cases, or as between particular parties,—but this is not normally the subject of any express provision, as it is in Article 6 of the Geneva Convention. Secondly the part played by the notion of special circumstances relative to the principle of equidistance as embodied in Article 6, and the very considerable, still unresolved controversies as to the exact meaning and scope of this notion, must raise further doubts as to the potentially norm-creating character of the rule. Finally, the faculty of making reservations to Article 6, while it might not of itself prevent the equidistance principle being eventually received as general law, does add considerably to the difficulty of regarding this result as having been brought about (or being potentially possible) on the basis of the Convention: for so long as this faculty continues to exist, and is not the subject of any revision brought about in consequence of a request made under Article 13 of the Convention—of which there is at present no official indication—it is the Convention itself which would, for the reasons already indicated, seem to deny to the provisions of Article 6 the same norm-creating character as, for instance, Articles 1 and 2 possess.

73. With respect to the other elements usually regarded as necessary before a conventional rule can be considered to have become a general rule of international law, it might be that, even without the passage of any considerable period of time, a very widespread and representative participation in the convention might suffice of itself, provided it included that of States whose interests were specially affected. In the present case however, the Court notes that, even if allowance is made for the existence of a number of States to whom participation in the Geneva Convention is not open, or which, by reason for instance of being land-locked States, would have no interest in becoming parties to it, the number of ratifications and accessions so far secured is, though respectable, hardly sufficient. That non-ratification may sometimes be due to factors other than active disapproval of the convention concerned can hardly constitute a basis on which positive acceptance of its principles can be implied: the reasons are speculative, but the facts remain.

ment, un caractère fondamentalement normatif et puisse ainsi constituer la base d'une règle générale de droit. On peut dire que le principe de l'équidistance, envisagé dans l'abstrait, satisfait à cette condition. Néanmoins, vu la forme particulière qu'il revêt à l'article 6 de la Convention et étant donné le rapport entre cet article et d'autres dispositions de la Convention, on ne peut manquer d'avoir des doutes. En premier lieu, l'article 6 est rédigé de telle sorte qu'il fait passer l'obligation de recourir à la méthode de l'équidistance après l'obligation primordiale d'effectuer la délimitation par voie d'accord. Cette obligation primordiale précéderait de manière bien inusitée ce que l'on prétend être virtuellement une règle de droit général. Sans chercher à aborder la question du jus cogens et encore moins à se prononcer sur elle, on doit admettre qu'en pratique il est possible de déroger par voie d'accord aux règles de droit international dans des cas particuliers ou entre certaines parties, mais cela ne fait pas normalement l'objet d'une disposition expresse comme dans l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève. En second lieu, le rôle que joue la notion de circonstances spéciales par rapport au principe de l'équidistance consacré à l'article 6 et les controverses très importantes, non encore résolues, auxquelles ont donné lieu la portée et le sens de cette notion ne peuvent que susciter d'autres doutes quant au caractère virtuellement normatif de la règle. Enfin, si la faculté d'apporter des réserves à l'article 6 ne suffit peut-être pas à empêcher le principe de l'équidistance de s'intégrer finalement au droit général, elle fait du moins qu'il est beaucoup plus difficile de soutenir que ce résultat a été ou pourrait être atteint sur la base de la Convention: tant que cette faculté demeure et qu'elle n'est pas modifiée à la suite d'une demande de révision formulée en vertu de l'article 13 — demande qu'aucune indication officielle ne laisse présager pour l'instant —, il semble que ce soit la Convention elle-même qui, pour les raisons déjà énoncées, prive les dispositions de l'article 6 du caractère normatif qu'ont par exemple les dispositions des articles 1 et 2.

74. As regards the time element, the Court notes that it is over ten years since the Convention was signed, but that it is even now less than five since it came into force in June 1964, and that when the present proceedings were brought it was less than three years, while less than one had elapsed at the time when the respective negotiations between the Federal Republic and the other two Parties for a complete delimitation broke down on the question of the application of the equidistance principle. Although the passage of only a short period of time is not necessarily, or of itself, a bar to the formation of a new rule of customary international law on the basis of what was originally a purely conventional rule, an indispensable requirement would be that within the period in question, short though it might be, State practice, including that of States whose interests are specially affected, should have been both extensive and virtually uniform in the sense of the provision invoked;— and should moreover have occurred in such a way as to show a general recognition that a rule of law or legal obligation is involved.

75. The Court must now consider whether State practice in the matter of continental shelf delimitation has, subsequent to the Geneva Convention, been of such a kind as to satisfy this requirement. Leaving aside cases which, for various reasons, the Court does not consider to be reliable guides as precedents, such as delimitations effected between the present Parties themselves, or not relating to international boundaries, some fifteen cases have been cited in the course of the present proceedings, occurring mostly since the signature of the 1958 Geneva Convention, in which continental shelf boundaries have been delimited according to the equidistance principle—in the majority of the cases by agreement, in a few others unilaterally—or else the delimitation was foreshadowed but has not yet been carried out. Amongst these fifteen are the four North Sea delimitations United Kingdom/Norway-Denmark-Netherlands, and Norway/Denmark already mentioned in paragraph 4 of this Judgment. But even if these various cases constituted more than a very small proportion of those potentially calling for delimitation in the world as a whole, the Court would not think it necessary to enumerate or evaluate them separately, since there are, a priori, several grounds which deprive them of weight as precedents in the present context.

76. To begin with, over half the States concerned, whether acting unilaterally or conjointly, were or shortly became parties to the Geneva Convention, and were therefore presumably, so far as they were concerned, acting actually or potentially in the application of the Convention. From their action no inference could legitimately be drawn as to the existence of a rule of customary international law in favour of the equidistance principle. As regards those States, on the other hand, which were not, and have not become parties to the Convention, the basis of

74. En ce qui concerne l'élément de temps, la Cour constate qu'il y a actuellement plus de dix ans que la Convention a été signée et moins de cinq ans qu'elle est entrée en vigueur (juin 1964); lorsque la présente affaire a été introduite, il y en avait moins de trois; enfin moins d'un an s'était écoulé lorsque les négociations bilatérales tendant à une délimitation complète entre la République fédérale et les deux autres Parties ont échoué sur la question de l'application du principe de l'équidistance. Bien que le fait qu'il ne se soit écoulé qu'un bref laps de temps ne constitue pas nécessairement en soi un empêchement à la formation d'une règle nouvelle de droit international coutumier à partir d'une règle purement conventionnelle à l'origine, il demeure indispensable que dans ce laps de temps, aussi bref qu'il ait été, la pratique des Etats, y compris ceux qui sont particulièrement intéressés, ait été fréquente et pratiquement uniforme dans le sens de la disposition invoquée et se soit manifestée de manière à établir une reconnaissance générale du fait qu'une règle de droit ou une obligation juridique est en jeu.

75. La Cour doit maintenant rechercher si, depuis la Convention de Genève, la pratique des Etats en matière de délimitation du plateau continental a été de nature à satisfaire à cette condition. Abstraction faite des cas que la Cour, pour divers motifs, ne considère pas comme des précédents sur lesquels on puisse se fonder, notamment les délimitations effectuées entre les Parties à la présente affaire ou ne concernant pas des limites internationales, on a cité au cours de la procédure une quinzaine de cas où des limites de plateau continental ont été déterminées selon le principe de l'équidistance; la plupart sont postérieurs à la signature de la Convention de Genève de 1958; le plus souvent la délimitation a été opérée par voie d'accord, parfois elle l'a été unilatéralement, parfois aussi elle est prévue mais n'a pas encore été réalisée. Parmi ces quelque quinze exemples, on relève les quatre délimitations concernant la mer du Nord déjà mentionnées au paragraphe 4 du présent arrêt: Royaume-Uni/Norvège-Danemark-Pays-Bas et Norvège/Danemark. Même s'ils représentaient plus qu'une très faible proportion des cas possibles de délimitation dans le monde, la Cour n'estimerait pas nécessaire de les énumérer ou de les examiner séparément car plusieurs raisons leur enlèvent à priori la valeur de précédents en l'espèce.

76. Tout d'abord plus de la moitié des Etats intéressés, qu'ils aient agi unilatéralement ou conjointement, étaient, ou sont bientôt devenus, parties à la Convention de Genève et il est donc permis de supposer que leur action s'inscrivait en fait ou virtuellement dans le cadre de l'application de la Convention. On ne saurait donc légitimement en déduire qu'il existe une règle de droit international coutumier consacrant le principe de l'équidistance. Pour les Etats qui n'étaient pas et ne sont pas devenus depuis lors parties à la Convention, les raisons de leur action ne their action can only be problematical and must remain entirely speculative. Clearly, they were not applying the Convention. But from that no inference could justifiably be drawn that they believed themselves to be applying a mandatory rule of customary international law. There is not a shred of evidence that they did and, as has been seen (paragraphs 22 and 23), there is no lack of other reasons for using the equidistance method, so that acting, or agreeing to act in a certain way, does not of itself demonstrate anything of a juridical nature.

77. The essential point in this connection—and it seems necessary to stress it—is that even if these instances of action by non-parties to the Convention were much more numerous than they in fact are, they would not, even in the aggregate, suffice in themselves to constitute the opinio juris;—for, in order to achieve this result, two conditions must be fulfilled. Not only must the acts concerned amount to a settled practice, but they must also be such, or be carried out in such a way, as to be evidence of a belief that this practice is rendered obligatory by the existence of a rule of law requiring it. The need for such a belief, i.e., the existence of a subjective element, is implicit in the very notion of the opinio juris sive necessitatis. The States concerned must therefore feel that they are conforming to what amounts to a legal obligation. The frequency, or even habitual character of the acts is not in itself enough. There are many international acts, e.g., in the field of ceremonial and protocol, which are performed almost invariably, but which are motivated only by considerations of courtesy, convenience or tradition, and not by any sense of legal duty.

78. In this respect the Court follows the view adopted by the Permanent Court of International Justice in the Lotus case, as stated in the following passage, the principle of which is, by analogy, applicable almost word for word, mutatis mutandis, to the present case (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 10, 1927, at p. 28):

“Even if the rarity of the judicial decisions to be found . . . were sufficient to prove . . . the circumstance alleged . . ., it would merely show that States had often, in practice, abstained from instituting criminal proceedings, and not that they recognized themselves as being obliged to do so; for only if such abstention were based on their being conscious of having a duty to abstain would it be possible to speak of an international custom. The alleged fact does not allow one to infer that States have been conscious of having such a duty; on the other hand, . . . there are other circumstances calculated to show that the contrary is true.”

Applying this dictum to the present case, the position is simply that in certain cases—not a great number—the States concerned agreed to draw or did draw the boundaries concerned according to the principle of equidistance. There is no evidence that they so acted because they felt peuvent être que problématiques et restent entièrement du domaine de la conjecture. Il est clair que ces Etats n'appliquaient pas la Convention, mais il serait excessif d'en conclure qu'ils croyaient appliquer une règle de droit international coutumier à caractère obligatoire. Il n'existe pas le moindre indice en ce sens et, comme on l'a vu aux paragraphes 22 et 23, il ne manquait pas d'autres raisons de recourir à la méthode de l'équidistance, de sorte que le fait d'avoir agi ou de s'être engagé à agir d'une certaine façon ne prouve rien sur le plan juridique.

77. L'élément essentiel à cet égard — il semble nécessaire de le souligner — est que, même si pareille attitude avait été beaucoup plus fréquente de la part des Etats non parties à la Convention, ces actes, même considérés globalement, ne suffiraient pas en eux-mêmes à constituer l'opinio juris car, pour parvenir à ce résultat, deux conditions doivent être remplies. Non seulement les actes considérés doivent représenter une pratique constante, mais en outre ils doivent témoigner, par leur nature ou la manière dont ils sont accomplis, de la conviction que cette pratique est rendue obligatoire par l'existence d'une règle de droit. La nécessité de pareille conviction, c'est-à-dire l'existence d'un élément subjectif, est implicite dans la notion même d'opinio juris sive necessitatis. Les Etats intéressés doivent donc avoir le sentiment de se conformer à ce qui équivaut à une obligation juridique. Ni la fréquence ni même le caractère habituel des actes ne suffisent. Il existe nombre d'actes internationaux, dans le domaine du protocole par exemple, qui sont accomplis presque invariablement mais sont motivés par de simples considérations de courtoisie, d'opportunité ou de tradition et non par le sentiment d'une obligation juridique.

78. A cet égard la Cour fait sienne l'opinion de la Cour permanente de Justice internationale dans l'affaire du Lotus, telle qu'elle est énoncée dans le passage suivant, et dont le principe est applicable par analogie à la présente espèce presque mot pour mot mutatis mutandis (C.P.J.I. série A n° 10, 1927, p. 28):

« Même si la rareté des décisions judiciaires que l'on peut trouver... était une preuve suffisante du fait invoqué..., il en résulterait simplement que les Etats se sont abstenus, en fait, d'exercer des poursuites pénales, et non qu'ils se reconnaissent obligés de ce faire; or, c'est seulement si l'abstention était motivée par la conscience d'un devoir de s'abstenir que l'on pourrait parler de coutume internationale. Le fait allégué ne permet pas de conclure que les Etats aient été conscients de pareil devoir; par contre, ... il y a d'autres circonstances qui sont de nature à persuader du contraire. »

Si l'on applique ce prononcé à la présente affaire, on doit simplement constater que dans certains cas peu nombreux des Etats sont convenus de tracer, ou ont tracé, les limites qui les concernent suivant le principe de l'équidistance. Rien ne prouve qu'ils aient agi ainsi parce qu'ils s'y legally compelled to draw them in this way by reason of a rule of customary law obliging them to do so—especially considering that they might have been motivated by other obvious factors.

79. Finally, it appears that in almost all of the cases cited, the delimitations concerned were median-line delimitations between opposite States, not lateral delimitations between adjacent States. For reasons which have already been given (paragraph 57) the Court regards the case of median-line delimitations between opposite States as different in various respects, and as being sufficiently distinct not to constitute a precedent for the delimitation of lateral boundaries. In only one situation discussed by the Parties does there appear to have been a geographical configuration which to some extent resembles the present one, in the sense that a number of States on the same coastline are grouped around a sharp curve or bend of it. No complete delimitation in this area has however yet been carried out. But the Court is not concerned to deny to this case, or any other of those cited, all evidential value in favour of the thesis of Denmark and the Netherlands. It simply considers that they are inconclusive, and insufficient to bear the weight sought to be put upon them as evidence of such a settled practice, manifested in such circumstances, as would justify the inference that delimitation according to the principle of equidistance amounts to a mandatory rule of customary international law,—more particularly where lateral delimitations are concerned.

80. There are of course plenty of cases (and a considerable number were cited) of delimitations of waters, as opposed to seabed, being carried out on the basis of equidistance—mostly of internal waters (lakes, rivers, etc.), and mostly median-line cases. The nearest analogy is that of adjacent territorial waters, but as already explained (paragraph 59) the Court does not consider this case to be analogous to that of the continental shelf.

81. The Court accordingly concludes that if the Geneva Convention was not in its origins or inception declaratory of a mandatory rule of customary international law enjoining the use of the equidistance principle for the delimitation of continental shelf areas between adjacent States, neither has its subsequent effect been constitutive of such a rule; and that State practice up-to-date has equally been insufficient for the purpose.

82. The immediately foregoing conclusion, coupled with that reached earlier (paragraph 56) to the effect that the equidistance principle could not be regarded as being a rule of law on any a priori basis of logical sentaient juridiquement tenus par une règle obligatoire de droit coutumier, surtout si l'on songe que d'autres facteurs ont pu motiver leur action.

79. Enfin il semble que, dans presque tous les cas de délimitation invoqués, il s'est agi de tracer des lignes médianes entre Etats se faisant face et non des limites latérales entre Etats limitrophes. Pour les motifs déjà indiqués au paragraphe 57, la Cour considère que les délimitations effectuées selon des lignes médianes entre Etats se faisant face sont à divers égards différentes des délimitations latérales et qu'elles s'en distinguent suffisamment pour ne pas constituer un précédent pour la fixation de limites latérales. Il semble qu'une seule des situations évoquées par les Parties se rapporte à une configuration géographique ressemblant dans une certaine mesure à celle de la présente espèce, en ce sens que plusieurs Etats sont groupés le long d'une côte fortement incurvée. Or, jusqu'à présent, il n'a pas été effectué de délimitation complète dans la région dont il s'agit. Ce n'est pas que la Cour refuse aux exemples cités toute valeur probante à l'appui de la thèse du Danemark et des Pays-Bas; elle estime simplement qu'ils ne sont pas décisifs et ne suffisent pas à établir, comme on le voudrait, une pratique constante manifestée dans des circonstances permettant de conclure que la délimitation suivant le principe de l'équidistance constitue une règle obligatoire de droit international coutumier, en particulier en matière de délimitation latérale.

80. Bien entendu, dans de nombreux cas dont beaucoup ont été mentionnés, l'équidistance a été appliquée pour délimiter des eaux, par opposition à des fonds marins: il s'est agi surtout d'eaux intérieures (lacs, fleuves, etc.) et de délimitations suivant les lignes médianes. Le cas le plus voisin est celui des eaux territoriales adjacentes mais, ainsi qu'on l'a déjà vu au paragraphe 59, la Cour ne le considère pas comme analogue à celui du plateau continental.

81. La Cour conclut donc que, si la Convention de Genève n'était ni dans ses origines ni dans ses prémices déclaratoire d'une règle obligatoire de droit international coutumier imposant l'emploi du principe de l'équidistance pour la délimitation du plateau continental entre Etats limitrophes, elle n'a pas non plus par ses effets ultérieurs abouti à la formation d'une telle règle; et que la pratique des Etats jusqu'à ce jour a également été insuffisante à cet égard.

82. La conclusion qui précède, jointe à celle qui a déjà été formulée au paragraphe 56 et suivant laquelle le principe de l'équidistance ne saurait être considéré comme constituant a priori une règle de droit découlant necessity deriving from the fundamental theory of the continental shelf, leads to the final conclusion on this part of the case that the use of the equidistance method is not obligatory for the delimitation of the areas concerned in the present proceedings. In these circumstances, it becomes unnecessary for the Court to determine whether or not the configuration of the German North Sea coast constitutes a "special circumstance" for the purposes either of Article 6 of the Geneva Convention or of any rule of customary international law,—since once the use of the equidistance method of delimitation is determined not to be obligatory in any event, it ceases to be legally necessary to prove the existence of special circumstances in order to justify not using that method.

83. The legal situation therefore is that the Parties are under no obligation to apply either the 1958 Convention, which is not opposable to the Federal Republic, or the equidistance method as a mandatory rule of customary law, which it is not. But as between States faced with an issue concerning the lateral delimitation of adjacent continental shelves, there are still rules and principles of law to be applied; and in the present case it is not the fact either that rules are lacking, or that the situation is one for the unfettered appreciation of the Parties. Equally, it is not the case that if the equidistance principle is not a rule of law, there has to be as an alternative some other single equivalent rule.

84. As already indicated, the Court is not called upon itself to delimit the areas of continental shelf appertaining respectively to each Party, and in consequence is not bound to prescribe the methods to be employed for the purposes of such a delimitation. The Court has to indicate to the Parties the principles and rules of law in the light of which the methods for eventually effecting the delimitation will have to be chosen. The Court will discharge this task in such a way as to provide the Parties with the requisite directions, without substituting itself for them by means of a detailed indication of the methods to be followed and the factors to be taken into account for the purposes of a delimitation the carrying out of which the Parties have expressly reserved to themselves.

85. It emerges from the history of the development of the legal régime of the continental shelf, which has been reviewed earlier, that the essential reason why the equidistance method is not to be regarded as a rule of law is that, if it were to be compulsorily applied in all situations, this would not be consonant with certain basic legal notions which, as has been observed in paragraphs 48 and 55, have from the beginning reflected the opinio juris in the matter of delimitation; those principles being that delimitation must be the object of agreement between the States concerned, and that such agreement must be arrived at in accordance with equitable principles. On a foundation of very general precepts of justice and good faith, actual rules of law are here involved which govern the logiquement de la conception fondamentale du plateau continental, amène à conclure sur cet aspect de l'affaire que l'emploi de la méthode de l'équidistance n'est pas obligatoire pour la délimitation des zones en cause. Dans ces conditions, la Cour n'a pas à déterminer si la configuration de la côte allemande de la mer du Nord constitue ou non une « circonstance spéciale » aux fins de l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève ou de toute règle de droit international coutumier; en effet, dès lors qu'il est établi que la méthode de délimitation fondée sur l'équidistance n'est en aucune façon obligatoire, il cesse d'être juridiquement nécessaire de prouver l'existence de circonstances spéciales pour en justifier la non-application.

83. La situation juridique est donc que les Parties ne sont tenues d'appliquer ni la Convention de 1958 qui n'est pas opposable à la République fédérale, ni la méthode de l'équidistance en tant que règle obligatoire de droit coutumier, ce qu'elle n'est pas. Mais entre Etats qui ont un problème de délimitation latérale de plateaux continentaux limitrophes il demeure des règles et principes de droit à appliquer et il ne s'agit, en l'espèce, ni d'une absence de règles, ni d'une appréciation entièrement libre de la situation par les Parties. Il ne s'agit pas non plus, si le principe de l'équidistance n'est pas la règle de droit, d'avoir à titre subsidiaire une autre règle unique équivalente.

84. Comme il a été indiqué plus haut, la Cour n'a pas à faire elle-même une délimitation des zones de plateau continental relevant respectivement de chaque Partie et elle n'est par conséquent pas tenue de prescrire les méthodes à utiliser pour procéder à cette délimitation. La Cour doit indiquer aux Parties les principes et règles de droit en fonction desquels devra se faire le choix des méthodes pour effectuer finalement la délimitation. La Cour s'acquittera de cette tâche de manière à fournir aux Parties les directions nécessaires, sans se substituer à elles par une indication détaillée des méthodes à suivre et des éléments à prendre en considération aux fins d'une délimitation que les Parties se sont formellement réservé de faire elles-mêmes.

85. Il ressort de l'histoire du développement du régime juridique du plateau continental, qui a été rappelée ci-dessus, que la raison essentielle pour laquelle la méthode de l'équidistance ne peut être tenue pour une règle de droit est que, si elle devait être appliquée obligatoirement en toutes situations, cette méthode ne correspondrait pas à certaines notions juridiques de base qui, comme on l'a constaté aux paragraphes 48 et 55, reflètent depuis l'origine l'opinio juris en matière de délimitation; ces principes sont que la délimitation doit être l'objet d'un accord entre les Etats intéressés et que cet accord doit se réaliser selon des principes équitables. Il s'agit là, sur la base de préceptes très généraux de justice et de bonne foi, de véritables règles de droit en matière de délimitation des delimitation of adjacent continental shelves—that is to say, rules binding upon States for all delimitations;—in short, it is not a question of applying equity simply as a matter of abstract justice, but of applying a rule of law which itself requires the application of equitable principles, in accordance with the ideas which have always underlain the development of the legal régime of the continental shelf in this field, namely:

- (a) the parties are under an obligation to enter into negotiations with a view to arriving at an agreement, and not merely to go through a formal process of negotiation as a sort of prior condition for the automatic application of a certain method of delimitation in the absence of agreement; they are under an obligation so to conduct themselves that the negotiations are meaningful, which will not be the case when either of them insists upon its own position without contemplating any modification of it;
- (b) the parties are under an obligation to act in such a way that, in the particular case, and taking all the circumstances into account, equitable principles are applied,—for this purpose the equidistance method can be used, but other methods exist and may be employed, alone or in combination, according to the areas involved;
- (c) for the reasons given in paragraphs 43 and 44, the continental shelf of any State must be the natural prolongation of its land territory and must not encroach upon what is the natural prolongation of the territory of another State.

86. It is now necessary to examine these rules more closely, as also certain problems relative to their application. So far as the first rule is concerned, the Court would recall not only that the obligation to negotiate which the Parties assumed by Article I, paragraph 2, of the Special Agreements arises out of the Truman Proclamation, which, for the reasons given in paragraph 47, must be considered as having propounded the rules of law in this field, but also that this obligation merely constitutes a special application of a principle which underlies all international relations, and which is moreover recognized in Article 33 of the Charter of the United Nations as one of the methods for the peaceful settlement of international disputes. There is no need to insist upon the fundamental character of this method of settlement, except to point out that it is emphasized by the observable fact that judicial or arbitral settlement is not universally accepted.

87. As the Permanent Court of International Justice said in its Order of 19 August 1929 in the case of the Free Zones of Upper Savoy and the District of Gex, the judicial settlement of international disputes “is simply an alternative to the direct and friendly settlement of such disputes between the parties” (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 22, at p. 13). Defining the content of the obligation to negotiate, the Permanent Court, in its plateaux continentaux limitrophes, c'est-à-dire, de règles obligatoires pour les Etats pour toute délimitation; en d'autres termes, il ne s'agit pas d'appliquer l'équité simplement comme une représentation de la justice abstraite, mais d'appliquer une règle de droit prescrivant le recours à des principes équitables conformément aux idées qui ont toujours inspiré le développement du régime juridique du plateau continental en la matière, à savoir:

- a) les parties sont tenues d'engager une négociation en vue de réaliser un accord et non pas simplement de procéder à une négociation formelle comme une sorte de condition préalable à l'application automatique d'une certaine méthode de délimitation faute d'accord; les parties ont l'obligation de se comporter de telle manière que la négociation ait un sens, ce qui n'est pas le cas lorsque l'une d'elles insiste sur sa propre position sans envisager aucune modification;
- b) les parties sont tenues d'agir de telle sorte que, dans le cas d'espèce et compte tenu de toutes les circonstances, des principes équitables soient appliqués; à cet effet la méthode de l'équidistance peut être appliquée; d'autres aussi existent et peuvent être utilisées exclusivement ou conjointement selon les secteurs envisagés;
- c) pour les raisons exposées aux paragraphes 43 et 44, le plateau continental de tout Etat doit être le prolongement naturel de son territoire et ne doit pas empiéter sur ce qui est le prolongement naturel du territoire d'un autre Etat.

86. Il convient maintenant d'examiner ces règles de plus près, ainsi que certains problèmes relatifs à leur application. En ce qui concerne la première règle, la Cour rappelle que l'obligation de négocier assumée par les Parties dans l'article 1, paragraphe 2, des compromis, non seulement découle de la proclamation Truman qui, pour les motifs énoncés au paragraphe 47, doit être considérée comme ayant posé les règles de droit en la matière, mais encore ne constitue qu'une application particulière d'un principe, qui est à la base de toutes relations internationales et qui est d'ailleurs reconnu dans l'article 33 de la Charte des Nations Unies comme l'une des méthodes de règlement pacifique des différends internationaux; il est inutile d'insister sur le caractère fondamental de cette forme de règlement sinon pour remarquer qu'il est renforcé par la constatation que le règlement judiciaire ou arbitral n'est pas généralement accepté.

87. Comme l'a dit la Cour permanente de Justice internationale dans son ordonnance du 19 août 1929 en l'affaire des Zones franches de la Haute-Savoie et du Pays de Gex, le règlement judiciaire des conflits internationaux « n'est qu'un succédané au règlement direct et amiable de ces conflits entre les parties » (C.P.J.I. série A n° 22, p. 13). Définissant dans son avis consultatif sur le Trafic ferroviaire entre la Lituanie et la

Advisory Opinion in the case of Railway Traffic between Lithuania and Poland, said that the obligation was “not only to enter into negotiations but also to pursue them as far as possible with a view to concluding agreements”, even if an obligation to negotiate did not imply an obligation to reach agreement (P.C.I.J., Series A/B, No. 42, 1931, at p. 116). In the present case, it needs to be observed that whatever the details of the negotiations carried on in 1965 and 1966, they failed of their purpose because the Kingdoms of Denmark and the Netherlands, convinced that the equidistance principle alone was applicable, in consequence of a rule binding upon the Federal Republic, saw no reason to depart from that rule; and equally, given the geographical considerations stated in the last sentence of paragraph 7 above, the Federal Republic could not accept the situation resulting from the application of that rule. So far therefore the negotiations have not satisfied the conditions indicated in paragraph 85 (a), but fresh negotiations are to take place on the basis of the present Judgment.

88. The Court comes next to the rule of equity. The legal basis of that rule in the particular case of the delimitation of the continental shelf as between adjoining States has already been stated. It must however be noted that the rule rests also on a broader basis. Whatever the legal reasoning of a court of justice, its decisions must by definition be just, and therefore in that sense equitable. Nevertheless, when mention is made of a court dispensing justice or declaring the law, what is meant is that the decision finds its objective justification in considerations lying not outside but within the rules, and in this field it is precisely a rule of law that calls for the application of equitable principles. There is consequently no question in this case of any decision ex aequo et bono, such as would only be possible under the conditions prescribed by Article 38, paragraph 2, of the Court’s Statute. Nor would this be the first time that the Court has adopted such an attitude, as is shown by the following passage from the Advisory Opinion given in the case of Judgments of the Administrative Tribunal of the I.L.O. upon Complaints Made against Unesco (I.C.J. Reports 1956, at p. 100):

“In view of this the Court need not examine the allegation that the validity of the judgments of the Tribunal is vitiated by excess of jurisdiction on the ground that it awarded compensation ex aequo et bono. It will confine itself to stating that, in the reasons given by the Tribunal in support of its decision on the merits, the Tribunal said: ‘That redress will be ensured ex aequo et bono by the granting to the complainant of the sum set forth below.’ It does not appear from the context of the judgment that the Tribunal thereby intended to depart from principles of law. The apparent intention was to say Pologne la teneur de l'obligation de négocier, la Cour permanente a dit que cette obligation « n'est pas seulement d'entamer des négociations, mais encore de les poursuivre autant que possible, en vue d'arriver à des accords », même si l'engagement de négocier n'impliquait pas celui de s'entendre (C.P.J.I. série A/B n° 42, 1931, p. 116). Dans la présente affaire on doit noter que, quels qu'en aient été les détails, les négociations menées en 1965 et 1966 n'ont pas atteint leur but parce que les Royaumes du Danemark et des Pays-Bas, convaincus que le principe de l'équidistance était seul applicable et cela par l'effet d'une règle obligatoire pour la République fédérale, ne voyaient aucun motif de s'écarter de cette règle, de même que, vu les considérations d'ordre géographique dont il est fait état au paragraphe 7 ci-dessus in fine, la République fédérale ne pouvait accepter la situation résultant de l'application de cette règle; les négociations menées jusqu'à présent n'ont donc pas satisfait aux conditions énoncées au paragraphe 85 a), mais de nouvelles négociations doivent se tenir sur la base du présent arrêt.

88. La Cour en vient maintenant à la règle de l'équité. Le fondement juridique de cette règle dans le cas particulier de la délimitation du plateau continental entre Etats limitrophes a déjà été précisé. Il faut noter cependant que cette règle repose aussi sur une base plus large. Quel que soit le raisonnement juridique du juge, ses décisions doivent par définition être justes, donc en ce sens équitables. Néanmoins, lorsqu'on parle du juge qui rend la justice ou qui dit le droit, il s'agit de justification objective de ses décisions non pas au-delà des textes mais selon les textes et dans ce domaine c'est précisément une règle de droit qui appelle l'application de principes équitables. Il n'est par conséquent pas question en l'espèce d'une décision ex aequo et bono, ce qui ne serait possible que dans les conditions prescrites à l'article 38, paragraphe 2, du Statut de la Cour. Ce ne serait d'ailleurs pas la première fois que la Cour adopterait une telle position, ainsi que cela ressort de son avis consultatif en l'affaire des Jugements du tribunal administratif de l'O.I.T. sur requête contre l'Unesco (C.I.J. Recueil 1956, p. 100):

« Dans ces conditions, la Cour n'a pas à examiner la prétention selon laquelle la validité des jugements du tribunal serait viciée par un dépassement de compétence du fait qu'il a été accordé des indemnités ex aequo et bono. Elle se bornera à dire que si le tribunal, dans les motifs de sa décision sur le fond, a dit « que la réparation sera assurée ex aequo et bono par l'allocation au requérant du montant ci-après », le contexte ne fait nullement apparaître que le tribunal ait entendu par là se départir des principes du droit. Il a voulu seulement énoncer que, le calcul du montant de l'indemnité ne pouvant pas that, as the precise determination of the actual amount to be awarded could not be based on any specific rule of law, the Tribunal fixed what the Court, in other circumstances, has described as the true measure of compensation and the reasonable figure of such compensation (Corfu Channel case, Judgment of December 15th, 1949, I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 249).”

89. It must next be observed that, in certain geographical circumstances which are quite frequently met with, the equidistance method, despite its known advantages, leads unquestionably to inequity, in the following sense:

- (a) The slightest irregularity in a coastline is automatically magnified by the equidistance line as regards the consequences for the delimitation of the continental shelf. Thus it has been seen in the case of concave or convex coastlines that if the equidistance method is employed, then the greater the irregularity and the further from the coastline the area to be delimited, the more unreasonable are the results produced. So great an exaggeration of the consequences of a natural geographical feature must be remedied or compensated for as far as possible, being of itself creative of inequity.
- (b) In the case of the North Sea in particular, where there is no outer boundary to the continental shelf, it happens that the claims of several States converge, meet and intercross in localities where, despite their distance from the coast, the bed of the sea still unquestionably consists of continental shelf. A study of these convergences, as revealed by the maps, shows how inequitable would be the apparent simplification brought about by a delimitation which, ignoring such geographical circumstances, was based solely on the equidistance method.

90. If for the above reasons equity excludes the use of the equidistance method in the present instance, as the sole method of delimitation, the question arises whether there is any necessity to employ only one method for the purposes of a given delimitation. There is no logical basis for this, and no objection need be felt to the idea of effecting a delimitation of adjoining continental shelf areas by the concurrent use of various methods. The Court has already stated why it considers that the international law of continental shelf delimitation does not involve any imperative rule and permits resort to various principles or methods, as may be appropriate, or a combination of them, provided that, by the application of equitable principles, a reasonable result is arrived at.

91. Equity does not necessarily imply equality. There can never be any question of completely refashioning nature, and equity does not require that a State without access to the sea should be allotted an area of continental shelf, any more than there could be a question of rendering the situation of a State with an extensive coastline similar to that of a être déduit de règles de droit posées à cet effet, il entendait fixer ce que la Cour a, en d'autres circonstances, appelé la juste mesure de la réparation, le chiffre raisonnable de celle-ci (affaire du Détroit de Corfou, arrêt du 15 décembre 1949, C.I.J. Recueil 1949, p. 249). »

89. Il faut ensuite constater que, malgré ses avantages reconnus, la méthode de l'équidistance aboutit dans certaines conditions géographiques assez fréquentes à créer une incontestable inéquité :

- a) La moindre déformation d'une côte est automatiquement amplifiée par la ligne d'équidistance dans ses conséquences pour la délimitation du plateau continental. C'est ainsi qu'on a vu dans le cas des côtes concaves ou convexes que, si l'on applique la méthode de l'équidistance, on aboutit à des résultats d'autant plus déraisonnables que la déformation est considérable et que la zone à délimiter est éloignée de la côte. Une exagération d'une telle importance des conséquences d'un accident géographique naturel doit être réparée ou compensée dans la mesure du possible parce qu'elle est en soi créatrice d'inéquité.
- b) Particulièrement dans le cas de la mer du Nord où le plateau continental ne rencontre aucune limite extérieure, il se trouve que les prétentions de plusieurs Etats convergent, se rencontrent et s'entrecroisent en des endroits où, en dépit de la distance des côtes, le lit de la mer consiste encore en un plateau continental. La constatation de ces convergences, manifestes sur la carte, révèle combien inéquitable serait la simplification apparente d'une délimitation qui ne serait fondée que sur la méthode de l'équidistance en ignorant cette circonstance géographique.

State with a restricted coastline. Equality is to be reckoned within the same plane, and it is not such natural inequalities as these that equity could remedy. But in the present case there are three States whose North Sea coastlines are in fact comparable in length and which, therefore, have been given broadly equal treatment by nature except that the configuration of one of the coastlines would, if the equidistance method is used, deny to one of these States treatment equal or comparable to that given the other two. Here indeed is a case where, in a theoretical situation of equality within the same order, an inequity is created. What is unacceptable in this instance is that a State should enjoy continental shelf rights considerably different from those of its neighbours merely because in the one case the coastline is roughly convex in form and in the other it is markedly concave, although those coastlines are comparable in length. It is therefore not a question of totally refashioning geography whatever the facts of the situation but, given a geographical situation of quasi-equality as between a number of States, of abating the effects of an incidental special feature from which an unjustifiable difference of treatment could result.

92. It has however been maintained that no one method of delimitation can prevent such results and that all can lead to relative injustices. This argument has in effect already been dealt with. It can only strengthen the view that it is necessary to seek not one method of delimitation but one goal. It is in this spirit that the Court must examine the question of how the continental shelf can be delimited when it is in fact the case that the equidistance principle does not provide an equitable solution. As the operation of delimiting is a matter of determining areas appertaining to different jurisdictions, it is a truism to say that the determination must be equitable; rather is the problem above all one of defining the means whereby the delimitation can be carried out in such a way as to be recognized as equitable. Although the Parties have made it known that they intend to reserve for themselves the application of the principles and rules laid down by the Court, it would, even so, be insufficient simply to rely on the rule of equity without giving some degree of indication as to the possible ways in which it might be applied in the present case, it being understood that the Parties will be free to agree upon one method rather than another, or different methods if they so prefer.

93. In fact, there is no legal limit to the considerations which States may take account of for the purpose of making sure that they apply equitable procedures, and more often than not it is the balancing-up of all such considerations that will produce this result rather than reliance on one to the exclusion of all others. The problem of the relative weight to be accorded to different considerations naturally varies with the circumstances of the case.

94. In balancing the factors in question it would appear that various aspects must be taken into account. Some are related to the geological, others to the geographical aspect of the situation, others again to the se mesure dans un même plan et ce n'est pas à de telles inégalités naturelles que l'équité pourrait porter remède. Mais en l'espèce il s'agit de trois Etats dont les côtes sur la mer du Nord sont justement d'une longueur comparable et qui par conséquent ont été traités à peu près également par la nature, sauf que l'une de ces côtes par sa configuration priverait l'un des Etats d'un traitement égal ou comparable à celui que recevraient les deux autres si l'on utilisait la méthode de l'équidistance. C'est bien un cas où, dans une situation théorique d'égalité dans le même plan, une inéquité est créée. Ce qui est inacceptable en l'espèce est qu'un Etat ait des droits considérablement différents de ses voisins sur le plateau continental du seul fait que l'un a une côte de configuration plutôt convexe et l'autre une côte de configuration fortement concave, même si la longueur de ces côtes est comparable. Il ne s'agit donc pas de refaire totalement la géographie dans n'importe quelle situation de fait mais, en présence d'une situation géographique de quasi-égalité entre plusieurs Etats, de remédier à une particularité non essentielle d'où pourrait résulter une injustifiable différence de traitement.

92. Il a été soutenu qu'aucune méthode de délimitation ne peut empêcher de tels résultats et que toutes peuvent éventuellement aboutir à une relative injustice. Une réponse a déjà été donnée à cet argument. Il renforce d'ailleurs l'opinion selon laquelle on doit rechercher non pas une méthode unique de délimitation mais un but unique. C'est dans cet esprit que la Cour doit rechercher comment une délimitation de plateau continental peut être assurée lorsque le principe de l'équidistance ne donne précisément pas une solution équitable. Délimiter étant une opération de détermination de zones relevant respectivement de compétences différentes, c'est une vérité première de dire que cette détermination doit être équitable; le problème est surtout de définir les moyens par lesquels la délimitation peut être fixée de manière à être reconnue comme équitable. Bien que les Parties aient manifesté leur intention de se réserver l'application des principes et règles établis par la Cour, il serait cependant insuffisant de s'en tenir à la règle de l'équité sans en préciser quelque peu les possibilités d'application en l'espèce, étant entendu que les Parties pourront choisir l'une plutôt que l'autre de ces méthodes ou qu'elles pourront en préférer de différentes.

93. En réalité il n'y a pas de limites juridiques aux considérations que les Etats peuvent examiner afin de s'assurer qu'ils vont appliquer des procédés équitables et c'est le plus souvent la balance entre toutes ces considérations qui créera l'équitable plutôt que l'adoption d'une seule considération en excluant toutes les autres. De tels problèmes d'équilibre entre diverses considérations varient naturellement selon les circonstances de l'espèce.

94. Dans la balance des éléments en cause divers facteurs semblent devoir être pris en considération. Les uns tiennent à l'aspect géologique, d'autres à l'aspect géographique de la situation, d'autres enfin à l'idée idea of the unity of any deposits. These criteria, though not entirely precise, can provide adequate bases for decision adapted to the factual situation.

95. The institution of the continental shelf has arisen out of the recognition of a physical fact; and the link between this fact and the law, without which that institution would never have existed, remains an important element for the application of its legal régime. The continental shelf is, by definition, an area physically extending the territory of most coastal States into a species of platform which has attracted the attention first of geographers and hydrographers and then of jurists. The importance of the geological aspect is emphasized by the care which, at the beginning of its investigation, the International Law Commission took to acquire exact information as to its characteristics, as can be seen in particular from the definitions to be found on page 131 of Volume I of the Yearbook of the International Law Commission for 1956. The appurtenance of the shelf to the countries in front of whose coastlines it lies, is therefore a fact, and it can be useful to consider the geology of that shelf in order to find out whether the direction taken by certain configurational features should influence delimitation because, in certain localities, they point-up the whole notion of the appurtenance of the continental shelf to the State whose territory it does in fact prolong.

96. The doctrine of the continental shelf is a recent instance of encroachment on maritime expanses which, during the greater part of history, appertained to no-one. The contiguous zone and the continental shelf are in this respect concepts of the same kind. In both instances the principle is applied that the land dominates the sea; it is consequently necessary to examine closely the geographical configuration of the coastlines of the countries whose continental shelves are to be delimited. This is one of the reasons why the Court does not consider that markedly pronounced configurations can be ignored; for, since the land is the legal source of the power which a State may exercise over territorial extensions to seaward, it must first be clearly established what features do in fact constitute such extensions. Above all is this the case when what is involved is no longer areas of sea, such as the contiguous zone, but stretches of submerged land; for the legal régime of the continental shelf is that of a soil and a subsoil, two words evocative of the land and not of the sea.

97. Another factor to be taken into consideration in the delimitation of areas of continental shelf as between adjacent States is the unity of any deposits. The natural resources of the subsoil of the sea in those parts which consist of continental shelf are the very object of the legal régime established subsequent to the Truman Proclamation. Yet it frequently occurs that the same deposit lies on both sides of the line dividing a continental shelf between two States, and since it is possible to exploit such a deposit from either side, a problem immediately arises on account of the risk of prejudicial or wasteful exploitation by one or other of the States concerned. To look no farther than the North Sea, the practice d'unité de gisement. Ces critères, à défaut de précision rigoureuse, fournissent des bases de décision adaptées aux situations de fait.

95. L'institution du plateau continental est née de la constatation d'un fait naturel et le lien entre ce fait et le droit, sans lequel elle n'eût jamais existé, demeure un élément important dans l'application du régime juridique de l'institution. Le plateau continental est par définition une zone prolongeant physiquement le territoire de la plupart des Etats maritimes par cette espèce de socle qui a appelé en premier lieu l'attention des géographes et hydrographes, puis celle des juristes. L'importance de l'aspect géologique est marquée par le soin qu'a pris au début de ses études la Commission du droit international pour se documenter exactement sur ses caractéristiques, ainsi que cela ressort notamment des définitions contenues dans l'Annuaire de la Commission du droit international, 1956, volume I, page 141. L'appartenance géologique du plateau continental aux pays riverains devant leurs côtes est donc un fait et l'examen de la géologie de ce plateau peut être utile afin de savoir si quelques orientations ou mouvements influencent la délimitation en précisant en certains points la notion même d'appartenance du plateau continental à l'Etat dont il prolonge en fait le territoire.

96. La doctrine du plateau continental est l'un des cas récents d'empiètement sur des espaces maritimes qui, pendant la plus grande partie de l'histoire, ne relevaient de personne. Zone contiguë et plateau continental sont à cet égard du même ordre. Dans les deux hypothèses on applique le principe que la terre domine la mer; il est donc nécessaire de regarder de près la configuration géographique des côtes des pays dont on doit délimiter le plateau continental. C'est l'une des raisons pour lesquelles la Cour ne pense pas qu'on puisse négliger les configurations nettement excentriques, car puisque la terre est la source juridique du pouvoir qu'un Etat peut exercer dans les prolongements maritimes, encore faut-il bien établir en quoi consistent en fait ces prolongements. Et cela surtout lorsqu'il ne s'agit plus de zones aquatiques comme la zone contiguë mais d'espaces terrestres submergés, car le régime juridique du plateau continental est celui d'un sol et d'un sous-sol, deux mots qui évoquent la terre et non pas la mer.

97. Un autre élément à prendre en considération dans la délimitation des zones de plateau continental entre Etats limitrophes est l'unité de gisement. Les ressources naturelles du sous-sol de la mer dans la partie qui constitue le plateau continental sont l'objet même du régime juridique institué à la suite de la proclamation Truman. Or il est fréquent qu'un gisement s'étende des deux côtés de la limite du plateau continental entre deux Etats et, l'exploitation de ce gisement étant possible de chaque côté, un problème naît immédiatement en raison du danger d'une exploitation préjudiciable ou exagérée par l'un ou l'autre des Etats intéressés. Sans aller plus loin que la mer du Nord, la pratique des Etats montre of States shows how this problem has been dealt with, and all that is needed is to refer to the undertakings entered into by the coastal States of that sea with a view to ensuring the most efficient exploitation or the apportionment of the products extracted—(see in particular the agreement of 10 March 1965 between the United Kingdom and Norway, Article 4; the agreement of 6 October 1965 between the Netherlands and the United Kingdom relating to “the exploitation of single geological structures extending across the dividing line on the continental shelf under the North Sea”; and the agreement of 14 May 1962 between the Federal Republic and the Netherlands concerning a joint plan for exploiting the natural resources underlying the area of the Ems Estuary where the frontier between the two States has not been finally delimited.) The Court does not consider that unity of deposit constitutes anything more than a factual element which it is reasonable to take into consideration in the course of the negotiations for a delimitation. The Parties are fully aware of the existence of the problem as also of the possible ways of solving it.

98. A final factor to be taken account of is the element of a reasonable degree of proportionality which a delimitation effected according to equitable principles ought to bring about between the extent of the continental shelf appertaining to the States concerned and the lengths of their respective coastlines,—these being measured according to their general direction in order to establish the necessary balance between States with straight, and those with markedly concave or convex coasts, or to reduce very irregular coastlines to their truer proportions. The choice and application of the appropriate technical methods would be a matter for the parties. One method discussed in the course of the proceedings, under the name of the principle of the coastal front, consists in drawing a straight baseline between the extreme points at either end of the coast concerned, or in some cases a series of such lines. Where the parties wish to employ in particular the equidistance method of delimitation, the establishment of one or more baselines of this kind can play a useful part in eliminating or diminishing the distortions that might result from the use of that method.

99. In a sea with the particular configuration of the North Sea, and in view of the particular geographical situation of the Parties' coastlines upon that sea, the methods chosen by them for the purpose of fixing the delimitation of their respective areas may happen in certain localities to lead to an overlapping of the areas appertaining to them. The Court considers that such a situation must be accepted as a given fact and resolved either by an agreed, or failing that by an equal division of the overlapping areas, or by agreements for joint exploitation, the latter solution appearing particularly appropriate when it is a question of preserving the unity of a deposit.

comment ce problème a été traité et il suffira de relever les engagements pris par des Etats riverains de la mer du Nord pour assurer l'exploitation la plus efficace ou la répartition des produits extraits (cf. notamment l'accord du 10 mars 1965 entre le Royaume-Uni et la Norvège, article 4, l'accord du 6 octobre 1965 entre le Royaume-Uni et les Pays-Bas sur « l'exploitation de structures géologiques s'étendant de part et d'autre de la ligne de séparation du plateau continental situé sous la mer du Nord », et l'accord du 14 mai 1962 entre la République fédérale et les Pays-Bas sur un plan d'exploitation commune des richesses du sous-sol dans la zone de l'estuaire de l'Ems où la frontière entre les deux Etats n'a pas été délimitée de façon définitive). La Cour ne considère pas que l'unité de gisement constitue plus qu'un élément de fait qu'il est raisonnable de prendre en considération au cours d'une négociation sur une délimitation. Les Parties sont pleinement informées de l'existence du problème comme des possibilités de solution.

98. Un dernier élément à prendre en considération est le rapport raisonnable qu'une délimitation effectuée selon des principes équitables devrait faire apparaître entre l'étendue du plateau continental relevant des Etats intéressés et la longueur de leurs côtes; on mesurerait ces côtes d'après leur direction générale afin d'établir l'équilibre nécessaire entre les Etats ayant des côtes droites et les Etats ayant des côtes fortement concaves ou convexes ou afin de ramener des côtes très irrégulières à des proportions plus exactes. Le choix et l'application des méthodes techniques appropriées appartiendraient aux parties. L'une des méthodes examinées pendant la procédure, sous le nom de principe de la façade maritime, consiste à tracer une ligne de base droite ou, dans certains cas, une série de lignes de base droites entre les points extrêmes de la côte dont il s'agit. Lorsque les parties veulent recourir notamment à la méthode de délimitation fondée sur l'équidistance, le tracé d'une ou plusieurs lignes de base de ce genre peut contribuer utilement à éliminer ou à atténuer les distorsions que l'emploi de cette méthode risque d'entraîner.

100. The Court has examined the problems raised by the present case in its own context, which is strictly that of delimitation. Other questions relating to the general legal régime of the continental shelf, have been examined for that purpose only. This régime furnishes an example of a legal theory derived from a particular source that has secured a general following. As the Court has recalled in the first part of its Judgment, it was the Truman Proclamation of 28 September 1945 which was at the origin of the theory, whose special features reflect that origin. It would therefore not be in harmony with this history to over-systematize a pragmatic construct the developments of which have occurred within a relatively short space of time.

101. For these reasons,

THE COURT,

by eleven votes to six,

finds that, in each case,

(A) the use of the equidistance method of delimitation not being obligatory as between the Parties; and

(B) there being no other single method of delimitation the use of which is in all circumstances obligatory;

(C) the principles and rules of international law applicable to the delimitation as between the Parties of the areas of the continental shelf in the North Sea which appertain to each of them beyond the partial boundary determined by the agreements of 1 December 1964 and 9 June 1965, respectively, are as follows:

- (1) delimitation is to be effected by agreement in accordance with equitable principles, and taking account of all the relevant circumstances, in such a way as to leave as much as possible to each Party all those parts of the continental shelf that constitute a natural prolongation of its land territory into and under the sea, without encroachment on the natural prolongation of the land territory of the other;
- (2) if, in the application of the preceding sub-paragraph, the delimitation leaves to the Parties areas that overlap, these are to be divided between them in agreed proportions or, failing agreement, equally, unless they decide on a régime of joint jurisdiction, user, or exploitation for the zones of overlap or any part of them;

(D) in the course of the negotiations, the factors to be taken into account are to include:

100. La Cour a examiné les problèmes soulevés par la présente affaire dans son contexte propre, c'est-à-dire aux seules fins de la délimitation. Si la Cour a abordé d'autres questions ayant trait au régime juridique général du plateau continental, elle ne l'a fait que dans ce cadre. Le régime du plateau continental est l'exemple d'une théorie juridique née d'une solution particulière qui a fait école. Comme la Cour l'a rappelé dans la première partie de l'arrêt, c'est la proclamation Truman du 28 septembre 1945 qui est à l'origine de la théorie et les particularités de celle-ci sont le reflet de cette origine. Il serait donc contraire à l'histoire de systématiser à l'excès une construction pragmatique dont les développements se sont présentés dans un délai relativement court.

101. Par ces motifs,

par onze voix contre six,

dit que, pour l'une et l'autre affaire,

A) l'application de la méthode de délimitation fondée sur l'équidistance n'est pas obligatoire entre les Parties;

B) il n'existe pas d'autre méthode unique de délimitation qui soit d'un emploi obligatoire en toutes circonstances;

C) les principes et les règles du droit international applicables à la délimitation entre les Parties des zones du plateau continental de la mer du Nord relevant de chacune d'elles, au-delà des lignes de délimitation partielle respectivement déterminées par les accords du 1<sup>er</sup> décembre 1964 et du 9 juin 1965, sont les suivants:

- 1) la délimitation doit s'opérer par voie d'accord conformément à des principes équitables et compte tenu de toutes les circonstances pertinentes, de manière à attribuer, dans toute la mesure du possible, à chaque Partie la totalité des zones du plateau continental qui constituent le prolongement naturel de son territoire sous la mer et n'empiètent pas sur le prolongement naturel du territoire de l'autre;
- 2) si, par suite de l'application de l'alinéa précédent, la délimitation attribue aux Parties des zones qui se chevauchent, celles-ci doivent être divisées entre les Parties par voie d'accord ou, à défaut, par parts égales, à moins que les Parties n'adoptent un régime de juridiction, d'utilisation ou d'exploitation commune pour tout ou partie des zones de chevauchement;

D) au cours des négociations, les facteurs à prendre en considération comprendront:

- (1) the general configuration of the coasts of the Parties, as well as the presence of any special or unusual features;
- (2) so far as known or readily ascertainable, the physical and geological structure, and natural resources, of the continental shelf areas involved;
- (3) the element of a reasonable degree of proportionality, which a delimitation carried out in accordance with equitable principles ought to bring about between the extent of the continental shelf areas appertaining to the coastal State and the length of its coast measured in the general direction of the coastline, account being taken for this purpose of the effects, actual or prospective, of any other continental shelf delimitations between adjacent States in the same region.

Judge Sir Muhammad ZAFRULLA KHAN makes the following declaration:

I am in agreement with the Judgment throughout but would wish to add the following observations.

The essence of the dispute between the Parties is that the two Kingdoms claim that the delimitation effected between them under the Agreement of 31 March 1966 is binding upon the Federal Republic and that the Federal Republic is bound to accept the situation resulting therefrom, which would confine its continental shelf to the triangle formed by lines A-B-E and C-D-E in Map 3. The Federal Republic stoutly resists that claim.

Not only is Article 6 of the Geneva Convention of 1958 not opposable to the Federal Republic but the delimitation effected under the Agreement of 31 March 1966 does not derive from the provisions of that Article as Denmark and the Netherlands are neither States "whose coasts are opposite each other" within the meaning of the first paragraph of that Article nor are they "two adjacent States" within the meaning of the

- 1) la configuration générale des côtes des Parties et la présence de toute caractéristique spéciale ou inhabituelle;
- 2) pour autant que cela soit connu ou facile à déterminer, la structure physique et géologique et les ressources naturelles des zones de plateau continental en cause;
- 3) le rapport raisonnable qu'une délimitation opérée conformément à des principes équitables devrait faire apparaître entre l'étendue des zones de plateau continental relevant de l'Etat riverain et la longueur de son littoral mesurée suivant la direction générale de celui-ci, compte tenu à cette fin des effets actuels ou éventuels de toute autre délimitation du plateau continental effectuée entre Etats limitrophes dans la même région.

Fait en anglais et en français, le texte anglais faisant foi, au palais de la Paix, à La Haye, le vingt février mil neuf cent soixante-neuf, en quatre exemplaires, dont l'un restera déposé aux archives de la Cour et dont les autres seront transmis respectivement au Gouvernement de la République fédérale d'Allemagne, au Gouvernement du Royaume du Danemark et au Gouvernement du Royaume des Pays-Bas.

Le Président,

Sir Muhammad ZAFRULLA KHAN, juge, fait la déclaration suivante:

Je souscris à l'arrêt dans son intégralité mais voudrais ajouter les observations ci-après.

Le différend entre les Parties se ramène pour l'essentiel à ceci: le Danemark et les Pays-Bas soutiennent que la délimitation effectuée entre eux conformément à l'accord du 31 mars 1966 lie la République fédérale et que celle-ci est tenue d'accepter la situation ainsi créée, dans laquelle son plateau continental se trouverait limité au triangle formé par les lignes ABE et CDE de la carte 3. La République fédérale rejette catégoriquement cette thèse.

Or, non seulement l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève de 1958 n'est pas opposable à la République fédérale, mais la délimitation effectuée par l'accord du 31 mars 1966 ne procède pas des dispositions dudit article, puisque le Danemark et les Pays-Bas ne sont ni des Etats « dont les côtes se font face » au sens du premier paragraphe de cet article, ni des Etats « limitrophes » au sens du second paragraphe. La situation second paragraph of that Article. The situation resulting from that delimitation, so far as it affects the Federal Republic is not, therefore, brought about by the application of the principle set out in either of the paragraphs of Article 6 of the Convention.

Had paragraph 2 of Article 6 been applicable to the delimitation of the continental shelf between the Parties to the dispute, a boundary line, determined by the application of the principle of equidistance, would have had to allow for the configuration of the coastline of the Federal Republic as a "special circumstance".

In the course of the oral pleadings the contention that the principle of equidistance cum special circumstances had crystallized into a rule of customary international law was not advanced on behalf of the two Kingdoms as an alternative to the claim that that principle was inherent in the very concept of the continental shelf. The Judgment has, in fairness, dealt with these two contentions as if they had been put forward in the alternative and were thus consistent with each other, and has rejected each of them on the merits. I am in agreement with the reasoning of the Judgment on both these points. But, I consider, it is worth mentioning that Counsel for the two Kingdoms summed up their position in regard to the effect of the 1958 Convention as follows:

"... They have not maintained that the Convention embodied already received rules of customary law in the sense that the Convention was merely declaratory of existing rules. Their position is rather that the doctrine of the coastal State's exclusive rights over the adjacent continental shelf was in process of formation between 1945 and 1958; that the State practice prior to 1958 showed fundamental variations in the nature and scope of the rights claimed; that, in consequence, in State practice the emerging doctrine was wholly lacking in any definition of these crucial elements as it was also of the legal régime applicable to the coastal State with respect to the continental shelf; that the process of the definition and consolidation of the emerging customary law took place through the work of the International Law Commission, the reaction of governments to that work and the proceedings of the Geneva Conference; that the emerging customary law, now become more defined, both as to the rights of the coastal State and the applicable régime, crystallized in the adoption of the Continental Shelf Convention by the Conference; and that the numerous signatures and ratifications of the Convention and the other State practice based on the principles set out in the Convention had the effect of consolidating those principles as customary law."

If it were correct that the doctrine of the coastal State's exclusive rights over the adjacent continental shelf was in process of formation créée par cette délimitation, dans les effets qu'elle a pour la République fédérale, n'est par conséquent pas due à l'application du principe énoncé dans l'un ou l'autre de ces deux paragraphes de l'article 6 de la Convention.

Le paragraphe 2 de l'article 6 eût-il été applicable à la délimitation du plateau continental entre les Parties que la ligne de délimitation déterminée par application du principe de l'équidistance aurait dû tenir compte de la configuration de la côte de la République fédérale comme d'une « circonstance spéciale ».

Au cours de la procédure orale, le Danemark et les Pays-Bas n'ont pas présenté la thèse suivant laquelle le principe « équidistance-circonstances spéciales » se serait cristallisé en une règle de droit international coutumier comme l'un des termes d'une alternative, l'autre étant que ce principe serait inhérent à la notion même de plateau continental. Dans son arrêt la Cour a cru devoir examiner ces deux thèses comme si elles avaient été présentées sous la forme d'une alternative et étaient par conséquent compatibles l'une avec l'autre, et la Cour a rejeté chacune d'elles au fond. Je souscris dans les deux cas au raisonnement de l'arrêt. Mais je crois utile de signaler que l'agent du Danemark et des Pays-Bas a résumé la position des deux gouvernements quant à l'effet de la Convention de 1958 de la façon suivante :

« [Les deux gouvernements] n'ont pas soutenu que la Convention consacrait des règles déjà reçues de droit coutumier en ce sens qu'elle était simplement déclaratoire des règles existantes. Ils estiment plutôt que la doctrine des droits exclusifs d'un Etat riverain sur le plateau continental adjacent se trouvait en voie de formation entre 1945 et 1958; que la pratique des Etats antérieure à 1958 témoignait de variations fondamentales quant à la nature et à la portée des droits revendiqués; qu'en conséquence, dans la pratique des Etats, la doctrine en voie de formation ne définissait nullement ces éléments essentiels pas plus qu'elle ne définissait le régime juridique applicable aux Etats riverains en ce qui concerne le plateau continental; que la définition et la consolidation du droit coutumier en voie de formation s'étaient effectuées grâce aux travaux de la Commission du droit international, aux réactions des gouvernements devant l'œuvre de la Commission et aux débats de la conférence de Genève; que ce droit coutumier en formation, désormais plus précis sur la double question des droits des Etats riverains et du régime applicable, s'est cristallisé du fait de l'adoption de la Convention sur le plateau continental par la conférence; et que les nombreuses signatures et ratifications recueillies par la Convention, ainsi que la pratique des Etats s'inspirant des principes énoncés dans la Convention, ont eu pour effet de consolider ces principes en tant que droit coutumier. »

Si l'on admet que la doctrine des droits exclusifs de l'Etat riverain sur le plateau continental adjacent à sa côte était en voie de formation entre between 1945 and 1958 and that in State practice prior to 1958 it was wholly lacking in any definition of crucial elements as it was also of the legal régime applicable to the coastal State with respect to the continental shelf, then it would seem to follow conclusively that the principle of equidistance was not inherent in the concept of the continental shelf.

Judge BENGZON makes the following declaration:

I regret my inability to concur with the main conclusions of the majority of the Court. I agree with my colleagues who maintain the view that Article 6 of the Geneva Convention is the applicable international law and that as between these Parties equidistance is the rule for delimitation, which rule may even be derived from the general principles of law.

President BUSTAMANTE Y RIVERO, Judges JESSUP, PADILLA NERVO and AMMOUN append Separate Opinions to the Judgment of the Court.

Vice-President KORETSKY, Judges TANAKA, MORELLI, LACHS and Judge ad hoc SØRENSEN append Dissenting Opinions to the Judgment of the Court.

1945 et 1958 et que la pratique des Etats antérieure à 1958 ne fournissait aucune définition, ni de certains éléments essentiels ni du régime juridique applicable à l'Etat riverain en ce qui concerne le plateau continental, on doit, semble-t-il, en tirer la conclusion que le principe de l'équidistance n'était pas inhérent à la notion de plateau continental.

M. BENGZON, juge, fait la déclaration suivante:

Je regrette de ne pouvoir souscrire aux conclusions principales émises par la majorité de la Cour. Je suis d'accord avec ceux de mes collègues qui soutiennent que l'article 6 de la Convention de Genève constitue le droit international applicable et qu'entre les Parties la règle de délimitation est l'équidistance, cette règle pouvant même être déduite des principes généraux de droit.

M. BUSTAMANTE Y RIVERO, Président, MM. JESSUP, PADILLA NERVO et AMMOUN, juges, joignent à l'arrêt les exposés de leur opinion individuelle.

M. KORETSKY, Vice-Président, MM. TANAKA, MORELLI, LACHS, juges, et M. SØRENSEN, juge ad hoc, joignent à l'arrêt les exposés de leur opinion dissidente.

Au sujet de l'interprétation de l'accord signé le 25 mars 1951 entre l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé et le Gouvernement de l'Égypte,

LA COUR,

ainsi composée,

donne l'avis consultatif suivant :

1. La Cour a été saisie des questions sur lesquelles un avis consultatif lui est demandé par une lettre du Directeur général de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé au Greffier de la Cour datée du 21 mai 1980 et parvenue au Greffe le

Health Organization to the Registrar. In that letter the Director-General informed the Court of resolution WHA33.16 adopted by the World Health Assembly on 20 May 1980, in accordance with Article 96, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations, Article 76 of the Constitution of the World Health Organization, and Article X, paragraph 2, of the Agreement between the United Nations and the World Health Organization, by which the Organization had decided to submit two questions to the Court for advisory opinion. The text of that resolution is as follows :

“The Thirty-third World Health Assembly,

Having regard to proposals which have been made to remove from Alexandria the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean Region of the World Health Organization,

Taking note of the differing views which have been expressed in the World Health Assembly on the question of whether the World Health Organization may transfer the Regional Office without regard to the provisions of Section 37 of the Agreement between the World Health Organization and Egypt of 25 March 1951,

Noting further that the Working Group of the Executive Board has been unable to make a judgment or a recommendation on the applicability of Section 37 of this Agreement,

Decides, prior to taking any decision on removal of the Regional Office, and pursuant to Article 76 of the Constitution of the World Health Organization and Article X of the Agreement between the United Nations and the World Health Organization approved by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 15 November 1947, to submit to the International Court of Justice for its Advisory Opinion the following questions :

‘1. Are the negotiation and notice provisions of Section 37 of the Agreement of 25 March 1951 between the World Health Organization and Egypt applicable in the event that either party to the Agreement wishes to have the Regional Office transferred from the territory of Egypt?’

2. If so, what would be the legal responsibilities of both the World Health Organization and Egypt, with regard to the Regional Office in Alexandria, during the two-year period between notice and termination of the Agreement?’”

2. By letters dated 6 June 1980, the Registrar, pursuant to Article 66, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the Court, gave notice of the request for advisory opinion to all States entitled to appear before the Court.

3. The President of the Court, having decided pursuant to Article 66, paragraph 2, of the Statute, that those States Members of the World Health Organization who were also States entitled to appear before the Court, and the Organization itself, were likely to be able to furnish information on the question submitted to the Court, made an Order on 6 June 1980 fixing 1 September 1980 as the time-limit within which written statements might be submitted by those States. Accordingly, the special and direct communication provided for in 28 mai 1980. Dans cette lettre le Directeur général porte à la connaissance de la Cour la résolution WHA33.16 adoptée par l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé le 20 mai 1980, par laquelle, conformément à l'article 96, paragraphe 2, de la Charte des Nations Unies, à l'article 76 de la Constitution de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé et à l'article X, paragraphe 2, de l'accord entre l'Organisation des Nations Unies et l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé, cette dernière Organisation a décidé de soumettre deux questions à la Cour pour avis consultatif. La résolution est ainsi conçue :

Tenant compte des propositions visant à transférer en un autre lieu le Bureau régional de la Méditerranée orientale qui se trouve actuellement à Alexandrie ;

Prenant note des divergences de vues qui se sont fait jour à l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé sur le point de savoir si l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé est en droit de transférer le Bureau régional sans tenir compte des dispositions de la section 37 de l'accord entre l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé et l'Égypte en date du 25 mars 1951 ;

Notant en outre que le groupe de travail du Conseil exécutif n'a pas été en mesure de décider si la section 37 dudit accord devait ou non être appliquée ni de formuler une recommandation à ce sujet,

Décide, avant de prendre une décision au sujet du déplacement du Bureau régional, et conformément à l'article 76 de la Constitution de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé ainsi qu'à l'article X de l'accord entre l'Organisation des Nations Unies et l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé approuvé par l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies le 15 novembre 1947, de demander à la Cour internationale de Justice de rendre un avis consultatif sur les questions suivantes :

2. Dans l'affirmative, quelles seraient les responsabilités juridiques tant de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé que de l'Égypte en ce qui concerne le Bureau régional à Alexandrie, au cours des deux ans séparant la date de dénonciation de l'accord et la date où celui-ci deviendrait caduc ? »

2. Par lettre du 6 juin 1980, le Greffier a notifié la requête pour avis consultatif à tous les Etats admis à ester devant la Cour, conformément à l'article 66, paragraphe 1, du Statut.

3. Le Président de la Cour ayant décidé, conformément à l'article 66, paragraphe 2, du Statut, que les Etats membres de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé admis à ester devant la Cour ainsi que l'Organisation elle-même étaient susceptibles de fournir des renseignements sur les questions soumises à la Cour, il a, par ordonnance du 6 juin 1980, fixé au 1<sup>er</sup> septembre 1980 la date d'expiration du délai dans lequel ces Etats pourraient présenter des exposés écrits. La communication spéciale et directe prévue à l'article 66, paragraphe 2, du Statut a été Article 66, paragraph 2, of the Statute was included in the above-mentioned letters of 6 June 1980 addressed to those States, and a similar communication was addressed to the WHO.

4. The following States submitted written statements to the Court within the time-limit fixed by the Order of 6 June 1980 ; Bolivia, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Syrian Arab Republic, United Arab Emirates, United States of America. The texts of these statements were transmitted to the States to which the special and direct communication had been sent, and to the WHO.

5. Pursuant to Article 65, paragraph 2, of the Statute and Article 104 of the Rules of Court, the Director-General of the WHO transmitted to the Court a dossier of documents likely to throw light upon the questions. This dossier was received in the Registry on 11 June 1980 ; it was not accompanied by a written statement, a synopsis of the case or an index of the documents. In response to requests by the President of the Court, the WHO supplied the Court, for its information, with a number of additional documents, and the International Labour Organisation supplied the Court with documents of that Organisation regarded as likely to throw light on the questions before the Court.

6. By a letter of 15 September 1980, the Registrar requested the States Members of the WHO entitled to appear before the Court to inform him whether they intended to submit an oral statement at the public sittings to be held for that purpose, the date fixed for which was notified to them at the same time.

7. Pursuant to Article 106 of the Rules of Court, the Court decided to make the written statements submitted to the Court accessible to the public, with effect from the opening of the oral proceedings.

8. In the course of three public sittings held on 21, 22 and 23 October 1980, oral statements were addressed to the Court by the following representatives :

- |   |   |
|---|---|
| For the United Arab Emirates :     | Mr. Mustafa Kamil Yasseen, Special Counsellor of the Mission of the United Arab Emirates at Geneva. |
| For the Republic of Tunisia :      | Mr. Abdelhawab Chérif, Counsellor, Embassy of Tunisia at The Hague.                                 |
| For the United States of America : | Mr. Stephen M. Schwebel, Deputy Legal Adviser, Department of State.                                 |
| For the Syrian Arab Republic :     | Mr. Adnan Nachabé, Legal Adviser to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.                                |
| For the Arab Republic of Egypt :   | H.E. Mr. Ahmed Osman, Ambassador of Egypt to Austria.   |

In reply to a question by the President, Mr. Claude-Henri Vignes, Director of the Legal Division of the WHO, stated at the public sitting that the WHO did not intend to submit argument to the Court on the questions put in the request for Opinion, but that he would be prepared, on behalf of the Director-General, to answer any question that the Court might put to him. Questions were put by Members of the Court to the Government of Egypt and to the WHO ; replies were given by the representative of Egypt and by the Director of the Legal Division of the WHO, and additional observations were made by the representatives of the United States of America and the United Arab Emirates.

incorporée en conséquence à la lettre qui a été adressée à ces Etats le 6 juin 1980. Une communication analogue a été faite à l'OMS.

4. Les Etats énumérés ci-après ont soumis à la Cour des exposés écrits dans le délai fixé par l'ordonnance du 6 juin 1980 : Bolivie, Egypte, Emirats arabes unis, Etats-Unis d'Amérique, Irak, Jordanie, Koweït, République arabe syrienne. Le texte de ces exposés a été transmis aux Etats à qui la communication spéciale et directe avait été envoyée ainsi qu'à l'OMS.

5. Conformément à l'article 65, paragraphe 2, du Statut et à l'article 104 du Règlement, le Directeur général de l'OMS a transmis à la Cour un dossier de documents pouvant servir à élucider les questions. Ce dossier, qui est parvenu au Greffe le 11 juin 1980, n'était pas accompagné d'un exposé écrit, d'un sommaire de l'affaire ou d'un index des documents. A la demande du Président de la Cour, l'OMS a fourni à la Cour, pour information, divers documents supplémentaires et l'Organisation internationale du Travail lui a fait tenir certains de ses propres documents, considérés comme pouvant servir à élucider les questions dont la Cour est saisie.

6. Par lettre du 15 septembre 1980 le Greffier a prié les Etats membres de l'OMS admis à ester devant la Cour de lui faire savoir s'ils avaient l'intention de présenter un exposé oral pendant les audiences qui se tiendraient à cette fin, dont la date leur était simultanément notifiée.

7. Conformément à l'article 106 du Règlement, la Cour a décidé de rendre accessible au public le texte des exposés écrits à la date d'ouverture de la procédure orale.

8. Au cours de trois audiences publiques tenues les 21, 22 et 23 octobre 1980, la Cour a entendu, en leurs exposés oraux, les représentants ci-après :

pour les Emirats arabes unis :	M. Mustafa Kamil Yasseen, conseiller spécial de la mission des Emirats arabes unis à Genève ;
pour la République de Tunisie :	M. Abdelhawab Chérif, conseiller, ambassade de Tunisie à La Haye ;
pour les Etats-Unis d'Amérique :	M. Stephen M. Schwebel, conseiller juridique adjoint du département d'Etat ;
pour la République arabe syrienne :	M. Adnan Nachabé, conseiller juridique au ministère des affaires étrangères ;
pour la République arabe d'Egypte :	S. Exc. M. Ahmed Osman, ambassadeur d'Egypte en Autriche.

Sur interrogation du Président, M. Claude-Henri Vignes, directeur de la division juridique de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé, a déclaré à l'audience que l'OMS n'avait pas l'intention d'exposer des arguments à la Cour sur les questions énoncées dans la demande d'avis mais qu'il serait prêt à répondre, au nom du Directeur général, à celles que lui poserait éventuellement la Cour. Des membres de la Cour ont posé des questions au Gouvernement de l'Egypte et à l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé ; le représentant de l'Egypte et le directeur de la division juridique de l'OMS y ont respectivement répondu, et les représentants des Etats-Unis d'Amérique et des Emirats arabes unis ont présenté des observations complémentaires.

9. At the close of the public sitting held on 23 October 1980, the President of the Court indicated that the Court remained ready to receive any further observations which the Director of the Legal Division of the WHO or the representatives of the States concerned might wish to submit in writing within a stated time-limit. In pursuance of this invitation, the Governments of the United States of America and Egypt transmitted certain written observations to the Court on 24 October and 29 October 1980 respectively ; copies of these were supplied to the representatives of the other States which had taken part in the oral proceedings, as well as to the WHO. Certain further documents were also supplied to the Court by the WHO after the close of the oral proceedings, in response to a request made by a Member of the Court.

10. The first, and principal, question submitted to the Court in the request is formulated in hypothetical terms :

But a rule of international law, whether customary or conventional, does not operate in a vacuum ; it operates in relation to facts and in the context of a wider framework of legal rules of which it forms only a part. Accordingly, if a question put in the hypothetical way in which it is posed in the request is to receive a pertinent and effectual reply, the Court must first ascertain the meaning and full implications of the question in the light of the actual framework of fact and law in which it falls for consideration. Otherwise its reply to the question may be incomplete and, in consequence, ineffectual and even misleading as to the pertinent legal rules actually governing the matter under consideration by the requesting Organization. The Court will therefore begin by setting out the pertinent elements of fact and of law which, in its view, constitute the context in which the meaning and implications of the first question posed in the request have to be ascertained.

11. The existence at the present day of a Regional Office of the World Health Organization located at Alexandria has its origin in two main circumstances. One is the policy adopted by the WHO in 1946, which is expressed in Chapter XI of the text of its Constitution, of establishing regional health organizations designed to be an integral part of the Organization. The other is the fact that at the end of the Second World War there existed at Alexandria a health Bureau which, pursuant to that policy

9. A la clôture de l'audience du 23 octobre 1980, le Président a indiqué que la Cour demeurerait disposée à recevoir toutes nouvelles observations que le directeur de la division juridique de l'OMS ou les représentants des Etats intéressés pourraient vouloir soumettre par écrit dans un délai qui était spécifié. Répondant à cette invitation, les Gouvernements des Etats-Unis d'Amérique et de l'Egypte ont respectivement adressé à la Cour, les 24 et 29 octobre 1980, certaines observations écrites dont le texte a été communiqué aux représentants des autres Etats qui avaient pris part à la procédure orale ainsi qu'à l'OMS. A la demande d'un membre de la Cour l'OMS a en outre fourni divers autres documents à la Cour après la clôture de la procédure orale.

10. La première et principale question posée à la Cour dans la requête est formulée en termes hypothétiques :

Or une règle du droit international, coutumier ou conventionnel, ne s'applique pas dans le vide ; elle s'applique par rapport à des faits et dans le cadre d'un ensemble plus large de règles juridiques dont elle n'est qu'une partie. Par conséquent, pour qu'une question présentée dans les termes hypothétiques de la requête puisse recevoir une réponse pertinente et utile, la Cour doit d'abord s'assurer de sa signification et en mesurer toute la portée dans la situation de fait et de droit où il convient de l'examiner. S'il en allait autrement, la réponse de la Cour à la question posée risquerait d'être incomplète et, partant, d'être inefficace, voire d'induire en erreur sur les règles juridiques pertinentes régissant en fait le sujet examiné par l'Organisation requérante. La Cour commencera donc par énoncer les éléments de fait et de droit pertinents qui, selon elle, forment le contexte dans lequel le sens et la portée de la première question posée dans la requête doivent être recherchés.

11. Le Bureau régional de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé, actuellement situé à Alexandrie, doit son origine à deux faits principaux. Le premier est la politique adoptée en 1946 par l'OMS et exprimée au chapitre XI de sa Constitution, qui consiste à établir des organisations régionales de santé devant faire partie intégrante de l'Organisation. L'autre est la présence à Alexandrie, à la fin de la seconde guerre mondiale, d'un bureau sanitaire qui, en exécution de la politique susmentionnée et and by agreement between Egypt and the WHO, was subsequently incorporated in the Organization in the manner hereafter described.

12. Article 44 of the WHO Constitution empowers the World Health Assembly to define geographical areas in which it is desirable to establish a regional organization and, with the consent of a majority of the members of the Organization situated within the area, to establish the regional organization. It also provides that there is not to be more than one regional organization in each area. Articles 45 and 46 proceed to lay down that each such regional organization is to be an integral part of the Organization and to consist of a regional committee and a regional office. Articles 47-53 then set out rules to regulate the composition, functions, procedure and staff of regional committees. Finally, Article 54, which contains special provisions regarding the "integration" of pre-existing inter-governmental regional health organizations, reads as follows :

"The Pan American Sanitary Organization represented by the Pan American Sanitary Bureau and the Pan American Sanitary Conferences, and all other inter-governmental regional health organizations in existence prior to the date of signature of this Constitution, shall in due course be integrated with the Organization. This integration shall be effected as soon as practicable through common action based on mutual consent of the competent authorities expressed through the organizations concerned."

The above-mentioned provisions of Chapter XI are thus the constitutional framework within which the WHO came to establish its regional office in Egypt.

13. The existence of a health bureau in Alexandria dates back to the creation of a general Board of Health in Egypt in 1831 for the purpose of preventing the spread of cholera and other diseases by and among pilgrims on the way to and from Mecca. This Board subsequently acquired a certain international character as a result of the association with its quarantine work of seven representatives of States having rights in Egypt under the capitulations régime ; and in 1892 its character as an international health agency became more pronounced as a result of changes in the structure of its council effected by the International Sanitary Convention of Venice of that year. In this form the Conseil sanitaire maritime et quarantenaire d'Egypte operated successfully for over forty years, during which, by arrangement with the Office international d'hygiène publique and pursuant to the International Sanitary Convention of 1926, it also functioned as the Regional Bureau of Epidemiological Intelligence for the Near East. In 1938, at the request of the Egyptian Government, it was decided, at the International Sanitary Conference of that year that the Conseil sanitaire should be abolished and its functions assumed by the governments of Egypt and the other countries concerned, but this did not involve the suppression of the Regional Bureau of Epidemiological Intelligence. The new Bureau, although placed under the authority of the Egyptian Gov-par accord entre l'Égypte et l'OMS, a été ultérieurement intégré dans l'Organisation suivant le processus exposé ci-après.

12. L'article 44 de la Constitution de l'OMS habilite l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé à déterminer les régions géographiques où il est désirable d'établir une organisation régionale et, avec le consentement de la majorité des Etats membres situés dans chaque région ainsi déterminée, à y établir une organisation régionale. Le même article dispose qu'il ne pourra y avoir plus d'une organisation de ce genre dans chaque région. Les articles 45 et 46 prévoient ensuite que chacune des organisations régionales fait partie intégrante de l'Organisation et comporte un comité régional et un bureau régional. Puis les articles 47 à 53 régissent la composition, les fonctions, le règlement et le personnel des comités régionaux. Enfin l'article 54 contient des dispositions particulières relatives à l'« intégration » d'organisations régionales intergouvernementales de santé préexistantes ; cet article est ainsi rédigé :

Les dispositions susmentionnées du chapitre XI constituent donc le cadre constitutionnel dans lequel l'OMS a établi son Bureau régional en Égypte.

13. L'existence d'un bureau sanitaire à Alexandrie remonte à la création en Égypte, en 1831, d'une commission générale de la santé destinée à enrayer la propagation du choléra et autres maladies dont les pèlerins allant à La Mecque ou en revenant étaient porteurs. Cette commission a acquis par la suite un certain caractère international quand sept représentants d'Etats bénéficiaires du régime des capitulations en Égypte ont été associés à ses travaux en matière de quarantaine ; son caractère d'organisme sanitaire international s'est affirmé quand la convention sanitaire internationale de Venise de 1892 a modifié la structure de son conseil. Le Conseil sanitaire maritime et quarantenaire d'Égypte a fonctionné avec succès sous cette forme pendant plus de quarante ans, au cours desquels, à la suite d'un arrangement conclu avec l'Office international d'hygiène publique et conformément à la convention sanitaire internationale de 1926, il a aussi assumé les fonctions de Bureau régional de renseignements épidémiologiques pour le Proche-Orient. La conférence sanitaire internationale tenue en 1938 a décidé, à la demande du Gouvernement de l'Égypte, que le Conseil sanitaire serait aboli et que ses fonctions seraient prises en charge par les Gouvernements de l'Égypte et des autres Etats concernés, mais cela n'entraînait pas la disparition du Bureau régional de renseignements épidémiologiques. Le nouveau Bureau, quoique placé sous ernment, was to have the same international character as the former Bureau ; the Egyptian Government was to set up a commission including technical representatives of the affiliated countries. From 1938 onwards the expenses of the Bureau were wholly borne by the Egyptian Government. The Second World War broke out before the projected commission had been constituted, and from December 1940 until the end of hostilities the work of the Alexandria Bureau was taken over by a special wartime service under the Quarantine Department of the Egyptian Ministry of Public Health. After the hostilities had ended, the Bureau resumed its operations.

14. It has not been made entirely clear to the Court what was the exact situation in regard to the Alexandria Sanitary Bureau as a result of the events just described. But it was operating under Egypt's Ministry of Public Health when in 1946, and before the WHO Constitution had been adopted, Egypt raised the question of the relation of the Bureau to the Organization. Even before that, the members of the newly created League of Arab States had taken a decision in favour of using the Alexandria Bureau as their regional sanitary bureau. Meanwhile, however, the Alexandria Bureau was continuing to operate under the Egyptian sanitary authorities rather than as an inter-governmental institution. On the other hand, the projected association of the Bureau with the League of Arab States, the international character of its functions and its previous status may have led to the Bureau being regarded as an inter-governmental institution. This no doubt explains why, as will now be seen, the Alexandria Sanitary Bureau, despite any question there may have been as to its inter-governmental character, was in fact dealt with by the Organization as a case of integration under Article 54 of the WHO Constitution.

15. On 6 March 1947, at the direction of the WHO Interim Commission, the Executive Secretary of the Commission sent a circular letter to member governments enquiring as to whether they might wish to have either the headquarters of the organization or the seat of a regional office located on their territory and as to the facilities they could offer. Soon afterwards he was also directed to get in touch with the authorities "of the Pan Arab Sanitary Organization", and wrote on 2 May 1947 for information to the Egyptian Minister of Public Health. Replying on 26 July 1947, the Egyptian Minister supplied him with a memorandum giving an account of the history and activities of the "Pan Arab Regional Health Bureau" from 1926 onwards. When, on the basis of the memorandum, a recommendation was made by the Committee on Relations to the Interim Commission in September 1947 that negotiations should be started with the "Pan Arab Sanitary Organization", objection was taken that the Pan Arab Sanitary Bureau did not really exist. Some delegates observed that the negotiations should rather be with the Egyptian Government and, ultimately, it was with the Egyptian Government that the negotiations concerning the Bureau took place. In fact, the next development was a reply from the Egyptian Government to the Executive Secretary's circular l'autorité du Gouvernement de l'Égypte, devait avoir le même caractère international que l'ancien Bureau. Le Gouvernement de l'Égypte devait créer une commission comprenant des représentants techniques des pays affiliés de la région. A partir de 1938 il a assumé en totalité les dépenses du Bureau. La seconde guerre mondiale a éclaté avant la constitution de la commission projetée et, de décembre 1940 à la fin des hostilités, les tâches du Bureau d'Alexandrie ont été confiées à un service spécial de guerre relevant du département de la quarantaine du ministère de l'hygiène publique d'Égypte. A la fin des hostilités, le Bureau a repris ses activités.

14. La situation exacte du Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie à la suite des événements qui viennent d'être évoqués n'a pas été présentée à la Cour avec une clarté totale. Cependant le Bureau fonctionnait sous l'autorité du ministère de l'hygiène publique d'Égypte quand, en 1946, avant que la Constitution de l'OMS eût été adoptée, l'Égypte a soulevé la question des relations du Bureau avec l'Organisation. Auparavant les membres de la Ligue des Etats arabes qui venait d'être créée avaient pris une décision favorable à l'utilisation du Bureau d'Alexandrie à titre de bureau sanitaire régional. Entre-temps le Bureau d'Alexandrie continuait à fonctionner sous la direction des autorités sanitaires égyptiennes et non comme une institution intergouvernementale. En revanche le projet d'association du Bureau avec la Ligue des Etats arabes, le caractère international de ses fonctions et son ancien statut ont pu amener à voir en lui une institution intergouvernementale. Cela explique sans doute pourquoi le Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie, malgré les questions qui auraient pu se poser au sujet de son caractère intergouvernemental, a été en fait traité par l'Organisation comme un cas d'intégration au sens de l'article 54 de la Constitution de l'OMS, ainsi qu'on le verra ci-après.

15. Le 6 mars 1947, sur l'instruction de la Commission intérimaire de l'OMS, le secrétaire exécutif de cette Commission a adressé une circulaire aux gouvernements des Etats membres, leur demandant s'ils souhaiteraient que le siège de l'Organisation ou celui d'un bureau régional fût établi sur leur territoire et quelles facilités ils pourraient offrir. Peu après, ayant été chargé en outre de se mettre en rapport avec les autorités de l'« Organisation sanitaire panarabe », il a demandé des renseignements au ministre de l'hygiène publique d'Égypte par lettre du 2 mai 1947. Répondant le 26 juillet 1947, le ministre lui a fourni une note sur l'origine et les activités du « Bureau sanitaire régional panarabe » depuis 1926. Quand, sur la base de la note, le comité des relations a recommandé en septembre 1947 à la Commission intérimaire que des négociations soient entamées avec l'« Organisation sanitaire panarabe », il a été objecté que le Bureau sanitaire panarabe n'existait pas en réalité. Certains délégués ont fait observer que les négociations devraient plutôt être menées avec le Gouvernement de l'Égypte, et c'est avec celui-ci qu'elles se sont en effet déroulées. Le Gouvernement de l'Égypte a d'ailleurs répondu peu après à la circulaire du secrétaire exécutif en faisant savoir que les autorités compétentes avaient montré le vif intérêt qu'elles portaient à voir s'établir un letter in which the Government stated that the competent authorities had declared that they were most anxious to see a regional bureau established at Alexandria, which could deal with all questions coming within the scope of the WHO for the entire Middle East.

16. Matters then began to move more quickly. It appears from a report submitted to the Interim Commission in May 1948, mentioned below, that early in January 1948 quarantine experts of the Arab countries met in Alexandria and passed a number of resolutions in favour of establishing a regional organization. This was to be composed of the member States of the League of Arab States and, it was contemplated, certain other States in the region ; it was to have a regional committee similarly composed ; and it was to use the Alexandria Bureau as its regional office. These resolutions were adopted in the light of the fact that the WHO was to take over the functions of pre-existing regional health organizations. The next step was an invitation from the Egyptian Ministry of Public Health to Dr. Stampar, Chairman of the Interim Commission, to visit Egypt and study on the spot the conditions for setting up the proposed regional organization. In May 1948 a substantial report, referred to above, was duly submitted by the Chairman of the Interim Commission in which he gave a detailed account of the past history and current activities of the Alexandria Bureau and set out the arguments in favour of it as the regional health centre for the Near and Middle East. He ended the report with the conclusion :

“we are bound to admit that the conditions which predestinate Alexandria to be the centre of the future regional health organization for the Near and the Middle East are literally unique”.

The Constitution of the WHO had now come into force and the question of the Alexandria Bureau was discussed in the Committee on Headquarters and Regional Organization at the first session of the new World Health Assembly. Mention was made of the facts that most of the member States of the Eastern Mediterranean area had agreed to the proposal for the establishment of a regional organization in that area, that the Alexandria Bureau was a pre-existing sanitary bureau, and that preliminary steps had already been taken for the final integration of this bureau with the WHO. Taking those facts into account the Committee recommended that the Executive Board should be instructed to integrate the Bureau with the WHO as soon as practicable, through common action, “in accordance with Article 54 of the WHO Constitution”, and this recommendation was approved by the World Health Assembly on 10 July 1948 (resolution WHA1.72).

17. The Director-General of the WHO then proceeded to organize the setting up of a Regional Committee for the Eastern Mediterranean and an agenda was drawn up for its inaugural meeting due to take place on 7 February 1949. Earlier, the Executive Secretary of the Interim Commission had negotiated successfully with the Swiss Government the text of an bureau régional à Alexandrie, qui pourrait traiter toutes les questions relevant de l'OMS pour tout le Moyen-Orient.

16. Les choses ont alors commencé à évoluer plus rapidement. Il ressort d'un rapport soumis à la Commission intérimaire en mai 1948 dont il est fait mention ci-après qu'au début du mois de janvier 1948 des experts des pays arabes en matière de quarantaine se sont réunis à Alexandrie et ont adopté des résolutions prévoyant la constitution d'une organisation régionale. Celle-ci devait se composer des Etats membres de la Ligue des Etats arabes ainsi, prévoyait-on, que de certains autres Etats de la région, avoir un comité régional de composition analogue et utiliser le Bureau d'Alexandrie comme bureau régional. Ces résolutions ont été adoptées en prévision de la reprise par l'OMS des fonctions des organisations régionales de santé préexistantes. Ensuite le ministère de l'hygiène publique d'Egypte a invité le docteur A. Stampar, président de la Commission intérimaire, à se rendre en Egypte pour étudier sur place les conditions de l'établissement de l'organisation régionale projetée. En mai 1948 le président a présenté l'important rapport de la Commission intérimaire qui vient d'être mentionné, dans lequel il rendait compte en détail des antécédents et de l'activité du Bureau d'Alexandrie et exposait les arguments militant en faveur du choix de ce Bureau comme centre sanitaire régional pour le Proche et le Moyen-Orient. Il terminait en ces termes :

« On arrive nécessairement à la conclusion que les conditions qui militent en faveur du choix d'Alexandrie comme centre de la future organisation sanitaire régionale pour le Proche et le Moyen-Orient sont absolument exceptionnelles. »

La Constitution de l'OMS étant entrée en vigueur, la question du Bureau d'Alexandrie a été examinée par la commission du siège et de l'organisation régionale à la première session de la nouvelle Assemblée mondiale de la Santé. Il a été rappelé que la majorité des Etats membres de la région de la Méditerranée orientale avait accepté la proposition d'y établir une organisation régionale, que le Bureau d'Alexandrie était un bureau sanitaire préexistant et que des démarches préliminaires avaient déjà été faites en vue de l'intégration définitive de ce Bureau dans l'OMS. Cela étant, la commission a recommandé de charger le Conseil exécutif d'intégrer le Bureau régional d'Alexandrie dans l'OMS dès que possible, par une action commune, « conformément à l'article 54 de la Constitution » et cette recommandation a été approuvée par l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé le 10 juillet 1948 (résolution WHA1.72).

17. Le Directeur général de l'OMS a donc entrepris de constituer un Comité régional de la Méditerranée orientale et un ordre du jour a été rédigé pour sa réunion inaugurale devant s'ouvrir le 7 février 1949. Auparavant le secrétaire exécutif de la Commission intérimaire avait abouti dans ses négociations avec le Gouvernement suisse au sujet du texte d'un agreement for the WHO's headquarters in Geneva which had been approved by the First World Health Assembly on 17 July 1948 and by Switzerland on 21 August 1948 ; and a model host agreement had been prepared in the WHO for use in negotiations concerning the seats of regional or local WHO offices. Accordingly, when the agenda was drawn up for the Regional Committee's inaugural meeting on 7 February 1949, included in it was the question of a "Draft Agreement with the Host Government of the Regional Office".

18. At the Regional Committee's meeting the Egyptian Delegation informed the Committee on 7 February 1949 that the Egyptian Council of Ministers had just "agreed, subject to approval of the Parliament, to lease to the World Health Organization, for the use of the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean area, the site of land and the building thereon which are at present occupied by the Quarantine Administration and the Alexandria Health Bureau, for a period of nine years at a nominal annual rent of P.T.10".

The Committee next took up the question of the location of the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean area. A motion was introduced, which the Committee at once approved, "to recommend to the Director-General and the Executive Board, subject to consultation with the United Nations, the selection of Alexandria as the site of the Regional Office". The recitals in the formal resolution to that effect, adopted the following day referred, inter alia, to "the desirability of the excellent site and buildings under favourable conditions generously offered by the Government of Egypt".

19. The Regional Committee also addressed itself to the question of the integration of the Alexandria Sanitary Bureau with the WHO. After recalling that a Committee of the Arab States had previously voted in favour of the integration, the Egyptian delegate observed that, should this happen, "the WHO would have to take over expenses from the date of opening of the Regional Office". A few brief explanations having been given, the Committee adopted a resolution recommending the integration of the Bureau in the following terms :

"Resolves to recommend to the Executive Board that in establishing the Regional Organization and the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean the functions of the Alexandria Sanitary Bureau be integrated within those of the Regional Organization of the World Health Organization."

The Egyptian delegate responded by presenting a written statement to the Committee to the effect that, taking into account the resolution just adopted, his Government was pleased to transfer to the World Health Organization the functions and all related files and records of the Alexandria Sanitary Bureau. The statement went on to say that this transfer accord concernant le siège de l'OMS à Genève, lequel accord avait été approuvé par la première Assemblée mondiale de la Santé le 17 juillet 1948 et par la Suisse le 21 août 1948 ; et l'on avait mis au point à l'OMS le texte d'un modèle d'accord avec les Etats hôtes, destiné à être utilisé lors des négociations relatives aux sièges de bureaux régionaux ou locaux de l'OMS. En conséquence l'ordre du jour de la réunion inaugurale du Comité régional du 7 février 1949 comportait une question intitulée « Projet d'accord avec l'Etat hôte du Bureau régional ».

18. Le 7 février 1949, la délégation égyptienne a fait savoir au Comité régional qu'un conseil des ministres tenu tout récemment avait

Le Comité a ensuite examiné la question de l'emplacement du Bureau régional de la Méditerranée orientale. Une motion a été présentée, que le Comité a approuvée immédiatement, « recommandant au Directeur général et au Conseil exécutif, sous réserve d'en référer aux Nations Unies, le choix d'Alexandrie comme siège du Bureau régional ». Les considérants de la résolution formelle adoptée à cet effet le lendemain faisaient notamment état de « la facilité de pouvoir disposer d'un excellent emplacement et de bâtiments, à des conditions favorables, gracieusement offerts par le Gouvernement égyptien ».

19. Le Comité régional s'est aussi penché sur la question de l'intégration du Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie dans l'OMS. Après avoir rappelé qu'un comité des Etats arabes s'était prononcé auparavant en faveur de l'intégration, le délégué de l'Egypte a fait observer que, quand celle-ci serait réalisée, « l'OMS aura[it] à prendre à sa charge les dépenses à partir de la date de l'ouverture du Bureau régional ». Quelques brefs éclaircissements ayant été donnés, le Comité a adopté une résolution recommandant l'intégration du Bureau dans les termes suivants :

Le délégué de l'Egypte a alors présenté une déclaration écrite au Comité indiquant que, en raison de la résolution qui venait d'être adoptée, son Gouvernement était heureux de transférer les fonctions du Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie et tous ses dossiers et archives à l'OMS. Il était précisé dans ce texte que le transfert aurait lieu à la date à laquelle l'Organisation would be made on the date on which the Organization notified the Government of Egypt of the commencement of operations in the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean Region. That statement having met with warm thanks from the Committee, the Egyptian delegate proposed that the work of the Regional Office should begin in July 1949 and this proposal was adopted.

20. The Director-General now raised the question of the "Draft Agreement with the Host Government" which he had included in the Agenda. He said he wished to inform the Committee that "such a draft agreement had been produced and handed to the Egyptian Government where it was under study in the legal department". He also stated that the WHO, "though always considering necessary formalities, never allowed them to interfere with Health Work", and the Egyptian delegate then added the comment that, should there be any difference of opinion between the WHO and the legal expert, this could be settled by negotiation.

21. The question passed to the Executive Board of the WHO which, in March 1949, adopted resolution EB3.R30 "conditionally" approving selection of Alexandria as the site of the Regional Office, "subject to consultation with the United Nations". That resolution went on to request the Director-General to thank Egypt for "its generous action" in placing the site and buildings at Alexandria at the disposal of the Organization for nine years at a nominal rent. Next, it formally approved the establishment of the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean and the commencement of its operations on or about 1 July 1949. The resolution then endorsed the Regional Committee's recommendation that the "functions" of the Alexandria Sanitary Bureau be "integrated" within those of the Regional Organization. It further authorized the Director-General to express appreciation to the Egyptian Government for the transfer of the "functions, files and records of the Alexandria Sanitary Bureau to the Organization upon commencement of operations in the Regional Office". The resolution did not deal with the projected host agreement still under negotiation with the Egyptian Government. Pursuant to the Agreement between the WHO and the United Nations which came into force on 10 July 1948 (Article XI), the consultation with the United Nations referred to in the resolution was effected in May 1949. This confirmed the selection of Alexandria as the site of the Regional Office.

22. However the draft host agreement, which necessarily had implications not only for the Ministry of Public Health but for other departments of the Egyptian administration, it would seem, had been undergoing close examination. As appears from a letter of 4 May 1949 from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to Sir Ali Tewfik Shousha Pasha, then Under-Secretary of State for Public Health but already designated as the first WHO Regional Director for the Eastern Mediterranean, he had been discussing the draft agreement with the Foreign Ministry during April. In that letter the Foreign Ministry referred to the draft agreement as one notifierait au Gouvernement de l'Égypte le début du fonctionnement du Bureau régional de la Méditerranée orientale. La déclaration ayant été accueillie avec gratitude par le Comité, le délégué de l'Égypte a proposé que le Bureau régional commence ses travaux en juillet 1949 ; cette proposition a été adoptée.

20. Le Directeur général a alors soulevé la question du « projet d'accord avec l'Etat hôte » qu'il avait fait inscrire à l'ordre du jour. Il a indiqué qu'il désirait informer le Comité que ce « projet d'accord a été présenté au Gouvernement égyptien, qui l'a mis à l'étude au Contentieux ». Il a également signalé que l'OMS, « tout en admettant certaines formalités nécessaires, n'acceptait jamais qu'elles puissent mettre obstacle à l'œuvre sanitaire ». Le délégué de l'Égypte a ajouté qu'en cas de divergences d'opinion entre l'OMS et le conseiller juridique la difficulté pourrait être réglée par voie de négociation.

21. La question a été déférée au Conseil exécutif de l'OMS qui, en mars 1949, a adopté la résolution EB3.R30 approuvant « sous condition » le choix d'Alexandrie comme siège du Bureau régional, « cette décision devant être soumise aux Nations Unies ». Dans la même résolution, le Conseil priait le Directeur général de remercier l'Égypte d'avoir « généreusement » mis l'emplacement et les locaux d'Alexandrie à la disposition de l'Organisation pour une période de neuf ans moyennant un loyer nominal. Il approuvait ensuite formellement la création d'un Bureau régional de la Méditerranée orientale qui commencerait à fonctionner le 1<sup>er</sup> juillet 1949 ou vers cette date. Puis il faisait sienne la résolution du Comité régional demandant que les « fonctions » du Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie soient « intégrées » dans celles de l'organisation régionale. Le Directeur général était en outre autorisé à exprimer sa satisfaction au Gouvernement de l'Égypte pour le transfert à l'Organisation des « fonctions, dossiers et archives du Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie, transfert qui aura[it] lieu au moment où le Bureau régional commencera[it] à fonctionner ». La résolution ne traitait pas de l'accord de siège envisagé, qui était encore en cours de négociation avec le Gouvernement de l'Égypte. Conformément à l'accord entre l'OMS et l'ONU entré en vigueur le 10 juillet 1948 (art. XI), la consultation des Nations Unies mentionnée dans la résolution a eu lieu en mai 1949. Cela a confirmé le choix d'Alexandrie comme siège du Bureau régional.

22. Il apparaît cependant que le projet d'accord, qui avait nécessairement des incidences non seulement pour le ministère de l'hygiène publique mais pour plusieurs autres départements de l'administration égyptienne, faisait alors l'objet d'un examen approfondi. Il ressort d'une lettre adressée le 4 mai 1949 par le ministère des affaires étrangères à sir Ali Tewfik Choucha Pacha, alors sous-secrétaire d'Etat à l'hygiène publique et déjà désigné pour être le premier directeur régional de l'OMS pour la Méditerranée orientale, que celui-ci avait discuté le projet d'accord avec le ministère durant le mois d'avril. Dans sa lettre, le ministère se référait expressément au projet comme étant celui d'un accord

“which the World Health Organization intends to conclude with the Egyptian Government on the privileges and immunities to be enjoyed by its regional office which will be established in Alexandria as well as the staff of that office”.

It explained that it was enclosing a copy of the memorandum prepared by the Contentieux (legal department) of the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Justice, setting out their comments on the draft agreement, together with a revised draft. The memorandum stated that, in studying the provisions of the draft, the Contentieux had also had regard to various other agreements concluded, or in course of conclusion, between individual States and specialized agencies on the occasion of the latter establishing headquarters or regional offices in their territories. In this connection, it made mention of the headquarters agreements already concluded by France with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and by Switzerland with WHO itself, as well as draft agreements still under negotiation by France and Peru with the International Civil Aviation Organization regarding the seats of regional offices to be established in their territories. The memorandum went on to suggest numerous changes in the provisions of the agreement and gave detailed explanations of the amendments which the Contentieux wished to see in the draft. The memorandum and revised draft, it appears from a later note of Sir Ali Tewfik Shousha Pasha, were then transmitted to the Director-General of the WHO. It also appears from letters of 29 May and 4 June 1949 supplied to the Court by the WHO that some further exchanges took place between him and the Contentieux concerning the draft agreement at this time.

23. Meanwhile, however, the whole question of privileges and immunities for regional offices of international organizations had become at once more complicated and more pressing for the Egyptian administration. This was because by now Regional Bureaux for the Middle East had already been established in Cairo by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, by ICAO and by Unesco, and because in any event it was becoming necessary to consider the question of Egypt's adherence to the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies. The general situation was laid before Egypt's Council of Ministers by the Foreign Minister in a Note of 25 May 1949. His Note ended with a proposal that, as a provisional measure the Council should grant to the staff of FAO, Unesco and WHO in their Regional Offices the same temporary exemption from customs dues on any articles and equipment imported from abroad and relating to their official work as was already enjoyed by ICAO. This proposal was endorsed by the Council of Ministers at a meeting four days later, and the Regional Director was so informed on 23 June. The operations of the Regional Office being due to commence on 1 July, the need to complete the negotiations for the host agreement had been under consideration by the World Health Assembly itself which passed a resolution on the subject on 25 June at its Second

Le ministère ajoutait qu'il joignait une copie du mémorandum rédigé par le Contentieux des ministères des affaires étrangères et de la justice où figuraient des observations sur le projet d'accord, ainsi qu'un projet révisé. Le mémorandum précisait que, en étudiant les dispositions du projet, le Contentieux avait aussi pris en considération divers autres accords qui avaient été conclus, ou étaient sur le point de l'être, entre des Etats et des institutions spécialisées, à l'occasion de l'établissement de sièges ou bureaux régionaux de ces institutions sur leur territoire. A cet égard il était fait mention des accords de siège déjà conclus par la France avec l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'éducation, la science et la culture et par la Suisse avec l'OMS, ainsi que des projets d'accords que la France et le Pérou négociaient respectivement avec l'Organisation de l'aviation civile internationale au sujet des bureaux régionaux à établir sur leur territoire. Le mémorandum suggérait ensuite d'apporter de nombreux changements aux dispositions de l'accord et expliquait en détail ceux que le Contentieux jugeait souhaitables. Le mémorandum et le projet révisé ont été transmis au Directeur général de l'OMS, comme paraît l'indiquer une note postérieure de sir Ali Tewfik Choucha Pacha. Il ressort aussi de lettres du 29 mai et du 4 juin 1949 communiquées par l'OMS à la Cour que d'autres échanges ont eu lieu à l'époque entre sir Ali Tewfik Choucha Pacha et le Contentieux au sujet du projet d'accord.

23. Entre-temps toute la question des privilèges et immunités des bureaux régionaux des organisations internationales était devenue à la fois plus complexe et plus pressante pour l'administration égyptienne. En effet l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'alimentation et l'agriculture, l'OACI et l'Unesco avaient déjà établi leurs bureaux régionaux pour le Moyen-Orient au Caire et, de toute façon, il devenait nécessaire d'examiner la question de l'adhésion de l'Egypte à la convention sur les privilèges et immunités des institutions spécialisées. La situation générale a été portée par le ministre des affaires étrangères à l'attention du conseil des ministres d'Egypte par note du 25 mai 1949. Cette note proposait en conclusion qu'à titre provisoire le conseil accorde au personnel de la FAO, de l'Unesco et de l'OMS affecté aux bureaux régionaux de ces organisations en Egypte l'exemption temporaire des droits de douane sur tout article ou matériel importé pour les besoins de son activité officielle dont bénéficiait déjà l'OACI. La proposition a été approuvée par le conseil des ministres quatre jours plus tard et le directeur régional en a été avisé le 23 juin 1949. Le Bureau régional devant entrer en service le 1<sup>er</sup> juillet, la nécessité de mener à leur terme les négociations sur l'accord de siège avait été examinée par l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé elle-même, qui a adopté une résolution à ce sujet le 25 juin pendant sa deuxième session. Par cette Session. The Director-General was requested to continue the negotiations with the Government of Egypt in order to obtain an agreement extending privileges and immunities to the Regional Organization and to report to the next session. Pending the coming into force of that agreement, the Assembly invited the Government of Egypt to extend to the Organization the privileges and immunities set out in the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies. Egypt, however, had not yet adhered to that Convention, and it was only the Council of Ministers' decision authorizing, temporarily, exemption from customs dues that applied when the Regional Office commenced operations, as it did on the agreed date, 1 July 1949.

24. The Director-General continued the negotiations and on 26 July 1949 the WHO's comments on the Contentieux' memorandum were transmitted to the Egyptian Government, together with a revised draft of the host agreement and a draft lease of the site and buildings. On 9 November 1949, a host agreement on the same lines as the draft transmitted to Egypt was signed with the Government of India. In February 1950 the Executive Board noted the state of the negotiations ; a letter of 23 March 1950 to the WHO Regional Director from the Contentieux of the Egyptian Government Ministries gave the impression that, subject to minor modifications, WHO's draft was acceptable to Egypt. In that belief the Third World Health Assembly passed a resolution in the following May affirming the Agreement in the form of the WHO's revised draft. Subsequently, however, the Regional Office reported that the Egyptian authorities were, in fact, asking for a number of fairly substantial alterations. As the Director-General considered the amendments requested to touch fundamental points of principle and therefore to be unacceptable, he went himself to Egypt and, in negotiations with the Egyptian authorities on 19 and 20 December 1950, persuaded them to drop the amendments which were the cause of the disagreement. The Egyptian authorities then expressed themselves as ready to accept the host agreement, subject to the approval of the Egyptian Parliament and to certain points being set out in an accompanying Exchange of Notes. Eventually, the Agreement was signed in Cairo on 25 March 1951 and was approved by the Fourth World Health Assembly in May, although one of the points in the Exchange of Notes had given rise to some discussion in the Legal Sub-Committee. The Egyptian Parliament gave its approval towards the end of June and the long-negotiated host agreement finally entered into force on 8 August 1951. As to the lease of the site and buildings of the former Sanitary Bureau to the WHO, which under an Egyptian law also required Parliamentary approval, its execution was not completed until 1955, the operation of the lease then being expressed to have begun several years earlier on 1 July 1949.

25. Mention has finally to be made of an Agreement for the provision of services by the WHO in Egypt, signed on 25 August 1950. At the same time the Court notes that, according to the Director of the Legal Division of the résolution, le Directeur général était prié de poursuivre les négociations avec le Gouvernement de l'Égypte pour aboutir à un accord en vue de l'octroi de privilèges et d'immunités à l'organisation régionale et de faire rapport à la session suivante. En attendant l'entrée en vigueur de l'accord, l'Assemblée invitait le Gouvernement de l'Égypte à accorder à l'Organisation les privilèges et immunités énoncés dans la convention sur les privilèges et immunités des institutions spécialisées. L'Égypte cependant n'avait pas encore adhéré à cette convention, et ce n'est que la décision du conseil des ministres autorisant temporairement l'exemption des droits de douane qui s'est appliquée à la date convenue pour l'entrée en service du Bureau régional, le 1<sup>er</sup> juillet 1949.

24. Le Directeur général a poursuivi les négociations, et les observations de l'OMS sur le mémorandum du Contentieux ont été transmises au Gouvernement de l'Égypte le 26 juillet 1949, en même temps qu'un projet révisé d'accord de siège et un projet de bail pour le terrain et les bâtiments. Le 9 novembre 1949 un accord de siège analogue au projet transmis à l'Égypte a été signé avec le Gouvernement de l'Inde. En février 1950 le Conseil exécutif a noté l'état d'avancement des négociations ; le 23 mars 1950 une lettre du Contentieux des ministères égyptiens au directeur régional de l'OMS donnait l'impression que, sous réserve de légères modifications, le projet de l'OMS serait acceptable pour l'Égypte. C'est dans cette conviction que la troisième Assemblée mondiale de la Santé a adopté en mai suivant une résolution entérinant l'accord sous la forme du projet révisé de l'OMS. Par la suite cependant le Bureau régional a fait savoir que les autorités égyptiennes demandaient en réalité plusieurs modifications assez importantes. Estimant que ces amendements touchaient des points de principe fondamentaux et étaient donc inacceptables, le Directeur général s'est rendu lui-même en Égypte et, au cours des pourparlers avec les autorités égyptiennes qui ont eu lieu les 19 et 20 décembre 1950, les a persuadées d'abandonner les amendements source du désaccord. Les autorités égyptiennes se sont alors déclarées prêtes à accepter l'accord de siège, sous réserve de l'approbation du Parlement égyptien et étant entendu que certaines questions devaient être précisées dans un échange de notes qui accompagnerait l'accord. Pour finir, l'accord a été signé au Caire le 25 mars 1951, puis approuvé par la quatrième Assemblée mondiale de la Santé en mai, bien que l'un des points de l'échange de notes eût prêté à discussion à la sous-commission juridique. Le Parlement égyptien a donné son approbation vers la fin du mois de juin et l'accord, qui avait fait l'objet de si longues négociations, est finalement entré en vigueur le 8 août 1951. Quant au contrat de bail pour la location à l'OMS du terrain et des bâtiments de l'ancien Bureau sanitaire qui, en vertu de la législation égyptienne, devait aussi être approuvé par le Parlement, ce contrat n'a été définitivement entériné qu'en 1955 ; il y était spécifié que la location avait commencé à courir plusieurs années plus tôt, le 1<sup>er</sup> juillet 1949.

25. Il convient enfin de faire mention d'un accord de fourniture de services conclu le 25 août 1950 entre l'OMS et l'Égypte. La Cour note cependant que, d'après le directeur de la division juridique de l'Organi-

Organization, this Agreement does not have any particular connection with the setting up of the Regional Office in Egypt. The 1950 Agreement, he explained, is simply a standard form of agreement for the execution of technical co-operation projects, similar to Agreements concluded with other member States which have no WHO office situated on their territories.

26. The position appearing from the events which the Court has so far set out may be summarized as follows. During the early years of the WHO, Egypt raised the question of the relation to the new Organization of the existing long-established Alexandria Sanitary Bureau, and the Interim Commission of the WHO in turn approached Egypt regarding the integration of the existing Bureau with the Organization and the location of the WHO's Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean in Alexandria. Agreement was then reached between the WHO and Egypt early in 1949 that the operation of the Alexandria Bureau should be taken over by the WHO in July of that year. That agreement was arrived at on the basis of offers by the Egyptian Government to lease to the Organization for the use of the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean the site and buildings of the existing Alexandria Bureau, and to transfer to the Organization the functions and all related files and records of the Bureau. Egypt's offers were accepted by the Organization which, on its part, undertook to assume financial responsibility for the Bureau on the date of the opening of the Regional Office ; and it was then decided that the date should be 1 July 1949. These arrangements were approved by the Egyptian Government and were endorsed by the Organization specifically as an integration of a pre-existing institution under Article 54 of its Constitution. Temporary exemption from customs dues having been provided by Egypt's Council of Ministers, the WHO's Regional Office commenced operating at the seat of the former Sanitary Bureau on 1 July 1949.

27. Meanwhile, negotiations for the conclusion of a host agreement for the Regional Office, begun at least five months earlier, had been making slow progress and were not completed until nearly two years later. On 25 March 1951, however, the Agreement, Section 37 of which is the subject of the present request, was signed and ultimately entered into force on 8 August of that year. That agreement, in the words of its preamble, was concluded :

“for the purpose of determining the privileges, immunities and facilities to be granted by the Government of Egypt to the World Health Organization, to the representatives of its Members and to its experts and officials in particular with regard to its arrangements in the Eastern Mediterranean Region, and of regulating other related matters”.

Its provisions followed closely those of the model host agreement prepared in the WHO, and are for the most part typical of those found in host agreements of headquarters or regional or local offices of international sation, cet accord est sans rapport particulier avec la création du Bureau régional en Egypte. L'accord de 1950, a-t-il expliqué, ne représente qu'un type d'accord courant portant sur l'exécution de projets de coopération technique, analogue aux accords conclus avec d'autres Etats membres qui n'ont pas de bureau de l'OMS sur leur territoire.

26. La situation, telle qu'elle se dégage des événements que la Cour a évoqués jusqu'ici, peut être résumée comme suit. Dans les premières années d'existence de l'OMS, l'Egypte a soulevé la question des liens entre le Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie, établi depuis fort longtemps, et la nouvelle Organisation, puis la Commission intérimaire de l'OMS a approché à son tour l'Egypte au sujet de l'intégration du Bureau dans l'Organisation et de l'installation à Alexandrie du Bureau régional de l'OMS pour la Méditerranée orientale. L'OMS et l'Egypte sont alors convenues, au début de 1949, que les fonctions du Bureau d'Alexandrie seraient reprises par l'OMS en juillet de la même année. L'entente a été conclue sur la base d'offres faites par le Gouvernement de l'Egypte en vue de louer à l'Organisation, à l'usage du Bureau régional de la Méditerranée orientale, le terrain et les bâtiments du Bureau d'Alexandrie et de transférer à l'Organisation les fonctions du Bureau ainsi que tous les dossiers et archives s'y rapportant. Les offres de l'Egypte ont été acceptées par l'Organisation, qui s'est engagée pour sa part à assumer la responsabilité financière du Bureau à dater de l'ouverture du Bureau régional ; il a été ensuite décidé de fixer celle-ci au 1<sup>er</sup> juillet 1949. Ces arrangements ont été approuvés par le Gouvernement de l'Egypte et ils ont été expressément entérinés par l'Organisation comme représentant l'intégration d'une institution préexistante au sens de l'article 54 de la Constitution de l'OMS. Le conseil des ministres égyptien ayant accordé l'exemption temporaire des droits de douane, le Bureau régional de l'OMS est entré en service au siège de l'ancien Bureau sanitaire le 1<sup>er</sup> juillet 1949.

27. Entre-temps les négociations en vue de la conclusion d'un accord de siège pour le Bureau régional, commencées il y avait au moins cinq mois, progressaient avec lenteur ; elles n'ont abouti que près de deux ans plus tard. Le 25 mars 1951 cependant l'accord dont la section 37 fait l'objet de la présente requête a été signé et est entré finalement en vigueur le 8 août de la même année. Aux termes de son préambule, cet accord avait pour objet :

Ses dispositions s'inspirent de très près de celles du modèle d'accord avec les Etats hôtes établi à l'OMS et sont pour l'essentiel caractéristiques des accords de siège concernant les organisations internationales elles-mêmes organizations. These provisions are on the lines of the Convention of 21 November 1947 on the Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies, to which Egypt became a party on 28 September 1954. Under Section 39 of that Convention, however, the Agreement of 25 March 1951 continued to be the instrument defining the legal status of the Regional Office in Alexandria as between the WHO and Egypt.

28. The Court must now turn to the circumstances which have led to the submission of the present request to the Court. Ever since beginning its activities in Egypt on 1 July 1949, the WHO's Regional Office has operated continuously at the site of the former Sanitary Bureau in Alexandria. In doing so, however, it has encountered certain difficulties stemming from the tense political situation in the Middle East. Those difficulties are reflected in the fact that in 1954 the World Health Assembly found it necessary to divide the Committee into two sub-committees : Sub-Committee A in which Israel was not, and Sub-Committee B in which it was, represented.

29. On 7 May 1979 the Regional Director received a letter from the governments of five member States of the Region requesting the convening of an extraordinary meeting of the Regional Committee to discuss transferring the Regional Office from Alexandria to one of the other Arab member States. A special session of Sub-Committee A was held on 12 May 1979, attended by representatives of 20 States, but not by Egypt which had asked for the session to be postponed. Sub-Committee A adopted a resolution reciting the wish of the majority of its members that the Regional Office should be transferred to another State in the Region and recommending its transfer. Meanwhile, the question had also been placed on the agenda for the thirty-second Session of the World Health Assembly ; and on 16 May 1979 the Egyptian delegation submitted a Memorandum alleging certain procedural irregularities and objecting that the request for transfer was "politically motivated". The question was referred to a Committee which expressed the view that the effects of the implementation of such a decision by the Assembly needed study and recommended that the study be undertaken by the Executive Board.

30. The World Health Assembly adopted the recommendation of the Committee and, on 28 May 1979, the Executive Board set up a Working Group to study all aspects of the matter and report back in January 1980. The Working Group's report, dated 16 January 1980 (which is in the dossier of documents supplied to the Court), included a section entitled "Question of denunciation of the existing Host Agreement", as to which it said :

"The Group considered that it was not in a position to decide whether or not Section 37 of the Agreement with Egypt is applicable. The final position of the Organization on the possible discrepancies of

28. La Cour doit maintenant en venir aux événements qui ont abouti à la soumission de la présente requête. Depuis le début de son activité en Égypte, le 1<sup>er</sup> juillet 1949, le Bureau régional de l'OMS a fonctionné sans interruption sur les lieux mêmes de l'ancien Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie. Il devait toutefois se heurter à certaines difficultés, tenant à la tension politique qui règne au Moyen-Orient, et dont témoigne le fait que l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé a jugé nécessaire en 1954 de subdiviser le Comité en deux sous-comités : le sous-comité A dont Israël ne faisait pas partie et le sous-comité B où Israël était représenté.

29. Le 7 mai 1979 le Directeur général a reçu une lettre par laquelle les gouvernements de cinq des Etats membres de la région demandaient la convocation d'une session extraordinaire du Comité régional afin de discuter du transfert du Bureau régional d'Alexandrie dans un des autres Etats membres arabes de la région. Le sous-comité A s'est réuni en session extraordinaire le 12 mai 1979 avec la participation des représentants de vingt Etats mais non de l'Égypte, qui avait demandé le report de la session. Il a adopté une résolution par laquelle, considérant que la majorité de ses membres souhaitait que le Bureau régional soit transféré dans un autre Etat de la région, il recommandait le transfert dudit Bureau. Entre-temps la question avait aussi été inscrite à l'ordre du jour de la trente-deuxième session de l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé. Le 16 mai 1979 la délégation égyptienne a présenté un mémorandum dans lequel l'Égypte alléguait certaines irrégularités de procédure et objectait que la demande de transfert obéissait à des « motifs politiques ». La question a été renvoyée à une commission, qui a estimé qu'il était nécessaire d'étudier les effets qu'aurait la mise en œuvre d'une telle décision de l'Assemblée et a recommandé que le Conseil exécutif entreprenne cette étude.

30. L'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé a adopté la recommandation de la commission et le Conseil exécutif a constitué le 28 mai 1979 un groupe de travail chargé d'étudier tous les aspects de la question et de lui faire rapport en janvier 1980. Le rapport du groupe de travail daté du 16 janvier 1980 (qui fait partie du dossier des documents soumis à la Cour) comporte une section intitulée « Question de la dénonciation de l'accord de siège actuel », où figure le passage suivant :

views will have to be decided upon by the Health Assembly . . . the International Court of Justice could also possibly be requested to provide an advisory opinion under Article 76 of the WHO Constitution.”

The Executive Board accordingly transmitted the Working Group’s report to the World Health Assembly for consideration and decision.

31. A further special session of Sub-Committee A of the Regional Committee for the Eastern Mediterranean was held in Geneva on 9 May 1980, attended by representatives of 20 States, including Egypt. A resolution was adopted, by 19 votes to 1 (that of Egypt) whereby the Sub-Committee decided to recommend the transfer of the Regional Office for the Eastern Mediterranean to Amman, Jordan, as soon as possible. The representative of Egypt objected that the recommendation was, in his view, based on purely political considerations. The question was again referred to the World Health Assembly at its thirty-third session, and at Egypt’s request the text of the 1951 Host Agreement was distributed to member States. At its meeting on 16 May 1980, the Committee concerned had before it a draft resolution submitted by 20 Arab States under which the Health Assembly would decide to transfer the Regional Office to Amman, Jordan, as soon as possible. Before it also was a draft resolution submitted by the United States under which the Assembly would decide, “prior to taking any decision on removal of the Regional Office” to request an advisory opinion of the Court in the terms in which the request has been submitted to the Court. In the course of the debate the Arab States stressed the wish of the great majority of the member States of the Region to transfer the office from Egypt and the harm which they considered its retention in Alexandria would do to the work of the Organization. A number of other States, on the other hand, questioned the desirability of transferring a regional health office for political reasons and expressed doubts regarding the practical aspects of the transfer. The Egyptian delegate, inter alia, invoked Section 37, pointing out problems involved in its interpretation. The United States resolution was endorsed by the Committee which recommended its adoption to the World Health Assembly. Three days later, on 19 May, the representatives of 17 Arab States addressed a letter to the Director-General of the Organization informing him of their decision completely to “boycott” the Regional Office in its present location, not to have any dealings with it as from that date, and to deal directly with Headquarters in Geneva.

32. When the Committee’s recommendation was considered by the World Health Assembly at a Plenary Meeting on 20 May, the delegate of Jordan disputed the relevance of Section 37 to the question of the transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt, and called for an opinion to be given by the Director of the Legal Division of the Organization. The latter then gave certain explanations as to the problems which he considered to be involved in the interpretation of Section 37 and added that he was not for the moment able to enlighten it further. The Assembly thereupon adopted the vues possibles devra être décidée par l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé... La Cour internationale de Justice pourrait, en application de l'article 76 de la Constitution de l'OMS, également être priée de donner un avis consultatif. »

Le Conseil exécutif a donc transmis ce rapport à l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé pour examen et décision.

31. Une nouvelle session extraordinaire du sous-comité A du Comité régional de la Méditerranée orientale s'est tenue à Genève le 9 mai 1980 ; vingt Etats y étaient représentés, dont l'Égypte. Par une résolution adoptée par dix-neuf voix contre une (celle de l'Égypte), le sous-comité a décidé de recommander que le Bureau régional de la Méditerranée orientale soit transféré le plus tôt possible à Amman, en Jordanie. Le représentant de l'Égypte s'est élevé contre cette recommandation, qui obéissait, à son avis, à des motifs purement politiques. La question a été une fois encore renvoyée à l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé à sa trente-troisième session et, à la demande de l'Égypte, le texte de l'accord de siège de 1951 a été distribué aux Etats membres. A sa séance du 16 mai 1980, la commission compétente a été saisie d'un projet de résolution présenté par vingt Etats arabes, par lequel l'Assemblée aurait décidé de transférer le plus tôt possible le Bureau régional à Amman. Elle était en outre saisie d'un projet de résolution des Etats-Unis prévoyant que l'Assemblée déciderait, « avant de prendre une décision au sujet du déplacement du Bureau régional », de demander à la Cour un avis consultatif dans les termes mêmes de la requête soumise depuis lors à la Cour. Pendant le débat, les Etats arabes ont souligné que la grande majorité des Etats membres de la région souhaitait le transfert du Bureau hors d'Égypte et que son maintien à Alexandrie nuirait aux travaux de l'Organisation. Divers autres Etats se sont demandé en revanche s'il était souhaitable de transférer un bureau sanitaire régional pour des motifs politiques et ont exprimé des doutes sur les aspects pratiques du transfert. Le délégué de l'Égypte a notamment invoqué la section 37, soulignant les problèmes que pose son interprétation. La résolution des Etats-Unis a été approuvée par la commission, qui a recommandé à l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé de l'adopter. Trois jours plus tard, le 19 mai 1980, les représentants de dix-sept Etats arabes ont adressé une lettre au Directeur général de l'Organisation pour l'informer de leur décision de « boycotter » complètement le Bureau régional en son siège actuel, de n'avoir aucune relation avec lui à compter de cette date et de traiter directement avec le siège de l'Organisation à Genève.

32. Lorsque l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé a examiné la recommandation de la commission à sa séance plénière du 20 mai, le délégué de la Jordanie a contesté la pertinence de la section 37 en ce qui concerne le transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Égypte et il a demandé un avis du directeur de la division juridique de l'Organisation. Celui-ci a alors donné certaines explications sur les problèmes que posait, selon lui, l'interprétation de la section 37 et il a ajouté qu'il n'était pas pour le moment en mesure de fournir plus d'éclaircissements. Sur ce, l'Assemblée a adopté le projet de draft resolution recommended by the Committee, the full text of which has been given in the opening paragraph of this Opinion. The resolution, the Court observes, in setting out the Assembly's decision to submit the present request to the Court, explained in recitals the reasons why the Assembly found it necessary to do so. In those recitals the Assembly took note of "the differing views" which had been expressed on the question of whether the Organization "may transfer the Regional Office without regard to the provisions of Section 37 of the Agreement between the World Health Organization and Egypt of 25 March 1951" ; and it further noted that the Working Group of the Executive Board had been "unable to make a judgment or a recommendation on the applicability of Section 37 of this Agreement".

33. In the debates in the World Health Assembly just referred to, on the proposal to request the present opinion from the Court, opponents of the proposal insisted that it was nothing but a political manoeuvre designed to postpone any decision concerning removal of the Regional Office from Egypt, and the question therefore arises whether the Court ought to decline to reply to the present request by reason of its allegedly political character. In none of the written and oral statements submitted to the Court, on the other hand, has this contention been advanced and such a contention would in any case, have run counter to the settled jurisprudence of the Court. That jurisprudence establishes that if, as in the present case, a question submitted in a request is one that otherwise falls within the normal exercise of its judicial process, the Court has not to deal with the motives which may have inspired the request (Conditions of Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations (Article 4 of Charter), Advisory Opinion, 1948, I.C.J. Reports 1947-1948, pp. 61-62 ; Competence of the General Assembly for the Admission of a State to the United Nations, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1950, pp. 6-7 ; Certain Expenses of the United Nations (Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter), Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1962, p. 155). Indeed, in situations in which political considerations are prominent it may be particularly necessary for an international organization to obtain an advisory opinion from the Court as to the legal principles applicable with respect to the matter under debate, especially when these may include the interpretation of its constitution.

34. Having thus examined the factual and legal context in which the present request for an advisory opinion comes before it, the Court will now consider the full meaning and implications of the hypothetical questions on which it is asked to advise. Since those are formulated in the request by reference to the applicability of Section 37 of the Agreement of 25 March 1951 to a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt, it is necessary at once résolution recommandé par la commission, dont le texte intégral est cité au début du présent avis consultatif. La Cour note que la résolution, qui concrétise la décision de l'Assemblée de soumettre la présente requête à la Cour, expose en son préambule les raisons pour lesquelles l'Assemblée a jugé bon d'agir ainsi. L'Assemblée y prend note des « divergences de vues » qui se sont fait jour sur le point de savoir si l'Organisation « est en droit de transférer le Bureau régional sans tenir compte des dispositions de la section 37 de l'accord entre l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé et l'Égypte en date du 25 mars 1951 » ; elle relève en outre que le groupe de travail du Conseil exécutif n'avait pas été « en mesure de décider si la section 37 dudit accord devait ou non être appliquée ni de formuler une recommandation à ce sujet ».

33. Au cours des débats mentionnés au paragraphe précédent, auxquels la proposition de soumettre la présente requête pour avis consultatif a donné lieu à l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé, les adversaires de cette proposition ont insisté sur le fait qu'il ne s'agissait là que d'une manœuvre politique visant à retarder toute décision sur le retrait d'Égypte du Bureau régional ; la question se pose donc de savoir si la Cour devrait refuser de répondre à la requête en raison du caractère politique qu'elle présenterait. Cependant cette thèse n'est développée dans aucun des exposés écrits et oraux soumis à la Cour et elle irait de toute façon à l'encontre de sa jurisprudence constante. Selon cette jurisprudence, s'il advient que, comme c'est le cas dans la présente espèce, une question formulée dans une requête relève de d'autres égards de l'exercice normal de sa juridiction, la Cour n'a pas à traiter des mobiles qui ont pu inspirer la requête (Conditions de l'admission d'un Etat comme Membre des Nations Unies (article 4 de la Charte), avis consultatif, 1948, C.I.J. Recueil 1947-1948, p. 61 et 62 ; Compétence de l'Assemblée générale pour l'admission d'un Etat aux Nations Unies, avis consultatif, C.I.J. Recueil 1950, p. 6 et 7 ; Certaines dépenses des Nations Unies (article 17, paragraphe 2, de la Charte), avis consultatif, C.I.J. Recueil 1962, p. 155). En fait, lorsque des considérations politiques jouent un rôle marquant il peut être particulièrement nécessaire à une organisation internationale d'obtenir un avis consultatif de la Cour sur les principes juridiques applicables à la matière en discussion, surtout quand ces principes peuvent mettre en jeu l'interprétation de sa constitution.

34. Après avoir ainsi examiné le contexte de fait et de droit dans lequel la présente requête pour avis consultatif lui est soumise, la Cour va maintenant considérer toute la signification et la portée des questions hypothétiques auxquelles il lui est demandé de répondre. Ces questions étant formulées dans la requête en fonction de l'applicabilité de la section 37 de l'accord du 25 mars 1951 à un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Égypte, to turn to the provisions of that Section. Included in the 1951 Agreement as one of its "Final Provisions", Section 37 reads :

"Section 37. The present Agreement may be revised at the request of either party. In this event the two parties shall consult each other concerning the modifications to be made in its provisions. If the negotiations do not result in an understanding within one year, the present Agreement may be denounced by either party giving two years' notice."

The "differing views" in the World Health Assembly as to the applicability of these provisions to a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt, which are mentioned in the recitals to the resolution, concerned various points. One of these was whether a transfer of the seat of the Regional Office from Egypt is or is not covered by the provisions of the 1951 Agreement which to a large extent deal with privileges, immunities and facilities. Another was whether the provisions of Section 37 relate only to the case of a request by one or other party for revision of provisions of the Agreement relating to the question of privileges, immunities and facilities or are also apt to cover its total revision or outright denunciation. But the differences of view also involved further points, as appears from the debates and from the explanations given by the Director of the Legal Division of the WHO at the World Health Assembly's meeting of 20 May. Dealing with a question from the delegate of Jordan about the two years' notice provided for in Section 37, the Director of the Legal Division referred to the enlightenment to be obtained on the point by comparing the provisions in other host agreements. He also drew attention to the possibility of referring to the applicable general principles of international law, emphasizing the relevance in this connection of Article 56 of the International Law Commission's draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between international organizations.

35. Accordingly, it is apparent that, although the questions in the request are formulated in terms only of Section 37, the true legal question under consideration in the World Health Assembly is : What are the legal principles and rules applicable to the question under what conditions and in accordance with what modalities a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt may be effected ? This, in the Court's opinion, must also be considered to be the legal question submitted to it by the request. The Court points out that, if it is to remain faithful to the requirements of its judicial character in the exercise of its advisory jurisdiction, it must ascertain what are the legal questions really in issue in questions formulated in a request (cf. Admissibility of Hearings of Petitioners by the Committee on South West Africa, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1956, p. 26, and see also p. 37 ; Certain Expenses of the United Nations (Article 17, paragraph 2, of the il est nécessaire de commencer par examiner les dispositions de cette section. La section 37, qui fait partie des « Dispositions finales » de l'accord de 1951, est libellée comme suit :

Les « divergences de vues » qui se sont fait jour à l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé au sujet de l'applicabilité de ces dispositions à un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Égypte, divergences mentionnées dans le préambule de la résolution, portaient sur divers points. Il s'agissait d'abord de savoir si un transfert du siège du Bureau régional hors d'Égypte est régi ou non par les dispositions de l'accord de 1951, qui portent en grande partie sur les privilèges, immunités et facilités. Il s'agissait aussi de déterminer si les dispositions de la section 37 visent uniquement le cas où l'une ou l'autre partie demande la révision de clauses de l'accord relatives à la question des privilèges, immunités et facilités ou si elles peuvent également s'appliquer à sa révision totale ou à sa dénonciation pure et simple. Mais les divergences de vues portaient encore sur d'autres points, comme il ressort des débats et des explications données par le directeur de la division juridique de l'OMS à la séance tenue par l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé le 20 mai. En réponse à une question posée par le délégué de la Jordanie au sujet du préavis de deux ans prévu par la section 37, le directeur de la division juridique a indiqué que l'on pourrait obtenir des éclaircissements à ce sujet en procédant à une comparaison avec les dispositions d'autres accords de siège. Il a signalé aussi la possibilité de se reporter aux principes généraux applicables du droit international, soulignant la pertinence à cet égard de l'article 56 du projet de la Commission du droit international sur les traités conclus entre États et organisations internationales ou entre organisations internationales.

35. Il appert donc que, bien que les questions de la requête soient formulées uniquement en fonction de la section 37, la véritable question juridique qui se pose à l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé est celle-ci : Quels sont les principes et les règles juridiques applicables à la question de savoir selon quelles conditions et selon quelles modalités peut être effectué un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Égypte ? De l'avis de la Cour, c'est aussi cet énoncé qui doit être considéré comme la question juridique à elle soumise par la requête. La Cour souligne que, pour rester fidèle aux exigences de son caractère judiciaire dans l'exercice de sa compétence consultative, elle doit rechercher quelles sont véritablement les questions juridiques que soulèvent les demandes formulées dans une requête (voir par exemple Admissibilité de l'audition de pétitionnaires par le Comité du Sud-Ouest africain, avis consultatif, C.I.J. Recueil 1956, p. 26 et aussi p. 37 ;

Charter), Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1962, pp. 156-158). It also points out in this connection that the Permanent Court of International Justice, in replying to requests for an advisory opinion, likewise found it necessary in some cases first to ascertain what were the legal questions really in issue in the questions posed in the request (cf. Jaworzina, Advisory Opinion, 1923, P.C.I.J., Series B, No. 8, p. 282 ; Interpretation of the Greco-Turkish Agreement of 1 December 1926, Advisory Opinion, 1928, P.C.I.J., Series B, No. 16, pp. 5-16). Furthermore, as the Court has stressed earlier in this Opinion, a reply to questions of the kind posed in the present request may, if incomplete, be not only ineffectual but actually misleading as to the legal rules applicable to the matter under consideration by the requesting Organization. For this reason, the Court could not adequately discharge the obligation incumbent upon it in the present case if, in replying to the request, it did not take into consideration all the pertinent legal issues involved in the matter to which the questions are addressed.

36. The Court will therefore now proceed to consider its replies to the questions formulated in the request on the basis that the true legal question submitted to the Court is : What are the legal principles and rules applicable to the question under what conditions and in accordance with what modalities a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt may be effected ?

37. The Court thinks it necessary to underline at the outset that the question before it is not whether, in general, an organization has the right to select the location of the seat of its headquarters or of a regional office. On that question there has been no difference of view in the present case, and there can be no doubt that an international organization does have such a right. The question before the Court is the different one of whether, in the present case, the Organization's power to exercise that right is or is not regulated by reason of the existence of obligations vis-à-vis Egypt. The Court notes that in the World Health Assembly and in some of the written and oral statements before the Court there seems to have been a disposition to regard international organizations as possessing some form of absolute power to determine and, if need be, change the location of the sites of their headquarters and regional offices. But States for their part possess a sovereign power of decision with respect to their acceptance of the headquarters or a regional office of an organization within their territories ; and an organization's power of decision is no more absolute in this respect than is that of a State. As was pointed out by the Court in one of its early Advisory Opinions, there is nothing in the character of international organizations to justify their being considered as some form of "super-State" (Reparations for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the United Nations, Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 179). International organizations are subjects of international law and, as such, are bound by

Certaines dépenses des Nations Unies (article 17, paragraphe 2, de la Charte), avis consultatif, C.I.J. Recueil 1962, p. 156 à 158). Elle souligne également à ce propos qu'en réponse à des requêtes pour avis consultatif la Cour permanente de Justice internationale a elle aussi jugé parfois nécessaire de déterminer quels points de droit étaient véritablement mis en jeu par les questions posées dans la requête (voir Jaworzina, avis consultatif, 1923, C.P.J.I. série B n° 8, p. 282 ; Interprétation de l'accord gréco-turc du 1<sup>er</sup> décembre 1926, avis consultatif, 1928, C.P.J.I. série B n° 16, p. 5 à 16). En outre, comme la Cour l'a relevé plus haut dans le présent avis consultatif, une réponse incomplète à des questions comme celles de la requête peut non seulement être inefficace mais induire réellement en erreur sur les règles juridiques qui régissent le sujet examiné par l'Organisation requérante. Aussi la Cour ne pourrait-elle s'acquitter convenablement de l'obligation qui lui incombe en l'espèce si, dans sa réponse à la requête, elle ne prenait pas en considération tous les aspects juridiques pertinents du sujet sur lequel portent les questions.

37. La Cour estime nécessaire de souligner dès le départ que la question dont elle est saisie n'est pas de savoir si en général une organisation a le droit de choisir l'emplacement de son siège ou d'un bureau régional. Il n'y a pas eu de divergences de vues à cet égard en la présente espèce et il n'est pas douteux qu'une organisation internationale jouit de ce droit. La question posée à la Cour est différente ; elle est de savoir si, en l'occurrence, le pouvoir que possède l'Organisation d'exercer ce droit est ou non soumis à des règles, du fait de l'existence d'obligations dont l'Organisation serait tenue envers l'Égypte. La Cour constate que, au sein de l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé comme dans certains des exposés écrits ou oraux qui lui ont été présentés, on paraît avoir eu tendance à considérer que les organisations internationales jouissent d'une sorte de pouvoir absolu de déterminer ou éventuellement de changer l'emplacement de leur siège ou de leurs bureaux régionaux. Mais les États aussi possèdent un pouvoir souverain de décision pour ce qui est d'accueillir le siège ou un bureau régional d'une organisation sur leur territoire ; et le pouvoir de décision d'une organisation à cet égard n'est pas plus absolu que celui d'un État. Ainsi que la Cour l'a souligné dans l'un de ses premiers avis consultatifs, rien dans le caractère d'une organisation internationale ne justifie qu'on la considère comme une sorte de « super-État » (Réparation des dommages subis au service des Nations Unies, avis consultatif, C.I.J. Recueil 1949, p. 179). L'organisation internationale est un sujet de droit international lié en tant any obligations incumbent upon them under general rules of international law, under their constitutions or under international agreements to which they are parties. Accordingly, it provides no answer to the questions submitted to the Court simply to refer to the right of an international organization to determine the location of the seat of its regional offices.

38. The “differing views” expressed in the World Health Assembly regarding the relevance of the Agreement of 25 March 1951, and regarding the question whether the terms of Section 37 of the Agreement are applicable in the event of any transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt, were repeated and further developed in the written and oral statements submitted to the Court. As to the relevance of the 1951 Agreement in the present connection, the view advanced on one side has been that the establishment of the Regional Office in Alexandria took place on 1 July 1949, pursuant to an agreement resulting either from Egypt’s offer to transfer the operation of the Alexandria Bureau to the WHO and the latter’s acceptance of that offer, or from Egypt’s acceptance of a unilateral act of the competent organs of the WHO determining the site of the Regional Office. Proponents of this view maintain that the 1951 Agreement was a separate transaction concluded after the establishment of the Regional Office in Egypt had been completed and the terms of which only provide for the immunities, privileges and facilities of the Regional Office. They point to the fact that some other host agreements of a similar kind contain provisions expressly for the establishment of the seat of the Regional Office and stress the absence of such a provision in the 1951 Agreement. This Agreement, they argue, although it may contain references to the seat of the Regional Office in Alexandria, does not provide for its location there. On this basis, and on the basis of their understanding of the object of the 1951 Agreement deduced from its title, preamble, and text, they maintain that the Agreement has no bearing on the Organization’s right to remove the Regional Office from Egypt. They also contend that the 1951 Agreement was not limited to the privileges, immunities and facilities granted only to the Regional Office, but had a more general purpose, namely, to regulate the above-mentioned questions between Egypt and the WHO in general.

39. Proponents of the opposing view say that the establishment of the Regional Office and the integration of the Alexandria Bureau with the WHO were not completed in 1949 ; they were accomplished by a series of acts in a composite process, the final and definitive step in which was the conclusion of the 1951 host agreement. To holders of this view, the act of transferring the operation of the Alexandria Bureau to the WHO in 1949 and the host agreement of 1951 are closely related parts of a single transaction whereby it was agreed to establish the Regional Office at Alexandria. Stressing the several references in the 1951 Agreement to the location of the Office in Alexandria, they argue that the absence of a specific provision regarding its establishment there is due to the fact that this que tel par toutes les obligations que lui imposent les règles générales du droit international, son acte constitutif ou les accords internationaux auxquels il est partie. Dès lors, se contenter d'invoquer le droit que possède une organisation internationale de déterminer le siège de ses bureaux régionaux ne fournit aucune réponse aux questions posées à la Cour.

38. Les « divergences de vues » qui se sont fait jour à l'Assemblée mondiale de la Santé au sujet de la pertinence de l'accord du 25 mars 1951 et de l'applicabilité des termes de sa section 37 dans l'éventualité d'un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Égypte se retrouvent et s'accusent dans les exposés écrits et oraux présentés à la Cour. A propos de la pertinence de l'accord de 1951 en l'espèce, l'une des thèses soutenues est que le Bureau régional a été établi à Alexandrie le 1<sup>er</sup> juillet 1949 en vertu d'un accord consistant, ou bien dans l'offre faite par l'Égypte de transférer les fonctions du Bureau d'Alexandrie à l'OMS suivie de l'acceptation de cette offre par l'OMS, ou bien dans l'acceptation par l'Égypte d'un acte unilatéral des organes compétents de l'OMS déterminant le siège du Bureau régional. Les tenants de cette thèse maintiennent que l'accord de 1951 représente une transaction distincte, consécutive à l'établissement du Bureau régional en Égypte et qui concerne uniquement les immunités, les privilèges et les facilités accordés à ce Bureau. Ils font observer que certains autres accords comparables contiennent des dispositions fixant expressément le siège du Bureau régional et ils soulignent l'absence d'une disposition à cet effet dans l'accord de 1951. Ils font valoir que, si celui-ci mentionne le siège du Bureau régional à Alexandrie, aucune de ses dispositions ne spécifie que ce siège y est situé. Ils se fondent sur cette constatation et sur la manière dont ils comprennent l'objet de l'accord de 1951 d'après son titre, son préambule et son texte pour soutenir que cet accord ne touche en rien le droit que possède l'Organisation de transférer le Bureau régional hors d'Égypte. Ils soutiennent aussi que l'accord de 1951 ne se limitait pas aux privilèges, immunités et facilités accordés au seul Bureau régional, mais qu'il avait un objet plus large, à savoir qu'il réglait d'une façon générale les questions susmentionnées entre l'Égypte et l'OMS.

39. D'après les partisans de la thèse contraire, l'établissement du Bureau régional et l'intégration du Bureau d'Alexandrie dans l'OMS n'ont pas été achevés en 1949 ; ils sont le résultat d'un processus complexe, comportant une série d'actes, dont l'étape définitive a été la conclusion de l'accord de siège de 1951. Pour ceux qui défendent cette thèse, le transfert effectif des fonctions du Bureau d'Alexandrie à l'OMS en 1949 et l'accord de 1951 sont des éléments intimement liés d'une transaction unique par laquelle il a été convenu d'établir le Bureau régional à Alexandrie. Rappelant que l'accord de 1951 fait à plusieurs reprises mention d'Alexandrie comme siège du Bureau, ils soutiennent que l'absence d'une disposition prévoyant expressément son établissement dans cette ville tient à ce que Agreement was dealing with a pre-existing Sanitary Bureau already established in Alexandria. In general, they emphasize the significance of the character of the 1951 Agreement as a headquarters agreement, and of the constant references to it as such in the records of the WHO and in official acts of the Egyptian State.

40. The differences regarding the application of Section 37 of the Agreement to a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt have turned on the meaning of the word "revise" in the first sentence and on the interpretation then to be given to the two following sentences of the Section. According to one view the word "revise" can cover only modifications of particular provisions of the Agreement and cannot cover a termination or denunciation of the Agreement, such as would be involved in the removal of the seat of the Office from Egypt ; and this is the meaning given to the word "revise" in law dictionaries. On that assumption, and on the basis of what they consider to be the general character of the 1951 Agreement, they consider all the provisions of the Section, including the right of denunciation in the third sentence, to apply only in cases where a request has been made by one or other party for a partial modification of the terms of the Agreement. They conclude that, in consequence, the 1951 Agreement contains no general right of denunciation and invoke the general rules expressed in the first paragraph of Article 56 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and the corresponding provision of the International Law Commission's draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between international organizations. Under those articles a treaty, "which contains no provision regarding its termination and which does not provide for denunciation or withdrawal" is not subject to denunciation or withdrawal unless, inter alia, such a right may be implied by the nature of the treaty. Referring to opinions expressed in the International Law Commission that headquarters agreements of international organizations are by their nature agreements in which a right of denunciation may be implied under the articles in question, they then maintain that such a general right of denunciation is to be implied in the 1951 Agreement. The proponents of this view go on to argue that in any case the transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt is not a matter which can be said to fall within the provisions of Section 37, and that the removal of the seat of the Office from Egypt would not necessarily mean the denunciation of the 1951 Agreement.

41. Opponents of the view just described insist, however, that the word "revise" may also have the wider meaning of "review" and cover a general or total revision of an agreement, including its termination. According to them, the word has not infrequently been used with that meaning in treaties and was so used in the 1951 Agreement. They maintain that this is confirmed by the travaux préparatoires of Section 37, which are to be found in negotiations between representatives of the Swiss Government and the ILO concerning the latter's headquarters agreement with Switzerland. These negotiations, they consider, concern the specific question of the l'accord concernait un bureau sanitaire préexistant et qui s'y trouvait déjà installé. D'une façon générale ils soulignent l'importance du caractère d'accord de siège de l'accord de 1951 et du fait qu'il est constamment désigné par cette expression dans les documents de l'OMS et dans les actes officiels de l'Etat égyptien.

40. Les divergences sur l'applicabilité de la section 37 de l'accord à un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Egypte portent essentiellement sur la signification du verbe reviser employé dans la première phrase et par conséquent sur l'interprétation à donner aux deux phrases suivantes de ladite section. Une thèse voudrait que le mot reviser puisse seulement s'appliquer à des modifications de dispositions particulières de l'accord et non à l'extinction ou à la dénonciation de celui-ci qu'entraînerait le transfert du Bureau hors d'Egypte ; c'est d'ailleurs le sens que les dictionnaires de droit donnent au mot reviser. Partant de là et de ce qu'ils estiment être le caractère général de l'accord de 1951, les tenants de cette thèse considèrent que toutes les dispositions de la section, y compris le droit de dénonciation prévu à la troisième phrase, ne s'appliquent que si l'une des parties demande une modification partielle des termes de l'accord. Ils en concluent que l'accord de 1951 ne prévoit donc aucun droit général de dénonciation et ils invoquent les règles générales énoncées dans le paragraphe 1 de l'article 56 de la convention de Vienne sur le droit des traités et dans la disposition correspondante du projet d'articles de la Commission du droit international sur les traités conclus entre Etats et organisations internationales ou entre organisations internationales. En vertu de ces textes, un traité « qui ne contient pas de dispositions relatives à son extinction et ne prévoit pas qu'on puisse le dénoncer ou s'en retirer » ne peut faire l'objet d'une dénonciation ou d'un retrait à moins notamment que ce droit ne puisse être déduit de la nature du traité. S'appuyant sur certaines opinions exprimées à la Commission du droit international, suivant lesquelles les accords de siège des organisations internationales sont par nature des accords comportant implicitement un droit de dénonciation en vertu des textes susvisés, les partisans de cette thèse affirment qu'un tel droit général de dénonciation doit être déduit dans le cas de l'accord de 1951. Ils poursuivent en faisant valoir qu'en tout état de cause le transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Egypte ne saurait être considéré comme entrant dans le cadre de la section 37 et que le retrait d'Egypte du siège du Bureau régional n'emporterait pas nécessairement dénonciation de l'accord de 1951.

41. Les adversaires de la thèse qui vient d'être exposée insistent en revanche sur le fait que le verbe reviser peut aussi avoir le sens plus large de revoir et désigner une révision totale ou générale de l'accord, y compris son extinction. D'après eux, ce terme a assez souvent été utilisé en ce sens dans des traités et il possède cette acception dans l'accord de 1951. Ils en voient la confirmation dans les travaux préparatoires de la section 37, qui sont consignés dans le compte rendu des négociations entre les représentants du Gouvernement suisse et de l'OIT au sujet de l'accord de siège déjà mentionné de l'OIT avec la Suisse. Ils considèrent que ces négociations ont establishment of the ILO's seat in Geneva and, while Switzerland wished in this connection to include a provision for denunciation in the agreement, the ILO did not. The result, they say, was the compromise formula, subsequently introduced into WHO host agreements, which provides for the possibility of denunciation, but only after consultation and negotiation regarding the revision of the instrument. In their view, therefore, the travaux préparatoires confirm that the formula in Section 37 was designed to cover revision of the location of the Regional Office's seat at Alexandria, including the possibility of its transfer outside Egypt. They further argue that this interpretation is one required by the object and purpose of Section 37 which, they say, was clearly meant to preclude either of the parties to the Agreement from suddenly and precipitately terminating the legal régime it created. The proponents of this view of Section 37 also take the position that, even if it were to be rejected and the Agreement interpreted as also including a general right of denunciation, Egypt would still be entitled to notice under the general rules of international law. In this connection, they point to Article 56 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and the corresponding article in the International Law Commission's draft articles on treaties concluded between States and international organizations or between international organizations. In both articles paragraph 2 specifically provides that in any case where a right of denunciation or withdrawal is implied in a treaty a party shall give not less than twelve months' notice of its intention to exercise the right.

42. The Court has described the differences of view regarding the application of Section 37 to a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt only in a broad outline which does not reproduce all the refinements with which they have been expressed nor all the considerations by which they have been supported. If it has done this, it is because it considers that the emphasis placed on Section 37 in the questions posed in the request distorts in some measure the general legal framework in which the true legal issues before the Court have to be resolved. Whatever view may be held on the question whether the establishment and location of the Regional Office in Alexandria are embraced within the provisions of the 1951 Agreement, and whatever view may be held on the question whether the provisions of Section 37 are applicable to the case of a transfer of the Office from Egypt, the fact remains that certain legal principles and rules are applicable in the case of such a transfer. These legal principles and rules the Court must, therefore, now examine.

43. By the mutual understandings reached between Egypt and the Organization from 1949 to 1951 with respect to the Regional Office of the Organization in Egypt, whether they are regarded as distinct agreements or as separate parts of one transaction, a contractual legal régime was created précisément porté sur la question de l'établissement du siège de l'OIT à Genève ; la Suisse souhaitait à ce propos insérer dans l'accord une clause de dénonciation, l'OIT ne le souhaitait pas. Il en est résulté, disent-ils, la formule de compromis ultérieurement introduite dans les accords de siège de l'OMS, formule qui prévoit la possibilité de dénoncer mais uniquement après consultations et négociations portant sur la revision de l'instrument. A leur avis, les travaux préparatoires confirment donc que les termes de la section 37 étaient conçus comme s'appliquant à une revision concernant la localisation du Bureau régional d'Alexandrie, y compris l'éventualité de son transfert hors d'Égypte. Ils font valoir en outre que cette interprétation est imposée par l'objet et le but de la section 37 qui, selon eux, visait clairement à éviter que l'une des parties à l'accord puisse mettre fin d'une manière soudaine et précipitée au régime juridique créé par celui-ci. Les partisans de cette façon d'envisager la section 37 sont d'autre part d'avis que, même si elle devait être rejetée et si l'accord devait être interprété comme comportant aussi un droit général de dénonciation, l'Égypte n'en aurait pas moins droit à un préavis en application des règles générales du droit international. A cet égard ils invoquent l'article 56 de la convention de Vienne sur le droit des traités et la disposition correspondante du projet d'articles de la Commission du droit international sur les traités conclus entre Etats et organisations internationales ou entre organisations internationales. Dans ces deux textes, le paragraphe 2 prévoit expressément que, lorsque, dans un traité, le droit de dénonciation ou de retrait peut être déduit, une partie doit notifier au moins douze mois à l'avance son intention d'exercer ce droit.

between Egypt and the Organization which remains the basis of their legal relations today. Moreover, Egypt was a member – a founder member – of the newly created World Health Organization when, in 1949, it transferred the operation of the Alexandria Sanitary Bureau to the Organization ; and it has continued to be a member of the Organization ever since. The very fact of Egypt's membership of the Organization entails certain mutual obligations of co-operation and good faith incumbent upon Egypt and upon the Organization. Egypt offered to become host to the Regional Office in Alexandria and the Organization accepted that offer ; Egypt agreed to provide the privileges, immunities and facilities necessary for the independence and effectiveness of the Office. As a result the legal relationship between Egypt and the Organization became, and now is, that of a host State and an international organization, the very essence of which is a body of mutual obligations of co-operation and good faith. In the present instance Egypt became host to the Organization's Regional Office, with its attendant advantages, and the Organization acquired a valuable seat for its office by the handing over to the Organization of an existing Egyptian Sanitary Bureau established in Alexandria, and the element of mutuality in the legal régime thus created between Egypt and the WHO is underlined by the fact that this was effected through common action based on mutual consent. This special legal régime of mutual rights and obligations has been in force between Egypt and WHO for over thirty years. The result is that there now exists in Alexandria a substantial WHO institution employing a large staff and discharging health functions important both to the Organization and to Egypt itself. In consequence, any transfer of the WHO Regional Office from the territory of Egypt necessarily raises practical problems of some importance. These problems are, of course, the concern of the Organization and of Egypt rather than of the Court. But they also concern the Court to the extent that they may have a bearing on the legal conditions under which a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt may be effected.

44. The problems were studied by the Working Group set up by the Executive Board of WHO in 1979, and it is evident from the report of that Working Group that much care and co-operation between the Organization and Egypt is needed if the risk of serious disruption to the health work of the Regional Office is to be avoided. It is also apparent that a reasonable period of time would be required to effect an orderly transfer of the operation of the Office from Alexandria to the new site without disruption to the work. Precisely what period of time would be required is a matter which can only be finally determined by consultation and negotiation between WHO and Egypt. It is, moreover, evident that during this period the Organization itself would need to make full use of the privileges, immunities and facilities provided in the Agreement of 25 March 1951 in order to ensure a smooth and orderly transfer of the Office from Egypt to its new site. In short, the situation arising in the event of a transfer of the entre l'Égypte et l'Organisation, qui constitue aujourd'hui encore le fondement de leurs relations juridiques. Au surplus, au moment où en 1949 elle a transféré à l'Organisation les fonctions du Bureau sanitaire d'Alexandrie, l'Égypte était membre – membre fondateur – de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé qui venait d'être créée et elle n'a pas cessé depuis lors d'en être membre. Le simple fait d'être membre de l'Organisation entraîne certaines obligations réciproques de coopération et de bonne foi qui incombent à l'Égypte et à l'Organisation. L'Égypte a offert d'accueillir le Bureau régional à Alexandrie et l'Organisation a accepté cette offre ; l'Égypte a accepté d'accorder les privilèges, immunités et facilités nécessaires à l'indépendance et à l'efficacité du Bureau. En conséquence les relations juridiques entre l'Égypte et l'Organisation sont devenues et demeurent celles d'un Etat hôte et d'une organisation internationale, c'est-à-dire des relations dont l'essence même consiste en un ensemble d'obligations réciproques de coopération et de bonne foi. En l'espèce l'Égypte est devenue l'Etat hôte du Bureau régional de l'Organisation, avec les avantages qui en découlent, et l'Organisation a ainsi bénéficié d'excellentes installations grâce au transfert à l'Organisation du Bureau sanitaire égyptien existant à Alexandrie ; le caractère de réciprocité du régime juridique ainsi créé entre l'Égypte et l'OMS est souligné par le fait que cette opération a été effectuée par une action commune, basée sur le consentement mutuel. Ce régime juridique spécial, comportant des droits et obligations réciproques, est en vigueur entre l'Égypte et l'OMS depuis plus de trente ans. Il en résulte qu'il existe aujourd'hui à Alexandrie une institution de l'OMS qui emploie un personnel nombreux et s'acquitte de fonctions sanitaires importantes pour l'Organisation comme pour l'Égypte. Dans ces conditions tout transfert du Bureau régional de l'OMS hors du territoire égyptien pose nécessairement des problèmes pratiques d'une certaine ampleur. Certes ces problèmes sont du ressort de l'Organisation et de l'Égypte plutôt que de la Cour. Mais ils concernent également la Cour dans la mesure où ils sont susceptibles d'influer sur les conditions juridiques selon lesquelles un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Égypte pourrait se réaliser.

Regional Office from Egypt is one which, by its very nature, demands consultation, negotiation and co-operation between the Organization and Egypt.

45. The Court's attention has been drawn to a considerable number of host agreements of different kinds, concluded by States with various international organizations and containing varying provisions regarding the revision, termination or denunciation of the agreements. These agreements fall into two main groups : (1) those providing the necessary régime for the seat of a headquarters or regional office of a more or less permanent character, and (2) those providing a régime for other offices set up ad hoc and not envisaged as of a permanent character. As to the first group, which includes agreements concluded by the ILO and the WHO, their provisions take different forms. The headquarters agreement of the United Nations itself, with the United States, which leaves to the former, the right to decide on its removal, provides for its termination if the seat is removed from the United States "except for such provisions as may be applicable in connection with the orderly termination of the operations of the United Nations at its seat in the United States and the disposition of its property therein". Other agreements similarly provide for cessation of the host agreement upon the removal of the seat, subject to arrangements for the orderly termination of the operations, while others, for example, provide for one year's or six months' notice of termination or denunciation, and there are other variants. The ad hoc type of agreement, on the other hand, commonly provides for termination on short periods of notice or by agreement or simply on cessation of the operations subject to orderly arrangements for bringing them to an end.

46. In considering these provisions, the Court feels bound to observe that in future closer attention might with advantage be given to their drafting. Nevertheless, despite their variety and imperfections, the provisions of host agreements regarding their revision, termination or denunciation are not without significance in the present connection. In the first place, they confirm the recognition by international organizations and host States of the existence of mutual obligations incumbent upon them to resolve the problems attendant upon a revision, termination or denunciation of a host agreement. But they do more, since they must be presumed to reflect the views of organizations and host States as to the implications of those obligations in the contexts in which the provisions are intended to apply. In the view of the Court, therefore, they provide certain general indications of what the mutual obligations of organizations and host States to co-operate in good faith may involve in situations such as the one with which the Court is here concerned.

47. A further general indication as to what those obligations may entail is to be found in the second paragraph of Article 56 of the Vienna Con-

Bref, en cas de transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Égypte, la situation, par sa nature même, nécessiterait des consultations, des négociations et une coopération entre l'Organisation et l'Égypte.

45. L'attention de la Cour a été attirée sur un nombre considérable d'accords de siège de types différents, conclus par des Etats avec diverses organisations internationales et contenant des dispositions variées relatives à leur revision, à leur extinction ou à leur dénonciation. Ces accords relèvent de deux catégories principales : 1) ceux qui prévoient le régime nécessaire pour le siège d'une organisation ou celui d'un bureau régional de caractère plus ou moins permanent ; 2) ceux qui définissent le régime applicable à d'autres bureaux établis sur une base ad hoc et qui ne sont pas conçus comme étant de caractère permanent. Pour ce qui est de la première catégorie, qui comprend les accords conclus par l'OIT et par l'OMS, les dispositions revêtent diverses formes. L'accord de siège de l'Organisation des Nations Unies elle-même avec les Etats-Unis, qui laisse à la première le droit de décider du transfert, dispose qu'il peut prendre fin si le siège est transféré hors des Etats-Unis « exception faite toutefois de celles de ses dispositions qui seraient nécessaires pour la terminaison régulière des activités de l'Organisation des Nations Unies dans son siège des Etats-Unis et pour la disposition de celles de ses propriétés qui s'y trouvent ». D'autres accords prévoient de même leur extinction en cas de retrait du siège, sous réserve des arrangements prévus pour la liquidation ordonnée des opérations ; d'autres envisagent par exemple un préavis de dénonciation ou de résiliation d'un an ou de six mois ; il existe encore d'autres variantes. En revanche il est couramment prévu dans les accords ad hoc que ces accords peuvent prendre fin moyennant un court préavis, par consentement mutuel ou par la simple cessation des opérations sous réserve des arrangements destinés à en assurer l'achèvement dans l'ordre.

46. S'agissant de ces dispositions, la Cour se voit obligée de relever qu'à l'avenir il pourrait y avoir avantage à prêter plus d'attention à leur rédaction. Néanmoins, malgré leur diversité et leurs imperfections, les dispositions des accords de siège concernant leur revision, leur extinction ou leur dénonciation ne sont pas en l'occurrence sans intérêt. Elles confirment tout d'abord que les organisations internationales et les Etats hôtes reconnaissent être tenus de l'obligation réciproque de résoudre les problèmes que peuvent soulever la revision, l'extinction ou la dénonciation d'un accord de siège. Elles font même plus que cela, puisqu'il faut présumer qu'elles traduisent les vues des organisations et des Etats hôtes sur ce que cette obligation implique dans les circonstances où les dispositions sont destinées à jouer. La Cour est donc d'avis qu'il s'en dégage certaines indications générales quant à ce que peut impliquer l'obligation réciproque des organisations et des Etats hôtes de coopérer de bonne foi dans des situations comme celle dont la Cour connaît en l'espèce.

47. Une autre indication générale de ce que peut impliquer cette obligation est fournie par le paragraphe 2 de l'article 56 de la convention de vention on the Law of Treaties and the corresponding provision in the International Law Commission's draft articles on treaties between States and international organizations or between international organizations. Those provisions, as has been mentioned earlier, specifically provide that, when a right of denunciation is implied in a treaty by reason of its nature, the exercise of that right is conditional upon notice, and that of not less than twelve months. Clearly, these provisions also are based on an obligation to act in good faith and have reasonable regard to the interests of the other party to the treaty.

48. In the present case, as the Court has pointed out, the true legal question submitted to it in the request is : What are the legal principles and rules applicable to the question under what conditions and in accordance with what modalities a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt may be effected ? Moreover, as it has also pointed out, differing views have been expressed concerning both the relevance in this connection of the 1951 Agreement and the interpretation of Section 37 of that Agreement. Accordingly, in formulating its reply to the request, the Court takes as its starting point the mutual obligations incumbent upon Egypt and the Organization to co-operate in good faith with respect to the implications and effects of the transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt. The Court does so the more readily as it considers those obligations to be the very basis of the legal relations between the Organization and Egypt under general international law, under the Constitution of the Organization and under the agreements in force between Egypt and the Organization. The essential task of the Court in replying to the request is, therefore, to determine the specific legal implications of the mutual obligations incumbent upon Egypt and the Organization in the event of either of them wishing to have the Regional Office transferred from Egypt.

49. The Court considers that in the context of the present case the mutual obligations of the Organization and the host State to co-operate under the applicable legal principles and rules are as follows :

- In the first place, those obligations place a duty both upon the Organization and upon Egypt to consult together in good faith as to the question under what conditions and in accordance with what modalities a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt may be effected.
- Secondly, in the event of its being finally decided that the Regional Office shall be transferred from Egypt, their mutual obligations of co-operation place a duty upon the Organization and Egypt to consult together and to negotiate regarding the various arrangements needed to effect the transfer from the existing to the new site in an orderly manner and with a minimum of prejudice to the work of the Organization and the interests of Egypt.
- Thirdly, those mutual obligations place a duty upon the party which Vienne sur le droit des traités et par la disposition correspondante du projet d'articles de la Commission du droit international sur les traités entre Etats et organisations internationales ou entre organisations internationales. Ces dispositions, comme la Cour l'a déjà mentionné, prévoient expressément que, quand un droit de dénonciation peut être déduit de la nature d'un traité, ce droit ne peut être exercé que moyennant un préavis, lequel doit être de douze mois au moins. Il est clair que ces dispositions supposent elles aussi une obligation d'agir de bonne foi et de tenir raisonnablement compte des intérêts de l'autre partie au traité.

48. En la présente espèce, ainsi que la Cour l'a souligné, la véritable question juridique qui lui est soumise dans la requête est celle-ci : Quels sont les principes et les règles juridiques applicables à la question de savoir selon quelles conditions et selon quelles modalités peut être effectué un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Egypte ? De plus, comme la Cour l'a également rappelé, des vues divergentes ont été exprimées au sujet tant de la pertinence à cet égard de l'accord de 1951 que de l'interprétation de sa section 37. En conséquence, pour formuler sa réponse à la requête, la Cour prend comme point de départ les obligations réciproques de l'Egypte et de l'Organisation, qui sont tenues de coopérer de bonne foi relativement aux implications et aux effets d'un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Egypte. Cette méthode lui paraît d'autant plus opportune qu'elle considère ces obligations comme le fondement même des relations juridiques entre l'Organisation et l'Egypte en vertu du droit international général, de la Constitution de l'Organisation et des accords en vigueur entre elle et l'Egypte. Pour répondre à la requête, la tâche essentielle de la Cour est donc de déterminer quelles sont les implications juridiques précises des obligations réciproques incombant à l'Egypte et à l'Organisation au cas où l'une ou l'autre souhaite que le Bureau régional soit transféré hors d'Egypte.

49. La Cour considère que, dans le contexte de la présente espèce, les obligations réciproques de coopérer dont l'Organisation et l'Etat hôte sont tenus en vertu des principes et règles juridiques applicables sont les suivantes :

- En premier lieu, l'Organisation et l'Egypte doivent se consulter de bonne foi au sujet de la question de savoir selon quelles conditions et selon quelles modalités peut être effectué un transfert du Bureau régional hors d'Egypte.
- En deuxième lieu, s'il était finalement décidé de transférer le Bureau régional hors d'Egypte, leurs obligations réciproques de coopération leur imposeraient de se consulter et de négocier au sujet des diverses dispositions à prendre pour que le transfert de l'ancien au nouvel emplacement s'effectue en bon ordre et nuise le moins possible aux travaux de l'Organisation et aux intérêts de l'Egypte.
- En troisième lieu, ces obligations réciproques imposent à la partie qui wishes to effect the transfer to give a reasonable period of notice to the other party for the termination of the existing situation regarding the Regional Office at Alexandria, taking due account of all the practical arrangements needed to effect an orderly and equitable transfer of the Office to its new site.

Those, in the view of the Court, are the implications of the general legal principles and rules applicable in the event of the transfer of the seat of a Regional Office from the territory of a host State. Precisely what periods of time may be involved in the observance of the duties to consult and negotiate, and what period of notice of termination should be given, are matters which necessarily vary according to the requirements of the particular case. In principle, therefore, it is for the parties in each case to determine the length of those periods by consultation and negotiation in good faith. Some indications as to the possible periods involved, as the Court has said, can be seen in provisions of host agreements, including Section 37 of the Agreement of 25 March 1951, as well as in Article 56 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and in the corresponding article of the International Law Commission's draft articles on treaties between States and international organizations or between international organizations. But what is reasonable and equitable in any given case must depend on its particular circumstances. Moreover, the paramount consideration both for the Organization and the host State in every case must be their clear obligation to co-operate in good faith to promote the objectives and purposes of the Organization as expressed in its Constitution ; and this too means that they must in consultation determine a reasonable period of time to enable them to achieve an orderly transfer of the Office from the territory of the host State.

50. It follows that the Court's reply to the second question is that the legal responsibilities of the Organization and Egypt during the transitional period between the notification of the proposed transfer of the Office and the accomplishment thereof would be to fulfil in good faith the mutual obligations which the Court has set out in answering the first question.

51. For these reasons,

THE COURT,

1. By twelve votes to one,

Decides to comply with the request for an advisory opinion ;

IN FAVOUR : President Sir Humphrey Waldock ; Vice-President Elias ; Judges Forster, Gros, Lachs, Nagendra Singh, Ruda, Mosler, Oda, Ago, El-Erian and Sette-Camara ;

AGAINST : Judge Morozov ;

souhaite le transfert de donner à l'autre un préavis raisonnable pour mettre fin à la situation actuelle du Bureau régional à Alexandrie, compte étant dûment tenu de toutes les dispositions pratiques à prendre pour que le transfert au nouvel emplacement s'effectue dans l'ordre et dans des conditions équitables.

Telles sont, selon la Cour, les implications des principes et règles juridiques généraux applicables en cas de transfert du siège d'un bureau régional hors du territoire d'un Etat hôte. Les délais précis qui peuvent être nécessaires pour s'acquitter des obligations de consultation et de négociation et le préavis de dénonciation exact qui doit être donné varient forcément en fonction des nécessités de l'espèce. En principe, c'est donc aux parties qu'il appartient de déterminer dans chaque cas la durée de ces délais en procédant de bonne foi à des consultations et à des négociations. Ainsi que la Cour l'a noté, on peut trouver certaines indications à ce sujet dans les dispositions des accords de siège, y compris la section 37 de l'accord du 25 mars 1951, dans l'article 56 de la convention de Vienne sur le droit des traités et dans l'article correspondant du projet de la Commission du droit international sur les traités entre Etats et organisations internationales ou entre organisations internationales. Mais ce qui est raisonnable et équitable dans un cas donné dépend nécessairement des circonstances. De plus, la considération primordiale aussi bien pour l'Organisation que pour l'Etat hôte doit être dans tous les cas leur évidente obligation de coopérer de bonne foi pour servir les buts et objectifs de l'Organisation tels qu'ils s'expriment dans son acte constitutif ; ce qui signifie qu'ils doivent se consulter pour déterminer un délai raisonnable devant leur permettre de réaliser le transfert en bon ordre du Bureau hors du territoire de l'Etat hôte.

50. Il en découle que la réponse de la Cour à la seconde question est que, au cours de la période transitoire séparant la notification du préavis pour le transfert projeté du Bureau et l'accomplissement de ce transfert, l'Organisation et l'Egypte auraient la responsabilité juridique de s'acquitter de bonne foi des obligations réciproques que la Cour a énoncées dans sa réponse à la première question.

51. Par ces motifs,

LA COUR,

1. Par douze voix contre une,

Décide de donner suite à la requête pour avis consultatif ;

POUR : Sir Humphrey Waldock, Président ; M. Elias, Vice-Président ;

MM. Forster, Gros, Lachs, Nagendra Singh, Ruda, Mosler, Oda, Ago, El-Erian, Sette-Camara, juges ;

CONTRE : M. Morozov, juge ;

2. With regard to Question 1,

By twelve votes to one,

Is of the opinion that in the event specified in the request, the legal principles and rules, and the mutual obligations which they imply, regarding consultation, negotiation and notice, applicable as between the World Health Organization and Egypt are those which have been set out in paragraph 49 of this Advisory Opinion and in particular that :

- (a) their mutual obligations under those legal principles and rules place a duty both upon the Organization and upon Egypt to consult together in good faith as to the question under what conditions and in accordance with what modalities a transfer of the Regional Office from Egypt may be effected ;
- (b) in the event of its being finally decided that the Regional Office shall be transferred from Egypt, their mutual obligations of co-operation place a duty upon the Organization and Egypt to consult together and to negotiate regarding the various arrangements needed to effect the transfer from the existing to the new site in an orderly manner and with a minimum of prejudice to the work of the Organization and the interests of Egypt ;
- (c) their mutual obligations under those legal principles and rules place a duty upon the party which wishes to effect the transfer to give a reasonable period of notice to the other party for the termination of the existing situation regarding the Regional Office at Alexandria, taking due account of all the practical arrangements needed to effect an orderly and equitable transfer of the Office to its new site ;

AGAINST : Judge Morozov ;

3. With regard to Question 2.

By eleven votes to two,

Is of the opinion that, in the event of a decision that the Regional Office shall be transferred from Egypt, the legal responsibilities of the World Health Organization and Egypt during the transitional period between the notification of the proposed transfer of the Office and the accomplishment thereof are to fulfil in good faith the mutual obligations which the Court has set out in answering Question 1 ;

IN FAVOUR : President Sir Humphrey Waldock ; Vice-President Elias ; Judges Forster, Gros, Nagendra Singh, Ruda, Mosler, Oda, Ago, El-Erian and Sette-Camara ; AGAINST : Judges Lachs and Morozov.

2. En ce qui concerne la question 1,

Par douze voix contre une,

Est d'avis que, dans l'éventualité spécifiée dans la requête, les principes et règles juridiques et les obligations réciproques qui en découlent, applicables en matière de consultation, de négociation et de préavis entre l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé et l'Égypte, sont ceux qui ont été énoncés au paragraphe 49 du présent avis consultatif, et en particulier que :

- a) leurs obligations réciproques en vertu de ces principes et règles juridiques imposent à l'Organisation et à l'Égypte de se consulter de bonne foi au sujet de la question de savoir selon quelles conditions et selon quelles modalités peut être effectué un transfert du Bureau régional hors du territoire égyptien ;
- b) au cas où il serait finalement décidé de transférer le Bureau régional hors d'Égypte, leurs obligations réciproques de coopération leur imposeraient de se consulter et de négocier au sujet des diverses dispositions à prendre pour que le transfert de l'ancien au nouvel emplacement s'effectue en bon ordre et nuise le moins possible aux travaux de l'Organisation et aux intérêts de l'Égypte ;
- c) leurs obligations réciproques en vertu de ces principes et règles juridiques imposent à la partie qui souhaite le transfert de donner à l'autre un préavis raisonnable pour mettre fin à la situation actuelle du Bureau régional à Alexandrie, compte étant dûment tenu de toutes les dispositions pratiques à prendre pour que le transfert du Bureau en son nouvel emplacement s'effectue dans l'ordre et dans des conditions équitables ;

El-Erian, Sette-Camara, juges ;

3. En ce qui concerne la question 2,

Par onze voix contre deux,

Est d'avis que, dans l'éventualité d'une décision tendant à transférer le Bureau régional hors d'Égypte, les responsabilités juridiques de l'Organisation mondiale de la Santé et de l'Égypte, au cours de la période transitoire séparant la notification du préavis pour le transfert projeté du Bureau et l'accomplissement de ce transfert, consisteraient à s'acquitter de bonne foi des obligations réciproques que la Cour a énoncées dans sa réponse à la question 1 ;

POUR : Sir Humphrey Waldock, Président ; M. Elias, Vice-Président ;
MM. Forster, Gros, Nagendra Singh, Ruda, Mosler, Oda, Ago, El-Erian, faith is expressed in particular by the necessity of cooperating and of behaving fairly, which exists even before a contract is entered into.<sup>23</sup>

The question that arises is whether the duty to perform agreements in good faith includes a duty to renegotiate these agreements when specific circumstances arising after the signature of the contract threaten the original balance. In other words, would the saying "rebus sic stantibus" (it is also common to evoke concepts of imprévision (failure to foresee or hardship) be liable to call into question the principle of the binding nature of contracts. The majority opinion tends towards the negative,<sup>24</sup> and we agree with it. It is worth quoting an award rendered in 1997:

If one can admit the existence of a tendency, in certain branches, to stipulate hardship clauses with some certainty, it is certain that in the practice of business the obligation to rebalance the contract (by negotiation and, failing which, by the intervention of a third party, as provided for in Article 6.2.3, paragraph 4 of UNIDROIT Principles), which characterizes hardship, constitutes an absolutely exceptional principle, which is only accepted in the context of contractual clauses, which should determine in detail the situations justifying hardship as well as its consequences. It is therefore not possible to consider the provisions in matters of hardship contained in 'Unidroit Principles' as trade practices. On the contrary, it is a question of rules, which do not correspond, at least in their current state, to the usual practice of business in international trade and which will consequently only be applicable when the parties make an express reference to them, which is not the case here.<sup>25</sup>

Despite the exclusion of the principle of imprévision, it is true that the good faith obligation resulted in a certain number of transnational rules of primary importance. This is true concerning the principle according to which no party can contradict itself to the detriment of another, also known under its original name "principle of estoppel by representation." In an ICC award rendered in 1995, arbitrators had occasion to apply this principle. A defendant in the arbitration proceedings had raised, in previous court proceedings, the lack of jurisdiction of the judge on the grounds that the disputes related to arbitration. The arbitrators considered that the defendants could not then, at the risk of contradicting themselves to the detriment of another, claim in the arbitration proceedings that the arbitration clause was not applicable.<sup>26</sup>

It is by referring to the same good faith obligation that arbitration tribunals lift "the corporate veil" and apply the arbitration clause to non-signatory companies. In an ICC Award rendered in 1995, the arbitration tribunal noted that: "There is no doubt that the international community developed a right to settle this question. In numerous international disputes, arbitration

Protecting Investors' Legitimate Expectations: Recognizing and Delimiting a General Principle*Elizabeth Snodgrass**

INTRODUCTION

RECENT AWARDS IN INVESTMENT TREATY arbitrations between foreign investors and the States in which they invest are notable for their repeated references to the “legitimate expectations” of the foreign investor. The award in Técnicas Medioambientos Tecmed, SA v. United Mexican States<sup>1</sup> well illustrates the trend. In this case, the Tribunal interpreted the obligation of “fair and equitable treatment” in the bilateral investment treaty at issue to require “treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment.”<sup>2</sup> The Tribunal articulated a broad statement of the expectations the investor would be deemed to have:

The foreign investor expects the host State to act in a consistent manner, free from ambiguity and totally transparently in its relations with the foreign investor, so that it may know beforehand any and all rules and regulations that will govern its investments, as well as the goals of the relevant policies and administrative practices or directives, to be able to plan its investments and comply with such regulations.... The foreign investor also expects the host State to act consistently, i.e. without arbitrarily revoking any preexisting decisions or permits issued by the state that were relied upon by the investor to assume its commitments as well as to plan and launch its commercial and business activities.<sup>3</sup>

And then, finding the investor's expectations to have been frustrated by a regulatory measure (in that case the denial of an extension of a permit to operate a landfill in circumstances in which the investor could have expected the permit to be extended), the Tecmed Tribunal ruled that this amounted to unfair and inequitable treatment that entitled the investor to compensation under the bilateral investment treaty at issue in the case.<sup>4</sup> Other cases, discussed in more detail in Part I of this article, refer to protection for legitimate expectations as aspects of other investment treaty protections. And taken together this body of authority now provides ample support for the conclusion reached in International Thunderbird Gaming Corporation v. United Mexican States<sup>5</sup> that the principle of protection for investors' legitimate expectations has developed into "a self-standing subcategory and independent basis for a claim" under bilateral and multilateral investment treaties.<sup>6</sup>

Although the emergence of the legitimate expectations principle cannot now be doubted, to date there has been little systematic consideration of the scope or limits of the protection being recognized.<sup>7</sup> This article aims to contribute to that analysis, arguing in particular that protection for investors' legitimate expectations can be justified as reflecting a "general principle of law recognized by civilized nations" as that phrase is used to describe a source of international law,<sup>8</sup> and that the methodology for recognizing a general principle can be applied to develop a more highly articulated expression of that principle to guide the protection given investors' legitimate expectations in future cases.

Following a brief summary in Part I of several of the recent investment awards in which the investors' legitimate expectations feature, Part II explains the relevance of the concept of a "general principle of law" to the analysis. The role general principles play in the international legal system is precisely to facilitate the application of primary norms such as those embodied in investment treaties. General principles do this both by filling gaps between other applicable norms and by resolving conflicts or "overlaps" between them. Moreover, the methodology for identifying a general principle filters jurisprudential "hunches" or notions of fundamental fairness through a comparative analysis of the positive enactments of municipal law in order to identify common legal principles for application as rules of international law. Drawing as it does on this more or less empirical foundation, the general principles framework validates the concern expressed in recent awards to protect investors' legitimate expectations at the same time that it disciplines the development of the concept as a legal norm. Accordingly, general principles is an appropriate and attractive intellectual framework for analyzing the concept of protection for investors' legitimate expectations emerging in recent investment treaty arbitrations.

Parts III and IV apply the general principles methodology at two levels of abstraction. Part III proceeds at a general level, looking at a selection of national legal systems to see whether, and if so how, in those systems individual's legitimate expectations are protected against inconsistent government action. This analysis validates the assertion in the recent investment awards that individual's legitimate expectations warrant protection: the references to legitimate expectations in recent investment cases echo explicit protections for legitimate expectations found in the municipal public law of a number of States and the administrative law of the European Union. The survey in Part III reflects not only consensus around the broad statement of principle—legitimate expectations should be protected—but also a notable degree of consensus on more detailed questions such as: What governmental conduct can give rise to expectations that are protected? What makes certain expectations legitimate and others illegitimate? What would constitute compelling reasons for not providing protection? And what does it mean for expectations to be fulfilled? Extending the general principles methodology, and with reference to recent investment arbitration awards, Part IV proposes consensus-based answers to these key questions.

The final step in analyzing whether a principle widely reflected in municipal law should be recognized as a general principle for international law purposes is a somewhat amorphous enquiry into the "appropriateness" of the proposed principle for extrapolation to the international legal plane. Part V argues that, as arbitral tribunals have already instinctively grasped, the principle of protection for legitimate expectations can work justice in disputes between investors and host States and can usefully play a role in resolving such disputes. The emergence and further development of the principle should therefore be welcomed. There remain interesting and important open questions about how the principle should be applied and refined that will determine the breadth of protection that is afforded to investors by virtue of this principle. These include such questions as how stringently to assess the reasonableness of investors' expectations or of the host State's conduct and, perhaps most interestingly a range of questions surrounding how the balance between individual expectations and the public purposes for which States purport to act will be struck. This article must leave to others further consideration of these questions and in particular the provocative recent suggestion that the balance should be tilted to favor investors.<sup>9</sup>

I. PROTECTION FOR LEGITIMATE EXPECTATIONS IN RECENT INVESTMENT AWARDS

In the recent cases, investors' legitimate expectations have been discussed most frequently in connection with claims arising under investment treaty guarantees of "fair and equitable treatment." The discussion of this standard in Tecmed and the protection for legitimate expectations that resulted was summarized above.

The recent case which most explicitly addresses the principle of legitimate expectations is Thunderbird. In this case, all members of the Tribunal accepted "that the principle of legitimate expectations forms part, i.e. a subcategory, of the duty to afford fair and equitable treatment" to investors.<sup>10</sup> And they concur[red] on the general conditions for this claim—an expectation of the investor to be caused by and attributed to the government, backed-up by investment relying on such expectation, requiring the legitimacy of the expectation in terms of the competency of the officials responsible for it and the procedure for issuing it and the reasonableness of the investor in relying on the expectation.<sup>11</sup>

The author of the separate opinion differed from his colleagues on the question of whether, as a matter of fact, the claimant investor's expectations were legitimate.<sup>12</sup>

In addition to Thunderbird and Tecmed, the claim that actions attributable to the respondent State "arbitrarily dissolve[d] the 'legitimate expectations' created by previous decisions of U.S. courts and administrative agencies" was one aspect of the claim under the fair and equitable treatment provision of the investment chapter of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) in ADF Group Inc. v. United States of America.<sup>13</sup> Although the ADF Tribunal rejected this argument (without much discussion), like the Thunderbird majority it did so on the facts, in essence finding no such legitimate expectation, rather than because of any fundamental disagreement with the notion that interference with legitimate expectations could constitute a denial of fair and equitable treatment.<sup>14</sup> Similarly, although the claim of unfair and inequitable treatment failed in Waste Management Inc. v. United Mexican States,<sup>15</sup> the Tribunal in that case identified "complete lack of transparency and candour in an administrative process" and the fact "that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host State which were reasonably relied on by the claimant" as factors that would weigh in its necessarily fact-specific evaluation of whether there had been a denial of fair and equitable treatment in that case.<sup>16</sup>

In GAMI Investments, Inc v. The Government of the United Mexican States,<sup>17</sup> the Tribunal dismissed a claim of unfair and inequitable treatment in circumstances where the investor could not point to "an unambiguous affirmation" that the Government would act in a certain manner, in part because no "certain expectation" had been created.<sup>18</sup> This was the conclusion even when it was shown that the Government had failed to apply its regulations according to their terms, the Tribunal explaining: <sup>12</sup> An important basis for the conclusion by Professor Wälde that the investor's expectations were legitimate also appeared to be his appreciation of the imbalance of power as between investors and host States and the fact that the purpose of investment treaties is to protect and encourage investment by favoring investors with heightened protection. See id. paras. 33–36.

International law does not appraise the content of a regulatory programme extant before an investor decides to commit. The inquiry is whether the state abided by or implemented that programme. It is in this sense that a government's failure to implement or abide by its own law in a manner adversely affecting a foreign investor may but will not necessarily lead to a violation of Article 1105 [of NAFTA, the "fair and equitable treatment" provision]. Much depends on context. The imposition of a new licence requirement may for example be viewed quite differently if it appears on a blank slate or if it is an arbitrary repudiation of a preexisting licensing regime upon which a foreign investor has demonstrably relied.<sup>19</sup>

In addition to Tecmed, quoted above, fair and equitable treatment claims framed in terms of the investors' legitimate expectations succeeded in MTD Equity Sdn Bhd and MTD Chile S.A. v. Republic of Chile,<sup>20</sup> Occidental Exploration and Production Company v. The Republic of Ecuador,<sup>21</sup> and Eureko B.V. v. Republic of Poland.<sup>22</sup> The Tribunals in MTD and Eureko explicitly drew upon Tecmed's formulation: that the obligation of fair and equitable treatment required host States to "provide to international investments treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment."<sup>23</sup> MTD claimed that the Republic of Chile breached the fair and equitable treatment provisions of the BIT... when it "created and encouraged strong expectations that the Project, which was the object of the investment, could be built in the specific proposed location and entered into a contract confirming that location, but then disapproved that location as a matter of policy after MTD irrevocably committed its investment to build the Project in that location."<sup>24</sup>

The MTD Tribunal described the Government's approval of the Project as "a key element in the consideration of whether the Respondent fulfilled its obligation to treat the Claimants fairly and equitably"<sup>25</sup> and found that:

Approval of a Project in a location would give prima facie to an investor the expectation that the project is feasible in that location from a regulatory point of view.... This is not to say that approval of a project in a particular location entitles the investor to develop that site without further governmental approval.... What the Tribunal emphasizes here is the inconsistency of action between two arms of the same Government vis-à-vis the same investor even when the legal framework of the country provides for a mechanism to coordinate.<sup>26</sup>

The MTD Tribunal accepted Chile's argument that the Claimants had a duty to inform themselves of the relevant regulations and policies, but it stressed that "Chile also has an obligation to act coherently and apply its policies consistently, independently of how diligent an investor is"<sup>27</sup> and ultimately concluded "that approval of an investment...for a project that is against the urban policy of the Government is a breach of the obligation to treat an investor fairly and equitably."<sup>28</sup>

In OEPC, the Tribunal drew on these precedents to hold simply that "[t]he stability of the legal and business framework is...an essential element of fair and equitable treatment,"<sup>29</sup> one "that does not depend on whether the Respondent has proceeded in good faith or not,"<sup>30</sup> suggesting that there is a violation of the treaty standard whenever the investor's expectations of stability and consistency are disappointed.

Investors' legitimate expectations have played a role in other contexts. Tecmed also considered the investor's legitimate expectations as part of the analysis of a regulatory expropriation claim. The investor argued that, because the landfill facility it owned was not able to operate following the Government's refusal to extend a permit, a regulatory taking of all or substantially all of the value of its investment had occurred. As is usual in regulatory expropriation cases, the Mexican Government responded that its decision not to renew the permit “was a regulatory measure issued in compliance with the State’s police power within the highly regulated and extremely sensitive framework of environmental protection and public health” and as such was “a legitimate action of the State that does not amount to an expropriation under international law.”<sup>31</sup>

The Tecmed Tribunal accepted both propositions—that regulatory measures that have the effect of destroying all or substantially all of the value of an investment can be expropriations that give rise to an obligation to pay compensation<sup>32</sup> and that exercises of the State’s police powers do not require compensation even if they completely destroy (the value of) an investment.<sup>33</sup> Having found that denial of the permit did cause a substantial deprivation of the value of Tecmed’s investment, the Tribunal was confronted with the issue of whether the regulatory measure in question was a privileged exercise of the State’s police power or not. The Tribunal invoked the investor’s legitimate expectations to guide that determination. The Tribunal stated that it would determine whether such measures are reasonable with respect to their goals, the deprivation of economic rights and the legitimate expectations of [the investor] who suffered such deprivation. There must be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the charge or weight imposed to the foreign investor and the aim sought to be realized by any expropriatory measure.<sup>34</sup>

The Tribunal assessed the stated (and other possible) justifications for denying the permit and determined that the decision was motivated not by any concern for public health or the environment but as a response to “political circumstances,” namely public opposition to the location of the landfill, that neither could be blamed on any misconduct by the investor nor rose to the level of a genuine social crisis.<sup>35</sup> Weighing against this justification, which the Tribunal clearly viewed as less than substantial, was the fact that the denial of the permit frustrated the investor’s legitimate expectations in a number of respects:

- (i) “at the time the investment was made, [the investor] had no reason to doubt the lawfulness of the Landfill’s location, regardless of the social and political pressure that appeared subsequently. These companies were not negligent upon analyzing the legal issues related to the Landfill’s location”;<sup>36</sup>
- (ii) the investor “had legitimate reasons to believe that the operation of the Landfill would extend over the long term,” a legitimate expectation of which the Government “could not be unaware”;<sup>37</sup> and
- (iii) after the investor agreed to a plan to relocate the landfill to another site identified by the Mexican authorities, it legitimately expected that it would be able to operate the landfill at its present location up until the time such relocation could be effected.<sup>38</sup>

Finding that the decision not to extend the permit did not strike an appropriate balance between the investor’s expectations and the interests served by the decision, the Tecmed Tribunal found “that the Resolution and its effects amount to an expropriation in violation of Article 5 of the [bilateral investment treaty] and international law.”<sup>39</sup>

The Claimants in MTD invoked legitimate expectations to bolster their (unsuccessful) claim under the so-called “umbrella clause,” which obliged the host State to “observe any obligation it may have entered into with regard to investments of investors of the other Contracting Party.”<sup>40</sup> They argued that the Government’s refusal to effect re-zoning necessary for the Project to go forward as envisaged “frustrated the rights and legitimate expectations of MTD under the Foreign Investment Contracts and treated the entire Foreign Investment Application procedure [which authorized the investment] as an empty formality.”<sup>41</sup> Although the MTD Tribunal ultimately found that there had been no breach of the umbrella clause, because the Foreign Investment Contracts did not in terms obviate the need to obtain further permits and approvals,<sup>42</sup> it referred back to its finding that there had been a failure to afford fair and equitable treatment and observed that:

Even accepting the limited significance of the Foreign Investment Contracts for purposes of other permits and approvals that may be required, they should be at least in themselves an indication that, from the Government's point of view, the Project is not against Government policy.<sup>43</sup>

Further, the Tribunal in Nagel v. Czech Republic<sup>44</sup> even used the concept of the investor's legitimate expectations to determine whether a Cooperation Agreement made between the Claimant investor and a State enterprise of the host State gave rise to a "claim to...performance under contract having a financial value" such that it constituted a protected "investment" under the bilateral investment treaty at issue. The Cooperation Agreement envisaged that the Claimant and the State enterprise would work together to secure a telecommunications license, and it obliged the State enterprise not to support the efforts of any third party to secure such a license. A year after the Cooperation Agreement was signed the host State passed a regulation pursuant to which two licenses were to be issued, including one to the State enterprise and a joint venture partner to be identified by public tender. Ultimately, the license was issued to the State enterprise and a tenderer other than the Claimant.

The Nagel Tribunal found that the Cooperation Agreement did not constitute "a binding commitment" chargeable to the Government and that it "was not, and could not be a guarantee that a licence would in fact be obtained."<sup>45</sup> Accordingly, the Cooperation Agreement could not be said to have "create[d] legitimate expectation of performance in the future," which the Tribunal had determined was the touchstone for whether a claim of performance under a contract can be said to have financial value, and thus constitute an "investment."<sup>46</sup> The Tribunal acknowledged that the Claimant "may have been encouraged by various remarks from Ministers or government officials or by the general interest they demonstrated in his plans, [but] this was not sufficient... to raise his prospects based on the Cooperation Agreement to the level of a 'legitimate expectation with financial value.'"<sup>47</sup>

This brief summary of a number of recent awards illustrates that tribunals in investment disputes increasingly consider the investor's legitimate expectations, and often base their decisions in a variety of contexts on such expectations. These awards generally stop short of articulating the scope or any limits to the protection that should be given to investors' legitimate expectations. And these awards are generally short on discussion of the authority for providing protection for such expectations aside from (in the later awards) references to other investment awards that also consider legitimate expectations.<sup>48</sup> This would thus seem to be a developing area of the law of investor-State relations that is ripe for more systematic analysis.

II. GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF LAW

This article uses the concept of a "general principle of law" as the intellectual lens through which the legitimate expectations principle is studied. This part of the article aims to demonstrate that general principles provide an appropriate framework for evaluating the protection afforded investors' legitimate expectations in recent investment cases both because of the way in which general principles of law function in the international legal system (addressed in II.A.) and because the methodology for identifying a general principle (addressed in II.B.) grounds the emerging norm in the empirical foundation of positive enactments of municipal law, thus both validating its normative status and disciplining the recognition of the principle.

A. The Function of General Principles of Law: Gaps and Overlaps

The primary function of general principles of law in the international legal system is to facilitate the resolution of disputes by managing the interplay of other, usually customary or conventional, norms to knit together the sometimes patchy fabric of international law into a comprehensive system capable of resolving disputes. General principles perform this function in one of two basic ways: (i) by providing "principles to fill the gaps in positive law"<sup>49</sup> and providing an answer to a question left unsettled by other norms or (ii) by resolving conflicts between norms that otherwise would overlap.

1. Filling Gaps

Gap-filling by general principles itself takes one of two forms: providing a primary rule in the absence of an applicable treaty or customary norm (“primary gap-filling”) or filling a gap in the relevant treaty or customary regime (“secondary gap-filling”).

Primary gap-filling is most likely in respect of those topics, such as judicial procedure or estoppel, where it is unlikely that treaties or norm-creating State practice will generate rules. In fact, though, it is difficult to identify a case in which no treaty or customary norm was applicable and a general principle has been applied to fill such an obvious hole in the fabric of international law.<sup>50</sup> And although the general principles of law have been referred to (albeit not necessarily in terms) in majority and separate opinions in a number of cases in the International Court of Justice (ICJ),<sup>51</sup> the ICJ has enumerated few

<sup>51</sup> Opinions of the court in which general principles were referenced include Application for Review of Judgment No. 273 of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal, 1982 I.C.J. 325, 338–40, 345, 356 (July 20) (principles of judicial procedure); Application for Review of Judgment No. 158 of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal, 1973 I.C.J. 166, 177, 181, 210 (July 12) (various “principles governing the judicial process”); Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited (Second Phase) (Belg. v. Spain), 1970 I.C.J. 3, 33–5 (Feb. 5) (municipal law concept of limited liability company); Effect of Awards of Compensation Made by the UN Administrative Tribunal, 1954 I.C.J. 53 (July 13) (res judicata); International Status of South West Africa, 1950 I.C.J. 128, 134, 142 (July 11) (estoppel); Corfu Channel (U.K. v. Alb.), 1949 I.C.J. 4, 18 (Dec. 15) (admitting circumstantial evidence on the basis that “this indirect evidence is admitted in all systems of law, and its use is recognized by international decisions”); Electricity Company of Sofia and Bulgaria (Belg. v. Bulg.), 1939 P.C.I.J. (ser. A/B) No. 79, at 199 (Dec. 5) (“the principle universally accepted by international tribunals . . . to the effect that the parties to a case must abstain from any measure capable of exercising a prejudicial effect in regard to the execution of the decision to be given”); Legal Status of Eastern Greenland (Den. v. Nor.), 1933 P.C.I.J. (ser. A/B) No. 53, at 68 et seq. (Apr. 5) (estoppel); Mosul Boundary, 1925 P.C.I.J. (ser. B) No. 12, at 32 (Nov. 21) (principle that no one can be a judge in his own suit); Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia (Jurisdiction) (Ger. v. Pol.), 1925 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 6, at 20 (Aug. 25) (litispence); Factory at Chorzów (Merits) (Ger. v. Pol.), 1927 P.C.I.J. (ser. A) No. 17, at 47 (Sept. 13) (restitutio in integrum).

Separate opinions referring to general principles include South West Africa (Second Phase) (Eth. v. S. Afr.; Liber. v. S. Afr.), 1966 I.C.J. 6, 294–99 (July 18) (dissenting opinion of Judge Tanaka) (human rights); Temple of Preah Vihear (Camb. v. Thai.), 1962 I.C.J. 6, 40–43 (June 15) (separate opinion of Judge Alfaro), 62–4 (separate opinion of Judge Fitzmaurice) (estoppel); Right of Passage Over Indian Territory (Port. v. India), 1960 I.C.J. 6, 66 (April 12) (separate opinion of Judge Koo), 136–40 (dissenting opinion of Judge Fernandes) (right of access to enclaved territory).

“general principles of law” as such. Other international tribunals, especially ad hoc tribunals, have been somewhat more willing to have recourse to general principles of law,<sup>52</sup> drawing on general principles for legal rules in those areas which, while outside the normal scope of national rules of private law, do not fall within the traditional scope of international law, such as relations between international organizations and between them and, on the other hand, states or private persons (especially their employees) and certain transactions of states (particularly in their dealings with private corporations on essentially private law matters).<sup>53</sup>

Practice thus suggests that the law of investor-State relations is a context in which the recognition of general principles might be especially appropriate.

This is the case even though, by and large, investor-State relations are regulated as a matter of international law by an extensive network of bilateral investment treaties and also by customary norms. General principles commonly supplement treaty and customary norms, filling gaps interstitially and operating alongside treaty and custom.<sup>54</sup> An example of this secondary, interstitial gap-filling is “the use of general principles to establish minimum standards of procedural fairness in those cases where international treaties and agreements do not provide for them.”<sup>55</sup> In fact, this is described as “the most frequent and successful use” of general principles of law.<sup>56</sup>

General principles have also been used to fill substantive gaps. In perhaps the most famous example, the case concerning the Factory at Chorzów, a treaty established an obligation and a general principle established the remedy for failure to fulfill the obligation. The Court explained the interplay between treaty and general principle in the following terms:

It is a principle of international law that the breach of an engagement involves an obligation to make reparation in an adequate form.

Reparation therefore is the indispensable complement of a failure to apply a convention and there is no necessity for this to be stated in the convention itself.<sup>57</sup>

In the Fabiani case, reference was made to general principles of law on State responsibility for the acts of State agents and on the assessment of damages for denial of justice in violation of both general principles of the law of nations and a convention between France and Venezuela.<sup>58</sup>

The fact that investor-State relations are governed by well-developed customary norms and an extensive network of investment treaties thus should not indicate that there is no occasion for the application of a general principle:

Even if there is a treaty, its interpretation may require the application of general principles of law recognized by civilized nations. This is particularly true of the numerous treaties [including investment treaties] which employ broad language such as “freedom of access to the courts” or “most constant protection and security for their persons and property.”<sup>59</sup>

2. Resolving Overlaps

Indeed, the existence of a network of treaty provisions and customary norms governing investor-State relations may give rise to a need for general principles to assist in resolving overlaps between these norms. In this, the second context in which general principles function, the problem is not that other norms do not provide an answer, but that contending norms provide different answers to the same question. General principles of law may resolve overlaps or conflicts between primary norms by providing rules of interpretation, limiting principles, or principles of reconciliation that allow the simultaneous application of otherwise potentially conflicting norms to a particular case.

In this context, general principles often take the form of canons of interpretation,<sup>60</sup> which shape the application of treaty norms in such a way as to reduce friction and overlaps between them. For example, the principle lex specialis derogat generalis addresses the potential conflict between a general rule and a specific rule that might address the same subject matter inconsistently. Another way in which general principles address overlaps is illustrated by the principle of good faith, which can circumscribe the otherwise apparent scope of a treaty norm in order to reduce a clash with a countervailing principle.<sup>61</sup>

It is clear that the problem of overlaps is not a new one: general principles, especially principles of interpretation, have long operated in conjunction with treaty and other norms to ameliorate potential conflicts between them. Nevertheless, this tailoring and reconciling function of general principles does seem likely to be of increasing importance. As the reach of international law extends both horizontally to new subject matter (environmental law, criminal law) and vertically to new subjects (supra-national organizations, individuals), norms proliferate, and, as they do, the likelihood that they will conflict also increases. General principles can play a significant role in resolving conflicts between such contending rights.

The separate opinions of Judges Koo and Fernandes in Right of Passage over Indian Territory illustrate this point particularly well. That case involved Portugal's claim that it had a right to pass over Indian territory to reach an enclave of land over which Portugal was sovereign. There was no dispute about either Portugal's rights within the enclaved territory or India's sovereignty over the surrounding land, the normal implication of which would be that India did not have to allow Portugal, or anyone, passage over its land. But applying those settled norms with no limitation did not address, and indeed created, the practical difficulty that, without passage over Indian territory, Portugal could not effectively exercise its undisputed rights over the enclave. The judgment of the Court addressed this question on the basis of a customary practice between the two parties allowing the passage of certain types of traffic to and from the enclaved territory.<sup>62</sup> Judges Koo and Fernandes, however, based their separate conclusions that Portugal had a right of passage over Indian land on a general principle directed by logical and practical necessity.

Judge Koo referred to this as “the principle of justice founded on reason,”<sup>63</sup> and would have ruled that, because the principle of access to enclaved territory was “based upon reason and the elementary principle of justice,” it represented a general principle of law.<sup>64</sup> Judge Fernandes’ opinion goes into more detail about how logical and practical necessity led to the recognition of a general principle of a right of passage to enclaved land:

What has to be determined is whether there is not a reason deeply rooted in the legal consciousness of all peoples for admitting, as a logical and practical necessity, the recognition of a right of passage to one who has a certain legal capacity to exercise in an area to which he cannot have access without using an area reserved for another. If that is not a general principle of law, valid alike in municipal and international law, within the meaning of Article 38 of the Statute of the Court, then no principles will meet the conditions of that Article.<sup>65</sup>

Although neither opinion says so explicitly, a general principle of law, i.e. that there is a right of passage to access enclaved lands, was used to reconcile two conflicting absolute principles—on the one hand that India’s sovereignty meant it could exclude Portugal from Indian land and on the other that Portugal had the right to exercise sovereignty over the enclave, which it could only do if it were allowed to pass over Indian land—in a way that both were as effective as possible.

The separate opinion of Vice-President Weeramantry in the case concerning the Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Project, which focused on “sustainable development” as a general principle of law, makes this point explicit. Vice-President Weeramantry echoed the Koo and Fernandes opinions in deriving this principle, in part, as a matter of “inescapable logical necessity.”<sup>66</sup> He explained that the rights of economic development and environmental protection having been recognized, the principle of sustainable development is necessary to resolve the tension between them:

The problem of steering a course between the needs of development and the necessity to protect the environment is a problem alike of the law of development and of the law of the environment. Both these vital and developing areas of law require, and indeed assume, the existence of a principle which harmonizes both needs.

To hold that no such principle exists in the law is to hold that current law recognizes the juxtaposition of two principles which could operate in collision with each other, without providing the necessary basis of principle for their reconciliation. The untenability of the supposition that the law sanctions such a state of normative anarchy suffices to condemn a hypothesis that leads to so unsatisfactory a result.

Each principle cannot be given free rein, regardless of the other. The law necessarily contains within itself the principle of reconciliation. That principle is the principle of sustainable development.<sup>67</sup>

Vice-President Weeramantry thus clearly saw a critical function of the general principle of “sustainable development” as reconciling otherwise conflicting rights.

B. The Methodology for Recognizing a General Principle

Given the significant, if often interstitial, role general principles play in knitting together and tailoring the fabric of international law, the methodology for identifying general principles is the subject of a surprising amount of uncertainty. The practice of international tribunals has not explicated a systematic methodology. Rather “[i]n case after case, the judge writing the opinion simply expressed a hunch probably based upon the legal systems with which he happened to be familiar.”<sup>68</sup> But though the methodology for identifying general principles is not always transparent in practice, as a matter of doctrine, a straightforward methodology can be identified which promises to discipline what might otherwise appear to be subjective (or at least unpredictable) jurisprudential “hunches” about how open-ended investment treaty standards should be applied in individual cases and thereby to validate the principles that are articulated as applications of those standards.

1. Rules of Municipal Public Law as a Source of General Principles

Rules of municipal law, including public law, constitute an important empirical foundation for the identification of general principles.

(a) Municipal Law

Luis Henkin wrote that “[t]he use of analogies drawn from municipal legal systems to develop or supplement international law is as old as international law itself.”<sup>69</sup> And “the majority of jurists... take the line that general principles recognized in national law constitute a reservoir of principles which an international judge is authorized by Article 38 to apply in international disputes, if their application appears relevant and appropriate in the different context of inter-State relations.”<sup>70</sup> In fact, concerns that the content of the category of sources of international law that is now called “general principles of law recognized by civilized nations” would be unpredictable and subjective<sup>71</sup> were assuaged at the time the concept was first codified in the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ) by emphasizing that this category drew its content from municipal law. As Baron Descamps explained, far from giving too much liberty to the judges’ decision, his proposal would limit it. As a matter of fact it would impose on the judges a duty which would prevent them from relying too much on their own subjective opinion; it would be incumbent on them to consider whether the dictates of their conscience were in agreement with the conception of justice of civilized nations.<sup>72</sup>

Rather than providing an occasion for judges to create law, the application of general principles was “merely [bringing] to light a latent rule,... [which] is quite legitimate because it is logically contained in a principle already recognized by the Nation concerned.”<sup>73</sup> A focus on municipal law thus imposes critical discipline on the essentially creative process of identifying a general principle of law by allowing objective “verification” of any claim about the universal validity of the principle against “a purely empirical municipal law basis.”<sup>74</sup> Thus the drafters of Article 38 emphasized general principles as having acquired through recognition in foro domestico by the civilized nations that positive character which makes them rules of law and which forbids including among them what has been called the “ideal element” or mere aspiration...<sup>75</sup>

Having established the relevance of rules of municipal law as important raw materials for general principles of law, the next point to canvass is that public law, as well as private law, can be a source of general principles. The basic (though not uncomplicated) distinction is between private law, which governs relations among individuals, and public law, which governs relations between individuals and the State.<sup>76</sup>

This point bears emphasizing because the traditional focus of scholarship on general principles has been on analogies drawn from municipal private law.<sup>77</sup> One explanation for this might be that traditionally international law was chiefly concerned with inter-State relations, relations between sovereign equals, which are more closely analogous to individual relations in private law. Only relatively recently has international law been seen as imposing much of a meaningful constraint on State action vis-à-vis sub-State actors, a role similar to that played by public law on the municipal plane. That being said, recourse to public law principles is not unknown to international law: As long ago as the late nineteenth century, arbitrators were looking to municipal public law on issues such as the responsibility of States for the acts of their agents.<sup>78</sup> Thus Brownlie has noted that “[a] problem worth examination is whether public law is a better source of analogies in the present state of international law and institutions.”<sup>79</sup>

International law is notoriously expanding in scope to reach beyond issues of strictly inter-State relations analogous to the individual relations governed by private law. As one commentator observes, the “proliferation of international rules and standards, whatever their precise legal status . . . extend to virtually every field of human activity that transcends national boundaries.”<sup>80</sup> The proliferation of investment treaties, giving protection—and direct access to treaty arbitration—to individual investors is but one very clear example of this phenomenon. Thus international law now governs precisely the sorts of relations between individuals and the State that public law speaks to in the municipal context. Other examples (albeit ones outside the scope of this article) are international administrative law, which is a body of law rapidly evolving to address the relationship between individuals, especially employees, and international organizations,<sup>81</sup> and of course human rights law. Against this backdrop, Friedmann’s conclusion, now almost half a century old, rings even more true today:

Because so many of the new domains of international law are no longer clearly allocable to either public or private law but constitute a blend of both, the statement made a generation ago by Lauterpacht that “these general principles of law are, in the great majority of cases, in substance co-extensive with the general principles of private law” would no longer be correct today.<sup>82</sup>

It seems that the time is ripe for international lawyers to look as much to public as to private law for general principles of law.

2. How Much Consensus is Enough?

In extrapolating a general principle of law from rules of municipal law one need not establish actual universality of application of identical rules. One should seek to identify the principle in legal systems representative of various legal traditions in the world, and it is enough commonality if systems agree on the solution to a particular legal problem or the outcome of a particular case, even if they do so through different doctrines and procedures.

(a) How Many and Which Legal Systems?

Theory supports two quite different answers to this question. On one view, the ideal of a truly “general” principle of law is universal adherence.<sup>83</sup> On the other hand, someone who was confident of her ability to appreciate what Cheng called “the general feeling of mankind for the requirements of equity” might adopt his suggestion that it would be possible to identify a general principle of law with reference to only one municipal legal system, or none. Practice picks out a middle path between these extremes. According to a survey of practice in the PCIJ, “in most cases the alleged general principle of law was claimed to exist in all countries,” and the ICJ and other international tribunals often assert that a general principle is “universal.”<sup>84</sup> But in fact “tribunals that have applied ‘general principles’ have not considered it necessary to carry out a detailed examination of the main (or ‘representative’) systems of national law to determine whether the principles pervade ‘the municipal law of nations in general.’”<sup>85</sup> Often this is a matter of assertion, and “[u]sually only the laws of a small number of countries, or of none, are cited.”<sup>86</sup>

This accommodation to reality reflects the fact that in a world of nearly two hundred independent States, such an extensive comparative exercise as would be required to establish true unanimity would be likely to sink under its own weight

The notable tendency of the ICJ to identify purportedly “general” principles by perhaps a less robust comparative exercise than might be expected—or than would suffice for an academic inquiry—is somewhat ameliorated by the fact that Article 9 of the Court’s Statute aims to ensure “representation of the main forms of civilization and of the principal legal systems of the world.” The practice of ad hoc tribunals and other, less representative bodies is more problematic. See Waldock, supra note 70, at 67.

(Waldock's image of a "legal tower of Babel"<sup>87</sup> comes to mind) and may for an arbitral tribunal or academic be practically impossible—it certainly would be for this author. Thus "almost all authors" emphasize "[t]hat universality of application is not a prerequisite of a general principle of law."<sup>88</sup> Instead identification of the principle under study in representative systems of municipal law—such as common, civil, socialist, Islamic, and Japanese law—is sufficient.<sup>89</sup>

(b) How Similar Do They Have to Be?

Reality must also be conceded to when considering the degree of similarity one should expect or hope to find when comparing different legal systems. It is conventional wisdom among comparative lawyers that finding identical rules in the municipal law of States from different legal traditions is unlikely and that even superficially identical rules might operate quite differently in different systems. As Dr. Mann noted,

[c]omparative lawyers will regard it as almost platitudinous that complete identity, extending to all the details of a legal rule, hardly ever exists between the legal systems of two or more countries; even if the wording of a statutory provision is the same, its judicial interpretation may differ from country to country.<sup>90</sup>

This reality need not foil the attempt to identify a general principle; in contrast, the article aims at ascertaining congruence between the principles served by the rules, not between the rules themselves. Thus, a general principle may be identified when different rules in different legal systems reflect the same principle, despite differences in points of detail, as when legal systems reach similar outcomes in similar cases, even if by different routes of legal reasoning:

[C]omparative lawyers will not hesitate to testify to the existence of a surprising degree of similarity of rules or at least results, arrived at frequently by differing means, processes of reasoning or classification. It is this similarity which permits the deduction of general principles.<sup>91</sup>

3. Final Considerations—“Appropriateness”

Even once widespread consensus on a principle has been identified, the analysis of whether that principle constitutes a general principle of law applicable as international law does not end, although the paucity of jurisprudence on Article 38(1)(c) and on general principles does make it difficult to identify a basis for distinguishing between a widely accepted principle that is a general principle of law and one that is not. Commentators suggest that such principles are part of international law “in so far as they are applicable to relations of States,”<sup>92</sup> or, slightly more helpfully, that they “are appropriate for application on the international level”<sup>93</sup> or are “suited to the international environment.”<sup>94</sup>

These question-begging formulations do appear to track the rationale the ICJ has given for analyzing the existence of a general principle. In the Advisory Opinion concerning the International Status of South West Africa, the Court rejected the proposed analogy between the Mandate system under the League of Nations and trusts in municipal law. The Court emphasized the “essentially international character of the functions which had been entrusted to the Union of South Africa,” stressed that “[t]he object of the Mandate regulated by international rules far exceeded that of contractual relations regulated by national law,” and distinguished the League’s supervision and control over the Mandate territory from the role of “mandator” in national law, differences between the national and international systems that made the analogy ill fitting.<sup>95</sup>

One suspects that another reason for rejecting the analogy between trust and mandate in South West Africa was the Court’s rejection of the implication the South African government sought to draw from it—that because the League as mandator had ceased to exist, the Mandate had lapsed, leaving South Africa in control of the territory. A different approach was taken in Lord McNair’s separate opinion. Willing to entertain the analogy between Mandate and trust even while acknowledging that the analogy was not perfect, he drew from it a number of principles that weakened South Africa’s claims.<sup>96</sup> This suggests an organizing methodological principle: The Court rejected the analogy to municipal law because it worked an injustice, while Lord McNair embraced the analogy because he saw that it could be made to serve justice. Or, as Cheng concluded,

[a]ssuming a basic analogy between individuals, international courts and tribunals apply to international relations those principles underlying municipal rules of law which have been found to work substantial justice between individuals, whenever circumstances similar to those justifying their application exist.<sup>97</sup>

The separate opinions of Judges Koo and Fernandes in Right of Passage over Indian Territory also suggest justice is one of the basic evaluative criteria to be used in deciding whether to extrapolate a general principle of law from municipal law.

The “practical or logical necessity” of a principle—and in particular the extent to which it performs the function of filling gaps or resolving overlaps between primary norms discussed above—is also a basis for recognizing a general principle of law. Practical necessity may have as much to do with whether an issue is likely to arise for resolution by an international tribunal as anything: Because the effective judicial resolution of international disputes is a key raison d’être for general principles, they are unlikely as a practical matter to develop in areas of international law that are not subject to formal dispute settlement processes. This may begin to explain why “the universally accepted common crimes—murder, theft, assault, incest—that apply to individuals are not crimes under international law [simply] by virtue of their ubiquity”<sup>98</sup>: International tribunals have, until recently, not been faced with disputes concerning crimes under international law, so analogies to domestic criminal law have not been necessary for the resolution of international disputes.

Reason and “logical necessity” were additional bases for Judges Koo and Fernandes to identify a general principle of a right of access to enclaved territory in the Right of Passage case. Judge Koo, while acknowledging that “there are important distinctions between a right of passage of an international enclave and that of an enclaved land owned by a private individual,” insisted that at the foundation of the law governing both situations lay “the principle of justice founded on reason.”<sup>99</sup> Accordingly, because the principle of access to enclaved territory was “based upon reason and the elementary principle of justice,” it represented a general principle of law.<sup>100</sup> For his part, Judge Fernandes justified international recognition of the principle in the following terms:

[I]t was shown by a study of comparative law by Professor Max Rheinstein, filed with the Court, that the laws of all civilized nations recognize the right of access to enclaved property in favour of its owner. No sort of analogy needs to be drawn between ownership and sovereignty, nor is it necessary to transfer a rule of municipal law to the field of international law. What has to be determined is whether there is not a reason deeply rooted in the legal consciousness of all peoples for admitting, as a logical and practical necessity, the recognition of a right of passage to one who has a certain legal capacity to exercise in an area to which he cannot have access without using an area reserved for another.<sup>101</sup>

Similarly, in his separate opinion in the case concerning the Gabcikovo-Nagymaros Project Vice-President Weeramantry derived the general principle of law of “sustainable development,” in part, as a matter of “inescapable logical necessity.”<sup>102</sup> It may go too far to argue on the basis of Vice-President Weeramantry’s opinion that legal logic would direct the recognition as a general principle of law of any principle that would reconcile otherwise conflicting absolute rights. But his approach does provide an argument in support of a principle that would have such an effect that could also be justified on the bases of widespread acceptance, “appropriateness,” and substantial justice that have been the touchstones for identifying general principles of law in international jurisprudence to date.

III. THE PRINCIPLE OF PROTECTING LEGITIMATE EXPECTATIONS IN NATIONAL LEGAL SYSTEMS

National legal systems reflect the principle of protecting legitimate expectations in a variety of ways. Reflections of the principle are easiest to identify in those systems that explicitly recognize the principle as a doctrine of public or administrative law. For example, German law protects legitimate expectations as a constitutional norm, reflected in the principle of Vertrauensschutz, literally the “protection of trust.”<sup>103</sup> This concept heavily influenced the development by the European Court of Justice (ECJ) of the European administrative law doctrine of protection for legitimate expectations. This doctrine first appeared in the Algera case of 1957, where the ECJ ruled that an administrative measure conferring individual rights on the person concerned cannot in principle be withdrawn, if it is a lawful measure; in that case, since the individual right is vested, the need to safeguard confidence in the stability of the situation thus created prevails over the interests of an administration desirous of reversing its decision.<sup>104</sup>

There is debate about whether the English courts borrowed legitimate expectations from European law or the common law developed the doctrine on its own,<sup>105</sup> but there is no denying that the doctrine of protecting legitimate expectations now features importantly in English administrative law.<sup>106</sup> Other systems that explicitly recognize a doctrine of protecting legitimate expectations include the public law of the Netherlands<sup>107</sup> and legal systems that have been more or less influenced by English law, such as the

An explicit doctrine of protecting legitimate expectations has not gained approval by the French courts.<sup>113</sup> Although at least one lower administrative tribunal has provided protection for such expectations (confiance légitime),<sup>114</sup> on appeal that decision was disapproved.<sup>115</sup> And both the Conseil d'Etat and the Conseil constitutionnel have indicated that the principle is not part of French administrative law.<sup>116</sup> Nevertheless French law effectively protects legitimate expectations as “vested rights” (droits acquis) and imposes restrictions on the revocation of certain administrative acts (the doctrine of intangibilité).<sup>117</sup> Thus, with respect to protection for legitimate expectations one commentator concluded, “French law needs such a principle less than [other legal systems might].”<sup>118</sup>

Other legal systems protect legitimate expectations even more indirectly. For example, while lawyers trained in the United States might not instinctively identify a principle of protecting legitimate expectations as such in U.S. law,<sup>119</sup> upon a closer look, legitimate expectations is one of the animating themes of jurisprudence under the Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment<sup>120</sup> and the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution.<sup>121</sup> In particular, U.S. courts have emphasized under the Due Process Clauses that “[r]etroactive legislation presents problems of unfairness that are more serious than those posed by prospective legislation, because it can deprive citizens of legitimate expectations and upset settled transactions.”<sup>122</sup> And a central analysis in regulatory takings cases is whether the interests at stake “were sufficiently bound up with the reasonable expectations of the claimant to constitute “property” for Fifth Amendment purposes.”<sup>123</sup> Thus, though there is no explicit doctrine of protecting legitimate expectations in U.S. law, the principle is reflected in that legal system.

Rules limiting retrospective legislation, which exist in each of the systems studied here and in many others, are also animated by a concern to protect settled expectations: “The well-established presumption against retroactive legislation, which serves to protect settled expectations, is grounded in a respect for vested rights.”<sup>124</sup> This rule of construction, whereby a statute will not be interpreted to have retrospective effect unless the legislative intent that it should is clearly expressed, is recognized in the U.S., the U.K. and France.<sup>125</sup> European administrative law similarly deals with “the applicability of legislative acts to events which originated in the past but which have yet to be definitively concluded”<sup>126</sup> with an interpretive canon or clear statement rule.<sup>127</sup> Significantly, however, none of these systems imposes an absolute ban on retrospective legislation. In France, although retroactive statutes are outlawed by Article 2 of the Civil Code,<sup>128</sup> this is only a statutory principle, subject to legislative revision, and in practice it has been diluted to the rule of interpretation discussed above. German law most clearly applies the principle of protecting legitimate expectations to the question of retrospective legislation: Actual retrospective effect, which changes the legal significance of acts that were completed in the past, is only exceptionally consistent with the requirements of the legitimate expectations doctrine, while so-called “apparent” retrospectivity, which affects acts that may have begun in the past but are ongoing, is in principle consistent with the German constitution and may only exceptionally transgress the doctrine of protection for legitimate expectations.<sup>129</sup>

These rules on retrospective legislation suggest that, although there is in principle some concern about legitimate expectations of a stable legal situation, this concern will only infrequently give rise to protection for these expectations. U.S. law is particularly clear on this point:

[O]ur cases are clear that legislation readjusting rights and burdens is not unlawful solely because it upsets otherwise settled expectations. This is true even though the effect of the legislation is to impose a new duty or liability based on past acts.<sup>130</sup>

Thus such retroactive legislation is generally permissible whenever retroactivity serves some rational purpose.<sup>131</sup>

The fact that the legal systems referenced in this discussion are all identifiably “Western” should not obscure the fact that more than one of the world’s legal families is represented, and each reflects a noticeably different public law tradition: The United States and the United Kingdom are both common law systems, but the United States has both a written constitution and a statute-based system of administrative law.<sup>132</sup> The United Kingdom, by contrast, has an unwritten constitution and until fairly recently not only did not distinguish between public law and private law,<sup>133</sup> but has been described as not having “a developed system of administrative law.”<sup>134</sup> Scholars have emphasized the divergence between the essentially pragmatic (and some would say anti-rationalist) common-law, especially English, approach to issues of public law and administration and highly articulated Continental conceptions such as the French l'état de droit and the German Rechtsstaat.<sup>135</sup> But it also bears noting that, while France and Germany are both civil law systems, they come from the Romanic and Germanic branches of that legal family respectively. The key components of French administrative law were born of the Revolution of 1789 and the period of the Consulate (1798–1802),<sup>136</sup> while German administrative law is heavily influenced by developments in German constitutional law after the Second World War.<sup>137</sup> These different histories have led to significantly different structures and approaches to the problems of administration. European law, for its part, is a supra-national hybrid of the legal traditions of its members, including both common law and civilian systems. These systems thus support a more meaningful comparison than their shared “Western-ness” might suggest.

IV. THE CONTOURS OF A GENERAL PRINCIPLE OF PROTECTING LEGITIMATE EXPECTATIONS

As the discussion of rules on retroactive legislation made especially clear, any expression of a principle of protecting legitimate expectations based on an analogy to municipal public law would not be absolute: Consider, for example, the position in U.S. constitutional law, which provides that “legislation readjusting rights and burdens is not unlawful solely because it upsets otherwise settled expectations.”<sup>138</sup> This tracks the outcome of the recent investment cases, where although some legitimate expectations claims have been upheld, others have failed.

This part of the article extends the general principles methodology to attempt to identify factors that support the protection of legitimate expectations and those which do not. Two caveats before turning to this analysis: First, it is beyond the scope of this article to recount every manifestation of this principle in the legal systems of the world, or even just in those systems in which it features most explicitly. Second, as the methodological discussion in part II made clear, one need not prove universal adherence to a doctrine that takes the identical form in various legal systems for it to reflect a “general principle of law recognized by civilized nations.” Accordingly, the references to the doctrines protecting legitimate expectations in various systems of national law that follow will not be an attempt to identify the “least common denominator” or “greatest common factor” between legal systems, but will instead propose a hybrid principle of protection for legitimate expectations drawn from various sources.

The analysis in this part is organized around the following working statement of the principle reflected in a comparative survey: “any individual who, as a result of governmental conduct, holds certain expectations concerning future governmental activity, can require those expectations to be fulfilled unless there are compelling reasons for not doing so.”<sup>139</sup> Each of the sections that follows looks for further consensus among national legal systems on each element of that statement of principle: What is the nature of the “governmental conduct” that can give rise to expectations? Only “certain” expectations are legitimate, but which are they? What would constitute “compelling reasons” for not providing protection? And what form does this protection take—what does it mean for “expectations to be fulfilled”? The answers municipal law gives to these questions, which are considered along with recent investment awards, suggest the direction in which the principle of protection for legitimate expectations might develop as a matter of international law.

1. What “Governmental Conduct” Can Give Rise to Expectations?

(a) Form

National legal systems impose few formal requirements for the type of governmental conduct that can give rise to legitimate expectations, although the person asserting expectations must be able to point to some overt government action, and the conduct in question must be precise and unambiguous.

The first point, that legitimate expectations actually have to be based on government conduct, may seem obvious, but it serves to distinguish what U.S. courts refer to as a mere “unilateral expectation” from expectations that are to be protected.<sup>140</sup> As commentators on protection for legitimate expectations in European administrative law emphasize, the ECJ normally “requires a certain degree of active participation in the raising of the expectation.”<sup>141</sup>

Otherwise the government conduct that might give rise to an expectation can take many forms. European and English courts have recognized a particularly wide range of administrative acts, in addition to formal administrative decisions, that may generate expectations. The Châtillon case from 1966 established in European law that legitimate expectations could be raised by an informal “statement” as well as a formal decision, although the expectations were not found deserving of protection in that case.<sup>142</sup> And though it may be more difficult to establish an expectation on the basis of an oral statement, oral statements that are sufficiently precise have been held to give rise to legitimate expectations.<sup>143</sup>

Similarly, English courts have accepted that expectations can be raised in a number of different ways, including by a government promise or undertaking, or simply by a representation or the provision of information to an individual.<sup>144</sup> Such administrative act may be express or implied<sup>145</sup> and may be identified on the basis of government conduct either alone or in addition to words.<sup>146</sup> Possible sources of a representation include a statement by an individual, a circular, report or other document, an agreement between the individual claiming the expectation and the government, and an international treaty.<sup>147</sup> A representation need not have been made directly to the individual claiming an expectation.<sup>148</sup> An expectation has also been found on the basis of a consistent course of conduct over an extended period of time.<sup>149</sup>

Likewise in U.S. law, expectations that were protected as property under the Due Process Clauses have been based on “a broad range of interests that are secured by ‘existing rules or understandings.’”<sup>150</sup> These include implied promises<sup>151</sup> and statements in administrative handbooks, administrative guidelines, and consistent practice in conformity with those statements.<sup>152</sup>

Because the rules that most clearly reflect the principle of protection for legitimate expectations in French and German law are, by and large, rules about the withdrawal or revocation of administrative decisions, they are necessarily directed at administrative action of a certain degree of formality. It is nevertheless clear in these systems that administrative decisions across the range of administrative competence, and taking different forms, are capable of giving rise to legitimate expectations. Those administrative acts that give rise to protected expectations include the decision to award a contract,<sup>153</sup> the grant of a permit or license,<sup>154</sup> and a promotion decision in the civil service.<sup>155</sup> And it is clear that in French law, administrative representations that do not take the form of a formal decision may give rise to expectations at least sufficient to support an award of damages when the expectations are disappointed, although the administration will not be bound to comply with or otherwise satisfy the expectations generated by the representation.<sup>156</sup>

While there is widespread agreement that much government conduct can, in principle, give rise to an expectation, national courts do look for a certain degree of specificity and precision. The ECJ has held that, to give rise to expectations, the administrative conduct in question must amount to a “precise and specific assurance”<sup>157</sup>: “it is only a concrete expectation which is protected.”<sup>158</sup> The English courts also look for conduct that is “clear and unambiguous.”<sup>159</sup> And U.S. courts refer to “mutually explicit understanding[s].”<sup>160</sup>

None of the rules discussed so far concerns expectations that are effectively based on legislation itself, such as an expectation, based on nothing more than the current state of the law, that existing legislation will not be amended or repealed or reinterpreted. This is not because national law does not recognize that expectations may be implicated by legislation—rules on retroactivity do reflect this awareness—and although protection of such expectations is often very limited, that they can arise is not in doubt.

This brief survey suggests that a general principle of protecting legitimate expectations in international law might impose little in the way of formal requirements for the type of governmental conduct that could potentially give rise to expectations, although it should insist that such conduct be overt, clear, and specific. Tecmed reflects the view that a broad range of government conduct may generate expectations, having identified legitimate expectations based on, among other things, an unwritten agreement between the investor and the authorities.<sup>161</sup> To the extent that it would recognize that expectations may be raised by various forms of government conduct, including informal communications, such an approach may seem to be more generous than the approach outlined in Nagel, which emphasized not only that there had been insufficiently “concrete Government involvement” but also that the investor sought to rely on informal personal contacts with various government ministers or officials and that formalities necessary to bind the Government had not been observed.<sup>162</sup> But the focus in that case was as much on the vagueness and generality of the expressions of interest by government officials as on the fact that no formal commitment had been made. And of course the issue of legitimate expectations arose as part of the analysis of whether a claim to performance under a contract had financial value, a context in which the scope and limits of any contractual obligation would seem to be decisive. A requirement that conduct be overt, clear, and specific tracks the result in GAMI, where the legitimate expectations claim failed in part because the investor could not point to “an unambiguous affirmation” by the Government.<sup>163</sup>

It is submitted that a flexible approach to the form of government actions that may give rise to expectations is a sensible starting point for an international legal principle of protecting legitimate expectations: There seems to be little basis in international or comparative law for distinguishing among the types of administrative activity that can give rise to expectations, although it is just and reasonable that expectations must be traceable to some overt and specific government conduct. Thus, without more, it would be unusual for legitimate expectations to be founded solely on the basis of the pre-existing legal regime.

(b) Beneficial Effect

In order to give rise to expectations in national law, governmental conduct, whatever its form, generally has to tend to the benefit of the addressee.

The identification of administrative acts that “create rights”<sup>164</sup> and hence may be entitled to protection is an area in which French “administrative courts [have] never provided a conceptual definition.”<sup>165</sup> Generally, though, it appears that only favorable decisions will be found to create rights.<sup>166</sup> German law makes this point more explicitly, distinguishing between government acts that benefit individuals and those that impose burdens on them. Only expectations based on the former will be protected.<sup>167</sup> Withdrawal or revocation of administrative decisions imposing burdens is discretionary, while withdrawal of acts that confer benefits is limited by the need to protect legitimate expectations.<sup>168</sup> The ECJ has blended the German distinction between administrative acts that benefit as opposed to burden and the French focus on acts that “create rights.” In early cases, the Court limited the revocation of an act that “created a right or a similar advantage”<sup>169</sup> and a decision “by which a benefit is conferred,”<sup>170</sup> and the Court ultimately settled on the description “favorable administrative act[s].”<sup>171</sup> The requirement of beneficial effect is not prominent in the English case law. Commentators nevertheless find that it “is implicitly and consistently applied.”<sup>172</sup>

Although this issue does not yet appear to have arisen in international investment awards, the requirement that conduct said to give rise to expectations have a beneficial effect on the addressee seems like a commonsense requirement for an international legal principle of protecting legitimate expectations. In any event, it seems unlikely as a practical matter that anyone would contend that his expectation of a negative regulatory outcome should be protected.

(c) Individualized

Legitimate expectations can only, or can at least more readily, be based on acts directed at one individual or a small group rather than acts or rules addressed more generally.

French law draws this line very clearly, recognizing “a distinction... between those rights which have been acquired through an individual measure and those conferred on the basis of a regulation.”<sup>173</sup> Individualized acts give rise to vested rights and are in principle inviolable, while more general acts, actes réglementaires, are only limited by rules prohibiting retroactivity. “[N]obody has a right to insist on an acte réglementaire being upheld, i.e. to oppose its being annulled for the future.”<sup>174</sup> The ECJ has reached a similar position by the application of rules of locus standi: “Any natural or legal person may, under the same conditions, institute proceedings against a decision addressed to that person or against a decision which, although in the form of a regulation or a decision addressed to another person, is of direct and individual concern to the former.”<sup>175</sup> Thus private parties may not normally challenge generally applicable regulations. It appears that German law draws a similar distinction between concrete, individualized decisions and abstract, general rule-making.<sup>176</sup> U.S. law does not confront this issue directly, but a general regulatory regime itself is normally not the basis for expectations that will be protected by property rights, and if anything the existence of such a regime will be seen as putting individuals on notice that the regime is likely to change.<sup>177</sup> Some English commentators discern in the case law a distinction between generalized administrative actions, such as rule-making or other more legislative activities, and quasi-judicial individualized determinations and conclude that legitimate expectations are more likely to be recognized in the latter setting.<sup>178</sup>

The limited substantive bite of rules on retroactivity may in part be attributable to this distinction between expectations based on individualized and expectations based on general acts: This distinction suggests that an expectation that the law will not be changed should usually not be protected, and such a generalized expectation is not based on the specific or individualized governmental conduct that typically gives rise to a legitimate expectation.

The recent investment awards also reflect heightened protection for individually targeted conduct. The expectations that have been protected were, in Tecmed, based on individualized communications and an agreement between the investor and the regulators,<sup>179</sup> and in MTD on government approval of foreign investment contracts to which the investor was a party.<sup>180</sup> Nagel may seem to be something of an outlier in this respect—there the investor could point to a contract with a State enterprise and several individual (albeit informal) contacts with government officials<sup>181</sup>—but the Nagel Tribunal ultimately ruled that not only did the contract not amount to a guarantee of anything, neither was the Government directly involved in the contract, suggesting that the finding on legitimate expectations in this case turned on other considerations. ADF too is consistent with a principle that individualized government action will be more likely to give rise to protected expectations. In ADF, the investor sought to ground its legitimate expectations on prior interpretations of various legislative enactments in cases to which the investor was not a party, a claim which failed.<sup>182</sup>

In addition to these recent awards, international law has addressed expectations about the persistence of a legislative environment in the related context of investment or concession contracts. In that context, an investor may secure an explicit contract provision that some or all of the relevant legal landscape will remain the same.<sup>183</sup> But such protection results only from that individual bargain with the State; a guaranty of legal stability is not implied from the application of international law to these agreements but arises only out of a specific contract term.<sup>184</sup> It would be surprising for a general principle of protecting legitimate expectations effectively to provide to all investors the protection that some had won through a bargained-for exchange.<sup>185</sup> Although protection of legitimate expectations based on government conduct that does not rise to the level of a contract or formal promise may be desirable, a requirement that an expectation be based on some individualized government act seems an appropriate limitation.

One rationale that has been offered for this distinction between expectations based on targeted acts and those based on general acts is “both because an unequivocal representation made to a person carries a particular moral force, and because holding the public body to that representation is less likely to have serious consequences for the administration as a whole” than would the protection of legitimate expectations in a case involving a general norm or quasi-legislative policy choice, not to mention legislation itself.<sup>186</sup> This rationale seems to be equally persuasive in respect of an international legal principle of protection for legitimate expectations, as limiting claims for the protection of legitimate expectations to those measures which are directed to one or a small number of natural or legal persons rather than generally will limit the impairment of sovereignty that necessarily results from a successful claim for the protection of legitimate expectations. At the least, it is submitted that legitimate expectations should more readily be identified on the basis of individualized administrative conduct or communication than on the basis of general legislation or quasi-legislative administrative rulemaking.

An ultra vires administrative act can in principle give rise to expectations that may be protected, although it should do so less readily than would lawful administrative conduct.

The question of expectations based on unlawful acts is one on which national legal systems are somewhat divided. For example, German law takes the position that ultra vires acts can give rise to legitimate expectations, but that expectations based on such acts are not to be protected by maintaining the act in force but by compensation,<sup>187</sup> an issue addressed specifically in sub-section 4 below. It is somewhat unclear in English law whether an ultra vires act can give rise to a legitimate expectation. Expectations purportedly based on acts that are outside the power of the person or institution that authors them have seemed especially problematic to the English courts,<sup>188</sup> but the apparent injustice that can result from a strict application of the ultra vires doctrine has led the English courts to develop a less than analytically satisfying set of “exceptions” to the ultra vires doctrine to avoid the conclusion that such acts would have no legal effect.<sup>189</sup> French law recognizes no difficulty in principle with basing expectations on ultra vires acts, although French law does allow the withdrawal of ultra vires acts within a specified time period, while withdrawal of lawful acts that create rights is, in principle, impossible.<sup>190</sup> European law is closer to French law, in that unlawful acts may be withdrawn within a “reasonable time.”<sup>191</sup> This question has not arisen in U.S. law.

In some ways this issue is less fraught in international law than it might be in national legal systems, where values such as administrative compliance with statute law are given priority. It is well settled that the provisions of municipal law may not be interposed as an excuse for failure to comply with international law.<sup>192</sup> This suggests that the compliance or non-compliance with municipal law of an administrative act that gave rise to expectations should not be determinative of the degree of protection, if any, those expectations will receive in international law. MTD reflects this approach. In MTD, the investors’ expectations based on government approval of a Project that turned out to contravene aspects of national urban policy<sup>193</sup> were given protection via the obligation of fair and equitable treatment despite their clear incompatibility with national law. Moreover, it might be more difficult for a foreign investor to evaluate the legality in domestic law of an administrative act directed at him. Nevertheless, it is undeniable that an international legal rule that protects expectations based on unlawful acts which might not be protected by national legal principles relating to legitimate expectations is likely to be controversial. A reasonable position might be that ultra vires acts, while they may give rise to legitimate expectations, will do so less readily than would lawful acts. This might be reflected in consideration of whether the expectations are reasonable (see the next sub-section) or in the balancing test discussed as the third step of the legitimate expectations analysis (sub-section 3 below).

2. What Makes “Certain” Expectations Legitimate and Others Illegitimate?

(a) Reasonableness

Legitimate expectations must be reasonable, both objectively and subjectively.

National legal systems are agreed in protecting only “reasonable” expectations. This analysis typically has both an objective and a subjective aspect. From an objective standpoint, the ECJ considers whether the alleged expectation is that of a diligent or prudent person,<sup>194</sup> which is a fairly strict standard.<sup>195</sup> Evidence that an expectation is subjectively unreasonable, in that for example it conflicted with other knowledge the individual had about the administration’s intentions,<sup>196</sup> will defeat a claim that a legitimate expectation was created.<sup>197</sup> Failure to satisfy conditions imposed by the decision in question<sup>198</sup> or by the statutory framework<sup>199</sup> will make an expectation that the decision will remain in force illegitimate because, without more, it is not reasonable to expect that non-fulfillment of those conditions will be excused. Another factor is whether revocation is explicitly permitted by statute or regulation—in such case, an expectation that the act would remain in force is unlikely to be reasonable.<sup>200</sup> Similarly, knowing failure to follow a prescribed procedure for obtaining an assurance will prevent the formation of a reasonable expectation.<sup>201</sup> U.S. case law suggests that it will generally not be reasonable to expect that something which has already been the subject of legislative attention, in the form of an existing statutory regime, will not again make its way onto the legislative agenda.<sup>202</sup> Accordingly, an expectation that the law will require or allow something tomorrow based on nothing more than the fact that it was required or allowed today is generally not reasonable.

The good faith of the person claiming the expectation is also central to the inquiry. Administrative acts procured by deception and fraud will not give rise to legitimate expectations.<sup>203</sup> Nor will decisions that rest “upon wrong or incomplete information from the persons concerned.”<sup>204</sup> Failure to place “all cards face up on the table” and disclose all relevant circumstances will render a purported expectation illegitimate.<sup>205</sup> If the governmental act on which the expectation was based was procured through deception, duress or bribery, on the basis of substantially incorrect or incomplete information, was known to be unlawful, or it was wanton negligence not to know that it was unlawful, there is no legitimate expectation to protect.<sup>206</sup> And in general “[t]he courts will not readily infer a legitimate expectation where it would confer an unmerited or improper benefit which offended against considerations of fairness and justice.”<sup>207</sup>

Awards in which investors’ expectations have been protected have not always emphasized that those expectation were reasonable in the circumstances, but they are nevertheless broadly consistent with such a requirement. Tecmed considers this at length.<sup>208</sup> But the MTD Tribunal treated the issue of “[w]hether the Claimants acted responsibly or diligently” as a separate question of contributory fault,<sup>209</sup> and OEPC does not consider the reasonableness of the investor's expectations in terms. Awards in which legitimate expectations were not identified generally do not address the issue of "reasonableness" in terms either, although in GAMI, Nagel and Thunderbird the Tribunals emphasized circumstances that would have made any expectations unreasonable. In GAMI, the government conduct in question was too uncertain to support an expectation of particular government conduct.<sup>210</sup> In Nagel the investor, having obtained no guarantees or a "binding commitment" from the government, could not reasonably have had such an expectation.<sup>211</sup> And the Thunderbird Tribunal detailed at length the circumstances that would have made any expectation of being able to engage in the gambling business in Mexico unreasonable:

It cannot be disputed that Thunderbird knew when it chose to invest in gaming activities in Mexico that gambling was an illegal activity under Mexican law. By Thunderbird's own admission, it also knew that operators of similar machines... had encountered legal resistance from [the regulators]. Hence, Thunderbird must be deemed to have been aware of the potential risk of closure of its own gaming facilities and it should have exercised particular caution in pursuing its business venture in Mexico.<sup>212</sup>

As for the good faith of the investor, it is here that the Thunderbird majority and separate opinion disagree. The majority of the Tribunal, finding that the investor's request to the government for an advisory opinion was "not a proper disclosure and that it puts the reader on the wrong track"<sup>213</sup> and "did not give the full picture, even for an informed reader"<sup>214</sup> also found that the government's advice to the investor based on that disclosure did not give rise to legitimate expectations.

The subjective and objective reasonableness and the good faith of the individual asserting that an expectation deserves protection are just, reasonable, and useful yardsticks for evaluating the legitimacy of any claimed expectation in international law.

There is some suggestion in national law that detrimental reliance is a necessary or at least a usual component of a legitimate expectation. German law recognizes that an expectation is “legitimate” or “worthy of protection if the beneficiary [of the act in question] has used up the benefit granted or has made arrangements in connection with it such as can no longer be rescinded or can be rescinded only at unacceptable cost.”<sup>215</sup> Similarly, U.S. courts have emphasized that reliance justifies the protection of certain expectations as property: “It is the purpose of the ancient institution of property to protect those claims upon which people rely in their daily lives, reliance that must not be arbitrarily undermined.”<sup>216</sup> And in the Takings Clause context U.S. courts generally only protect “investment-backed expectations,” which suggests reliance.<sup>217</sup> English law goes further and normally requires detrimental reliance to establish a legitimate expectation.<sup>218</sup> The policy in back of this requirement is that “if the individual has suffered no hardship there is no reason based on legal certainty to hold the agency to its representation.”<sup>219</sup> But neither French nor European law requires reliance to establish a legitimate expectation.<sup>220</sup>

Detrimental reliance has not featured as a decisive component of the analysis of legitimate expectations in recent investment awards, although in most, if not all of those cases, the investor will have been able to point to investment (or further or continued investment) in the host State at a point later in time than the government conduct said to give rise to a legitimate expectation. Reliance is mentioned as a possible factor weighing in favor of finding a denial of fair and equitable treatment in GAMI,<sup>221</sup> although the GAMI Tribunal did not find legitimate expectation to have been created. Moreover, the investor in MTD emphasized that it had “irrevocably committed” to the Project when the Government changed its policy,<sup>222</sup> though this fact was not stressed by the Tribunal. The description of the legitimate expectations principle in the Thunderbird Separate Opinion seems to take for granted that reliance is the sine qua non of a legitimate expectations claim.<sup>223</sup>

It has been convincingly argued that detrimental reliance should not be required on grounds that even in cases where there is no reliance “[c]onsistency of treatment and equality are at stake, and these values should be protected irrespective of whether there has been any reliance as such.”<sup>224</sup> Others argue that requiring reliance “may induce individuals to incur expenses, which in turn makes it more difficult to reach a solution if an authority seeks to revoke or modify an inappropriate decision with the consent of the affected parties.”<sup>225</sup> These arguments have persuasive force, but are perhaps of less relevance in the investment treaty context. Accordingly it is submitted that the proper approach to the significance of reliance in establishing legitimate expectations in international law is that reliance tends to confirm that an expectation is legitimate, but should not strictly be required to establish a legitimate expectation.

3. What Would Constitute “Compelling Reasons” for Not Providing Protection?

In each of the legal systems being studied here, the answer to this question turns on an explicit or an implicit balancing test that weighs the public interest served by the action that disappoints legitimate expectations against the individual’s interest in the fulfillment of his expectations. For example, the English courts have noted that whether expectations are to be protected is “a function of expectations induced by government and of policy considerations which militate against their fulfillment.”<sup>226</sup> Thus, after expectations have been identified, the English courts typically go on to consider whether overriding considerations of public interest nevertheless require those expectations to be disappointed.<sup>227</sup> In French, German, and European law a balancing test plays the most explicit role in cases involving unlawful administrative acts. The courts in these systems will allow the withdrawal or revocation of unlawful administrative acts only after the public's interest in administrative action complying with the law is weighed against the individual's interest in having the decision upheld.<sup>228</sup>

Legal systems differ on the stringency of what an American lawyer might call the “level of scrutiny” represented by this balancing test. In the Due Process context U.S. courts look for “a legitimate legislative purpose furthered by rational means,”<sup>229</sup> and they seek “rough proportionality” between means and ends in Takings Clause cases,<sup>230</sup> neither of which is particularly searching review. By contrast, German courts look for “serious infringement” of the public interest or “a direct threat to the State, the public or important community interests,” concepts that are restrictively construed.<sup>231</sup> The English approach occupies something like the middle ground between these two:

The balance must in the first instance be for the policy-maker to strike; but if the outcome is challenged by way of judicial review, I do not consider that the court's criterion is the bare rationality of the policy-maker's conclusion. While policy is for the policy-maker alone, the fairness of his or her decision not to accommodate reasonable expectations which the policy will thwart remains the court's concern (as of course does the lawfulness of the policy). To postulate this is not to place the judge in the seat of the minister. As the foregoing citations explain, it is the court's task to recognize the constitutional importance of ministerial freedom to formulate and to reformulate policy; but it is equally the court's duty to protect the interests of those individuals whose expectations of different treatment has a legitimacy which in fairness outtops the policy choice which threatens to frustrate it.<sup>232</sup>

And in respect of European law see Schwarze, supra note 103, at 991–94 (stressing that revocation or withdrawal of unlawful administrative measures “must involve a weighing up of the interests in question, as required under the German and Netherlands systems”).

This comparison suggests that legitimate expectations, particularly those based on an unlawful administrative act, may not be entitled to protection when the public interest served by the act that disappoints the expectations outweighs the individual interest in having his expectations met.

Of the investment cases being considered here, those which did not identify legitimate expectations (GAMI, Nagel, ADF, Waste Management II and Thunderbird) of course had no occasion to consider the issue. Among those in which legitimate expectations were protected, Tecmed includes such an explicit balancing test:

[T]he Arbitral Tribunal will consider... whether such measures are proportional to the public interest presumably protected thereby and to the protection legally granted to investments... . to determine whether such measures are reasonable with respect to their goals, the deprivation of economic rights and the legitimate expectations of who suffered such deprivation. There must be a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the charge or weight imposed to the foreign investor and the aim sought to be realized by any expropriatory measure.<sup>233</sup>

The Thunderbird Separate Opinion recognizes that such a balancing process is part of the legitimate expectations principle:

Such protection is, however, not un-conditional and ever-lasting. It leads to a balancing process between the needs for flexible public policy and the legitimate reliance on in particular investment backed expectations.<sup>234</sup>

Including a balancing test as part of the principle of protecting legitimate expectations in international law is entirely consistent with the function of this principle as a general principle of law to balance competing rights on a case-by-case basis. Moreover, the recent awards (with the possible exception of OEPC, referring as it does without qualification to “an obligation not to alter the legal and business environment in which the investment has been made”<sup>235</sup>) do not suggest that protection for investors' legitimate expectations should be absolute. Nor could an absolute protection be validated as a general principle of law. Accordingly, in evaluating legitimate expectations claims some weighing of the public interest said to countervail the investor's legitimate expectations is required.

The method by which this weighing is done in national law, and the way in which it was done in Tecmed, is to evaluate the "relationship of proportionality" between the investor's private expectations and the public interest. In striking this balance, it is submitted that something more searching than the bare rationality review conducted by U.S. courts under the Due Process Clauses is desirable: While a margin of appreciation for national decision makers is entirely appropriate,<sup>236</sup> this should not equate to abdication of the judicial function of protecting the interests of individuals detrimentally affected by changes in administrative policy or decisions and evaluating the fairness of those administrative decisions. In other words, the fact that some "public interest" is said to be served by a challenged measure should not be determinative of the outcome. Tribunals should evaluate whether that interest could equally be served by a measure that impinged less on legitimate expectations, and if so the legitimate expectation should be protected. International tribunals are by now practiced at the means-ends type evaluation that such review entails. For example, application of other provisions of investment treaties such as the guaranty of national treatment entails an evaluation of whether a State may have been able to achieve the legitimate non-discriminatory purposed offered as a justification for a challenged measure through other non-or less discriminatory means.<sup>237</sup> Review under such relative treatment standards is considerably more searching than is suggested by bare rationality review, and there is no reason to think this type of review would be less appropriate in the context of evaluating legitimate expectations.

4. What Does It Mean for "Expectations to Be Fulfilled"?

Protection for legitimate expectations can take essentially two forms: compensation or in-kind, injunctive or specific relief.

National legal systems approach this question of "remedy" in a couple of different ways. Some systems assign the remedy according to the nature of the act that gave rise to the expectations. Thus in German law, the form that protection for legitimate expectations takes generally depends on whether the government act that gave rise to the expectation was lawful or not: Protection for lawful acts that give rise to legitimate expectations generally entails their maintenance, while in the case of unlawful acts, “Article 48(3) VwVfG confers protection of legitimate expectations not by ensuring the maintenance of the measure, but by payment of compensation for material losses incurred.”<sup>238</sup> And in French law, legitimate expectations raised (or, in French nomenclature, vested rights created) by formal administrative decisions are protected by maintenance of the act in question, while expectations based on more informal administrative conduct like a representation are protected by compensation.<sup>239</sup>

In other systems, although there is in principle a choice of remedy, one or the other will practically predominate. Legitimate expectations are generally raised in the English courts in support of an application for a writ of certiorari to quash the measure said to be inconsistent with the expectations, and this was the remedy recommended by the Privy Council.<sup>240</sup> Legitimate expectations can also arise at the point of an application for leave to seek judicial review, where they form the sort of interest that justifies such review.<sup>241</sup> My research has revealed no English case in which legitimate expectations were the basis for a compensation claim, although commentators have raised the issue,<sup>242</sup> and “the negligent provision of false information by the administration may give rise to an obligation to pay compensation.”<sup>243</sup> In the United States, claims related to expectations are usually claims for injunctive relief, although it is possible that denial of substantive due process might give rise to a claim for damages,<sup>244</sup> and of course the “remedy” for a “taking” is just compensation.<sup>245</sup> There is interesting jurisprudence suggesting that in cases presenting claims under both the Takings and the Due Process Clauses, the due process analysis (typically giving rise to an injunctive remedy) should be undertaken before analyzing the taking and compensation question, which is to be evaluated only when the governmental action being challenged has been found otherwise to be permissible.<sup>246</sup> This question is not settled in U.S. law, but it does suggest that a range of remedial possibilities might be appropriate for different cases.

International law generally recognizes a similar range of remedial possibilities. As the classic statement on this point in the Chorzów Factory case indicates, either restitution or a compensatory remedy is appropriate:

[R]eparation [for breach of an international obligation] must, as far as possible, wipe out all the consequences of the illegal act and reestablish the situation which would, in all probability have existed if that act had not been committed. Restitution in kind, or, if this is not possible, payment of a sum corresponding to the value which a restitution in kind would bear; the award, if need be, of damages for loss sustained which would not be covered by restitution in kind or payment in place of it; such are the principles which should serve to determine the amount of compensation due for an act contrary to international law.<sup>247</sup>

The priority expressed in this judgment might suggest that restitution in kind is the “normal sanction” for breach of an international legal obligation,<sup>248</sup> and that is the priority expressed in the International Law Commission’s 2001 Draft Articles on State Responsibility.<sup>249</sup> But it is a commonplace that compensation is by far the more frequent remedy. Indeed the ILC recognized that restitution may not be practicable or desirable,<sup>250</sup> that in fact it may be “wholly disproportionate” in a particular case,<sup>251</sup> and that in such a case compensation is to be preferred.<sup>252</sup>

With respect to how international law should protect legitimate expectations a similar choice presents itself: Expectations might be protected by either a restitutionary, in-kind remedy such as an order to maintain or restore the act upon which the expectations were based, at least with respect to the individual to whom it was addressed (referred to as “juridical restitution”)<sup>253</sup> or by compensation for any damages caused when that act is rescinded or modified.

An analogy to the law on State contracts, and in particular to so-called “stabilization clauses” or promises not to change relevant provisions of national law, suggests that an expectation that law or regulation will not be changed should normally be protected, if at all, by compensation rather than by a restitutionary, injunctive, or in-kind remedy. Although one well-known case involving the stabilization of a State contract found that restitution was the appropriate remedy for breach,<sup>254</sup> the weight of arbitral authority and authoritative State practice favors compensation. It has been said in this context that all the State has normally bargained for is an obligation to indemnify the other contracting party if the law changes.<sup>255</sup> The enforcement of in-kind remedies has often been seen as too intrusive or insufficiently respectful of sovereignty. So, as the tribunal ruled in Government of Kuwait v. Aminoil, although a specifically enforceable commitment not to change the law is “juridically possible,” it will not be lightly inferred, and compensation will be the usual remedy for breach of a clause purporting to “stabilize” the legal regime.<sup>256</sup> It is hard to imagine that a claim based on legitimate expectations should be protected more robustly, or by a remedy that impinges more directly on sovereignty, than would a claim based on an explicit contract term.

Compensation is also the more usual remedy in those recent investment awards in which legitimate expectations were identified and protected (Tecmed, MTD, and OEPC), however, they do not exclude the possibility of a restitutionary award. In Tecmed and MTD, compensation was the remedy prayed for by the investor. Indeed, although the investor in Tecmed claimed restitution in kind as a “subsidiary” or alternative remedy, it primarily sought monetary damages and considered restitution in kind—extension of the operating permit to allow operations at the landfill to resume—“absolutely impossible”; the Tribunal agreed.<sup>257</sup> The OEPC case is interesting in that the investor sought the in-kind remedy of declarations that it was entitled to certain refunds of tax paid and that the State should effect the refunds. The OEPC Tribunal awarded these declarations and also awarded the amount of the outstanding refunds “as compensation due to the investor because of the breach of its rights under the Treaty,”<sup>258</sup> including the denial of fair and equitable treatment that resulted from the State’s failure to protect the investor’s reasonable expectations. Accordingly, the most appropriate form of protection for legitimate expectations, if any is to be afforded, is likely to be compensation.

V. THE “APPROPRIATENESS” OF PROTECTING INVESTORS’ LEGITIMATE EXPECTATIONS

It will be recalled from the methodological discussion in Part II that before even a universally accepted principle is received in international law, one must evaluate its “appropriateness” for the international legal order. Key considerations are whether such a principle seems calculated to do justice between investors and host States and whether there is logical and practical necessity for such a principle in this context.

1. Will Protection for Legitimate Expectations Do Justice?

Even having narrowed the scope of the analysis to one general factual context, it remains difficult to evaluate in the abstract whether a principle like protection for legitimate expectations will do justice. As the example of the South West Africa cases illustrates, reasonable people can differ on whether a principle serves the ends of justice in a particular case. Moreover, any absolute conclusions about “justice” depend on selection from among contending subjective conceptions of justice, which lies well outside the scope of this article.

Nevertheless, one measure of whether a principle is just is whether it seems to be even-handed as between the two parties to which it would be applied, something on which it is possible to reach tentative conclusions. One indicator that the principle of protection for legitimate expectations is or can be even-handed is that, in those systems that recognize the doctrine, legitimate expectations cannot be said to have worked a dramatic shift in favor of private or individual over public or general interests. In the U.S. and ECHR jurisprudence, in particular, claimants have rarely satisfied the courts that they had expectations worth protecting or sufficient to support a claim for compensation.<sup>259</sup> In the context of regulated industries especially, it has been difficult to establish that regulatory changes were not expected.<sup>260</sup> The investment awards that discuss legitimate expectations more often have found that such expectations were not created (ADF, GAMI, Nagel, Waste Management II and Thunderbird) than that they were to be protected (Tecmed, MTD, OEPC and Thunderbird Separate Opinion), which provides some anecdotal support for the view that protection for legitimate expectations will not unduly favor investors.

Moreover, a number of features of the principle of protection for investors' legitimate expectations detailed in this article can provide additional assurance of balanced application. The protection would be predicated on specific, unambiguous, and individualized governmental conduct. The protection would not apply to expectations unreasonably held or those not held in good faith. Moreover, the principle of protection for legitimate expectations explicated here would positively require tribunals to balance the investor's private interests with the public interests advanced by the State. And while European systems have been more willing to identify legitimate expectations than have U.S. courts, only very infrequently in any of these systems have claims based on those expectations survived the balancing test. This suggests that continued application of a principle of protecting investors' legitimate expectations is unlikely to be a development that dramatically or automatically shifts the advantage to investors in international investment disputes, but instead that the principle can be said to be even-handed as between investors and States, which is a fair proxy for determining whether the principle can be justly applied. That being said, the suggestion that the principle of protecting legitimate expectations should be applied in a way that explicitly favors investors, which seems to be the purport of the Thunderbird Separate Opinion,<sup>261</sup> demonstrates that whether in fact this principle can be said to be even-handed will depend on how this balance is struck and how the range of detailed issues outlined in Part IV above are resolved. Any final view on whether this principle can be said to do justice between host States and investors must therefore await further development in the case law.

2. Logical and Practical Necessity

The discussion in Part II showed that one measure of the logical and practical necessity of recognizing a particular principle as a general principle of law is whether that principle usefully assists the resolution of disputes, in particular by filling a gap or resolving an overlap between different norms. That “legitimate expectations” have been invoked in so many different contexts in investment disputes—as an aspect of fair and equitable treatment, under the umbrella clause, as part of a regulatory expropriation analysis, and even in connection with the definition of “investment”—would tend to suggest the utility of this principle. Moreover, as Tecmed illustrates more substantively, there is ample scope for a general principle of protecting investors’ legitimate expectations to perform its gap-filling and overlap-resolving work in the law of foreign investment.

Such a principle could “fill a gap” in the way legitimate expectations did in Tecmed and other cases by giving content to the standard of “fair and equitable treatment.” While reference to fair and equitable treatment is common in bilateral and multilateral investment instruments, the terms “fair” and “equitable” are not further defined,<sup>262</sup> such that “the precise meaning of the fair and equitable concept is still, to some extent, a matter of conjecture.”<sup>263</sup> Accordingly, what is “fair and equitable” might be seen as a question to which sources of positive law do not provide an answer, one of the areas in which a general principle is designed to function. A general principle derived by the methodology set forth above, that is, drawn from the national laws of States reflecting diverse jurisprudential traditions, is a consensus foundation for what otherwise could be a troublingly subjective process of determining what is “fair” or “equitable.”<sup>264</sup> Moreover, it is a small step from accepting a general principle of law as guidance on standards of procedural fairness that are not specified by treaty or norm-creating State practice<sup>265</sup> to accepting that a general principle such as the protection of legitimate expectations might give content to vague or unarticulated standards of substantive fairness. Accordingly, giving content to the notions of “fair” and “equitable” treatment would seem to be a problem tailor-made for the deployment of a general principle of protection for investors’ legitimate expectations.

The principle of protecting investors’ legitimate expectations could also play a role in resolving an overlap that persistently bedevils the law of investor-State relations: the endemic conflict in regulatory expropriation cases between the State’s sovereign regulatory or “police powers” prerogative and an investor’s right to be compensated when regulatory measures have the effect of expropriating its investment. As Tecmed acknowledged, two basic rules govern the resolution of regulatory expropriation claims: (i) “A state is responsible as for an expropriation of property... when it subjects alien property to taxation, regulation, or other action that is confiscatory, or that prevents, unreasonably interferes with, or unduly delays, effective enjoyment of an alien’s property or its removal from the state’s territory”<sup>266</sup>; but at the same time (subject to qualifications not relevant here) (ii) “[A] state is not responsible for loss of property or for other economic disadvantage resulting from bona fide general taxation, regulation, forfeiture for crime, or other action of the kind that is commonly accepted as within the police power of states.”<sup>267</sup> The first rule implies, on the one hand, that some regulatory measures give rise to an obligation of compensation, while the second indicates, on the other hand, that some exercises of a State's "police powers" or regulatory authority are privileged, immune from the requirement of compensation altogether. The interplay of these rules is particularly incoherent because the question of degree or substantiality of impact has been described as the touchstone of determining whether regulation "goes too far" and becomes expropriation,<sup>268</sup> a sliding-scale approach that might make sense of the first basic rule, but makes a nonsense of the second. There is an evident need for a principle of reconciliation, and, as Tecmed illustrated, the principle of protecting investors' legitimate expectations can perform that function by seeking "a reasonable relationship of proportionality" between the individual rights protected by rules of de facto expropriation and the collective interests served by privileged exercises of the police power.

CONCLUSION

This article argues for the recognition of a general principle of law that the legitimate expectations of investors should be protected. It attempts to delineate, on the basis of the methodology for identifying a general principle of law, what might be the contours of such a principle. Central to this analysis is a comparative survey of the protection afforded individual expectations in the national law of a number of countries from different public law traditions and the European Union. This survey, taken together with the recent investment awards that have invoked investors' legitimate expectations, suggests that, pursuant to a general principle of law:

1. Legitimate expectations can arise as a result of overt government conduct that, while it could take various forms, is specific and unambiguous and beneficial to the individual to whom it is directed. Legitimate expectations will not normally and certainly not easily be based upon legislation or legislative-type regulations addressed generally, but will derive from targeted and individualized government conduct. In other words, recognizing a general principle of protection for legitimate expectations will not automatically allow individuals to insist upon the maintenance of existing legal or regulatory regimes. The fact that an act that gave rise to an expectation is unlawful as a matter of national law will not be fatal to a claim of protection for legitimate expectations, although that fact may weigh against providing the requested protection.

2. Only expectations that are subjectively and objectively reasonable, in the light of substantive or procedural conditions imposed by the administration and the individual's knowledge and good faith, will be legitimate. One factor reducing the reasonableness of an expectation may be the fact that the expectation relates to an area or industry that is already heavily regulated. Detrimental reliance on the administrative act said to give rise to the expectation may help establish the legitimacy of the expectation, but should not be required in every case.

3. Even expectations that are identified as legitimate may not be protected if a plausible public interest actually furthered by the challenged measure outweighs the individual's interest in fulfillment of his expectations. This will depend upon a case-by-case evaluation of whether the public interest may be achieved by means that do not disappoint legitimate expectations. And though national administrative authorities will be given a margin of appreciation, international tribunals should not be overly deferential to national authorities when evaluating the fairness and proportionality of administrative decisions that disappoint legitimate expectations.

4. While in theory legitimate expectations could be protected by a flexible menu of remedies, including orders to maintain in force the administrative act on which legitimate expectations are based or temporary or permanent exemption from compliance with administrative measures inconsistent with legitimate expectations, compensation for damages caused by the disappointment of legitimate expectations will more often be the appropriate remedy.

The recognition of such a principle of protection for investor's legitimate expectations would seem to be a useful and appropriate development in the law governing investor-State relations. The principle of protecting legitimate expectations responds to the instinctive sympathy of tribunals for investors' reliance on particularized communications and assurances from the State, which might have induced investment or expectations about the future regulatory and legal landscape in which investment would take place. At the same time, though, it disciplines those instincts. A rigorous application of the principle along the lines set forth in this article would ground applications of open-ended treaty standards such as "fair and equitable treatment" in shared conceptions of fairness and equity. It would subject a claim of reasonable reliance to thorough scrutiny, and it would accommodate both investors' rights and sovereign prerogatives in an explicit balancing test. In contexts such as regulatory expropriation, where all too often phrases like “police power” or “taking,” obscure rather than illuminate the resolution of investment disputes,<sup>269</sup> the principle of protecting legitimate expectations as explicated here might discourage tribunals from simply asserting investors’ rights or sovereign prerogative or picking between them with no explanation. It is thus submitted that recognition of the principle of protection for legitimate expectations could facilitate the transparent and (more) predictable consideration of the abstractions and normative compromises inherent in the resolution of investment disputes and thus it should be welcomed as a development of the international law governing investor-State relations.

These criteria also apply to some extent to arbitral tribunals and other decision-making bodies but in the case of a court they must all be present.

In its judgment in the North Sea Continental Shelf case, the International Court of Justice presupposed the existence of a concept of what constitutes a court in saying: "Whatever the legal reasoning of a court of justice, its decisions must by definition be just, and therefore in that sense equitable."<sup>28</sup> The same Court had a similar a priori concept of an international tribunal and, without giving specific reasons, characterised the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation as "an international tribunal".<sup>29</sup>

1 (3). Principles to Be Applied to International Legal Relations (e.g. Good Faith, Estoppel, Proportionality, "Legal Notions")

Let us now take a look at some of the other principles applying to legal relations amongst the member States of the international community. Unlike the principles just discussed, these are not substantive or procedural rules but operate so as to regulate the conduct of all kinds of relations between subjects of the law.

(a) The most important of these is the principle that legal relations are to be conducted in good faith. This applies not only to the actual performance of legal obligations properly undertaken but also to any other part of legal relations such as the earliest stages of negotiations and, indeed, to any conduct to which legal significance could reasonably be attached by other subjects of international law. To illustrate this last point, I would refer to the earlier discussion on the question of the conduct of State representatives in dealing with the representatives of other States.<sup>30</sup>

It is quite clear that to act in good faith is as important in the international community as it is in municipal law and this requires no great elaboration. But it might be useful to illustrate the point with a few examples rather than to talk in abstract terms and I should like to deal with two cases, both taken from the Second World War:

The first case was decided in 1959 by the Italian-United States Conciliation Commission. Article 78, paragraph 9 a, subparagraph 2, of the Italian Peace Treaty of 1947 refers to legislation "in force" in Italy. The question was whether this included legislation of the so-called Italian Social Republic of the former dictator Mussolini which, in the

Separate OpinionIn the Arbitration under Chapter XI of the NAFTA and the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules: Thunderbird ./ Mexico1) Summary

1. I concur with my colleagues on several significant issues of the case:

- The questions of jurisdiction, admissibility, control and waivers;
- the rejection of the expropriation (NAFTA Art. 1110) claim;
- the rejection of the “denial of administrative justice” claim;
- the rejection of the NAFTA governments’ position that pursuant to Article 1102 Claimant needs to prove that the government had a direct intention to harm the foreign investor because it is foreign is required for Art. 1102 and needs to be proven by claimant;
- the general view that the principle of legitimate expectation forms part, i.e. a subcategory, of the duty to afford fair and equitable treatment under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA. We also seem to concur on the general conditions for this claim – an expectation of the investor to be caused by and attributed to the government, backed-up by investment relying on such expectation, requiring the legitimacy of the expectation in terms of the competency of the officials responsible for it and the procedure for issuing it and the reasonableness of the investor in relying on the expectation. I do, however, not concur with the application of this standard to the specific factual situation in light of the purpose, specific content and precedents of the legitimate expectations standard as it should be applied under investment protection treaties based on recent relevant jurisprudence.

2. I have found the rejection of the national treatment (non-discrimination) under Art. 1102 more difficult. Guardia, Thunderbird’s competitor with comparable operations, continued to operate through success with procedural appeals (“amparos”) before Mexican courts and through the lesser success of SEGOB in enforcing against him as compared to its – most effective – enforcement against Thunderbird. He was the domestic investor that was the “most comparable” and “best treated” by the integral Mexican (administrative and judicial) system. That creates a presumption of discrimination which Mexico has to rebut by showing and proving “legitimate reasons” for such distinct, but more favourable treatment. But I have in the end accepted the view of my colleagues denying a breach of Art. 1102. However, I have been able to identify “discriminatory elements” in the greater energy, focus and effectiveness of the enforcement activities by the SEGOB against Thunderbird – which had arranged (or at least tried to arrange) a clearance of its activities as compared to the main and most successful Mexican competitor, Mr Guardia (who had always taken a non-cooperative approach. But I have not come in the particular circumstances to the conclusion that the much more favourable position enjoyed by Guardia in terms of de-facto practice and effectiveness of enforcement created a corresponding right for Thunderbird under Art. 1102 to continue its gam(bl)ing operations or to receive an equivalent amount of damages. I have been able to solve this dilemma by taking into account such “discriminatory elements” in the enforcement of the Mexican gambling law in the context of the balancing that is, in my view, required between legitimate expectations of a foreign investor and an equally legitimate public interest in preserving a large “regulatory space” in particular in the field of gambling regulation under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA.

3. I will discuss in this separate opinion both the normative scope and contours of the legitimate expectation concept as it should be construed under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA and their significance in the particular factual context. The facts that emerged in this arbitration and on its record provide, as always, not a complete picture of the events. But what has emerged can only be assessed, including through presumptions and other rules of evidence, on the basis of the particular features of the legitimate expectations concept<sup>1</sup>. Since the arbitration has, as often or always, not elucidated all relevant facts, one needs to rely on standard practice of rules of evidence, burden of proof and presumptions to determine when the claimant and when the respondent has to bear the respective burden. In addition, as recently explained again by the Methanex v US award, what is unknown but relevant has to be dealt with by inference, i.e. by taking the “dots” that are available, drawing explanatory lines between them<sup>2</sup> and then determine what explanation can be inferred by relying on burden of proof allocation, prima facie evidence and arbitral determination of the evidence. They need to be assessed not only from the lofty spheres of commercial arbitration law, but also with a real-life understanding of the “coal-face” of foreign investment practices.

4. My disagreement is based on a different weight which needs to be accorded to this principle in the particular context of an investment promotion and protection treaty which protects interests different from those involved in an ordinary commercial relationship involving two equal private parties. Commercial arbitration is a suitable mechanism for resolving the disputes of equal parties on equal footing and without need for the purpose of taking into account the position of the weaker party; nor is there any policy purpose underlying commercial arbitration – such as to protect and promote investment, enhance transparency and the “rule of law”, create employment or enhance trade opportunities. In commercial arbitration, rules including the caveat emptor and due diligence principle are deeply ingrained in the culture, approaches and principles applied consciously or subconsciously by the tribunals. By contrast, international investment law is aimed at promoting foreign investment by providing effective protection to foreign investors exposed to the political and regulatory risk of a foreign country in a situation of relative weakness<sup>3</sup>. The main principles underlying the NAFTA (preamble, Art. 102) as developed in the most recent and authoritative jurisprudence by arbitral tribunals require that in case of doubt, the risk of ambiguity of a governmental assurance is allocated rather to the government than to a foreign investor and that the government is held to high standards of transparency and responsibility for the clarity and consistency in its interaction with foreign investors. If official communications cause, visibly and clearly, confusion or misunderstanding with the foreign investor, then the government is responsible for pro-actively clarifying its position. The government can not rely on its own ambiguous communications, which the foreign investor could and did justifiably rely on, in order to later retract and reverse them– in particular in change of government situations

5. Investors need to rely on the stability, clarity and predictability of the government's regulatory and administrative messages as they appear to the investor when conveyed – and without escape from such commitments by ambiguity and obfuscation inserted into the commitment identified subsequently and with hindsight. This applies not less, but more with respect to smaller, entrepreneurial investors who tend to be inexperienced but provide the entrepreneurial impetus for increased trade in services and investment which NAFTA aims to encourage. Taking into account the nature of the investor is not formulation of a different standard, but of adjusting the application of the standard to the particular facts of a specific situation.

6. It is with these principles in mind that I have come to assess the – never absolutely clear and straightforward – factual background of the case and the presumptions and burden of legal justification and proof differently from my colleagues. They rather see the glass of the investor half empty, I rather see it half full. They imply a very high level of due diligence, of knowledge of local conditions and of government risk to be taken by the investor. I rather see the government as responsible for providing a clear message and of sticking to the message once given and as reasonably understood by the investor. They view the investor as having a duty to be close to perfect in its dealings with the government, I consider the government to have a duty to be transparent and consistent, and as responsible for the message conveyed: i.e. how such conduct was reasonably understood by the investor. They interpret the “Oficio” on its face value; I suggest it should be construed in light of its context, history and the objectively identifiable common intentions of both parties and as it was – reasonably – understood by the recipient, i.e. Thunderbird. They attach no importance to the combination of an official comfort letter followed by acceptance by the chief regulator of the investor’s operation to the end of the term of the government’s term; I view the governments accepting conduct subsequent to the comfort letter as reinforcing and clarifying the investor’s understanding of the key message conveyed by the comfort letter. My colleagues see no discrimination whatsoever in the fact that the chief Mexican competitor goes on providing the same type of services the claimant offered while claimant loses all appeals and gets shut down; I see here by way of inference, presumption and burden of proof on the government discriminatory elements of enforcement which reinforce the government’s obligation to respect the messages the comfort letter and the subsequent accepting conduct have reasonably conveyed to the investor.

7. I would have come to a quite modest obligation of the government of Mexico to pay a part of those investment expenditures assumed by Thunderbird to the extent such costs can be reasonably and directly related to reliance of Thunderbird on positive assurances and accepting conduct by the competent Mexican authorities. I therefore find the claimant's argument and evidence on detrimental reliance more persuasive, but I then find the respondent's argument on compensation more convincing; in effect, my compensation assessment would have been at less than 0.5 % of the compensation claimed.

8. I also do not concur with the tribunal's decision to deviate from established practice not to allocate attorney costs to the losing investor claimant. In my view, such a deviation would have required an in-depth and extensively reasoned justification.

2.) Main Principles underlying the Application of the "Investment Disciplines" in Chapter XI of the NAFTA to the Thunderbird – Mexico dispute

9. It is likely to lead to highly divergent outcomes if the key NAFTA disciplines at issue here – 1102, 1105 and 1110 – are not applied with a common understanding of the pertinent principles of legal interpretation and application to a specific factual situation. Let me therefore highlight the key principles and methodological approaches I consider most relevant to define for the interpretation and application to the factual situation, the relevant "context" and "purpose" of these principles:
10. First, the applicable law is – Art. 1131 – "this Agreement" (i.e. the whole NAFTA, not just Chapter XI) and "applicable rules of international law", guided by the authoritative article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties ("Vienna Convention") where the elements of "good faith", "ordinary meaning", "context" and "object and purpose" are the main principles of treaty interpretation. These principles – plus the Vienna Convention's reference to "subsequent conduct" – should also guide the interpretation of the crucial "Oficio" of August 2000.

11. The Preamble of NAFTA emphasises as authoritative interpretation guidelines, namely the need for “clear rules”, “predictable commercial framework for business planning and investment”, “promotion of trade in.. services” and “creation of new employment opportunities”.

Art. 102 NAFTA: Highlights the purpose to “facilitate cross-border movement of ..services”, transparency, promotion of fair competition, increasing substantially investment opportunities<sup>4</sup>;

Art. 1115: To assure “equal treatment among investors of the parties”

12. While the forms and procedures of international commercial arbitration are relied upon<sup>5</sup>, one needs, for the application of such rules, to bear in mind that their purpose is to govern the procedure, but not to inject substantive principles, rules and legal concepts used in international commercial arbitration into the qualitatively different investment disputes between a foreign investor and a host state. International commercial arbitration assumes roughly equal parties engaging in sophisticated transnational commercial transactions. Investment arbitration is fundamentally different from international commercial arbitration. It governs the situation of a foreign investor exposed to the sovereignty, the regulatory, administrative and other governmental powers of a state. The investor is frequently if not mostly in a position of structural weakness, exacerbated often by inexperience (in particular in the case of smaller, entrepreneurial investors). Investment arbitration therefore does not set up a system of resolving disputes between presumed equals as in commercial arbitration, but a system of protection of foreign investors that are by exposure to political risk, lack of familiarity with and integration into, an alien political, social, cultural, commercial, institutional and legal system, at a disadvantage. Legal principles for and methodological approaches to examining the factual situation, habits, natural instincts and styles from commercial arbitration are therefore no suitable guideposts for investment arbitration. The relevant legal texts and the factual situation at issue have therefore to be seen in the light of the close link between investment promotion – to get foreign businessmen to come with their capital and efforts into a new, alien and inherently difficult and high-risk situation – and investment protection, i.e. the protection against governmental risk offered by investment treaties to increase the attractiveness of the host state economy<sup>6</sup>.

<sup>4</sup> This interpretation method has been properly applied in the Metalclad v Mexico award; the contrary view of an enforcement court in Vancouver (suggesting that principles of the NAFTA outside Chapter XI should be ignored) has, rightly, not found any support.

13. Secondly, while public international law still provides the main principles (in particular Art. 31 of the Vienna Convention, which moreover is an expression of an international consensus on interpretative principles), one needs to bear in mind that investment treaties such as the NAFTA, deals with a significantly different context from the one envisaged by traditional public international law: At its heart lies the right of a private actor to engage in an arbitral litigation against a (foreign) government over governmental conduct affecting the investor. That is fundamentally different from traditional international public law, which is based on solving disputes between sovereign states and where private parties have no standing. Analogies from such inter-state international law have therefore to be treated with caution; more appropriate for investor-state arbitration are analogies with judicial review relating to governmental conduct – be it international judicial review (as carried out by the WTO dispute panels and Appellate Body, by the European- or Inter-American Human Rights Courts or the European Court of Justice) or national administrative courts judging the disputes of individual citizens' over alleged abuse by public bodies of their governmental powers<sup>7</sup>. In all those situations, at issue is the abuse of governmental power towards a private party that did and could legitimately trust in governmental assurances it received; in commercial arbitration on the other hand it is rather a good-faith interpretation of contractual provisions that is at stake. Abuse of governmental powers is not an issue in commercial arbitration, but it is at the core of the good-governance standards embodied in investment protection treaties. The issue is to keep a government from abusing its role as sovereign and regulator after having made commitments of a more formal character (contracts and licenses) or of a less formal character (i.e. the assurances by explicit communication or by meaningful conduct that form the basis of the legitimate expectations principle under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA).

14. The disappointment of legitimate expectations must be sufficiently serious and material. Otherwise, any minor misconduct by a public official could go to the jurisdiction of a treaty tribunal. Their function is not to act as a general-recourse administrative law tribunal. The introduction of direct investor-state arbitration (“arbitration without privity; “transnational arbitration”) since the late 1980, resulted in a “discontinuity” which is not as yet fully appreciated and requires attention in cases such as this one. In former times, investment treaties provided for an intergovernmental arbitration process only; governments therefore had to “sponsor” private claims. Such governmental sponsorship provided an important “filter” for screening claims and for avoiding that investment treaties were used for a multitude of claims that did not justify the machinery of an international treaty to come into play: The risk of opened “floodgates” and the spectre of treaty-based procedures for a single instance of misconduct<sup>8</sup> of an individual official. Modern treaties with direct investor-state arbitration rights no longer have such in-built “filters”. The construction of key legal terms must therefore provide sufficient filtering so that the treaty is only available to material, substantive and serious breaches and not for the every-day grievances arising from an individual's interaction with the machinery of government. Cases of administrative misconduct which are not serious enough, in terms of materiality of a breach, amount of damage or lack of instant remedy,<sup>9</sup> do not justify triggering the operation of the heavy and costly treaty machinery under Chapter XI.

15. Finally, I wish to highlight the need to pay attention and respect to the consolidating jurisprudence coalescing out of pertinent decisions of other authoritative arbitral tribunals, in particular the more recent decisions applying the NAFTA and international investment treaties which have a similar methodology, procedure and substantive content to NAFTA Chapter XI. While there is no formal rule of precedent in international law, such awards and their reasoning form part of an emerging international investment law jurisprudence<sup>10</sup>. This is again a significant difference from commercial arbitration where there is little authoritative and persuasive precedent, largely because the awards are exclusively formulated for the private parties and because they are generally not publicly available. Investment treaty tribunals should

Lawyer*, May 1999 at p. 217: "arbitral tribunals have a strong tendency to use precedents established by arbitral awards rendered in similar circumstances". This approach has to be a fortiori much stronger in public, transparent and public-policy involving investment arbitration than in commercial arbitration; Gaillard, La Jurisprudence du CIRDI, 2004, p. 8, 153; this does not prevent one tribunal disagreeing from another one, but it should preclude a tribunal from departing, without in-depth reasoning if at all, from an established jurisprudence ("jurisprudence constante"), see SGS v Philippines, at para. 97 (footnotes omitted) :

"In the Tribunal's view, although different tribunals constituted under the ICSID system should in general seek to act consistently with each other, in the end it must be for each tribunal to exercise its competence in accordance with the applicable law, which will by definition be different for each BIT and each Respondent State. Moreover there is no doctrine of precedent in international law, if by precedent is meant a rule of the binding effect of a single decision..... It must be initially for the control mechanisms provided for under the BIT and the ICSID Convention, and in the longer term for the development of a common legal opinion or jurisprudence constante, to resolve the difficult legal questions..".

therefore place themselves in the centre of emerging international investment law rather than at or beyond the margin:

“To place one decision in a long tradition of similar decisions give the entire tradition of consistency, an “integrity” that is a central feature of law as such”<sup>11</sup>.

16. While individual arbitral awards by themselves do not as yet constitute a binding precedent<sup>12</sup>, a consistent line of reasoning developing a principle and a particular interpretation of specific treaty obligations should be respected; if an authoritative jurisprudence evolves, it will acquire the character of customary international law and must be respected. A deviation from well and firmly established jurisprudence requires an extensively reasoned justification. This approach will help to avoid the wide divergences that characterise some investment arbitral awards – not subject to a common and unifying appeals’ authority. Otherwise, there is the risk of discrediting the health of the system of international investment arbitration which has been set up as one of the major new tools in improving good governance in the global economy<sup>13</sup>. But it also is also mandated by the reference to applicable rules of international Law (Art. 1131 NAFTA) and thereby Art. 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice: An increasingly continuous, uncontested and consistent modern arbitral jurisprudence is part of the authoritative source of international law embodied in “judicial decisions” (Art. 38 (1) (d)) and will develop, with an even greater legally binding effect, into “international custom (Art. 38 (1) (b)), in particular as an arbitral jurisprudence defines in a contemporary treaty and factual context the “general principles of law” (Art. 38 (1)(d)).

3.) Specific Approaches to the Factual Situation of the Thunderbird – Mexico Dispute

17. This case presents neither solely a legal or solely a factual issue, but a situation where the factual situation has to be closely scrutinised, but always with the view of the legal rules and principles that are applicable. The application of a legal rule to a factual situation always involves a certain feed-back between the way the legal rule is defined and the way the factual situation is viewed. The adjudicator's personal and cultural pre-understanding will inevitably play a role as much as competent professionals will try to minimise and make transparent such a pre-disposition.

18. At issue here is a foreign investment in gambling or, as industry advocates would now call it, "gaming". This industry has a bad press in many cultures and is not accepted in several religions, including as I understand Canon law, fundamentalist Protestant attitudes and Islamic law. The negative view towards gambling businesses may be the reason underlying the change in attitude that took place between the outgoing Mexican PRI and the incoming PAN government in 2001. It has also been relied upon by respondent in order to colour the case<sup>14</sup>. The former PRI government considered more extensive legalisation of gambling to create employment and re-attract Mexican demand for such services in Las Vegas; the latter seems to have been, to some extent, more closely attached to an attitude negative towards gambling. As far as this dispute is concerned, I have advocated a fully neutral and professional approach, without inherent bias for or against this particular industry. There has been no evidence in this dispute about any of the negative effects of gambling often alleged to accompany such entertainment services – crime, prostitution, money-laundering or similar undesirable by-products justifying an extra-rigorous approach. That liberalisation was in the relevant period under consideration in Mexico is also indicated by a study commissioned by the Mexican Congress on the implications of liberalisation<sup>15</sup> Under the WTO/GATS Schedules of Specific Commitments, certain countries have made specific commitments to liberalize gambling services, namely by offering non-discriminatory treatment to foreign gambling services establishing themselves on the domestic market; recent WTO panel and Appeals Body cases have treated gambling as any normal entertainment services industry as has the European Court of Justice<sup>16</sup>. This indicates that gambling services, in particular if not typically accompanied by criminal by-products, have to be treated as a fully legitimate investment.

19. There is therefore no general or compelling reason to approach gambling investment with a negative attitude compared to other types of investment. All evidence in this particular case points towards operations of computer-programmed slot machines with a "skill" stop button; they have a certain attraction and entertainment value for many people. But from the record of this case and from personal observation of such facilities one now finds throughout the world, it seems not possible to either win or lose large amounts of money in a normal period of time spent. Such video-arcades with gambling machines can not be compared to the high-stakes traditional casinos. None of the criticism of "high gambling" applies here: There is no suggestion of children left destitute because of fathers' gambling, of family assets dispersed, but a rather mundane activity of putting coins repeatedly into multi-coloured slot machines. As a result, Thunderbird's operation should be viewed and treated as a normal operation of entertainment services, without any in-built bias against them and in favour of governmental closure.

20. The same applies to the corruption hint insinuated by respondent in its submission on the "success fee" paid to Aspe & Arroyo, two of Thunderbird's lawyer-lobbyists, for negotiating the "oficio" of August 15, 2000. Such insinuations are now frequently employed by both claimant investors and respondent governments. They should be disregarded – explicitly and implicitly, except if properly and explicitly submitted to the tribunal, substantiated with a specific allegation of corruption and subject to proper legal and factual debate for the tribunal. That is simply the implication of the "fair hearing" principle. In contrast to, for example, the WTO dispute system and other international adjudicatory bodies, there is in current investment arbitration only one level of fact-finding. If a tribunal should be influenced by insinuations, there is no appeal instance (at present) in the NAFTA arbitral system which can correct a factual finding or assumption that has a bearing on the ultimate award. It is therefore particularly important for a tribunal not to get influenced, directly or indirectly, by "insinuations" meant to colour and influence the arbitrators' perception and activate a conscious or subconscious bias, but to make the decision purely on grounds that have been subject to a full and fair hearing by both parties. Cards should be placed, "face up", on the table rather than be waved around, with hints and suggestions. If the Mexican government had wanted to prove bribery it had the opportunity both to raise it and to try to prove it by providing its officials involved in the transaction for cross-examination; but it chose not to produce them.

Legitimate Expectations (Detrimental Reliance) under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA

21. At issue in dispute – and the main area where I disagree with my colleagues – is whether the conduct of the Government, i.e. SEGOB, the federal gambling directorate, has individually or in its aggregate, created a legitimate expectation for Thunderbird that it could carry out legally its business of computer-driven slot machines involving some measure of skill and human intervention. In this context, the government's duty to avoid ambiguity towards foreign investors, to send clear messages and to pro-actively correct any misperception manifestly created, to take into account the investor's need for predictability of government conduct and key attitudes is engaged, also its obligation to take its prior assurances into account when "closing" the facilities. It is not sufficient that Thunderbird had an "expectation", and that this expectation contributed in a significant way to its readiness to commit risk capital and effort, but the expectation must also have been "legitimate", i.e. it must have been created by government officials in an official way (i.e. attributable to the government of Mexico), they must have been competent (or at least appeared, credibly, to be competent) for the trust-inspiring action. The procedure for issuing the assurance ("comfort") letter must have been legitimate and it must have been "reasonable" for Thunderbird to rely on that letter<sup>17</sup>.

22. The following are the key distinct factors on which the determination of "legitimate expectation" under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA must rest:

- First: The letter "oficio" or "criterio" of August 2000, to be read in conjunction with the following: (i) the request ("solicitud") by claimant; (ii) the prior, prolonged, informal and preparatory discussions with the competent government officials who later commended the investor's "cooperative" approach in contrast to the Mexican competitors' confrontational approach and who

<sup>17</sup> An excellent overview, with particular emphasis on civil law systems in Spanish speaking countries such as Mexico, is Hector Mairal, La Doctrina de los propios actos y la administracion publica, Buenos Aires, 1994; on the requirement that the expectation must be reasonable, Mairal, p. 90, 91. On the requirement that the reliance be reasonable: D. Anderson, Compensation for interference with property, 6 EHLR (1999) 543-558, text at note 80 encouraged Thunderbird to pursue this cooperative approach; and (iii) the subsequent legal advice by its legal adviser in September 2000 (I do not concur with the majority's reasoning:

paras. 158-163);

- Second: The accepting conduct of SEGOB subsequent to the issuance of the "oficio" in August 2000 which did not raise any questions, did not require any further information, did not inspect or review the operations and which tolerated and did not interfere in Thunderbird's operation until a new (more anti-gambling minded) government and a new SEGOB director (on the uncontested facts available in the record more anti-Thunderbird-minded) came into office about six months later;
- Third: The conduct of SEGOB under its new director which targeted less the long-established slot machine operations at various locations of Mr Guardia, and certainly had no success (if there was a serious effort) in factually preventing them from operating but which targeted with priority and soonest after taking office Thunderbird's operation, though (or perhaps because) Thunderbird had gone the legal way and obtained an "interpretative assurance" which did give green light to Thunderbird, or at least seemed to them to give such green light. (The majority award – paras 174-179 – has no problem with both the relative enforcement intensity and its ultimate success against claimant but not against the Mexican competitor and does not deal with the question if the issuing of the "oficio" has anything to do with the later enforcement and closure)<sup>18</sup>.

23. It is in the combination of these three inter-related and consecutive measures of SEGOB – solicitud, oficio and subsequent conduct - that I find a breach of legitimate expectations under NAFTA Art. 1105 in contrast to the tribunal which finds the “Oficio” of August 2000 not clear enough and tainted by insufficient disclosure, attaches no significance to either the preparatory discussions of Thunderbird with SEGOB where a cooperative approach was encouraged, nor to the subsequent accepting toleration of Thunderbird’s slot machine operations for over six months and which finds no elements of discriminatory treatment in the enforcement intensity, focus and effectiveness of SEGOB as between Thunderbird (rapidly closed after the new government and then the new SEGOB director took office) and Guardia – who continues, it seems, to this day, winning injunctive relief (“amparo”) and maintaining at least several of his long-standing slot machine operations.

24. To understand my different application of the principle of “legitimate expectation” under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA to the factual situation it is necessary to understand its background and scope which is far from simple or un-ambiguous.

25. First the doctrinal structure: “Legitimate expectation” is not explicitly mentioned in Art. 1105 nor in other similar investment treaties. It is, however, considered to be part of the “good faith” principle which is a guiding principle (also a general principle of international law)<sup>19</sup> for applying the “fair and equitable treatment” standard in Art. 1105, a standard that is repeated, more or less identically, in most of the other over 2500 investment treaties in force at present<sup>20</sup>. In the current dispute both parties (and the tribunal) assume the existence of such a standard under Art. 1105<sup>21</sup>. They can, correctly, rely on the recognition of “good faith” principle – either as a separate obligation or, arguably mainly, as a major interpretative principle that is applied ancillary to a principal obligation (such as “fair and equitable treatment”)<sup>22</sup>. “Good faith” is explicitly mentioned in Art. 31 of the Vienna Convention<sup>23</sup>. This principle has been applied in intergovernmental relations to reinforce an obligation, to prevent a state to invoke formal law against a claim when it has caused the other state to rely on the way it would exercise rights, and to deny a legal argument to a state when its previous conduct indicated it would not rely on such argument<sup>24</sup>. To cite Derek Bowett in an authoritative statement<sup>25</sup>:

<sup>20</sup> A recent OECD study on the “fair and equitable standard” mentions “good faith” as a combination of elements: respect of basic expectations, transparency and lack of arbitrariness and quotes the Tecmed v Mexico case to illustrate this link, p. 37-39., - Working papers on international investment number: Fair and equitable treatment standard in international investment law September 2004. Older precedent and modern arbitral jurisprudence (Metalclad v Mexico; Tecmed v Mexico; MTD v Chile; Occidental v Ecuador) have not as yet been examined in this study. Legitimate Expectation has been employed as early as the Aminoil v Kuwait award; Amoco v. Iran – see I. Seidl-Hohenveldern L’Evaluation des dommages dans les arbitrages transnationaux, Annuaire Francais de Droit International, 1987

“Representations .. may be made expressly or impliedly where, upon a reasonable construction of a party’s conduct, the conduct presupposed a certain state of act to exist. Assuming that another party to whom the statement is made acts to its detriment in reliance upon that statement or from that statement the party making the statement secures some advantage, the principle of good faith requires that the party adhere to its statement whether it be true or not. It is possible to construe the estoppel as resting upon a responsibility incurred by the party making the statement for at p. 28 mainly, it appears, to correct an otherwise too formal legal approach; similar, in the Shufeldt award, a similar approach was used to hold the government to a commitment when the formal contract was not legally valid, but the government had tolerated the operations based on such commitment and had benefited from them by way of taxes and otherwise – as in this case.

having created an appearance of act, or as a necessary assumption of the risk of another party acting upon the statement”

26. But such international inter-state rules are difficult to apply in the context of a foreign investor’s reliance on host state assurances as to its law (i.e. a specific interpretation) or as to the way its authorities would proceed<sup>26</sup>. But what can be used from international, inter-state law is the concept that “good faith” and “legitimate expectation” under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA trump the application of domestic law – such as Mexican gambling law as interpreted by the – then – new Mexican government<sup>27</sup>. The good-faith and legitimate expectations principle control, for the relationship between the parties (e.g. Mexico and Thunderbird), the way the Mexican gambling law has to be interpreted<sup>28</sup>. Governments can not, against a determination that under the international law-based “fair and equitable treatment” principle a legitimate expectation of a specific interpretation has emerged, invoke a dominant contrary interpretation under domestic

<sup>26</sup> Different from inter-state relations, also within the WTO, with NAFTA investor-state disputes, the parties are on an unequal footing as to conditions of competition, because the host State even if bound by the fair and equitable treatment standard is less vulnerable than the investor to the application of that standard in the specific case at hand, because the investor lacks the retaliatory power of a trading partner. Therefore it is important to interpret more broadly under NAFTA Chapter XI than under the WTO Agreements the legitimate expectations an investor may have with respect to a host state’s assurances..

<sup>27</sup> In international law, as Brownlie has said, “references to the ‘principles of good faith’ are, first, and foremost, indications that the national law of the respective parties is not to apply.” The assumption, so Brownlie is that “the applicable law should be applied in a manner which is compatible with the shared expectations of the parties. I. Brownlie, Ian, Some Questions Concerning the Applicable Law in International Tribunals, in: Theory of International Law at the Threshold of the 21st Century, Essays in Honour of Krzysztof Skubiszewski, Jerzy Makarczyk (ed.), The Hague, Kluwer Law International, 1996; Reisman/Arsanjani, ICSID Review 2004, at p. 339: “If the investor has relied on that statement, as in public international law, it is difficult to see how domestic law can then be used by the state to avoid responsibility.”

<sup>28</sup> The Government of Kuwait v. Aminoil award, 1982 (66 International Law Reports (1982) at 518) says: Thus, to the extent that Article III, 2 of the Arbitration Agreement calls for interpretation, such an interpretation ought to be based on that provision which not only was freely chosen by the Parties in 1973, but also reflects the spirit which has underlain the carrying on of the oil concession in Kuwait.”.

law<sup>29</sup>. The implication of this analysis is that the principle of “legitimate expectation” under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA overrides any dominant interpretation of applicable Mexican law on the legality of the operation at issue if SEGOB can be considered to have given – reasonably and legitimately – such an assurance. Mexico is not compelled by the treaty to change its law or the dominant interpretation of the law at a certain point of time; it is simply obliged to provide financial compensation if its officials have created an investment-backed legitimate expectation with a specific investor that another, or earlier, interpretation would prevail.

27. The principle of protection of “legitimate expectation<sup>30</sup>” or, in common law, estoppel<sup>31</sup>, has also been applied in comparative contract law, mainly to deny formal rights invoked by a party if such invocation contradicts previous statements and conduct that made the other party trust in the particular expectation so created<sup>32</sup>. But contract law – presuming the existence of two equal parties in a commercial contract – is less relevant than comparative public law with respect to the judicial review of governmental conduct. For example, in its well-established jurisprudence, the European Court of Justice held “legitimate expectations” to be a key principle of the relation between <sup>29</sup> That has also been the conclusion of the MTD v Chile tribunal where a protected legitimate expectation was found to exist, though the building project contravened national planning law.

<sup>32</sup> See references in Hector Mairal, Actos Proprios, Buenos Aires, 1994; this use of the concept of “estoppel” seems related to “laches” (“acquiescence”) where prolonged and informed acquiescence will lead to a barring of a claim or an implied waiver, Corpus Juris Secundum, June 2005, 30 A CJS Equity at para. 136. also Fernando de Trazegnies, La Verdad construida, algunas reflexiones heterodoxas sobre la interpretación legal, in: TDM 2005 (www.transnational-dispute-management.com). Trazegnies examines the principle in light of its Roman (and mediaeval) law antecedents and in particular Latin American, Argentine and Peruvian practice: “no es admisible que un contratante o parte en general actue unas veces en un sentido y otras en otro, afirme ciertos hechos en una situación y los niegue en otra, reconozca y acepte ciertas interpretaciones .. y las desconozca en otra similar, simplemente porque en una le conviene y en otra no le conviene” (at p. 10/11)

state and individuals<sup>33</sup>. The principle requires public authorities (including the European Commission) to respect legitimate expectations it has created with individuals, in particular if such expectations have become the basis for investment<sup>34</sup>. In ECJ jurisprudence, the public authority can not lightly reverse course once it has created such investment-backed legitimate expectations, but has to take its prior conduct into account when planning to reverse its course with a detrimental effect on individuals/ investors. The principle has also been recognised in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, here in particular to define the existence of legally protected “acquired rights”<sup>35</sup>. European law does not prevent a public authority from reversing its course, but requires a balancing process where the strength of the individual’s interest is balanced against the need for flexibility in public policy<sup>36</sup>:

“An expectation is then legitimate and ought to be protected if “taking a new and different course will amount to an abuse of power” – “Once the legitimacy of the expectation is established, the courts will balance the requirements of fairness against any overriding interest relied upon for the change of policy".<sup>37</sup>

28. The principle of legitimate expectation is also recognised in several developed systems of administrative law<sup>38</sup>. The common principles of the principal administrative law systems are in my view an important point of reference for the interpretation of investment treaties to the extent investment treaty jurisprudence is not as yet firmly established. But its exact scope and implication are not well established<sup>39</sup>. There are contradictions between the principle that public administrations have to be utterly clear in their dealing with individuals and to respect any legitimate expectations they have been responsible for and the concept that only confidence in un-ambiguous assurances by public authorities are protected<sup>40</sup>. Legitimate expectations in EU law can be created by informal statements, including sufficiently precise oral representations and by government conduct, either by itself or in combination with written assurances<sup>41</sup>. Noteworthy is a reference in Schonberg's comprehensive study to the need for a more subjective approach that takes into account the experience and size of investors – with greater protection for smaller and less experienced investors<sup>42</sup>.

29. Legitimate expectation has also been recognised as an important principle guiding the interpretation of other obligations in international economic law. A certain measure of recognition of this principle can be inferred from several WTO panel decisions:<sup>45</sup> “The protection of legitimate expectations of Members regarding the conditions of competition is a well-established GATT principle, which derives in part from Article XXIII, the basic dispute settlement provisions of GATT (and the WTO).”<sup>46</sup> In the main, the principle is here used to protect negotiated concessions from being undermined by conduct of member states contrary to the purpose and spirit of such concessions.<sup>47</sup>

<sup>47</sup> The WTO AB has associated what it calls the “GATT-specific” principle of protection of legitimate expectations with the general principle of law of good faith to prohibit the US from abusing the injury-test in anti-dumping law, by distributing the funds collected from anti-dumping duties to those of the US businesses, which had voted in favour of introducing and sustaining US anti-dumping duties against EU imports of steel. The US thereby created an incentive to apply trade remedies, which the WTO Anti-Dumping Agreement’s “threat of injury” clause does not foresee, and which the Panel implied, was contrary to good faith. See

30. While this brief survey of general international, international economic (including EU), comparative contract and comparative administrative law does not specify exactly the contours of this principle, it suggests that under developed systems of administrative law, a citizen – even more so an investor - should be protected against unexpected and detrimental changes of policy if the investor has carried out significant investment with a reasonable, public-authority initiated assurance in the stability of such policy. Assurance on a particular interpretation of often open-ended statute against an unexpected detrimental change of such interpretation is in this context particularly relevant<sup>48</sup>. Such protection is, however, not un-conditional and ever-lasting. It leads to a balancing process between the needs for flexible public policy and the legitimate reliance on in particular investment-backed expectations. The consulted authorities are indicative of contemporary state practice and the minimum standards of comparative national and international law. The “fair and equitable standard” can not be derived from subjective personal or cultural sentiments; it must be anchored in objective rules and principles reflecting, in an authoritative and universal or at least widespread way, the contemporary attitude of modern national and international economic law. The wide acceptance of the “legitimate expectations” principle therefore supports the concept that it is indeed part of “fair and equitable treatment” as owed by governments to foreign investors under modern investment treaties and under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA. It is before this international and comparative law background that one needs to make sense out of several recent investment treaty awards which have applied the legitimate expectations principle, both under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA and the equivalent provisions of applicable bilateral investment treaties. These awards – Metalclad v Mexico, Tecmed v. Mexico,

Occidental v. Ecuador, Waste Management v Mexico II<sup>49</sup> and MTD v. Chile<sup>50</sup> – may not have explained the doctrinal background of the principle, its scope and contours specifically, but these authoritative precedents have contributed towards establishing the “legitimate expectation” as a sub-category of “fair and equitable treatment” in the for this dispute here most pertinent investment treaties (including NAFTA Chapter XI’s Art. 1105)<sup>51</sup>.

31. While these cases for the first time appear to consider “legitimate expectation” as a definite subcategory of the “fair and equitable treatment” obligation, there are precursors. In most of them, legitimate expectation is used as a principle to specify the scope and content of primary legal obligations. In Revere Copper and Brass v OPIC, the tribunal identified the “assurances given in good faith to such aliens as an inducement to their making the investments” as contributing to the creation of a protected right<sup>52</sup>. In ME Cement v Egypt, legitimate expectation was used to delineate future profitability of a license, for the purpose of calculating compensation<sup>53</sup>. In Nagel v. Czech Republic (p. 33), the concept of a legitimate expectation was used to distinguish the existence of a protected acquired right from a mere hope or legally irrelevant personal expectation<sup>54</sup>. The tribunal’s reasoning suggests that the less formal “personal communications”, the less likely is the emergence of a legitimate expectation; this means that the greater the formality of an assurance, the greater its ability to trigger a legitimate expectation. That criterium is pertinent to the highly formalised “Oficio” issues in this case by SEGOB. In ADF v US, the tribunal discussed the claimant's expectation allegedly created by existing case law; but it denied the existence of a "legitimate expectation" because the expectation was not created by "any misleading representations made by authorised officials of the US federal government but rather, it appears probable, by legal advice received.. from private counsel"<sup>55</sup>. That case suggests, e contrario, that it is representations from authorised officials that provide the foundation for legitimate expectations if these representations become reasonably the basis for the investor's commitment of capital<sup>56</sup>. In Mobil Oil v Iran, legitimate expectation was used to calculate compensation for the break-down of negotiations for a termination agreement<sup>57</sup>; it functions in this context as the protection of an interest that has not yet grown into a full-fledged legally binding contract, but is still worthy of protection – similarly to the Shufeldt-case<sup>58</sup>. The key feature of these cases is that a proto-contractual interest is protected, albeit, in terms of compensation, at a significantly different and lower level than would be available to a full-fledged, contractually validated legal interest. In SPP v Egypt, the tribunal held that "certain acts of Egyptian officials"... were "cloaked with the mantle of government authority and communicated as such to foreign investors who relied on them in making their investment. Whether legal ... or not these acts.. created expectations protected by established principles of international law"<sup>59</sup>.

<sup>58</sup> Shufeldt case, Claim USA v Guatemala UNRIAA 2 (1949) 1081; the case dealt with concession activities carried out without a legally valid concession instrument; nevertheless, the award considered the government to be bound as it had tolerated the activities for a prolonged period and had been quite ready to benefit from it – by way of taxes and related benefits. Similarly, in the ICSID case of Biloune v. Ghana (95 ILR 183 (1994) at pp. 207, 210) conduct – in the form of an about 12 months' toleration of the process of setting up and constructing a restaurant was seen as sufficient to create not only a legitimate expectation (a formal assurance was alleged but contested), but justify a farther-reaching claim of "constructive expropriation".

32. A review of these cases suggests that conduct, informal, oral or general assurances can give rise to or support the existence of a legitimate expectation. But the threshold for such informal and general representations is quite high. On the other hand, a legitimate expectation is assumed more readily if an individual investor receives specifically formal assurances that display visibly an official character and if the official(s) perceive or should perceive that the investor intends, reasonably, to rely on such representation (the element of “investment-backed expectation”). The strongest way to build a legitimate expectation is if both formal and official elements are followed and reinforced by conduct that carries the same message as the investor reads – and can reasonably read – into an interpretative assurance or “comfort letter”. That is as well the implication of both the relevance of subsequent conduct for interpreting a formal declaration of treaty under Art. 31 (3) (b)<sup>60</sup> and the method of interpretation for contracts and unilateral legally relevant declarations in comparative contract law of civil-law countries (such as Mexico).<sup>61</sup> A most recent analysis suggests that specific “expectations that have been created by the acts, statements or omissions of the relevant public authorities” are “close parallels” to the requirement to accord “treatment that is fair and equitable”<sup>62</sup>.

33. As mentioned, the essential difference for the application of the “legitimate expectation” concept under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA and comparable investment treaties from commercial contract law as applied in international commercial arbitration is that the two parties in investment disputes are not in an equal position<sup>63</sup>. If the parties are in an equal position, a much higher degree of due diligence is justified, as for example in inter-state relations under conventional international law, in WTO law or in transnational commercial relations, as usually adjudicated in international commercial arbitration. Strong parties in an equal position can be expected to deploy more expertise and due diligence to minimise ambiguity in their dealings with each other. Nor can the same requirements as in national judicial review of administrative actions be applied as the foreign investor is in a much more vulnerable, exposed position than a national citizen confronting his administration before national courts. Investment treaties throughout – witness the Preamble and Art. 102 of the NAFTA – are meant to compensate for this weaknesses of foreign investors by a regime of intensified protection. Such special protection for foreign investors is required in order to encourage investment, to compensate for the foreign investors' structural handicap when entering a foreign society and to help governments enhance the quality of their governance systems. As Elihu Root said, in 1910, about the foreign investor:

“He will naturally be at a disadvantage in litigation against citizens of the country. He is less familiar than they with the laws, the ways of doing business, the habits of thought and action, the method of procedure, the local customs and prejudices.”<sup>64</sup>

<sup>63</sup> This feature also distinguishes investment arbitration from the WTO – thus justifying a higher-level of protection; the observation by Schonberg (supra, at p. 128) about the need to take into account the specific background of in particular inexperienced investors) suggests that the subjective perception of the assurance by the particular addressee needs to be taken into account – rather than how an ultra-competent and perfect large corporation would have and should have understood the assurance addressed to it by the public authority.

34. All international investment treaties aim at attracting foreign capital in a situation where the domestic investor is in a much better position: It is as a rule more expert in dealing formally and informally with the government apparatus; there are often hidden forms of collusion between administrators and local businessmen. What happens in such government-business relationships is usually not visible – it is a “black box” into which foreign investors – and arbitral tribunals – have great difficulties in penetrating<sup>66</sup>. So if “fair competition” aimed at (Art. 101 (1)(b) NAFTA) and an “increase of substantial investment opportunities” (Art. 101 (1)(c) NAFTA) is to be achieved, there must be an extra attention to “clarity” and “predictability” for “business planning and investment” (NAFTA preamble). The protection of legitimate expectations standard thus says that such competitive opportunities as are protected under Art. 101(1) (b) NAFTA shall not be offset by measures which are in effect detrimental to the “business planning and investment” of the investor. NAFTA Chapter XI is to attract foreign investors to the host state in spite of their greater exposure to the political risk, including the risk of camouflaged domestic competitor-government alliances; the special protections of Chapter XI NAFTA serve as the principal instrument for such an investment promotion policy. As the World Bank Development Report for 2005, the authoritative policy instrument on foreign investment and economic development, formulates the relevant standard for government promises and administrative conduct<sup>67</sup>:

<sup>67</sup> The World Bank Development Report (2005), at p. 176, highlights the importance of government promises and administrative conduct to be “credible” – in order to support

“Can firms rely on them, with confidence, when making their investment decisions?”

35. Enforcing rules making such promises effective is both in the long-term and comprehensive interest of the host state and of the investor (at p. 179 ff). The use of the disciplines of investment treaties – here the legitimate expectation principle under fair and equitable treatment – is a “potentially powerful tool to enhance the credibility of (governments’) contract and policy commitments”. As the World Bank Development Report puts it:

“Governments and firms can both benefit. Governments benefit from a commitment device that can address concerns from investors, and thus help them attract more investment at lower cost, and also reduce the risk of any later dispute becoming politicized. Firms benefit from reduced risks and a more reliable mechanism for protecting their rights if the relationship with the host government deteriorates.”

36. These objectives of the NAFTA – both the general objective of enhancing the attractiveness of the host state for foreign investors and the instrumental tool of using greater transparency, clarity and predictability to enable better investment planning – have therefore to guide the process of both defining the conditions of the “legitimate expectations” principle under Art. 1105 and of applying it to the particular facts of a specific situation<sup>68</sup>. They are essentially different investment – “ (p. 179). It views the use of investment treaties and their “disciplines” as a “potentially powerful tool to enhance the credibility of their contractual and policy commitments”

<sup>68</sup> On the significance of the investment promotion-by-protection objectives of the NAFTA to govern the interpretation: Metalclad v. Mexico, para. 75: “ensure the successful implementation of investment initiatives” and “promote .. cross-border investment opportunities”; Pope-Talbot, Award on Merits I, para. 77: “The legal context includes the trade and investment liberalizing objectives of the NAFTA”, i.e. the investment liberalizing from the approach to the “legitimate expectations” concept in commercial and contract law adjudicated through international commercial arbitration. The UNCTAD survey on the “Fair and Equitable Treatment” for investment treaties<sup>69</sup> therefore highlights that the “concept of transparency overlaps with fair and equitable treatment in at least two significant ways”, one being that “the investor will need to ascertain the pertinent rules concerning the state action; the degree of transparency in the regulatory environment will therefore affect the ability of the investor to assess whether or not fair and equitable treatment has been made available..”.

37. The most relevant NAFTA (and ICSID) awards have translated these authoritative objectives and instruments provided by the NAFTA and similar investment treaties into an emphasis on “transparency” and a concept of “legitimate expectation” that takes up, but further develops the meaning of this concept in conventional international, comparative contract, administrative and European and WTO law jurisprudence. One can observe over the last years a significant growth in the role and scope of the legitimate expectation principle, from an earlier function as a subsidiary interpretative principle to reinforce a particular interpretative approach chosen, to its current role as a self-standing subcategory and independent basis for a claim under the “fair and equitable standard” as under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA. This is possibly related to the fact that it provides a more supple way of providing a remedy appropriate to the particular situation as compared to the more drastic determination and remedy inherent in concept of regulatory expropriation. It is probably partly for these reasons that “legitimate expectation” has become for tribunals a preferred way of providing protection to claimants in situations where the tests for a “regulatory taking” appear too difficult, complex and too easily assailable for reliance on a measure of subjective judgment.

38. In Maffezini v Spain, the tribunal linked the fair and equitable treatment obligation with transparency. The lack of transparency with a financial transaction carried out on government orders and detrimental to the investor was considered the core of the breach of this obligation<sup>70</sup>.

39. In CME<sup>71</sup> v. Czech Republic<sup>72</sup>, the tribunal found a breach of the fair and equitable treatment discipline in the reversal of its previous position on the legal situation of CME. CME had, held the tribunal, a legitimate expectation that its legal position recognised by the Czech regulator would be maintained and not be changed, without bona fide purpose, to undermine its business, in particular favouring domestic investors. Such a change of the regulator's position on statutory interpretation created an opportunity for the squeeze-out of the investor by its local partner (and competitor). It is the "evisceration of arrangements in reliance upon which the foreign investor was induced to invest" by the new or subsequent government authorities which was at the core of the determination that there was a breach of the investment treaty. As in the current case, the change of legal interpretation by the regulatory agency on which the foreign investor relied allowed a domestic competitor, favoured de-facto, to flourish.

40. The Metalclad v. Mexico tribunal interpreted "transparency" to mean:

<sup>70</sup> Award on the merits, para 83; November 13, 2000. ICSID website: "The lack of transparency with which this loan transaction was conducted is incompatible with Spain's commitment to ensure the investor a fair and equitable treatment".

<sup>71</sup> The tribunal relied here on Detlev Vagts, Coercion and Foreign Investment Rearrangements, 72 AJIL 17 (1978) where he suggests that "cancellation .. of the authorisation to do business in which the investor relies... " to establish expropriation. One should probably see the breach of legitimate expectation as a former of less intensive breach than expropriation; investment-backed legitimate expectation is one of the standards to define expropriation, particularly in the form of "regulatory taking" (action tantamount to expropriation), but it requires also a very severe interference in the property right and its economic value. The difference between the lesser-intensity breach and the more intensive breach in the form of expropriation should lie primarily in the compensation – full value in expropriation, reliance damage in the case of a non-expropriatory breach of the fair and equitable treatment obligation.

“that all relevant legal requirements for the purpose of initiating, completing and successfully operating investments made, or intended to be made, under the Agreement should be capable of being readily known to all affected investors.. There should be no room for doubt or uncertainty on such matters. Once the authorities of the central government.. become aware of any scope of misunderstanding or confusion in this connection, it is their duty to ensure that the correct position is promptly determined and clearly stated so that investors can proceed with all appropriate expedition in the confident belief that they are acting in accordance with all relevant laws”.

The tribunal held that the investor was entitled to rely on the representations of the federal officials (para 89) and the Respondent “failed to ensure a transparent and predictable framework for Metalclad’s business planning and investment. The totality of these circumstances demonstrate a lack of orderly process.. in relation to an investor.. acting in the expectation that it would be treated fairly and justly”. The duty in Metalclad (as in the later MTD v Chile case) is not just a passive duty to ambiguous messages, but to pro-actively take clarificatory action when the government agency knows or should know that the investor has misunderstood the relevant signalling from the government.

41. In Tecnicas Medioambientales (TecMed) v. Mexico (para 154), the tribunal held:

“Part of these expectations is the foreign investor’s assumption that the state receiving the investment will act consistently, without any ambiguities, and transparently with the foreign investor so that the investor may know in advance (and thus plan its activities..) not only the rules or regulations.. but also the policies pursued by such rules... and the administrative practices or guidelines that are relevant. "The foreign investor also expects the host state not to act in a contradictory manner; this means .. that the state will not arbitrarily reverse prior or pre-existing state-made decisions or approvals upon which the investor relied and on the strength of which it took on its commitments and planned and set in motion its .. operation". And it referred to the standard of a "reasonable and impartial man".

42. In Occidental (OEPC) v. Ecuador, the tribunal examined the government's responses to queries by the investor and found that the official response to such queries was a:

"wholly unsatisfactory and thoroughly vague answer"

and it considered that the "legal and business framework" did not meet the "requirement of stability and predictability" (paras 190-191).

43. In Waste Management v. Mexico II (para 98) the tribunal considered that Art. 1105 was breached by:

"a complete lack of transparency and candour in an administrative process. In applying this standard it is relevant that the treatment is in breach of representations made by the host state which were reasonably relied on by the claimant".<sup>73</sup>

44. The recent CMS v Argentina (Merits) award confirms the principles developed in Metalclad and Tecmed v. Mexico. It draws a close link between the fair and equitable treatment standard, the government duty to provide clear and un-ambiguous signals to the investor and the treaty objectives to promote investment<sup>74</sup>. It concurs with my explanation of established jurisprudence according to which the breach of legitimate expectations created by specific assurances now constitutes a self-standing subcategory of the “fair and equitable treatment” standard under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA<sup>75</sup>.

45. This is further confirmed in Eureko v Poland (2005); the award quotes (at para 235) with approval the Tecmed v Mexico (para 154) statement that:

“This provision of the Agreement, in light of the good faith principle established by international law, requires the Contracting Parties to provide to international investments treatment that does not affect the basic expectations that were taken into account by the foreign investor to make the investment” and determines that the “discriminatory conduct by the Polish Government is blunt violation of the expectations of the Parties in concluding the SPA..” (at para. 242)<sup>76</sup>

<sup>74</sup> CMS v Argentina, 2005, at paras. 273-280; that a failure to implement a regulatory programme could constitute a breach of a legitimate expectation was also confirmed in GAMI v Mexico, paras 97, 108, but only provided in the case (not found to exist here) that, first, the investor was made to trust that such regulatory action would be taken, that it relied on such assurances, that the government was solely responsible for the lack of implementation of promised regulatory action and that a minimum threshold was reached. In Gami, the government conduct was too unspecific to be able to create a legitimate expectation.

<sup>75</sup> So also Stephen Fietta, 9 September 2005 BIICL conference presentation, at p. 7; R. Dolzer Fair and Equitable Treatment: A Key standard in investment treaties, International Lawyer 39 (2005), 87 at p. 105 with a reference suggesting that in analogy to the legal effect of unilateral statements in state-to-state international law assurances given to foreign investors may create legal significance and, at p. 106, that one of the two pillars of foreign investment law is the “protection of the investor’s legitimate expectation”.

<sup>76</sup> An not identified recent award in an East European investment dispute relating to oilfield development reported by K. Hober, , OGEL 5-2003, p. 37, 28 (www.gasandoil.com/ogel) also relies on the legitimate expectation of the investor in connection with a joint venture that the state would not subsequently interfere and hamper the on-going operation and implementation of the investment project.

46. These statements on the required clarity mirror established jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice. For example, in Opel Austria v Commission (1997, at para 124):

“According to the case-law, moreover, Community legislation must be certain and its application foreseeable by individuals. The principle of legal certainty requires that every measure of the institutions having legal effects must be clear and precise and must be brought to the notice of the person concerned in such a way that he can ascertain exactly the time at which the measure comes into being and starts to have legal effects. That requirement of legal certainty must be observed all the more strictly in the case of a measure liable to have financial consequences in order that those concerned may know precisely the extent of the obligations which it imposes on them”<sup>77</sup>

47. The implications of the obligation to be clear and avoid ambiguity is that the government agency has to bear the risk of its own ambiguity. This allocation of the risk of ambiguity requires that the investor did and could reasonably have confidence in the assurance, not as an ultra-perfect lawyer equipped with a hindsight vision facility, but as a reasonable businessman in the position of the investor would do in the particular circumstances. “Hindsight, of course, is notoriously lucid”<sup>78</sup>; but foresight lacks the sharpness of hindsight. Investors’ lack clairvoyance and need to make rapid decisions on the basis of the way facts are and can reasonably be perceived at the time they become

48. Lord Denning, in HTV v Price Commission, said that “a public authority which had led traders to rely on one interpretation of a statutory provision could only adopt another interpretation if there was an overriding public interest to do so.<sup>80</sup>”

49. The European Court of Justice has recently confirmed its jurisprudence on “legitimate expectation” and “legal certainty”<sup>81</sup>:

“With regard to the principle of legal certainty, this requires in particular that rules involving negative consequences for individuals should be clear and precise and their application predictable for those subject to them (see, to this effect, Case 325/85 Ireland v Commission [1987] ECR 5041, Case C-143/93 Van Es Douane Agenten [1996] ECR I-431, paragraph 27; and Case C-63/93 Duff and Others [1996] ECR I-569, paragraph 20)”

50. The conclusion that the risk of ambiguity falls square on the shoulders of the assurance-issuing public authority, is reinforced by the traditional international law principle that the construction of a legal instrument in need of interpretation and with elements of ambiguity should be “in dubio contra proferentem”, i.e. that the drafter and the authority issuing a legally relevant statement has to bear the risks of ambiguity<sup>82</sup>. This rule is primarily concerned with interpretation of unilateral legal acts – such as the “interpretative assurance” given by SEGOB to Thunderbird. Related to the “contra proferentem rule” is the legal principle “Nemo audiatur propriam turpitudinem allegans<sup>83</sup>”: It implies in the context of the transparency and clarity obligation on governments under NAFTA that a public authority which has evaded – as bureaucratic behaviour often does – the clarity of expression required by investors, then it can later not rely on the obfuscation it intentionally or negligently deployed to avoid the legal consequences of the legitimate expectation thus created and protected by Art. 1105 of the NAFTA. A change of interpretation of the law has to be reckoned with, but it becomes suspicious and “must be viewed with the greatest scepticism if their effect is to disadvantage a foreigner”<sup>84</sup>.

51. The most relevant Unctad reports – authoritative UN surveys that can not be accused of investor sympathy – tie transparency explicitly to the “fair and equitable treatment” discipline<sup>85</sup>:

“This interpretation suggests that where an investment treaty does not expressly provide for transparency, but does for fair and equitable treatment, then transparency is implicitly included in the treaty (UNCTAD, 1999a, p. 34). Secondly, where a foreign investor wishes to establish whether or not a particular State action is fair and equitable, as a practical matter, the investor will need to ascertain the pertinent rules concerning the State action; the degree of transparency in the regulatory environment will therefore affect the ability of the investor to assess whether or not fair and equitable treatment has been made available in any given case.”

52. Hector Mairal, in his authoritative study of “legitimate expectation” (Actos propios) for Latin American civil law systems, emphasises that ambiguity in an official representation can not free the public administration from the “legitimate expectations” effect if such ambiguity appears intentional and contrived in order to leave to the administration two options while appearing to provide predictability to the individual; if the administration is in a relationship with the individual which obliges it to be clear that imposes an extra duty of transparency and clarity upon it<sup>86</sup>. Schonberg, in his study on comparative law on legitimate expectation has in this context pointed out correctly that smaller and less experienced investors deserve greater protection than large and experienced companies<sup>87</sup>.

53. Similarly, in two recent arbitral awards, an interpretation of ambiguous treaty language in light of the treaty’s investment promotion objective was preferred over a restrictive interpretation that would have allocated the risk of ambiguity to the investor<sup>88</sup>. While these statements have been made in the context of treaty interpretation,

According to the preamble it is intended “to create and maintain favorable conditions for investments by investors of one Contracting Party in the territory of the other”. It is legitimate to resolve uncertainties in its interpretation so as to favour the protection of covered investment”; also Loewen v. US (5 January 2001, para 40 ff): “The text, context and purpose of Chapter Element combine to support a liberal rather than a restricted interpretation... and: citing Ethyl v Canada, award of 1998, 38 ILM 708 —“ that is an interpretation which provides protection and security for the foreign investor and its investment and to “increase substantially investment opportunities”. they express a principle that is equally relevant to interpretation of official communications between government and investor, arguably even more so as different from a bilateral treaty, an official communication from government to a foreign investor is not a bilateral agreement, but a unilateral communication solely under the responsibility of the issuing government agency.

54. These observations describe the legal contours of the principle of “legitimate expectations” under Art. 1105 NAFTA. But it is helpful to take an even closer look at the decision and underlying rationale of the arbitral tribunal in the very recent MTD v Chile case which should be considered the most relevant authoritative precedent:

55. In MTD, a Malaysian investor planned an investment in housing in Chile. The government made at a high political and administrative level positive noises; it assured the investor of its welcome. It signed a formal investment contract which, however, did not include any specific approvals for the investment project at issue, but rather formalised the grant of foreign exchange and tax-stability related investment guarantees; this investment contract also clarified that it was not a substitute for specific zoning permits and other applicable authorisation requirements. The investor was thus made to believe in the positive attitude of the government. Chile issued, at a senior governmental level, a formal endorsement of the project though the project could not be done under the regulatory framework as it stood at the time of such endorsement. The investor was unaware of this, was not made aware of this and the minister responsible for the sector was not even invited to the relevant meetings. Without the investor’s knowledge, other government authorities that were opposed to the project, took active steps to counter local support of the project and in the end ensured the project could not go ahead due to the lack of required zoning permits. The difference to Thunderbird is that the contradiction was there not simultaneous, but in the consecutive actions of government. The MTD tribunal did recognise that a “rigorous due diligence” by the investor – inexperienced and new to Chile – would probably have identified the crucial obstacles to his investment plan (para 117):

but:

“Chile has an obligation to act coherently and apply its policies consistently independent of how diligent an investor is” (paras 165-166)

56. The tribunal considered such contradictory conduct by the competent government authorities to constitute a breach of the “legitimate expectation” principle – as sub-category of the duty to fair and equitable treatment. It found that the “investment promotion” obligation was not just a prescription for passive behaviour or avoidance of prejudicial conduct, but had a “pro-active” meaning. Relying on Tecmed v. Mexico and Waste Management II, the tribunal found a breach of the legitimate expectations of the investor in the governments failure to “act consistently”, to be “free from ambiguity and totally transparent with the foreign investor so that it may know beforehand any and all rules and regulations that will govern its investments, as well as the goals of the relevant practices and directives” (para 114). The tribunal took account (also in terms of mitigating the compensation claim) of the “unwise business decisions or .. lack of diligence of the investor” though “counsel for Chile in effect argued for the notion that the claimant was foolish to have relied upon representation of the government”<sup>89</sup>. In MTD, the formal approval of the financial arrangements for the project and official signals about its desirability were in contradiction to urban policy and regulation; the fact that this contradiction was not conveyed to MTD before it committed its investment, constituted the breach of the fair and equitable obligation; this situation is not that different from the positive "Oficio" of August 2000, confirmed by continuing acceptance of the operations by SEGOB, but then, and in contradiction to the earlier actions and positions taken by the former government, followed by the targeted and prioritised enforcement of the Mexican gambling law against Thunderbird by another, new, set of officials and political forces acquiring powers under the new government.

57. The MTD award supports the view that even if government assurances were ambiguous and an extra-careful investor could have found this out, the government still owes a duty of consistency and protection of legitimate expectations to the foreign investor. This is not a passive duty, but a pro-active duty (as in Metalclad v. Mexico) to ensure investors are not misled and are made to realise where the "true" directions of government policy for the issue at stake lie. This approach is in contrast with the "caveat emptor" and "due diligence" approach in commercial arbitration, but also, to a lesser extent though, to some statements in for example comparative administrative law where the risk of ambiguity in the governmental assurance is either assumed by the citizen, or at least balanced against a duty on the public agency to provide un-ambiguous statements. The MTD v Chile award thus reinforces a reading of the legitimate expectation principle that is distinct for investment disputes. It acknowledges the structural weakness of the investor – in MTD as in Thunderbird we have entrepreneurial investors without extensive country experience - when confronted with a foreign country that wishes to attract such investment. Such a pro-active duty to ensure the foreign investor does not succumb to a visible misunderstanding is even more acute in cases where there are substantial indicators of "black box" collusion between administrative agencies and powerful domestic competitors. This conclusion has a bearing in particular on my point No. 2 – subsequent accepting conduct by SEGOB – for assuming the existence of a "legitimate expectation" by Thunderbird protected by Art. 1105 of the NAFTA.

58. It is with these interpretative guidelines that I will now examine the factual situation.

5.) Did Thunderbird have a "legitimate expectation" that it could operate its "skill" slot machines in Mexico?

59. The issues are essentially if the "Oficio" ("official response" or "criterio" (translatable as "legal opinion" in this context) of 15 August 2000 and the subsequent conduct by SEGOB can be qualified as creating a "legitimate expectation" with Thunderbird that it could legally operate its slot machine facilities. The majority of the tribunal rejects this interpretation; I respectfully disagree. The relevant meaning of investor and government conduct and communications with each other can not only be determined from within the "four corners" of the legal documents, but must be appreciated with an approach that recognises realistically the practicalities of the foreign investment process. The legal documentation has to be understood before the context in which the investor-government interaction takes place. The interpretation of the key document – the official, authoritative, unilateral assurance in the format of the "Oficio" – needs to rely on international and comparative (civil law) methodology applicable to contractual, and where distinct, unilateral, documentation. That means that the text has to be assessed as it represents a "meeting of the minds" of both parties and in particular as it was, reasonably and for both parties manifestly, understood by the investor to whom the "comfort letter" was addressed, taking into account the history of their interaction, the context, the purpose and the subsequent conduct of the parties<sup>90</sup>.

60. In light of the differing opinions on the legal value and meaning of the "Oficio", one needs to bear in mind the burden of proof situation: Thunderbird has to prove that the Oficio conveyed to it, from the perspective of a reasonable foreign businessman in the gambling industry and in the specific context of the interaction between Thunderbird and SEGOB, the message that it could operate the software-driven video poker machines it imported. Mexico, on the other hand, has to prove that the Oficio was tainted by insufficient, but mandatory disclosure by Thunderbird. This is a high threshold because, first, Mexico has to counter the presumption of the validity of official acts of government which respect for government requires; secondly, it has total control over all the documentation and witnesses – its own past and present SEGOB officials who alone can testify about what they knew and did not know. We therefore have to measure the evidence to see if Thunderbird has met this burden of proof, and, if so, Mexico has met its burden of proof.

The "Solicitud": Request for negative clearance

61. It is not contested that Thunderbird was very keen to get a "negative clearance", "green light" or an in its sense, positive interpretative assurance from the government that its "skill" machines were not covered by the Mexican gambling law. It rejected the strategy of Mr Guardia who kept his profitable slot machine operations alive by using a sequence of mostly successful, mainly injunctive appeals, and seems in whatever way have managed to defeat any attempt at effective enforcement. This is characteristic of the way a foreign investor approaches a business the legality of which is not certain: A domestic investor, often with tacit allies in the administrative and judicial institutions, can afford more easily a blatantly illegal conduct. A foreign investor will want more legal certainty – and in Thunderbird's case that seems also to have been urged by its venture investors. It thus took the most "legal" course by asking SEGOB, and trying to persuade it, to assure it that its “skill” machines – in effect combining chance and skill – were not covered by the law.

62. Thunderbird’s proposed interpretation - that machines involving a substantial amount of skill (in addition to chance) could be considered legal - was not implausible<sup>91</sup>. As all other players in the industry, it used the label of “skill machines” to highlight the involvement of skill in order to make the point for the interpretation of the Mexican Gambling Act it advocated. Witness Watson reports that former Gobernacion Secretary Labastida, had informally supported the approach to get a comfort letter (Oficio) from the government that confirmed and repeated the “skill” argument already, reportedly, raised in a litigation in “northern Mexico”<sup>92</sup>. SEGOB does seem to have a certain administrative and interpretative discretion, both with respect to interpreting the law and with respect to directing enforcement efforts<sup>93</sup>. The older and the more obsolete a law, as the 1940’s Mexican Gambling Law, the more grows the need and the space for interpretation. Thunderbird had – this is not contested – received encouragement from a very senior Mexican politician – formerly the Minister in charge of Gobernacion (Labastida) -to go forward. Liberalisation of the 1943 gambling law was considered in Mexico during the end of the PRI government in order to bring it in line with modern developments outside Mexico and to re-attract gambling

<sup>91</sup> See the testimony by Mexico’s expert Prof Rose, p. 791 “clearly require some skill”; “certainly skilful players will do better “ (p. 793); referring to a court that said: “this is a game of skill if you have the time to sit and play it” (794) and referring (p. 795) to the “learning curve whether the more you play it the better you do and a learning curve should be fairly steep at the beginning” and (p. 796) “the more you play those games, the better you’re going to do”.

<sup>92</sup> Watson, p. 404: “ Mr La Bastida stated in general terms that he was aware of the skill game litigation that had taken place in northern Mexico; that in light of the outcome of that he felt that the letter (i.e. the Oficio) which Gobernacion had issued to us was appropriate .. because of some precedent”.

<sup>93</sup> Prof Rose testified for Mexico about the role of the regulatory agency’s powers and the widely interpreted concept of “predominantly” skill or chance – pages 766, 768, 769, 773, 774, 775; Alcantara (pp. 880, 881) testified that action would – if it were to depend on him (“believe me”) be taken “right away”, but that he acted merely as a subordinated officer to higher authorities in Gobernacion that decided on how to focus and prioritise enforcement – namely the “government unit of Gobernacion” (p. 881. p. 922: “I follow instructions. I don’t decide things on my own” (p. 922). Respondent has not made available any testimony from Lic Alcantara’s superiors who “called the shots” on enforcement matters.

income and employment that had moved to the Caribbean, Las Vegas and US Indian reservations<sup>94</sup>. As Mexico's expert testified on the potential to liberalise the gambling regulation in Mexico:

"There was a great movement right before President Fox was elected" (i.e. in 2000, the year the "Oficio" was issued).

63. There were no particular public order concerns with the type of coin-operated, computer-programmed video-slot machines. The then Mexican PRI government had the choice of either changing the law in a formal, time-consuming and politically costly process or to try out a more low-profile liberalisation by introducing and then testing a re-interpretation of the law to relax its margins. Thunderbird's description of its machines as "not involving chance" was factually – with the hindsight of this tribunal's expertise – incorrect, but it was a qualification for interpretative purposes that was also used by other operators (including Guardia), possibly suggested by Mexican experts. The issue of skill versus chance was well known to SEGOB from its confrontational interaction with Guardia and in several other litigations since 1998<sup>95</sup> as a suggestion to stretch the prohibition of the 1943 Gambling Law. As the report of the discussion with former Gobernacion Secretary Labastida indicated, the concept of liberalisation by "stealth" through re-interpretation of the "skill concept" is likely to have been common currency among senior officials and politicians with some knowledge of gambling regulation in Mexico. It was also the standard

<sup>94</sup> Mexico's expert Prof Rose testified (p 776) on the prospect for liberalisation of Mexico's gambling law in the end days of the PRI government: "There was a great movement right before President Fox was elected and then some sort of scandal or political issue hit, and the government had to back away". This is consistent with the study for the Mexican Congress, op.cit. of 2002 and the testimony of Thunderbird expert Watson on his discussion with former Gobernacion Secretary Labastida (p. 404, 423-424) which indicates a positive attitude towards the relaxation of the gambling prohibitions by using the issue of "implication of skill" as an opening. That testimony – consistent with Mexico's expert Rose's comment – also suggests that the "Oficio" was using a re-interpretation of the skill concept in "skill game litigation.. in northern Mexico" appropriately (p. 404, bottom).

64. It is in this light that we have to see the August 3, 2000 request (“solicitud”) by Thunderbird for an authoritative opinion (“criterio”). Thunderbird’s “solicitud” makes it clear that such a “comfort letter” by SEGOB is desired to provide legal certainty for the investment envisaged – and it is not contested that Thunderbird had such an intention and that SEGOB officials understood this perfectly well<sup>97</sup>. In interpreting a unilateral declaration under international law, the relevant ICJ jurisprudence has emphasised the “significance of the intention behind the unilateral declaration made by a state”<sup>98</sup>. It is therefore not a free-standing abstracted from its context text as it appears to a tribunal years after the event, but the intention as it was conveyed and, moreover, as it was – reasonably - understood by the specific investor in that specific situation that counts. Literal interpretation purely on an isolated text is a traditional common law method (itself not applied strictly any longer and least in situations of ambiguous declarations); but it is not appropriate to our situation where, next to the NAFTA, Mexican law, and thereby also interpretation method, is applicable. The relevant ICJ jurisprudence deals mainly with unilateral declarations “erga omnes”. Here we do not have a declaration erga omnes, but a governmental representation made in the context of a specific relationship. In that specific relationship, the reading of the interpretative assurance letter needs to be guided by what both parties involved understood the purpose and factual background of the letter<sup>99</sup>. The “face” of the letter is largely gibberish if not read before the context, the parties’ common intention and the meaning that was intended to be conveyed and that was reasonably so understood by the addressee of the “Oficio”. Even if there was a divergence – i.e. if SEGOB had a more modest intention with the assurance letter, then the – reasonable – perception of the investor as the relevant specific addressee of the letter has to prevail. The reason is that it is the investor that is to be encouraged by the assurance letter, the investor that comes with capital and exposes its capital to government risk. It is therefore the investor’s confidence that is to be reinforced by the Oficio. To quote Reisman & Arsanjani:

“.. the inclination of an international tribunal to infer that a unilateral act has given rise to a binding obligation will probably be reinforced if the state making the declaration expects to receive clear benefits on the basis of the declaration”<sup>100</sup>.

65. Different from the majority (see para 157), I see no lack of required disclosure: Thunderbird disclosed clearly that at issue were video slot machines and identified them in a way that for a knowledgeable Regulator it was clear that these were video-gaming devices. I accept Mexico’s suggestion that these were most likely refurbished gaming devices used by Thunderbird in the US. But this does not detract from the fact that for somebody with experience in the gambling industry it was clear that these were video-gaming devices. The reference to BESTCO should have alerted the most sleepy gambling regulator that these were video gambling machines produced by one of the largest US producers of such devices. One can not assume, again, that the Mexican gambling regulator who according to its own statements had fought for years with Mexican businessman Guardia over video-gaming machines labelled as “skill” machines would not have been aware both of BESTCO as a major supplier of such machines. A short look at BESTCO’s website and a google search confirm this<sup>101</sup>. The same applies to the reference to “SCI-Support Consultants” as an identifiable manufacturer of video slot gambling machines, class III, deployed on US Indian reservations. The reference to BESTCO and SCI is therefore not misleading; it is a clearly identifiable reference to video slot machines. It is consistent with the result of the cross-examination, namely that SCI (K. McDonald) probably refurbished Thunderbird and other operators’ video slot machines previously used in US Indian reservations<sup>102</sup>.

66. Its letter otherwise needs to be seen not as a detailed factual description of the functioning of the machines (which it was not asked to provide), but as development of the legal argument as it had emerged in earlier litigation and already indicated in the discussions with ex-Gobernacion Minister Labastida. It made the legal argument that the machines were either only skill-based (para 3, which was overshooting reality), but it then referred in order to suggest as reason for legalisation, that “skills and ability is involved (para 6). This qualification for legal purposes is correct and it advances from the earlier reference that the machines were “only” skill-based. The issue was here to propose to SEGOB a legal qualification to help the liberalisation by “stealth” through a cautious interpretative strategy – that the machines were “skill” machines because they were used “in entertainment where skills and ability is involved”.<sup>103</sup> Thunderbird’s “Solicitud” described the character of these machines in a light so as to make it easy to subsume them under the label “skill” machines<sup>104</sup> - a term that was used, for reasons of suggesting compatibility with the law, throughout the industry in Mexico<sup>105</sup>. Its statement – that “chance and wagering is not involved” was involved, is technically not correct. However, it should be seen not as a scientific analysis but as rather a legal-interpretative term suggesting (or repeating a suggestion informally made by SEGOB as can be inferred from Waton’s testimony on the discussion with Labastida) how the law could be interpreted to allow such machines.

67. Virtually all games, indeed all human activity, involve some element of skill and chance (including say chess or football);<sup>106</sup> only some games – presumably the more mechanically and machine-based chance-oriented games – have in practice been prohibited in Mexico. As Mexico’s principal expert Prof Rose put it:

“The second, element (sc. in gambling law), chance has caused the most problems in the courts. Part of the problem is that if every human activity is mixed skill and chance, the <sup>103</sup> That key statement is contained in paragraph 6 of the Solicitud; it does not follow any factual description, but refers to the investor’s need for “certainty” that the operation is “legal” under the Ley de Juegos y Sorteos”.

<sup>104</sup> Technically, the machines combined chance and skill – at the beginning of a player’s competence, chance presumably prevails, while then – so Mexico’s expert Professor Rose (see supra) – there is a “steep learning” curve so that the role of skill increases significantly. The skill component consists mainly of probability calculation, possibly also of some element of physical alertness. The abundance of technical manuals for playing poker and their emphasis on understanding probability analysis suggests that skill plays a role and can be greatly enhanced by learning. Otherwise, there would be no point in using these manuals to enhance skill and thereby the probabilities of winning. To rely on the Supreme Court of California – after N. Rose, Gambling and the Law, p. 81: It “pointed to the large body of books and periodicals discussing strategy for playing the game. “The existence of such a large amount of literature designed to increase the player’s skill is a persuasive indication that bridge is not predominantly a game of chance”.

question is simply where you draw the line”<sup>107</sup>. And: “In England, any skill at all takes a game out of the prohibited lottery category. California outlaws slot machines if any chance enters into the payoff, but then states that devices that are predominantly skill are legal”.

68. So the legal-interpretative view that is put forward does not amount in my view to a lack of disclosure, but rather reflects the particular interpretative strategy, a strategy that Professor Rose describes in detail as the interpretation normally put forward to justify liberalisation<sup>108</sup>. In his extensive study on gambling law – and I have to take this as authoritative as he has been put forward by Mexico as the principal authority on gambling law – he describes courts that recognised video poker as a game of skill and other courts which did not do so. But putting forward a legal view based on several respected US courts in Illinois and Pennsylvania – that video-poker is a game of skill or a game predominantly of skill<sup>109</sup> – can not constitute a deception. Thunderbird was not asked or expected to provide a dispassionate academic study on comparative regulatory approaches on video poker machines to the Mexican Regulator, but did suggest, and was expected to do so, its view on how the machines could and should be legally qualified. It naturally advocated an interpretation that was in its favour rather than develop the reasoning for an opposing view. Nothing else is expected of professional advocacy, including in interaction with an industry Regulator.

69. The tribunal thus views as factual statements – and in this respect incorrect and lacking in required disclosure – what I consider is not a factual and technical statement, but a legal qualification of the machines made with the very intention to suggest an interpretation that would extend the boundaries of the 1943 law. I should add that I do not consider the "Solicitud" as the most technically perfected document. Thunderbird did not highlight the fact that "chance" was inevitably involved in playing such machines (but as Prof Rose testified and we all know, chance is involved in any activity), but it did reduce its original claim that "no chance was involved " to, later in the Solicitud, that "skill" was involved (i.e. that it was not exclusively a skills game). That some level of "skill" is involved has not been disputed in the case; the tribunal has come so far as to suggest that a "considerable degree of chance" was involved, without, however, being willing and feeling competent to quantify specifically the "degree of chance" (See para 136).

70. Thunderbird did not say these were refurbished Thunderbird videopoker machines; it did not say that Guardia was using the same type of machines. It did not invite SEGOB to inspect the machines nor did it provide manuals. But SEGOB did request further information when it wanted to – such as later in 2000 when a request for a similar "Oficio" was launched by Mr Gomez. That Thunderbird did not provide the information Mexico now thinks they should have provided is, in my view not material. They were under no duty to do so. If SEGOB had felt in summer 2000 there was a need for more, it should have requested Thunderbird to provide whatever it considered relevant. If Mexico now raises them in arbitration, but did not raise them during the informal and formal process of Solicitud and Oficio, this suggests that it changed its mind on information requirements under the impact of a new government and the arbitration. Relevant non-disclosure – deception – would only then have been material if SEGOB had requested such information and Thunderbird had in response provided false information.

71. The signs were there – it must have been clear to anybody involved – that Thunderbird was testing the waters with a cooperative approach to government for video-slot machines issuing prizes (or US Dollars, as a prize that eschewed offering Mexican pesos – legal tender – as prizes). From the prolonged period of informal consultations – the claimant’s factual assertion is not contested<sup>110</sup> - the presumption arises that SEGOB officials knew what was at issue – and most probably suggested or at least approved of the very low-profile and discreet description. I can not agree that the tribunal “cannot rely on presumptions or inferences, let alone speculation concerning that background” and interpret the 3 August 2000 Solicitud on its “face value” (para 150). The significance and the meaning of the Solicitud and the Oficio can only be understood when the itself undisputedly convoluted and ambiguous text is read before the background of the parties’ interactions, their level of knowledge, their role and relationship (regulator vis-à-vis clearance seeking investor) and interests. That is standard interpretation of contracts and related instruments, and in particular in civil-law countries such as Mexico<sup>111</sup>. Not only does Oficio have to be interpreted on the basis of the parties common intentions and the context of their interaction, but also with the principle of good-faith which emphasises transparency, clarity and discourages the abuse of intentional ambiguity to allow a government to first make the recipient and investor believe one message and then turn around and claim it really had sent the opposite message. In addition, as we have – as mostly in litigation – a not completely verified factual situation, it is normal and necessary to use inference and presumptions to derive from the evidence that is available what was most likely to have happened.

72. The “solicitud” did not come out of the blue; the normal way to go about such matters is to informally sound out, negotiate and prepare in such an evidently very sensitive matter both the “solicitud” and the

<sup>110</sup> Crosby, p. 26; Mitchell, p. 290; Crosby, p. 37: “and the fact they came back with a refining of the standard indicates knowledge on their part of that they were intending to do..” Mitchell’s testimony – so far never contested – was that informal consultations had gone on for a prolonged period, and then intensified through lawyers Aspe and Arroyo (with a more technical role for Ruiz Velasco, their formal legal adviser on Mexican law) throughout summer 2000.

“oficio”. This has to be the common-sense assessment of the situation. That would make eminent sense in terms of the “stealth liberalisation by interpretation at the law’s margins” strategy that can be easily identified. If the unlikely course of action had been that SEGOB was surprised by a request coming out of nowhere and then reacted a little bit confusedly, as must be Mexico’s and the tribunal’s understanding, then it was up to Mexico, using its control over SEGOB officials, to prove a course of event that would be strikingly different from the way interaction between an investor and a regulating agency normally proceed.

73. Whatever the defects of the letter (and with hindsight and professional perfectionism a technically perfect “solicitud” separating a technical description from suggested legal qualification could have been written), I do not concur that by not providing manuals, complete technical specifications and not forcing SEGOB to inspect and test the machines physically,<sup>112</sup> Thunderbird failed with its disclosure duties in a way that any response would be invalidated. SEGOB was not a group of widows and orphans to whom shoddy goods are deceptively sold at the door and which requires the special protection of the law: It was the chief gambling regulator in Mexico; it had battled with Mr Guardia about precisely this type of machines since at least 1998<sup>113</sup>; its legal battles with Guardia had been at the centre of SEGOB activities. According to the chief witness on this issue put forward by Mexico, the issue of the “skill versus chance machines” had been at the forefront of its litigation activity – including five Supreme Court decisions. It is therefore not conceivable that when SEGOB received the Solicitud it did not think of the issue of using the “skill involvement” for relaxing the Mexican gambling law prohibition. The machines itself – and that is essential – were identified in a way that allowed SEGOB to know they were video-slot machines used in the US for class 3 gambling.

<sup>112</sup> Mexico’s counsel suggested proper disclosure should have included the “slot that you can put US $”, “manuals and operating instructions”; a “machine to show how these machines worked or even photographs of these machines”, p. 99-100. But that seems to be second-guessing ex-post the Mexican gambling regulator’s role. They had to know, and presumably did know, what information they needed and wanted. They could have easily obtained any information they wanted from Thunderbird as they controlled the process of the for Thunderbird vital “green light clearance”.

<sup>113</sup> Alcantara, 874, 917 (“there have been a number of decisions by the Supreme Court, one in 1998, and four other ones in 2000”)

74. If SEGOB had had the slightest doubts about the nature of the operations, it had the duty to investigate. The preparation of an administrative decision is not the responsibility of the applicant, who does what the government requires of him, but of the Regulator. It is not – as implicit in the majority's award – the obligation of private applicants to tell the national chief regulator how to run its business, but the public authority has to advise applicants what information it requires. This is even more so as SEGOB had enough time; the time between the receipt by SEGOB of the Solicitud and the delivery of the Oficio is quite short; the claimant's narrative of several weeks (if not months) of informal discussions between SEGOB and its lawyer-lobbyists Aspe & Arroyo has not been contested. It is also the way such business is conducted practically and in reality. One does not write out of the blue a request to a government agency, but the rules of the art of interaction with the regulator normally involve an informal period ("sounding-out") with the formal inputs and outputs (Solicitud and Oficio) only as the ultimate official documentation of an informal process of consultation. Again, with full sensitivity of the controversial skill-chance issue created by years of litigation, with clear indicators of a wish to liberalise gambling policy by interpretation rather than full-fledged legislative change, one has to expect the Regulator knew exactly what the issues were. It must have considered a physical inspection superfluous – much as later Mexico felt a physical inspection of the machines was not necessary for its principal expert, Prof Rose to develop his views later presented to the tribunal. Respondent can not now argue that its federal Gambling Regulator needed more information which should have been provided by Thunderbird without being asked to do so when its NAFTA defense unit considered such information for a foreign gambling law expert not necessary.

75. The consequence is that Mexico has not met the incumbent burden of proof that there was deception of SEGOB by insufficient disclosure. It should have brought the SEGOB officials involved to the tribunal. Since it did not do so, the inference must be allowed that it considered that production of these key witnesses to the events would not have supported its argument of deception – nor its argument about the meaning conveyed with the Oficio.
76. SEGOB therefore knew full well what these machines were like and what issues they raised; the over two years of litigation occupying SEGOB's core attention focused on one issue: The question if slot machines with stop-functions (video-poker) could be exempted from the Gambling Law because of the publicly and in litigation alleged "skill" character<sup>114</sup>. I suggest that SEGOB therefore understood the issue at stake quite possibly much better than Thunderbird itself. The uncontested evidence on the interaction between Thunderbird and SEGOB officials suggests that the officials had encouraged Thunderbird to seek a clearance – rather than the confrontational strategy with Guardia which must have cost SEGOB a large amount of resources and loss of face. If SEGOB had had any doubts about the machines, they could have easily asked Thunderbird to provide more information and inspect the machines – which were available in the offices of Baker McKenzie in Mexico City. The fact that they did not suggests that SEGOB had not the slightest problem in terms of awareness. The confrontation with Guardia and other Mexican operators must have provided to SEGOB all relevant technical understanding and legal sensitivity. They must have known how such machines functioned and how skill and chance played a role, both from a technical and legal/regulatory perspective. It is not proper to consider a large country such as Mexico with a fully developed legal and administrative system, a 60+ years old gambling law and an experienced regulatory agency as acting, on the highest level of this specialised regulator, as un-informed, naïve, inexperienced and not aware of the key issues relevant at the time in their line of business. We have to consider SEGOB as a competent regulator of its industry which knew what it was doing. The respect for government owed by international tribunals requires also respect for its officials and regulatory agencies – and with this respect, naturally, comes responsibility.

77. Nor did SEGOB have any doubts – or could have any doubts – that the investor was asking for an assurance in the light of its interest to invest under conditions of greater legal certainty in a “grey area” of the law where the competent government agency’s authoritative interpretation would make the decisive difference<sup>115</sup>. If SEGOB had had any doubts about either what machines were being envisaged, their technical character and the way they functioned, or the interpretative challenges they raised, they could have easily – and should have under the transparency and avoidance of ambiguity rule – requested Thunderbird to amend and back-up its “solicitud”. That they did not do this indicates that SEGOB saw the letter – as Thunderbird intended – not as a technical description of the machines, but as a request to confirm the legal qualifications that Thunderbird, after informal consultations, proposed or was recommended to propose. The same approach was practised by Mexico in the arbitration. Not only did SEGOB never feel it was necessary to inspect and test the machines, but respondent, in its defense, did exactly the same: It let its principal (but foreign) expert, Professor Rose, opine on the machines, their functionality and the legal implications under Mexican law in great detail, but never felt it necessary to let him see, inspect, review and test the machines (which were in Mexico's hands)<sup>116</sup>:

<sup>115</sup> See testimony Watson, supra; the same was expressed by CEO Mitchell, never seriously contested by Mexico. Plus, it is in the very logic of foreign investment that serious commitment of capital in a grey area of the law needs to be risk-managed, and such risk management is best done by getting a comfort letter/interpretative assurance from the competent regulatory agency. This is indeed common practice in other areas of high-value foreign investment in areas of substantial political risk, as e.g. in the Sakhalin oil-gas investment process in Russia where a similar “comfort/interpretative” letter was informally negotiated and in the end issued by the Russian Prime Minister (direct information).

Question: "Did counsel for Mexico indicate that they had it in their ability to provide a machine for your review if you could work out the logistics? Answer Rose: "I don't think we ever really got to that stage".

The Mexican approach throughout this case - be it SEGOB at the Oficio-stage, newly directed SEGOB in the prohibition phase or Mexico in the defense stage - has been that the functionality of the machine was self-evident, and no need for in-depth inspection and examination was necessary<sup>117</sup>. If, after all the controversy on skill and chance, Mexico still felt it was not necessary to let their principal expert examine the machines physically and directly, then the conclusion to be drawn is that at no time was there any doubt with SEGOB about how the machines functioned and what legal issues they raised. The "lack of disclosure" by Thunderbird argument hence can go nowhere: Re-examining the machines in August 2000 - as during the subsequent NAFTA arbitration from 2002 to 2005 - would have been to "bring coal to Newcastle" or "owls to Athens". SEGOB and Mexico's counsel never thought it was necessary to examine the machines in detail - and the tribunal, I suggest, should not theorise on SEGOB's ignorance as SEGOB and Mexico's counsel, then and now, act in a way that indicates that they have a perfect understanding of the machines at issue.

To sum up: Since I view the Solicitud as a proposal for a legal qualification of the machines as not being covered by the Mexican gambling law, I can not view the claimant's Solicitud as lacking in required disclosure of the technical nature of the machines. There can be no deception of SEGOB if

SEGOB was or must have been aware of the nature of the machines, the legal issues raised, the precedential litigation and if the Solicitud in essence was conceived as and understood as a legal advocacy. The facts were evident and knowledge of them was shared by both parties; what was at issue was the legal qualification. Even Mexico's chief expert describes the moment in time when the Oficio was issued as "a great movement right before President Fox was elected" for liberalisation of the gambling law. And he equally provided the explanation for the subsequent reversal of SEGOB's position under the new PAN government:

"then some sort of scandal or political issue hit, and the government had to back away".

78. Nothing can be more persuasive for explaining Mexico's attempt to liberalise by stealth, through the "oficio" interpretation and its subsequent reversal (at the cost of the investor) than Professor Rose, Mexico's own chief expert and authority on comparative gambling law.

"Oficio" (or "Criterio") of August 15, 2000 – the Interpretative Assurance or Comfort letter

79. The formal letter that emerged is an extreme case of bureaucratic obfuscation: While protecting the "back" of the officials that signed and authorised that letter by ambiguous references, sometimes to machines where chance does not "intervene" (there is hardly any game where chance does not at least have a minor role – so Mexico's principal gambling law expert Rose<sup>118</sup>), sometimes to machines which "predominantly" ("preponderante") involve chance<sup>119</sup>, the main "operative" message of the letter is: Yes – go ahead with the machines if they are as you qualified them, but bear in mind that machines which involve “predominantly” chance are not allowed. A very rigorous analysis, done with hindsight of 4 years of national and international litigation and with the sophisticated expertise of my respected colleagues examining closely the Oficio word for word (paras. 159, 160), can plausibly come to the conclusion that the literal text of the letter did not give unambiguous clearance if chance was involved in the operation of the “skill” machines<sup>120</sup>. Chance is evidently involved to a substantial extent, as it is in every respect of human activity, so my colleagues have some justification in suggesting this letter was not the un-ambiguous and clear assurance to Thunderbird that it could go ahead.

80. On the other hand, if the letter is read from the perspective of the addressee and a “reasonable businessman” of the relevant trade without the benefit of 4 years of litigation, and over twenty lawyers and experts poring over every word in the letter, a different message emerges. The letter does not say: Your machines (which SEGOB knew perfectly well) are not allowed nor did it say: We think your machines are the same as Guardia’s machines (which SEGOB knew or should have known) and as you know they can not be operated in Mexico. It did give a positive signal – you can go ahead; its qualification (“as you described the machines”) refers back to “legal” interpretation given by Thunderbird in its “solicitud” to the machines. Possibly, it plays intentionally with ambiguity in the “solicitud” which was meant to convey the legal qualification but could also be read as meaning the “factual” or “technical” description. Most importantly, and at first sight out of the blue, comes the reference that machines that are “predominantly” involving chance are forbidden. The use of the “predominant” criterium inevitably leads to the conclusion that if an operation that is “predominantly chance” is forbidden, then an operation that is “predominantly skill” is allowed. Predominant means

“more than 50%”. There is a zero-sum relationship between skill and chance. Something that is more skill, is less chance and vice versa. The “predominant” criterium is – as Professor Rose testified and wrote – the key issue around which legalisation and liberalisation of gambling regulation turns:

“There is the difference between whether it is a game of skill or a game of chance, so if it’s predominantly skill, it is not gambling. If it is predominantly chance, then it is gambling”.<sup>121</sup>

81. Using the “predominant” criterium is referring to a crucial gambling regulatory standard. A reference to “predominantly chance” as an indicator of prohibition is therefore automatically a reference to “predominantly skill” as an indicator of legality. I have therefore trouble with the tribunal’s rejection of the “e contrario” argument (para 160), in particular as Mexico’s chief counsel (same as counsel for Mexico later, in the hearing, accepted quite explicitly the e contrario argument as inevitable logic<sup>122</sup>:

Question by President: “But does it address also the question predominantly, now the reverse, predominantly skilled? .. It says one thing, but does it also say the other thing.

Answer: You might interpret it as predominantly ability and skill and not betting Question: So, you would say you can interpret this?

Answer: Yes, sir

<sup>121</sup> P. 751; Rose, Gambling and the Law, p. 80: On California: “devices that are predominantly skill are legal”

<sup>122</sup> Question of president to Mexico’s chief counsel and answer, p. 1161 ; also: Cross-Examination of A. Attallah, p. 207: Question by Mexico’s counsel: “Again, the obverse of this, of course, would be to be a skill machine, the skill machine, the skill would have to be the predominant factor in operation, would’n’t it” and p. 209: “ and what I am suggesting to you and trying to see if you agree , is basically what this is saying that to be lawful, a game would have to require – the principal factor in the game would have to be skill in order to meet this test: do you agree?”

82. It is virtually impossible to determine if the machines involve chance under or over 50%; at best, it depends on the level of player skill which, so respondent expert Prof Rose, increases in a “steep learning” curve, i.e. with a rapid increase once a serious effort at learning is made<sup>123</sup>.

83. With the introduction of the criterium of “predominantly skill or chance”, SEGOB shows the way how the boundaries of the Mexican gambling law’s prohibition on games of “chance” can be relaxed. That is fully consistent with the report of witness Watson’s conversation with ex-Gobernacion Secretary Labastida supporting the “appropriateness” of using the “skill issue” from a “northern Mexican litigation” to relax the gambling prohibition. The “Oficio” can therefore be read as suggesting to Thunderbird that it should not qualify its machines as “only skill” (reflecting the label of “skill machines” used for presentational purposes), but as “predominantly skill”. While “no chance at all” is a criterium that can not be met (by any game), with “predominantly skill” the door is open to discretionary assessment. A gambling industry person can only hear when the term “predominantly skill” emerges the message: “Yes – allowed” – as Mexico’s chief expert Prof Rose said in describing the Californian approach<sup>124</sup>:

A dispassionate expert or a tribunal careful weighing up facts ex-post and after intensive litigation may come to a more nuanced conclusion. That what is relevant for interpreting the conveyed meaning and message by SEGOB to Thunderbird is not what a dispassionate expert or a meticulous tribunal would or should understand, but what the addressee of the message – the Thunderbird gambling industry investors and promoters – could reasonably understand at the time the message was conveyed.

<sup>123</sup> Prof Rose’s testimony is lengthy and never unequivocal; but in sum he concedes that in video-poker and related games skill plays a role; that the more players play and learn, the better they get, that the skill consists mainly in the ability to make rapid probability calculations taking into account prior experience and that the predominant criterium is fuzzy and can not easily be pinned down and that it is and can be used to introduce liberalisation – pages 773-791.

84. SEGOB's and Thunderbird's interaction can not be construed on the sole basis of the text of the "Oficio" as would be read in isolation by sophisticated international lawyers, but they need to be read as the "people in the business" – the gambling regulator and gambling professionals – would read them. In proper methodology for construing contractual text and text of unilateral declarations addressed to investors as we have here, it is the "horizon" and perception of a reasonable person in the trade that counts. And here "predominantly skill" means – let us simply trust Mexico's chief expert in this matter: "Yes".

85. With this criterium, a large leeway of discretionary interpretation is opened: Do video-slot machines running on software involve skill at 10%, at 51%? There is no fully objective determination possible; player skill and experience determine the relative proportions of chance and skill. In capturing the main message conveyed by the text in its particular context, we need to acknowledge the desire by Thunderbird to get legal clarification for its investment. That was perfectly known to SEGOB. We need also to appreciate that SEGOB knew and must have known all about the technical nature of the machines and the legal sensitivity, tested in many litigations and administrative procedures. The August 15, 2000 "criterio" ("oficio") has then to be seen as SEGOB giving a green light (at the end of a long tunnel darkened by ambiguity and obfuscation). The numerous reservations can be explained by the usual self-defensive strategies of bureaucracies<sup>125</sup>. Some of the reservations – i.e. "predominantly" skill-involving versus "involving no chance at all" – are contradictory. But the ultimate message for a reasonable businessman in that situation was the answer to his question: Can we operate these machines which you know?: Yes, you can, just be careful and note that you – we – have to present this as something that can be qualified as “predominantly” – but not exclusively – skill-involving. That explanation fits perfectly with Mexico’s expert Rose’s reference to the window of opportunity for relaxation of the rules that existed just in 2000 (before President Fox was elected) and closed rapidly thereafter. What counts for the legal assessment of the letter is not the text per se, but the way it could be and was likely to be understood by Thunderbird to whom the message was conveyed. It was how Thunderbird could, reasonably, have understood the response of SEGOB to its request – the reasonable perception of the addressee of the message.

86. Thunderbird was no “Fortune 100” multinational company with hundreds of lawyers and country analysts at its disposal. It is a small entrepreneurial company where entrepreneurial activism was not matched with commensurate expertise and caution. But NAFTA would lose its objective of mobilising investment opportunities if its requirements were only suited to very large, expert, well resourced and suitably super-cautious companies. The vigour and dynamics of entrepreneurial drive would be lost; this is not compatible with the cited objectives both from Art. 102 and the Preamble of the NAFTA. If SEGOB had wanted to keep Thunderbird from operating its – clearly identified – machines, it should have said so and it could have said so easily, clearly and unequivocally.

87. This conclusion, I suggest, is the one most consistent with real-life practices and expectations. It takes into account that a private investor will rarely look at what looks like and is intended to be a positive response with the “rigorous due diligence” and the fine comb of an ultra-cautious litigation lawyer based on hindsight, but will look towards the essential message. It was: “You can go ahead – bear in mind: Such types of games in Mexico need to be presented as “predominantly skill-involving””. While a text-book approach would always require that official opinions be very clear, the messy reality of business life in most places and most times is that bureaucrats tend to use obfuscation for self-protective purposes in sensitive situations even if they want to be supportive. Disputes would not go to arbitration and investment treaties were not necessary if every investor would at any stage in its business manage to execute a legal transaction so that there were no doubts whatsoever over a government's intention. To the contrary, ambiguity is the name of the game in dealing with governments and the task of international investment protection comes into play not in the case of the perfectly executed and documented transaction, but in the imperfect one of real life.

88. It is here that the legal criteria identified earlier for "legitimate expectations" need to be applied: The tribunal's majority relies on the ambiguity<sup>126</sup> and lack of clear, unconditional and un-reserved text of the letter. But if we apply the principle that the risk of ambiguity has to be allocated to the drafting government, that a government agency can not rely on intentionally inserted obfuscation to extract itself from the key message the investor relied upon and that the drafter and the public authority in a position of superiority over the foreign investor has to be clear, unambiguous and consistent – then the positive message that a reasonable businessman could have taken from the "Criterio" of August 10, 2000 must prevail over the manifold reservations and contradictions my esteemed colleagues rely on. Similarly, based on the rules developed in particular in the Metalclad v Mexico and MTD v Chile cases, but also reflected in other precedents on the duty of governments' to provide pro-actively legal certainty to investors, one can conclude that if SEGOB did not want to accept Thunderbird's type of operation, it should have said so, clearly, and if it saw that Thunderbird did not get the message properly, it should have repeated the message and ensured it was clearly conveyed and understood<sup>127</sup>.

89. The “Oficio” or “Criterio” is not private legal advice – the claimant did not need any more legal advice having contracted several respected lawyers and law firms already. It comes, as respondent concedes<sup>128</sup>, with the presumption of being an official and authoritative act by the competent government agency. It comes with the full authority of government – on SEGOB letterhead, multiple official seals or stamps of the “Secretaria de Gobernacion” – the Mexican Interior Ministry. It is not a furtive note handed out secretly to Thunderbird to avoid the light of day, but it is formally copied to at least two senior Gobernacion officials; it presents itself as an official unilateral statement intended to have legal implications. It is signed, every page is initialled and it has reference to an official case identification code<sup>129</sup>. There is also a formal act of notarisisation of the document. The more formal a communication by an administrative agency to an individual in a specific case, the more likely it is to create a legitimate expectation; the threshold for informal or general communications is much higher.

90. Formal acts of government have to be treated with full respect<sup>130</sup>; it would not be respectful to treat a government’s formal declaration as if it were the un-informed utterings of an ignorant minor in need of protection against shady dealings. Thunderbird did not want or need a restatement of the letter of the law – it wanted, as was clear to the government, a statement if its “skill machines”, identified properly, could be operated in Mexico. It wanted an interpretation – and with the “predominant criterium”, it received one. We have to assume that SEGOB did mean what it said and was ready to provide “green light” to the investor. The presumption is that such a formal legal advice, sought by an investor, is valid, has an effective meaning, responds properly to the request and in its operative conclusion gives to the investor a clear response. Respondent bears the burden of proving that the “oficio/criterio” was emitted in an improper procedure by officials acting manifestly outside their powers and that it did not convey the main message which was the reply to the main question of the investor: Can we operate our machines – the BESTCO and SCI machines which we (as the other operators) call “skill machines”, in Mexico?

91. We also have to assume that it was intended to say something substantial on the request for “green light” by Thunderbird – rather than just a re-copying of the text of the law. A view that reduces the conveyed meaning of the letter to something close to zero, lacking a true substantive response to the “solicitud”, does not do justice to accepted interpretation methodology for legal instruments which include a legally significant unilateral statement such as contained in the Oficio. Legal instruments formally emitted are in doubt to be interpreted for an “effet util”. If they serve as a formal and official reply to a request for clarification of the law by a foreign investor, then they have to be an effective response to the request. If it did so with so many reservations and ambiguity, then the government has to bear the risk for such ambiguity. There is a presumption – both in international and in comparative administrative law – of the legitimacy of official acts<sup>131</sup>. That is the risk that the government, as price for the due respect to official acts, has to bear.

92. That the “Oficio” gave green light was also the opinion of Thunderbird’s Legal Adviser Mr Ruiz de Velasco of Baker McKenzie. While he reiterated the reservations of the “Oficio” – which lawyer does not equally try to protect his back when giving legal opinions, the operative conclusions, and this is what counts, he confirmed that Thunderbird could go ahead and operate its video skill machines. He may not have understood nor Mexican gambling law nor the functionalities of the machines; possibly, he did not appreciate the implication that the introduction of the criterium of “predominantly skill-involving” machines in the Oficio opened the interpretative door of the Mexican gambling law. But his opinion must be weighed primarily by its clear conclusion rather than by its lawyerly and self-protective reservations. While other sophisticated lawyers are competent to appreciate the self-protective legalese in legal opinions, in particular with hindsight ex-post, our impression from the hearing was not that this applied to Thunderbird. Mr Ruiz Velasco got in cross-examination increasingly confused about disclosure as it should have been, as it was done, about the functionality of the machines and their legal implication in Mexico, but that was because he had little if any understanding or interest in the technical and legal issues of the Mexican gambling law. Had he understood the implication of the “predominantly skill or chance” criterium introduced by the Oficio properly, then he would have been able to give a clearer legal opinion and represent this accordingly before the tribunal.

93. The “Oficio” was also within the competence of the government officials who signed it<sup>132</sup>. Interpretative and similar official assurances and representations must be “legitimate”, i.e. they must be issued by competent officials and not, at least from the due-diligence horizon of the recipient, be against the law<sup>133</sup>. SEGOB is the highest federal authority in Mexico for regulating the gambling business. Such authority involves a competence to determine, for the purpose of the administration of SEGOB, the boundaries of the law. That inevitably implies interpretation of the terms – even if such interpretation was not legally binding in the way courts act and subject to judicial action.

Since virtually all games involve some elements of chance and skill, it is a normal and legitimate activity for the principal national regulatory authority to determine (and to convey to an investor) its own view of the precise line constituting that boundary, even more so as the underlying law, of the 1940s, was quite old and had not kept up with modern commercial and technological developments. International regulatory practices – on which Prof Rose testified for Mexico – had developed the “predominantly skill or chance” distinction; accordingly, it was perfectly appropriate for SEGOB to interpret the 1940s’ Mexican Gambling Law in the light of such practices, in particular as there was a political idea of liberalising the Gambling law around at the time. Liberalising it at the margin – rather than seeking a wholesale legislative change – is often if not mostly used to introduce policy changes in a way that is faster, more efficient and more politically palatable. Ex-Gobernacion Minister Labastida, Mexico’s chief expert Professor Rose and Thunderbird witness Watson all in effect concur that there was, in 2000, a window of opportunity for “stealth liberalisation” using the openness of the “skill” condition and SEGOB and Thunderbird exploited this window. The SEGOB officials therefore issued their “Oficio” well within their real and apparent competence and within the then emerging (but later reversed) official policy<sup>134</sup>.

94. Thunderbird’s view that the “Oficio” was giving formally (even if cautiously worded in bureaucratic language) green light to their operations was also reasonable. First, the machines and their mode of operation were well known to both parties. Second, Thunderbird had made clear to SEGOB that it considered the issuance of a comfort letter as significant to their operation, and also engaged on the path of cooperation with the government rather than the confrontational strategy applied by Mexican competitor Guardia. They might have been more cautious; they might have seen that the “Oficio” left many escape routes to SEGOB and was not an absolutely clear and un-ambiguous assurance. But they were not unreasonable in drawing comfort from what appeared in the context of their communication the positive attitude of the Oficio towards Thunderbird's machines and the confirmation of this positive message in the operative paragraph of their legal adviser's subsequent legal opinion letter.

95. To sum up: The expectation was created, by the competent officials in their normal conduct of affairs, with Thunderbird and it was also reasonable by Thunderbird under the circumstances to draw confidence from the Oficio. We do therefore have a "legitimate expectation" protected by Art. 1105 of the NAFTA. Thunderbird evidently understood the "Oficio" to give green light, but my analysis also suggests that it could reasonably and in the context of the regulator-gambling business interaction understand the operative message and the "predominant" criterium to mean that green light was given, and for the machines it had named, envisaged for its operations and ultimately deployed for operations. Mexico's case in the main rests on the "deception of SEGOB" argument, but as I have determined earlier, it did not meet the incumbent burden of proof for deception.

Post-Oficio Acceptance of Thunderbird Operations by Outgoing Mexican Government

96. In spite of my different view attributing effectiveness to the "Oficio", I might have become swayed by the eloquent arguments of my colleagues dissecting the Oficio in a painstaking way that the "Oficio" was just not enough to create a legitimate expectation that Mexico's SEGOB was ready to use its powers to tolerate Thunderbird's operations. But the "comforting" messages coming from SEGOB to Thunderbird did neither start nor stop with the "Oficio" of August 15, 2000. As is recognised in "legitimate expectations" jurisprudence,<sup>135</sup>

conduct, as the “consistent and prolonged treatment of a person in a particular way, can create a reasonable expectation that the treatment will be continued until further notice”. Given the difficulty of enforcing Mexican anti-gambling laws throughout the country swiftly, I would not have been willing to qualify the about six months of toleration of Thunderbird’s operations alone, without preceding Oficio, by the then outgoing Mexican government as sufficient for creating a legitimate expectation under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA. But even if one considers the “Oficio” as not sufficiently strong and the post-Oficio toleration as not sufficiently prolonged, the combination of the two creates a much stronger case for a protected legitimate expectation<sup>136</sup>. This is also in line with the interpretation guideline of Art. 31 (2) of the Vienna Convention where subsequent conduct of the parties is taken as a significant indicator of their common intention. In comparative administrative law – in particular in legal systems of the Latin tradition – subsequent conduct by the administration is generally relied upon to interpret earlier, ambiguous, administrative acts and contracts<sup>137</sup>.

97.If SEGOB had been effectively deceived by dressing up a video-poker operation as an innocent video arcade game, as the majority suggests, then it had sufficient time to inspect the operations, realise that they were not what was submitted and for which SEGOB had given green light, but something else that was against Mexican law as then interpreted by SEGOB. Given the sensitivity of the issue and the long legal battles of SEGOB with Guardia starting in 1998, it would have been natural for SEGOB to check on the facilities soon after the “Oficio”

party’s conduct” in Professor Bowett’s statement cited by Reisman/Arsanjani, op. cit. at p. 340

<sup>136</sup> That would also be the consequence of construing “legitimate expectation” in accordance with the common law equity doctrine of “laches” or, in civil law, acquiescence. The six-months by itself may not have been a very long period, but it is the full period from the grant of the “oficio” to the end of the PRI government. The fact that it took a new government with its own politics to rescind the acceptance embodied in the combination of Oficio and subsequent informed toleration suggests rather that the “Oficio” can be legitimately interpreted with the post-Oficio informed toleration by the outgoing PRI government.

of August 15, 2000. Lic. Alcantara testified to his ever present will to pursue vigorously and consistently any perpetrators<sup>138</sup>. Nothing would be more normal after a so carefully drafted Oficio than to inspect Thunderbird facilities to see that the “warnings” were observed and the machines were as what they were presented to SEGOB. But there was no action by SEGOB throughout 2000 and beyond – until a new government and thereafter a new Director of SEGOB – Guadelupe Vargas – took office. The first actions against Thunderbird, reflecting the change of interpretation and enforcement attitude, started in February 2001, i.e. only after a new government and a new SEGOB Director had taken office. I do therefore not share the tribunal’s view (para 165) that “approximately six months” is “insufficient to establish that prior to that date SEGOB had authorised (or was intentionally tolerating) Thunderbird’s operations. It was not just the mere passage of time from August 2000 to February 2001 that is relevant, but the fact that toleration and an absence of any action of monitoring, inspection, request for information or enforcement lasted throughout the whole period remaining for the outgoing PRI government. It only ended when a new, PAN-appointed SEGOB director, took office. As we have to read the “Oficio” in a way that is most likely to reflect the true intention and common understanding of the parties in the context of their interaction, it is only that period – of the same group of players motivated by the same type of approach and attitude to gambling regulation – that we have to look at. We do not have simply a period of six months’ toleration – short some might say for many government agencies to get their acts together, but the full remaining period of the tenure of the government which negotiated and later issued the “Oficio”. I note that in Biloune v. Ghana<sup>139</sup> the tribunal identified the about 12-months’ long toleration of a visible construction as a key factor for a finding of expropriation, i.e. a sanction that reaches much further than the Art. 1105 NAFTA breach at issue here<sup>140</sup>. But 12 months of toleration of a construction process indicates much less than the combination of a formal, though ambiguous, interpretative assurance combined with toleration not only of the prior process of establishing the gambling facilities, but also of their operation subsequent to the Oficio to the very end of the government's tenure. On the Biloune principles, Thunderbird had therefore a much better case for the lesser Art. 1105 NAFTA claim. Different from Biloune where a positive signal from the regulating agency was alleged, but contested, Thunderbird had a very formal assurance letter following its formal request plus a subsequent toleration of the very operations for which the Oficio had been requested.

98. In Thunderbird, the assurance letter was given in light of a well known interpretative dispute, where the facilities were not only established, but up and running and where the government had a specialised agency charged with monitoring and enforcing the regulation-intensive gambling law and where the government prided itself on rapid and energetic enforcement. The comparison with the Biloune case thus reinforces the view that SEGOB's conduct subsequent to the Oficio letter, throughout the outgoing PRI government, not only expressed toleration, but allows us to read the preceding Oficio in light of the subsequent toleration.

99. The combination of the "Oficio" with the continuous tolerating acceptance of Thunderbird's operation by SEGOB to the end of the term of the government – which had been responsible for issuing the Oficio – suggests that SEGOB knew exactly what it gave a green light for and was content with it. The conduct of both parties subsequent to the key "Oficio" – Thunderbird's continued investment and SEGOB's tolerance – confirms that the "Oficio" was meant to give green light to the installation and operation of exactly the type of software-programmed slot machines Thunderbird operated and that SEGOB was perfectly aware and accepting of this fact – regardless of circuitous and convoluted way it formulated the Oficio.

<sup>140</sup> In Biloune, the claimant also raised an assurance from government authorities for his construction without permit, but such an assurance was contested and in the tribunal's view not necessary for its determination of a "constructive expropriation".

100. In interpreting legal acts, what counts in the end is what the parties intended and what the recipient of a legally relevant communication did and could reasonably understand the main message to be. The fact that it took a new government and a new director – with his own sets of attitudes, affiliations and alliances<sup>141</sup> – to reverse the course that the Oficio of August 15, 2000 had most cautiously taken, suggests that the earlier Mexican government had indeed given green light to Thunderbird, had been fully conscious of it and accepted the consequences of Thunderbird now backing its expectation with substantial follow-up investment. The fact that it took a new government and a new SEGOB director to suddenly reverse the course – and the fact that “the first closure order was issued” against Thunderbird in early 2001 – and not against the confrontational Mexican competitor Guardia – is unlikely to be coincidental: Thunderbird was penalised for having collaborated with the (earlier) government and for having been part of the earlier government’s attempt to gradually relax the gambling prohibition.

101. If this is not enough to explain what SEGOB meant and the investor understood with the Oficio, then the “pro-active” duty of government to avoid contradiction and confusion of the investor – developed in the MTD v Chile, Tecmed v. Mexico and Metalclad v Mexico cases – would come into play. Given the close interaction between SEGOB and Thunderbird, one has to assume that SEGOB was aware that Thunderbird started to operate with its video-poker and related machines (identified as BESTCO and SCI machines) after the Oficio. If this was not covered by the Oficio – as the majority of the tribunal believes – then SEGOB had a duty to advise the investor accordingly and to ensure no legitimate expectation would arise. That they did not so, both confirms the meaning SEGOB and Thunderbird assigned to their Oficio, but also that SEGOB would have breached the duty of transparency and fair dealing with the investor by letting him run blindly into an open knife.

Disappointment of Legitimate Expectation with Discriminatory Elements in the Enforcement Process

102. The element of breach in the case of legitimate expectations under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA does not consist in the act of creating them, but in the disappointment of such expectations i.e. when a government changes course after the investor made its investment. We need therefore to examine not only how the expectations were created, but also how they were breached. Legitimate expectations – under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA or equivalent investment protection treaties - is never to be seen as an iron-clad guarantee – comparable to a long-term concession contract with a stabilisation guarantee – that policies will not change. Throughout the extensive jurisprudence surveyed, we find that if governments reverse their previously communicated and relied upon course, a balancing process takes place between the strength of legitimate expectations (stronger if an investment for the future has been committed) and the very legitimate goal of retaining “policy space” and governmental flexibility. Equality between individuals and absence of favouritism – i.e. non-discrimination – plays a role in the assessment of legitimate expectation<sup>142</sup>. That is even more relevant in investment treaties where the prohibition on discrimination in favour of domestic competitors is formally enshrined, as in Art. 1102 of the NAFTA.

<sup>142</sup> Mairal, p. 104. That “discriminatory elements” can play a role in the examination of Art. 1105 of the NAFTA does not mean that a breach of Art. 1102 may automatically lead to a breach of other NAFTA obligations such as Art. 1105 or Art. 1110. That is also confirmed by the interpretation by the NAFTA Commission quoted in the award.

Courts have made reference to transitional measures<sup>143</sup> to smooth a reversal of policy. But this is not what occurred here. With the change of government and SEGOB director, enforcement started with priority and focus on the weakest player: the foreign investor<sup>144</sup>. As Licenciado Alcantara confirmed: The first closure order, under the new director, was issued against Thunderbird's Nuevo Laredo facility<sup>145</sup>. The new SEGOB director did not go first, as one would have expected, against Guardia who had never sought or obtained a comfort letter from government, but against the foreign investor who had engaged with the (previous) government and obtained an assurance, as disputed as such assurance later became. Enforcement attempts against Guardia followed, but they were ultimately not effective. It is hard to tell and the evidence is not conclusive if Guardia was simply more skilful with his "amparos" before Mexican courts or if SEGOB was pursuing Guardia with less intensity than Thunderbird, a much easier and politically less protected target. Lic Alcantara's, SEGOB's enforcement lawyer, cross-examination indicates that the direction of enforcement was not in his discretion but ordered from above by senior authorities ("Unidad de Gobierno")<sup>146</sup> in the "Secretaria de Gobernacion". Lic Alcantara – keen as he said he was to enforce vigorously - was excluded from such deliberations and acted simply as a lawyer executing enforcement directions given from above. His cross-examination indicated quite clearly that when he was given an enforcement job, he went about energetically, but the targets were

given to him from above. Nothing has come to light or been produced by Mexico on who these officials were, how they went about their business and if they directed enforcement actions with equal energy against both Thunderbird and Guardia. This is another “black box” in Gobernacion overseeing SEGOB. But the results speak against such equality. Since the prima facie results indicate that Thunderbird was singled out without good reason (Guardia’s confrontation should in normal circumstances made him the first target), and since access to these people and their conduct controlling enforcement is under Mexico’s exclusive control, the prima facie presumption is that they favoured Guardia or at least had a particular reason to go after Thunderbird first rather than after Guardia<sup>147</sup>. That leads to another – rebuttable but not rebutted or explained and proved – presumption that there was an intention to discriminate against Thunderbird and quite plausibly to thereby favour the chief and most potent and visible Mexican competitor. Support comes here again from the method of the Feldman v Mexico tribunal<sup>148</sup> which inferred from a number of factors – including the willingness of the foreign investor to raise a NAFTA claim and the better-treatment of a well-connected Mexican investor – that there was a good case for an intention to single out Feldman because he was a foreign investor; with the unwillingness or inability of the government of Mexico to rebut that plausible conclusion based on available factual “dots” which the tribunal was able to connect with an explanatory “line”,<sup>149</sup> the tribunal rightly inferred from the available

“dots” that they were connected by the “line” of discriminatory intention.

103. While I have come to an agreement with my respected colleagues that such conduct may not have amounted to a full breach of the national treatment duty of Art. 1102, I find more than enough “discriminatory elements” that have to be taken into account when judging the disappointment of legitimate expectation inherent in the rapid priority enforcement of closure against Thunderbird. “Discriminatory elements” may per se not amount to a breach of Art. 1102 of the NAFTA (and I concur that breach of one NAFTA Chapter XI duty does not necessarily indicate the breach of another one), but in particular in the context of fair and equitable treatment (Art. 1105 of the NAFTA) discriminatory elements have to play a role in the process of determining if problematic conduct has risen to the required threshold of intensity required under Art. 1105. I am comforted here by the similar (or identical) approach of the prestigious Eureko v. Poland (2005) tribunal; it has also linked “discriminatory conduct” with a finding of a breach of the fair and equitable standard<sup>150</sup>.

104. It is clear from the uncontested evidence and my assessment of the witnesses, in particular Lic Alcantara, that the reversal of government attitudes towards Thunderbird started right after the new PAN government and its new director of SEGOB, Guadalupe Vargas, took office and that it developed a special vigour in enforcing the law against Thunderbird. That is evidenced by the not contested fact that the first closure order was against Thunderbird. Under normal circumstances, one would expect that the first target of a more vigorous anti-gambling policy should have been Guardia who had pioneered the “skill” machine operation since 1999 and openly defied SEGOB, going as far to brag in public about his success of running such operations “with or without the law”<sup>151</sup> – rather than Thunderbird who had chosen the approach of not confronting, but cooperating with the Regulator. Guardia is described in the most illustrative article as “friend of PAN politicians”. I therefore find the justification for a presumption of discriminatory enforcement energy and direction in the result. We do not know and hardly are able to know what happens exactly in the “black box” of government administration, in particular in sensitive matters and where domestic competitors are linked with government services against foreign competitors. That is why a distinct treatment by result raises the presumption of a discriminatory strategy and intention. SEGOB was, with respect to Thunderbird, successful before the Mexican courts. But such combination of exceptional enforcement energy and success did not occur against the competing operations of Mr Guardia. What happens within the Mexican courts is not separate from the measures SEGOB took nor does it provide immunity for SEGOB action: Mexico is before the NAFTA responsible for its courts as it is for the conduct of SEGOB<sup>152</sup>.

105. Without an extensive analysis of the national treatment obligation – Art. 1102 – I read the relevant jurisprudence – Pope-Talbot v. Canada, Myers v Canada, Feldman v Mexico and Occidental v Ecuador – as requiring the claimant to prove “likeness” and different treatment at least de-facto, with the burden of proof that such difference in treatment is either linked to legitimate policy objectives or <sup>151</sup> This is even more so as Guardia had publicly taunted SEGOB and had claimed political and religious (“Santa Rita”) protection to explain his success in running gambling operation – in dramatic contrast to Thunderbird which had taken the route of the “Oficio” assurance; Exhibit C-97, article from Millenio, August 18 of 2003 on Jose Maria Guardia, entitled: “Abriré mi casino con o sin ley” (I will open my casino with the law or without the law”. Guardia is described in this article as “Amigo de políticos PANISTAS” – i.e. as friend of “PAN” (the new government party) politicians.

<sup>152</sup> I concur with my colleagues that the allegations by Thunderbird do not rise, in their aggregate, to the serious and material due process breach that would qualify as a “denial of administrative justice”. But I remain troubled over the fact that it is not contested that the chief government lawyer, Alcantara, had an over 13 hours private discussion with one of the “Colegiado courts”, Witness Watson, 421, 422: “Mr Alcantara had arrived the day before the tribunal was to consider this matter, and had spent over 13 hours in locked, closed door session with the Colegiado of the Tribunal”. That may be acceptable practice in Mexico as I am advised, but it weakens the argument that discriminatory elements are not significant as the Mexican courts had cleared SEGOB’s conduct.

unrelated to the foreign nationality of the claimant going to defendant. I also read these persuasive precedents as suggesting that the best-placed major domestic competitor<sup>153</sup> has to be compared with the foreign investor. The fact that there may be other domestic competitors who are also not treated as favourably as the best domestic competitor does not detract from this approach. The reference to “most favourable treatment” in Art. 1102 (3) suggests that it is “the most favourable treatment” accorded to a domestic competitor, and not an “average treatment” or the “worst treatment afforded to a domestic competitor” that is the required benchmark. There is no defense of equally bad treatment for some, politically not favoured, domestic companies.

106. Treatment means the consolidated conduct by national authorities (including courts). I accept that discrimination requires a certain materiality and weight; it also requires that it can not be remedied rapidly and practically by an administrative or judicial appeal readily available<sup>154</sup>. It also does not involve a duty of “affirmative action” by the state to equalise all the informal handicaps which are inherent in the foreign origin of the investor nor does it require that bad luck and lack of litigation skill of the investor in judicial processes be automatically seen as a breach of national treatment. Nor do I see the Art. 1102 obligation to require a government to afford the same toleration to illegal operations just because it is foreign owned – such as supporting a foreign Mafia group just because a local police chief is in cahoots with a domestic Mafia group.

<sup>153</sup> Note Loewen v. US, Final Award para. 14o: “What article 1102 (3) requires is a comparison between the standard of treatment accorded to a claimant and the most favourable treatment to a person in like situation to that claimants.”; OECD, MID-TERM REPORT ON THE 1976 DECLARATION AND DECISIONS Annex V (1982) AT P. 50; Unctad, National Treatment, 1999, p. 33; Myers v Canada, Partial Award, November 13, 2000, paras. 93, 112, 256; particularly in Pope & Talbot v. Canada, Interim Award, June 26, 2000, paras. 11, 24, 36, 38. The idea that one could use the example of badly treated domestic companies to justify discrimination between the best-treated domestic company and a foreign competitor is questionable; it could lead to a situation were some local companies are badly treated to avoid application of the NT standard. <sup>154</sup> Paulsson, 2005, op. cit. supra

107. But we are not faced here with a criminal conduct, but rather an often legitimate gam(bl)ing service the legality of which depends on legal interpretations of the boundaries of the law; these boundaries are neither a thin line nor a bright line, but rather a fuzzy grey area. One can therefore identify government conduct (reinforced by court conduct) – by SEGOB in its enforcement intensity and focus – that leads to the result that the foreign investor who committed its investment after a reasonable comfort letter by the previous government suffers first, while the domestic investor who always played the card of legal confrontation continues to thrive. The most legitimate way to test the margins of a about 60 years old law bypassed by technology is surely to ask the government for an interpretation that takes into account emerging technologies and comparative regulatory practices. Why Thunderbird seems to have been penalised for this approach while the confrontational approach of the major domestic competitor is – 4 years later – still reaping rewards, has not been explained, neither by the government nor by the tribunal in its majority award. The reasons for this difference in result are hard to ascertain. It has to do with what happens within the “black box” of interface between government and domestic business people. But my conclusion is that we have at least a presumption of discriminatory and arbitrary elements in the SEGOB enforcement activity. That presumption has not been rebutted by a satisfactory explanation. Mexico has kept studiously silent on Guardia’s relationship with the government and the reason for his relative success with the courts. That such difference only emerges after a new government and a new SEGOB director have taken office reinforces the idea that SEGOB went after Thunderbird because it was seen to have reached a deal with the prior government.

108. The Mexican government could have cleared up such a presumption by producing the key players on its side: The Gobernacion Director General under whose authority the Oficio was executed; the SEGOB official who prepared and signed it; the SEGOB officials to whom the “oficio” was copied to, Guadalupe Vargas who was the instrument of the reversal of policy with energetic targeting of Thunderbird. Nor did the respondent produce any member of the “Unidad de Gobierno” which, though left faceless and un-identified, ordered Lic Alcantara to focus on and go first after Thunderbird and which must bear responsibility for the relative ineffectiveness of enforcement against Guardia. Alcantara’s testimony on the first target of enforcement – Thunderbird – and on the location of the “command and control center” within Gobernacion indicates only one thing: That the unnamed powers in the “Unidad de Gobierno” had earmarked Thunderbird as the first and prioritised target. That the government did not produce any of these key players – both in the PRI and the subsequent PAN period - supports a not rebutted presumption that Thunderbird was singled out in enforcement. This is the same legal operation as was carried out by the Feldman v Mexico tribunal which found evidence, though never fully explained by Mexico, that the foreign investor was targeted by effective audit-based enforcement procedures, while the politically well connected and economically more powerful competitor was left alone<sup>155</sup>.

109. Accordingly, I find that a breach of the duty to respect investment-backed legitimate expectation under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA has taken place at the time when enforcement began against Thunderbird in 2001 without a similar enforcement effort displayed (on the evidence available and as determined by the operation of the presumption of discriminatory elements) against Guardia. The presumption that at least some discriminatory elements were present in the enforcement against Thunderbird strengthens the position of Thunderbird in the necessary balancing process between its investment-backed legitimate expectation and the equally legitimate acknowledgement of the need for governmental flexibility. Since it is in the end the de-facto situation of different treatment that is compared – Guardia continues to operate from 2000 throughout 2004 at least – the presumption is that there is discrimination. Perhaps it is mere difference of relative luck and litigation skill (though that is not very probable), <sup>156</sup> perhaps Guardia was protected by higher government authorities and had a better way to persuade the courts. But that is not essential: With the evidence of a de-facto more favourable treatment of Guardia by the Mexican state (administration plus courts), Mexico has the burden of proof of explaining satisfactorily and justifying the available prima facie evidence of discrimination. I find the explanations not satisfactorily as there was no proof that enforcement was equally directed; Mexico did not present witnesses from its “Unidad de Gobierno”. Similarly, there was no satisfactory explanation why SEGOB singled out, after the change of government, Thunderbird rather than Guardia.

<sup>155</sup> The lack of enforcement resources was also considered not to excuse discrimination in Gami v. Mexico, para. 94; the issue here is not the relative weakness of enforcement in general, but the prioritising of the resources and energy that were available against the foreign – cooperative – rather than the domestic – confrontational – competitor.

110. The acknowledgement of the legitimacy of government flexibility can not justify that Thunderbird was pursued with most vigour and priority when the dominant domestic competitor managed – <sup>156</sup> Note Ambassador Montano’s reference to Guardia’s very good informal relationship with government offices which squares with Prof Rose’s finding that a strong informal link is normally present when a local operator is tolerated and a foreign one closed down, see supra. It also squares with Lic Alcantara’s statement that he was “very keen “ to close down anybody contravening the law, but needed directions from higher authorities (“Unidad de Gobierno”) – from which nobody was presented by Mexico. These witness and expert statements are consistent with the references to Guardia’s close relationship with the Catholic Church (supporter of the ruling PAN party) and with PAN politicians in exhibit C 97 (Exhibit C-97’s journalistic information squares with references available by google search on Jose Maria Guardia (e.g. <http://www.revistavertigo.com/historico/27-9-2003/reportaje.html>; http://raulrejo.tripod.com/SyPblogs02y03/2003\_06\_01\_raulrejo\_archive.html ). These internet references to Mexican press reporting have not been entered into the arbitral record – except for the C-97 exhibit. Nevertheless, they provide publicly available information which needs to be used critically and cautiously – but in this case it merely confirms what the expert and witness statements from both sides already indicate and confirm. None of these statements and references have ever been contested by respondent. Accordingly, given the theoretical explanation (Rose), the reference (without proof) to close relationship of Guardia to influential politicians (Montano), the reference by Alcantara that the “shots were called from above” when it came to enforcement and the link made in Exhibit .. of Guardia to PAN politicians and to the PAN-supporting Catholic hierarchy, the prima facie evidence properly assessed leads to the presumption that Guardia was not effectively closed down because he was politically well connected and protected, and that possibly Thunderbird was closed down so rapidly in order to eliminate a competitor.

by whatever ways – to continue his operations throughout at least 2004 – though Thunderbird did and could rely on the positive signal from the then government in August 2001 followed by six months of toleration. SEGOB should have given Thunderbird a negotiated transition period to recoup its expenditures and relocate its operations and equipment within a reasonable period in 2001. The government of Mexico is not prevented, in case of a change of government, to change its interpretation of the law – from the view that the Gambling Law prohibited only machines which “predominantly involved chance” to one where there was some substantial involvement of chance in addition to skill; but such a change of interpretation can not override the legitimate expectation created by the earlier government, in particular if it was reasonable for the investor to have confidence in such expectation and if it was clear to the old and new government that the investor had carried out substantial investment because of the government-created expectation that the earlier, more liberal interpretation of the law would be respected. As Jan Paulsson has said:

Was Thunderbird’s legitimate expectation invalidated because of a presumption of corruption of SEGOB officials?

111. One issue has played an important, but not very visible role in the arbitration: The implications of the – uncontested – payment of a 300 000 $ success fee to two Mexican lawyers – Aspe & Arroyo – for obtaining the August 15, 2000 “Oficio” from SEGOB. In principle, it is not exceptional that a success fee was paid for successful negotiations that produced a document that Thunderbird considered important for its investment process (including its relations with its financial backers). Both the Thunderbird CEO and Mexico’s expert Prof Rose testified on the considerable economic value that a license, or a sub-license legal instrument has when it allows operation in a not generally open market. There was an insinuation – never maturing to a full-fledged assertion backed by substantiated facts and evidence – hinting the possibility of corruption. One can not exclude that this insinuation had some influence on the case. The role of the success fee and its implication for the existence or not of a “legitimate” expectation has therefore to be squarely addressed as it would undermine a fair hearing, if the issue were allowed to fester, but would not be made transparent and fully discussed. The tribunal notes (para 150), after an extensive discussion of the success fee arrangements, that “these facts do not have a bearing on the tribunal’s analysis below” and that it can “only interpret the 3 August 20000 Solicitud letter on its face value”. But the insinuation about the success fee arrangements hangs like a heavy dark cloud over the case. It is difficult to see how it can not have an effect on the analysis of in particular the “Oficio” which, as I have suggested earlier, can not be done purely “on its face value” as it is part and parcel and in the end the formal outcome of a prolonged interaction between both parties; an examination of this interaction only allows to place the “Oficio” properly in the context of the investor seeking a regulator’s clearance by a formal letter confirming a more liberal interpretation of the Gambling Law and the regulator’s accommodation of this request, albeit in a convoluted and ambiguous format “protecting its back”. Since I consider that attention must be paid to the context of the Oficio, that it can not be interpreted purely on its own as a free-floating document without history and purpose, I consider that the “success fee” story may have coloured the tribunal’s award. For this reason, the success fee story and its possible implications for the legal effect of the “Oficio” in creating a legitimate expectation has to be faced head on – rather than be developed in detail, then hang ominously over the legitimate expectation claim, but finally be dismissed as formally irrelevant and as such no longer a suitable object for a proper examination.

112. First, there is no doubt that the use of illicit practices such as direct or indirect bribery of government officials would be a reason to invalidate any legal effect of the "Oficio", as indeed the legitimacy of Thunderbird's claim as such. There is ample jurisprudence that a legitimate expectation protected by Art. 1105 of the NAFTA can not be created if deception, fraud or other illicit means were used to obtain the governmental assurance or other rights obtained from the government in this way<sup>158</sup>. There can be no international treaty protection for rights obtained by illicit means. In such cases, there may be an expectation, but not a "legitimate" one. It is generally very difficult to prove bribery as there is usually little if any paper trail. However, arbitral tribunals and courts, in particularly of more recent date and under the influence of the authoritative international conventions (mainly, but not exclusively the OECD anti-bribery convention) have been ready to use presumptions rather than full-fledged and hard to obtain full evidence. If a transaction creates enough suspicion so that – in the practice of the US Foreign Corrupt Practices Act – a "red flag" should show up on the face of the transaction, it is sufficient to require the party in control of such a transaction to prove that it was contrary to "red flag" indicators a proper one<sup>159</sup>. Note again the Methanex v. US award:

“The tribunal is not averse to trying to “connect the dots” as a way of testing Methanex’s hypothesis”, and: “inference is an appropriate mode of decision in circumstances in which firmer evidence is not available” (Part III, B, para. 57)

113. But in this dispute, respondent has hinted, insinuated, focused in cross-examination on the role of the two lawyer-lobbyists Aspe and Arroyo, raised and queries the payment modalities of the success fee (a transfer made from Mexico to an account in the US), but it has never explicitly and properly asserted and tried to substantiate that the success fee had been an instrument of bribery or that at least it indicated – as a “red flag” – a suspicion of bribery of SEGOB officials. Neither Mexico nor Thunderbird have made the key players – Msrs Orozco Aceves (Director General de Gobierno); Martinez Ortiz; Antunano – the signatory of the “Oficio”, Guadalupe Vargas, the successor director of SEGOB, the members of the “Unidad de Gobierno” which decided on enforcement priorities nor lawyers Aspe & Arroyo, available. I have advocated throughout this procedure for pressure under the – limited – powers of the tribunal to make them appear, but in the end the insinuation remained what it was – an insinuation without substantiation and without being available for proper and full testing before the tribunal. The tribunal therefore should, in my view, have drawn inferences from this failure of Mexico to produce these key witnesses and officials – I follow here the as mostly very persuasive view of the late F.A. Mann, one of the past masters of international investment law<sup>160</sup>.

114. In this situation, as always when we are faced with a “black box” in which relevant events occur but which we do not see, tribunals have to work with a system of presumptions and tests of plausibility. It is theoretically not impossible that the success fee and the work of the two lawyer-lobbyists Aspe & Arroyo had to do with illicit influencing of public officials. Similarly there is testimony by Mexico's expert Prof Rose on the great economic value and natural attractiveness that lies in collusion between a domestic gambling operator and the national gambling regulator to foreclose the operation of a foreign competitor:<sup>161</sup>

"If they have closed one down and don't close down a competitor who is very public, then there is the possibility, very strong possibility of bribes".

115. One can infer therefore, the possibility that the energetic closure action against Thunderbird after Mr Guadalupe Vargas took office (without a commensurate enforcement energy and result against Guardia) might involve an underlying Guardia/SEGOB alliance<sup>162</sup>. But both these theories are conjecture rather than proven fact. Having worked in investment negotiations in developing and transition countries for over 30 years, I have rarely encountered a deal that was not surrounded by corruption gossip. Relying on gossip – as plausible as it may appear in particular in conspiratorial explanation models – is never a professional way to proceed in such matters.

116. A legitimate interpretation of the events in 2000 is equally plausible<sup>163</sup>: The outgoing government did consider liberalisation of

gambling. Prof Rose, for Mexico, alluded to the window of opportunity that was open for a short while in 2000. The Mexican Congress had commissioned a study which, subsequently, in 2002 indicated the benefits of bringing the gambling industry back to Mexico. Senior politician and presidential hopeful Francisco Labastida had – as is uncontested – raised and supported the idea of “stealth liberalisation” through an interpretative assurance. Thunderbird’s uncontested narrative of government contacts indicates that SEGOB officials were appreciative of Thunderbird’s willingness to engage rather, as Guardia, confront the government. The sudden emergence of the “predominantly either skill – then yes, or predominantly chance, then no” - criterium in the “Oficio” of August 2000 attests that the criteria used for liberalising gambling regulation in other jurisdictions had come to the attention of SEGOB and found favour with its senior officials. That success fees or “lump sum payments” are paid for lobbyists (often lawyers) for achieving results – rather than just letting them maximise billable hours – is not unusual and not in industries where government licensing – by way of formal concessions or less formal interpretative comfort letters – is of great value. Dealing with governments, including, but not only, developing countries is always a difficult matter, particularly for foreign investors. It is likely to be rare to find a case where local lobbyists – “government relations experts” – do not have to be employed. They come with risks, but their involvement is in practice inevitable.

117. But what must ultimately decide this issue is that Mexico has the burden of proof – even if such burden can be discharged in an easier way by evidence of sufficient “red flag indicators”. Mexico is responsible for the very formal conduct of its officials; there is the presumption of the validity, legitimacy and effectiveness of the Oficio of August 2000. Insinuating corruption but not submitting it for proper of the California regulatory process to accommodate environmental and related citizens’ concerns. In other words, the Methanex tribunal built a high threshold of proof for corruption allegations and allowed any possible prima facie evidence to be rebutted by showing that there was a perfectly reasonable explanation for the incriminated regulatory outcome.

testing in legal combat is not an instrument that tribunals should pay any attention to, directly or indirectly, explicitly or implicitly. To quote the recent Methanex v US award in the context of examining the prospect of inferring conduct for which indicator “dots” might be available, but not the proof of the full story:

“therefore, to establish undue influence, Methanex would, at least, have to be in a position to allege if not also to demonstrate that a legal violation took place” (part III, Chapter B, para 22)

The Methanex tribunal was not impressed with the claim for improper behaviour on the part of the regulating state, though the assertions and facts in Methanex were stronger than the hints and innuendo in Thunderbird. As in Methanex, there was a reasonable explanation for the context and underlying policy of SEGOB under the earlier government to test and marginally expand the boundaries of the gambling law embodied in the Oficio. As a result, the Thunderbird allegations should deserve even less consideration than similar, but factually much more substantiated, allegations in the Methanex case.

118. Mexico, however, has not put forward any substantiated assertion or evidence; it has refrained from putting forward the main witnesses under its control, that is the SEGOB officials past and present. Thunderbird has equally refrained from putting forward Aspe & Arroyo, over which it presumably has less control than Mexico over its own officials. But the issue of bribery affecting the Oficio is something that Mexico has to prove, while Thunderbird only has to come forward with counter-evidence once Mexico has provided prima facie evidence of at least “red flag signals”. Insinuation without the readiness to come forward and have a substantiated allegation properly debated and tested before the tribunal is a poisonous way to conduct litigation. It has become more and more frequent in investment arbitration as both claimants and defendants raise such hints, without being ready to submit them to a full and fair trial. Tribunals should actively discourage this tactic and ensure it plays no role, directly or indirectly, in their deliberation. For these reasons, I see in the light of the evidence available and the defense made by the respondent no reason to question the validity of the legitimate expectation created by the “Oficio” in combination with SEGOB’s subsequent conduct and sudden reversal once new powers took over. If Mexico had wished to question the legitimacy of the expectation created, it should have openly and directly, with substantiated assertions and proper evidence – mainly making its own officials in SEGOB (including the higher-level SEGOB officials which directed its enforcement efforts above Lic Alcantara and which issued the Oficio) available for testimony and cross-examination before the tribunal<sup>164</sup>.

Compensation

119. Since the majority of the tribunal rejected all claims by Thunderbird, I do not need to get into the details of how compensation should have been calculated. But I can provide an outline. I concur largely with Mexico’s back-up argument that at most “reliance damages”, that is damages which were directly and reasonably caused by reliance of Thunderbird on the “Oficio”, later confirmed by SEGOB toleration, are owed. It is widely recognised that a “legitimate expectation” can only then lead to compensation if there was “detrimental reliance”, i.e. a link between the expectation and investment made – a principle which in American takings law has led to the notion of “investment-backed expectations”<sup>165</sup>. That detrimental reliance must also be a “reasonable” one (see Waste Management II v. Mexico, supra). For a normal business person engaged in foreign investment in Mexico, the “Oficio” and the subsequent conduct by SEGOB must have allowed the conclusion that the government was ready to accept the operation of the gaming machines envisaged – something which not only the Oficio, but also other factors (the high-level encouragement of Thunderbird, the discussion about liberalisation of an obsolete gambling law) supported.

<sup>164</sup> See here the Turkish-Greek Mixed Tribunal, Megalidis v Turkey, of 26 July 1928 which uses the method of inference in case of a respondent state which was unwilling to produce evidence under its control relying on the maxim “omnia presumuntur contra spoliatorem”. The tribunal inferred that the claimant’s factual assertions were correct; these could have been rebutted by Turkey if it had made the evidence under its control available.

<sup>165</sup> Pennsylvania Coal v Mahon, 260 US 393 (1972) – discussed in more detail in my article with Dr Abba Kolo:, Environmental Regulation, Investment Protection and regulatory taking in international Law 50 ICLQ 811-848 (2001)

120. The fact that the “Oficio” may have been only one of the various factors in its investment process is not an objection. Business decisions are usually made on the basis of several significant reasons and a single, causative relationship between one key factor – the Oficio – and the overall subsequent conduct by the investor is hard to establish. There is enough evidence that the interpretative assurance by SEGOB was an important factor for Thunderbird for opening the facilities which were already more or less ready and for adding new facilities. There was credible evidence by the CEO of Thunderbird, Jack Mitchell, by P. Watson, the business development consultant and by other credible references to the importance attached to this “comfort letter” by the financial backers. Plus, the payment of the success fee itself indicated that the comfort letter was for Thunderbird a matter of great significance. If the “Oficio” had not been very important for Thunderbird’s investment process as the majority award (para 164) suggests, why did then Thunderbird pay instantly the not insignificant amount of 300 000 $ to those who helped to arrange it?<sup>166</sup>

121. Thunderbird’s position is that compensation were owed (estimated at over 100 M US $) as if its operations had been well established, were likely to run at a high rate of profitability unencumbered by future competition or regulatory measures and should be compensated on the basis of projecting an initial measure of profitability, after disregarding initial start-up costs, into a long-term future. That, however, is not a legally viable proposition: First, that would equate a “legitimate expectation” with a firm, long-term concession contract. But a legitimate expectation under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA is a much weaker legal position than a long-term concession contract. As all precedents show, governments retain flexibility to reverse a legitimate expectation in a reasonable way with transitional measures. A comfort letter may create a legally protected legitimate expectation even if it is not crystal-clear; but it is by far not the equal of a proper long-term concession contract. Even if we had a long-term, legally valid concession contract, one would have to take into account that the initial high profitability stemming from a successful start-up operation of a newcomer in a hitherto largely closed market is likely to give way as other competitors move in and thus, in the normal process of economic logic, depress the profitability. In cases of legitimate expectation (detrimental reliance), at most the government owes the investor the “negative interest”, i.e. the expenditure the investor has undertaken with confidence in the reliability of the government position communicated. But it does not give a claim to the “positive interest”, i.e. to be placed into a situation as if the government had committed in the form of a valid long-term concession contract.

<sup>166</sup> Witness Mitchell, , 234, 235; 279, 280-285. The conditions of the success fee commitment letter spelled out that the fee was only payable if there was “no opposition or limitation to our operations”. Business logic and this in so far credible testimony dictate that Thunderbird did not commit and pay the 300 000 US $ for nothing, but because it was important for increasing the legal certainty of its operations, at least in the eyes of its private investors.

122. The claimant can only reasonably be assumed to have relied on the “Oficio” from about August 2000 to February 2001 when the first dark clouds started to cover the sky over Thunderbird. By then, it had received a warning, could have easily appreciated the weakness of its legal and political decision in light of the ambiguities of the “Oficio” and the entry into power of a new government. By February 2001, it can no longer be assumed to have continued to invest in full confidence in SEGOB’s comfort letter. By October 2001, it was clear that there was a serious problem and the wise course of action would have been to stop operations and take the machines out of Mexico. The relevant expenditures incurred in direct detrimental reliance are therefore quite modest. They can also not include the 300 000 $ success fee which was not an investment after and because of the “comfort letter”, but rather a payment to the lawyer-lobbyists for getting the comfort letter.

Finally, in line with Art. 39 of the ILC Articles on State Responsibility and the MTD v Chile tribunal (paras 240-243), the absence of a rigorous due diligence<sup>167</sup> in terms of ambiguous qualification of the machines in its “Solicitud”<sup>168</sup> and the unquestioned reliance on the “Oficio” in spite of its manifold obfuscations and ambiguities, should lead to a reduction of the compensation due under the concept of mitigation of damage and contributory negligence. While I do not have at this stage to calculate the hypothetical compensation in detail as the tribunal has rejected the claim, I would not have advocated a compensation award exceeding 500 000 $.

123. To sum up: The award I have advocated would have provided a fair and equitable solution. Neither would it have produced exorbitant damages likely to undermine the acceptance of the investment arbitration regime nor would it have let Mexico – which played contradictory games with Thunderbird – come out of the arbitration without a good-governance signal: To be more careful with official assurances to investors<sup>169</sup> and to be more respectful of the expectation created with such assurances even in the context of a change of government, senior staff and policy direction<sup>169</sup>. This is not a zero-sum issue: If Mexico’s official declarations and assurances are given legal effect by way of application of the legitimate expectations concept under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA, Mexico can enhance the credibility and effectiveness of its policy tools to encourage foreign investment. To deny such effect is to reduce the effectiveness of instruments available to governments required to micro-manage an investment promotion policy in relation with specific investors. To Thunderbird and other entrepreneurial companies in a similar situation,

the award would also have sent a due-diligence and good-governance signal as well: To be more careful with ambiguously drafted government assurances, with local lobbyists promising to control government conduct and to phase investment more prudently in alignment with the degree of legal assurance received – and not to make exorbitant damage claims with no legal foundation. Both parties should, in my view, have settled the matter much earlier, in the sense of a negotiated “velvet exit” of Thunderbird from Mexico and not in the style of an abrupt expulsion of the investor out of Mexico.

Costs

124. The tribunal orders the claimant to pay  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the arbitration cost and to pay to Mexico  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the costs of Mexico’s own legal expenditures. It applies therefore the principle of “costs follow the event” to attorney costs. Such a practice is relatively frequent in civil-law litigation, less so in international commercial arbitration, but mostly with considerable limitations and judicial and tribunal competence to reduce such costs<sup>170</sup>. It is not at all practice in North American litigation and arbitration; some US courts have prohibited awards of attorney fees in arbitration<sup>171</sup>. “Fee shifting” is as a rule only allowed in case of misconduct – contempt of court, incompetent

<sup>170</sup> Note the Himpurna tribunal’s consideration of the cost issue which suggests that also in civil law countries – such as Indonesia – cost of legal representation are in practice rarely awarded in significant amounts.

<sup>171</sup> Most recent and extensive analysis: J. Gotanda, Chapter 3 (Attorneys Fees & Costs) in: Damages in Private International Law, Preliminary Draft for 2006 Hague Academy Lecture, at page 19 and notes 85-89. See the UNIDROIT and American Law Institute draft principles and rules on transnational civil procedure (2002), at para 32:

32.3: “the prevailing party must ordinarily be reimbursed its reasonable costs and expenses from the losing party”

32.5:” the courts may reduce or preclude reimbursement against a losing party that had a reasonable factual and legal basis for its position.”- The Commentary says: “Under the American rule, each party bears its own costs and expenses, including its attorneys’ fees”. It seems that in Mexico itself, under its civil procedural code, the principle is as in civil countries – costs follow the event (Art. 7), but this is reportedly tempered by the fact that judges often (mostly?) apply their discretion under Art. 8 to allocate the costs of legal representation to each party. Communication received from a Mexican colleague.

125. One of the US federal judges most respected for an understanding of economic analysis recently ruled that in international sales the loss claimed under Art. 74 CISG did not include attorney fees<sup>173</sup>. The Uncitral rules – Art. 40 – constitute a compromise between the “European” and the “American rule”<sup>174</sup> by establishing a slight (but not mandatory) preference for the “costs follow the event” rule for the arbitration cost, but leave it in the tribunal’s discretion to allocate the costs of legal representation (Art. 40 (1) and (2)). I can not follow the tribunal’s position (paras 213) that the Uncitral rules prefer that the losing investor pays to the prevailing government legal representation (“attorney”) costs: Section (1) of Art. 40 of the Uncitral rules prefers (without obligation) the “loser pays” principle for arbitration costs, but then, in section 2, different and distinct from section (1) leaves it fully open to the tribunal how to allocate legal representation (“attorney”) costs<sup>175</sup>. The distinction between Art. 40 (1) and Art. 40 (2) can not be simply explained as giving “larger discretion” (a term that is hard to appreciate – what is the difference between “discretion” and “larger discretion”?). It must mean something sensible. The only explanation is – in accordance with Myers v Canada<sup>176</sup> - that the limited preference for the “European Rule” for arbitration costs in Art. 40 (1) is omitted in favour of complete neutrality between the European and American rules with respect to “attorney costs” in Art. 40 (2). If it were otherwise, the distinction between arbitration costs (Art. 40 (1) and legal representation costs (Art. 40 (2) would not have been necessary. It is true that according to Art. 1135 the tribunal is empowered to award cost and that reference is made to applicable arbitration rules – including Art. 40 (2) UNCITRAL rules. But I suggest that a tribunal has to exercise its discretion under Art. 40 (2) of the UNCITRAL rules in conformity with well established standard practice; it is well established in administrative law that discretion is not unfettered and arbitrary, but needs to be exercised in line with established principles and practice. What is “appropriate and reasonable in the circumstances” (para 216) does not confer arbitrary discretion on the tribunal in its cost decision, but only discretion within the boundaries of established jurisprudence. That jurisprudence has developed the principle that legal representation costs can only be awarded in case of spurious claims or bad-faith litigation tactics.

126. The tribunal’s decision to order the losing investor-claimant to pay most of the costs of legal representation of the winning state respondent is a significant departure from established jurisprudence by all previous NAFTA tribunals and by most, if not virtually all other BIT-based ICSID cases. It is not required as a measure of damages; the distinction of the award of attorney costs for investor-claimants and not for respondent governments that can sometimes be observe, can be advocated on the basis of this concept: Only – successful – claimants can reasonably argue that attorney costs form part of their damages claim; respondent governments can only argue procedural law principles. It is not required by the Uncitral rules which are relied upon in investment arbitration to provide a standard set of procedural rules; reference to them was not intended to import the “European rule” to investment arbitration under the NAFTA nor does their specific language (Art. 40 (2) require application of the “European rule”. Since Art. 40 (2) of the Uncitral rules provides for arbitral discretion, such discretion must, I propose, be exercised in harmony with the well developed jurisprudence of, first, the NAFTA tribunals and, second, other ICSID-based BIT awards<sup>177</sup>. I am therefore bound to disagree with the tribunal’s departure from well established jurisprudence. Should an investment tribunal operating under a treaty decide to diverge from well established jurisprudence, it should provide in detail and depth the why such deviation should be exceptionally justified. It is also my view that such deviation should be the subject of a proper hearing (orally or in writing) for both parties and based on extensive, in-depth reasoning to establish the compelling need for such an exceptional approach.

127. There are three recent and relevant surveys of the cost decisions: M. Buehler, in a survey that is focused on international commercial arbitration – not investment arbitration – concludes that in “mixed arbitration (meaning investor-state), too, the loser-pays rule seems to be the exception rather than the rule”. “In most cases, the tribunals simply ordered each party to bear half of the procedural costs and left the parties’ costs where they fell.” “Waste Management v. Mexico seems to be the only case where the private party was ordered to bear the procedural costs because it lost its case (nonetheless, legal costs were not allocated”<sup>178</sup>. – The survey of N. Rubins<sup>179</sup> focusing on investment arbitration notes that :

“awards of costs or legal fees against unsuccessful claimants in investment arbitration cases appear to be exceedingly rare” and that “investment arbitration tribunals have examined the issue on a case-by-case basis, more often than not dividing the arbitration costs equally between the parties, and, more frequently yet, ordering each party to bear its own legal fees”.

The most recent and exhaustive survey by Professor Gotanda finds that:

“One trend that has developed is the tribunals’ hesitation in awarding attorneys fees against a private party under the ICSID rules. Where there is case law awarding attorneys’ fees against a losing government party, there is a noticeable lack of cases where tribunals order a losing private party to bear the winning party’s cost of representation. Even where the private party’s claim or defense fails in its entirety tribunals have opted not to award attorneys’ fees and split the costs of the proceeding between the two parties”<sup>180</sup>.

A most recent survey on “ICSID Arbitration Awards and Cost”<sup>181</sup> finds, on a survey of 14 awards:

“The fourteen arbitration decisions reviewed indicate that, with few exceptions, the tribunals generally allocate one half of the arbitration costs to each party. In addition, the tribunals generally hold each party responsible for their own representation costs”.

And it concludes that only “reckless” or “bad faith” claims have led to claimant responsibility for respondent’s representation costs:<sup>182</sup>

“Unless there is a significant error, inconvenience of unreasonable action on the part of one party, it is most likely that each party will bear half of the arbitration costs and their own respective representation cost”.

128. Since this tribunal is departing from general practice, unanimously identified by all recent commentators, the issue requires closer analysis, both in terms of precedential cases (“how exceedingly rare is this tribunal’s approach”?) and in terms of the particular criteria that might, exceptionally and in specific cases, justify the U-turn as made by this tribunal. Before I do this, an observation is called for on the significance of precedent in international investment arbitration. The difference of the role of precedent in commercial arbitration from its role in international investment arbitration may explain why the tribunal made its unusual cost decision, without giving the parties the chance to comment on this departure, and without detailed reasoning to justify its departure. In commercial arbitration, there is no formal and very limited practical “persuasive” precedent. The reason is simply that most awards are still confidential; only a few are published or made public in sanitised form. The award is in the main an explanation to the parties of the reasoning of the tribunal, and there is no requirement or expectation of transparency, including its consequence of respect for established jurisprudence or the need to explain a significant deviation from well-established principles. Similarly, commercial arbitration as a rule applies specific rules of contracts; investment arbitration, on the other hand, applies treaty provisions that are general; in their investment protection core content, the investment treaties (with the equivalent of the multilateral treaties now well over 3500) express common principles and very similar, often identical language<sup>183</sup>. Every interpretation that is public is likely to exercise a general effect and will be taken up by counsel and tribunals in subsequent cases.

129. But that is different in investment arbitration: It is not two equal parties who agreed specifically to submit a dispute to confidential resolution, but it is the investor only which raises a matter usually involving public policy and administrative misconduct (as measured under a treaty’s obligations) against the host state. Investment arbitration is in substance a special form of international quasi-judicial review of governmental conduct using as a default the methods of commercial arbitration<sup>184</sup>. Following criticism for alleged “secrecy” (i.e. confidentiality in commercial arbitration language), awards are increasingly made public and debated – this is the now uniform practice in NAFTA Chapter XI arbitration and increasingly also so in ICSID cases, with all indicators pointing towards greater transparency. As a result of this primarily international and public-law character of investment arbitration, with transparency and public debate, the principles and practices of international law with respect to precedent become more relevant compared to the almost non-existent and at most illustrative character of precedent in commercial arbitration. That difference still needs to be appreciated<sup>185</sup>. In international and international economic law – to which investment arbitration properly belongs – there may not be a formal “stare decisis” rule as in common law countries, but precedent plays an important role. Tribunals and courts may disagree and are at full liberty to deviate from specific awards, but it is hard to maintain that they can and should not respect well-established jurisprudence. WTO, ICJ and in particular investment treaty jurisprudence shows the importance to tribunals of not “confronting” established case law by divergent opinion – except if it is possible to clearly distinguish and justify in-depth such divergence. The role of precedent has been recognised de facto in the reasoning style of tribunals, but can also be formally inferred from Art. 1131 (1) of the NAFTA – which calls for application of the “applicable rules of international law”; these include, according to Art. 38 of the statute of the International Court of Justice : “International custom, as evidence of general practice accepted as law” and “judicial decisions” as “subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law”.

130. In consequence, it appears to me that at the very least that, if a tribunal wishes in a significant question, to adopt a novel philosophy that diverges from well established principles is under an obligation to provide the parties with an opportunity of a full debate – such as calling for a “separate argument on the allocation of fees and expenses after rendering a decision on the merits”<sup>186</sup> – and to provide extensive reasoning which shows that the tribunal is both familiar with established jurisprudence and is prepared to justify its departure from such jurisprudence with in-depth reasoning. While the parties have both claimed all relevant costs, one should assume that they expected and assumed reasonably that the tribunal would follow general NAFTA and ICSID practice with respect to the attorney cost issue. If the tribunal wishes to diverge, it should give the parties the opportunity of a full hearing, at least in writing, to focus on this issue.

131. Arguably, in the context of NAFTA jurisprudence it is not proper at all for any tribunal – whatever their “depth of reasoning” and regardless of whether full hearing was afforded to the parties on the point of divergence – to diverge in a significant way, as this tribunal does here; for such purposes the NAFTA has set up the intergovernmental NAFTA Free Trade Commission (Art. 2001); in cases of similar significance this Commission has provided an authoritative guideline<sup>187</sup>.

132. A review of publicly accessible prior NAFTA awards indicates that there is no precedent for ordering a losing claimant to pay the legal expenses of government except in the case of spurious claims or bad-faith litigation. Waste Management v. Mexico<sup>188</sup> is often seen as an exception in so far as the claimant was ordered to pay the cost of the arbitration – but it was not ordered to pay the legal expenses of the respondent. In Azinian v. Mexico, in spite of finding fraudulent conduct with respect to the contracting out of a municipal concession contract, the tribunal split the costs of the arbitration, with each party bearing its own legal expenses. It argued among others that the “novelty of the issues” and professional conduct by counsel as reasons for its cost allocation in a case that might be seen as a “spurious” or “frivolous” claim by a company that did not measure up to a reasonable standard of integrity and competence<sup>189</sup>.

133. In order to seek justifications for the tribunal’s cost award, we need therefore to seek out the few cases where an award of legal expenses against the losing claimant was – at least to some extent – determined or mentioned: There has been up to now almost no ICSID case<sup>190</sup> where losing claimant had to pay respondent government’s cost. In some cases, the legal costs of the claimant had to be paid by the respondent government, taking into account relative success, efficient conduct and the principle of full compensation of investor damages suffered<sup>191</sup>. In the Myers case<sup>192</sup>, the government of Canada pointed out explicitly that it was NAFTA chapter XI practice not to award legal representation costs. The tribunal itself held that “

<sup>189</sup> Para 125: “The claim has failed in its entirety. The Respondent has been put to considerable inconvenience. In ordinary circumstances it is common in international arbitral proceedings that a losing claimant is ordered to bear the costs of the arbitration, as well as to contribute to the prevailing respondent’s reasonable costs of representation.” I suggest that while the tribunal did not as yet identify explicitly appreciate the differences between private-commercial arbitration and public-investment arbitration, it did so intuitively (and correctly).

<sup>190</sup> I discuss the Methanex v US award rendered after the main text of this opinion was prepared later.

<sup>191</sup> C Schreuer, The ICSID Convention, p. 1226, para 21, 22 with a discussion of special features of the MINE v Guinea case; the principle was also that each party had to bear, irrespective of losing or winning, its own legal expenses.

134. Even in long-term concession contract cases resembling investment disputes, the practice is rather to let each party bear its legal costs, even if the losing respondent has to bear 100% of the tribunal costs<sup>193</sup>. In other recent cases (e.g. Noble v Romania), the “Arbitral Tribunal deems it fair and reasonable that the cost burden be shared equally between the parties, each bearing its own legal and other expenses and 50% of the arbitration costs” (para 236) though “all the claims ultimately failed” (para. 235).

135. Dr Benhamida, in a recent publication in TDM<sup>194</sup>, reviewed about 26 NAFTA and ICSID decisions rendered against the investor in favour of the state. In 19 of these cases, the tribunals decided that every party has to bear its own legal representation costs and to share the arbitration expenditures (tribunal, supporting institution). In all others where the tribunal awarded the winning respondent all or part of legal representation costs an element of either spurious claim or bad-faith litigation tactic was present. In Soufraki v. UAE (not a NAFTA case), the tribunal ordered the claimant to bear 2/3s of the arbitration cost – but each party to assume its litigation expenses. The only possibly relevant investment awards we have been able to identify<sup>195</sup> outside the context of the NAFTA and outside the context of arbitration rules mandating the “costs follow events rule” (e.g. Stockholm Chamber of <sup>195</sup> Since there are probably well over 100 cases, and none surveyed has the type of cost allocation this tribunal now determined, it has been very difficult to find any even remotely comparable case. I have, however, tried very hard with my research support team to review even remote cases not rendered under the NAFTA or within the ICSID system. The only case we have been able to identify is Link-Trading Joint Stock Company v Moldova, an (presumably unpublished) UNCITRAL award of April 18, 2002. In this – Uncitral rules and BIT-based case – the tribunal required the wholly unsuccessful claimant to pay 22000 US $ towards the costs of the respondent government, a cost risk factor that constitutes less than 2% of this Thunderbird v. Mexico allocation of respondent government legal expenditures. Noah Rubins, at p. 126, has only identified one case, Scimitar v Bangla Desh, ICSID Award of April 5, 1994 where costs were awarded to respondent against losing claimant; but it seems such costs did not include legal representation costs of Bangla Desh and the litigation strategy of claimant was contradictory and in the end led to a de-facto withdrawal from the case.

Commerce) are the – unanimous - Generation Ukraine v. Ukraine award and the Uncitral-based (non-NAFTA, non-ICSID) Link Trading v. Moldova case.

136. In the Generation Ukraine case<sup>196</sup> the tribunal did award all costs Ukraine had paid into ICSID and added a contribution of 100 000 $ to Ukraine's legal fees (In the Link Trading case the "contribution" was 22 200 $). But one needs to read the award to get a flavour for the reasons. Not only was the claim rejected in its entirety and no possible reason for a justified claim was found to exist, but the tribunal was also extremely dissatisfied with the claimant's conduct before the tribunal. In other words: It considered the claim as spurious and a not justifiable waste of the resources and attention of respondent and tribunal, both in terms of jurisdiction, merits and conduct before the tribunal.

"The Claimant's written presentation of its case has also been convoluted, repetitive, and legally incoherent. It has obliged the Respondent and the Tribunal to examine a myriad of factual issues which have ultimately been revealed as irrelevant to any conceivable legal theory of jurisdiction, liability or recovery. Its characterisation of evidence has been unacceptably slanted, and has required the Respondent and the Tribunal to verify every allegation with suspicion". (para 24/2_; - "The Claimant's position has also been notably inconsistent." (para 24.3) - Moreover, the Claimant's presentation of its damages claim has reposed on the flimsiest foundation. (para. 24.4) - The Claimant's presentation has lacked the intellectual rigour and discipline one would expect of a party seeking to establish a cause of action before an international tribunal. This lack of discipline has needlessly complicated the examination of the claim. (para 24.6) ". "The claimants submissions .. have been seriously flawed due to the absence of a coherent analysis” (para. 20.26)

The “contribution” of 22200 US $ to the respondent’s attorney costs in the Link Trading case (under Uncitral rules) could prima vista be seen as supporting, marginally, the cost decision in this award. There is, however, no review of precedent and only a very general reference to Art. 40 of the Uncitral rules in the award. But the tribunal also expressed, in its cost decision, dissatisfaction with the litigation conduct of claimant. It noted that the costs significantly exceeded what the tribunal estimated for the security deposit: “due principally to the unsolicited further submission of Claimant” (para. 96). This reference suggests that the 22200 US $ contribution reflected an unnecessary increase of the arbitration cost due to unreasonable litigation conduct by claimant. The case, therefore, rather supports the principle that attorney costs of prevailing respondent can only be allocated to the unsuccessful claimant if there was in the tribunal’s judgment evidence of unreasonable, cost-enhancing, conduct. E contrario, the Link Trading award therefore follows the rule that Art. 40 (2) of the Uncitral rules has to be applied in investment disputes so that the losing claimant does not have to pay the respondent’s costs of legal representation. Since there is no such evidence or indication in the Thunderbird award of any professional cost-inflating or otherwise “bad faith” misconduct, the Link Trading case provides another example of a “jurisprudence constante”: Each party, in particular respondent, have to bear their own attorney costs.

137. The only NAFTA/ICSID case<sup>197</sup> where the parties’ legal costs were awarded to the prevailing government<sup>198</sup> is the Methanex v US case

<sup>197</sup> In Nagel v Czech Republic, available at www.transnational-dispute-management.com, the tribunal awarded to the prevailing respondent 80% of its legal representation costs. It considered the claim not tenable. But the case has been decided under the SCC rules which that came out in August 2005<sup>199</sup>. The tribunal here recognizes, based on a survey of 1991 – i.e. before investment cases became widespread and at a date where modern NAFTA/ICSID jurisprudence on costs did not exist (as it does now):

“Certain tribunals are reluctant to order the unsuccessful party to pay the costs of the successful party’s legal representation unless the successful party has prevailed over a manifestly spurious position taken by the unsuccessful party.”

138. The Methanex award mentions that “other tribunals consider that the successful party should not normally be left out of pocket in respect of the legal costs reasonably incurred in enforcing or defending its legal rights” – but it does not mention such cases, in particular investment claims where the government has prevailed. It also does not discuss the contrast between arbitration and legal costs as is set up between section 1 and section 2 of Art. 40 of the Uncitral rules nor does it give any more detailed reasoning. But from the procedural history of the case, one can infer that the tribunal was not satisfied with the way claimant conducted its claim, in particular with respect to evidence<sup>200</sup>. Given this situation, the Methanex case should be seen as awarding attorney costs to prevailing respondent for the well-established reasons (even mentioned in the award) at para. 9), that is either frivolous claims or claims where the tribunals have developed a apply the “European” principle of costs follow the event and is thus not relevant for NAFTA or ICSID claims.

<sup>198</sup> The ICSID annulment committee in the CDC v Seychelles case awarded 83.345 £ to CDC (original claimant which prevailed in the annulment), but is based its award (para, 89, 90) on its consideration that the “Republic’s case before this Committee was fundamentally lacking in merit. While we refrain from going so far as to say that it was frivolous, we can state unequivocally... that the Republic’s case was, to any reasonable and impartial observer, most unlikely to succeed”.

practice of penalizing unprofessional conduct by the party against which the cost determination is made. To quote:

“The tribunal decided that this documentation was procured by Methanex unlawfully ... in violation of a general duty of good faith imposed by Uncitral rules and, indeed, incumbent on all who participate in international arbitration”<sup>201</sup>.

139. From this survey, it is safe to infer that it is by now a standard principle of international investment law, in particular in the NAFTA context, but also in other ICSID cases, that in principle, each party bears its own legal costs and the costs of the arbitration are shared. Exceptions to this rule have occurred very rarely with respect to the arbitration expenditures and in favour of the winning claimant, but never – except for a limited “contribution” to the government’s legal expenses in the Generation Ukraine and Link Trading v Moldova case – in the case of a losing claimant. The only concept under which this so far well-established rule has not been observed or a different treatment suggested is for “manifestly spurious or unmeritorious” positions taken by the loser, unprofessional conduct and significant breach of good-faith in arbitration<sup>202</sup>. There are a good reasons for this approach which has so far been intuitively, but not yet explicitly appreciated by tribunals in thrall to the attitudes prevalent in commercial arbitration: Investment arbitration is not a reciprocally agreed and structured method of dispute resolution. It is a unilateral right of investors – not mirrored by a reciprocal government right – to claim against alleged misconduct by governments under an investment treaty<sup>203</sup>. It is in substance comparable at most to national and international judicial review of administrative conduct – rather than to the reciprocal “contract” model of commercial arbitration. Governments can not sue investors because investors can not breach the treaty disciplines such as “expropriation”, discrimination or fair and equitable treatment. They focus exclusively on governmental action targeting foreign investors. Governments have made this asymmetric right available because it helps them to attract capital and improves their internal governance, and the perception of their governance quality internationally.

<sup>201</sup> P. 155 at para 58 of the final award. A comparison of the detailed cost submission by the US (approx 3 M US$) with a cost submission statement of Methanex (“Methanex respectfully advises that the order of magnitude sought from the United States is US$11 to US$12 million”) suggests that there had been serious problems in the normal professional relationship between Methanex litigation group and the tribunal, as well as a serious imbalance in the cost submissions (i.e. a very detailed breakdown of about 3 M US$ by the US and a general reference of “11-12 M US$) by Methanex. That would suggest an additional reason for the tribunal exercising its powers under Art. 40 (2) of the Uncitral rules in allowing the US full recovery of its legal representation cost. The Methanex cost decision appears very much to include, or be fully based on, punitive elements – i.e. factors such as spurious claim and cost-increasing bad-faith litigation conduct. The Methanex award (p. 298 and para. 10 there) suggests as one way of justifying its cost decision: “In the present case, the Tribunal favours the approach taken by the Disputing Parties themselves, namely that as a general principle the successful party should be paid its reasonable legal costs by the unsuccessful party.” I would not necessarily agree with this reasoning: The parties are almost compelled by the psychological pressure of litigation to claim at the onset that both arbitration costs and legal representation costs should be awarded to them in case they prevail; to require a party, in particular a claimant, to make at the beginning of the litigation an extended argument why they should not pay legal representation costs in case they lose, is from that aspect of litigation psychology not a practical option. Parties, in particular the claimant, can only then be expected to focus on and develop such an argument in case the case on the merits has already been dismissed and the tribunal calls for a separate debate on the cost allocation.

140. This principle of cost allocation in international judicial review of government conduct is also applied in GATT litigation. There has been a formal proposal to award litigation costs to winning developing countries because of the prohibitively high costs of WTO litigation; one can see this as a similar concept to the idea that investors – in particularly smaller companies – should not be penalized for complaining about host state breach of treaty investment protection obligations; the common idea is that for under-resourced claimants access to justice is illusory if the cost (and risk) of litigation is prohibitive<sup>204</sup>. Costs of the winning respondent have also not been awarded in UN Compensation Commission cases; in the Iran-US Claims Tribunal cases, in a small number of cases where Iran prevailed, it was awarded very modest costs (a few thousand dollars)<sup>205</sup>. It is worth noting that the Iran-US Claims Tribunal relied, in order to reject award of attorney costs, inter alia, on the fact that in the US each party bears its own attorney fees. Its approach of avoiding generalization of a particular legal-culture approach to the cost issue makes sense to me.

<sup>202</sup> SD Myers Final Award on Costs, para 33; Gotanda, 2005, p. 49 ff: citing delay tactics, reprehensive or unreasonable conduct as factors that have moved international commercial arbitral tribunals to award attorneys’ costs. This is also my explanation for the Methanex v US cost award.

<sup>203</sup> In French, the concept is therefore named “arbitrage transnational unilateral” – Walid Benhamida, Arbitrage Transnational Unilatéral-, Doctoral Thesis, University of Paris II, Forthcoming (as monograph).

141. The judicial practice most comparable to treaty-based investor-state arbitration is the judicial recourse available to individuals against states under the European Convention on Human Rights; again, states have to defray their own legal representation expenditures, even if they prevail.

142. Imposing the risk of government attorney costs on losing investors in effect undermines the very purpose of such treaties; it raises the litigation risk in factual situations which are as a rule ambiguous, confused and contradictory to a prohibitive level, in particularly for smaller companies for whom litigation risk is high and where a government enjoys significant superiority in terms of expertise, experience and resources available for defense against NAFTA arbitration. In this particular case, we have had a well integrated, highly competent, coordinated and seamlessly functioning government defense team consisting of over 7 or 8 Mexican and international

<sup>205</sup> Gotanda, 2005, p. 47; Sylvania v Iran, 8 Iran-US CTR 298, 324 (1985): “so far, the tribunal has not awarded costs in all cases and even when it has, the amounts have generally been less than claimed. Chamber two has never awarded any costs, chamber one has awarded relatively small amounts of costs in only a few cases and Chamber Three has in general awarded costs to the successful party in an amount well below the one claimed, using a range between 5000 and 25000 $ with costs of 70 000 $ awarded in one case”. lawyers, including from two expert law firms, hardened by many rounds of NAFTA Chapter XI litigation facing a small entrepreneurial company with (equally competent I should add) two outside single-practitioner lawyers. The tribunal's break-out from – for good reasons – established NAFTA and BIT/ICSID jurisprudence on cost allocation can only be seen as foreclosing access to this type of justice for smaller companies. But that is not the objective of the NAFTA treaty which, to promote trade, new employment opportunities (note the Preamble of the NAFTA), increase investment opportunities and eliminate barriers to trade in, and facilitate cross-border movement of goods and services (Art. 102) is not intended to provide access to investment arbitration only to major US and Canadian multinational companies. The approach to costs in this award suggests that investment arbitration is only for the very large companies, leaving out entrepreneurs with initiative, willingness to take (sometimes perhaps recklessly) risk and who may not have the same “international corporate style” appeal of the “men in dark suits”. But there is no indication that this was the intention of the negotiators of such treaties. The highly unusual cost award thus casts a “chill” over attempts by junior companies to rely on the NAFTA's investment protection regime and makes that recourse – very high-risk anyway<sup>206</sup> – doubly prohibitive because of the now added cost risk. In effect and in practice, it makes recourse to independent justice for smaller companies prohibitive.

143. The only reason possible to use the reversal of standard NAFTA and BIT cost jurisprudence is legitimate reliance on the principle of “manifestly spurious claims” and grave professional misconduct by claimant and its advocates<sup>207</sup>. But it is hard to find such evidence in the Thunderbird – Mexico case. The tribunal itself has been explicitly positive about the professional conduct of the arbitration by claimant (para 213). If the claim had been “manifestly spurious”, the tribunal could have accepted Mexico’s request for bifurcation and in a preliminary decision rejected jurisdiction and admissibility. The implication of ICJ jurisprudence on the requirement that claims be founded prima facie in law and in fact, suggests that manifestly spurious claims should be rejected in a preliminary phase<sup>208</sup>. There is also the practice of the Iran-US claims tribunal to dismiss a claim that is manifestly without merit<sup>209</sup>. But this tribunal rejected the Mexican request for a preliminary phase focusing on jurisdiction and admissibility issues only. This conduct of the tribunal hardly suggests that the claim was manifestly spurious. The fact that it had to rely on a painstaking ex-post analysis of a convoluted and ambivalent Mexican “comfort letter “ (“oficio”), arrived at after years of in-depth argument involving dozens of fine-comb-handling lawyers and evidence from both sides, does not help to establish a “manifestly spurious claim”.

<sup>206</sup> Barton Legum, Lesson Learned from the NAFTA: The New Generation of U.S. Investment Treaty Arbitration Provisions, 19 ICSID Rev. 344 (2004); this study notes that so far no NAFTA case against the US has ever succeeded and identifies in detail the substantial litigation risks; the investor litigation risk assessment by this study would have to be compounded were this tribunal's approach to costs to be followed.

144. Similarly, I do not share the tribunal’s statement that, in order to distinguish itself from the Azinian award (NAFTA protection was sought for a fraudulently obtained concession contract with no indication of governmental misconduct), that NAFTA jurisprudence was no longer “novel”. It may be useful to cite here the approach of the Vivendi v. Argentina annulment committee commenting on and endorsing the cost decision of the original Vivendi tribunal (para 117, 118) which made each party bear its own expenditures:

“It observed that the dispute raised “a set of novel and complex issues not previously addressed in international arbitral precedent..... Moreover, Argentina was entitled to take the position it took, which itself raised a difficult and novel question of public importance concerning ICSID and the operation of investment protection agreements on the model of the BIT.”

In the light of the importance of the arguments advanced by the parties in connection with this case, the Committee considers it appropriate that each party bear its own expenses incurred...”

145. The issues at stake here – allocation of the risk of ambiguity of a governmental assurance, the scope of disclosure to government before obtaining a comfort letter – raise hitherto in BIT jurisprudence unsettled questions of how to apply the principle of “legitimate expectation” under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA. While there have been recently several awards on the question, no easily applicable doctrine of legitimate expectation under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA has so far evolved. It appears to me far from settled that one can dismiss easily a national treatment claim in a situation where the foreign investor – having pursued a cooperative approach – is closed down immediately and effectively, with no luck at all with domestic courts, while government enforcement is never successful with a politically well-connected domestic competitor. Also, the evidence of the government counsel huddling for over 13 hours discreetly with a senior judge in the case does at least raise questions of due process under international, if not national, standards. The tribunal may not have felt such procedural flaws in their aggregate reached the threshold of a breach of Art. 1105, but that is not to say that claimant made a frivolous claim in raising the issue of administrative denial of justice. I doubt that a reasonable, objective observer would have come at the outset to the conclusion that Thunderbird’s claim was frivolous and manifestly unjustified.

146. Under these circumstances, I must conclude that there is no evidence, so far and on the record of the case, of a “manifestly spurious” claim. One could have thought to define “winning” by a relation of the investor’s claim (about 100+ M US $) to the outcome – zero in the award, about 500K US $ in my reckoning). But that would be a practice of civil law litigation not applicable here. This was a North-American investor, incorporated in Canada but largely run from the US and with a US approach. It (and its counsel) followed what seems to be the standard US practice of making arguably “excessive” monetary claims. But international tribunals have to be careful with cultural prejudices; NAFTA litigation is not meant to penalize claimant and its counsel for what is normal in their own jurisdiction, but which might be seen in other jurisdictions not as acceptable. A measure of cultural tolerance is required in transnational dispute resolution.

147. Another reason one could think of would be that the claim related to gambling, an industry that is seen in many religious quarters as not very salubrious and provoking a moral opprobrium. But gambling, while usually heavily regulated, of the type at issue here (slot machines) is an entertainment activity that is widely practiced around the world<sup>210</sup> and can not be per se condemned as not worthy of investment treaty protection. The next reason I can think of as providing a justification for this decision deviating significantly from standard investment arbitration practice is the suspicion raised by the payment of the success fee – i.e. that possibly the two lawyers who arranged for the comfort letter may have shared that fee with Mexican officials. If it were so, I would have no hesitation whatsoever to penalize the claimant for daring to use an investment treaty to protect the fruits of unethical behaviour. As I have argued earlier, I would not require full proof, but rather enough corroborating indicators leading to a reversal of the burden of proof on claimant. But Mexico has not raised this suspicion openly, with substantiated argument and evidence and with a credible effort to bring its own officials who were involved in the comfort letter to the tribunal. In that situation, I consider that we have to disregard insinuations of bribery if they are not properly raised, substantiated and open to a fair hearing. Otherwise, and with this award, a signal is sent out to respondent governments to insinuate corruption as a standard defense technique; it is persuasive and effective, without having to stand up to the proper scrutiny of a full and proper litigation debate. The negative proof of non-corruption, is rarely possible. There is no foreign investment where a close interaction, mostly with use of local consultants, with the government can be avoided. The whiff of corruption can therefore be made to appear in virtually any foreign investment project.

To conclude: While I have sympathized with my colleagues' view not to find a breach of the principle of "legitimate expectation" under Art. 1105 of the NAFTA , I find no reason to reverse a well established NAFTA and ICSID jurisprudence consisting in letting each party, winning or losing, bear its own legal expenses and share the costs of arbitration short of clear evidence of either gross professional misconduct on the part of a party in arbitration or a manifestly spurious claim.

1. Noble Ventures, Inc. v. Romania, ICSID Case No. ARB/01/11 (US/Romania BIT)- Final Award, 12 October 2005, § 230 et seq.	The Tribunal dismissed the claims. The tribunal decided that each party shall bear the expenses incurred by it in connection with the arbitration and that the arbitration costs, including the fees of the members of the Tribunal, shall be borne by the parties in equal shares. The tribunal said that “233. Provisions regarding the Tribunal’s decision in the matter of costs are to be found in Art. 61(2) of the ICSID Convention and Arts. 28 and 47 (j) of the ICSID Arbitration Rules. Noting that none of these provisions mentions specific criteria for the decision on costs, the Tribunal takes into account the following particular considerations: 234. On one hand, it is a principle common to both national laws and international law that a party injured by a breach must be compensated for its losses and damages, which include arbitration costs. On the other hand, the “loser pays” principle is not common to all national laws or international law, and in particular is stated in neither the ICSID Convention nor the ICSID Arbitration Rules. 235. On the issue of costs the Tribunal has taken into consideration all the circumstances of this case. In particular, it notes that, although all the claims ultimately failed, the Claimant succeeded on certain issues, notably the fundamental legal issue of the umbrella clause contained in

	Article II(2)(c) of the BIT as a basis for liability under the BIT in this case and the factual issue with regard to the diligence exercised by SOF after the execution of the SPA, albeit without causal significance. The Tribunal also has in mind that the basic flaws in the SPA are to be attributed to both SOF and the Claimant. 236. Therefore, using the discretion that it has under the ICSID Convention and the ICSID Arbitration Rules, the Arbitral Tribunal deems it fair and reasonable that the cost burden be shared equally between the parties, each bearing its own legal and other expenses and 50 % of the arbitration costs”
2. Methanex Corporation v. United States of America UNCITRAL (NAFTA)- Final Award, 3 August 2005, Part V.	The Tribunal dismissed the claims. The tribunal applied UNCITRAL Rules. The Tribunal observed that it has a broad discretion in relation to its award in respect of costs under Articles 38 and 40 of the UNCITRAL Rules. The Tribunal determines that there is no compelling reason not to apply the general approach required by the first sentence of Article 40(1) of the UNCITRAL Rules. Although over the last five years, Methanex has prevailed on certain arguments and other issues against the USA, Methanex is the unsuccessful party both as to jurisdiction and the merits of its Claim. There is no case here for any apportionment under Article 40(1) of the Rules or other departure from this general principle. Accordingly, the Tribunal decides that Methanex as the unsuccessful party shall bear the costs of the arbitration. With regard to disputing party legal costs, the Tribunal observed that the practices of international tribunals vary widely. Certain tribunals are reluctant to order the unsuccessful party to pay the costs of the successful party’s legal representation unless the successful party has prevailed over a manifestly spurious position taken by the unsuccessful party. Other arbitral tribunals consider that the successful party should not normally be left out of pocket in respect of the legal costs

	reasonably incurred in enforcing or defending its legal rights. In the present case, the Tribunal favours the approach taken by the Disputing Parties themselves, namely that as a general principle the successful party should be paid its reasonable legal costs by the unsuccessful party. In this case, the USA has emerged as the successful party, as regards both jurisdiction and the merits. The Tribunal has borne in mind that, at the time of the Partial Award, it could have been argued that the USA had lost several important arguments on the admissibility issues; but over time the Partial Award does not affect the end-result of the dispute overall, as decided by this Final Award. Likewise, the issues on which the USA did not prevail in this Award were of minor significance. The Tribunal does not consider any apportionment appropriate under Article 40(2) of the UNCITRAL Rules. Accordingly, the Tribunal decides that Methanex shall pay to the USA the amount of its legal costs reasonably incurred in these arbitration proceedings.<sup>212</sup>

Peru, ICSID Case No. ARB/03/4 (Peru/Chile BIT), Decision on Jurisdiction, 7 February 2005. p. 25 et seq.	The Tribunal holds that it has no jurisdiction to hear the merits of the present claim. The Tribunal decides that each Party shall pay one half of the arbitration costs and bear its own legal costs

Gami  Investments, Inc. v.  Mexico, UNCITRAL  (NAFTA), Final Award,  15 November 2004, §  134 et seq.	The tribunal declared that it has jurisdiction over the claims but it dismissed them in their entirety. The tribunal nevertheless finds equitable that each side bears its costs. The Tribunal said that "There are two reasons for not giving Mexico any recovery in this respect. The first is that Mexico raised an unsuccessful jurisdictional objection which became a major feature of the proceedings. The costs associated with that special hearing were significant. The second is that GAMI grievance must be considered as serious. It raised disquieting questions with respect to regulatory act and omission. The Tribunal said that UNCITRAL rules accorded the arbitrators broad discretion with allocation

11. Generation Ukraine, Inc. v. Ukraine, ICSID Case No. ARB/00/9 (United States/Ukraine BIT)-Final Award, 16 September 2003, § 24.1 et seq.	The claim fails in its entirety. The tribunal considered whether there are any reasons to attenuate the general rule that an unsuccessful litigant in international arbitration should bear the reasonable costs of its opponent. Counsel for the Claimant has suggested that "there's more documentation in this particular ICSID reference than has ever been in any previous ICSID reference." The Tribunal is not certain that such an affirmation is verifiable; it is certainly true that the written evidence and submissions in this case have been voluminous. But the Claimant's written presentation of its case has also

been convoluted, repetitive, and legally incoherent. It has obliged the Respondent and the Tribunal to examine a myriad of factual issues which have ultimately been revealed as irrelevant to any conceivable legal theory of jurisdiction, liability or recovery. Its characterisation of evidence has been unacceptably slanted, and has required the Respondent and the Tribunal to verify every allegation with suspicion.

The Claimant's position has also been notably inconsistent. Moreover, the Claimant's presentation of its damages claim has reposed on the flimsiest foundation. The Claimant's presentation has lacked the intellectual rigour and discipline one would expect of a party seeking to establish a cause of action before a international tribunal. This lack of discipline has needlessly complicated the examination of the claim. Even at the stage of final oral submissions in March 2003, counsel for the Claimant relied on two ICSID awards without mentioning that they had been partially annulled. While the Tribunal was fortunately aware of that limitation on the pertinence of those awards, this was due to the happenstance of the arbitrators' personal knowledge. The Tribunal assumes in counsel's favour that he was unaware of the annulments; that is bad enough, and does no credit to the Claimant.

The Respondent has claimed costs of USD 739,309.80, representing "contract payments of lawyers [sic] and experts services and expenses for business trips". The Tribunal is unsatisfied with these uncorroborated costs submissions, and considers them vastly overstated.

It awards all costs the Respondent has paid into ICSID, or USD 265,000 as well as a contribution of USD 100,000 to the Respondent's legal fees.

12. Loewen v. United States (I), ICSID Case No. ARB (AF)/98/3 (NAFTA) - Final Award, 26 June 2003, §240 et seq.	In regard to the question of costs the Tribunal is of the view that the dispute raised difficult and novel questions of far-reaching importance for each party, and the Tribunal therefore ordered that each party shall bear its own costs, and shall bear equally the expenses of the Tribunal and the Secretariat.
13. Yaung Chi Oo Trading PTE Ltd. v. Government of the Union of Myanmar ASEAN Investment Agreement, I.D. Case No. ARB/01/1 -Final Award, 31 March, 2003, § 87 et seq.	The Tribunal unanimously holds that it lacks jurisdiction in the case. As to the question of costs, the Tribunal notes that neither party sought costs at the end of the oral proceedings. For its own part, the Tribunal concludes that no order should be made in relation to the costs of the parties or the fees and expenses of the Tribunal. Each party has succeeded in part in terms of the issues which were argued before the Tribunal, even if in the result the Claimant fails on grounds essentially unrelated to the merits of its underlying claim. The tribunal concluded that each party shall bear its own costs, and shall bear equally the fees, costs and expenses of the Tribunal and the Secretariat.
14. ADF Group Inc. v. United States, ICSID Case No. ARB (AF)/00/1 (NAFTA). - Final Award, 9 January 2003, § 200.	In its Counter-Memorial, the Respondent asked the Tribunal for an order requiring the Investor to bear the costs of this proceeding, including the fees and expenses of the Members of the Tribunal, the expenses and charges of the Secretariat and the expenses incurred by the United States by reason of this proceeding. Having regard to the circumstances of this case, including the nature and complexity of the questions raised by the disputing parties, the Tribunal believes that the costs of this proceeding should be shared on a fifty-fifty basis by the disputing parties, including the fees and expenses of the Members of the Tribunal and the expenses and charges of the Secretariat. Each party shall bear its own expenses incurred in connection with this proceeding.

15. Mondev International Ltd. v United States of America, ICSID Case No. ARB(AF)/99/2 (NAFTA)- Final Award, 11 October 2002, § 158 et seq.	The Tribunal dismisses Mondev's claims in their entirety. As to the question of costs and expenses, the United States sought orders that Mondev pay the Tribunal's costs and the legal expenses of the United States on the basis that its claim was unmeritorious and should never have been brought. The Tribunal said that " NAFTA tribunals have not yet established a uniform practice in respect of the award of costs and expenses. In the present case the Tribunal does not think it appropriate to make any order for costs or expenses, for several reasons. First, the United States has succeeded on the merits, but it has by no means succeeded on all of the many arguments it has advanced, including a number of arguments on which significant time and costs were expended. Secondly, in these early days of NAFTA arbitration the scope and meaning of the various provisions of Chapter 11 is a matter both of uncertainty and of legitimate public interest. Thirdly, the Tribunal has some sympathy for Mondev's situation, even if the bulk of its claims related to pre-1994 events. It is implicit in the jury's verdict that there was a campaign by Boston (both the City and BRA) to avoid contractual commitments freely entered into. In the end, the City and BRA succeeded, but only on rather technical grounds. An appreciation of these matters can fairly be taken into account in exercising the Tribunal's discretion in terms of costs and expenses. The Tribunal concluded that each party shall bear its own costs, and shall bear equally the expenses of the Tribunal and the Secretariat.
16. W. Nagel v. Czech Republic, SCC Case 49/2002	The Arbitral Tribunal has reached the conclusion that Mr Nagel's claims are to be dismissed in their entirety. This should normally have as a consequence that Mr Nagel

(UK/Czech Republic BIT), Decision on Jurisdiction 9 September 2002, p. 166 et seq. (SAR version).	should bear his own costs and also be ordered to pay the Czech Republic's costs and be ultimately responsible for the costs and expenses of the Arbitral Tribunal and the administrative fee of the SCC Institute. However, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that some costs and expenses must be considered to relate to specific objections raised by the Czech Republic which were rejected by the Arbitral Tribunal. The Arbitral Tribunal considers it justified to take these circumstances into account when making an order about costs and expenses. Thus, while Mr Nagel should be responsible for his own costs in their entirety, he should be obliged to reimburse only 80 % of Czech Republic's costs. Mr. Nagel has contested the reasonableness of Czech the Republic's cost claims. He has argued that the number of more than 3,267 hours indicated by the Republic as having been devoted to the case by lawyers and other timekeepers is excessive since there have been (a) no preliminary hearings or appearances of any kind, (b) no disclosures of documents, (c) only three days of evidentiary hearings in which the Republic cross-examined only one witness and produced the testimony of only four witnesses, and (d) only three written submissions from each side, none of unusual length. Mr. Nagel also argued that the claim of USD 118,041 for experts was excessive and unreasonable and pointed out that the testimony of one of the experts (...) had relevance, if at all, only to damages and that his costs should therefore be disallowed at this stage of the proceedings. The Arbitral Tribunal first notes that there is a very considerable difference between the amounts claimed by the two parties as compensation for costs.

	In view of the outcome of the arbitration, the Arbitral Tribunal finds that the parties should be ultimately responsible, [Mr Nagel for 90 % and the Czech Republic for 10 % of these costs and expenses In relation to the arbitrators and the Arbitration Institute, the parties shall be responsible, jointly and severally, for the payment of the amounts due to the arbitrators and the Arbitration Institute. As between the parties, Mr Nagel shall be responsible for 90 % and the Czech Republic for 10 % of the amounts due in this arbitration to the arbitrators and the Arbitration Institute.
17. Link-Trading Joint Stock Company v. Moldova, UNCITRAL (US/Moldova BIT) – Final Award, 18 April 2002, § 83 et seq.	The tribunal said that according to article 38 of UNCITRAL rules, the cost of arbitration including fees for legal representation and assistance shall in principle be borne by the unsuccessful party, although the tribunal may apportion such costs among the parties if it determines that this would be reasonable under the circumstances of the case. The Tribunal holds that the Claimant has failed to prove its claim of violation of the BIT by the respondent and the reasonable costs of arbitration shall be awarded to respondent. The respondent made a submission as to its cost (counsel fees and experts) for a total USD 144, 422, 80. The tribunal considered that it would be reasonable to award the respondent an amount of USD 22,200. As for the cost of arbitrators and secretariat, The tribunal said that these expenditures shall be beard by the claimant.

18. Genin, Eastern Credit Limited, Inc. and A.S. Baltoil v Estonia (II), ICSID Case No. ARB/99/2. (United States/Estonia BIT)- Decision on Request for Supplementary Decisions and Rectification, 4 April 2002, § 19 et seq.	Claimants' Request for Supplemental Decisions and Rectification is denied. The Tribunal said that "19. The Claimants had their "day in court". In fact, they had their week before the Tribunal. Not content with the result, they initiated further proceedings, as was their right, making the Request which the Tribunal hereby denies. 20. In the present instance, the Tribunal has no hesitation in ordering that the costs associated with Claimants' Request shall follow the result. Specifically, and in accordance with Article 61 of the ICSID Convention and Arbitration Rule 47(1)(g), the Tribunal orders that the costs of the present proceeding - that is, the expenses incurred by the parties as well as the fees and expenses of the members of the Tribunal associated with the Request - shall be paid in full by Claimants. 21. In this regard, the Tribunal assesses the expenses incurred by the Respondent in connection with the present proceeding in the amount of US$26,485.43, in accordance with the Respondent's Statement on Costs submitted on March 11, 2002, and assesses the fees and expenses of the members of the Tribunal associated with the Request in the amount of US$14,769.15, in accordance with the Secretariat's communication of March 14, 2002. Accordingly, the Tribunal orders Claimants to reimburse Respondent the total amount of US$41,254.58 within 15 days of the date on which the present decision is dispatched to the parties"

The same applies according to Article 40(2) with respect to the costs of legal representation and assistance. The Arbitral Tribunal can take into account the circumstances of the case and is free to determine which Party shall bear such costs or may apportioned such costs between the Parties if it determines that apportionment is reasonable. 318. Among the circumstances the Tribunal has taken into account is its finding that the Respondent, at the very beginning of the investment by the Claimant in the Czech Republic, breached its obligations not to subject the investment to discriminatory and arbitrary measures when it reneged on its original approval of a capital investment in the licence holder and insisted on the creation of a joint venture. Furthermore, various steps were taken by the Media Council, especially, but not only, the 15 March 1999 letter to CET 21. Although the Arbitral Tribunal came to the conclusion that such acts did not constitute a violation of the Treaty obligations of the Respondent, the Claimant bona fide could nevertheless feel that he had to commence these arbitration proceedings. Furthermore, the behaviour of

	the Respondent regarding the discovery of documents, which the Claimant could rightly feel might shed more light on the acts of the Respondent, needs to be mentioned in this context. 319. Taking all these circumstances of the case into account, the Arbitral Tribunal comes to the decision that each Party shall pay one half of the fees and expenses of the Arbitral Tribunal and the hearing cost and bear its own costs for legal representation and assistance and the costs of its witnesses.
21. Olguín v Paraguay, ICSID Case No. ARB/98/5. (Peru/Paraguay BIT), Final Award, 26 July 2001, § 85 et seq.	Although this Tribunal is rejecting all of Mr. Olguín’s claims, it does not feel that it is fair to make him pay the costs for these proceedings. In the first place, the Respondent’s questioning of this Tribunal’s jurisdiction was flatly rejected, on the grounds expressed earlier. In the second place, as already stated various times in this Award, while the oversight exercised by the Paraguayan State through its bodies did not rise to a level of negligence that created liability to pay the losses suffered by the Claimant, it is also true that it cannot be considered to have been exemplary. Moreover, the conduct of the Republic of Paraguay needlessly prolonged these proceedings by repeatedly failing to meet the deadlines set by the Tribunal, in particular, the obligations imposed by the ICSID Administrative and Financial Regulations. For the above reasons, this Tribunal feels that it is fair that the parties each contribute part of the expenses arising from these proceedings, dividing the procedural costs in equal shares, and each assuming the costs for their legal representation.
22. Genin, Eastern	The Tribunal dismissed the claims. Two factors, in particular, have shaped the Tribunal’s determination of the allocation of the costs of the arbitration. Both

Credit Limited, Inc. and A.S. Baltoil v Estonia (I), ICSID Case No. ARB/99/2, (United States/Estonia BIT)- Final Award, 25 June 2001, § 379 et seq.	of those factors relate to the conduct of the parties as demonstrated by the written and oral evidence adduced by them. 380. First, the Tribunal cannot but decry Mr. Genin's failure to cooperate with the Estonian banking authorities during the period in which the salient facts underlying the dispute took place. His concealment, right up until his cross-examination by Respondent's counsel during the hearing, of his ownership of the companies in question was an element of both substantive and procedural significance, with effect on the conduct of the arbitration. Claimants themselves concede, in their Post-Hearing Memorial, that Mr. Genin's conduct could be considered to have affected the case and that it is thus appropriate for the Tribunal to take this conduct into account when considering the allocation of costs. The Tribunal cannot but concur with both parts of that statement. 381. On the other hand, as mentioned above, the awkward manner by which the Bank of Estonia revoked EIB's license, and in particular the lack of prior notice of its intention to revoke EIB's license and of any means for EIB or its shareholders to challenge that decision prior to its being formalized, cannot escape censure. 382. Either of these factors, alone, might have impelled an award of costs against the offending party. 383. Accordingly, and taking into consideration the circumstances of the case, the Tribunal determines that each party shall bear all of the expenses incurred by it in connection with the arbitration. The costs of the arbitration, including the fees and expenses of the

	members of the Tribunal and the charges for the use of the facilities of the ICSID, shall be borne by the parties in equal shares. The tribunal concluded that All of Claimants' claims are dismissed; (6) Respondent's counterclaim is dismissed; and (7) Each party shall bear all of its own costs and expenses incurred in connection with the proceedings, and the costs of the arbitration shall be borne by Claimants and Respondent, respectively, in equal shares.

Among these considerations the inequality if the position of the parties: the tribunal remarked that the claimant conducted the proceedings in person and with particular tenacity and was not assisted as the state was by counsellors. Second consideration: the fact that the respondent did not raise the approved project argument until the second round of pleadings. The tribunal concluded that each party shall bear all of its own costs and expenses incurred in connection with the proceedings, and the costs of the arbitration shall be borne by Claimants and Respondent, respectively, in equal shares.

The Respondent has been put to considerable inconvenience. In ordinary circumstances it is common in international arbitral proceedings that a losing claimant is ordered to bear the costs of the arbitration, as well as to contribute to the prevailing respondent's reasonable costs of representation. This practice serves the dual function of reparation and dissuasion. The Tribunal said that "126. In this case, however, four factors militate against an award of costs. First, this is a new and novel mechanism for the resolution of international investment disputes. Although the Claimants have failed to make their case under NAFTA, the Arbitral Tribunal accepts, by way of limitation, that the legal constraints on such causes of action were unfamiliar. Secondly, the Claimants presented their case in an efficient and professional manner. Thirdly, the Arbitral Tribunal considers that by raising issues of defective performance (as opposed to voidness ab initio) without

	regard to the notice provisions of the Concession Contract, the Naucalpan Ayuntamiento may be said to some extent to have invited litigation. Fourthly, it appears that the persons most accountable for the Claimants' wrongful behaviour would be the least likely to be affected by an award of costs; Mr. Goldenstein is beyond this Arbitral Tribunal's jurisdiction, while Ms. Baca – who might as a practical matter be the most solvent of the Claimants – had no active role at any stage. 127. Accordingly the Arbitral Tribunal makes no award of costs, with the result that each side bears its own expenditures, and the amounts paid to ICSID are allocated equally"

Albania, ICSID Case No. ARB/94/2 (Jurisdiction based on foreign investment law not BIT) – Final Award, 29 April 1999, § 206 et seq.	For its decision regarding the costs of the proceeding, the Tribunal first takes into account that Tradex prevailed in the procedure concluded by the Decision on Jurisdiction of 24 December 1996, and that now, Albania prevailed on the merits. Furthermore, though, taking the dispute as a whole, Tradex failed in its claim, it may be taken into account that, by no means, this claim can be considered as frivolous in view of the many difficult aspects of fact and law involved and dealt with in this Award. herefore, the Tribunal concludes that, in view of all the circumstances of this dispute, each Party should bear its own expenses and the costs of its own legal representation, and that the costs of the arbitration, covered by equal advance deposits by both Parties, should be borne by the Parties equally in shares of 50 %.

I. Introduction

1. India appeals from certain issues of law and legal interpretations in the Panel Report, India - Patent Protection for Pharmaceutical and Agricultural Chemical Products<sup>1</sup> (the "Panel Report"). The Panel was established to consider a complaint by the United States against India concerning the absence in India of either patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products under Article 27 of the Agreement on Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property (the "TRIPS Agreement"), or of a means for the filing of patent applications for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products pursuant to Article 70.8 of the TRIPS Agreement and of legal authority for the granting of exclusive marketing rights for such products pursuant to Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement. The relevant factual aspects of India's "legal regime"<sup>2</sup> for patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products are described at paragraphs 2.1 to 2.12 of the Panel Report.

2. The Panel Report was circulated to the Members of the World Trade Organization (the "WTO") on 5 September 1997. The Panel reached the following conclusions:

On the basis of the findings set out above, the Panel concludes that India has not complied with its obligations under Article 70.8(a) and, in the alternative, paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 63 of the TRIPS Agreement, because it has failed to establish a mechanism that adequately preserves novelty and priority in respect of applications for product patents in respect of pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical inventions during the transitional period to which it is entitled under Article 65 of the Agreement, and to publish and notify adequately information about such a mechanism; and that India has not complied with its obligations under Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement, because it has failed to establish a system for the grant of exclusive marketing rights.<sup>3</sup>

The Panel made the following recommendation:

The Panel recommends that the Dispute Settlement Body request India to bring its transitional regime for patent protection of pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products into conformity with its obligations under the TRIPS Agreement ...<sup>4</sup>

3. On 15 October 1997, India notified the Dispute Settlement Body<sup>5</sup> (the "DSB") of its intention to appeal certain issues of law covered in the Panel Report and legal interpretations developed by the Panel, pursuant to paragraph 4 of Article 16 of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes (the "DSU"), and filed a Notice of Appeal with the Appellate Body, pursuant to Rule 20 of the Working Procedures for Appellate Review (the "Working Procedures"). On 27 October 1997, India filed an appellant's submission.<sup>6</sup> On 10 November 1997, the United States filed an appellee's submission pursuant to Rule 22 of the Working Procedures. That same day, the European Communities filed a third participant's submission pursuant to Rule 24 of the Working Procedures. The oral hearing provided for in Rule 27 of the Working Procedures was held on 14 November 1997. At the oral hearing, the participants and third participant presented their arguments and answered questions from the Division of the Appellate Body hearing the appeal.

II. Arguments of the Participants

A. Appellant - India

4. India appeals certain aspects of the legal findings and conclusions of the Panel relating to Articles 70.8, 70.9 and 63 of the TRIPS Agreement. India asserts that it has established, through "administrative instructions"<sup>7</sup>, "a means" by which applications for patents for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products (often referred to as "mailbox applications") can be filed and filing dates assigned to them. India contends that, as of 15 October 1997, 1924 such applications had been received, of which 531 were by United States' applicants. Upon receipt, the particulars of these applications, including serial number, date, name of applicant, and the title of the invention were published in the Official Gazette of India. None of these applications had been taken up for examination, and none had been rejected. On 2 August 1996, the Government had stated in Parliament: "The Patent Offices have received 893 patent applications in the field of drug or medicine from Indian or foreign companies/institutions until 15 July 1996. The applications for patents will be taken up for examination after 1 January 2005, as per the World Trade Organization (WTO) Agreement which came into force on 1 January 1995".<sup>8</sup>

5. India argues that the function of Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement is to ensure that the Member concerned receives patent applications as from 1 January 1995 and maintains a record of them on the basis of which patent protection can be granted as from 2005. India asserts that the Panel ruled that Article 70.8(a) comprises two obligations: first, to establish a mailbox to receive patent applications for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products and to allot filing and priority dates to them; and second, to create legal certainty that the patent applications and the patents based on them will not be rejected or invalidated in the future. India maintains that the second obligation is a creation of the Panel.

6. India asserts that the Panel justified the creation of this second obligation by invoking the concept of predictability of competitive relationships that was developed by panels in the context of Articles III and XI of the GATT 1947. India contends that this concept cannot be unquestioningly imported into the TRIPS Agreement. Furthermore, the Panel used this concept to advance the date on which India must give substantive rights to inventors of pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products. Thus,

India concludes, the Panel incorporated into the procedural requirements of Article 70.8(a) the substantive obligations set out in paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 70.8 and turned an obligation to be carried out in the future into a current obligation.

7. India asserts that the means of filing provided by India ensures that patents can be granted when they are due. According to India, there is absolute certainty that India can, when patents are due in accordance with paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 70.8, decide to grant such patents on the basis of the applications currently submitted and determine the novelty and priority of the inventions in accordance with the date of these applications. India insists that there is no logical link between the theoretical refusal of a mailbox application under current law and the grant of a patent in accordance with paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 70.8 in the future.

8. According to India, the Panel interpreted into the TRIPS Agreement the requirement that a Member must eliminate any reasonable doubts that it has met the requirements set out in that Agreement. To India, the Panel's interpretation of Article 70.8(a) entails a violation of established principles governing the burden of proof.

9. India argues that the effect of the Panel's shift in the burden of proof from the complainant to the defendant was exacerbated by the standard of proof which the Panel applied to the evidence submitted by India to demonstrate that the United States' assertion was based on an incorrect interpretation of Indian law. In India's view, the Panel did not assess the Indian law as a fact to be established by the United States, but as a law to be interpreted by the Panel. According to India, the Panel's initiative contrasts with the cautious approach of previous panels to issues of municipal law.<sup>9</sup> The Panel should have followed GATT practice and given India, as the author of the mailbox system, the benefit of the doubt as to the status of that system under its domestic law. The Panel also should have sought guidance on the manner in which the Indian authorities interpreted that law. India contends that the assertion by a Member that a mailbox system exists, and that it has been set up in accordance with its domestic law, may be displaced only by compelling evidence that the mailbox is illegal in domestic law: it is essentially for the Member itself to determine the methodology by which it sets out the mailbox system in terms of its municipal laws.

10. India argues that the text of Article 70.9 establishes the obligation to provide exclusive marketing rights to a pharmaceutical or agricultural chemical product for which a patent application has been made only after the events specified in the provision have occurred. India maintains that there is nothing in the text of Article 70.9 that creates an obligation to make a system for the grant of exclusive marketing rights system generally available in the domestic law before the events listed in Article 70.9 have occurred.

11. In India's view, the Panel did not examine the context of Article 70.9 fully. There are many provisions in the TRIPS Agreement -- including Articles 22.2, 25.1, 39.2, 42-48 and 51 -- which explicitly oblige Members to change their domestic law to authorize their domestic authorities to take certain actions before the need to take such actions actually arises. India also notes that a comparison of the terms of Article 70.9 with those of Article 27, according to which "patents shall be available" for inventions, is revealing. According to India, the Panel examines Article 70.9 only in the context of Article 27, and dismisses the relevance of the distinction between "shall be available" and "shall be granted" in the wording of these related provisions because "an exclusive marketing right cannot be 'granted' in a specific case unless it is 'available' in the first place".<sup>10</sup>

12. India maintains that Article 70.9 is part of the transitional arrangements of the TRIPS Agreement whose very function is to enable developing countries to postpone legislative changes. Patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products is the most sensitive TRIPS issue in many developing countries. To India, the Panel's interpretation of Article 70.9 has the consequence that the transitional arrangements would allow developing countries to postpone legislative changes in all fields of technology except in the most sensitive ones.

13. In India's view, the Panel did not base its interpretation on the terms of Article 70.9, nor did it take into account the context and the transitional object and purpose of this provision; instead, the Panel justified its expansive approach with the need to establish predictable conditions of competition. India contends that this notion turns an obligation to take actions in the future into an obligation to take action immediately. India notes that there are numerous transitional provisions in the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization (the "WTO Agreement")<sup>11</sup> that require action at some point in the future, either when a date has arrived or an event has occurred. These are all obligations that are, just like those under Article 70.8 and 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement, contingent upon a date or event. While it would be desirable if all Members were immediately to enable their executive authorities to take the required actions even before the dates or events requiring those actions have occurred, India asserts that these provisions cannot reasonably be interpreted to imply the obligation to provide for such conditions in the domestic law in advance of that date or event.

14. India asserts that, under Articles 3, 7 and 11 of the DSU, panels are to make findings and recommendations only on matters submitted to them by the parties to the dispute. India therefore contends that the Panel exceeded its authority under the DSU by ruling on the subsidiary claim by the United States relating to Article 63 after accepting its principal claim under Article 70.8. If the Appellate Body were to conclude that the Panel was entitled to present findings on the United States' Article 63 claim, India asks whether the Panel was entitled to recommend simultaneously that India bring its mailbox system into conformity with Article 70.8(a) and Article 63 of the TRIPS Agreement. If the Panel was so entitled, India further asks the Appellate Body to what the recommendation relating to Article 63 refers.

B. Appellee - United States

15. The United States endorses the legal findings and conclusions of the Panel relating to Articles 70.8, 70.9 and 63 of the TRIPS Agreement. The United States asserts that the Panel correctly analyzed the text and context of Article 70.8, and focused on the failure of the system described by India to achieve the object and purpose of this provision. The United States contends that the concept of the importance of creating the predictability needed to plan future trade was developed in the context of Articles III and XI of the GATT 1947, as the Panel observed. However, it does not follow that the objectives of ensuring minimum standards of treatment and regulating competitive relationships are mutually exclusive. Protecting legitimate expectations of WTO Members regarding conditions of competition is as central to trade relating to intellectual property as it is to trade in goods that do not relate to intellectual property.

16. According to the United States, under Article 70.8, reasonable assurances of treatment must be provided for mailbox applications. The United States deems that the Panel correctly interpreted Article 70.8 to require a mailbox system under which patent applications have a secure legal status. This interpretation respects the relationship between paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of Article 70.8, and the purpose of the mailbox system. The United States insists that the administrative system described by India does not provide a sound legal basis for filing mailbox applications. According to the United States, the Panel correctly placed the burden of proof on the United States, consistent with the Appellate Body Report in United States - Measure Affecting Woven Wool Shirts and Blouses from India ("United States - Shirts and Blouses").<sup>12</sup> The United States argues that nothing in the Panel's analysis had the effect of shifting the burden of proof from the United States to India, and that the Panel applied the correct standard of proof. In the view of the United States, the Panel did not require India to prove that its administrative instructions to patent offices were immune from challenge, but rather found that India had not rebutted the evidence presented by the United States regarding the likelihood that mailbox applications and patents ultimately based on them would be invalidated by such a challenge.

17. The United States asserts that the Panel appropriately considered India's factual arguments regarding the operation of the Act to Amend and Consolidate the Law Relating to Patents (the "Patents Act"), and that India's arguments represent an attempt to turn a factual question into a legal issue. While the United States acknowledges the propriety of seeking guidance from Members regarding their domestic laws, it argues that giving a Member the benefit of the doubt regarding matters of interpretation of its domestic law is not equivalent to unquestioning acceptance of the Member's position. In the view of the United States, India's argument is inconsistent with the requirement in Article 11 of the DSU that a panel make "an objective assessment" of the facts of the case. On this point, the United States recalls that the panel in United States - Restrictions on Imports of Cotton and Man-Made Fibre Underwear stated, "a policy of total deference to the findings of the national authorities could not ensure an "objective assessment" as foreseen by Article 11".<sup>13</sup>

18. The United States contends that the Panel correctly found that India has failed to comply with Article 70.9. According to the United States, the text of Article 70.9 indicates that the obligation to establish exclusive marketing rights became effective upon the entry into force of the WTO Agreement. The ordinary meaning of the term "granted" is to "give (rights, property, etc.) formally; transfer legally".<sup>14</sup> The definition implies that availability and authority are necessary, but not sufficient, conditions for "granting" something. The United States asserts that the Panel correctly stated: "an exclusive marketing right cannot be "granted" in a specific case unless it is "available" in the first place".<sup>15</sup> Moreover, the terms used in other Articles of the TRIPS Agreement reflect the context of each Article, and do not support the conclusion that there is no obligation under Article 70.9 to provide a system for granting exclusive marketing rights before a particular case arises.

19. The United States maintains that the context, object and purpose of Article 70.9 indicate that it imposes a current, not future, obligation. In the view of the United States, the Panel correctly found that the average period of time required to satisfy the conditions set forth in Article 70.9 is not relevant to the analysis. The United States further argues that India's argument is factually incorrect: the Panel found that at least one United States' company had satisfied the steps required for the grant of exclusive marketing rights, but had not applied for them in India because it could not obtain information regarding the appropriate procedure for doing so. In addition, the United States presented evidence regarding the likelihood that various products designed to treat serious medical conditions would be ready for introduction to the Indian market in advance of the timeframe described by India.

20. The United States argues that the consequence of India's view of Article 70.9 is that a national of another WTO Member would have to apply for exclusive marketing rights that did not exist under Indian law, and only at that time would India be obligated to enact legislation providing such rights. There would be at least a temporary violation of a Member's rights because that Member's national would have to wait for India to enact legislation making these rights available. According to the United States, such a result is inconsistent with the principle of fostering predictable conditions of competition and does not protect the legitimate expectations of Members under Article 70.9.

21. In the view of the United States, the Panel's finding on Article 70.9 does not imply that all future obligations under the WTO Agreement should be implemented immediately in Members' domestic law. Requiring a system for granting exclusive marketing rights protects the core balance of the TRIPS Agreement with respect to pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical product patents. Under the TRIPS Agreement, the quid pro quo for taking advantage of the extended transition period for granting product patents for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical inventions was the grant of exclusive marketing rights.

22. The United States asks the Appellate Body to affirm the Panel's decision to make findings on the Article 63 issue submitted to it by the United States. In the view of the United States, the Panel correctly addressed both the issue of India's failure to comply with Article 70.8 and its failure to comply with Article 63. The United States asserts that Articles 3, 7, and 11 of the DSU establish that the Panel acted within its authority in addressing the United States' claim: the United States submitted this issue to the Panel in both written and oral submissions and India had an abundant opportunity to respond; and the United States' characterization of its Article 63 claim is not determinative of the Panel's authority to address it.

C. Third Participant - European Communities

23. The European Communities endorses the Panel's findings concerning the failure by India to take the action necessary to implement its obligations under Article 70.8 of the TRIPS Agreement and agrees with the Panel's interpretation of Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement. The European Communities supports the Panel's finding that India failed to take the action necessary to implement its obligations under Article 70.8 of the TRIPS Agreement. In the view of the European Communities, India's arguments about the Panel's interpretation of municipal law are unfounded: there is nothing in the ruling of the Panel which suggests that it did anything other than treat domestic law as a question of fact to be proved by the party asserting a breach of Article 70.8. The European Communities asserts that the Panel's findings show that the Panel treated the question of municipal law as a matter of evidence. Moreover, India's submission that the Panel's interpretation on this point be treated as a question of fact would result in it being excluded from the remit of the Appellate Body.

24. The European Communities maintains that the Panel's approach in interpreting Article 70.8(a) was consistent with the provisions of Article 31 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties ("the Vienna Convention").<sup>16</sup> Accordingly, in analyzing the meaning to be given to the term "means" in paragraph (a) of Article 70.8, the Panel considered that term in its context and in the light of the object and purpose of Article 70.8. The European Communities asserts that the setting up of such a mailbox mechanism is clearly not an end in itself. The objective of the mechanism cannot simply be to permit the filing of applications: such a mechanism would serve no useful purpose. The objective is rather to ensure that the novelty and priority of such applications is preserved and made available as from the date of application of the Agreement for developing countries.

25. With respect to India's claims that the Panel effectively relieved the United States of the burden of proof of adducing evidence that a breach of Article 70.8 had occurred, the European Communities asserts that the Panel's reasoning is correct. According to the European Communities, it is clear, from paragraph 7.37 of the Panel's findings, that India was not able to discharge the burden of proof upon it to demonstrate that its system for mailbox applications was not tainted with a degree of legal insecurity.

In the view of the European Communities, this question relates to the Panel's appreciation of the evidence before it and is therefore not a question of law. In consequence, it falls outside the scope of the remit of the Appellate Body.

26. The European Communities supports the Panel's interpretation of Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement. The European Communities maintains that Article 70.9 provides for the granting of a residual right (the exclusive marketing right) to applicants as long as the products are not patentable during the transitional period available to developing country Members. For that purpose, applicants must be able to identify the authority to whom they have to address a request for the granting of an exclusive marketing right. They must also be given the opportunity to know what their rights are with regard to other potential applicants who might request exclusive marketing rights for the same product. In the view of the European Communities, India's proposed reading of Article 70.9 disregards this aspect of the law on intellectual property rights that concerns the relationship between different actual or potential applicants. It is not possible to regulate this relationship by legislative or administrative action only after the relevant events have occurred, since such subsequent action would not be capable of determining the relationship between several actual or potential applicants. The European Communities insists that the protection of the exclusivity of the exclusive marketing right is a necessary component of the mechanism that is required under Article 70.9.

27. The European Communities contends that India's attempt to deny the need for a mechanism for the grant of exclusive marketing rights cannot be considered as a good faith interpretation of Article 70.9. According to the European Communities, India's reference to the sensitivity of the question of exclusive rights for the marketing of pharmaceuticals and agricultural chemical products in developing countries is not relevant. The European Communities contends that the basic rule of international treaty law is "pacta sunt servanda", that is, that treaties must be observed. Moreover, treaty provisions must be read in context and treaty interpretation must be carried out in good faith. In the view of the European Communities, the TRIPS Agreement contains many provisions concerning the rights of applicants and right holders with regard to third parties; the context of the TRIPS Agreement requires developing country Members that invoke the transitional period to allow, in advance, the grant of exclusive marketing rights under Article 70.9 and to provide the relevant mechanism for the grant of such exclusive marketing rights in order to define the position of applicants and right holders with regard to other persons. According to the European Communities, India's argument that this reading of Article 70.9 is not consistent with the general understanding of the kind of action that is required by Members during transitional periods, provided for in a number of other multilateral trade agreements, is misleading:

it neglects that Article 70.9 deals with an obligation arising during the transitional period, not after its expiry.

III. Issues Raised In This Appeal

28. The appellant, India, raises the following issues in this appeal:

- (a) What is the proper interpretation to be given to the requirement in Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement that a Member shall provide "a means" by which applications for patents for inventions relating to pharmaceutical or agricultural chemical products can be filed?
- (b) Did the Panel err in its treatment of Indian municipal law, or in its application of the burden of proof, in examining whether India had complied with its obligations under Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement?
- (c) Does Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement require that there must be a "mechanism" in place to provide for the grant of exclusive marketing rights effective as from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement?
- (d) Did the Panel, after having accepted the principal claim of the United States under Article 70.8 of the TRIPS Agreement, err by making conclusions on the alternative claim by the United States under Article 63 of the TRIPS Agreement?

IV. The *TRIPS Agreement

29. The TRIPS Agreement is one of the new agreements negotiated and concluded in the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations. The TRIPS Agreement brings intellectual property within the world trading system for the first time by imposing certain obligations on Members in the area of trade-related intellectual property rights. As one of the covered agreements under the DSU, the TRIPS Agreement is subject to the dispute settlement rules and procedures of that Understanding. The dispute that gives rise to this case represents the first time the TRIPS Agreement has been submitted to the scrutiny of the WTO dispute settlement system.

30. Among the many provisions of the TRIPS Agreement are certain specific obligations relating to patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products. With respect to patentable subject matter, Article 27.1 of the TRIPS Agreement provides generally:

Subject to the provisions of paragraphs 2 and 3, patents shall be available for any inventions, whether products or processes, in all fields of technology, provided that they are new, involve an inventive step and are capable of industrial application. Subject to paragraph 4 of Article 65, paragraph 8 of Article 70 and paragraph 3 of this Article, patents shall be available and patent rights enjoyable without discrimination as to the place of invention, the field of technology and whether products are imported or locally produced. (footnote deleted)

31. However, Article 65 of the TRIPS Agreement provides, in pertinent part:

1. Subject to the provisions of paragraphs 2, 3 and 4, no Member shall be obliged to apply the provisions of this Agreement before the expiry of a general period of one year following the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement.

2. A developing country Member is entitled to delay for a further period of four years the date of application, as defined in paragraph 1, of the provisions of this Agreement other than Articles 3, 4 and 5.

4. To the extent that a developing country Member is obliged by this Agreement to extend product patent protection to areas of technology not so protectable in its territory on the general date of application of this Agreement for that Member, as defined in paragraph 2, it may delay the application of the provisions on product patents of Section 5 of Part II to such areas of technology for an additional period of five years.

5. A Member availing itself of a transitional period under paragraphs 1, 2, 3 or 4 shall ensure that any changes in its laws, regulations and practice made during that period do not result in a lesser degree of consistency with the provisions of this Agreement.

32. With respect to patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products, certain specific obligations are found in Articles 70.8 and 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement. The interpretation of these specific obligations is the subject of this dispute. Our task is to address the legal issues arising from this dispute that are raised in this appeal.

V. Interpretation of the TRIPS Agreement

33. As one of the fundamental issues in this appeal, India has questioned the Panel's enunciation and application of a general interpretative principle which, the Panel stated, "must be taken into account" in interpreting the provisions of the TRIPS Agreement. The Panel found that:

... when interpreting the text of the TRIPS Agreement, the legitimate expectations of WTO Members concerning the TRIPS Agreement must be taken into account, as well as standards of interpretation developed in past panel reports in the GATT framework, in particular those laying down the principle of the protection of conditions of competition flowing from multilateral trade agreements.<sup>17</sup>

India argues that the Panel's invocation of this principle caused the Panel to misinterpret both Article 70.8 and Article 70.9 and led the Panel to err in determining whether India had complied with those obligations.<sup>18</sup>

34. The Panel stated that:

The protection of legitimate expectations of Members regarding the conditions of competition is a well-established GATT principle, which derives in part from Article XXIII, the basic dispute settlement provisions of GATT (and the WTO).<sup>19</sup>

The Panel also referred to certain GATT 1947 panel reports<sup>20</sup> as authority for this principle. The Panel noted that whereas the "disciplines formed under GATT 1947 (so-called GATT acquis) were primarily directed at the treatment of the goods of other countries", "the concept of the protection of legitimate expectations" in relation to the TRIPS Agreement applies to "the competitive relationship between a Member's own nationals and those of other Members (rather than between domestically produced goods and the goods of other Members, as in the goods area)".<sup>21</sup>

<sup>20</sup>In particular: Panel Report, Italian Discrimination Against Imported Agricultural Machinery, adopted 23 October 1958, BISD 7S/60, paras. 12-13; Panel Report, United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances, adopted 17 June 1987, BISD 34S/136, para. 5.22; and Panel Report, United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930, adopted 7 November 1989, BISD 36S/345, para. 5.13.

35. In Japan - Taxes on Alcoholic Beverages, on the status of adopted panel reports, we acknowledged:

Article XVI:1 of the WTO Agreement and paragraph 1(b)(iv) of the language of Annex 1A incorporating the GATT 1994 into the WTO Agreement bring the legal history and experience under the GATT 1947 into the new realm of the WTO in a way that ensures continuity and consistency in a smooth transition from the GATT 1947 system. This affirms the importance to the Members of the WTO of the experience acquired by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT 1947 -- and acknowledges the continuing relevance of that experience to the new trading system served by the WTO. Adopted panel reports are an important part of the GATT acquis.<sup>22</sup>

36. Although the Panel states that it is merely applying a "well-established GATT principle", the Panel's reasoning does not accurately reflect GATT/WTO practice. In developing its interpretative principle, the Panel merges, and thereby confuses, two different concepts from previous GATT practice. One is the concept of protecting the expectations of contracting parties as to the competitive relationship between their products and the products of other contracting parties. This is a concept that was developed in the context of violation complaints involving Articles III and XI, brought under Article XXIII:1(a), of the GATT 1947. The other is the concept of the protection of the reasonable expectations of contracting parties relating to market access concessions. This is a concept that was developed in the context of non-violation complaints brought under Article XXIII:1(b) of the GATT.

37. Article 64.1 of the TRIPS Agreement incorporates by reference Article XXIII of the GATT 1994 as the general dispute settlement provision governing the TRIPS Agreement.<sup>23</sup> Thus, we have no quarrel in principle with the notion that past GATT practice with respect to Article XXIII is pertinent to interpretation of the TRIPS Agreement. However, such interpretation must show proper appreciation of the different bases for action under Article XXIII.

The provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of GATT 1994 as elaborated and applied by the Dispute Settlement Understanding shall apply to consultations and the settlement of disputes under this Agreement except as otherwise specifically provided herein.

38. Article XXIII:1 of the GATT 1994 sets out the various causes of action on which a Member may base a complaint. A Member may have recourse to dispute settlement under Article XXIII when it considers that:

... any benefit accruing to it directly or indirectly under this Agreement is being nullified or impaired or that the attainment of any objective of the Agreement is being impeded as the result of

- (a) the failure of another contracting party to carry out its obligations under this Agreement, or
- (b) the application by another contracting party of any measure, whether or not it conflicts with the provisions of this Agreement, or
- (c) the existence of any other situation.<sup>24</sup>

39. Article XXIII:1(a) involves so-called "violation" complaints. These are disputes that arise from an alleged failure by a Member to carry out its obligations. During nearly fifty years of experience, Article XXIII:1(a) has formed the basis of almost all disputes under the GATT 1947 and the WTO Agreement. In contrast, Article XXIII:1(b) involves so-called "non-violation" complaints. These are disputes that do not require an allegation of a violation of an obligation. The basis of a cause of action under Article XXIII:1(b) is not necessarily a violation of the rules, but rather the nullification or impairment of a benefit accruing to a Member under a covered agreement. In the history of the GATT/WTO, there have been only a handful of "non-violation" cases arising under Article XXIII:1(b).<sup>25</sup> Article XXIII:1(c), covering what are commonly called "situation" complaints, has never been the foundation for a recommendation or ruling of the GATT CONTRACTING PARTIES or the Dispute Settlement Body, although it has formed the basis for parties' arguments before panels in a small number of cases.<sup>26</sup>

40. In the context of violation complaints made under Article XXIII:1(a), it is true that panels examining claims under Articles III and XI of the GATT have frequently stated that the purpose of

<sup>26</sup>See, generally, F. Roessler, "The Concept of Nullification and Impairment in the Legal System of the World Trade Organization" in E.-U. Petersmann (ed.), International Trade Law and the GATT/WTO Dispute Settlement System (Kluwer, 1997), pp. 123-142; and E.-U. Petersmann, The GATT/WTO Dispute Settlement System: International Law, International Organizations and Dispute Settlement (Kluwer, 1997), pp. 170-176.

these articles is to protect the expectations of Members concerning the competitive relationship between imported and domestic products, as opposed to expectations concerning trade volumes. However, this statement is often made after a panel has found a violation of, for example, Article III or Article XI that establishes a prima facie case of nullification or impairment.<sup>27</sup> At that point in its reasoning, the panel is examining whether the defending party has been able to rebut the charge of nullification or impairment. It is in this context that panels have referred to the expectations of Members concerning the conditions of competition.

41. The doctrine of protecting the "reasonable expectations" of contracting parties developed in the context of "non-violation" complaints brought under Article XXIII:1(b) of the GATT 1947. Some of the rules and procedures concerning "non-violation" cases have been codified in Article 26.1 of the DSU. "Non-violation" complaints are rooted in the GATT's origins as an agreement intended to protect the reciprocal tariff concessions negotiated among the contracting parties under Article II.<sup>28</sup> In the absence of substantive legal rules in many areas relating to international trade, the "non-violation" provision of Article XXIII:1(b) was aimed at preventing contracting parties from using non-tariff barriers or other policy measures to negate the benefits of negotiated tariff concessions. Under Article XXIII:1(b) of the GATT 1994, a Member can bring a "non-violation" complaint when the negotiated balance of concessions between Members is upset by the application of a measure, whether or not this measure is inconsistent with the provisions of the covered agreement. The ultimate goal is not the withdrawal of the measure concerned, but rather achieving a mutually satisfactory adjustment, usually by means of compensation.<sup>29</sup>

42. Article 64.2 of the TRIPS Agreement states:

Subparagraphs 1(b) and 1(c) of Article XXIII of GATT 1994 shall not apply to the settlement of disputes under this Agreement for a period of five years from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement.

<sup>27</sup>See, for example: Working Party Report, Brazilian Internal Taxes, adopted 30 June 1949, BISD II/181, para. 16; Panel Report, United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances, adopted 17 June 1987, BISD 34S/136, para. 5.1.9; Panel Report, Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act, adopted 7 February 1984, BISD 30S/140, para. 6.6; Panel Report, Japanese Measures on Imports of Leather, adopted 15/16 May 1984, BISD 31S/94, para. 55; Panel Report, Japan - Customs Duties, Taxes and Labelling Practices on Imported Wines and Alcoholic Beverages, adopted 10 November 1987, BISD 34S/83, para. 5.11; Panel Report, European Economic Community - Restrictions on Imports of Apples, adopted 22 June 1989, BISD 36S/135, para. 5.25; and Panel Report, United States - Measures Affecting the Importation, Internal Sale and Use of Tobacco, adopted 4 October 1994, DS44/R, para. 99.

The meaning of this provision is clear: the only cause of action permitted under the TRIPS Agreement during the first five years after the entry into force of the WTO Agreement is a "violation" complaint under Article XXIII:1(a) of the GATT 1994. This case involves allegations of violation of obligations under the TRIPS Agreement. However, the Panel's invocation of the "legitimate expectations" of Members relating to conditions of competition melds the legally-distinct bases for "violation" and "non-violation" complaints under Article XXIII of the GATT 1994 into one uniform cause of action. This is not consistent with either Article XXIII of the GATT 1994 or Article 64 of the TRIPS Agreement. Whether or not "non-violation" complaints should be available for disputes under the TRIPS Agreement is a matter that remains to be determined by the Council for Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property (the "Council for TRIPS") pursuant to Article 64.3 of the TRIPS Agreement. It is not a matter to be resolved through interpretation by panels or by the Appellate Body.

43. In addition to relying on the GATT acquis, the Panel relies also on the customary rules of interpretation of public international law as a basis for the interpretative principle it offers for the TRIPS Agreement. Specifically, the Panel relies on Article 31 of the Vienna Convention, which provides in part:

1. A treaty shall be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose.

44. With this customary rule of interpretation in mind, the Panel stated that:

In our view, good faith interpretation requires the protection of legitimate expectations derived from the protection of intellectual property rights provided for in the Agreement.<sup>30</sup>

45. The Panel misapplies Article 31 of the Vienna Convention. The Panel misunderstands the concept of legitimate expectations in the context of the customary rules of interpretation of public international law. The legitimate expectations of the parties to a treaty are reflected in the language of the treaty itself. The duty of a treaty interpreter is to examine the words of the treaty to determine the intentions of the parties. This should be done in accordance with the principles of treaty interpretation set out in Article 31 of the Vienna Convention. But these principles of interpretation neither require nor condone the imputation into a treaty of words that are not there or the importation into a treaty of concepts that were not intended.

46. In United States - Standards for Reformulated and Conventional Gasoline<sup>31</sup>, we set out the proper approach to be applied in interpreting the WTO Agreement in accordance with the rules in Article 31 of the Vienna Convention. These rules must be respected and applied in interpreting the TRIPS Agreement or any other covered agreement. The Panel in this case has created its own interpretative principle, which is consistent with neither the customary rules of interpretation of public international law nor established GATT/WTO practice. Both panels and the Appellate Body must be guided by the rules of treaty interpretation set out in the Vienna Convention, and must not add to or diminish rights and obligations provided in the WTO Agreement.

47. This conclusion is dictated by two separate and very specific provisions of the DSU. Article 3.2 of the DSU provides that the dispute settlement system of the WTO:

... serves to preserve the rights and obligations of the Members under the covered agreements, and to clarify the existing provisions of those agreements in accordance with customary rules of interpretation of public international law. Recommendations and rulings of the DSB cannot add to or diminish the rights and obligations provided in the covered agreements.

Furthermore, Article 19.2 of the DSU provides:

In accordance with paragraph 2 of Article 3, in their findings and recommendations, the panel and Appellate Body cannot add to or diminish the rights and obligations provided in the covered agreements.

These provisions speak for themselves. Unquestionably, both panels and the Appellate Body are bound by them.

48. For these reasons, we do not agree with the Panel that the legitimate expectations of Members and private rights holders concerning conditions of competition must always be taken into account in interpreting the TRIPS Agreement.

VI. Article 70.8

49. Article 70.8 states:

Where a Member does not make available as of the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products commensurate with its obligations under Article 27, that Member shall:

- (a) notwithstanding the provisions of Part VI, provide as from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement a means by which applications for patents for such inventions can be filed;
- (b) apply to these applications, as of the date of application of this Agreement, the criteria for patentability as laid down in this Agreement as if those criteria were being applied on the date of filing in that Member or, where priority is available and claimed, the priority date of the application; and
- (c) provide patent protection in accordance with this Agreement as from the grant of the patent and for the remainder of the patent term, counted from the filing date in accordance with Article 33 of this Agreement, for those of these applications that meet the criteria for protection referred to in subparagraph (b).

50. With respect to Article 70.8(a), the Panel found that:

... Article 70.8(a) requires the Members in question to establish a means that not only appropriately allows for the entitlement to file mailbox applications and the allocation of filing and priority dates to them, but also provides a sound legal basis to preserve novelty and priority as of those dates, so as to eliminate any reasonable doubts regarding whether mailbox applications and eventual patents based on them could be rejected or invalidated because, at the filing or priority date, the matter for which protection was sought was unpatentable in the country in question.<sup>32</sup>

51. In India's view, the obligations in Article 70.8(a) are met by a developing country Member where it establishes a mailbox for receiving, dating and storing patent applications for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products in a manner that properly allots filing and priority dates to those applications in accordance with paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 70.8.<sup>33</sup> India asserts that the Panel established an additional obligation "to create legal certainty that the patent applications and the eventual patents based on them will not be rejected or invalidated in the future".<sup>34</sup> This, India argues, is a legal error by the Panel.

52. The introductory clause to Article 70.8 provides that it applies "[w]here a Member does not make available as of the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products commensurate with its obligations under Article 27 ..." of the TRIPS Agreement. Article 27 requires that patents be made available "for any inventions, whether products or processes, in all fields of technology", subject to certain exceptions. However, pursuant to paragraphs 1, 2 and 4 of Article 65, a developing country Member may delay providing product patent protection in areas of technology not protectable in its territory on the general date of application of the TRIPS Agreement for that Member until 1 January 2005. Article 70.8 relates specifically and exclusively to situations where a Member does not provide, as of 1 January 1995, patent protection for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products.

53. By its terms, Article 70.8(a) applies "notwithstanding the provisions of Part VI" of the TRIPS Agreement. Part VI of the TRIPS Agreement, consisting of Articles 65, 66 and 67, allows for certain "transitional arrangements" in the application of certain provisions of the TRIPS Agreement. These "transitional arrangements", which allow a Member to delay the application of some of the obligations in the TRIPS Agreement for certain specified periods<sup>35</sup>, do not apply to Article 70.8. Thus, although there are "transitional arrangements" which allow developing country Members, in particular, more time to implement certain of their obligations under the TRIPS Agreement, no such "transitional arrangements" exist for the obligations in Article 70.8.

54. Article 70.8(a) imposes an obligation on Members to provide "a means" by which mailbox applications can be filed "from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement". Thus, this obligation has been in force since 1 January 1995. The issue before us in this appeal is not whether

<sup>35</sup>Pursuant to Article 65.1, all Members were entitled to delay the application of most of the provisions of the TRIPS Agreement for one year after the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement. Pursuant to Article 65.2, developing country Members are generally entitled to a delay of a further four years. Where a developing country Member is obliged to extend patent protection to areas of technology to which it did not extend such protection on the general date of application of the TRIPS Agreement for that Member, Article 65.4 states that that developing country Member may delay the application of the provisions on product patents to such areas of technology for an additional period of five years.

this obligation exists or whether this obligation is now in force. Clearly, it exists, and, equally clearly, it is in force now. The issue before us in this appeal is: what precisely is the "means" for filing mailbox applications that is contemplated and required by Article 70.8(a)? To answer this question, we must interpret the terms of Article 70.8(a).

55. We agree with the Panel that "[t]he analysis of the ordinary meaning of these terms alone does not lead to a definitive interpretation as to what sort of 'means' is required by this subparagraph".<sup>36</sup> Therefore, in accordance with the general rules of treaty interpretation set out in Article 31 of the Vienna Convention, to discern the meaning of the terms in Article 70.8(a), we must also read this provision in its context, and in light of the object and purpose of the TRIPS Agreement.

56. Paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 70.8 constitute part of the context for interpreting Article 70.8(a). Paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 70.8 require that the "means" provided by a Member under Article 70.8(a) must allow the filing of applications for patents for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products from 1 January 1995 and preserve the dates of filing and priority of those applications, so that the criteria for patentability may be applied as of those dates, and so that the patent protection eventually granted is dated back to the filing date. In this respect, we agree with the Panel that,

... in order to prevent the loss of the novelty of an invention ... filing and priority dates need to have a sound legal basis if the provisions of Article 70.8 are to fulfil their purpose. Moreover, if available, a filing must entitle the applicant to claim priority on the basis of an earlier filing in respect of the claimed invention over applications with subsequent filing or priority dates. Without legally sound filing and priority dates, the mechanism to be established on the basis of Article 70.8 will be rendered inoperational.<sup>37</sup>

57. On this, the Panel is clearly correct. The Panel's interpretation here is consistent also with the object and purpose of the TRIPS Agreement. The Agreement takes into account, inter alia, "the need to promote effective and adequate protection of intellectual property rights".<sup>38</sup> We believe the Panel was correct in finding that the "means" that the Member concerned is obliged to provide under Article 70.8(a) must allow for "the entitlement to file mailbox applications and the allocation of filing

and priority dates to them".<sup>39</sup> Furthermore, the Panel was correct in finding that the "means" established under Article 70.8(a) must also provide "a sound legal basis to preserve novelty and priority as of those dates".<sup>40</sup> These findings flow inescapably from the necessary operation of paragraphs (b) and (c) of Article 70.8.

58. However, we do not agree with the Panel that Article 70.8(a) requires a Member to establish a means "so as to eliminate any reasonable doubts regarding whether mailbox applications and eventual patents based on them could be rejected or invalidated because, at the filing or priority date, the matter for which protection was sought was unpatentable in the country in question".<sup>41</sup> India is entitled, by the "transitional arrangements" in paragraphs 1, 2 and 4 of Article 65, to delay application of Article 27 for patents for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products until 1 January 2005. In our view, India is obliged, by Article 70.8(a), to provide a legal mechanism for the filing of mailbox applications that provides a sound legal basis to preserve both the novelty of the inventions and the priority of the applications as of the relevant filing and priority dates. No more.

59. But what constitutes such a sound legal basis in Indian law? To answer this question, we must recall first an important general rule in the TRIPS Agreement. Article 1.1 of the TRIPS Agreement states, in pertinent part:

... Members shall be free to determine the appropriate method of implementing the provisions of this Agreement within their own legal system and practice.

Members, therefore, are free to determine how best to meet their obligations under the TRIPS Agreement within the context of their own legal systems. And, as a Member, India is "free to determine the appropriate method of implementing" its obligations under the TRIPS Agreement within the context of its own legal system.

60. India insists that it has done that. India contends that it has established, through "administrative instructions"<sup>42</sup>, a "means" consistent with Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement. According to India,

these "administrative instructions" establish a mechanism that provides a sound legal basis to preserve the novelty of the inventions and the priority of the applications as of the relevant filing and priority dates consistent with Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement. According to India, pursuant to these "administrative instructions", the Patent Office has been directed to store applications for patents for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products separately for future action pursuant to Article 70.8, and the Controller General of Patents Designs and Trademarks ("the Controller") has been instructed not to refer them to an examiner until 1 January 2005. According to India, these "administrative instructions" are legally valid in Indian law<sup>43</sup>, as they are reflected in the Minister's Statement to Parliament of 2 August 1996.<sup>44</sup> And, according to India:

There is ... absolute certainty that India can, when patents are due in accordance with subparagraphs (b) and (c) of Article 70.8, decide to grant such patents on the basis of the applications currently submitted and determine the novelty and priority of the inventions in accordance with the date of these applications.<sup>45</sup> (emphasis added)

61. India has not provided any text of these "administrative instructions" either to the Panel or to us.

62. Whatever their substance or their import, these "administrative instructions" were not the initial "means" chosen by the Government of India to meet India's obligations under Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement. The Government of India's initial preference for establishing a "means" for filing mailbox applications under Article 70.8(a) was the Patents (Amendment) Ordinance (the "Ordinance"), promulgated by the President of India on 31 December 1994 pursuant to Article 123 of India's Constitution. Article 123 enables the President to promulgate an ordinance when Parliament is not in session, and when the President is satisfied "that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action". India notified the Ordinance to the Council for TRIPS, pursuant to Article 63.2 of the TRIPS Agreement, on 6 March 1995.<sup>46</sup> In accordance with the terms of Article 123 of India's Constitution, the Ordinance expired on 26 March 1995, six weeks after the reassembly of Parliament. This was followed by an unsuccessful effort to enact the Patents (Amendment) Bill 1995 to implement the contents of the Ordinance on a permanent basis.<sup>47</sup> This Bill was introduced in the Lok Sabha (Lower House) in March 1995. After being passed by the Lok Sabha, it was referred to a Select Committee of the Rajya Sabha (Upper House) for examination and report. However, the Bill was subsequently not enacted due to the dissolution of Parliament on 10 May 1996. From these actions, it is apparent that the Government of India initially considered the enactment of amending legislation to be necessary in order to implement its obligations under Article 70.8(a). However, India maintains that the "administrative instructions" issued in April 1995 effectively continued the mailbox system established by the Ordinance, thus obviating the need for a formal amendment to the Patents Act or for a new notification to the Council for TRIPS.<sup>48</sup>

63. With respect to India's "administrative instructions", the Panel found that "the current administrative practice creates a certain degree of legal insecurity in that it requires Indian officials to ignore certain mandatory provisions of the Patents Act"<sup>49</sup>; and that "even if Patent Office officials do not examine and reject mailbox applications, a competitor might seek a judicial order to do so in order to obtain rejection of a patent claim".<sup>50</sup>

64. India asserts that the Panel erred in its treatment of India's municipal law because municipal law is a fact that must be established before an international tribunal by the party relying on it. In India's view, the Panel did not assess the Indian law as a fact to be established by the United States, but rather as a law to be interpreted by the Panel. India argues that the Panel should have given India the benefit of the doubt as to the status of its mailbox system under Indian domestic law. India claims, furthermore, that the Panel should have sought guidance from India on matters relating to the interpretation of Indian law.<sup>51</sup>

65. In public international law, an international tribunal may treat municipal law in several ways.<sup>52</sup> Municipal law may serve as evidence of facts and may provide evidence of state practice. However, municipal law may also constitute evidence of compliance or non-compliance with international obligations. For example, in Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia, the Permanent Court of International Justice observed:

It might be asked whether a difficulty does not arise from the fact that the Court would have to deal with the Polish law of July 14th, 1920. This, however, does not appear to be the case. From the standpoint of International Law and of the Court which is its organ, municipal laws are merely facts which express the will and constitute the activities of States, in the same manner as do legal decisions and administrative measures. The Court is certainly not called upon to interpret the Polish law as such; but there is nothing to prevent the Court's giving judgment on the question whether or not, in applying that law, Poland is acting in conformity with its obligations towards Germany under the Geneva Convention.<sup>53</sup> (emphasis added)

66. In this case, the Panel was simply performing its task in determining whether India's "administrative instructions" for receiving mailbox applications were in conformity with India's obligations under Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement. It is clear that an examination of the relevant aspects of Indian municipal law and, in particular, the relevant provisions of the Patents Act as they relate to the "administrative instructions", is essential to determining whether India has complied with its obligations under Article 70.8(a). There was simply no way for the Panel to make this determination without engaging in an examination of Indian law. But, as in the case cited above before the Permanent Court of International Justice, in this case, the Panel was not interpreting Indian law "as such"; rather, the Panel was examining Indian law solely for the purpose of determining whether India had met its obligations under the TRIPS Agreement. To say that the Panel should have done otherwise would be to say that only India can assess whether Indian law is consistent with India's obligations under the WTO Agreement. This, clearly, cannot be so.

67. Previous GATT/WTO panels also have conducted a detailed examination of the domestic law of a Member in assessing the conformity of that domestic law with the relevant GATT/WTO obligations. For example, in United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930<sup>54</sup>, the panel conducted a detailed examination of the relevant United States' legislation and practice, including the remedies available under Section 337 as well as the differences between patent-based Section 337 proceedings and federal district court proceedings, in order to determine whether Section 337 was inconsistent with Article III:4 of the GATT 1947. This seems to us to be a comparable case.

68. And, just as it was necessary for the Panel in this case to seek a detailed understanding of the operation of the Patents Act as it relates to the "administrative instructions" in order to assess whether India had complied with Article 70.8(a), so, too, is it necessary for us in this appeal to review the Panel's examination of the same Indian domestic law.

69. To do so, we must look at the specific provisions of the Patents Act. Section 5(a) of the Patents Act provides that substances "intended for use, or capable of being used, as food or as medicine or drug" are not patentable. "When the complete specification has been led in respect of an application for a patent", section 12(1) requires the Controller to refer that application and that specification to an examiner. Moreover, section 15(2) of the Patents Act states that the Controller "shall refuse" an application in respect of a substance that is not patentable. We agree with the Panel that these provisions of the Patents Act are mandatory.<sup>55</sup> And, like the Panel, we are not persuaded that India's "administrative instructions" would prevail over the contradictory mandatory provisions of the Patents Act.<sup>56</sup> We note also that, in issuing these "administrative instructions", the Government of India did not avail itself of the provisions of section 159 of the Patents Act, which allows the Central Government "to make rules for carrying out the provisions of [the] Act" or section 160 of the Patents Act, which requires that such rules be laid before each House of the Indian Parliament. We are told by India that such rulemaking was not required for the "administrative instructions" at issue here. But this, too, seems to be inconsistent with the mandatory provisions of the Patents Act.

70. We are not persuaded by India's explanation of these seeming contradictions. Accordingly, we are not persuaded that India's "administrative instructions" would survive a legal challenge under the Patents Act. And, consequently, we are not persuaded that India's "administrative instructions" provide a sound legal basis to preserve novelty of inventions and priority of applications as of the relevant filing and priority dates.

71. For these reasons, we agree with the Panel's conclusion that India's "administrative instructions" for receiving mailbox applications are inconsistent with Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement.

72. India raises the additional argument that the Panel erred in its application of the burden of proof in assessing Indian municipal law. In particular, India alleges that the Panel, after having required the United States merely to raise "reasonable doubts" suggesting a violation of Article 70.8, placed the burden on India to dispel such doubts.<sup>57</sup>

73. The Panel states:

As the Appellate Body report on Shirts and Blouses points out, "a party claiming a violation of a provision of the WTO Agreement by another Member must assert and prove its claim". In this case, it is the United States that claims a violation by India of Article 70.8 of the TRIPS Agreement. Therefore, it is up to the United States to put forward evidence and legal arguments sufficient to demonstrate that action by India is inconsistent with the obligations assumed by India under Article 70.8. In our view, the United States has successfully put forward such evidence and arguments. Then, ... the onus shifts to India to bring forward evidence and arguments to disprove the claim. We are not convinced that India has been able to do so (footnotes deleted).<sup>58</sup>

74. This statement of the Panel is a legally correct characterization of the approach to burden of proof that we set out in United States - Shirts and Blouses.<sup>59</sup> However, it is not sufficient for a panel to enunciate the correct approach to burden of proof; a panel must also apply the burden of proof correctly. A careful reading of paragraphs 7.35 and 7.37 of the Panel Report reveals that the Panel has done so in this case. These paragraphs show that the United States put forward evidence and arguments that India's "administrative instructions" pertaining to mailbox applications were legally insufficient to prevail over the application of certain mandatory provisions of the Patents Act. India put forward rebuttal evidence and arguments. India misinterprets what the Panel said about "reasonable doubts". The Panel did not require the United States merely to raise "reasonable doubts" before the burden shifted to India. Rather, after properly requiring the United States to establish a prima facie case and after hearing India's rebuttal evidence and arguments, the Panel concluded that it had "reasonable doubts" that the "administrative instructions" would prevail over the mandatory provisions of the Patents Act if a challenge were brought in an Indian court.

75. For these reasons, we conclude that the Panel applied the burden of proof correctly in assessing the compliance of India's domestic law with Article 70.8(a) of the TRIPS Agreement.

VII. Article 70.9

76. Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement reads:

Where a product is the subject of a patent application in a Member in accordance with paragraph 8(a), exclusive marketing rights shall be granted, notwithstanding the provisions of Part VI, for a period of five years after obtaining marketing approval in that Member or until a product patent is granted or rejected in that Member, whichever period is shorter, provided that, subsequent to the entry into force of the WTO Agreement, a patent application has been filed and a patent granted for that product in another Member and marketing approval obtained in such other Member.

77. With respect to Article 70.9, the Panel found:

Based on customary rules of treaty interpretation, we have reached the conclusion that under Article 70.9 there must be a mechanism ready for the grant of exclusive marketing rights at any time subsequent to the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement.<sup>60</sup>

78. India argues that Article 70.9 establishes an obligation to grant exclusive marketing rights for a product that is the subject of a patent application under Article 70.8(a) after all the other conditions specified in Article 70.9 have been fulfilled.<sup>61</sup> India asserts that there are many provisions in the TRIPS Agreement that, unlike Article 70.9, explicitly oblige Members to change their domestic laws to authorize their domestic authorities to take certain action before the need to take such action actually arises.<sup>62</sup> India maintains that the Panel's interpretation of Article 70.9 has the consequence that the transitional arrangements in Article 65 allow developing country Members to postpone legislative changes in all fields of technology except the most "sensitive" ones, pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products. India claims that the Panel turned an obligation to take action in the future into an obligation to take action immediately.<sup>63</sup>

<sup>62</sup>Ibid.; for example, India asserts that according to Articles 42-48 of the TRIPS Agreement, the judicial authorities of Members "shall have the authority" to grant certain rights. Article 51 obliges Members to "adopt procedures" to enable right holders to prevent the release of counterfeited or pirated products from customs. Article 39.2 requires Members to give natural and legal persons "the possibility of preventing" the disclosure of information. According to Article 25.1 "Members shall provide for the protection" of certain industrial designs and Article 22.2 obliges Members to "provide the legal means for interested parties to prevent" certain misuses of geographical indications. India further asserts that a comparison of the terms of Article 70.9 with those of Article 27 according to which "patents shall be available" for inventions is revealing.

79. India's arguments must be examined in the light of Article XVI:4 of the WTO Agreement, which requires that:

Each Member shall ensure the conformity of its laws, regulations and administrative procedures with its obligations as provided in the annexed Agreements.

80. Moreover, India acknowledged before the Panel and in this appeal that, under Indian law, it is necessary to enact legislation in order to grant exclusive marketing rights in compliance with the provisions of Article 70.9. This was already implied in the Ordinance, which contained detailed provisions for the grant of exclusive marketing rights in India effective 1 January 1995. However, with the expiry of the Ordinance on 26 March 1995, no legal basis remained, and with the failure to enact the Patents (Amendment) Bill 1995 due to the dissolution of Parliament on 10 May 1996, no legal basis currently exists, for the grant of exclusive marketing rights in India. India notified the Council for TRIPS of the promulgation of the Ordinance pursuant to Article 63.2 of the TRIPS Agreement<sup>64</sup>, but has failed as yet to notify the Council for TRIPS that the Ordinance has expired.

81. Given India's admissions that legislation is necessary in order to grant exclusive marketing rights in compliance with Article 70.9 and that it does not currently have such legislation, the issue for us to consider in this appeal is whether a failure to have in place a mechanism ready for the grant of exclusive marketing rights, effective as from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement, constitutes a violation of India's obligations under Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement.

82. By its terms, Article 70.9 applies only in situations where a product patent application is filed under Article 70.8(a). Like Article 70.8(a), Article 70.9 applies "notwithstanding the provisions of Part VI". Article 70.9 specifically refers to Article 70.8(a), and they operate in tandem to provide a package of rights and obligations that apply during the transitional periods contemplated in Article 65. It is obvious, therefore, that both Article 70.8(a) and Article 70.9 are intended to apply as from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement.

83. India has an obligation to implement the provisions of Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement effective as from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement, that is, 1 January 1995. India concedes that legislation is needed to implement this obligation. India has not enacted such legislation.

To give meaning and effect to the rights and obligations under Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement, such legislation should have been in effect since 1 January 1995.

84. For these reasons, we agree with the Panel that India should have had a mechanism in place to provide for the grant of exclusive marketing rights effective as from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement, and, therefore, we agree with the Panel that India is in violation of Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement.

VIII. Article 63

85. India argues that, under Articles 3, 7 and 11 of the DSU, a panel may make findings only on issues that have been submitted to it by the parties to the dispute. With this in mind, India contends that the Panel exceeded its authority under the DSU by ruling on the subsidiary claim by the United States under Article 63 of the TRIPS Agreement after having first accepted the principal claim by the United States of a violation of Article 70.8 of the TRIPS Agreement.<sup>65</sup>

86. The facts are these. The Panel's terms of reference<sup>66</sup> refer to the request by the United States for the establishment of a panel.<sup>67</sup> The United States did not include a claim under Article 63 in its request for the establishment of a panel in this case.<sup>68</sup> The United States did not mention Article 63 in its first written submission to the Panel. The United States did not raise Article 63 as an alternative claim for the first time until its oral statement at the first substantive meeting of the parties with the Panel.

87. In United States - Shirts and Blouses, we said that "[a] panel need only address those claims which must be addressed in order to resolve the matter in issue in the dispute".<sup>69</sup> This means that a panel has the discretion to determine the claims it must address in order to resolve the dispute between the parties -- provided that those claims are within that panel's terms of reference. We have stressed, on more than one occasion, the fundamental importance of a panel's terms of reference.

<sup>69</sup>Adopted 23 May 1997, WT/DS33/AB/R, p. 19. A footnote to this statement reads: "The 'matter in issue' is the 'matter referred to the DSB' pursuant to Article 7 of the DSU".

In European Communities - Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas ("European Communities - Bananas"), we found that "[i]t is the panel's terms of reference, governed by Article 7 of the DSU, which set out the claims of the complaining parties relating to the matter referred to the DSB".<sup>70</sup> In Brazil - Measures Affecting Desiccated Coconut ("Brazil - Desiccated Coconut"), we stated:

A panel's terms of reference are important for two reasons. First, terms of reference fulfil an important due process objective -- they give the parties and third parties sufficient information concerning the claims at issue in the dispute in order to allow them an opportunity to respond to the complainant's case. Second, they establish the jurisdiction of the panel by defining the precise claims at issue in the dispute.<sup>71</sup>

88. We stated also in Brazil - Desiccated Coconut that all claims must be included in the request for establishment of a panel in order to come within the panel's terms of reference, based on the practice of panels under the GATT 1947 and the Tokyo Round Codes.<sup>72</sup> That past practice required that a claim had to be included in the documents referred to, or contained in, the terms of reference in order to form part of the "matter" referred to a panel for consideration. Following both this past practice and the provisions of the DSU, in European Communities - Bananas, we observed that there is a significant difference between the claims identified in the request for the establishment of a panel, which establish the panel's terms of reference under Article 7 of the DSU, and the arguments supporting those claims, which are set out and progressively clarified in the first written submissions, the rebuttal submissions, and the first and second panel meetings with the parties as a case proceeds. There we said:

Article 6.2 of the DSU requires that the claims, but not the arguments, must all be specified sufficiently in the request for the establishment of a panel in order to allow the defending party and any third parties to know the legal basis of the complaint. If a claim is not specified in the request for the establishment of a panel, then a faulty request cannot be subsequently "cured" by a complaining party's argumentation in its first written submission to the panel or in any other submission or statement made later in the panel proceeding.<sup>73</sup>

89. Thus, a claim must be included in the request for establishment of a panel in order to come within a panel's terms of reference in a given case. In this case, after describing the obligations of Articles 27, 70.8 and 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement, the request for establishment of a panel by the United States reads, in pertinent part:

... India's legal regime appears to be inconsistent with the obligations of the TRIPS Agreement, including but not necessarily limited to Articles 27, 65 and 70 ....

Accordingly, the United States respectfully requests the establishment of a panel to examine this matter in light of the TRIPS Agreement, and to find that India's legal regime fails to conform to the obligations of Articles 27, 65 and 70 of the TRIPS Agreement, and nullifies or impairs benefits accruing directly or indirectly to the United States under the TRIPS Agreement.<sup>74</sup>

90. With respect to Article 63, the convenient phrase, "including but not necessarily limited to", is simply not adequate to "identify the specific measures at issue and provide a brief summary of the legal basis of the complaint sufficient to present the problem clearly" as required by Article 6.2 of the DSU. If this phrase incorporates Article 63, what article of the TRIPS Agreement does it not incorporate? Therefore, this phrase is not sufficient to bring a claim relating to Article 63 within the terms of reference of the Panel.

91. In European Communities - Bananas, we accepted the view of the panel in that case that it was "sufficient for the Complaining Parties to list the provisions of the specific agreements alleged to have been violated without setting out detailed arguments as to which specific aspects of the measures at issue relate to which specific provisions of those agreements", and we also agreed with the panel that the request in that case was sufficiently specific to comply with the "minimum standards" established by Article 6.2 of the DSU.<sup>75</sup> In this case, in contrast, there is a failure to identify a specific provision of an agreement that is alleged to have been violated. This falls below the "minimum standards" that we were willing to accept in European Communities - Bananas.

92. We note also the Panel's statement that it "ruled, at the outset of the first substantive meeting held on 15 April 1997, that all legal claims would be considered if they were made prior to the end of that meeting; and this ruling was accepted by both parties".<sup>76</sup> We do not find this statement at all persuasive in advancing the argument made by the United States on this issue. Nor do we find this statement consistent with the letter and the spirit of the DSU. Although panels enjoy some discretion in establishing their own working procedures, this discretion does not extend to modifying the substantive provisions of the DSU. To be sure, Article 12.1 of the DSU says: "Panels shall follow the Working Procedures in Appendix 3 unless the panel decides otherwise after consulting the parties to the dispute". Yet that is all that it says. Nothing in the DSU gives a panel the authority either to disregard or to modify other explicit provisions of the DSU. The jurisdiction of a panel is established by that panel's terms of reference, which are governed by Article 7 of the DSU. A panel may consider only those claims that it has the authority to consider under its terms of reference. A panel cannot assume jurisdiction that it does not have. In this case, Article 63 was not within the Panel's jurisdiction, as defined by its terms of reference. Therefore, the Panel had no authority to consider the alternative claim by the United States under Article 63.

93. The United States argues that, in the consultations between the parties to this dispute in this case, India had not disclosed the existence of any "administrative instructions" for the filing of mailbox applications for pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products. Therefore, the United States asserts that it had no way of knowing that India would rely on this argument before the Panel. The United States maintains that, for this reason, it had not included a claim under Article 63 in its request for the establishment of a panel.<sup>77</sup> All that said, there is, nevertheless, no basis in the DSU for a complaining party to make an additional claim, outside of the scope of a panel's terms of reference, at the first substantive meeting of the panel with the parties. A panel is bound by its terms of reference.

94. All parties engaged in dispute settlement under the DSU must be fully forthcoming from the very beginning both as to the claims involved in a dispute and as to the facts relating to those claims. Claims must be stated clearly. Facts must be disclosed freely. This must be so in consultations as well as in the more formal setting of panel proceedings. In fact, the demands of due process that are implicit in the DSU make this especially necessary during consultations. For the claims that are made and the facts that are established during consultations do much to shape the substance and the scope of subsequent panel proceedings. If, in the aftermath of consultations, any party believes that all the pertinent facts relating to a claim are, for any reason, not before the panel, then that party should ask the panel in that case to engage in additional fact-finding. But this additional fact-finding cannot alter the claims that are before the panel -- because it cannot alter the panel's terms of reference. And, in the absence of the inclusion of a claim in the terms of reference, a panel must neither be expected nor permitted to modify rules in the DSU.

95. It is worth noting that, with respect to fact-finding, the dictates of due process could better be served if panels had standard working procedures that provided for appropriate factual discovery at an early stage in panel proceedings.

96. For these reasons, we find that the Panel erred in its findings and conclusions relating to the alternative claim by the United States under Article 63 of the TRIPS Agreement. In the light of this finding, it is not necessary for us to consider whether the Panel erred also in recommending simultaneously that India bring itself into compliance with its obligations under both Articles 70.8(a) and 63 of the TRIPS Agreement.

IX. Findings and Conclusions

97. For the reasons set out in this Report, the Appellate Body:

- (a) upholds the Panel's conclusion that India has not complied with its obligations under Article 70.8(a) to establish "a means" that adequately preserves novelty and priority in respect of applications for product patents in respect of pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical inventions during the transitional periods provided for in Article 65 of the TRIPS Agreement;
- (b) upholds the Panel's conclusion that India has not complied with its obligations under Article 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement; and
- (c) reverses the Panel's alternative findings that India has not complied with paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 63 of the TRIPS Agreement.

98. The Appellate Body recommends that the Dispute Settlement Body request India to bring its legal regime for patent protection of pharmaceutical and agricultural chemical products into conformity with India's obligations under Articles 70.8 and 70.9 of the TRIPS Agreement.

A. Introduction

1. Notion

1 The term 'source of law' may mean different things. It may refer to either historical, ethical, social, or other bases for a legal rule, or it may refer to legal rules as such (Abi Saab 31). The notion will be used here in the latter sense.

2 Speaking of 'sources of international law' presupposes that there exist legal, ie binding, rules in international law. This view is not uncontested and, apart from that, those who take that view advance different reasons why international law consists of binding rules.

2. Binding Nature of International Law

3 Generally speaking, those who argue that international law is binding rest their claim on one of two arguments: they either refer to the consent expressed by those subjects of international law being bound (Oppenheim 332), or they ascertain that the norm in question reflects accepted meta-legal principles such as justice, equity, and fairness (Equity in International Law).

4 This contribution takes the position that, ultimately, no individual source of international law (treaty law, customary international law, general principles, etc) is founded on one of these two justifications alone. Neither can, for example, international treaties provide for a long-term sustainable order among States, notwithstanding the consent of the States involved, if they do not also mirror the principles of justice, equity, and fairness. Nor is it possible to establish an international order on justice, equity, and fairness alone, however defined, if the subjects of international law do not consent thereto. The delicate balance between these two foundations of international law has to be achieved for each source of international law at the moment of its establishment and it has to be upheld over time. A variety of mechanisms are available in international law to gain consent, uphold consent, or to ensure that a norm under consideration meets the principles of fairness, equity, and justice. Reservations to international treaties; objections to the establishment of a rule of customary international law; the review of existing international treaties; the drafting of subsequent ones; the modification of treaty as well as customary law through subsequent practice; the establishment of peremptory norms of international law (ius cogens); and the development of non-binding rules such as resolutions and declarations of international organizations and international conferences having an impact on the progressive development of international law should be seen from this point of view. It is decisive to take into account that the sources of international law constitute a unity, and together form the corpus of international law. Whereas some sources may predominantly be based upon consent (eg international treaties), others may be more open to meta-legal and general considerations derived from ethics, reasonableness, and logic (principles of international law) (see also Ethos, Ethics and Morality in International Relations; Reasonableness in International Law). Therefore, the corpus of international law comprising all sources is based upon consent as well as meta-legal rules and general considerations. In that respect, the individual sources of international law complement each other as far as their substance but also, and more prominently, as far as their foundation is concerned.

5 Those who deny the binding nature of international law (amongst others Posner and Goldsmith; Bolton) argue that international law serves more as a set of guidelines than legal rules. They advance several reasons, from the lack of a central law-making power and the lack of efficient enforcement mechanisms, to the assumption that States act—and should act—only in the furtherance of self-interest, thus denying the existence of community interest[s]. This approach is neither new nor innovative. It can be traced back to Hans Morgenthau and Carl Schmitt. Although some of their criticism of international law is well-founded, they fail to explain why subjects of international law conclude international treaties and why they try to justify any alleged deviation from a commitment entered into. They also fail to appreciate that the States—even the most powerful ones—are in favour of establishing a world order which has a stabilizing effect on world affairs. And finally, they cannot rebut the argument of Louis Henkin that ‘almost all nations observe all principles of international law and almost all of their obligations almost all of the times’ (at 47).

6 This contribution is based on the premise that international law is constituted by legally binding norms, stemming from different sources. The term ‘sources’ refers to two different, albeit interrelated, issues, namely, the process and procedure through which binding rules of international law and the rules of international law as such are generated. The process character of international law is being emphasized not with the aim to question the legally binding nature of international law but to indicate that international law is in permanent flux, even though it is meant to have and does have a stabilizing effect on international relations.

B. Identification of Sources of International Law

7 Unlike national laws where the sources of law are usually specified in a norm superior to laws and regulations, usually a constitution, no such norm exists in international law (Shaw 66). Some consider this a deficiency of international law (Posner and Goldsmith). This criticism has its foundation in an emphasis of national law as the only model for a legal order; a view that disregards the fact that the legal rules governing the relationship between subjects of international law may have to follow different principles.

8 However, statutes of international courts and tribunals specify the sources of international law they may use. Notably, an international court or tribunal may not have the competence to invoke international law in toto but rather a part thereof. For example, according to Art. 293 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea, international courts and tribunals having jurisdiction under Part XV Section 2 of the Convention shall apply the Convention and other rules of international law not incompatible with the Convention. In other words, the international courts and tribunals concerned are not free to apply international law in its totality, at least theoretically.

9 According to Art. 38 (1) ICJ Statute, the sources to be applied by the International Court of Justice (ICJ), whose function it is to decide in accordance with international law such legal disputes as are submitted to it, are:

- a) international treaties, whether general or particular, establishing rules recognized by the contesting States Parties to a dispute before the ICJ;
- b) customary international law as evidence of a general practice accepted as law;
- c) the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations; and
- d) subject to the provisions of Art. 59 ICJ Statute, judicial decisions and teachings of the most highly qualified publicists (Art. 38 (1) ICJ Statute). It is evident from the wording of Art. 38 (1) (d) ICJ Statute that the latter are of a subsidiary nature only. They do not actually qualify as sources of law but rather as means to establish the existence of sources of law.

10 This provision identifies the sources which the ICJ is meant to apply in deciding a dispute submitted to it; it is also referred to as establishing the authentic list of the sources of international law (Thirlway). Although this view may find some justification in the Chapeau to Art. 38 ICJ Statute, it disregards the objective of this provision. It is the States concerned that eventually decide what constitutes international law (Higgins 18). If this approach is being followed, Art. 38 ICJ Statute states in a merely declaratory manner which sources of international law existed when this provision was drafted (Abi Saab). In addition to the sources listed, other sources exist, such as binding decisions of international organizations and unilateral acts. Therefore, Art. 38 (1) ICJ Statute does not provide for a complete list of sources of international law the ICJ may use, and in effect has used, in its jurisprudence.

11 Art. 38 (1) (a)–(c) ICJ Statute do not establish a hierarchy of the sources, although international courts and tribunals will, as a matter of convenience, invoke international treaties first. Apart from those provisions which are considered ius cogens, no such hierarchy exists. It is easily conceivable that the same matter is governed by treaty as well as customary international law and that these rules coexist or that customary international law is supplementing treaty law. The relationship between the sources is to be established on a case-by-case basis by having recourse to the established international law principles of interpretation, such as the lex specialis derogat legi generali rule or the lex posterior derogat legi priori rule (ILC).

C. Law-Making Process in International Law

1. Introduction

12 In general, international law lacks a central law-making power equivalent to the one in national legal systems. The characteristic feature of international law is that its main addressees are also the ones who create international law. Therefore, international law has elements of self-commitment as well as contractual elements, although it would be a simplification to qualify international law only or even predominantly from these two points of view. As already indicated, international law is not only based upon the consent of the States concerned but reflects and has to reflect principles such as justice, equity, and fairness. Such principles are—as can be taken from the evolution of the international community since the end of World War II—not static but develop progressively as required. Whereas traditionally, international law was considered as a legal system co-ordinating activities of States, it has developed under the aegis of the United Nations into a legal regime which is increasingly dominated by the principle of co-operation (Co-operation, International Law of). Some areas of international law, in particular the ones on economic relations or on the protection of the environment, are governed by the principle of solidarity (Solidarity, Principle of). The latter goes beyond the principle of co-operation in that it requires the subjects of international law not only to co-operate amongst each other but also to take into consideration the interest of others and to be guided by the interests of the international community as such. This, as well as the international human rights regime which influences other areas of international law, has an impact on the interpretation of international treaties and on the development of the sources of international law in general.

13 It has already been stated that international law is not static but should also be considered as a process, which means it is in a process of establishment, modification, or conformation. This process should be seen as a unity; all modifications of one of the sources of international law should be understood and assessed from its impact upon international law as such (Besson 170).

2. The Making of Treaties

14 The drafting and adoption of international treaties is tailored to the objective of achieving consent amongst the parties concerned. International treaties are developed in a contractual and thus consensual manner, although it would be misleading to consider international treaties from the point of view of contracts only. In particular, multilateral treaties designed to accommodate community interests are meant to establish an international legal order. The international law on treaties is further guided by the aim to preserve the stability of international treaties once accepted and, as far as multilateral treaties of a general nature are concerned, to achieve the maximum participation of parties in the legal regimes established by each of them.

15 In international law treaties fulfil the function laws have under national law, as they set, besides other sources, law. It has been suggested that international treaties are not a source of law but only a source of legal obligations amongst the parties (Fitzmaurice; see also Abi Saab). This view, however, focuses on bilateral treaties and, even as far as those are concerned, fails to acknowledge their contribution to the corpus of international law at large. In law-making treaties, the contribution to the corpus of international law outweighs the obligation owed to other parties. In fact, the rights of other parties in such treaties, for example, human rights treaties, are mechanisms of enforcement rather than substantial rights. Their emphasis is on giving the parties to such treaty regimes standing within the implementation and enforcement schemes provided by such treaties.

16 The generation of international law is often referred to as law-making process (Besson 164). However, it has to be borne in mind that a law-making process which is equivalent to such a process under national law does not exist in international law, except in a few instances (denied by Posner 28). Only rarely do international organizations exercise law-making power (for details see Alvarez [2005]). International treaties are drafted by their potential addressees and the potential addressees have to express their consent to be bound, for example, by ratification, accession, or in other forms envisaged in Arts 11 et seq Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969). Their basis of legitimacy and the basis for them being binding is, accordingly, firstly the consent of the States concerned. In contrast thereto, in the municipal system, laws are enacted by the competent institutions in a settled law-making procedure and they are also binding on subjects who have not participated in their creation, since the acting institutions are empowered to enact binding rules. Hence, the procedure for drafting international treaties and national laws bears no similarities. Nevertheless, one can hardly deny that international treaties have equivalent functions in international relations to laws in a municipal legal system.

17 The procedure of drafting international treaties is designed so as to generate consent among the participating States or other subjects of international law. Generally speaking, the whole process may be divided into four stages: first, the process of negotiating an international treaty and reaching a preliminary consent among the representatives of the States involved on the text (adoption of the treaty); second, the process during which the consent reached on the international plane is confirmed on the national level; and third, the expression of consent internationally. The fourth stage is the implementation of the international treaty, its interpretation, and its modification through revision, amendments, protocols, or other instruments and through subsequent practice.

18 As far as the first stage is concerned, the drafting of bilateral agreements and of multilateral agreements differs. With respect to bilateral treaties, both sides will normally come with their drafts or positions prepared and try to find a compromise in the bilateral meeting or meetings. The situation is much more complex at multilateral conferences, in particular at conferences in which virtually all States participate. Here, the potential solutions are too numerous for the participants to foresee all of them. Historically, multilateral treaties were adopted by unanimity. According to Art. 9 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties—a default rule—a draft may be adopted by a two-thirds majority. On the one hand, this provides for some flexibility, especially since it precludes that one State can impede the acceptance of a draft. On the other hand, the two-thirds majority rule may lead to the adoption of a treaty against a minority, perhaps just that group of States whose interests are particularly affected. The alternative has become, at many international conferences, in particular the ones undertaken under the auspices of the UN, to apply the consensus rule. This means an agreement is adopted if no participant challenges the consensus reached by insisting on a formal vote. In fact, this does not mean that every participant fully agrees with the result achieved but that it considers its objections not to be serious enough to challenge the result as such. Very often this procedure is combined with a majority vote system. If a participant objects, the text will be accepted by the required majority. The consensus principle has significantly changed the negotiation techniques. It has strengthened the position of the chairpersons in charge. The consensus principle further encourages States to form interest groups. This means, in effect, that at multilateral conferences the integration of the individual objectives or claims of States into one, namely the draft treaty, takes place on several subsequent levels—interest groups, regional groups, subject-oriented committees—until the final decision is reached. Finally, the consensus principle leads to ‘package deals’, which means trade-offs. Therefore, multilateral treaties are not as firmly based upon consent as bilateral treaties. The States participating therein are guided by other considerations besides their individual interests. Regional allegiances or overarching interest group policies may have an impact upon the decision of a State to accept the result achieved.

19 After the conclusion of the negotiating process on the international level, the draft is submitted to the municipal acceptance procedure. The national procedures vary widely, in particular to the extent the parliamentary bodies are involved. As a matter of principle, States are free as to how to organize the national procedure of approval, in particular to the extent that the national parliament is to be involved. Only rarely does an international treaty require a particular action to be taken on the national level, although it is in the interest of international law to strengthen the basis of the national legitimacy of the commitments entered into by the States. Equally, international law does not regulate how States Parties to a treaty ensure that the commitments are implemented on the national level if such implementation is required. These are two lacunae which may result in weakening the legitimacy of international treaty law and render its implementation less effective.

20 Once the national procedure of accepting an international treaty is complete, the consent to be bound is expressed; in the case of a bilateral treaty to the other party and in the case of a multilateral treaty to the community of States Parties of this particular treaty represented by a depositary.

21 International treaties, once adopted, are not static; they are living instruments which develop through interpretation, and they may be amended, revised, or supplemented by subsequent instruments. They may also be changed through subsequent practice in accordance with Art. 31 (3) (b) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. In particular, the latter mechanism constitutes a flexible mode to adjust international treaties to new facts or considerations.

3. The Development of Customary International Law

22 At the outset, international law was mainly constituted by customary international law. Under the aegis of the UN, a multitude of international treaties have been concluded, prompting some authors to express doubts concerning the remaining relevance of customary international law (Friedman 121–3). Others, however, emphasize that customary international law remains of high significance. They argue that, first, the development and adjustment of customary international law is more flexible than the development of treaty law; and second, customary international law is, by its very nature, universal, whereas treaty law binds the parties to these treaties only (D’Amato 12). This does not exclude the possibility of regional or even bilateral customary law. The development of customary international law reflects the characteristics of the international community understood as a legal community. It has the advantage that all States may share in the formulation of new rules and that customary international law can be modified, changed, or amended through this international community more easily than is possible for treaty law (Shaw 70). Certainly, customary international law is less precise than most treaty law but such a lack of precision also constitutes an amount of flexibility. In particular, it may be more easily and more quickly responsive to new factual developments.

23 The term ‘customary international law’ may refer to both the generation of law and the result of that process. While there is agreement concerning the process nature of customary international law, its foundation and binding nature have been the subject of a long-standing controversy. One theory, that was particularly endorsed by Soviet writers, is that customary law is based upon a tacit agreement (Tunkin). This implies that customary international law depends on the will of States, as does treaty law. This, however, is a fiction which is rather difficult to sustain. According to a different approach, the binding nature of customary international law has its basis in the longstanding practice of States, allowing one to expect that this practice will continue (Kelsen). A third group argues that customary international law develops spontaneously from within the international community and derives its legitimacy from the fact that such rules are needed for the well-being of the international community (Ago). This is reminiscent of natural law approaches.

24 Apart from this controversy, it is accepted that customary international law consists of two elements: State practice and opinio iuris. Art. 38 ICJ Statute refers to 'international uniform custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law'. This formulation, however, is unsatisfactory (Van Hoof 87). It is generally accepted that custom is applied, and it is practice which serves as evidence for custom (Higgins 18). Still, it remains controversial whether the emphasis lies on State practice or on opinio iuris, what constitutes State practice, and how the opinio iuris is to be expressed.

25 It is well established that both practice and opinio iuris are necessary to establish customary international law. This, however, does not imply that customary international law has a voluntative basis similar to international treaties. Opinio iuris, the belief that a certain conduct is required or permitted under international law, is in fact a conviction that such conduct is just, fair, or reasonable and for that reason is required under law. Such meta-legal or general legal considerations differ from the consent expressed in respect of treaty-based commitments. Opinio iuris develops in response to an assessment of foreign or own conduct. Only if this assessment leads to a positive result, namely that such conduct is to be considered as legally required, the necessary opinio iuris will form. If the assessment leads to a negative result it will not materialize; rather, the practice will be countered on legal grounds or at least will not be accepted. Therefore, every opinio iuris is the result of a value judgment, an element which is not inherent in (or at least not prominent in) expressing consent to an international treaty.

26 Practice usually manifests itself in activities or omissions attributable to particular subjects of international law, mostly of States. These activities may have an internal character or may be exercised on the international level (Degan 149). International treaties can reflect a State practice relevant for the formulation of customary international law. The conclusion, for example, of numerous investment treaties may be seen to establish customary international law. However, one may also argue that if States feel the necessity to conclude such international agreements, they do not believe that the practice so far existing is a reflection of an obligation to that extent. Still, the practice of States is nowhere better reflected than in treaties. Also, judgments of international courts or tribunals are considered as being of relevance for the development of customary international law. This is so for two reasons. First, judgments of international courts or tribunals may refer to certain norms as being customary international law. As such, they do not create customary international law but they identify and formulate it, and to that extent they are a source of reference. Apart from that, judgments of international courts or tribunals may also contribute to customary international law. Custom may develop amongst States, but equally in international organizations. This does not mean to say that a custom develops directly from, for example, resolutions of the UN General Assembly; but it cannot be denied that a frequent repetition of certain principles by UN organs, in particular the General Assembly, may, over time, amount to custom.

27 One of the elements which is considered to be of particular relevance for a practice is that such practice was carried on for a certain period of time (density and uniformity of the practice; Degan 150 et seq). It has been argued that custom may come about rather quickly or even instantly (Cheng). The law of outer space has been named as an example. The same may happen in response to widespread moral outrage regarding crimes committed in conflicts, such as those in Rwanda and Yugoslavia, that brought about the rapid formation of a set of customary international law rules concerning crimes committed in internal conflicts.

28 Non-governmental organizations have no impact on the formulation of customary international law as long as their actions are not directly attributable to States. However, to the extent that such actors are engaged in the work of international organizations, they can at least indirectly influence the formulation of customary international law. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is an exception, though; it has contributed significantly to the development of customary international law.

29 Not every usage transforms into customary international law, but only that which is carried by an opinio iuris. This has been emphasized by the jurisprudence of the ICJ (see for example in the advisory opinion on Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons paras 66 et seq; Nuclear Weapons Advisory Opinions). As indicated above, opinio iuris constitutes a value-based assessment of a certain practice which leads to the conclusion that this practice is required by law.

30 It is subject to much debate how customary international law can be changed or modified. Does the breach of a customary international law rule lead to the abolition of the rule, or even to the creation of a new one? This has been argued (Higgins 19) on the grounds that customary international law is a process. But it is more than simply a process—customary international law also has a stabilizing effect through which it contributes to the establishment of an international legal order. This stabilizing function derives from established practice and the accompanying belief that the practice is accepted as law—opinio iuris. In the situation of a breach, an established practice is lacking, as is the belief that such practice is required by law. The breach of an established norm may trigger the development of new customary international law only if other States follow such an example and a corresponding opinio iuris develops. Until such development comes to a conclusion, the deviation from a norm of customary international law remains a breach. It is relevant to note at this point that the breach of a norm of international law may actually be the first step of reconciling law with reality. What is essential, though, is that this development cannot be achieved by one State alone but only if other States join in (or do not object to) this practice and develop a corresponding opinio iuris. This is what constitutes the responsiveness of customary international law towards new developments, may they be factual or changes of attitudes.

31 Customary international law is frequently codified in treaties; customary law and treaty law then continue to exist side-by-side. This has the advantage that identical or at least similar rules are applied to States Parties and non-States Parties. However, it may happen that the customary international law rules change over time, whereas the treaty rules remain unchanged. In the past, this has caused some debate regarding the interpretation of the right to self-defence. Some argue that due to the increase of potential actors in armed conflicts, the scope of the right of self-defence under customary international law has changed.

32 To conclude, it may be reiterated that customary international law is more than just a process since it has a stabilizing effect on international relations. It does not depend upon the will of States or other subjects of international law but upon their value-based assessment that such practice is required by law. The practice of one may be followed by others and a corresponding opinio iuris may form, developing such practice into customary international law. The situation may also be reversed; a political opinion may have formed, for example, in a resolution of the UN General Assembly or at a Summit, followed by corresponding practice while the political opinion mutates into an opinio iuris. What is essential is that all States may and do contribute to the development and shaping of customary international law, including those who express reservations. Although this participation is governed by the principle of equality of States, it is nevertheless evident that, as the ICJ expressed in the judgment on the North Sea Continental Shelf Cases (at paras 73–4), those States particularly affected by potential new rules of customary international law have a particular impact on the development or the non-development of a particular rule of customary international law (Virally). As such, customary international law is particularly suited to constitute a counterweight against and supplement to consent-based international treaties.

4. The Development of General Principles

33 The term ‘principle’, generally speaking, may signify one of two things. It may either refer to meta-legal principles—ie principles generated within a philosophical or ethical discourse and then introduced into a normative system (Accioly 33 et seq)—or it may refer to principles inherent in or developed from a particular body of law or law in general. In the following, only the latter will be dealt with.

34 International and regional courts and tribunals make use of principles as an interpretative tool or as a source of concrete obligations. These two functions cannot be separated clearly.

35 Principles may be derived from municipal law, from general considerations, or, by generalizing, from a particular treaty regime. The development and recognition of such principles does not depend on the will of States and all States equally contributing to their development. These principles may, in particular, introduce overarching considerations into international law and, as such, may supplement international treaty law, in particular by influencing the interpretation of the latter.

36 Art. 38 (1) (c) ICJ Statute establishes that general principles derived from municipal law are sources of international law. The ICJ only sporadically referred to general principles in its judgments or advisory opinions. In none of these did the general principles referred to by the parties become a basis for the reasoning of the Court.

37 On the other hand, the ICJ frequently made use of principles derived from general considerations as well as principles derived from a particular treaty regime. As to the former, reference may be made to its judgment in the Corfu Channel Case. Here the ICJ found that the Albanian authorities were under the obligation to make known the existence of a minefield in their territorial waters and to warn the approaching ships of the imminent danger. The ICJ said: 'Such obligations are based...on certain general and well-recognized principles, namely: elementary considerations of humanity, even more exacting in peace than in war; the principle of the freedom of maritime communication; and every State's obligation not to allow knowingly its territory to be used for acts contrary to the rights of other States' (Corfu Channel Case [Judgment] [Merits] 22). One of the prime examples for a principle derived from legal relations in general is the principle of good faith (bona fide) which, in the view of the ICJ, governs the creation and performance of legal obligations (Nuclear Tests [Australia v France] [Judgment] 268 and Nuclear Tests [New Zealand v France] [Judgment] 473; Nuclear Tests Cases).

38 On numerous occasions, the ICJ has had recourse to principles derived from particular treaty regimes. An early example is the advisory opinion on Reservations to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide where the ICJ noted that 'the principles underlying the Convention are principles which are recognized by civilized nations as binding on States, even without any conventional obligation' (at 23; Genocide Convention, Reservations [Advisory Opinion]). In the jurisprudence of the Court, frequent references have been made to the principles enshrined in Art. 2 United Nations Charter. In the Case concerning Certain Questions of Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters (Djibouti v France), particular use was made of a treaty-based principle. The Court considered whether principles set out in the Treaty of Friendship and Co-operation between Djibouti and France of 1977 would inform the way in which the obligations under the Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters of 1986 were to be interpreted ([Judgment] paras 104–114). Here, principles were used to bridge the gap between two separate treaties concluded between the same parties.

39 Principles of law complement other sources of international law in various ways; they guide the interpretation of international treaties and, due to their abstract formulation, are the gateway for progressive interpretation. As the jurisprudence of the ICJ demonstrates, principles of international law may connect treaty regimes. They may be the starting point for the evolution of a new rule of customary international law and they have frequently had an influence on the interpretation of the latter. Principles of law have even been used as a basis for the development of new rights and obligations. In general, they may, and indeed have, become the motor of a progressive development of international law.

5. The Contribution of International Organizations

40 International organizations are playing an increasing role in the establishment of an international normative order (Alvarez [2002] 218 et seq). Their functions vary considerably. While they may only have the role of an initiator and a facilitator of treaty-making conferences, sometimes they exercise truly legislative tasks.

41 Even in those cases where international organizations only initiate legislative processes, which are then taken over by the participating States, their influence is not to be underestimated. Their technical expertise may give them—notably the respective secretariats—a significant influence concerning the issues and the outcome of the norm-creating process. So far, very few international organizations have prescriptive functions such as the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), concerning the regulation of flights over the high seas, or the International Seabed Authority (ISA), which promulgates regulations on deep seabed mining. It has been suggested, in particular in respect of the protection of the international environment, to establish authoritative institutions exercising quasi-governmental functions concerning global problems.

42 One may also speak of a 'norm-creating function' of the UN Security Council. Some decisions of the Security Council taken under Chapter VII of the UN Charter are of a normative nature since they regulate the relations amongst their addressees; provide for the establishment of institutions, such as international criminal courts, including the legal framework in which they function; and even create a regulatory order. The latter is true, for example, for Security Council Resolution S/687 (1991) of 3 April 1991, setting out the conditions for a ceasefire in the war against Iraq (see also UNSC Res 1373 [2001] 'Threats to International Peace and Security Caused by Terrorist Acts' [28 September 2001] SCOR [1 January 2001–31 July 2002] 291; UNSC Res 1540 [2004] 'Non-Proliferation of Weapons of Mass Destruction' [28 April 2004] SCOR [1 August 2003–31 July 2004] 214). Although Security Council decisions have a consensual origin, namely the acceptance of the UN Charter, the legitimacy of such decisions has been put into question (Weston). It is a salient question of whether the existing foundations of international law allow for the establishment of international organizations which have norm-creating functions not based upon consent of the addressees of the norms they prescribe.

43 Resolutions of the UN General Assembly call for a differentiated view. They may play a significant role in law-making even though they are non-binding, notwithstanding the fact that their recommendatory character is based upon State consent. General Assembly resolutions may be declaratory of existing customary law. As such they are not law-making in the true sense of the word but only a means of reference. There have been instances of General Assembly resolutions starting a process which eventually led to the adoption of an international treaty. Finally, repeated General Assembly resolutions adopted by consensus or unanimously may be considered State practice, thus establishing new customary international law.

44 So far, only the external effects of General Assembly resolutions and decisions have been addressed. It is well established that internally, certain decisions of the General Assembly have normative functions.

45 Regional organizations and arrangements offer, due to the homogeneity of their membership, increased possibilities for the development of a regional normative order. It is worth considering whether one should acknowledge that the international community is formed of regions and consequently put more emphasis on regional integration; there are tendencies pointing in that direction.

6. The Contribution of Courts and Tribunals

46 The contribution of international courts, tribunals, and dispute settlement mechanisms (for example the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes [ICSID]) to the establishment of an international normative order also deserves attention. Considering judgments of international courts merely as an interpretation of a given international agreement does not do justice to their role. Any such interpretation contributes to the further development of the relevant agreement or of customary international law. For example, the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in Prosecutor v Tadić held that customary international law rules concerning methods and means of warfare applicable in international conflicts may also apply to non-international conflicts ([Jurisdiction] para. 137). This reasoning was not based on State practice; rather, the Appeals Chamber argued that the concerns of humanity were the same and could not depend upon the nature of the conflict. Nevertheless, international courts and tribunals as a rule are not considered to have norm-creating functions, although the line between interpretation and law-making is sometimes fluid. The first argument is a positivistic one. International courts and tribunals are called upon to settle disputes on the basis of international law. As a matter of logic, this means the law has to exist. Apart from that, judgments of international courts and tribunals bind only the parties to that dispute (Art. 59 ICJ Statute), although the interpretation of the relevant source may be influenced by that case. International courts or tribunals referring to previous judgments, in particular those of the ICJ, do not do so because they feel bound, but rather as a matter of convenience (Fitzmaurice 172; Jennings 73). Finally, those who equate the functions of international courts and tribunals with law-making, fail to acknowledge the relevance of the international law-making process.

7. Others

47 Non-State actors are playing an increasing role in the norm-creating process. Even though they do not participate on an equal footing in codification conferences, they may be involved in the pre-normative process which leads to the development of new international legal regimes. Examples are the impact of non-governmental organizations on the drafting of the 1997 Ottawa Convention on the Prohibition of the Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and on Their Destruction, and on the establishment of a mechanism for an individual complaint procedure under the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Through this involvement, the views of representatives of the international society are introduced into the norm-creating process, eroding a monopoly of States. It has been argued that the proliferation and increasing influence of non-governmental organizations has strengthened the democratic element in international relations. Numerous international organizations have developed close links with non-governmental organizations engaging them in the norm-creating process they administer.

8. Ius Cogens

48 In national law there exists a complex hierarchy of legal sources: constitutions; acts of parliament; regulations; and administrative decisions.

49 In international law—at least in traditional international law—a comparable hierarchy was unknown. However, there was a shift in emphasis in the late 1960s. Within the UN General Assembly, the view evolved that some international norms should be accorded higher rank than others, in particular the right to self-determination. This had already been proposed in the 17th and 18th centuries by scholars such as Samuel Rachel, Christian Wolff, Georg Friedrich de Martens, and Emerich de Vattel. The 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties adopted this approach and provided that a treaty will be void if at the time of its conclusion it conflicts with a peremptory norm of general international law (Art. 53). The same principle would apply to customary international law. This clearly establishes a hierarchy of sources. Such a rule must be accepted and recognized by the international community of States as a whole, which makes it evident that a peremptory norm of international law rests on the consent or at least acquiescence of the world community. This consensual foundation deprives the ius cogens concept of the function to transport meta-legal or general considerations into international law, a function this concept had in the eyes of the proponents of natural law (see also Natural Law and Justice; Legal Positivism).

50 So far, no significant State practice has developed with respect to peremptory norms, in particular none which has qualified one concrete norm as being of peremptory nature (see also Art. 50 UN ILC 'Draft Articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts' [2001] GAOR 56th Session Supp 10, 43). No dispute has arisen amongst States in which a peremptory norm played a significant role. The notion is referred to mainly in academic writings and alluded to in advisory opinions of the ICJ (see Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons para. 79; Israeli Wall Advisory Opinion [Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory] para. 157).

D. Assessment

1. Expanding Scope of International Law

51 The international normative order has significantly expanded over the last few years; international law now governs issues which would clearly have been considered domestic affairs up until the middle of the 20th century. But the international normative order has not only expanded as far as its scope is concerned. What is even more relevant is that it has a deeper and more direct impact on national law than ever before. New actors, besides States, have become involved in the shaping of the international normative order—international organizations; non-governmental organizations; and sometimes groups of individuals. Their influence cannot always be adequately described by reference to traditional mechanisms of international norm development. This has become a reality in spite of the warning not to blur the distinction between normative and non-normative rules and to differentiate between normative and pre-normative acts in the international norm-creating process (Weil 415).

52 The international normative order comprises the legal rules governing and guiding international relations. It prescribes what its subjects are obliged to do, must not do or may do, and which factual situation they have to establish (Dupuy 371). Thus far, the international normative order constitutes a stabilizing factor in international relations. This does not imply, however, that the international normative order has the sole function of restraining States in their international relations. On the contrary, international law is designed and also used to establish alternative forms of State conduct or, to rule out particular forms of conduct, to create new relations and new situations. Recent examples where pre-normative or normative acts have played a proactive role in international law-making are those where legal principles have been established serving as a foundation of new legal regimes. The common heritage of mankind principle in the context of the law of the sea and the principle of sustainable development in the context of the international protection of the environment are cases in point. However, the international normative order is not limited to regulatory functions. It also has an effect concerning the formation of the international community. This effect is sometimes referred to as the 'constitutionalization' of international governance (Frowein; Tomuschat). In this capacity, the corpus of international law is a precondition for the very existence and for the further development of the international community. It reflects the need and desire of its members for a common structure. It constitutes the framework in which its members may seek to accommodate their mutual interests and through which the interests of the international community as a whole can be formulated and achieved.

53 The rapid growth of international treaty law in recent times has occasionally resulted in changes in the texture of international treaties and in the way they have evolved. Currently, multilateral international treaties are developed step-by-step quite frequently. For example, the 1967 Outer Space Treaty (Treaty on Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space, Including the Moon and other Celestial Bodies) is based upon several resolutions of the UN General Assembly, while the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties was prepared by the International Law Commission (ILC). The creation of international treaties has thus been entrusted to a political forum or fora, or to a technical forum in combination with a political one (Wolfrum 'Introduction' in Wolfrum and Röben 1–13, at 3).

54 International treaty law has particularly expanded in areas such as international environmental law; international economic law; international law of the sea; and international criminal law. It seems evident that the norm-creating impetus of international treaties is unbroken. Referring to international treaties as norm-creating means taking it for granted that they actualize the interests of the international community rather than just formulate the individual interests of the States participating in the negotiating process. This invokes the distinction between international treaties which simply accommodate the interests of the participating States and those which pursue community interests (traités-contrats v traités-lois). The latter creates a micro-legal system within the general international normative order. But apart from their regulatory effect, international treaties also become an important part of the practice of the States involved, which may lead to the establishment of new customary international law. Additionally, particular international treaties may influence the legal relations with and even amongst non-parties, such as treaties having erga omnes effect (Obligations erga omnes) or establishing the status of a particular territory or institution. Such international treaties have normative effects beyond the participating parties.

2. Mechanisms for a Progressive Development of Treaty Law

55 Many multilateral international treaties of the recent past have been designed as framework agreements whose provisions are supplemented by further rules. While in the past, international treaties frequently provided for supplementary law-making so as to adapt a legal regime most flexibly to changed needs or circumstances, this approach has now reached a new level as particular institutions are being entrusted with the progressive development of particular treaties (see Conference [Meeting] of States Parties). The system established by each of these international agreements thereby gains an additional dimension. Framework conventions establish 'living' treaty regimes with the prospect of continuous legislative activities. The formats developed display a significant variety.

56 A parallel mechanism, although with less authority, exists concerning international human rights treaties; it also opens the possibility for further development of the respective agreements through interpretation and application. So-called treaty bodies, such as the Human Rights Committee or the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (Human Rights, Treaty Bodies; Environmental Treaty Bodies), have the competence to issue general comments/recommendations which have an influence on the interpretation and application of the respective treaty.

3. Development Outside the Treaty-based Order

57 The development of the international normative order does not solely depend upon international treaties. The ILC, as far as State responsibility is concerned, did not initiate the finalization of the norm-creating process which commenced when it was entrusted with the codification of the respective rules. Instead, the ILC recommended that the UN General Assembly only take note of the Articles on State Responsibility rather than submit them to a codification conference, thus relying on the development of customary international law. In other areas, customary international law is also developing or has developed parallel to international treaty law, in part supplementing or modifying it. The relevant mechanism is subsequent State practice in accordance with Art. 31 (3) (b) Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

58 Apart from international treaty law, customary international law, and principles, other mechanisms have become increasingly important for the development of the international normative order. These are norms developed by self-established or politically mandated bodies; treaty-based conferences of parties; treaty bodies; international courts; and international organizations. The rules developed by such institutions have different impacts upon the international normative order. They may constitute restatements of international law or modify international treaty law.

59 For example, the 1994 San Remo Manual on International Law Applicable to Armed Conflict at Sea or the 2009 Harvard Manual on International Law Applicable to Air and Missile Warfare, developed by experts, are designed as a contemporary restatement of the law applicable in armed conflict. State practice will show if they will be accepted. Other similar instruments exist, for example, in international economic law and in international environmental law (eg the Codex Alimentarius or the Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries). The Codex Alimentarius, prepared by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO) and the World Health Organization ('WHO'), is non-binding. Nevertheless, it has a significant influence on the international harmonization of food safety standards, as products consistent with these standards are presumed to be in compliance with the WTO Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures ('SPS Agreement'). The Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries is not, as such, a binding instrument, but it is implemented and used by the FAO as an instrument to generate new international norms. It is the particularity of these codes that they have been developed outside the context of an international treaty regime. Their legitimacy and their potential impact upon the international legal order depend upon them being drafted by experts and subsequently accepted in State practice (Wolfrum 'Introduction' in Wolfrum and Röben at 6).

60 One should also consider to what extent the various sources influence each other. Non-treaty law standards may concretize treaty law provisions previously open for interpretation. For example, the lex mercatoria is used for that purpose. Non-treaty standards may be restatements of customary international law or may influence the formation of the latter. Also, treaty law influences the formation of customary international law. For example, the Geneva Conventions Additional Protocol I (1977) is considered by several national military manuals as customary international law, while the manuals themselves constitute State practice and contribute to the development of customary international law. International law sources form a unity and, as such, influence and supplement each other. They are, to a varying degree, susceptible to meta-legal and general consideration which is a mechanism for their progressive development, as well as the basis for their sustainable legitimacy.

61 There are norms which may not be considered binding in a formal sense but which are nevertheless expected to be followed (see also Soft Law). In this category belongs, among others, the Basel Accords, which apply among the governors of the G20 central banks.

62 Hortatory rules may also play an important role in the formation of the corpus of international law. Such rules constitute important phases in law-making (Boyle 904). For example, IAEA Guidelines were the basis for the adoption of the 1986 Convention on Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident. UNEP Guidelines were incorporated in the 1991 UNECE Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context. In particular, non-binding norms may establish general principles which may in turn direct the establishment and shape of legally binding international norms. There is even a recent trend towards the enforcement of non-binding rules. This is the case, for example, for the FAO Code of Conduct for Responsible Fisheries.

63 The formerly strict division of sources into legally binding ones and those that lack binding force is getting blurred. Not only do non-binding norms have an impact upon broadly-phrased treaty norms, but they also influence the development and shaping of principles of international law. What is more, there is a growing tendency to implement such non-binding norms. If this development is consolidated, they will gain an established place in the corpus of international law besides the established sources.

I. Introduction

1. The European Communities appeals from certain issues of law covered in the Panel Report, European Communities - Customs Classification of Certain Computer Equipment<sup>1</sup> (the "Panel Report") and certain legal interpretations developed by the Panel in that Report. The Panel was established to consider complaints by the United States against the European Communities, Ireland and the United Kingdom concerning the tariff treatment of Local Area Network ("LAN") equipment and personal computers with multimedia capability ("PCs with multimedia capability").<sup>2</sup> The United States claimed that the European Communities, Ireland and the United Kingdom accorded to LAN equipment and/or PCs with multimedia capability treatment less favourable than that provided for in Schedule LXXX of the European Communities<sup>3</sup> ("Schedule LXXX") and, therefore, acted inconsistently with their obligations under Article II:1 of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 (the "GATT 1994").

<sup>2</sup>The United States submitted three requests for the establishment of a panel: European Communities - Customs Classification of Certain Computer Equipment, WT/DS62/4, 13 February 1997; United Kingdom - Customs Classification of Certain Computer Equipment, WT/DS67/3, 10 March 1997; and Ireland - Customs Classification of Certain Computer Equipment, WT/DS68/2, 10 March 1997. At its meeting of 20 March 1997, the Dispute Settlement Body (the "DSB") agreed to modify, at the request of the parties to the dispute, the terms of reference of the Panel established against the European Communities, so that the panel requests by the United States contained in documents WT/DS67/3 and WT/DS68/2 might be incorporated into the mandate of the Panel established pursuant to document WT/DS62/4. See WT/DS62/5, 25 April 1997.

2. The Panel Report was circulated to the Members of the World Trade Organization (the "WTO") on 5 February 1998. The Panel reached the conclusion that:

... the European Communities, by failing to accord imports of LAN equipment from the United States treatment no less favourable than that provided for under heading 84.71 or heading 84.73, as the case may be, in Part I of Schedule LXXX, acted inconsistently with the requirements of Article II:1 of GATT 1994.<sup>4</sup>

The Panel made the following recommendation:

The Panel recommends that the Dispute Settlement Body request the European Communities to bring its tariff treatment of LAN equipment into conformity with its obligations under GATT 1994.<sup>5</sup>

3. On 24 March 1998, the European Communities notified the DSB<sup>6</sup> of its intention to appeal certain issues of law covered in the Panel Report and legal interpretations developed by the Panel, pursuant to paragraph 4 of Article 16 of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes (the "DSU"), and filed a Notice of Appeal with the Appellate Body, pursuant to Rule 20 of the Working Procedures for Appellate Review (the "Working Procedures"). On 3 April 1998, the European Communities filed an appellant's submission.<sup>7</sup> On 20 April 1998, the United States filed an appellee's submission<sup>8</sup> and on the same day, Japan filed a third participant's submission.<sup>9</sup> The oral hearing, provided for in Rule 27 of the Working Procedures, was held on 27 April 1998. At the oral hearing, the participants and the third participant presented their arguments and answered questions from the Division of the Appellate Body hearing the appeal.

A. Appellant - European Communities

4. The European Communities requests the Appellate Body to review a number of errors of law and certain legal interpretations developed by the Panel. The European Communities submits that the Panel erred in law when it rejected the procedural objections of the European Communities concerning the lack of specificity of the request for the establishment of a panel of the United States, thus hampering the rights of defence of the responding Member and violating Article 6.2 of the DSU. The European Communities asserts that the Panel also erred in considering that the meaning of a particular heading of the Schedule of a WTO Member should be read in the light of the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member outside the context of a non-violation complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) of the GATT 1994. The European Communities also asserts that the Panel erred in finding that Article II:5 of the GATT 1994 confirms this view. Subordinately, the European Communities argues that even if the notion of "legitimate expectations" was relevant in the context of a violation complaint under Article XXIII:1(a) of the GATT 1994, those legitimate expectations should not be based on the classification practices for individual importers and individual consignments, or on the subjective perception of a number of exporting companies of an exporting Member. The European Communities submits that the Panel also erred in considering that, in any case, the onus of clarifying the scope of a tariff concession during a multilateral tariff negotiation under the auspices of the GATT/WTO shall necessarily be on the importing Member. The European Communities asserts that by so doing, the Panel has created new rules on the burden of proof which are inconsistent with the ones applicable to WTO dispute settlement procedures.

1. Request for the Establishment of a Panel

5. The European Communities submits that the Panel erred in finding that the measures under dispute and the products affected by such measures were sufficiently identified by the United States to include measures other than Commission Regulation (EC) No. 1165/95 as far as it concerns LAN adapter cards.<sup>10</sup> The European Communities asserts that the findings of the Panel are based on several legal errors. First, the Panel disregarded the requirement under Article 6.2 of the DSU providing that the request for the establishment of a panel shall "identify the specific measures at issue". Second, the Panel misapplied the established procedural requirement according to which the product coverage of a claim has to be specified prior to the commencement of the Panel's examination. Third, neglecting these procedural requirements which the European Communities invoked before the Panel results in a serious violation of the rights of defence of the European Communities and, as such, constitutes a breach of the demands of due process that are implicit in the DSU.

6. With respect to the identification of the specific measures at issue, the European Communities submits that the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel does not meet the minimum standards contained in Article 6.2 of the DSU. The European Communities asserts that in European Communities - Regime for the Importation, Sale and Distribution of Bananas<sup>11</sup> ("European Communities - Bananas"), the Appellate Body confirmed that the measures at issue in that dispute were adequately identified under Article 6.2 of the DSU by referring to the basic EC regulation at issue, by place and date of publication, in the request for the establishment of a panel. The European Communities states that this reading of Article 6.2 of the DSU, pursuant to which the request must at least specify one basic legal measure, is fully in line with the general rules of interpretation of public international law. In the view of the European Communities, the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel only identifies one specific measure, namely Commission Regulation (EC) No. 1165/95, which is said to "reclassify" LAN adapter cards and which, unlike the regulation at issue in European Communities - Bananas, is not a basic measure on which all the other actions complained about are founded. In response to a question asked at the oral hearing, the European Communities expressly accepted that the application of a tariff in an individual case on a consignment is a measure within the meaning of Article 6.2 of the DSU. However, in the view of the European Communities, the measures in question are only vaguely described in the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel. The type of measure, the responsible authority, the date of issue or the reference are not clearly defined. Furthermore, the European Communities argues that it is even unclear how many of these alleged measures are under dispute.

7. The European Communities also submits that under the minimum standard laid down in Article 6.2 of the DSU, relating to the identification of specific measures, it is also necessary to clearly define the product coverage of a claim raised in the framework of a dispute settlement procedure. The European Communities asserts that the Panel erroneously distinguished the present case from EEC - Quantitative Restrictions Against Imports of Certain Products from Hong Kong<sup>12</sup> ("EEC - Quantitative Restrictions Against Hong Kong") when holding that no new product was added by the United States in the course of the proceedings, and that the definition of LAN equipment provided by the United States, in responding to a question by the Panel, was an elucidation of the product coverage already specified in the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel. According to the European Communities, this reasoning is based on at least two flawed assumptions: first, that LAN equipment and PCs with multimedia capability could each be considered as a single product; and, second, that the explanations of the United States before the Panel concerning product coverage were an "elucidation" rather than an unlawful "curing" of the defective product description in the request for the establishment of a panel.

8. With respect to the first assumption, the European Communities submits that LAN equipment is not a single product but a wide variety of different products used in a local area network. Furthermore, the United States has not been consistent regarding the definition of LAN equipment in the course of the panel proceedings. The European Communities also asserts that, like LAN equipment, PCs with multimedia capability are not a single product category. It is further argued by the European Communities that using such broad product categories when defining the scope of a claim is equivalent to adding the convenient phrase "including but not necessarily limited to" in the request for the establishment of a panel. In the view of the European Communities, the Appellate Body in India - Patent Protection for Pharmaceutical and Agricultural Chemical Products<sup>13</sup> ("India - Patents") vigorously rejected the use of this kind of loose language when holding that "the convenient phrase, 'including but not necessarily limited to', is simply not adequate to 'identify the specific measures at issue and provide a brief summary of the legal basis of the complaint sufficient to present the problem clearly' as required by Article 6.2 of the DSU".<sup>14</sup>

9. The European Communities submits that the second assumption on which the Panel based its reasoning was that the United States elucidated the product coverage of its panel request. The European Communities argues that the Panel appeared to agree that the United States had left the precise scope of the dispute in the dark and, after the first meeting of the Panel with the parties, allowed the United States to provide a definitive list of products with respect to which it alleged there had been a violation. The European Communities asserts that the Panel accepted this list as an "elucidation" and sufficient specification of the product coverage, thus regarding the vague product definition of the United States as cured. In the view of the European Communities, this finding of the Panel amounts to an error in law.

10. The European Communities asserts that in any judicial or quasi-judicial procedure, it is an essential procedural right of the responding party to be aware of the case held against it, and that the WTO dispute settlement system can only produce acceptable solutions to conflicts between WTO

Members if this fundamental rule of due process is adequately observed. The European Communities submits that the Appellate Body should, therefore, guarantee this essential procedural right by continuing to interpret Article 6.2 of the DSU strictly.

2. "Legitimate Expectations" in the Interpretation of a Schedule

11. According to the European Communities, the existence of a common intention forms the basis for the mutual consent of the signatories to be bound by an international agreement. This common intention finds its authentic expression in the text of the treaty, not in the subjective expectations of one or other of the parties to the agreement. The European Communities states that the rules of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties<sup>15</sup> (the "Vienna Convention") on the interpretation of international agreements are based on this fundamental consideration. Furthermore, the European Communities asserts that the report in Panel on Newsprint<sup>16</sup> is based on the correct assumption that a Schedule is an agreed commitment between the contracting parties and is not just the unilateral perception of one of the Members involved in the multilateral negotiations. The European Communities also submits that "protocols and certifications relating to tariff concessions" are an integral part of the GATT 1994<sup>17</sup> and, therefore, are part of an international multilateral agreement which is the result of a "meeting of the minds" and not the sum of subjective perceptions or expectations.

12. The European Communities asserts that the complaint of the United States was founded only on the allegation that the European Communities had violated its obligations under Article II:1 of the GATT 1994, which indicates that the claim was based only on Article XXIII:1(a) of the GATT 1994. The European Communities also submits that it appears that, when presenting its legal position, the United States used the notion of "reasonable expectations" and "legitimate expectations" as synonymous. The European Communities states that the Panel has not drawn any particular conclusion from the varied definitions of this notion and has apparently, albeit implicitly, decided to consider that the two definitions can be used indifferently to describe the same concept. In the view of the European Communities, the same approach was used by the Appellate Body, in paragraphs 41-42 of its Report in India - Patents and, therefore, the European Communities suggests that for the sake of this appeal, the Appellate Body continues to consider the notion of "legitimate expectations" used by the Panel and the parties to this dispute as equivalent to that of "reasonable expectations".

13. The European Communities submits that the Panel erred in law by not considering the object and purpose of the tariff concession in Schedule LXXX with respect to the products concerned but rather a supposed and erroneous object and purpose of Article II of the GATT 1994, i.e., the protection of "legitimate expectations". In the view of the European Communities, the Panel should have proceeded, pursuant to Article 31 of the Vienna Convention, with the interpretation of the words used in Schedule LXXX in the light of their object and purpose and within their context. The European Communities asserts that the context of the Schedule must include the negotiations, the legal situation in both the exporting and importing Members (including the classification practice of the United States during the entire period of the negotiations), the EC internal legislation applicable to such tariff treatment, the EC customs nomenclature existing at the time of the drafting of the Schedule and so on. Responding to a question asked by the Appellate Body during the oral hearing, the European Communities stated that on the basis of Article 31(3)(c) of the Vienna Convention, the International Convention on the Harmonized Commodity Description and Coding System<sup>18</sup> (the "Harmonized System") and its Explanatory Notes<sup>19</sup> would be relevant in interpreting the obligations of the European Communities under Schedule LXXX vis-à-vis WTO Members which are also Members of the World Customs Organization (the "WCO").

14. The European Communities argues that the Panel limited itself to an unmotivated affirmation that the context to be considered pursuant to Article 31 of the Vienna Convention was only Article II of the GATT 1994, and has proceeded to the totally separate and not directly relevant interpretation of the object and purpose of Article II and not of the Schedule. The European Communities asserts that "even more erroneously, [the Panel's] interpretation of Article II has been achieved through the reference to previous case law in a non-violation case, notwithstanding the fact that the present procedure is only concerned with a violation complaint".<sup>20</sup> Therefore, the context that the present Panel considered to be relevant for the interpretation of Schedule LXXX in a violation complaint has been deduced from the interpretation of Article II in a non-violation complaint. The European Communities further asserts that in paragraph 36 of the Appellate Body Report in India - Patents, the Appellate Body clearly indicates that the concept of the protection of reasonable expectations of contracting parties relating to market access was developed in the context of non-violation complaints under Article XXIII:1(b) of the GATT. Thus, according to the European Communities, the Panel's finding in paragraph 8.23 contradicts this interpretation and "melds the legally-distinct bases for 'violation' and 'non-violation' complaints under Article XXIII of the GATT 1994 into a uniform cause of action"<sup>21</sup> which is not consistent with Article XXIII.

15. It is further argued by the European Communities that, independently of the legal issues that were at stake in the two dispute settlement procedures, there is an extraordinary resemblance in the legal approach followed by the panel in India - Patents and that followed by the present Panel. The European Communities submits that as in India - Patents, this Panel: (i) was not about an Article XXIII:1(b) "non-violation" complaint but only about an Article XXIII:1(a) "violation" complaint; (ii) was not about a violation complaint concerning Articles III or XI of the GATT; (iii) was not concerned with the affectation of competitive relationship between imported and domestic products, but rather with the tariff treatment of certain products compared to the concessions scheduled by the European Communities in the WTO; and (iv) has considered the "legitimate expectations" of the parties not by examining whether they were reflected in the words of the treaty -- Schedule LXXX in this case -- but rather by "imputing" into the treaty considerations and subjective "understandings" which the Panel has considered to be the expectations of a Member and of private companies involved in the trade of the covered products and which were never reflected in the wording of the Schedule.

16. The European Communities also submits that the Panel's findings lead to "absurd practical consequences".<sup>22</sup> The European Communities questions how it is possible to determine the content of MFN tariff treatment on the basis of the "legitimate expectations" of one Member among all WTO Members. If the "legitimate expectations" of that Member diverges from the "legitimate expectations" of other Members, the consequence would be that a Member, in order to know exactly what is the tariff treatment to grant a given product, would have to verify the potentially divergent "legitimate expectations" of all other WTO Members. This is at odds with the aim affirmed by the Panel to protect the predictability and stability of the tariff treatment of that particular product. Moreover, in the view of the European Communities, the balance of mutual concessions among Members, which is the result of the successive rounds of tariff negotiations in the framework of the GATT/WTO, would be severely upset: the "legitimate expectations" of one Member would, through the MFN provision, apply to all other Members whose balance of reciprocal concessions was based on substantially different and variable "legitimate expectations". The European Communities further claims that, if the Panel's findings on this point were upheld, the whole purpose of Article II of the GATT 1994 and of the Members' Schedules would be altered. In the view of the European

Communities, a tariff concession bound by a Member in its Schedule would no longer define a limit to the duty applicable upon importation of a given product, but would rather be determined by a unilateral perception of the advantages expected by the exporting Member.

17. The European Communities submits that the Panel violated the rules of interpretation of Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention and Articles 3.2 and 19.2 of the DSU by affirming that "[although] in nearly all instances, the ordinary meaning of the terms of the actual description in a tariff schedule accurately reflects and exhausts the content of the legitimate expectations ... [i]t must remain possible, at least in principle, that parties have legitimately formed expectations based on other particular supplementary factors".<sup>23</sup> According to the European Communities, what the Panel appears to pronounce here is the power to add elements which are not present in the text of the Schedules whereas, under Articles 3.2 and 19.2 of the DSU, a panel is required simply to clarify the provisions of the covered agreements. The European Communities submits that this would inevitably alter the very nature of the panel procedure which would be seen as replacing, or attempting to replace, the signatories of the WTO Agreement.

18. It is further claimed by the European Communities that the Panel erred by stating that the importance of "legitimate expectations" in interpreting tariff commitments can be confirmed by the text of Article II:5 of the GATT 1994. The European Communities submits that the Panel made two contradictory statements. On the one hand, the Panel stated that Article II:5 confirms the existence of the "legitimate expectations" in Article II:1. On the other hand, however, it stated that Article II:5 is a provision for the special bilateral procedure regarding tariff classification, which is not directly at issue in this case. In the view of the European Communities, there is a clear non-sequitur between the affirmation of the inapplicability of Article II:5 to the present case and its use for the interpretation of a different provision which is declared applicable to this case. According to the European Communities, either Article II:5 is relevant and applicable to the present case, in particular for the interpretation of Schedule LXXX, or it is not. It cannot be both at the same time. It is further argued by the European Communities that the only relevance of Article II:5 of the GATT 1994 could have been in the context of a procedure aimed at requesting a compensatory adjustment, which was never pursued by the United States. Thus, according to the European Communities, if the Panel was of the opinion that Article II:5 was relevant, it should have come to the conclusion that it was only relevant in establishing that the United States had never correctly followed it. Alternatively, the European Communities argues that Article II:5 is simply irrelevant.

19. The European Communities also submits that Article II:5 does not prove the existence of a notion of "legitimate expectations" in Article II of the GATT 1994 or, more generally, in the tariff treatment of a given product under the Schedule of a Member. The European Communities notes that the words "believes to have been contemplated" and "contemplated" in the first and second sentence of this provision are highlighted in the Panel Report and, therefore, argues that the Panel attached a special value to them in order to support its findings. The European Communities cannot see how these words, read in their context, could in any way be assimilated to the notion of "legitimate expectations" that was developed in the context of non-violation cases. In the view of the European Communities, there is nothing in the words "believes" or "contemplated" that indicates any reference to an objective entitlement to a tariff treatment that would be different from the one that derives from the objective interpretation of the content of the Schedule of the importing Member.

20. In the event that the Appellate Body considers that the notion of "legitimate/reasonable expectations" is relevant in the context of a violation dispute under Article XXIII:1(a) of the GATT 1994, the European Communities submits the following arguments for its consideration. According to the European Communities, the core of the Panel's argument regarding the notion of "legitimate expectations" can be summarized as follows: during a multilateral trade negotiation, the tariff treatment of a given product subject to negotiation is considered with respect to the "actual normal" tariff treatment at the time of the negotiation, unless there is a "manifestly anomalous" treatment that would indicate "the contrary". Therefore, the meaning of the tariff treatment which is bound in the importing Member's Schedule must correspond to the "actual normal" tariff treatment at the time of the negotiation. Otherwise, there will be a breach of the "legitimate expectations" of the exporting Member and, therefore, a violation of Article II:1 of the GATT 1994.

21. The European Communities submits that the Panel's reasoning is affected by errors in law and in logic in at least three respects. First, the European Communities argues that a duty imposed at a level which is currently lower than the duty bound in a Schedule does not constitute a right for the Members which temporarily benefit from the reduction. Second, the European Communities submits that it is not correct to assert, as the Panel does, that the current duty treatment is taken as the basis for the negotiations and, therefore, that treatment will be continued unless such treatment is manifestly anomalous or there is information readily available to the exporting Member that clearly indicates the contrary. Third, the European Communities argues that elements of subjective judgement such as "normally based", "manifestly anomalous", "information readily available" and "clearly indicates" are not legal elements that must, or even can, be taken into account when interpreting a Member's Schedule and/or Article II of the GATT 1994. These subjective appreciations are not included in Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention. Thus, in the view of the European Communities, irrespective of the existence of any normality or abnormality, or of information readily or not readily available, the actual or current tariff treatment of a certain product could not be considered as an obligation under Article II if it cannot be demonstrated that it is reflected in the Schedule.

22. The European Communities also submits that the Panel should not have dealt with classification issues as the WTO system does deal with these issues in the covered agreements. According to the European Communities, there is no obligation under the GATT to follow any particular system for classifying goods, and a Member has the right to introduce in its customs tariff new positions or sub-positions as appropriate. The European Communities also argues that "[w]hat the Panel has de facto done here is weighing the number of individual EC classification decisions presented as evidence by the US against the opposite EC individual classification decisions presented as evidence by the EC in order to achieve the result that the former are correct and the latter are not".<sup>24</sup> The European Communities asserts that this is nothing less than a classification decision by the Panel in spite of the fact that the Panel itself rightly considers classification issues to be outside its terms of reference.

3. Clarification of the Scope of Tariff Concessions

23. The European Communities submits that the Panel erred in considering that the onus of clarifying the scope of a tariff concession during a multilateral tariff negotiation under the auspices of the GATT/WTO shall necessarily be placed on the side of the importing Member. In the view of the European Communities, the issue at stake in this dispute is not whether a requirement of clarification was on the United States or on the European Communities, but rather whether the agreement, which the United States claims it reached with the European Communities and other WTO Members, on certain tariff treatment of LAN equipment, really existed and was reflected in Schedule LXXX.

24. The European Communities asserts that the Panel dedicated three pages to the totally irrelevant issue of the burden of "clarification", which is treated separately from the issue of whether the United States has proven its assertion that Schedule LXXX contains an obligation to provide tariff treatment lower than the one applied. It is further argued by the European Communities that the Panel cannot rely on two contradictory assertions at the same time. Either the burden of proof and the burden of clarification are different notions, in which case the Panel should have explained to the parties and to the Members of the WTO how this is relevant in the present dispute, or the burden of clarification is identical with the notion of burden of proof or has, in any case, a bearing on the burden of proof in such a way as to determine a different distribution of that burden between the party which asserts and the party which responds.

25. The European Communities submits that in this second scenario, the Panel has in fact created a newly invented rule on the burden of proof. According to this burden of proof, "the exporting Member that could show the existence of practices on the current classification of individual shipments by some 'prevailing' customs authorities of a Member would have proved its assertion that a tariff treatment was agreed in the Schedule, ... irrespective of whether it has actually proved that the existence of the agreement on a certain tariff treatment was actually reflected in the text of the agreement (or of the agreed Schedule). The burden of clarifying the content of the Schedule is on the importing Member: as a result, that Member is to blame for any misunderstanding".<sup>25</sup>

26. The European Communities cannot agree with this newly invented rule. This rule would allow the Member who asserts that a certain agreement was passed on the tariff treatment of a given product to shift the burden of proof to the responding Member without any need to submit evidence related to the words of the agreement. In the view of the European Communities, the result of such an "easy" shift of the burden of proof on the responding Member would be that, failing any written document, it would find itself in the practical impossibility of rebutting that assumption. An assertion would amount to a proof, and an almost un rebuttable one, which is fundamentally at odds with the finding of the Appellate Body in United States - Measure Affecting Imports of Woven Wool Shirts and Blouses from India<sup>26</sup> ("United States - Shirts and Blouses").

B. Appellee - United States

27. The United States endorses the findings and conclusions of the Panel. The United States submits that the Panel was correct in determining that the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel sufficiently identified the measures and products at issue. The United States also asserts that regardless of whether the Appellate Body accepts the Panel's reasoning and interpretation of "legitimate expectations", the findings of the Panel Report support its ultimate conclusion that the impairment of treatment resulting from actions of customs authorities in the European Communities is inconsistent with Article II:1 of the GATT 1994. The United States also submits that the Panel correctly followed the standard laid down by the Appellate Body in United States - Shirts and Blouses and that, contrary to the arguments of the European Communities, the Panel did not establish a new burden of proof rule.

28. The United States asserts that the Panel correctly followed the guidance of the Appellate Body decision in European Communities - Bananas in determining that the United States sufficiently identified the measures and products at issue. According to the United States, the meaning of the term "specific measures", as used in Article 6.2 of the DSU, was addressed in European Communities - Bananas where the panel found that the panel request complied with the requirements of Article 6.2 of the DSU because the measures contested by the complainants were "adequately identified", even though they were not listed explicitly. In the view of the United States, the panel and Appellate Body decisions in European Communities - Bananas "teach that the specificity requirement of Article 6.2 will be met if the responding party is provided sufficient notice and identification of the measure(s) at issue, even if those measures are not specifically identified".<sup>27</sup>

29. It is further argued by the United States that its panel request identified both the timing and nature of the measures at issue which, in the application since June 1995 by the customs authorities in the European Communities, consist of tariffs to LAN equipment higher than those provided for in Schedule LXXX.<sup>28</sup> The United States also submits that as of March 1997, both the European Communities and the United States agreed that Member State customs authorities were applying the higher tariff rates, under heading 85.17, to imports of LAN equipment. Accordingly, in the view of the United States, the European Communities has never had any basis to claim that it lacked sufficient information about the measures the United States sought to have modified at the time of the establishment of the panel. In applying the "adequate" or "sufficient" notice test of European Communities - Bananas, the United States submits that the European Communities had clear notice from the explicit terms used in the panel requests of the United States that the complaint concerned the application of higher tariffs for LAN equipment by customs authorities of Member States. Since the panel request identified the same measures which the European Communities acknowledged its customs officials were applying, the European Communities suffered, in the view of the United States, no prejudice, let alone prejudice sufficient to rise to the level of a violation of due process.

30. The United States submits that there is no basis for the assertion of the European Communities that the description of the United States of "all types of LAN equipment" and the allegedly inappropriate "curing" of the request for the establishment of a panel have led to a "serious violation of the European Communities' rights of defence". According to the United States, these arguments ignore the fact that the term, LAN equipment, is a recognized term of the trade and that, beginning as early as the pre-consultation stage of this dispute through the panel proceedings, the European Communities was made sufficiently aware of which products were the subject of the dispute. According to the United States, the argument of the European Communities also ignores the many contacts between officials of the European Communities and the United States prior to the submission of the panel request, in which the term, LAN equipment, was routinely used and understood. The United States disagrees with the European Communities regarding the need for parties to exhaustively detail every conceivable sub-grouping of more broader categories of products which are detailed in a request for the establishment of a panel. In the view of the United States, the appropriate standard to be applied to product coverage should be similar to that applied by the panel in European Communities - Bananas to the specificity of measures: whether the products are "sufficiently identified". According to the United States, applying the logic followed in European Communities - Bananas, such a test would be met if the complaining party identifies the general product grouping of the products concerned in terms of the ordinary meaning in a commercial context.

<sup>28</sup>We note that the United States also argued with regard to its two additional requests for the establishment of a panel (WT/DS67/3 and WT/DS68/2) that they also identified both the timing and nature of the measures at issue (appellee's submission of the United States, paras. 34 and 35).

31. The United States submits that the Panel was correct when it stated that the more detailed definition of LAN equipment, provided by the United States to the Panel in response to a question, was an "elucidation" of the product coverage already specified in the requests of the United States for the establishment of a panel. According to the United States, the present case is quite different from the situation in European Communities - Bananas and India - Patents with respect to the addition of a new claim. In the request for the establishment of a panel against the European Communities<sup>29</sup>, the United States first defined the parameters of the products at issue -- all LAN products -- and then provided examples of some types of LAN products. The United States submits that it need not have provided any such examples to have complied with Article 6.2 of the DSU because the term LAN products is a sufficiently precise term of the trade. Nor should the United States or any other WTO Member be required to exhaustively enumerate all product category sub-groups in its panel request. The United States also asserts that since its request for the establishment of a panel properly identified LAN equipment, the Panel was correct in distinguishing the present case from the panel decision in EEC - Quantitative Restrictions Against Hong Kong.

32. In the view of the United States, if the arguments of the European Communities on the specificity of product definition are accepted, there inevitably will be long, drawn-out procedural battles at the early stage of the panel process in every proceeding. The United States submits that according to the theory of the European Communities, a complaining party would be required to list each and every product in detail in its panel request.

2. "Legitimate Expectations" in the Interpretation of a Schedule

33. The United States submits that the attack of the European Communities on the Panel's reasoning places form over substance. In the view of the United States, the substance of the findings of the Panel is its fact-finding which supports the conclusion that the ordinary meaning of "automatic data-processing machines and units thereof" includes LAN equipment. The Panel found that the meaning of the text of the concession in heading 84.71 can include LAN equipment and that, as a matter of fact, Member State customs authorities treated LAN equipment as automatic data-processing machines ("ADP machines") during the Uruguay Round and that the European Communities had given the United States and other trading partners reason to believe that this treatment would be continued. It is further argued by the United States that during the panel proceeding, the European Communities did not produce or prove facts demonstrating that LAN equipment was intended to be included in the binding in heading 85.17 of Schedule LXXX.<sup>30</sup>

34. Thus, in the view of the United States, regardless of whether the Appellate Body accepts the Panel's reasoning and interpretation of "legitimate expectations", the findings of the Panel Report support its ultimate conclusion that the European Communities, by failing to accord to imports of LAN equipment treatment no less favourable than that provided for in headings 84.71 or 84.73 of Schedule LXXX<sup>31</sup>, has acted inconsistently with its obligations under Article II:1 of the GATT 1994. The United States argues that the Panel's reasoning was correct but that, even if the Appellate Body should reverse certain aspects of this reasoning, the Appellate Body should affirm the Panel's ultimate conclusion.

35. The United States submits that the Panel has properly interpreted the obligations of the European Communities under Schedule LXXX and Article II of the GATT 1994 in accordance with Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention. The text of the concession in heading 84.71 of Schedule LXXX provides that this concession applies to "automatic data processing machines and units thereof". According to the United States, the ordinary meaning of "automatic data processing machines and units thereof" includes computers and computer systems, as well as units of computers such as computer networking equipment, i.e., LAN equipment. The United States submits that the function of LAN equipment is not "line telephony or line telegraphy" but that of facilitation of shared processing and storage of data within a computer network or an extended computer system. The Panel found that the text of this concession can include LAN equipment and that to the extent the ordinary meaning of the concession is ambiguous, that ordinary meaning can be clarified by the practice of the importing Member. In the view of the United States, these findings are eminently reasonable and are consistent with prior GATT and WTO practice. They can and should be affirmed.

36. The United States asserts that an important factor in determining the "ordinary meaning" of a term used in a Schedule is how the negotiating Members treated the particular product at issue -- in this case, how the European Communities, the United States and interested third parties treated LAN equipment. According to the United States, while the Panel's analysis in paragraphs 8.23-8.28 labels such treatment as an element of "legitimate expectations", this label is not essential to the Panel's conclusion. The United States submits that regardless of the label, what is important is that the factual findings of the Panel, concerning the actual treatment of LAN equipment during the Uruguay Round, amount to a determination that the parties assumed and intended that the concession under heading 84.71 in Schedule LXXX would cover LAN equipment.

37. The United States argues that "factual indicia" of "legitimate expectations" which the Panel actually considered can also be regarded as the factual context of the concessions in Schedule LXXX as facts indicating the object and purpose of the concessions in Schedule LXXX, or as a "supplementary means of interpretation" admissible under Article 32 of the Vienna Convention. According to the United States, whether the Panel's analysis was phrased as an interpretation of "legitimate expectations", or whether it was an interpretation of the intentions and understandings of the negotiating parties, the conclusion is the same. The United States submits that the important point here is that the intentions of the United States, as well as the third parties in this dispute, were a relevant factor for the Panel to consider in interpreting the ordinary meaning of the terms used in Schedule LXXX.

38. Responding to a question asked by the Appellate Body during the oral hearing, the United States asserted that the Harmonized System and its Explanatory Notes could be deemed as part of the "circumstances of the conclusion" of the WTO Agreement within the meaning of Article 32 of the Vienna Convention and, therefore, could be used as a "supplementary means of interpretation" of Schedule LXXX. However, the United States also submitted that the Explanatory Notes are not generally treated as binding because they contain certain contradictions and are occasionally outdated.

Thus, the United States considered that although the Explanatory Notes are relevant under Article 32 of the Vienna Convention, they should be treated with caution.

39. The United States submits that the European Communities argues that the text is the only permissible input for interpreting a Schedule. According to the United States, such a position leads to the conclusion that whenever a treaty interpreter cannot determine whether a given product falls within the exact product composition of a concession on the basis of the text of that concession, the importing Member can make this determination unilaterally. If this is the case, then the tariff obligations provided for under Articles II:1(a) and (b) of the GATT 1994, and the tariff concessions in the Schedules, would be reduced to inutility.

40. The United States further argues that the Panel properly considered the concept of "legitimate expectations" of WTO Members in analysing whether LAN equipment is included within the scope of the EC's concession in heading 84.71. The United States believes that the Panel properly relied on the concept of "legitimate expectations" and that the decision in India - Patents does not require the rejection of the Panel's use of "legitimate expectations" as a factor in its analysis of whether the European Communities is in violation of its obligations under Article II of the GATT 1994.

41. The issue, as the United States sees it, is really whether the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member are a relevant factor in determining the intentions of the negotiators and thus in determining the ordinary meaning of the terms used in the concession in heading 84.71 of Schedule LXXX. The United States submits that the Panel properly used the concept of "legitimate expectations" in determining and clarifying the intentions of the parties in this case. According to the United States, such an interpretation is supported by the text and context of Article II, as well as its object and purpose. In the view of the United States, the concept of "legitimate expectations" is entirely relevant in the context of any dispute concerning the application of actual tariff concessions. Contrary to the argument of the European Communities, the United States submits that the Panel's analysis has nothing to do with a "melding" of a basis for complaint under Articles III or XI of the GATT and a basis for a "non-violation nullification or impairment" complaint.

42. The United States argues that the argument of the European Communities confuses and distorts the Appellate Body's reasoning in India - Patents, and that it twists this reasoning into an instrument for undermining the enforcement of bargained-for tariff concessions. In the view of the United States, the conclusions argued by the European Communities are by no means ordained by the Appellate Body's findings and conclusions in India - Patents. The United States asserts that the European Communities has attempted to conflate the concept of "legitimate expectations", as used by the Panel, with the concept of "reasonable expectations" in the context of Article XXIII:1(b) of the GATT. The United States submits that these concepts are not the same thing. The phrases may exhibit accidental linguistic convergence, but are legally and historically distinct and deal with different situations. In the view of the United States, it is both possible and necessary to distinguish between the concepts employed in enforcing obligations under Articles III or XI of the GATT, the concepts involved in a "non-violation nullification or impairment complaint" and the concept of "legitimate expectations" employed by the Panel in the present dispute. According to the United States, all three concepts are intellectually and historically distinct and independent. They need not be distorted and conflated in the manner advocated by the European Communities.

43. The United States submits that as the Appellate Body pointed out in India - Patents, panels considering violation complaints concerning Articles III and XI of the GATT have developed the concept of protecting the expectations of contracting parties concerning the competitive relationship between their products and the products of other contracting parties. According to the United States, Article II of the GATT 1994 is different in nature from Article III. The obligations of Article II only apply to the extent that a Member has made tariff bindings in a Schedule. The United States asserts that Article II also has nothing to do with guaranteeing the equality of opportunity with regard to competitive conditions. The provisions of Article II permit and recognize the existence of tariffs and "other duties and charges" imposed at the border which imply an intentional competitive inequality between imports and like domestic products.

44. According to the United States, as the Appellate Body has noted in India - Patents, the non-violation provision of Article XXIII:1(b) was aimed at preventing contracting parties from using non-tariff barriers, or other policy measures, to negate the benefits of negotiated tariff concessions. Like Article II of the GATT 1994, the non-violation remedy under Article XXIII:1(b) recognizes the existence of tariff barriers at the border, as well as the terms, conditions or qualifications of tariff concessions, which create intentional competitive inequality between imports and like domestic products. Thus, the United States submits that Article II and the non-violation remedy are broadly alike in that they both protect bargained-for market access and the integrity of Schedules. However, Article II protects and enforces the tariff concession itself. According to the United States, tariff concessions safeguard the right to a particular tariff rate, and a Member's responsibility to charge a duty no higher than the level bound in its Schedule, on products covered by the tariff binding in question.

45. The United States submits that the Panel, in the present dispute, used "legitimate expectations" as an interpretative aid to determine what the concession in heading 84.71 means, as well as whether LAN equipment was meant to be within the product composition of heading 84.71. If it is further argued by the United States that, on the other hand, the concept of "actions that could not reasonably have been anticipated" or "reasonable expectations" has been used in non-violation cases to answer the question that Article XXIII:1(b) raises, namely what GATT-legal impediments to market access an importing Member may impose without taking away the value of the concession (as opposed to violating the obligation to maintain the concession itself). Therefore, in the view of the United States, "legitimate expectations" are relevant in the interpretation of obligations under Article II of the GATT 1994, and actions which "could not reasonably have been anticipated" are relevant in the application of the non-violation remedy under Article XXIII:1(b). However, these two concepts apply under different conditions and for different purposes. The United States argues that the concept of "legitimate expectations" is entirely relevant in the context of any dispute concerning the violation of tariff concessions; the Panel's analysis has nothing to do with a "melding" of a basis for complaint under Articles III or XI of the GATT and a basis for a "non-violation nullification or impairment" complaint.

46. It is further argued by the United States that the context of the Uruguay Round Schedules, as defined by Article 31(2) of the Vienna Convention, clearly includes the GATT 1994 and, in particular, Article II thereof. The United States submits that the text of Article II:5 of the GATT 1994 is, therefore, a relevant part of this context and the Panel properly interpreted the meaning of tariff obligations in the light of Article II:5. According to the United States, in the text of Article II:5 the "treatment provided for" is to be understood as the "treatment contemplated by a concession". The United States asserts that the term used in Article II:5 is "contemplated" and that such a provision does not require that treatment has been "discussed" or "expressly agreed". In the view of the United States, the ordinary meaning of "contemplate" in this context is "to expect"; the "treatment" in question must be the treatment by the importing Member which was contemplated at the time. Thus, the United States concludes that the "treatment" provided by a concession is the treatment legitimately expected by the trading partners of the Member making the concession. According to the United States, in the present case, that treatment is the treatment these products were known to be receiving in the European Communities, openly and legally, at the time the binding was negotiated.

47. The United States asserts that it properly invoked Article II:5 of the GATT 1994 and complied with all its procedural requirements. However, discussions under Article II:5 stopped short when, as the European Communities itself recognizes, the European Communities refused to agree that the treatment contemplated was that claimed by the United States. According to the United States, it was this refusal that prevented any negotiations under Article II:5 with regard to a compensatory adjustment. Therefore, in the view of the United States, having frustrated the procedures of Article II:5, the European Communities may not claim them as a defence to its own violation of Article II:1.

48. The United States disagrees with the alternative argument of the European Communities that the Panel erred in relying on particular types of evidence, namely Binding Tariff Information ("BTIs") and actual trade data, as a factual basis for its findings of fact concerning actual tariff treatment during the Uruguay Round and the "legitimate expectations" based on that treatment. According to the United States, the European Communities distorts the Panel Report by arguing that the Panel found that the tariff treatment bound in Schedules must correspond to the actual tariff treatment, or else there is a breach of the "legitimate expectations" of the exporting Member and therefore a violation of Article II:1 of the GATT 1994. The United States submits that the substance of the Panel's findings amounted to an interpretation of the ordinary meaning of the concession in heading 84.71, on the basis of its text, context, object and purpose. Thus, in the view of the United States, the Panel has, in essence, interpreted the intentions of the parties and has determined what, in fact, the actual tariff treatment of LAN equipment was as a factor in evaluating those intentions.

49. The United States asserts that the European Communities is arguing that, when interpreting a Schedule, the only evidence that may be taken into account is the text of the Schedule itself. The United States submits that this "text only" approach not only contradicts the guidance of the Vienna Convention and the Appellate Body, with regard to the interpretation of treaties, but also leads to establishing the right of an importing Member to arbitrarily change the duty treatment of products whenever the text of the relevant concession is ambiguous.

50. According to the United States, the Panel did not use BTIs in order to determine how LAN equipment should be classified. Rather, it used BTIs as a form of factual evidence concerning the actual tariff treatment of certain products during a particular historical period. Therefore, the United States submits that the Panel properly relied on the evidence before it, including BTIs, affidavits by exporters and actual trade data, as a basis for its findings of fact concerning the actual tariff treatment of LAN equipment during the Uruguay Round and the legitimate expectations based on that treatment. In the view of the United States, the Panel's fact-finding was within the scope of its discretion under Article 11 of the DSU and, because these findings are factual, they do not fall within the permissible scope of an appeal under Article 17.6 of the DSU.

3. Clarification of the Scope of Tariff Concessions

51. According to the United States, when the Panel rejected the assertion of the European Communities that the exporting Member bears the burden of clarifying the product composition of concessions during tariff negotiations, the Panel did not, as the European Communities suggests, create a new rule on the burden of proof in dispute settlement proceedings. Rather, the Panel correctly followed the standard laid down by the Appellate Body in United States - Shirts and Blouses. The United States submits that the Panel examined first, whether the United States had presented factual information sufficient to raise the presumption that its claim concerning the actual treatment of LAN equipment during the Uruguay Round was true and, second, whether the European Communities had presented evidence sufficient to rebut that presumption once raised. In the view of the United States, the Panel correctly found that the United States had raised such a presumption as a matter of fact and that the European Communities had failed to rebut that presumption.

52. Regarding the argument of the European Communities that the Panel Report dedicates three pages to the totally irrelevant issue of the burden of clarification, the United States submits that it finds this claim curious because it is in this section of the Panel Report<sup>32</sup> that the Panel addressed the purported defence of the European Communities that the United States should have clarified, during the negotiations, where LAN equipment would be classified. If the Panel had accepted this defence from the European Communities, the Panel would have imposed, according to the United States, a new rule limiting the scope of proof that could be brought forward by an exporting Member, in this situation, by restricting the exporting Member to textual arguments concerning the meaning of the terms in Schedule LXXX. Thus, the United States argues that if any change in the burden of proof is suggested, that suggestion comes from the European Communities and not the Panel or the United States.

53. The United States submits that the European Communities is wrong in asserting that the Panel's findings permitting exporting Members to present evidence of tariff treatment of individual shipments, practices of current classification and other such evidence, would permit the exporting Member to shift the burden of proof to the responding Member without any need to submit evidence related to the words of the agreement. The United States asserts that it submitted to the Panel evidence concerning the meaning of the term ADP machines in Schedule LXXX and the various products falling within that definition based on treatment by the WCO, the European Communities and industry. According to the United States, it never argued to the Panel -- and does not assert now -- that it could sustain its burden of proof in this case without setting out the meaning of the terms of the agreement. The United States sustained its burden of demonstrating that the term ADP machines included all types of LAN equipment.

C. Third Participant - Japan

54. Japan submits that the Panel's legal reasoning regarding "legitimate expectations" and the requirement of clarification was correct and, therefore, requests that the European Communities respect the conclusion of the Panel and bring its tariff treatment of LAN equipment into conformity with its obligations under the GATT 1994.

55. Japan asserts that "[g]enerally, ... the importing Member is obliged to identify products and relevant duties in its tariff schedules ... if the importing Member requests to limit or determine a scope of the tariff concession and relevant duties for the products, which are not classified under the heading of the Harmonized System Committee (HSC) of the CCC and therefore classified differently in several countries".<sup>33</sup> It is further argued by Japan that, "[i]n particular, the classification of the LAN equipment among the Members of the EC was not identical before the Uruguay Round. In other words, the common classification of the LAN equipment within the Members of the EC had not been established before the Uruguay Round, and the responsibility, the EC was required to discharge in this context, was inevitable".<sup>34</sup>

56. Japan submits that it agrees with the Panel that a tariff commitment is an instrument in the hands of an importing Member, in the light of its function to protect its own industry. Therefore, in the view of Japan, "[i]f the importing Member wishes to prove the expectations of the exporting Member, that a certain practice of its tariff classification will continue, are not legitimate, the importing Member as the effective bearer of its rights and responsibilities, will be in a position to correctly identify products and relevant duties in its tariff schedules, including such limitations or modifications as it intends to apply. Otherwise, no proof will be required to deny the legitimate expectations of the exporting Member that the tariff classification will continue and the predictability of protection through the imposition of tariffs would not be maintained".<sup>35</sup>

III. Issues Raised in this Appeal

57. The appellant, the European Communities, raises the following issues in this appeal:
- (a) Whether the measures in dispute, and the products affected by such measures, were identified with sufficient specificity by the United States in its request for the establishment of a panel under Article 6.2 of the DSU;
  - (b) Whether the Panel erred in interpreting Schedule LXXX, in particular, by reading Schedule LXXX in the light of the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member, and by considering that Article II:5 of the GATT 1994 confirms the interpretative value of "legitimate expectations"; and
  - (c) Whether the Panel erred in putting the onus of clarifying the scope of a tariff concession during a multilateral tariff negotiation conducted under the auspices of the GATT/WTO, solely on the importing Member.

IV. Request for the Establishment of a Panel

58. The first issue that we have to address is whether the measures in dispute, and the products affected by such measures, were identified with sufficient specificity by the United States in its request for the establishment of a panel under Article 6.2 of the DSU.

59. Article 6.2 of the DSU provides, in part, that the request for the establishment of a panel shall:

... identify the specific measures at issue and provide a brief summary of the legal basis of the complaint sufficient to present the problem clearly. ...

60. The Panel considered that:

... the substance of the present case is the actual tariff treatment by customs authorities in the European Communities and the evaluation of that treatment in the light of the tariff commitments in Schedule LXXX.<sup>36</sup>

The Panel found that:

Viewed from this perspective, ... the United States has sufficiently identified the measures subject to the dispute, which concerns tariff treatment of LAN equipment and multimedia PCs by customs authorities in the European Communities.<sup>37</sup>

61. The Panel found that the definitions given by the United States of the terms, LAN equipment and PCs with multimedia capability, are "sufficiently specific for the purposes of our consideration of this dispute".<sup>38</sup>

62. The European Communities appeals these findings and submits that:

The Panel erred where it found that the measures under dispute and the products affected by such measures were identified sufficiently specifically by the United States to include measures other than Commission Regulation (EC) No. 1165/95 as far as it concerns Local Area Network (LAN) adapter cards.<sup>39</sup>

63. According to the European Communities, the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel:

... identifies one specific measure, namely Commission Regulation (EC) No. 1165/95 ... [relating to] LAN adapter cards. The other alleged measures are only vaguely described, without clearly identifying the type of measure, the responsible authority, the date of issue and the reference.<sup>40</sup>

64. We note that the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel reads in relevant part:

Since June 1995, customs authorities in the European Communities, including but not limited to those in the United Kingdom and Ireland, have been applying tariffs to imports of all types of LAN equipment - including hubs, in-line repeaters, converters, concentrators, bridges and routers - in excess of those provided for in the EC Schedules. Those products were previously dutiable as automatic data-processing equipment under category 8471, but, as a result of the customs authorities' action, are now subject to the higher tariff rates applicable to category 8517, "telecommunications apparatus". In addition, since 1995, customs authorities in the European Communities, particularly those in the United Kingdom, have increased tariffs on imports of certain personal computers ("PCs") from 3.5 per cent to 14 per cent, which is above the rate provided for in the EC Schedules. These increases have resulted from the reclassification of PCs with multimedia capability from category 8471 to other categories with higher duty rates.<sup>41</sup>

65. We consider that "measures" within the meaning of Article 6.2 of the DSU are not only measures of general application, i.e., normative rules, but also can be the application of tariffs by customs authorities.<sup>42</sup> Since the request for the establishment of a panel explicitly refers to the application of tariffs on LAN equipment and PCs with multimedia capability by customs authorities in the European Communities, we agree with the Panel that the measures in dispute were properly identified in accordance with the requirements of Article 6.2 of the DSU.

66. With respect to the products affected by such measures, we note that the European Communities and the United States disagree on the scope of the terms, LAN equipment and PCs with multimedia capability. Regarding LAN equipment, the disagreement concerns, in particular, whether multiplexers and modems are covered by this term.

67. We note that Article 6.2 of the DSU does not explicitly require that the products to which the "specific measures at issue" apply be identified. However, with respect to certain WTO obligations, in order to identify "the specific measures at issue", it may also be necessary to identify the products subject to the measures in dispute.

<sup>42</sup>In an answer to a question at the oral hearing, the European Communities expressly accepted that "the application of a tariff in an individual case on a consignment is a measure" within the meaning of Article 6.2 of the DSU.

68. LAN equipment and PCs with multimedia capacity are both generic terms. Whether these terms are sufficiently precise to "identify the specific measure at issue" under Article 6.2 of the DSU depends, in our view, upon whether they satisfy the purposes of the requirements of that provision.

69. In European Communities - Bananas, we stated that:

It is important that a panel request be sufficiently precise for two reasons: first, it often forms the basis for the terms of reference of the panel pursuant to Article 7 of the DSU; and, second, it informs the defending party and the third parties of the legal basis of the complaint.<sup>43</sup>

70. The European Communities argues that the lack of precision of the term, LAN equipment, resulted in a violation of its right to due process which is implicit in the DSU. We note, however, that the European Communities does not contest that the term, LAN equipment, is a commercial term which is readily understandable in the trade. The disagreement between the European Communities and the United States concerns its exact definition and its precise product coverage.<sup>44</sup> We also note that the term, LAN equipment, was used in the consultations between the European Communities and the United States prior to the submission of the request for the establishment of a panel<sup>45</sup> and, in particular, in an "Information Fiche" provided by the European Communities to the United States during informal consultations in Geneva in March 1997.<sup>46</sup> We do not see how the alleged lack of precision of the terms, LAN equipment and PCs with multimedia capability, in the request for the establishment of a panel affected the rights of defence of the European Communities in the course of the panel proceedings. As the ability of the European Communities to defend itself was not prejudiced by a lack of knowing the measures at issue, we do not believe that the fundamental rule of due process was violated by the Panel.

71. The United States has stressed that "if the EC arguments on specificity of product definition are accepted, there will inevitably be long, drawn-out procedural battles at the early stage of the panel process in every proceeding. The parties will contest every product definition, and the defending party in each case will seek to exclude all products that the complaining parties may have identified by broader grouping, but not spelled out in 'sufficient' detail".<sup>47</sup> We share this concern.

72. We agree with the Panel that the present case should be distinguished from EEC - Quantitative Restrictions Against Hong Kong. The request of the United States for the establishment of a panel refers to "all types of LAN equipment". Individual types of LAN equipment were only mentioned as examples. Therefore, unlike the panel in EEC - Quantitative Restrictions Against Hong Kong, we are not confronted with a situation in which an additional product item was added in the course of the panel proceedings.<sup>48</sup> This is not a case in which an attempt was made to "cure" a faulty panel request by a complaining party.<sup>49</sup>

73. In conclusion, we agree with the Panel that the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel fulfilled the requirements of Article 6.2 of the DSU.

V. "Legitimate Expectations" in the Interpretation of a Schedule

74. The European Communities also submits that the Panel erred in interpreting Schedule LXXX, in particular, by:

- (a) reading Schedule LXXX in the light of the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member; and

The Panel considered that just as the terms of reference must be agreed between the parties prior to the commencement of the Panel's examination, similarly the product coverage must be clearly understood and agreed between the parties to the dispute.

We have already noted that Article 6.2 of the DSU does not require that the products at issue be specified in a request for the establishment of a panel. Also, Article 7 of the DSU provides that panels shall have standard terms of reference, unless the parties to the dispute agree otherwise within 20 days from the establishment of the panel.

<sup>49</sup>We recall that in our report in European Communities - Bananas, para. 143, we found that:

If a claim is not specified in the request for the establishment of a panel, then a faulty request cannot be subsequently 'cured' by a complaining party's argumentation in its first written submission to the panel or in any other submission or statement made later in the panel proceeding.

- (b) considering that Article II:5 of the GATT 1994 confirms the interpretative value of "legitimate expectations".

Subordinately, the European Communities submits that the Panel erred in considering that the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member with regard to the interpretation of tariff concessions should be based on the classification practices for individual importers and individual consignments, or on the subjective perception of a number of exporting companies of that exporting Member.

75. Schedule LXXX provides tariff concessions for ADP machines under headings 84.71 and 84.73 and for telecommunications equipment under heading 85.17. The customs duties set forth in Schedule LXXX on telecommunications equipment are generally higher than those on ADP machines.<sup>50</sup> We note that Schedule LXXX does not contain any explicit reference to "LAN equipment" and that the European Communities currently treats LAN equipment as telecommunications equipment. The United States, however, considers that the EC tariff concessions on ADP machines, and not its tariff concessions on telecommunications equipment, apply to LAN equipment. The United States claimed before the Panel, therefore, that the European Communities accords to imports of LAN equipment treatment less favourable than that provided for in its Schedule, and thus has acted inconsistently with Article II:1 of the GATT 1994. The United States argued that the treatment provided for by a concession is the treatment reasonably expected by the trading partners of the Member which made the concession.<sup>51</sup> On the basis of the negotiating history of the Uruguay Round tariff negotiations and the actual tariff treatment accorded to LAN equipment by customs authorities in the European Communities during these negotiations, the United States argued that it reasonably expected the European Communities to treat LAN equipment as ADP machines, not as telecommunications equipment.

76. The Panel found that:

... for the purposes of Article II:1, it is impossible to determine whether LAN equipment should be regarded as an ADP machine purely on the basis of the ordinary meaning of the terms used in Schedule LXXX taken in isolation. However, as noted above, the meaning of the term "ADP machines" in this context may be determined in light of the legitimate expectations of an exporting Member.<sup>52</sup>

---

77. In support of this finding, the Panel explained that:

The meaning of a particular expression in a tariff schedule cannot be determined in isolation from its context. It has to be interpreted in the context of Article II of GATT 1994 ... It should be noted in this regard that the protection of legitimate expectations in respect of tariff treatment of a bound item is one of the most important functions of Article II.<sup>53</sup>

The Panel justified this latter statement by relying on the panel report in European Economic Community - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins<sup>54</sup> ("EEC - Oilseeds"), and stated that:

The fact that the Oilseeds panel report concerns a non-violation complaint does not affect the validity of this reasoning in cases where an actual violation of tariff commitments is alleged. If anything, such a direct violation would involve a situation where expectations concerning tariff concessions were even more firmly grounded.<sup>55</sup>

78. The Panel also relied on Article II:5 of the GATT 1994, and stated that:

Although Article II:5 is a provision for the special bilateral procedure regarding tariff classification, not directly at issue in this case, the existence of this provision confirms that legitimate expectations are a vital element in the interpretation of Article II and tariff schedules.<sup>56</sup>

79. Finally, the Panel observed that its proposition that the terms of a Member's Schedule may be determined in the light of the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member:

... is also supported by the object and purpose of the WTO Agreement and those of GATT 1994. The security and predictability of "the reciprocal and mutually advantageous arrangements directed to the substantial reduction of tariffs and other barriers to trade" (expression common in the preambles to the two agreements) cannot be maintained without protection of such legitimate expectations. This is consistent with the principle of good faith interpretation under Article 31 of the Vienna Convention.<sup>57</sup>

80. We disagree with the Panel's conclusion that the meaning of a tariff concession in a Member's Schedule may be determined in the light of the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member. First, we fail to see the relevance of the EEC - Oilseeds panel report with respect to the interpretation of a Member's Schedule in the context of a violation complaint made under Article XXIII:1(a) of the GATT 1994. The EEC - Oilseeds panel report dealt with a non-violation complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) of the GATT 1994, and is not legally relevant to the case before us. Article XXIII:1 of the GATT 1994 provides for three legally-distinct causes of action on which a Member may base a complaint; it distinguishes between so-called violation complaints, non-violation complaints and situation complaints under paragraphs (a), (b) and (c). The concept of "reasonable expectations", which the Panel refers to as "legitimate expectations", is a concept that was developed in the context of non-violation complaints.<sup>58</sup> As we stated in India - Patents, for the Panel to use this concept in the context of a violation complaint "melds the legally-distinct bases for 'violation' and 'non-violation' complaints under Article XXIII of the GATT 1994 into one uniform cause of action"<sup>59</sup>, and is not in accordance with established GATT practice.

81. Second, we reject the Panel's view that Article II:5 of the GATT 1994 confirms that "legitimate expectations are a vital element in the interpretation" of Article II:1 of the GATT 1994 and of Members' Schedules.<sup>60</sup> It is clear from the wording of Article II:5 that it does not support the Panel's view. This paragraph recognizes the possibility that the treatment contemplated in a concession, provided for in a Member's Schedule, on a particular product, may differ from the treatment accorded to that product and provides for a compensatory mechanism to rebalance the concessions between the two Members concerned in such a situation. However, nothing in Article II:5 suggests that the expectations of only the exporting Member can be the basis for interpreting a concession in a Member's Schedule for the purposes of determining whether that Member has acted consistently with its obligations under Article II:1. In discussing Article II:5, the Panel overlooked the second sentence of that provision, which clarifies that the "contemplated treatment" referred to in that provision is the treatment contemplated by both Members.

82. Third, we agree with the Panel that the security and predictability of "the reciprocal and mutually advantageous arrangements directed to the substantial reduction of tariffs and other barriers to trade" is an object and purpose of the WTO Agreement, generally, as well as of the GATT 1994.<sup>61</sup> However, we disagree with the Panel that the maintenance of the security and predictability of tariff concessions allows the interpretation of a concession in the light of the "legitimate expectations" of exporting Members, i.e., their subjective views as to what the agreement reached during tariff negotiations was. The security and predictability of tariff concessions would be seriously undermined if the concessions in Members' Schedules were to be interpreted on the basis of the subjective views of certain exporting Members alone. Article II:1 of the GATT 1994 ensures the maintenance of the security and predictability of tariff concessions by requiring that Members not accord treatment less favourable to the commerce of other Members than that provided for in their Schedules.

83. Furthermore, we do not agree with the Panel that interpreting the meaning of a concession in a Member's Schedule in the light of the "legitimate expectations" of exporting Members is consistent with the principle of good faith interpretation under Article 31 of the Vienna Convention. Recently, in India - Patents, the panel stated that good faith interpretation under Article 31 required "the protection of legitimate expectations".<sup>62</sup> We found that the panel had misapplied Article 31 of the Vienna Convention and stated that:

The duty of a treaty interpreter is to examine the words of the treaty to determine the intentions of the parties. This should be done in accordance with the principles of treaty interpretation set out in Article 31 of the Vienna Convention. But these principles of interpretation neither require nor condone the imputation into a treaty of words that are not there or the importation into a treaty of concepts that were not intended.<sup>63</sup>

84. The purpose of treaty interpretation under Article 31 of the Vienna Convention is to ascertain the common intentions of the parties. These common intentions cannot be ascertained on the basis of the subjective and unilaterally determined "expectations" of one of the parties to a treaty. Tariff concessions provided for in a Member's Schedule -- the interpretation of which is at issue here -- are reciprocal and result from a mutually-advantageous negotiation between importing and exporting Members. A Schedule is made an integral part of the GATT 1994 by Article II:7 of the GATT 1994. Therefore, the concessions provided for in that Schedule are part of the terms of the treaty. As such, the only rules which may be applied in interpreting the meaning of a concession are the general rules of treaty interpretation set out in the Vienna Convention.

85. Pursuant to Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention, the meaning of a term of a treaty is to be determined in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to this term in its context and in the light of the object and purpose of the treaty. Article 31(2) of the Vienna Convention stipulates that:

The context, for the purpose of the interpretation of a treaty shall comprise, in addition to the text, including its preamble and annexes:

- (a) any agreement relating to the treaty which was made between all the parties in connexion with the conclusion of the treaty;
- (b) any instrument which was made by one or more parties in connexion with the conclusion of the treaty and accepted by the other parties as an instrument related to the treaty.

Furthermore, Article 31(3) provides that:

There shall be taken into account together with the context:

- (a) any subsequent agreement between the parties regarding the interpretation of the treaty or the application of its provisions;
- (b) any subsequent practice in the application of the treaty which establishes the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation;
- (c) any relevant rules of international law applicable in the relations between the parties.

Finally, Article 31(4) of the Vienna Convention stipulates that:

A special meaning shall be given to a term if it is established that the parties so intended.

86. The application of these rules in Article 31 of the Vienna Convention will usually allow a treaty interpreter to establish the meaning of a term.<sup>64</sup> However, if after applying Article 31 the meaning of the term remains ambiguous or obscure, or leads to a result which is manifestly absurd or unreasonable, Article 32 allows a treaty interpreter to have recourse to:

... supplementary means of interpretation, including the preparatory work of the treaty and the circumstances of its conclusion.

With regard to "the circumstances of [the] conclusion" of a treaty, this permits, in appropriate cases, the examination of the historical background against which the treaty was negotiated.<sup>65</sup>

87. In paragraphs 8.20 and 8.21 of the Panel Report, the Panel quoted Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention and explicitly recognized that these fundamental rules of treaty interpretation applied "in determining whether the tariff treatment of LAN equipment ... is in conformity with the tariff commitments contained in Schedule LXXX".<sup>66</sup> As we have already noted above, the Panel, after a textual analysis<sup>67</sup>, came to the conclusion that:

... for the purposes of Article II:1, it is impossible to determine whether LAN equipment should be regarded as an ADP machine purely on the basis of the ordinary meaning of the terms used in Schedule LXXX taken in isolation.<sup>68</sup>

Subsequently, the Panel abandoned its effort to interpret the terms of Schedule LXXX in accordance with Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention.<sup>69</sup> In doing this, the Panel erred.

88. As already discussed above, the Panel referred to the context of Schedule LXXX<sup>70</sup> as well as to the object and purpose of the WTO Agreement and the GATT 1994, of which Schedule LXXX is an integral part.<sup>71</sup> However, it did so to support its proposition that the terms of a Schedule may be interpreted in the light of the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member. The Panel failed to examine the context of Schedule LXXX and the object and purpose of the WTO Agreement and the GATT 1994 in accordance with the rules of treaty interpretation set out in the Vienna Convention.

89. We are puzzled by the fact that the Panel, in its effort to interpret the terms of Schedule LXXX, did not consider the Harmonized System and its Explanatory Notes. We note that during the Uruguay Round negotiations, both the European Communities and the United States were parties to the Harmonized System. Furthermore, it appears to be undisputed that the Uruguay Round tariff negotiations were held on the basis of the Harmonized System's nomenclature and that requests for, and offers of, concessions were normally made in terms of this nomenclature. Neither the European Communities nor the United States argued before the Panel<sup>72</sup> that the Harmonized System and its Explanatory Notes were relevant in the interpretation of the terms of Schedule LXXX. We believe, however, that a proper interpretation of Schedule LXXX should have included an examination of the Harmonized System and its Explanatory Notes.

90. A proper interpretation also would have included an examination of the existence and relevance of subsequent practice. We note that the United States referred, before the Panel, to the decisions taken by the Harmonized System Committee of the WCO in April 1997 on the classification of certain LAN equipment as ADP machines.<sup>73</sup> Singapore, a third party in the panel proceedings, also referred to these decisions.<sup>74</sup> The European Communities observed that it had introduced reservations with regard to these decisions and that, even if they were to become final as they stood, they would not affect the outcome of the present dispute for two reasons: first, because these decisions could not confirm that LAN equipment was classified as ADP machines in 1993 and 1994; and, second, because this dispute "was about duty treatment and not about product classification".<sup>75</sup> We note that the United States agrees with the European Communities that this dispute is not a dispute on the correct classification of LAN equipment, but a dispute on whether the tariff treatment accorded to LAN equipment was less favourable than that provided for in Schedule LXXX.<sup>76</sup> However, we consider that in interpreting the tariff concessions in Schedule LXXX, decisions of the WCO may be relevant; and, therefore, they should have been examined by the Panel.

91. We note that the European Communities stated that the question whether LAN equipment was bound as ADP machines, under headings 84.71 and 84.73, or as telecommunications equipment,

<sup>72</sup>We recall, however, that in reply to our questions at the oral hearing, both the European Communities and the United States accepted the relevance of the Harmonized System and its Explanatory Notes in interpreting the tariff concessions of Schedule LXXX. See paras. 13 and 38 of this Report.

<sup>74</sup>As noted in para. 6.34 of the Panel Report, Singapore pointed out, before the Panel, that:

... the WCO's HS Committee had recently decided that LAN equipment was properly classifiable in heading 84.71 of the HS. The HS Committee had specifically declined to adopt the position advanced that heading 85.17 was the appropriate category ... The EC had suggested that the HS Committee decision was intended solely to establish the appropriate HS classification for future imports. It ignored that the language interpreted by the HS Committee was the same language appearing in the EC's HS nomenclature and in the EC's concession schedule at the time of the negotiations and afterwards.

under heading 85.17, was not addressed during the Uruguay Round tariff negotiations with the United States.<sup>77</sup> We also note that the United States asserted that:

In many, perhaps most, cases, the detailed product composition of tariff commitments was never discussed in detail during the tariff negotiations of the Uruguay Round ...<sup>78</sup> (emphasis added)

and that:

The US-EC negotiation on Chapter 84 provided an example of how two groups of busy negotiators dealing with billions of dollars of trade and hundreds of tariff lines relied on a continuation of the status quo.<sup>79</sup> (emphasis added)

This may well be correct and, in any case, seems central to the position of the United States. Therefore, we are surprised that the Panel did not examine whether, during the Tokyo Round tariff negotiations, the European Communities bound LAN equipment as ADP machines or as telecommunications equipment.<sup>80</sup>

92. Albeit, with the mistaken aim of establishing whether the United States "was entitled to legitimate expectations"<sup>81</sup> regarding the tariff treatment of LAN equipment by the European Communities, the Panel examined, in paragraphs 8.35 to 8.44 of the Panel Report, the classification practice regarding LAN equipment in the European Communities during the Uruguay Round tariff negotiations. The Panel did this on the basis of certain BTIs and other decisions relating to the customs classification of LAN equipment, issued by customs authorities in the European Communities during the Uruguay Round.<sup>82</sup> In the light of our observations on "the circumstances of [the] conclusion" of a treaty as a supplementary means of interpretation under Article 32 of the Vienna Convention<sup>83</sup>, we consider that the classification practice in the European Communities during the Uruguay Round is part of "the circumstances of [the] conclusion" of the WTO Agreement and may be used as a supplementary means of interpretation within the meaning of Article 32 of the Vienna Convention. However, two important observations must be made: first, the Panel did not examine the

<sup>80</sup>We note that in paragraph 8 of its third participant's submission, Japan stated that: "[i]n particular, the classification of the LAN equipment among the Members of the EC was not identical before the Uruguay Round".

<sup>82</sup>The lists of the BTIs and classification decisions in the form of a letter, submitted by the parties and considered by the Panel, were attached to the Panel Report as Annex 4 and Annex 6 thereof.

classification practice in the European Communities during the Uruguay Round negotiations as a supplementary means of interpretation within the meaning of Article 32 of the Vienna Convention<sup>84</sup>; and, second, the value of the classification practice as a supplementary means of interpretation is subject to certain qualifications discussed below.

93. We note that the Panel examined the classification practice of only the European Communities<sup>85</sup>, and found that the classification of LAN equipment by the United States during the Uruguay Round tariff negotiations was not relevant.<sup>86</sup> The purpose of treaty interpretation is to establish the common intention of the parties to the treaty. To establish this intention, the prior practice of only one of the parties may be relevant, but it is clearly of more limited value than the practice of all parties. In the specific case of the interpretation of a tariff concession in a Schedule, the classification practice of the importing Member, in fact, may be of great importance. However, the Panel was mistaken in finding that the classification practice of the United States was not relevant.

94. In this context, we also note that while the Panel examined the classification practice during the Uruguay Round negotiations, it did not consider the EC legislation on customs classification of goods that was applicable at that time. In particular, it did not consider the "General Rules for the Interpretation of the Combined Nomenclature" as set out in Council Regulation 2658/87 on the Common Customs Tariff.<sup>87</sup> If the classification practice of the importing Member at the time of the tariff negotiations is relevant in interpreting tariff concessions in a Member's Schedule, surely that Member's legislation on customs classification at that time is also relevant.

95. Then there is the question of the consistency of prior practice. Consistent prior classification practice may often be significant. Inconsistent classification practice, however, cannot be relevant in interpreting the meaning of a tariff concession. We note that the Panel, on the basis of evidence relating to only five out of the then 12 Member States<sup>88</sup>, made the following factual findings with regard to the classification practice in the European Communities:

<sup>88</sup>With regard to the manner in which the Panel evaluated the evidence regarding classification practice during the Uruguay Round tariff negotiations, we note that in paragraph 8.37 of the Panel Report, the Panel accepted certain BTIs submitted by the United States as relevant evidence, while in footnote 152 of the Panel Report, it considered similar BTIs submitted by the European Communities to be irrelevant.

To rebut the presumption raised by the United States, the European Communities has produced documents which indicate that LAN equipment had been treated as telecommunication apparatus by other customs authorities in the European Communities.<sup>89</sup> (emphasis added)

... it would be reasonable to conclude at least that the practice [regarding classification of LAN equipment] was not uniform in France during the Uruguay Round.<sup>90</sup>

Germany appears to have consistently treated LAN equipment as telecommunication apparatus.<sup>91</sup>

... LAN equipment was generally treated as ADP machines in Ireland and the United Kingdom during the Uruguay Round.<sup>92</sup> (emphasis added)

As a matter of logic, these factual findings of the Panel lead to the conclusion that, during the Uruguay Round tariff negotiations, the practice regarding the classification of LAN equipment by customs authorities throughout the European Communities was not consistent.

96. We also note that in paragraphs 8.44 and 8.60 of the Panel Report, the Panel identified Ireland and the United Kingdom as the "largest" and "major" market for LAN equipment exported from the United States. On the basis of this assumption, the Panel gave special importance to the classification practice by customs authorities in these two Member States. However, the European Communities constitutes a customs union, and as such, once goods are imported into any Member State, they circulate freely within the territory of the entire customs union. The export market, therefore, is the European Communities, not an individual Member State.

97. For the reasons set out above, we conclude that the Panel erred in finding that the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member are relevant for the purposes of interpreting the terms of

<sup>92</sup>Panel Report, para. 8.41. In this paragraph, the Panel stated that the only direct counter-evidence against the claim of the United States that customs authorities in Ireland and the United Kingdom consistently classified LAN equipment as ADP machines during the Uruguay Round negotiations is a BTI issued by the UK customs authority to CISCO, classifying one type of LAN equipment (routers) as telecommunications apparatus. The Panel dismisses the value of this BTI as evidence on the basis that it "became effective only a week or so before the conclusion of the Uruguay Round negotiations [15 December 1993]". Similarly, in footnote 152 of the Panel Report, the Panel did not consider other BTIs issued by the UK customs authorities to be relevant because they became valid after the conclusion of the Uruguay Round negotiations. We note, however, that all of these BTIs became valid in December 1993 or February 1994, i.e., before the end of the verification process, to which all Schedules were submitted and which took place between 15 February 1994 and 25 March 1994 (MTN.TNC/W/131, 21 January 1994). Therefore, in our view, the Panel should have considered these BTIs.

Schedule LXXX and of determining whether the European Communities violated Article II:1 of the GATT 1994. We also conclude that the Panel misinterpreted Article II:5 of the GATT 1994.

98. On the basis of the erroneous legal reasoning developed and the selective evidence considered, the Panel was not justified in coming to the conclusion that the United States was entitled to "legitimate expectations" that LAN equipment would be accorded tariff treatment as ADP machines in the European Communities<sup>93</sup> and, therefore, that the European Communities acted inconsistently with the requirements of Article II:1 of the GATT 1994 by failing to accord imports of LAN equipment from the United States treatment no less favourable than that provided for in Schedule LXXX.<sup>94</sup>

99. In the light of our conclusion that the "legitimate expectations" of an exporting Member are not relevant in determining whether the European Communities violated Article II:1 of the GATT 1994, we see no reason to examine the subordinate claim of error of the European Communities relating to the evidence on which the "legitimate expectations" of exporting Members were based.

VI. Clarification of the Scope of Tariff Concessions

100. The last issue raised by the European Communities in this appeal is whether the Panel erred in placing the onus of clarifying the scope of a tariff concession during a multilateral tariff negotiation, held under the auspices of the GATT/WTO, solely on the importing Member.

101. In paragraph 8.60 of the Panel Report, the Panel concluded that:

We find that the United States was entitled to legitimate expectations that LAN equipment would continue to be accorded tariff treatment as ADP machines in the European Communities, based on the actual tariff treatment during the Uruguay Round, particularly in Ireland and the United Kingdom ... We further find that the United States was not required to clarify the scope of the European Communities' tariff concessions on LAN equipment ... (emphasis added)

Prior to this conclusion, the Panel stated the following:

... we find that the European Communities cannot place the burden of clarification on the United States in cases where it has created, through its own practice, the expectations regarding the continuation of the actual tariff treatment prevailing at the time of the tariff negotiations. It would not be reasonable to expect the US Government to seek clarification when it had not heard any complaints from its exporters, who were apparently satisfied with the current tariff treatment of LAN equipment in their major export market -- Ireland and the United Kingdom.<sup>95</sup>

102. The European Communities appeals these findings, and argues that:

... the Panel erred where it considered that, in any case, the onus of clarifying the scope of a tariff concession during a multilateral tariff negotiation ... shall necessarily be put on the side of the importing Member. By doing so, the Panel has created and applied a new rule on the burden of proof in the dispute settlement procedure which is outside its terms of reference and is beyond the powers of a panel.<sup>96</sup>

103. We do not agree that the Panel has created and applied a new rule on the burden of proof. The rules on the burden of proof are those which we clarified in United States - Shirts and Blouses.<sup>97</sup>

104. The Panel's findings in paragraphs 8.55 and 8.60 on the "requirement of clarification" are linked to the Panel's reliance on "legitimate expectations" as a means of interpretation of the tariff concessions in Schedule LXXX. They serve to complete and buttress the Panel's conclusion that "the United States was entitled to legitimate expectations that LAN equipment would continue to be accorded tariff treatment as ADP machines in the European Communities".<sup>98</sup>

105. We note that the Panel's findings in paragraphs 8.55 and 8.60 on the "requirement of clarification" were, in fact, the Panel's response to the question whether:

... the exporting Member has any inherent obligation to seek clarification when it has been otherwise given a basis to expect that actual tariff treatment by the importing Member will be maintained.<sup>99</sup>

106. We also note the Panel's references<sup>100</sup> to the panel report in Panel on Newsprint and the report by the Group of Experts in Greek Increase in Bound Duty.<sup>101</sup> In both of these reports, the conclusions on the obligations of the importing contracting party under Article II:1 of the GATT 1994 were reached on the basis of the ordinary meaning of the wording of the respective Schedules. These reports also assume that the tariff concessions made by the importing contracting party would have had to be limited by "conditions or qualifications" if they were to be interpreted restrictively. That the Panel reads these two reports in this way is evident from the Panel's concluding remark that "these cases ... confirm that the onus of clarifying tariff commitment is generally placed on the importing Member" (emphasis added).<sup>102</sup>

107. However, the case before us raises a different problem. The question here is whether the European Communities has committed itself to treat LAN equipment as ADP machines under headings 84.71 or 84.73, rather than as telecommunications equipment under heading 85.17 of Schedule LXXX. We do not believe that the "requirement of clarification", as discussed by the Panel, is relevant to this question.

<sup>101</sup>L/580, 9 November 1956. We note that while the panel report in Panel on Newsprint was adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the report by the Group of Experts in Greek Increase in Bound Duty was not.

108. The Panel also based its conclusions on the "requirement of clarification" on a certain perception of the nature of tariff commitments. The Panel stated:

... that a tariff commitment is an instrument in the hands of an importing Member which inherently serves the importing Member's "protection needs and its requirements for the purposes of tariff and trade negotiations". ... It is for this reason that it behooves the importing party, as the effective bearer of its rights and responsibilities, to correctly identify products and relevant duties in its tariff schedules, including such limitations or modifications as it intends to apply.<sup>103</sup>

109. We do not share this perception of the nature of tariff commitments. Tariff negotiations are a process of reciprocal demands and concessions, of "give and take". It is only normal that importing Members define their offers (and their ensuing obligations) in terms which suit their needs. On the other hand, exporting Members have to ensure that their corresponding rights are described in such a manner in the Schedules of importing Members that their export interests, as agreed in the negotiations, are guaranteed. There was a special arrangement made for this in the Uruguay Round. For this purpose, a process of verification of tariff schedules took place from 15 February through 25 March 1994, which allowed Uruguay Round participants to check and control, through consultations with their negotiating partners, the scope and definition of tariff concessions.<sup>104</sup> Indeed, the fact that Members' Schedules are an integral part of the GATT 1994 indicates that, while each Schedule represents the tariff commitments made by one Member, they represent a common agreement among all Members.

110. For the reasons stated above, we conclude that the Panel erred in finding that "the United States was not required to clarify the scope of the European Communities' tariff concessions on LAN equipment".<sup>105</sup> We consider that any clarification of the scope of tariff concessions that may be required during the negotiations is a task for all interested parties.

VII. Conclusions

111. For the reasons set out in this Report, the Appellate Body:

- (a) upholds the finding of the Panel that the request of the United States for the establishment of a panel met the requirements of Article 6.2 of the DSU;
- (b) reverses the findings of the Panel that the United States was entitled to "legitimate expectations" that LAN equipment would be accorded tariff treatment as ADP machines in the European Communities and, therefore, that the European Communities acted inconsistently with the requirements of Article II:1 of the GATT 1994 by failing to accord imports of LAN equipment from the United States treatment no less favourable than that provided for in Schedule LXXX; and
- (c) reverses the ancillary finding of the Panel that the United States was not required to clarify the scope of the European Communities' tariff concessions on LAN equipment.

institution's decision. Through the duty to give reasons, the private party can force the institution to explain clearly on what grounds it has based its decision. A common objective of the umbrella-principle of good administration may be defined as promoting transparency, legal certainty and predictability within administrative procedures.

3.2.2.1.1 The Principle of Due Diligence

The principle of due diligence has been applied by Community courts in a wide range of situations and under varying forms. The name of the principle has also varied. The obligations incumbent on the institutions discussed here have been labelled as due diligence,<sup>13</sup> principle of care,<sup>14</sup> and principle of good,<sup>15</sup> proper,<sup>16</sup> or sound<sup>17</sup> administration. Its core can be described as a procedural tool for private parties to ensure that Community institutions handle the affairs of individuals with care, by giving individuals a right to influence the basis for the public authority's decisions both as to how the matter is handled and how the substantive aspects are assessed and weighed by the institutions. In two cases establishing the principle of due diligence in the early 1990:s, TU München and Nölle, the European Court of Justice held that the institutions have a duty to examine carefully and impartially all the relevant aspects of the individual cases<sup>18</sup> and to give special attention to aspects that speak for private parties.<sup>19</sup> The field of application of the principle of due diligence can thus be divided into two types of situations. Firstly, from the demand to examine carefully and impartially all the relevant aspects, follows a duty for the institutions to handle matters diligently and to carefully follow any procedures laid down in secondary legislation or as general principles. Secondly, to give special attention to aspects that speak for private parties includes a duty to use the principle of due diligence as a counterweight to the discretionary powers of the institutions in the decision-making process itself.

When applied in the first manner, the principle of due diligence functions as a standard for the good behaviour of institutions. In the Fresh Marine Company-case, the Commission received a report from a Norwegian salmon company in an anti-dumping matter that contained some unclear figures. The Commission proceeded by unilaterally changing the figures, with the result that the Norwegian company appeared to have transgressed the anti-dumping agreement. It was later shown that the changes made by the Commission were inaccurate. The Court of First Instance held that there was a duty of diligence incumbent upon the Commission and that the error committed by the Commission was such that it 'would not have been committed in similar circumstances by an administrative authority exercising ordinary care and diligence'.<sup>20</sup> The European Court of Justice, in plenum, came to the same conclusion regarding the action of the Commission, even though the Court of Justice did not explicitly refer to the principle of due diligence.<sup>21</sup>

Similarly, Community institutions must be careful to observe and fulfil more general duties laid down in secondary legislation, so that mistakes and substandard practises of the institutions will not adversely affect private parties in individual matters. The Court of First Instance in several cases has applied the principle of due diligence to customs cases, where the Commission has an obligation to monitor trade between the EU and third countries. In the Eyckeler & Malt-case regarding the import of Hilton beef from Argentina, the Court of First Instance found that the Commission had failed in its obligation, leading to a breach of Article 211 EC and of the principle of good administration.<sup>22</sup> In the area of Community trade mark law, the European Court of Justice held equally in the Bayer- case that the principle of sound administration, as it was referred to, together with the principle of legal certainty, implied a duty to uphold time-limits and procedural rules in such a way as to ensure the proper conduct and effectiveness of proceedings.<sup>23</sup> A third example can be taken from the area of classification and control of foodstuffs, veterinary and medical matters, where the Commission enjoys a role as a legislator. Here, the Court of First Instance has applied the principle of due diligence or good administration as a standard in liability cases, CEVA Santé Animale and Monsanto Company.<sup>24</sup> In the both cases, the European Court of Justice, in plenum, overturned the verdicts of the Court of First Instance. In Ceva Santé Animale, the European Court of Justice did not review the principle of sound administration in itself, but held that that Court of First Instance had erred when it had not established what scope of discretion the Commission enjoyed.<sup>25</sup> In Monsanto Company, the European Court of Justice referred to the principle of sound administration and the duty of care, but found, in contrast to the Court of first Instance, that the Commission was not in breach of the principle. The European Court of Justice performed a more individualised test of the principle, as described below, balancing the interest of the private parties concerned against the interest of the Commission. The European Court thus held that in the present case, Monsanto Company had not established, or even sought to establish, that the decision at issue was adopted in disregard of the principle of sound administration and the duty of care.<sup>26</sup> In what circumstances the principle is to be understood as a standard or as an individual guarantee does not seem to be clear at all.

When the principle of due diligence is applied in the second manner as described above, the principle functions as a counterweight to the discretionary powers of the institutions. The principle gives the private party a tool to influence the substantive outcome of the decision-making procedure, by enabling the party to give input to the basis of the decision and to how it should be assessed. In this form, the principle of due diligence is a procedural rule with a close connection to the substantive evaluation of the case, as the duty to investigate carefully necessarily will be closely connected to the interpretation of the legal question at stake. Substantively irrelevant circumstances need not to be investigated as carefully.<sup>27</sup> The principle of due diligence can further be used as a supplementary tool to other procedural guarantees, such as the right to be heard, in order to ensure that Community institutions give appropriate attention to the arguments put forward by private parties. This may be useful for private parties who do not enjoy a formal standing in the administrative procedure, such as third parties. This application of the principle was described by Advocate General Poiares Maduro, in max.mobil.<sup>28</sup>

In the case-law, these safeguards are understood as a means, first, of laying down limits to the Commission's discretionary power and, second, of protecting third parties whose interests are affected but who have no procedural protection equal to that of persons to whom decisions are addressed.

Advocate General Maduro referred to Schlüsselverlag J.S. Moser<sup>29</sup> and Sytraval,<sup>30</sup> two cases in which the European Court of Justice found that the views put forward by private (third) parties should have prompted the Commission to take those considerations into account in its decision-making. Another case where the principle of due diligence was applied in this connection, is TU-München,<sup>31</sup> as mentioned above. The common ground in these cases is the interpretation of the private parties' legitimate interest in having a decisive influence over the institutions decision-making, especially in cases where the Community institution has a wide power of appraisal or where complex economic or technical issues are at stake.

3.2.2.1.2 The Principle of a Right to be Heard

The right to be heard in administrative proceedings was developed by the European Court of Justice in its very early case law as an independent general principle. In a staff case in 1962, Alvis, the European Court of Justice held that according to a generally accepted principle of administrative law in force in the Member States, the administrations of these states must allow their servants the opportunity of replying to allegations before any disciplinary decision is taken concerning them. This rule, which the European Court of Justice found to a part of 'sound justice and good administration', was to be followed by the Community institutions. In Transocean Marine Paint from 1974, the right to be heard was introduced as a general principle of administrative procedure.<sup>32</sup>

The right to be heard in Community law is ensured to private parties that in some way are affected by a measure taken by a Community institution, and first and foremost to those who are adversely affected. The typical situation is where an institution initiates proceedings of some kind against a private party, involving sanctions, fines and or penalty payments. The decision does not necessarily have to be addressed to a party for that party to be considered targeted. Third parties that might lose a benefit through the Community measure may also be 'targeted'.<sup>33</sup> It is more questionable whether there is a right to be heard in a situation where a private party turns to the institution in order to apply for a benefit. In Windpark Grothusen, a company had applied for financial support for an energy project administered by the Commission, together with 700 other applicants. When the application was denied, the company maintained that they had not been given a right to be heard. Both the Court of First Instance and the European Court of Justice found that the company did not have such right, as the company had not been adversely affected in the way understood by case law.<sup>34</sup> On the other hand, in TU München mentioned above in the context of the principle of due diligence, the party in the case, a university, was considered to have a right to be heard in regards to an application of exemption of import duties.<sup>35</sup> In TU München, the ground for promoting administrative procedural guarantees for the private party was the fact that the Commission had a wide power of appraisal in deciding the matter and that the importing university could be an important source of information, since they were

Decision No. 253

Walter Prescott,
Applicant

v.

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development,
Respondent

1. The World Bank Administrative Tribunal, composed of Francisco Orrego Vicuña, President, Thio Su Mien and Bola A. Ajibola, Vice Presidents, and A. Kamal Abul-Magd, Robert A. Gorman, Elizabeth Evatt and Jan Paulsson, Judges, has been seized of an application, received on February 25, 2000, by Walter Prescott against the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. In Prescott, Decision No. 234 [2000], the Tribunal denied the Bank's request to declare the application inadmissible for lack of jurisdiction. The parties thereafter submitted their written pleadings on the merits. A request made by the Applicant to hold oral proceedings was granted by the Tribunal. After a postponement at the request of the Applicant, the hearing took place on November 26, 2001. The case was listed on November 27, 2001.

2. This case concerns a claim for pension credits and related benefits during the period the Applicant held a Non-Regular Staff (NRS) Temporary appointment before April 15, 1998. The claim is based on arguments that the Bank pursued policies in violation of the Principles of Staff Employment and the relevant Staff Rules and that it misclassified the Applicant's position.

The Applicant's career in the Bank

3. The Bank hired the Applicant on December 2, 1985 as a Temporary Messenger to serve in the Administrative Services Department on an initial six-month appointment. The Applicant's Temporary appointment was extended continuously for six-month or one-year periods. Sixteen extensions of his contract were made between 1985 and 1999. Other than a six-month assignment in 1987 as a Telephone Operator, the Applicant performed the same messenger functions through December 1988.

4. In January 1989, the Applicant moved to the Information Technology and Facilities Department (ITF), Internal Documents Unit (ITFIO), as a Records Clerk. ITF later became the Information Solutions Group (ISG). The clerical functions the Applicant performed remained essentially the same and were subject to the changes in priorities and technologies periodically introduced in ITF and later in ISG. Training was provided to enable the Applicant to take on additional duties.

5. In 1999, ISG advertised a two-year Term position for an Information Technician that corresponded to the Applicant's functions. Having applied for this position, the Applicant was selected and appointed to it effective August 1, 1999.

6. When the Applicant joined the Bank, a Temporary appointment was defined as a "full-time appointment to the staff of the World Bank for a specified period of time, less than one year in duration." Although the length of the period specified in the Rule changed over time, it was always short-term. Conversely, a Regular appointment was a "full-time appointment of indefinite duration."

7. The Applicant's initial appointment as a Temporary employee allowed for participation in the Medical Insurance Plan, annual and sick leave and overtime pay, but did not allow for participation in the Staff Retirement Plan (SRP).

The Human Resources Policy Reform

8. As a result of the Human Resources Policy Reform enacted in 1998, the Applicant, like other NRS, commenced participation in the SRP and the corresponding accrual of service credit toward retirement benefits and retiree medical benefits on April 15, 1998. It is important to note in this respect that notwithstanding specific requests by the Staff Association to the effect that credit should also be received for employment prior to April 15, 1998, the Executive Directors expressly decided that no past service credit would be granted.

9. The Human Resources Policy Reform also led to a new policy concerning the phasing out of long-term NRS appointments by December 31, 2000. Staff holding this kind of appointment would be either selected for a Term or Open-Ended appointment or their appointment would expire by that date. It is in this context that the Applicant was appointed to a Term position in 1999.

10. The Applicant's first argument is that the Bank's management, by means of intentional and improper policy decisions, created incentives for an unjustified differentiation against particular NRS. He further argues that while lower-level management did not intentionally engage in détournement de procédure and unjustifiable differentiation, such abuses nevertheless resulted from the policy framework in which management had to operate. He mentions dollar budgeting, different comparators to determine pay rates, power inequalities and considerations based on nationality as particular policies that created incentives for managers to hire NRS instead of Regular staff. He maintains that they led to violations of the Principles of Staff Employment requiring proper process, equal treatment and equitable compensation.

11. The Respondent answers that at all times staff employment followed the applicable Staff Rules and Principles of Staff Employment, and that there was no abuse of power or any form of unjustifiable differentiation.

12. The policy questions involved in the Human Resources Policy Reform were discussed and decided by the Tribunal in Caryk (Decision No. 214 [1999]) and Madhusudan (Decision No. 215 [1999]). After examining various initiatives and decisions taken by the Bank in order to correct the adverse consequences of dollar budgeting, recruitment practices and, generally, the condition of NRS, the Tribunal then concluded:

These examples of policy initiatives or studies ... show that the Respondent, far from being involved in a détournement de pouvoir and détournement de procédure, was sensitive to a wide range of different, and occasionally conflicting, factors. The task of the Tribunal cannot possibly be to judge whether the Respondent could have been wiser.

(Caryk at para. 40; Madhusudan at para. 49.) The Respondent, during the Human Resources Policy Reform, was particularly sensitive to the situation in ISG, which had the highest percentage (50.9 percent) of NRS in the Bank.

13. Consistent with this jurisprudence, the Tribunal concludes that to the extent the issue before it involves a question of general policy pertaining to the ambit of managerial discretion, there is no basis for a finding of détournement de procédure or de pouvoir on the facts of this case. This does not, of course, obviate an examination of whether the implementation of the Bank's policies in fact resulted in a violation of the Applicant's conditions of employment.

Regularization under the Staff Rules

14. Regularization of NRS was governed at the time by Staff Rule 4.01. The 1986 version of this Rule allowed for the regularization of staff members in two situations: (i) if the Director of the Personnel Management Department or a designated official, at his or her discretion, authorized such regularization and the staff member met the eligibility criteria for the Regular position (para. 7.01); or (ii) the staff member was selected on a competitive basis against qualified external candidates for a Regular position (para. 7.02). Staff Rule 4.01 was amended in November 1991 and remained in effect until July 1998. Paragraph 7.02(b) of the amended Rule provided:

Staff holding Consultant or Temporary appointments before September 30, 1990 who have remained in continuous service and in the same job for four years or more, may be appointed ... to a Regular or Fixed-Term position if (i) before September 30, 1995, the vice president responsible for the hiring unit has selected the staff member, after determining that the staff member meets the criteria required for the new appointment, that the Bank Group's requirements for the work are likely to continue, and that the expected needs of the Bank Group indicate the staff member's skills should be secured by converting the existing appointment ....

15. The policy embodied in the Rule was first set out by the President of the Bank in an August 1, 1991 memorandum. This document stated that a special effort was to be made to regularize NRS who met similar criteria. The Tribunal referred to this memorandum in Caryk and Madhusudan when discussing the initiatives undertaken by Bank management to improve the conditions of NRS. (Caryk at para. 38; Madhusudan at para. 47.)

16. In the present case, the situation of the Applicant was addressed in a memorandum directed to him by the Acting Director of ITF on October 9, 1991, and communicated in exactly the same terms to other staff in ITF. This memorandum explicitly referred to the initiative of the President of the Bank to regularize NRS. It concluded, however, that

[a]s you had less than four years in your current assignment as of September 30, 1991, a final decision on your case cannot be taken at this time. You should be aware, however, that it is unlikely that you will be considered for regularization even if you do accumulate the necessary service. ... Arrangements for contract renewal remain unchanged and will continue to be based on the ongoing need for your services.

17. The Bank has argued that the Applicant, who was well aware of the fact that as a Temporary staff member he was not entitled to pension benefits, cannot plausibly complain now before the Tribunal since he could have brought a grievance many years ago. In particular, so the Bank argues, he could have complained on the occasion of one of the numerous renewals of his contract. Having failed to do so, he should not be allowed to rewrite his employment history by alleging that it had been wrong to maintain his NRS status.

18. In this respect, the Tribunal concludes, however, that the Applicant did ask to have his situation addressed. The Applicant's testimony, which the Tribunal views as credible in the circumstances (and which the Bank did not seek to rebut), is that during his early years of employment he had a number of conversations with his managers about his prospects for regularization, and was consistently told that this would not be possible at the moment because of budget constraints but not to be concerned because "[his] job would still be there." As for the October 1991 memorandum, the Applicant testified that it came as "quite a shock," that he "immediately confronted [his] supervisor," and that he was told "this is probably just temporary.... Everything changes in the Bank.... Be patient." When the Applicant's position was regularized in August 1999, he realized, as the Tribunal accepted in its decision on jurisdiction, that this brought into question the propriety of his NRS status over many years. The Applicant then took action without delay and in a timely manner to challenge his prior NRS condition and his exclusion from participation in the SRP prior to April 15, 1998. It is only because the Applicant has satisfied in a timely manner the indispensable jurisdictional requirements imposed by the Tribunal's Statute that the Tribunal is now in a position to consider his claim on the merits.

19. Although regularization under Staff Rule 4.01, paragraph 7.02(b), was not mandatory, as indicated by the expression "may," there was a clear indication in the Rule and the related policies that the matter should be considered if the terms of the Rule and the policies were met. The application of the Rule was conditioned on various cumulative elements. First, there had to be a continuous service for at least four years. Second, service had to be "in the same job." On this point, the Tribunal accepts the Applicant's argument that the term "same job" does not necessarily mean that the staff member performs precisely the same tasks over the relevant period.

20. Between 1985 and 1988, the Applicant held the Temporary messenger position described above. In 1989, he undertook a new job in ITF. Even though there may have been some continuity between the two, the fact is that the ITF position was a new job. The Applicant himself speaks of having "undergone training in different functions of a new job."

21. However, from January 1989 the Applicant held one single job, which involved filing reports into archives, duplicating microfiche, making photocopies, coordinating electronic mail, and ordering and stocking office supplies. Over time, some of these functions diminished considerably and new functions were added to this job, such as operating a new imaging system, printing reports, and maintaining the condition and performance of the printers. The Applicant was particularly successful in handling these assignments, as evidenced by the fact that by 1997 manual processing had been largely discontinued and the functions performed formerly by three staff members were now handled by the Applicant alone. This same job is the one currently held by the Applicant as an Information Technician after his regularization.

22. Other requirements of Staff Rule 4.01, paragraph 7.02(b), included that the work envisaged was likely to continue and that the staff member's skills met the expected needs of the Bank. The Bank has explained, particularly at the oral hearing, that it had expected that the Applicant's responsibilities would be either discontinued – through the development of the computer network – or absorbed by different departments. The Bank argues that it had anticipated these plans to begin as early as 1989 and finalized within a decade's time. Because of these plans, the Bank further argues, the Applicant's contract was appropriately extended for only short periods of time. Any long extensions, in the Bank's view, would have given the Applicant an expectation of continued employment and would have committed the Bank on a long-term basis.

23. The Bank's arguments are untenable. There can be no doubt that the work of the Applicant was expected to continue as in fact it did continue and does so presently. It may be true, as the Respondent has argued, that the specific tasks of the Applicant "changed significantly" over time; however, the general nature of his work remained substantially the same. As noted above, the Applicant was particularly successful in handling new assignments, thus evidencing that he also had the skills to meet the expected needs of the Bank. All the elements required under Staff Rule 4.01, paragraph 7.02(b), were thus met. The Respondent's argument that ITF experienced significant changes over time does not alter the fact that the core functions of the Applicant remained the same over time and that he proved to be capable of adapting to new methods.

24. The question then arises as to why, if the Applicant met all the criteria under Staff Rule 4.01, paragraph 7.02(b), and performed competently, he was not regularized between the date when he achieved four years in the job and the last date on which regularization was permitted under the Rule, that is to say September 29, 1995. Not only did he complete four years in the same job as of January 1993, but he also had the skills that met the expected needs of the Bank and his functions were expected to continue.

25. As a general principle, the Bank did not have an obligation to regularize the Applicant. This was a discretionary decision, which was final unless the decision constituted an abuse of discretion, being arbitrary, discriminatory, improperly motivated or carried out in violation of a fair and reasonable procedure. But under the applicable policy and rules, and in the context of contemporaneous communications to staff and managers, the Bank had an obligation to consider his regularization after four years in the light of the unique circumstances of the case. The Bank undertook no such consideration and thus failed to comply with this obligation. Moreover, the Bank at the time offered no valid reason for this failure.

26. Reasons now invoked by the Respondent, such as technological advances mentioned above, or the policy relied upon to regularize only staff having critical technological skills, were only raised by the Respondent for the first time in its pleadings, and most certainly not explained to the Applicant. In fact, the Tribunal, as noted, has been persuaded that there was an ongoing need for the Applicant's services.

27. In light of the above, the Tribunal concludes that the managers responsible for ITF/ISG decisions in this case abused their discretion in not considering and determining the Applicant's regularization before September 30, 1995 despite the clear terms of Staff Rule 4.01, paragraph 7.02(b), and of the President's directive of August 1, 1991. This directive should have weighed heavily in favor of regularization as it mandated the managers to make a "special effort" to regularize NRS who met the established criteria. The directive, in effect, placed the burden on the Respondent to show – when NRS met the criteria, but were not regularized – that there were particular reasons which justified a negative outcome. Here, however, although the Applicant satisfied the criteria, no special effort was made to regularize him and no particular reasons were offered at any material time to justify this failure.

28. This was not the result of a general policy of the Bank, which was leading in the opposite direction, nor of a deceitful purpose aiming at the denial of benefits, but rather of the failure to apply the policy on regularization to the Applicant. If all the legal and policy elements point in one direction and the managers choose to go the opposite way, probably relying on how things had been done in the past, there is an element of arbitrariness amounting to an abuse of discretion. In the light of this finding, the question of misclassification becomes moot.

Interpretation of the SRP

29. Because of the finding of abuse of discretion, there is likewise no need to address the question of interpretation of the SRP in respect of the definition of "service," "participant," and "days of service" that the Applicant has raised. Nor is it necessary to discuss questions of practice in the Bank and the International Monetary Fund. (See Yang, Decision No. 252 [2001], paras. 37 and 38.)

30. The Respondent has argued that under Staff Rule 11.01, paragraph 2.01, a Statute of Limitations would apply were the Applicant to establish an entitlement to past pension and medical service credits. This Rule provides as follows: "[T]he right of a staff member to claim any refund, allowance or payment due but unpaid or any benefit not credited shall lapse three years after the date on which a right to the benefit, allowance or payment claimed arose."

31. The Applicant has argued that this is a jurisdictional provision and not one related to the determination of substantive rights. The Tribunal agrees with this view. (See Singh, Decision No. 240 [2001], para. 22; Thomas, Decision No. 232 [2000], para. 21; and Mitra, Decision No. 230 [2000], para. 14.) The jurisdictional aspect of the case has already been settled. Moreover, as a right to pension and other credits shall be established only as a consequence of this judgment, the three-year statute of limitations would only apply, if at all, as from the date of the decision establishing the right.

Date for commencing participation in the SRP and related benefits

32. The Tribunal must now establish the date from which participation in the SRP and related medical benefits is recognized. The Applicant's first three years of service in the Bank do not qualify under the terms of Staff Rule 4.01, paragraph 7.02(b), because he had a different kind of job that lasted less than four years. The Applicant began his work with ITF in January 1989. After four years in this last job and having met all the other conditions of the Staff Rule and the Bank's stated policy, the Applicant was entitled to be given fair consideration for regularization and participation in the SRP and related benefits as from January 1, 1993. He was not given such consideration, and the Bank's explanations for this failure, as seen above, do not overcome the finding of arbitrariness. This is the date accordingly identified by the Tribunal for commencing SRP participation and entitlement to related medical benefits.

33. Account must be taken of the Applicant's obligation to make contributions to the SRP as from January 1, 1993 and until the date he began his present participation. However, as the Bank has been found at fault in this matter, it should provide the Applicant with an adequate time frame for completing these contributions and grant the appropriate facilities to this effect, as has been done on other occasions regarding the bridging of benefits.

Decision

For the above reasons, the Tribunal decides to:

- (i) direct the Respondent to allow the Applicant to participate in the Staff Retirement Plan and to receive related benefits beginning on January 1, 1993; and
- (ii) award costs to the Applicant in the amount of $15,000.

Arbitration CAS 2000/A/284 Sullivan / The Judo Federation of Australia Inc., the Judo Federation of Australia Inc. Appeal Tribunal and Raguz, award of 14 August 2000***

Panel: Mr. Malcolm Holmes (Australia), President, Mrs. Tricia Kavanagh (Australia); Mr. David Grace (Australia)

Judo
Olympic Games
Selection dispute

Any power to amend the criteria for selection must be subject to a limitation that it could not be exercised retrospectively once that allocation of points (earned in selection events and relevant for the selection in the 2000 Australian Olympic Team) had been made and once it had been scrutinised and confirmed.

Ms. Rebecca Sullivan (“The Applicant”) is a competitor in the sport of judo and has made herself available for selection in the 2000 Australian Olympic Team.

The Judo Federation of Australia Inc. (“The First Respondent”) is the governing body of the sport of Judo in Australia.

The First Respondent is responsible for nominating to the Australian Olympic Committee Inc. (“the AOC”) athletes and officials for selection by the AOC as members of the 2000 Australian Olympic Team.

In the lead up to the 2000 Olympic Games the AOC desired to promote awareness and a clear understanding of its selection criteria by all athletes involved in the sport of Judo. For its part the First Respondent desired to have certainty in the selection criteria for athletes in the sport of judo and to ensure that its athletes and officials were aware and had a clear understanding of the manner in which athletes and officials would be nominated to the AOC for selection in the 2000 Australian Olympic Team.

By an Agreement made the 27th day of September 1999 (“the Agreement”) the AOC and the First Respondent reflected their respective, but common, intentions as outlined above.

The Agreement purported to be a comprehensive agreement detailing nomination, participation and selection criteria. Annexed to the Agreement were the following:

* NB: This award has been challenged before the New South Wales Court of Appeal (Australia) (réf. CA 40650/00); cf. Judgment of 1 September 2000, delivered by the New South Wales Court of Appeal (Australia) in the case Angela Raguz v Rebecca Sullivan & Ors.

- Annexure A comprising the Participation and Qualification Criteria for athletes for the 2000 Olympic Games determined from time to time by the International Judo Federation (hereinafter referred to as “the IJF”) and the International Olympic Committee (hereinafter referred to as “the IOC”).
- Annexure B comprising the 2000 Australian Olympic Team Selection Criteria.
- Annexure C comprising the 2000 Australian Olympic Team Nomination Criteria developed by the First Respondent.
- Annexure D comprising the 2000 Australian Olympic Team Athlete Nomination Form.
- Annexure E comprising the 2000 Australian Olympic Team Officials Nomination Form.
- Annexure F (which was not put in evidence) comprising the 2000 Olympic Team Membership Agreement - Athletes.

Clause 5.3 of the Agreement provides that selection of an athlete in the Olympic Team is conditional upon the AOC confirming that the athlete has met all the applicable criteria for nomination and selection including the signing of the Team Membership Agreement (Annexure F).

The First Respondent has accepted that at all material times the Applicant has been eligible for nomination to the AOC for selection in the 2000 Australian Olympic Team.

Clause 7 of the Agreement has the heading “Appeal Process”. Clause 7.1 provides as follows:

“Subject to clause 7.2, any dispute regarding an Athlete’s nomination or non-nomination of an athlete by the NF to the AOC and whether arising during the term of this Agreement or after its termination will be according to the following procedure:

- (1) The appeal process is two tier, with the appeal being first heard by the Judo Federation of Australia’s Appeal Tribunal (“Tribunal”) with any subsequent appeal to be heard by the Court of Arbitration for Sport.
- (2) The sole grounds for any appeal are that the Nomination Criteria have not been properly followed and/or implemented.
- (3) Any appeal by an athlete against non-nomination to the AOC must be made to the Tribunal. Any appeal must accord with the following procedure:
  - (a) The appellant must give written notice of his appeal to the chief executive officer of the NF within 48 hours of the announcement of the decision against which the appeal is made.
  - (b) Within 5 working days of submitting his or her written notice of appeal, the appellant must submit to the chief executive officer of the NF the grounds of that appeal accompanied by a non-refundable deposit of $100 payable to the NF.
  - (c) Unless otherwise agreed in writing between the AOC and the NF, the Tribunal will comprise the following persons appointed by the Board of the NF:
    - (i) a barrister or solicitor who will act as Chairman;
    - (ii) a person with a thorough knowledge of the Sport and who preferably has had recent international competition experience in the Sport; and
    - (iii) one other person of experience and skills suitable to the function of the NF Appeal Tribunal.

No person is eligible to be appointed to the Tribunal if he or she is a member of Board of the NF or its selection panel or by reason of his or her relationship with the appellant or any member of the Board of the NF or its selection panel would be reasonably considered to be other than impartial.

- (d) The Tribunal will convene a hearing as soon as possible after the submission of the grounds of appeal. The hearing may occur in such manner as the Chairman decides, including telephone or video conferencing. The Tribunal is not bound by the rules of evidence but must observe the principles of procedural fairness.
  - (e) Prior to the hearing, the selection panel will provide the Tribunal and the appellant with a written statement as to the reasons for the decision against which the appeal is made.
  - (f) The Tribunal will give its decision as soon as practicable after the hearing and will provide the chief executive officer of the NF and the appellant with a statement of the reasons for its decision.
  - (g) The decision of the Tribunal will be binding on the parties and, subject only to any appeal to the Court of Arbitration for Sport pursuant to clause 7.1(4), it is agreed that neither party will institute or maintain proceedings in any court or tribunal other than the said Tribunal.
- (4) Any appeal from a decision of the Tribunal must be solely and exclusively resolved by the Court of Arbitration for Sport according to the Code of Sports-Related Arbitration. The decision of the said Court will be final and binding on the parties and it is agreed that neither party will institute or maintain proceedings in any court or tribunal other than the said Court.
  - (5) An athlete wishing to appeal to the Court of Arbitration for Sport must give written notice of that fact to the chief executive officer of the NF within 48 hours of the announcement of the decision against which the appeal is made and must then file his or her statement of appeal with the Court of Arbitration for Sport within 5 working days.
  - (6) Failure to observe the above time limits will render any appeal a nullity provided that an athlete may apply to the body to hear the appeal in question for an extension of time in which to commence an appeal. The body to hear the appeal in question may grant such an extension of time only in extenuating circumstances outside the control of the athlete concerned.”

Both the Applicant and Ms. Angela Raguz (“the Third Party”) were competitors for selection in the Australian Olympic Team in Judo in the 52-kilogram weight division. Under the Agreement the only events in respect of which points were to be awarded and upon which the selection was to be based were the following:

- (a) the 1999 Senior World Championships which were held between 4 and 11 October 1999;
- (b) the 1999 USA Open Championships which were held between 23 and 24 October 1999;
- (c) the Oceania Judo Union Championships which were held between 11 and 12 March 2000.

The Applicant competed in all three selection events and the Third Party participated in the latter two selection events. Their results were as follows:

Event	Sullivan	Raguz
1999 World Championships	9 th place	Did not compete
1999 USA Open Championships	7 th place	5 th place
2000 Oceania Judo Union Championships	2 nd place	1 st place

After the final selection events, the Applicant said in evidence that the first indication that she received that she had not been nominated was when she was not invited to attend a meeting of the proposed Olympic Team in March 2000.

On or about 17 March 2000 the Applicant wrote to the First Respondent expressing her belief that she would not be nominated by the First Respondent for selection in the 2000 Australian Olympic Team.

On 10 April 2000 the Applicant wrote to the First Respondent requesting urgent advice as to when it was intended that the First Respondent would nominate its team to the AOC and when the Applicant would know whether she had been so nominated. The letter also foreshadowed a request to refer any non-nomination to the Judo Federation of Australia Inc. Appeal Tribunal (“the Second Respondent”).

On 14 May 2000 the First Respondent’s Committee of Management met to discuss, inter alia, its nominations to the AOC for the 2000 Australian Olympic Games Team. The Committee of Management of the Respondent unanimously passed a motion that in the Women’s under 52-kilogram weight division Angela Raguz be the nominated athlete with the Applicant being a reserve athlete in that weight division. The First Respondent’s Committee of Management further resolved that the Applicant be advised that her Appeal should be lodged with the Oceania Judo Union and that the First Respondent’s Committee of Management had nominated this division to the AOC through the Oceania Judo Union selection criteria. On 11 June 2000 the Applicant wrote to the Oceania Judo Union appealing the decision by the First Respondent not to nominate her to the AOC. On 12 June 2000 the Oceania Judo Union wrote to the Applicant advising her that the Oceania Judo Union had no jurisdiction to hear the Applicant’s appeal.

On 19 June 2000 the Oceania Judo Union wrote a further letter to the Applicant confirming that the Applicant’s appeal should be directed to the First Respondent and further confirming that the Oceania Judo Union had no jurisdiction in the matter.

On 22 June 2000 the First Respondent wrote to the Applicant confirming her correspondence to the Second Respondent on 10 April 2000 and further confirming that her appeal must proceed pursuant to Clause 7.1 of the Agreement (set out above). Attached to that letter was a circular letter forwarded to the Applicant from the Section Manager Judo 2000 Olympic Games and dated 23 June 2000 advising the names of those athletes that had been nominated to the AOC by the First Respondent for selection in the 2000 Australian Olympic Games Team. That letter advised the procedures to follow in the case of an appeal and specified that the sole grounds for any appeal were that the Nomination Criteria had not been properly followed and/or implemented.

By letter dated 24 June 2000 the Applicant appealed to the Second Respondent against her non-nomination by the First Respondent to the AOC for selection to the 2000 Australian Olympic Team.

On 30 June 2000 the Applicant wrote to the First Respondent setting out the Applicant's Grounds of Appeal together with a request for clarification, information and documentation. The letter requested advice, amongst other things, as to the date, time and proposed venue for the Appeal Tribunal hearing. The letter also advised the intention to call Ms Sharon Rendle to give evidence at the hearing.

By letter dated 28 June 2000, Mr. Gerry Hay, Solicitor and Barrister of Rockdale NSW, advised the President of the First Respondent, Mr. J Deacon, that he had convened a panel to consider the Applicant's appeal. The other appointed members of the panel were Mrs. Margeurite Wilson and Mrs. Dianne Moffit. He further advised that the relevant documentation had been delivered to the nominated panel members the same day.

By letter dated 5 July 2000 Mr. Hay wrote to the Applicant's Solicitors advising that the Appeal Tribunal was "now in operation" and that he anticipated "that the Tribunal would complete its task within the next week". In relation to the intention to call Ms Sharon Rendle to give evidence on behalf of the Applicant Mr. Hay stated "I note your intention to call Ms Sharon Rendle to the Appeal and I must point out that the initial process does not involve examination of the parties concerned but relies on the documentation provided by all the relevant parties. Any subsequent appeal is a matter for the Court of Arbitration for Sport where examination processes are available." Mr. Hay then proceeded to answer each of the Grounds of Appeal, in effect rejecting each of the grounds. The letter concluded that "the initial appeal has commenced and is almost completed" and that "the Tribunal had reached a decision to consider the evidence in the first instance, on the documents provided by the parties".

By letter dated 6 July 2000 the Applicant's Solicitors wrote to Mr. Hay advising that the Applicant had not received the Selection Panel's Written Statement of Reasons as contemplated by Clause 7.1(3)(e) of the Agreement. The letter also requested the documents which had been requested in the 30 June 2000 letter to the First Respondent. The letter also complained that the Second Respondent had not been constituted in accordance with Clause 7.1(3)(c) of the Agreement, that the Tribunal was required to convene a hearing, allow the Applicant to give evidence, provide documents and call witnesses and that generally the Appeal procedure set out in the Agreement had not been followed. A copy of that letter to Mr. Hay was forwarded to the First Respondent on 6 July 2000.

By letter dated 11 July 2000 Mr. Hay wrote to the Applicant's Solicitors enclosing previously requested documentation, clarifying a number of matters that had been raised in previous correspondence and advising that he had "a wide scope of choice in the format in which" the Appeal Tribunal operated. He stated that "sufficient documentation was available to indicate to the Tribunal that the Appellant did not meet the criteria" and that "the hearing may occur in such a manner as the Chairman decides, including telephone or video conferencing. My method of conducting this Tribunal was to provide all the relevant information to my colleagues along with permission for them to ring the Appellant if necessary and discuss with her, any query that they may have. I am informed that one of the members of the Tribunal did use this method to gain information for herself. I am now in the process of writing to Rebecca Sullivan and give her the decision of the Tribunal ...”.

On 13 July 2000 the Applicant’s Solicitors wrote to Mr. Hay acknowledging receipt of his letter dated 11 July 2000 on 13 July 2000 and requesting that any decision of the Tribunal be delayed until the Solicitors had the opportunity to respond to Mr. Hay’s letter. The author further indicated that he would respond in writing by “close of business tomorrow”. By letter dated 12 July 2000 which appears to have been faxed on 13 July 2000 the First Respondent wrote to the Applicant via her Solicitors advising that Mr. Hay had advised “that the Tribunal has met and concluded the investigation and has upheld the selection criteria as applied” by the First Respondent.

By letter dated 14 July 2000 the Applicant’s Solicitors wrote to the First Respondent and gave notice that pursuant to Clause 7.1(4) of the Agreement the Applicant wished to appeal to the Court of Arbitration for Sport.

By letter dated 19 July 2000 the Applicant’s Solicitors wrote to the Court of Arbitration for Sport enclosing an application form together with other relevant documentation.

The application form outlined the relief sought by the Applicant as being “an order nominating Rebecca Sullivan to the AOC for selection in an OJU place at the 27th Olympiad in the Women’s Judo under 52 kg weight division.”

Pursuant to the Order of Procedure, a copy of the Applicant’s Appeal Brief was served on the Third Party and she was invited to attend and participate in the proceedings and the hearing on Saturday 12 August 2000.

At the commencement of the hearing, the Applicant indicated to the Court that the sole ground to be relied upon was that the nomination criteria had not been properly followed and/or implemented and that if properly followed then the Applicant would have been the nominated athlete. The other ground which related to discretionary considerations was then abandoned.

Pursuant to the Order of Procedure the First Respondent was required to provide by 12pm on Tuesday 10th August 2000 the written statement of reasons of the First Respondent’s selection panel referred to in clause 7.1(3)(e) of the Agreement and the statement of reasons of the First Respondent’s Appeal Tribunal for its decision. Neither of these documents (if indeed they are in existence as appears unlikely) was supplied to the Applicant or the Court.

LAW

1. At the hearing the sole Ground of Appeal was that on the true construction of the Agreement, the Nomination Criteria had not been properly followed and/or implemented. The Applicant submitted that the Nomination Criteria were inconsistent with the Participation Criteria and pursuant to clause 4.3 of the Agreement the Participation Criteria prevailed over the Nomination Criteria to the extent of the inconsistency.

2. The Applicant submitted that:

“The inconsistency between the Participation criteria and the Nomination criteria lies in the different points awarded towards an Oceania Judo Union (“OJU”) place in the Olympics for an athlete who places ninth in the 1999 world championship. The participation criteria awarded 8 points to such an athlete; the nomination criteria only awarded 6 points”.

The Applicant relied upon the fact that Rebecca Sullivan was placed 9th in the 1999 World Championships and therefore earned 8 points whilst Angela Raguz did not compete in those championships. Further points relied upon were that the Applicant was placed 7th in the 1999 USA Open and thereby earned 3 points; Angela Raguz was placed 5th in the 1999 USA Open and thereby earned 6 points. The Applicant was placed second in the 2000 OJU championships and thereby earned 12 points; Angela Raguz was placed first in the 2000 OJU championships and thereby earned 15 points. The Applicant submitted that she has, therefore, accrued 23 points and Angela Raguz has accrued only 21 points. The nomination of Angela Raguz had been based on Rebecca Sullivan only being credited with 6 points as a result of her 9th place at the 1999 World Championships.

3. The only issue for determination therefore on the appeal was the proper construction and effect of the Agreement. If the construction and effect contended for by the Applicant was correct then she would have accumulated 23 points and the Third Party 21 points and the Applicant should have been nominated. If the construction and effect contended for by the First Respondent was correct then both parties would have accumulated 21 points and as the Third Party achieved a higher place in the 2000 OJU Championships, the Third Party was correctly nominated.
4. The Court was not asked nor required to consider the respective abilities or performances of both athletes. All parties proceeded on the basis that both were suitable for nomination and no other athletes matched them in their division of the sport. The Court was not asked or required to make any evaluation of the merits or appropriateness of the selection system adopted by the First Respondent. No discretionary matters or subsequent circumstances were relied upon by any of the parties.
5. All parties proceeded on the basis that if the construction and effect of the Agreement contended for by the Applicant was correct then the Applicant should be nominated and if unsuccessful then the Third Party's nomination would stand. No party submitted that if the appeal should be upheld then the issue of whom should be nominated should be remitted back to the First Respondent or its selection panel for further consideration. The sole issue for determination by the Court was thus the proper construction and effect of the Agreement.

6. It is necessary to consider in detail the terms of the Agreement and the various annexures which were attached to the Agreement when executed on 27 August 1999.
7. There are five Recitals to the Agreement. Recital D provides that:
“The AOC wishes to promote awareness and a clear understanding of its Selection Criteria throughout the Sport.”
8. Recital E provides that:
“The NF desires to have certainty in the selection criteria for athletes and to ensure that its athletes and officials are aware and have a clear understanding of the manner by which it will decide to nominate Athletes and Officials to the AOC for selection in the Team.”
9. Clause 1.1 of the Agreement defines certain terms. Amongst those terms are “Nomination Criteria”, “Participation Criteria” and “Selection Criteria”. The Nomination Criteria were included in Annexure C, the Participation Criteria included in Annexure A and the Selection Criteria included in Annexure B.
10. Clause 1.2(6) provides that:
“The Recitals to this Agreement are incorporated into the operative portion of this Agreement as if repeated in full.”
11. The Agreement critically imposes on the First Respondent in clause 3.1 the obligation to “abide by the Selection Criteria and this Agreement in nominating Athletes for selection as members of the Team”. The essence of the case for the Applicant is that she would have been nominated had the First Respondent abided by the Selection Criteria and the Agreement.
12. Clauses 3.1 and 4.3 of the Agreement, collectively, provide that:
  - (a) the Participation Criteria will prevail over both the Selection Criteria and the Nomination Criteria (clauses 3.1 and 4.3); and
  - (b) the Selection Criteria will prevail over the Nomination Criteria (clause 4.3).
13. Clause 4.3 of the Agreement states:
“The NF will develop the Nomination Criteria no later than 12 months prior to the NF’s first nomination event for the Games, or as agreed with the AOC. The Nomination Criteria will be at all times subject to:
  - (1) the prior approval of the AOC;
  - (2) the Participation Criteria; and
  - (3) the Selection Criteria.

In the event that the Nomination Criteria are inconsistent in any way with the Participation Criteria and the Selection Criteria, the latter will prevail to the extent of that inconsistency.

Once the Nomination Criteria are so developed and approved, they will be deemed to be automatically incorporated into this Agreement as Annexure C and the NF will publish them to all persons to whom it has provided a copy of the Agreement”.

14. Clause 4.4 of the Agreement ensures that the Nomination Criteria must be applied in a way to ensure that “no Athlete is nominated to the AOC where another Athlete is, or other Athletes, are entitled to be nominated in priority”.
15. Clause 8.3 and 8.4 of the Nomination Criteria (Annexure C of the Agreement) provide as follows:
  - 8.3 To qualify for an OJU place, an athlete must comply with the selection criteria set out in Attachment 2. (OJU Olympic Selection System).
  - 8.4 Subject to clause 8.2 and 12, the NCC will nominate an athlete who has qualified for an OJU place, provided that athlete meets the preconditions for nomination set out in clause 11.”

The Applicant submitted that as she qualified for an OJU place the First Respondent was obliged to nominate her and accordingly this court should substitute the Respondent’s decision.

16. The Respondents contended, supported by the Third Party, that as clause 7.1(2) states that the sole ground for an Appeal is that the Nomination Criteria have not been properly followed and/or implemented, the Applicant was restricted to a complaint about a breach of the words found in Annexure C, Nomination Criteria, as being the basis of the Appeal. The difficulty with this submission is that within the Annexure C itself there is an obligation in Clause 6.2.2 that in order to be selected athletes must satisfy the requirements in the Selection Criteria in Annexure B. It is a requirement of Clause 5(1)(a) of the Selection Criteria in Annexure B that the athlete “must have met the Participation and Qualification Criteria”. The language used both in the operative provisions of the Agreement and each of the Annexures makes it clear that they are interlinked and should be read together. It is the Court’s view that on the proper construction of the Agreement the ground for an Appeal should not be so restricted and that the Court is able to determine whether there has been a breach of the Nomination Criteria by reading the Agreement as a whole.
17. The first question which arises is whether any rights flow to potential Olympic Athletes pursuant to the Agreement. It is clear from Recital E quoted above that certainty in Selection Criteria for Athletes and the ensuring that Athletes are aware of the manner by which nominations will be decided are the objectives of the parties to the Agreement. As a matter of the ordinary and natural meaning of the language used in the Agreement the parties intended an immediate and clear benefit to accrue to those Athletes. This is reinforced by the fact that clause 2.4 of the Agreement provides that:

“The NF will provide a copy of this Agreement to each member of the Shadow Team and all other individuals and organisations with a legitimate interest in the selection procedures. The NF will, if requested by the AOC, provide that the AOC written acknowledgement from each such Athlete that the Athlete has read and is aware of this Agreement.”

18. The Agreement defines the class of persons intended to be benefited by the Agreement. It is also reinforced by the definition of “Athlete” contained in Clause 1.1 of the Agreement which states:

“means those athletes who participate in the sport and are registered members or recognised athletes of the N.F.”

Further support is found in clause 11 of Annexure C (Nomination Criteria) which provides, inter alia, that in order for an Athlete to fulfil certain conditions prior to being considered for nomination, the Athlete must be a registered member of his or her State/Territory Judo Association which is a registered financial member of the First Respondent. In the opinion of the Court it is clear from the language used that the Agreement was intended to confer rights and legitimate expectations in relation to the Athletes in relation to whom it is directed from the time of its execution on 27 September 1999. It is clear that the Agreement including the Annexures form a comprehensive code in relation to the nomination and selection of Athletes, as defined, in the sport of Judo for the 2000 Olympic Games. The Agreement became the terms of reference for the Athletes and the Athletes by their participation in the selection events accepted and were entitled to rely upon the Agreement. We conclude that Athletes vying for selection in the 2000 Olympic Games Team in the sport of Judo have and at all times from 27 September 1999 have had a legitimate expectation that the provisions of the Agreement would be complied with.

19. The crucial question which then arises is whether the Respondents were required to apply the points table contained in Annexure A (which provided that 8 points would be provided for ninth place at the 1999 World Championships) or the points table contained in Annexure C (which provided that 6 points would be allocated for ninth placing at the 1999 World Championships). The terms of the Agreement and the Annexures provide a clear answer to this question. Where there is inconsistency then the provisions of Annexure A prevail over Annexure C, e.g. Clause 3.1, Clause 4.3 of the Agreement, Clause 1 and Clause 5(1)(a) of Annexure B and Clause 6.2.2 of Annexure C.
20. The Respondents sought support from evidence extraneous to the agreement notwithstanding that the Agreement contained an “entire agreement” clause in clause 9.1. This clause states that the “Agreement contains the entire agreement between the parties”. Any reliance on earlier discussions about a draft proposal is inconsistent with the terms and objects of the Agreement.
21. The evidence from the Respondent’s coaching director, who also held the position of technical director of the OJU, Mr. Peter Hermann, was that at a training camp held in late August 1999, the Applicant, together with other Athletes at the training camp was advised of a draft proposal to change the points table contained in Annexure A and to reduce the points

- allocated for ninth place at the 1999 World Championships from 8 points to 6 points. In order for that draft proposal to become effected, it was necessary for the Executive of the Oceania Judo Union to approve the proposal. The draft proposal and the eventual amendment after all the Selection Events had been completed had a long history.
22. At the Executive Meeting of the OJU on 22 January 1998, its executive adopted a 2000 Olympic Selection System which, inter alia, provided 8 points for ninth place at the 1999 World Championships. By letter dated 11 March 1999, Mr. Hermann in his capacity as Technical Director of the OJU wrote to the Executive and proposed some amendments which included an amendment to the points tables so that the points would be reduced from 8 points to 6 points. On 6 September 1999, the Secretary of the OJU distributed a copy of the proposed amended points system to the Presidents of the member countries although it was not incorporated in the Participation Criteria annexed as Annexure A to the Agreement when executed on 27 September 1999. The Agreement in Annexure A allocated 8 points for ninth place at the 1999 World Championships. Accordingly any prior inconsistent or informal discussion was in the circumstances irrelevant.
  23. Mr. Hermann stated that the Agreement including the Annexures thereto were forwarded to the Athletes, Coaches and Officials shortly after execution by the First Respondent but as the whole Judo Team was overseas at the time with most of the Athletes, Coaches and Officials returning to Australia at the end of October/November 1999, those Athletes, Coaches and Officials would not have received the document until after their return. Some time in late November 1999 Mr. Hermann was advised by the Judo Section Manager that there was an inconsistency between the points table of the Oceania Judo Union and that of the International Judo Federation. The Third Party had queried the inconsistency with him, together with another Athlete. Mr. Hermann wrote a letter dated 6 December 1999 to the Sports Director of the International Judo Federation advising of the inconsistency. The Sports Director of the International Judo Federation was confused and sought clarification in relation to the proposed amendment and by letter dated 17 December 1999 Mr. Hermann wrote to him and provided further information. Some delay then ensued.
  24. It was not until 3 March 2000 that the International Judo Federation sent the proposed changes to the Oceania Judo Union qualification system and sought verification from Mr. Hermann that it was appropriate to seek confirmation with the International Olympic Committee. Mr. Hermann replied on 8 March 2000 confirming that the draft proposal be processed. On 23 March 2000 the IOC wrote to the National Olympic Committees of Oceania and advised them that an amendment had been made to the Oceania Judo Union qualification procedure for the Sydney 2000 Olympic Games. The result was a purported amendment to the qualification system by a change to the points awarded for a ninth placing at the 1999 World Championships from 8 points to 6 points.
  25. By letter dated 14 March 2000, however, Peter Hermann as Technical Director of the OJU, wrote to the General Secretary of the Union setting out the final ranking for the 2000 Olympic Games of the OJU Athletes to be recommended for selection and in so doing applied the proposed amendment to the points retrospectively system which gave the Third Party 21 points and the Applicant 21 points but ranked the Third Party ahead of the Applicant in accordance with the term of the Agreement which gave priority to that Athlete who achieved a higher place at the 2000 OJU Championships.

26. The Applicant relied upon Clause 5 under the heading “Oceania Judo Union” of Annexure A as emphasising the fact that when the points are gained by Athletes at the various competitions, the allocations occur at that time and not at a later time. Furthermore, if this was permissible it would produce the anomalous result that allocated points could be taken away from the Athlete after all the selection events have been completed. Clause 5 of Annexure A provides that the OJU points system will be the basis used by the Oceania Judo Union to recommend their representatives for the 2000 Olympic Games selection. Subclauses provide, inter alia, that points would be allocated for Athletes of all OJU member countries, points gained by Athletes “will be allocated at all selected Olympic selection events” (clause 5.1.3), points allocated at the 2000 Olympic selection will be constantly scrutinised by the OJU Technical Director or his delegate and confirmation of points claimed must be provided to the Technical Director by the President of the member country by supplying copies of the relevant draw sheets pertaining to each Athlete. At all material times the Technical Director was Peter Hermann.
27. The Respondents, supported by the Third Party, relied substantially upon the meaning of the phrase “Participation Criteria” contained in clause 1.1 of the Agreement. That clause defines that phrase as meaning “the Participation and Qualification Criteria for the Games for Athletes determined from time to time by the IF and the IOC and attached as Annexure A”. The Respondents contended that the definition makes clear that the Participation Criteria as at the time of entry into the Agreement may change from time to time and that by the time the Nomination Criteria came to be developed and formulated the Participation Criteria had in fact changed by reducing the number of points to be allocated for ninth placing from 8 points to 6 points. This was so, it was contended, because at the time of the decision of the First Respondent to nominate its Athletes to the AOC, namely in May 2000, the points table contained within the Participation Criteria had in fact been amended. Thus the Respondents submitted the change to the number of points to be awarded even though made after all the selection events had been held was merely the result of the exercise of a right or power in the Agreement itself.
28. The Court finds that whatever may have been the subjective intention of the First Respondent in pursuing a change to the relevant points table the proposed change was not effective until after the three selection events had taken place. The language used in the Agreement and in the Annexures required action to be taken in relation to the points accrued at the 1999 World Championships. Any power to amend must be subject to a limitation that it could not be exercised retrospectively once that “allocation” had been made and once it had been scrutinised and confirmed. Furthermore no indication in writing had been given by the First Respondent to any of the potential Olympic nominees for selection that the points table was proposed to be changed prior to the change occurring.

29. The Court finds that in the particular circumstances of this case, all Athletes had a legitimate expectation that the issue of the nomination to the AOC would be governed by the documentation existing on 27 September 1999 which had not been amended prior to the selection decision by the Oceania Judo Union. The documentation as at that date, as it had at all times from 27 September 1999, objectively assured the Athletes that there would be awarded 8 points for a placing of ninth in the 1999 World Championships.
30. The Court concludes that as a matter of the proper construction of the Agreement, the Nomination Criteria were not properly followed and/or implemented in that they required the points table contained in Annexure A which remained in its unamended form until 23 March 2000 to be applied in the nomination by the First Respondent of Athletes to the AOC for selection for the 2000 Olympic Games Australian Judo Team.
31. Accordingly, the Court upholds the Appeal of the Applicant and orders that First Respondent nominate to the AOC the Applicant in substitution for the Third Party.
32. The Panel finds that the Second Respondent conducted a procedurally flawed appeal process. The Applicant was never given a statement of reasons by the selectors, as contemplated by the Agreement, nor any associated documentation or a proper chance to be heard, although she had notified the First Respondent of her concern at the selection processes as far back as 17 March 2000.
33. As a result of a determination of the Respondents not to consider her various complaints at the various stages, the other parties and the Court have been drawn into a full appeal on 12 August 2000. The Third Party has been led to believe from a March 2000 meeting of the proposed members of the Olympic Team that she was to be the nominated Athlete. For some five months she has held a belief that she would represent Australia and compete in the 2000 Olympic Games. This is a matter of grave concern. Responsibility for this is solely due to the actions and inactions of the Respondents.

The Court of Arbitration for Sport hereby rules :

1. The appeal is upheld and the decision of the Judo Federation of Australia Inc to nominate Angela Raguz to the Australian Olympic Committee for selection in the Women's Under 52-kilogram Division is set aside.
2. The Judo Federation of Australia Inc is directed to forthwith advise the Australian Olympic Committee that its nomination of Angela Raguz is withdrawn and substituted by the nomination of Rebecca Sullivan.

3. The award setting forth the results of the proceedings shall be made public unless all parties agree.

THE TRIBUNAL,

Composed as above,

Makes the following Award:

I. THE PROCEEDINGS

1. On August 24, 1984, the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes ("the Centre" or "ICSID") received a Request for Arbitration from Southern Pacific Properties (Middle East) Limited ("SPP(ME)" or "the Claimant"), a Hong Kong corporation. The Request stated that SPP(ME) wished to institute arbitration proceedings under the Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of Other States ("the Washington Convention") against the Arab Republic of Egypt ("the ARE" or "the Respondent"), and asked for the following relief:

"SPP(ME) respectfully requests ICSID to establish an arbitral tribunal to:

1. determine that the ARE has undertaken obligations and incurred duties in respect to SPP(ME) both according to the terms of Law No. 43 and according to the Heads of Agreement of September 1974 specifically entered into by a Member of its Government, as well as by a Supplemental Agreement "approved, agreed and ratified" by the same Member of its Government.
2. determine that the ARE violated its obligations thereunder,
3. adopt and incorporate as its own the pertinent findings of fact made by the ICC Arbitral Tribunal concerning SPP(ME)'s performance of its obligations under its agreements, the dismissal of EGOH's counterclaim therein, and the acts bringing about termination of the investment project,
4. determine the liability of the ARE to compensate SPP(ME) for the termination of its investment agreements and to award the full measure of indemnification to SPP(ME) on account of the destruction of its investment, increased by the additional costs, including all direct and indirect costs of the present proceedings, occasioned by ARE's wrongful refusal to honor the ICC award of February 16, 1983, or otherwise compensate SPP(ME), as well as interest at commercial rates."

2. On August 28, 1984, the Secretary-General of ICSID sent an acknowledgment of the Request to SPP(ME) and transmitted a copy of the Request to the Respondent. On the same day, the Secretary-General registered the Request in the Arbitration Register and notified the Parties accordingly.

3. On August 29, 1984, the Secretary-General notified the Parties by telex that:

"... the Arabic text of Article 8 of Law No. 43 of 1974 refers to the settlement of disputes within the framework of the ICSID Convention in the cases where it (i.e., the Convention) applies, and not, as erroneously mentioned in the English translation, where Law No. 90 of 1971 ratifying the Convention applies. I have, thus, registered the request of SPP without prejudice to the question whether said Article eight constitutes consent for the purposes of the ICSID Convention or merely includes a reference to this Convention in the cases where consent for ICSID jurisdiction is issued separately. This matter, if raised, will be for the Arbitral Tribunal to decide."

4. On August 29, 1984, the Centre received from SPP(ME) a proposal that a sole arbitrator be appointed pursuant to Rule 2(1)(a) of the Centre's Rules of Procedure for Arbitration Proceedings ("Arbitration Rules"), or, alternatively, that the Parties jointly nominate an individual as President of the Tribunal.

5. In a communication received by the Centre on November 12, 1984, the Respondent stated that it contested the Centre's competence with respect to the present dispute, and that no action undertaken in proceedings concerning SPP(ME)'s request could be deemed a renunciation of the Respondent's jurisdictional objections. The Respondent rejected SPP(ME)'s proposals for the constitution of the Tribunal and proposed as an alternative a Tribunal consisting of three members, with Dr. Eduardo JIMENEZ DE ARECHAGA serving as President of the Tribunal.

6. In accordance with Rule 4 of the Centre's Arbitration Rules, the Parties agreed on November 26, 1984 to extend to December 3, 1984 the period for nominating their respective arbitrators and for agreement on the President of the Tribunal.

7. On November 26, 1984, the Respondent designated Dr. Mohamed Amin EL MAHDI, an Egyptian national, as an arbitrator pursuant to Rule 3 of the Centre's Arbitration Rules. SPP(ME) informed the Centre on November 30, 1984 that it did not object to the nationality of the arbitrator named by the Respondent, as it might have done under Rule 3(1)(a)(i) of the Arbitration Rules, and that it was designating Mr. Robert F. PIETROWSKI, Jr., a U.S. national, as an arbitrator. Further, SPP (ME) informed the Centre that it consented to the Respondent's proposal that Dr. JIMENEZ DE ARECHAGA be appointed President of the Tribunal. Dr. JIMENEZ DE ARECHAGA accepted his appointment on December 5, 1984 and Mr. PIETROWSKI accepted his appointment on December 7, 1984. On December 18, 1984, the Centre received notice that Dr. EL MAHDI accepted his appointment as an arbitrator, and the Secretary-General informed the Parties that the Tribunal was constituted and that the proceedings were deemed to have begun in accordance with Rule 6(1) of the Arbitration Rules.

8. On February 8, 1985, the Tribunal conducted a preliminary meeting with the Parties at the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Hague. The Parties placed on record their agreement to the effect that:

"the Tribunal has been properly constituted in accordance with Section 2 of the ICSID Convention and Chapter 1 of the Arbitration Rules."

In accordance with Rule 20 of the Centre's Arbitration Rules, it was decided that the Arbitration Rules in effect up to September 26, 1984 would apply; that the procedural languages would be English and French; and that the seat of the arbitration would be Washington.

9. The Tribunal decided at the preliminary meeting to suspend the proceedings on the merits pending a decision on the Respondent's jurisdictional objections, and that the proceedings on jurisdiction would consist of written pleadings and oral argument. The Tribunal then fixed a schedule for the filing of the written pleadings on jurisdiction, with the Respondent's observations to be filed by May 8, 1985 and the Claimant's observations to be filed by June 19, 1985.

10. The observations of both Parties were filed within the prescribed time limits. The Respondent in its observations submitted that the Tribunal should

"pour l'ensemble des motifs ci-dessus exposés, se dire incompétent pour connaître des demandes présentées par SPP(ME)."

The observations of the Claimant submitted that the Tribunal should

"reject Respondent's objections to the Centre's jurisdiction over this dispute between SPP(ME) and the Government of Egypt regarding the State's failure to compensate this foreign investor for the losses it suffered as a result of the State's cancellation of the Pyramids Oasis project."

11. On July 8, 1985, the Centre received from the Respondent a further pleading addressing certain arguments made by the Claimant in its observations.

12. Oral argument on the question of jurisdiction was held at the Permanent Court of Arbitration in the Hague on July 10 and 11, 1985. The hearings were recorded in the form of a verbatim transcript in the English and French languages. At the end of the oral proceedings, the Tribunal requested that the Parties submit certain additional materials concerning Egypt's Law No. 43 of 1974 concerning the Investment of Arab and Foreign Funds and the Free Zones.

13. On July 23, 1985, the Parties advised the Centre that Southern Pacific Properties Limited ("SPP"), the parent company of SPP(ME) and also a Hong Kong corporation, had been joined as a claimant in the proceedings subject to the Respondent's reservation of jurisdictional defenses.

14. In response to the request made by the Tribunal at the end of the oral proceedings, SPP and SPP(ME) ("the Claimants") and the Respondent filed supplemental materials concerning Law No. 43 on August 21 and August 27, 1985, respectively.

15. On November 27, 1985, the Tribunal rendered a Decision on Preliminary Objections to Jurisdiction. In this decision, the Tribunal unanimously rejected certain of the Respondent's objections concerning jurisdiction and stayed the proceedings on the Respondent's remaining jurisdictional objections pending final disposition by the French courts of certain concurrent proceedings involving the same dispute. The operative part of the Tribunal's decision provided:

"THE TRIBUNAL UNANIMOUSLY DECIDES:

- A. To reject the objections to its jurisdiction raised by the Respondent alleging that Article 26 of the ICSID Convention, as well as the pursuit by the Claimants of alternative remedies, bar the claim in the present case;
- B. To reject the objection to its jurisdiction raised by the Respondent alleging the withdrawal from the Claimant of the benefits of Law No. 43;
- C. To reject the objection to its jurisdiction raised by the Respondent contending that the provisions of Article 8 of Law No. 43 do not apply to this investment dispute; and
- D. To stay the present proceedings on the Respondent's remaining objections to the Centre's jurisdiction until the proceedings in the French courts have finally resolved the question of whether the Parties agreed to submit their dispute to the jurisdiction of the International Chamber of Commerce."

16. On January 6, 1987, the French Cour de Cassation issued a decision the effect of which was to finally determine that the Respondent had not agreed to submit the present dispute to arbitration under the auspices of the International Chamber of Commerce ("ICC").

17. On January 29, 1987, the Claimants filed a request with the Tribunal asking that the present proceedings be resumed in view of the Cour de Cassation's decision of January 6, 1987.

18. On March 24, 1987, at the request of the Respondent, the Tribunal invited the Parties to file further written pleadings and supporting materials.

19. The Respondent filed its Mémoire, dated April 30, 1987, and requested further hearings on the remaining jurisdictional issues. The Claimants then filed their "Observations on Respondent's Jurisdictional Memorandum," dated May 20, 1987.

20. The Tribunal met in London on May 25-27, 1987. After reviewing the new materials filed by the Parties, and in consideration of its Decision on Preliminary Objections to Jurisdiction of November 27, 1985 and the decision of the French Cour de Cassation of January 6, 1987, the Tribunal unanimously decided to accede to the Respondent's request for further hearings on the question of the Centre's jurisdiction.

21. The final hearings on the question of jurisdiction were held in Paris on September 8, 1987. At the conclusion of the hearings, the Tribunal instructed the Parties to present their final written submissions on the jurisdictional issues, together with an enumeration of the specific arguments relied on to support those submissions, by September 25, 1987.

22. The Claimants' "Final Submission on Jurisdiction" dated September 25, 1987 submitted that the Tribunal should "determine in favor of Claimants the remaining jurisdictional issue, to rule that the Arab Republic of Egypt ("A.R.E.") has consented to ICSID arbitration in conformity with the requirement of Article 25(1) of the ICSID Convention, and to take jurisdiction over the investment dispute between the parties."

23. The Respondent's Mémoire en Réplique dated September 25, 1987 did not contain formal submissions as such, but reiterated certain points made by the Respondent's counsel at the hearing held in Paris on September 8, 1987, and responded to arguments made by counsel for the Claimants at that hearing.

24. The Tribunal conducted its final deliberations on the question of jurisdiction in Washington on December 7-12, 1987. On April 14, 1988, a majority Decision on Preliminary Objections to Jurisdiction was signed. The operative part of the Tribunal's decision provided:

“THE TRIBUNAL DECIDES:

(A) To reject the objection to its jurisdiction raised by the Respondent alleging that Article 8 of Law No. 43 does not suffice to establish Egypt's consent to the Centre's jurisdiction;

(B) To reject the submission of the Claimants that the Tribunal adopt and incorporate as its own the pertinent findings of fact made by the ICC tribunal; and

(C) Consequently, and in accordance with Rules 25 and 41, to instruct the President to fix the time limits for further proceedings on the merits in consultation with the Parties.”

25. On October 5, 1988, the Tribunal fixed December 5, 1988 as the date for the filing of the Claimants' Memorial on the merits. On November 17, 1988, this time limit was extended to January 5, 1989 and on January 4, 1989 it was further extended to February 15, 1989. At the same time, the Tribunal fixed June 25, 1989 as the time limit for the filing of the Respondent's Counter-Memorial. The Centre received the Claimants' Memorial on February 16, 1989.

26. Meanwhile, on November 14, 1988, the Centre received from the Respondent an application for annulment of the Tribunal's Decision on Preliminary Objections to Jurisdiction of April 14, 1988. In a letter dated December 9, 1988, the Acting Secretary-General of ICSID notified the Respondent of his decision not to register the application for annulment on the ground that the Tribunal's decision of April 14, 1988 was not an “award” as that term is used in Article 52 of the Washington Convention and Rule 50 of the Centre's Arbitration Rules.

27. The time limit for filing the Respondent's Counter-Memorial was extended on May 16, 1989 to September 7, 1989, and again on August 31, 1989 to September 15, 1989. The Centre received the Respondent's Counter-Memorial on September 18, 1989.

28. On October 12, 1989, the Tribunal fixed a schedule for the filing of the remainder of the written pleadings, with the Claimants' Reply to be filed by December 5, 1989 and the Respondent's Rejoinder to be filed by February 20, 1990. The Centre received the Claimants' Reply on December 28, 1989 and the Respondent's Counter-Reply on February 22, 1990.

29. On March 14, 1990, the President of the Tribunal held a consultation with representatives of the Parties in order to agree on the date and place for the final hearings on the merits. It was agreed to hold the final hearings in Paris.

30. On April 16, 1990, the President of the Tribunal issued a procedural order fixing September 3–11, 1990 as the dates for the hearings on the merits in Paris and providing further directions to the Parties including, inter alia, directions that they file written summaries of the relief claimed after the hearings. Following agreement by the Parties on certain procedures for the oral proceedings, the Tribunal, on August 23, 1990, issued a procedural order in respect of the conduct of the hearings.

31. The final hearings on the merits were held in Paris during the period September 3–11, 1990. The Tribunal heard testimony by witnesses and experts, as well as oral argument. The witnesses and experts appearing on behalf of the Claimants were: Mr. Ralph M. Grierson, Mr. Gerald Walker, Mr. Norbert Stibrany, Mr. William D. Birchall, Mr. A. Anthony McLellan, Mr. Ronald Blainey and Mr. David H. Gilmour. The witnesses and experts appearing on behalf of the Respondent were Professor Rainer Stadelmann, Mr. Michael Renshall, Ms. Soheir Azab and Professor Abdel Moneim Awadallah. In addition, the Respondent submitted an affidavit by Mr. Atif M. El-Azab.

32. At the close of the hearings, the Tribunal—in response to a request by the Respondent—ruled that the Respondent could submit written comments on the exhibits that had been produced for the first time during the hearings by the Claimants' witnesses and experts. The Tribunal asked that these comments be submitted by October 31, 1990.

33. On September 21, 1990, the Claimants, pursuant to the Tribunal's procedural order of April 16, 1990, submitted a document entitled “Final Conclusions and Prayer for Relief” which summarized the relief sought by the Claimants as follows:

“The Claim

A. The Claimants claim primarily:

(1) the value of the investment in ETDC computed at $41,000,000, or such other sum as the Tribunal may award, on the basis of (i) the DCF methodology and/or (ii) the share sales to the Saudi Princes; and

(2) the amount of the loan to ETDC, amounting to $1,650,000; and

(3) post-cancellation costs for 1978 and 1979, amounting to $623,000; and

(4) post-cancellation, legal, audit and arbitration costs from 1980 to 1990, amounting to $5,108,000;

together with interest:

a. on the value of the investment ((1) herein) at 12.6% compounded annually, amounting (on a value of $41,000,000) to $125,000,000; and

b. on (3) herein at 12.6% compounded annually, amounting to $1,874,000; and

c. on the loan to ETDC ((2) herein) at the contractual rate, amounting to $6,931,000.

B. The Claimants claim secondarily, as an alternative to A above, the value of its investment in ETDC on the basis of its out-of-pocket expenses (items 1-6), on the view that the project would necessarily have realized, at the very least, the amount invested in it, and an additional amount (item 7) to compensate for loss of the chance or opportunity of making a commercial success of the project:

(1) the amount of the loan to ETDC, amounting to $1,650,000; and

(2) further monies lent at no interest to ETDC, amounting to $408,000; and

(3) the capital invested, amounting to $1,310,000; and

(4) development costs pre-cancellation, amounting to $2,254,000; and

(5) post-cancellation costs for 1978 and 1979, amounting to $623,000; and

(6) post-cancellation, legal, audit and arbitration costs from 1980 to 1990, amounting to $5,108,000; and

(7) such additional amount as shall be fixed by the Tribunal to compensate for the loss of the chance or opportunity of making a commercial success of the project;

together with interest:

a. on the loan to ETDC ((1) herein) at the contractual rate, amounting to $6,931,000; and

b. on (3) herein at 12.6%, compounded annually, amounting to $4,303,000; and

c. on (4) herein at 12.6%, compounded annually, amounting to $7,404,000; and

d. on (5) herein at 12.6%, compounded annually, amounting to $1,874,000.

C. The Claimants claim as a further, subsidiary alternative to A and B above the out-of-pocket expenses represented by items B (1)-(6) above, together with interest as set forth in items B a-d above.

Interest on all items has been calculated to 31 August 1990. The Claimants ask that further interest be added to take the computation to the date of award.

Post-Award Interest

The Claimants claim post-award interest at a commercial rate on the final sums awarded, commencing 30 days after the date of the award and running until the date of payment.

The Object of the Award

Claimants claim that any and all amounts recognized by the Tribunal under claims A, B and C above should be awarded:

(i) to SPP (Middle East) Limited and Southern Pacific Properties Limited, jointly; and

(ii) to the extent that the prayer in part (i) herein is not recognized, then to SPP (Middle East) Limited alone; and

(iii) to the extent that the prayers in parts (i) and (ii) herein are not recognized, then to Southern Pacific Properties Limited alone.

Respondent's Counterclaim

Respondent's counterclaim and the relief sought by it should be denied in all respects."

34. The Respondent filed a summary of the relief claimed on September 25, 1990, requesting that the Tribunal decide the case as follows:

"SOUS la réserve expresse de la question de la compétence juridictionnelle (ID2) (1)(1), la R.A.E. demande au Tribunal arbitral qu'il lui plaise dire et juger:

(1) On désigne ci-après:

- le Mémoire en Réponse de la R.A.E. du 15/9/1989,

Facts: I F; Droit: I D

- le Mémoire en Réplique du 20/2/1990,

Facts: II F; Droit: II D

II SUR LE DROIT APPLICABLE AU LITIGE

1) Qu'en désignant expressément, notamment dans le Heads of Agreement, avec différentes lois égyptiennes, la loi 43/74, les parties ont choisi le droit égyptien comme loi applicable à leurs litiges, y compris le droit administratif, et ce conformément à l'article 42.1, 1ère phrase de la Convention de Washington (ID, 12 et s.; IID 32 et s.);

2) Que le droit égyptien incorpore différents principes et normes de droit international, et spécialement la Convention de l'UNESCO du 16 novembre 1972 pour la protection du Patrimoine Mondial, culturel et naturel applicable à l'espèce; qu'en revanche sont inapplicables les deux Traités bilatéraux entre l'Egypte et le Royaume Uni invoqués par SPP et SPP (ME) (ID 21 et s. ; II, D, 40 et s.)

3) Que, de toute manière, la Convention précitée de l'UNESCO s'impose à l'Egypte en tant qu'obligation internationale.

II/ SUR LES DEMANDES DE SPP (ME) ET SPP

A/ SUR L'IRRECEVABILITE DES DEMANDES

1) Que SPP (ME) ne justifie pas que son Projet ait été régulièrement approuvé par le "Board of directors" de l'Autorité Générale des Investissements (G.I.A.) conformément à l'article 1 de la loi 43/74 et aux articles 33 et suivants du Règlement 91/1975 portant application de cette loi (ID 3 et s. ; II D, 16 et s.).

2) Qu'en conséquence, le décret du 4 décembre 1975 du Ministre de l'Economie ne peut pas valoir approbation régulière ni du Projet de SPP (ME), ni de l'incorporation d'E.T.D.C. dans le cadre de la loi 43/75, II D, 28 et s.

3) Que SPP n'a présenté dans ses mémoires écrits aucune demande pour son compte ; que les demandes de paiement à son profit présentées verbalement et subsidiairement au cours des audiences des 3/11 septembre 1990, sont irrecevables comme étant tardives et non conformes aux dispositions du Règlement de Procédure d'arbitrage du CIRDI; qu'au surplus, elles n'ont été assorties d'aucune justification.

4) Qu'en tout état de cause, les demandes de SPP et SPP (ME) sont irrecevables et en tout cas mal fondées en raison des faits de corruption que révèlent les comportements de SPP et SPP (ME) notamment quant aux "développement costs" non imputés à E.T.D.C.; que, subsidiairement, il conviendrait d'ordonner une expertise pour vérifier la réalité de ces coûts, et les destinataires réels des paiements intervenus (II, F 117 et s. ; II D, 110 et s.).

B/ SUR LE MAL FONDE DES DEMANDES de SPP (ME) et SPP

B.1 Principalement

Que la R.A.E. n'a ni nationalisé ni confisqué les droits de SPP (ME) sur un "Projet" au sens de la loi 43/74, art. 7.

a) Qu'il n'y a pas eu de nationalisation à défaut de transfert desdits droits et du Projet au profit de l'Etat ou d'une collectivité publique (I D 36 ; II D 62).

b) Que la mesure de classement et d'expropriation pour cause d'utilité publique du terrain du Plateau était non seulement licite (ce qui n'est pas contesté) mais même obligatoire en raison de la Convention de l'UNESCO de 1972 précitée (I D 92 et s. ; II D 68 et s.)

c) Qu'il n'y a pas eu de "confiscation" des droits des demandeurs sur le Projet; qu'en effet, il n'y a pas eu privation de tels droits, le Projet étant seulement modifié dans l'une des ses modalités d'exécution conformément au droit administratif égyptien ; que, plus précisément,

1) les droits sur RAS EL HEKMA étaient intacts, ce qui n'est pas discuté (I D 111 et s. ; II D 83 et s.) ;

2) le blocage des comptes de E.T.D.C., puis la nomination d'un administrateur judiciaire constituait des mesures provisoires et conservatoires (I D 114; II D) ;

3) Il fut offert notamment lors des négociations de 1979 un terrain de remplacement proche des sites initiaux permettant la réalisation d'un projet analogue à celui qui avait été prévu en particulier dans le Heads of Agreement et le contrat du 12 décembre 1974, offre qui fut refusée sans examen sérieux (pièces F 37, F 43, F 51) (II F 111 et s. ; I D 150 et s. ; II D 87 et s.).

Que si, par extraordinaire, un doute subsistait, le Tribunal ordonnerait soit un transport sur le site, soit une expertise aux fins de vérifier la possibilité de réalisation d'un projet touristique sur ledit site de remplacement (I D 150).

4) La R.A.E. a également offert, au même moment, un dédommagement monétaire pour compenser les conséquences du changement de site (II D 91 et s.).

5) SPP (ME) n'a pas négocié de bonne foi, tant au regard du site de remplacement qu'elle a refusé d'étudier sérieusement, qu'au regard de la compensation monétaire, alors qu'elle présentait des demandes totalement dépourvues de justification, notamment quant aux "development costs" susmentionnés (I D 116 et s. ; II F 117 et s. ; II D 90 et s.).

6) Enfin, les droits de SPP (ME) sur le Projet étaient annulables ou résiliables en raison des causes de nullité du Projet et des fautes commises, précisées dans les Mémoires, (I F 169 et s. ; I D 124 et s. ; II F 101 et s. ; II D 100 et s.) et en particulier :

- de l'illégalité du Décret n 475/75 qui ne comprenait pas de carte en annexe et concernait un terrain déjà classé en partie domaine public, par le décret n 136 de 1955 (I F 129 et s. ; I D 125 et s.).

- de la dérive immobilière ("Housing") du Projet, contraire aux articles 3 et 4 de la loi 43/74 aux contrats et aux études de faisabilité présentées par SPP (I F 139 et s. ; I D 126 et s. ; II F 101 et s. ; II D 104 et s.).

B.2 Très subsidiairement, sur le préjudice

a) que la compensation doit être la "compensation appropriée", tenant compte des circonstances particulières de l'espèce (I D 76 et s. et 140 et s. ; III D 119 et s.).

b) Que parmi ces circonstances particulières figure au premier plan le fait -non contesté- que la R.A.E. ne s'est pas enrichie, et même s'est appauvrie sans autre raison que de protéger le patrimoine culturel mondial et de respecter une obligation internationale.

c) Qu'en tout état de cause, le lucrum cessans est exclu, en raison du caractère licite, et même obligatoire, des mesures (I D 73 et s. et 146 et s. ; II D 126 et s.).

d) Que les transactions exploitées comme références ne sauraient être retenues comme critère valable (II D 140 et s.), notamment à raison de leur caractère spéculatif.

e) Que la méthode D.C.F est inappropriée en raison de l'absence d'avancement suffisant du Projet, de même qu'est impossible toute prise en compte d'une quelconque "profitabilité" surtout pour un Projet aussi peu avancé (I D 156 ; II D 143 et s.).

f) Que l'évaluation des éléments de calcul de la méthode D.C.F sont contestables comme les experts de la R.A.E. l'ont établi (pièces F 50, D 26, D 27, D 28 ; II D 143).

g) Que les autres chefs de préjudice ne sont pas établis (II D 115 et 143).

Que la R.A.E. n'a pas pu vérifier les nombreux volumes de pièces produits par SPP aux audiences des 3/11 septembre 1990 à l'appui de ses demandes ; que si ces pièces tardives devaient être déclarées recevables, une expertise s'avèrerait indispensable pour les vérifier.

g) Que les intérêts moratoires sont soumis au droit égyptien et sont limités, en matière civile y inclus les contrats administratifs, à 4%, à partir du jugement, le montant total ne pouvant dépasser le capital (I D 159 ; II D 145 et s.).

Qu'en tout cas, le retard antérieur à janvier 1986, dû à la procédure C.C.I. engagée à tort par SPP ne saurait être imputé à la R.A.E.

III. SUR LA DEMANDE RECONVENTIONNELLE DE LA R.A.E.

I D 165 ; II D 155)

Dire et juger que SPP, et subsidiairement SPP (ME) sont responsables à l'égard de la R.A.E. de la non réalisation des Projets, et qu'elles devront payer une somme forfaitaire de 30 millions de USD à titre de réparation du préjudice, incluant les frais de procédure.

Qu'en tout état de cause, SPP et SPP (ME) seront condamnées aux entiers dépens et frais de procédure."

35. On November 27, 1990, the Tribunal extended the time limit for the submission of the Respondent's comments on the documents submitted by the Claimants' witnesses during the hearings on the merits to December 5, 1990. These comments, together with certain additional documents, were received by the Centre on December 3, 1990.

36. On December 21, 1990, the Claimants responded to certain points made by the Respondent in its submission of December 3, 1990.

37. On February 11 to 13, 1991, the Tribunal met in London and on February 13 it issued a procedural order requesting further information from the Parties as follows:

"1. Whereas, the Claimants have explained that they have incurred certain expenses in connection with what they describe as the planning, developing, financing and management of the project, adding that said expenses have been capitalized as development costs in the accounts of SPP(ME) before and after the measures taken in May 1978 by the Respondent.

2. Whereas, the Claimants have submitted as Exhibit 170 a letter dated 19 January 1981 from Coopers & Lybrand, with a summary of SPP(ME)'s development costs for the years 1975-1979, broken down by categories of expense.

3. Whereas, the above-referenced letter dated 19 January 1981 from Coopers & Lybrand states that the summary of development costs for each year from 1975 to 1979 "agrees in total by year to the audited accounts of SPP (Middle East) Limited, and is in accordance with the information contained in our audit files, which do not, however, provide a detailed analysis for each period shown in the summary." The letter further describes the audit procedures followed, indicating that a detailed analysis of these costs, prepared by employees of the company with reference to the various categories of expense, was provided to Coopers & Lybrand each year and "agreed by us to the expense accounts in the company's nominal ledger, in which all expenditure was recorded in the first instance." The letter adds that "[t]hose items which were material in relation to the total of these costs in each year were verified by us in order to ensure that the expenditure as recorded in the nominal ledger had been recorded correctly and had been authorised properly." This verification was carried out "by agreeing the selected items to the documentation supporting the expenditure, such as invoices and loan agreements and by performing tests on procedures operated by the company to ensure all payments were properly authorised" and by reviewing "minutes of the meetings of the Board of Directors."

4. Whereas, for its part the Respondent has stated in its Annex F-49 that the investigation of these expenses "sheds doubt over the components of the unjustifiable developing costs which were not charged to ETDC. This investigation requires the appropriate and clear details with their supporting legal documents in relation to the nature and components of these costs." In this connection, the Respondent formally requested that the Tribunal order "une expertise pour vérifier la réalité de ces coûts et les destinataires réels des paiements intervenus."

5. Whereas, the Respondent has submitted as Annex F-72 a report by Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co. dated 14 August 1981, which states that "[i]t is not possible . . . to be satisfied that the costs incurred either up to 18 June 1978, or subsequently, relate to the Pyramids Project" and that "we do not understand why [these costs] were not directly recovered from ETDC."

6. Whereas, the Tribunal did not receive sufficiently clear and precise information and figures concerning the development costs, nor the necessary indications as to the nature and supporting documents of the expenditures involved, to be in a position to determine all of the related legal consequences.

For these reasons, the Tribunal decides the following:

a. The Claimants shall submit to the Tribunal and to the Respondent, within one month, a document indicating the nature, date and amount of the above-referenced development costs, including the names of the recipients of payments in excess of U.S. $20,000 and a confirmation that these sums were legitimately and actually expended for the project and were directly connected with it. The document shall also contain an explanation of why these costs were not charged to or were not directly recovered from ETDC.

b. The Parties, within one month, shall submit to the Tribunal and to each other an itemized list of the legal and accounting fees relating to the present proceedings, indicating their amount, the respective dates and the phase of the proceedings to which those fees and expenses relate.

c. After receipt of the documents referred to in paragraphs a and b above, the Parties shall have one month within which to submit their comments thereon to the Tribunal."

38. On March 15, 1991, the time limit for the Claimants' submission of the information requested by the Tribunal in its procedural order of February 13, 1991 was extended to April 21, 1991. On March 25, 1991, the time limit for the Respondent's submission of the information requested in Paragraph 6(b) of the procedural order was extended to April 21, 1991, and the time limit for its submission of the information requested in Paragraph 6(c) was extended to June 21, 1991.

39. On April 22, 1991, the Centre received the Respondent's response to Paragraph 6(b) of the procedural order and on April 23, 1991 the Centre received the Claimants' response to Paragraphs 6(a) and (b). The Centre received the Respondent's comments on the Claimants' response to the procedural order on June 26, 1991.

40. On July 9, 1991, the Claimants filed a response to the Respondent's comments of June 26, 1991, and on September 18, 1991, the Respondent filed a response to the Claimants' response. Although this final exchange of communications had not been requested by the Tribunal, the materials submitted by the Parties were nevertheless considered by the Tribunal.

41. The Tribunal convened its final deliberation on the merits in Paris on February 17, 1992. On February 18, 1992, the Tribunal issued a procedural order declaring the proceedings closed.

II. THE FACTS

42. On September 23, 1974, a contract entitled "Heads of Agreement" was entered into by the Respondent (represented by the Minister of Tourism), the Egyptian General Organization for Tourism and Hotels ("EGOTH") and SPP, a company engaged in the development of tourist and resort facilities. EGOTH was at the time a public sector enterprise under the control of the Minister of Tourism, organized under Egyptian Law No. 60 of 1971.

43. The Heads of Agreement by its terms was entered into in accordance with certain Egyptian laws, including Law No. 43 of 1974 Concerning the Investment of Arab and Foreign Funds and the Free Zones. In the Heads of Agreement, EGOTH and SPP undertook to incorporate an Egyptian joint venture company to develop tourist complexes at the Pyramids area near Cairo and at Ras El Hekma on the Mediterranean coast. These projects were to be developed according to detailed "master plans" which were to be prepared by SPP and approved by EGOTH. The Ministry of Tourism agreed to secure the title to property and the possession of land necessary for the development of the proposed projects. The Ministry and EGOTH undertook to transfer the right of usufruct for such property to the joint venture company as part of the capital investment. They also undertook to assist in obtaining all necessary local approval for the execution of the projects in accordance with the master plans. SPP, for its part, agreed to obtain the necessary financing for the projects and to provide or arrange for all technical expertise required for the design, construction, management and marketing of the projects.

44. The Preamble of the Heads of Agreement, which was expressly made part of the Agreement by Article 1, provided:

"Whereas the Ministry of Tourism approved granting both 2nd and 3rd party [i.e., EGOH and SPP] the right to develop the areas as shown in the attached maps in the Pyramid's area and Ras El Hekma Zone.

This agreement is issued in accordance with laws No. 1 for the year 1973 relating to Hotels, Instalations and Tourism, and law No. 2 for the year 1973 relating to the supervision by the Ministry of Tourism on touristic sites and the development of such areas, and law 43 for the year 1974 relating to Arab and foreign funds invested in the A.R.E. with particular reference to government guarantees long term tax holidays, exemptions from import custom duties, etc."

45. Article 2 of the Heads of Agreement provided:

"Both 2nd and 3rd parties undertake to incorporate promptly an Egyptian joint venture company of which 40 percent would be subscribed by E.G.O.T.H. and 60 percent by S.P.P. (For the Pyramid area) and 30 percent by E.G.O.T.H. and 70 percent by S.P.P. (For Ras El Hekma)."

and Article 4 provided:

"FIRST party will secure the title of property and possession of land and both First and second party undertake to transfer the right of usufruct to the joint company as its part of the capital investment. Both M.T. [i.e., Ministry of Tourism] and E.G.O.T.H. undertake to transfer such right to the joint company immediately upon incorporation, any balance being transferred not later than 90 days thereafter."

46. On December 12, 1974, a contract entitled "Agreement for the Development of Two International Tourist Projects in Egypt" ("the December Agreement") was concluded between EGOH and SPP. The Preamble of the December Agreement referred to the Heads of Agreement, saying that:

"Following execution of the Heads of Agreement dated 23rd September, 1974, . . . and subsequent negotiations between the above parties, the following are agreed . . ."

Article 1 of the December Agreement provided for the formation of a joint venture company—the Egyptian Tourist Development Company ("ETDC")—to develop tourist complexes at the Pyramids and Ras El Hekma sites:

"A joint venture (stock) company with registered shares will be incorporated in Egypt for a duration of fifty years renewable, named the "Egyptian Tourist Development Company" (hereinafter referred to as "ETDC") which shall be responsible for the development and operation of the projects. The nominal capital shall be US$2,000,000 (two million United States dollars) increasing to US$10,000,000 (ten million United States dollars) at the end of the fifth year. The capital shall be subscribed 60 (sixty) per cent by SPP and 40 (forty) per cent by EGOH. On the fiftieth anniversary of the incorporation of ETDC, EGOH shall be entitled to an additional share at no cost in the capital of ETDC as will increase the EGOH shareholding to 50 (fifty) per cent of the total capital of the company. The participation of EGOH in the capital of ETDC shall be represented by the rights of usufruct referred to in Articles 5 and 6 hereinafter. These rights are hereby agreed to be equal to the share of EGOH in the capital of ETDC namely 40 (forty) per cent at the incorporation of ETDC and through its duration and 50 (fifty) per cent beginning at the fiftieth anniversary of its incorporation."

47. SPP agreed in Article 3 of the December Agreement to arrange for the financing of the projects:

"SPP will be responsible for the arranging of US$20,000,000 (twenty million United States dollars) finance on terms and conditions prevailing on the international market to be invested in the projects in the first four years from the date of approval of the Master Plans as referred to in Article 4 hereinafter, and will ensure over and above that all necessary additional finance required for both projects shall be provided by means of short and long term capital, both in free and local currency."

48. Article 4 provided that the development and management of the projects would be undertaken by ETDC

"within the general limits described in the maps attached to the Heads of Agreement, and in general accord with the Confidential Report, and as detailed in the Master Plans to be prepared. Each Master Plan shall recognise the appropriate regional plan and shall specify the various zones for the different types of development and shall include the location and description as well as the stages and priorities of all tourist facilities . . . For the Pyramids area there will be defined within the Master Plan area, the project site area of not less than 10,000 (ten thousand) feddans (approximately 10,000 acres) to which EGOH will receive title and ETDC the right of usufruct as provided in Articles 5 and 6 hereinafter and within which 5,000 (five thousand) feddans (approximately 5,000 acres) will be developed. The remainder will be parkland and other recreational facilities available for public use within the Master Plan."

49. With respect to the rights of usufruct that were to represent EGOH's capital contribution to the joint venture, Article 5 of the December Agreement stipulated that EGOH would "use its best efforts to secure all the necessary Government approvals to enable ETDC the immediate possession of the land in both sites, and to ensure the transfer of the rights of usufruct to ETDC for its duration . . ."

and Article 6 provided:

"EGOH will pass irrevocably the right of usufruct to ETDC for its duration immediately EGOH receives title. ETDC shall be free to assign its right of usufruct and to rent, lease, manage, promote or assign any site, construction, recreational, residential or commercial facilities in both local and foreign markets, provided that they are developed and utilized in accordance with approved plans, but excluding the monument areas and those which are designated for public use within the project sites."

50. The December Agreement also provided in Article 17 that SPP would incorporate a holding company to own its shareholding in the joint venture:

"It is understood that SPP will be incorporating a holding company to own its shareholding in ETDC and it is agreed that SPP shall have the right to assign its rights, privileges, duties and obligations under this Agreement to this company in which SPP will have a controlling, but not necessarily majority, interest and in which it controls and directs management, provided the company satisfies EGOTH."

Such an assignment was subsequently made to SPP(ME), a wholly-owned subsidiary of SPP formed in 1974 to undertake the execution of the projects at the Pyramids and Ras El Hekma sites.

51. Article 20 of the December Agreement provided that any dispute relating to that agreement would be submitted to ICC arbitration, and Article 21 stated that the December Agreement had been made in accordance with various laws of the ARE, including Law No. 43 of 1974.

52. On the final page of the December Agreement, following the signatures of the representatives of EGOTH and SPP, there appeared the typewritten statement, "Approved, agreed and ratified by the Minister of Tourism, His Excellency, Mr. Ibrahim Naguib, on the Twelfth day of December 1974." Next to this statement the signature of the Minister and an official stamp were affixed.

53. On the same date that the December Agreement was signed, the representatives of EGOTH and SPP also signed a "statement" which provided:

"It is understood between contracting parties (EGOTH) and (S.P.P.) in concern of the agreement signed on the 12th of December 1974, that obligations which lie on EGOTH are subject to the approval of the competent governmental authorities and that the feasibility study proves the profitability of the projects."

54. By a letter dated April 12, 1975, the General Organization for Investment of Arab Capital and Tax-Free Areas ("the GIA") notified SPP that the GIA's Board of Directors, by Decree No. 30/16-75, had approved the application for the establishment of a joint venture between EGOTH and SPP for the development of the tourist areas at the Pyramids and Ras El Hekma sites. The approval provided that the beneficial rights would accrue to the joint venture for a period of 50 years and then would revert to the State. This period was subsequently extended by the GIA to 99 years.

55. On May 22, 1975, the President of Egypt issued Decree No. 475 of 1975 which provided:

"The lands lying on each of the plateau of the pyramids and Ras-El-Hekma and whose features and dimensions are determined on the map and in the attached memorandum are assigned for the touristic utilization and the General Egyptian establishment for Tourism and Hotels itself or through one of its contributing companies will reconstruct and utilize these two areas."

56. On October 19, 1975, EGOTH as sole owner of the sites specified in Presidential Decree No. 475 transferred its right of usufruct for the sites "irrevocably" and "without restriction of any kind" to ETDC for the life of the joint venture.

57. On November 23, 1975, EGOTH and SPP(ME) signed a contract entitled "Preliminary Agreement of Incorporation" which provided for the incorporation of ETDC in conformity with Law No. 1 of 1973 Concerning Tourist Establishments and Law No. 43 of 1974. The incorporation of ETDC was subsequently authorized by Ministerial Decree No. 212 of 1975, issued by the Ministry of Economy and Economic Cooperation on December 4, 1975. This decree stated in its preamble that it was issued in conformity with inter alia "the [GIA] Board of Directors' Resolution No. 50/15/1975 at the session of 20th July, 1975; and the memorandum of the Deputy Chairman of the General Authority for Arab Investment dated 1st December, 1975."

58. By a letter dated April 1, 1976, the Chairman of EGOTH notified the Chairman of ETDC of the "formal approval of the MT [Ministry of Tourism] and EGOTH of the Pyramids Oasis Project as a whole . . . ."

59. On October 19, 1976, the Minister of Tourism wrote to the Chairman of ETDC, stating:

"I am writing to confirm my formal approval of the development and construction of your project pursuant to all terms of Law No. 2 of 1973.

This approval entitles you to proceed with your programme without the necessity of further reference to this Ministry."

60. On June 1, 1977, the Ministry of Tourism issued Decree No. 96 of 1977. Article 1 of this decree provided:

"The Ministry of Tourism approves the master planning for the tourist Pyramids Plateau Area, as well as the detailed planning of the first phase regarding the implementation of villages nos 1, 3 and 21 of the project of exploiting the tourist Giza Pyramids Plateau . . . ."

61. Construction began at the Pyramids site in July of 1977. Roads were laid, water and sewage trunk mains were installed, excavation for artificial lakes and a golf course was undertaken, and work on the main water reservoir was nearly completed. Planning was completed for the Pyramids Oasis George V Hotel, as were the designs for a second hotel. In addition, ETDC sold 386 lots on which villas and multi-family accommodations were to be built, for a total of US $10,211,000.

62. In late 1977, the Pyramids Oasis Project began to encounter political opposition in Egypt and it became the subject of a parliamentary inquiry. Opponents of the project claimed that it posed a threat to undiscovered antiquities.

63. In a decree issued on May 27, 1978, the Ministry of Information and Culture declared the land surrounding the Pyramids to be "public property (Antiquity)." This decree was issued upon the recommendation of the Egyptian Antiquities Authority, which confirmed the presence of antiquities in the western part of the Al Giza Pyramids region.

64. On May 28, 1978, the GIA withdrew its approval of the Pyramids Oasis Project by Resolution No. 1/51-78:

"As a result of the Decree of the Minister of Culture and Information dated 28/5/78, considering the Pyramids Plateau one of the monumental areas, and accordingly the nature of the land had changed to be a public domain owned by the State as public property, it is impossible legally to implement this project on this land.

The Board of Directors of the General Investment Authority decided to drop its former issued agreement No 50/19-75, dated 20th July 1975, concerning the Pyramids Plateau, for the impossibility of executing this project on the Plateau, thus, according to the decree of the Minister of Culture and Information."

65. On June 19, 1978, Presidential Decree No. 267 was issued, cancelling Presidential Decree No. 475, which had declared that the lands on the Pyramids Plateau would be used for "tourist utilization." On July 11, 1978, the Prime Minister issued a decree declaring these same lands d'utilité publique.

66. At the request of EGOH, ETDC was put under judicial trusteeship by a judgment of the Giza Court for Urgent Matters rendered on June 19, 1978. The court appointed trustees who were put in charge of the management of the company's assets until a general meeting of the shareholders could take place.

67. On December 7, 1978, SPP and SPP(ME) filed a request for arbitration with the ICC in Paris against the Respondent and EGOH under the arbitration clause in the December Agreement. The Respondent objected to the jurisdiction of the ICC tribunal. In the acte de mission, the Respondent and EGOH stated:

"The FIRST and SECOND DEFENDANTS wish to make it clear that their submission of an ANSWER and COUNTER-CLAIM does not constitute in any way an acceptance of the initiation of this arbitration proceedings. Their refusal of the arbitration proceedings is to remain firm until the Arbitrators render their final decision on the matter of jurisdiction. In case the Arbitrators affirm their jurisdiction over the subject matter at issue, the COUNTER-CLAIM shall be comprised within the said jurisdiction."

68. The ICC tribunal, in an award rendered on February 16, 1983, held inter alia:

"1. That the first Defendant, the Arab Republic of Egypt, pay to the First Claimant, Southern Pacific Properties (Middle East), Limited the sum of US$12,500,000 (twelve million five hundred thousand) together with interest thereof at the rate of 5% per annum from the date in which the request for arbitration was received by the Secretary of the ICC Court of Arbitration (i.e. 1st December 1978) until payment.

2. That the claim by both Claimants against the second Defendant, the Egyptian General Company for Tourism and Hotels, be dismissed.

3. That the counterclaim by the said second Defendant against the Claimants be dismissed."

In dismissing the claim against EGOH, the ICC tribunal added:

"Different considerations might well apply if the Government had not been a party to the December, 1974 Agreement."

69. On March 28, 1983, the Respondent appealed the ICC award to the French Cour d'Appel.

70. By a letter dated August 15, 1983, SPP(ME) notified the Minister of Tourism that in its view the ICC award "is binding between the parties and finally dispositive of our dispute." At the same time, SPP(ME) added that:

"recognizing that your Government has taken the position that the ICC award was rendered without a jurisdictional basis, we hereby notify you that we accept and reserve the opportunity of availing ourselves of the uncontested jurisdiction of the International Center for the Settlement of Investment Disputes, under the auspices of the World Bank, which is open to us as a result of Law no 43 of 1974, Article 8 of which provides that investment disputes may be settled by ICSID arbitration."

71. On July 12, 1984, prior to the institution of the present proceedings, the Cour d'Appel annulled the ICC award on the ground that the Respondent was not a party to the December Agreement and therefore was not bound by the arbitration clause contained therein.

72. On November 28, 1984, the Claimants referred the decision of the Cour d'Appel to the Cour de Cassation (Pourvoi N° 84/17/274), requesting that the decision be set aside. This request was rejected by the Cour de Cassation on January 6, 1987.

III. THE ISSUES REMAINING TO BE DECIDED

73. As recalled in Section I of this Award, the Tribunal disposed of the jurisdictional issues in two decisions, one issued on November 27, 1985 and the other on April 14, 1988. There remain to be decided a number of issues concerning the substantive merits of the case.

The Applicable Law

74. In addressing the remaining issues, it is appropriate to begin with the question of the law that is to be applied to the Parties' dispute. Article 42(1) of the Washington Convention provides that:

"The Tribunal shall decide a dispute in accordance with such rules of law as may be agreed by the parties. In the absence of such agreement, the Tribunal shall apply the law of the Contracting State party to the dispute (including its rules on the conflict of laws) and such rules of international law as may be applicable."

75. The Respondent contends that the Parties have implicitly agreed, in accordance with the first sentence of Article 42(1), to apply Egyptian law. It points out that the Parties' agreement with respect to the choice of law need not be express, and argues that in this case the choice of Egyptian law results from the preamble of the Heads of Agreement, which refers to Egyptian Laws No. 1 and No. 2 of 1973 and Law No. 43 of 1974. Pointing out that Law No. 43 provides that "[m]atters not covered by this Law are subject to the applicable laws and regulations," the Respondent argues that, according to this provision, "aucun autre droit que le droit égyptien n'a été choisi par les parties" and "toute lacune doit être comblée par l'application du droit commun égyptien applicable."

76. According to the Respondent, the second sentence of Article 42(1) is not applicable because it operates only "[i]n the absence of such agreement . . ." Thus, the Respondent argues, the role of international law is a limited one: it cannot be applied directly, but only indirectly through those rules and principles incorporated in Egyptian law such as the provisions of treaties ratified by the ARE and, in particular, the 1972 UNESCO Convention for the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage.

77. The Claimants, for their part, reject the notion that the Parties should be deemed to have agreed implicitly to the exclusive application of Egyptian law. In the Claimants' view, it is not the first sentence but the second sentence of Article 42(1) which becomes operative, so that the Tribunal should apply the "law of the Contracting State party . . . and such rules of international law as may be applicable." The Claimants acknowledge that their investment in Egypt was governed primarily by Law No. 43 of 1974, but they contend that the provisions of Law No. 43 do not cover every aspect of the dispute and that there is no agreement between the Parties on the rules of law to be applied by the Tribunal. In the absence of agreement, the Claimants argue, the second sentence of Article 42 (1) must apply.

78. In the Tribunal's view, the Parties' disagreement as to the manner in which Article 42 is to be applied has very little, if any, practical significance. Both Parties agree that Law No. 43 is applicable to their dispute. Nor is there any question that the UNESCO Convention is relevant: the Claimants themselves acknowledged during the proceedings before the French Cour d'Appel that the Convention obligated the Respondent to abstain from acts or contracts contrary to the Convention, stating:

"que les Etats étaient susceptibles d'engager leur responsabilité internationale envers les autres Etats signataires en persistant dans des actes ou contrats devenus contraires aux règles de la Convention."

79. Moreover, a consultation filed by the Respondent states:

"que si on applique l' Article 42, al. ler., 2ème phrase, le résultat est le même, les mêmes sources du droit régissant les mêmes rapports."

80. Finally, even accepting the Respondent's view that the Parties have implicitly agreed to apply Egyptian law, such an agreement cannot entirely exclude the direct applicability of international law in certain situations. The law of the ARE, like all municipal legal systems, is not complete or exhaustive, and where a lacunae occurs it cannot be said that there is agreement as to the application of a rule of law which, ex hypothesi, does not exist. In such case, it must be said that there is "absence of agreement" and, consequently, the second sentence of Article 42(1) would come into play.

81. The Respondent has contended that certain acts of Egyptian officials upon which the Claimants rely are, under Egyptian law, legally non-existent or absolutely null and void. Specifically, the Respondent has assailed the validity of Presidential Decree No. 475 of 1975 because, inter alia, certain areas covered by the decree overlapped land which had been designated "public utilities (antiquities)" by an arrêté of the Minister of Education issued in 1955. The Respondent argues that the quality of public domain is dominant and gives its character and nature to the whole area. The Respondent contends that because the public domain is inalienable and because the establishment of a usufruct constitutes an act of alienation, it follows that such an act would be absolutely null and void. The Respondent argues further that certain decisions of high-ranking government officials are invalid because they were not taken pursuant to the procedures prescribed by Egyptian law.

82. It is possible that under Egyptian law certain acts of Egyptian officials, including even Presidential Decree No. 475, may be considered legally nonexistent or null and void or susceptible to invalidation. However, these acts were cloaked with the mantle of Governmental authority and communicated as such to foreign investors who relied on them in making their investments.

83. Whether legal under Egyptian law or not, the acts in question were the acts of Egyptian authorities, including the highest executive authority of the Government. These acts, which are now alleged to have been in violation of the Egyptian municipal legal system, created expectations protected by established principles of international law. A determination that these acts are null and void under municipal law would not resolve the ultimate question of liability for damages suffered by the victim who relied on the acts. If the municipal law does not provide a remedy, the denial of any remedy whatsoever cannot be the final answer.

84. When municipal law contains a lacunae, or international law is violated by the exclusive application of municipal law, the Tribunal is bound in accordance with Article 42 of the Washington Convention to apply directly the relevant principles and rules of international law. As explained by one of the authors of the Washington Convention, such a process

"will not involve the confirmation or denial of the validity of the host State's law, but may result in not applying it where that law, or action taken under that law, violates international law." (A. Broches, "The Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes Between States and Nationals of Other States," Recueil des Cours, vol. 136, at p. 342 (1972).)

85. The principle of international law which the Tribunal is bound to apply is that which establishes the international responsibility of States when unauthorized or ultra vires acts of officials have been performed by State agents under cover of their official character. If such unauthorized or ultra vires acts could not be ascribed to the State, all State responsibility would be rendered illusory. For this reason,

"... the practice of states has conclusively established the international responsibility for unlawful acts of state organs, even if accomplished outside the limits of their competence and contrary to domestic law." (Sorensen (ed.), Manual of Public International Law, New York, 1968, at p. 548.)

The Change of Site

86. The Respondent, in its Counter-Memorial and in the oral proceedings, has dealt extensively with what it describes as a "new fact" to which it attaches great importance, namely, that the project sites shown on the maps attached to the Heads of Agreement and the "Confidential Report" referred to in the December Agreement were for the most part outside and below the Pyramids Plateau and thus were different than the site where the project was finally implemented. The Respondent points out that four sites were delineated on the map that was signed by the Minister of Tourism and SPP and attached to the Heads of Agreement. Two of these sites were completely outside the Pyramids Plateau area; a third site—the second largest—was on the southwestern side of the Plateau and was nearer to the Sixth of October City than to the Plateau center; and the fourth site, which was quite small, was on the edge of the Plateau proper. The Respondent further points out that the Heads of Agreement recited that:

"the Ministry of Tourism approved granting both 2nd and 3rd party the right to develop the areas as shown in the attached maps . . ."

and then provided:

"Each complex will be developed according to a detailed Master Plan prepared and submitted by S.P.P. and approved by E.G.O.T.H. in accordance with and shown in the attached maps."

Consequently, the Respondent contends, the project with respect to which the Claimants seek compensation is not the project that the Respondent agreed to in the Heads of Agreement. According to the Respondent,

"A quick glance at the real map attached as "Annex A" to the "Heads of Agreement", and by reference to which the obligations of the Ministry of Tourism regarding the securing of title to the land and the establishment of a right of usufruct, shows that it contains not one compact site on top of the Pyramids Plateau, the limits of which are clearly delineated on the map itself, but in fact four sites . . . It is clear that the sites indicated in the "Heads of Agreement" concluded with the M.T. [Ministry of Tourism] are quite different, in fact have very little in common, with the single site to which the Claimants climbed with their project on top of the Pyramids Plateau."

87. The Respondent adds that the same pattern of several separate sites, situated for the most part outside of the Plateau area, more or less repeats itself in the map attached to the "Confidential Report" referred to in the December Agreement. In contrast, the Respondent points out, the site shown on the map attached to the "Preliminary Agreement of Incorporation" of ETDC, signed by EGOH and SPP on November 23, 1975, sits all in one piece on top of the Plateau. The Respondent alleges that from the start the Claimants had been pressing for, and contriving to get, a single site on top of the Plateau, while the Egyptian authorities were adamant that the project should be implemented on several sites surrounding the Plateau.

88. The Respondent argues that this alteration of the agreed location of the project violated the Heads of Agreement and encroached upon an area protected by both Egyptian law and international law. According to the Respondent, the violation of the Heads of Agreement in respect of the sites was part of a larger design to transform the project into a "housing and urban development project" and entailed the violation of other imperative laws of the ARE concerning the protection of antiquities, urban development and the right of foreigners to own land in Egypt.

89. The Claimants, for their part, recognize that the map attached to the Heads of Agreement indicated four sites identified as "General Development Areas," none of which corresponds to the eventual project site (although the eventual site overlapped in small part two of the sites shown on the map). The Claimants assert, however, that the project site ultimately settled upon was agreed to and repeatedly endorsed by the Respondent. They contend that the evidence shows that Egyptian authorities suggested the Plateau site in the first place; that the Parties then proceeded to discuss and define the site together; and that by January of 1975 (at the latest) the Respondent had established—and all Parties had agreed to—the final site and that details of the site were approved in numerous decrees and other official documents. As evidence of these contentions, the Claimants call attention to a report of April 1975 on infrastructure availability at the Pyramids site which was commissioned by SPP and which refers to extensive and recorded consultations concerning the final site with numerous Egyptian Government organizations and contains several maps outlining the Plateau site.

90. The Claimants maintain that the map mentioned in the Heads of Agreement only indicated a number of possible development areas and that the precise location of the project was under discussion both prior to and after the signing of the Heads of Agreement. In this connection, the Claimants point to Article 4 of the December Agreement, which provided:

"ETDC will undertake the development and management of both projects within the general limits described in the maps attached to the Heads of Agreement, and in general accord with the Confidential Report, and as detailed in the Master Plans to be prepared. Each Master Plan shall recognize the appropriate regional plan and shall specify the various zones for different types of development and shall include the location and description as well as the stages and priorities of all tourist facilities.

For the Pyramids area there will be defined within the Master Plan area, the project site area of not less than 10,000 (ten thousand) feddans (approximately 10,000 acres) to which EGOH will receive title and ETDC the right of usufruct as provided in Articles 5 and 6 hereinafter and within which 5,000 (five thousand) feddans (approximately 5,000 acres) will be developed. The remainder will be parkland and other recreational facilities available for public use within the Master Plan."

91. The Claimants point out that the December Agreement was "[a]pproved, agreed and ratified" by the Minister of Tourism, and that knowledge of its contents—and particularly Article 4—must therefore be imputed to the Ministry. Article 4, according to the Claimants, makes clear that none of the parties to the Heads of Agreement—the Ministry of Tourism, EGOH or SPP—considered the project site to have been finally determined by the Heads of Agreement or the maps annexed thereto.

92. In response, the Respondent argues that the words "as detailed in the Master Plan to be prepared" in Article 4 of the December Agreement meant no more than that the master plan was to give the details of the project within the general limits described in the maps attached to the Heads of Agreement and the Confidential Report, and was not intended to derogate from those limits. The Respondent also contends that the change of site occurred without the knowledge of the President of Egypt, who had authorized the project on the basis of the original maps.

93. From the evidence, it is not clear precisely when the decision was made to locate the project on the Pyramids Plateau or whether the decision was taken at the initiative of the Claimants or of the Respondent. Resolution of these questions is not necessary to a decision in this case, however. Several documents in the record demonstrate conclusively that, even if the change of site was initiated by the Claimants, Egyptian authorities at the highest levels knew of and agreed to the final selection of the site on the Pyramids Plateau.

94. The most conclusive of these documents is Presidential Decree No. 475 of May 22, 1975. This decree was preceded by a draft decree submitted by the Minister of Tourism on March 30, 1975, together with a memorandum which referred to "two touristic zones on the Plateau of the Pyramids and at Ras El Hekma." On this basis, Presidential Decree No. 475 provided in Article 1 that:

"The lands lying on each of the plateau of the pyramids and Ras-El-Hekma and whose features and dimensions are determined on the map and in the attached memorandum are assigned for the touristic utilization and the General Egyptian establishment for Tourism and Hotels itself or through one of its contributing companies will reconstruct and utilize these two areas." (Emphasis added.)

Unfortunately, the map referred to in Presidential Decree No. 475 was not placed in evidence by either Party. Nevertheless, the record establishes unambiguously that, in implementing Decree No. 475, the Egyptian Government—acting through and represented by a number of different agencies—authorized the location of the project site on the Plateau.

95. In its Counter-Reply, the Respondent alleges that certain administrative requirements were not observed with respect to the map referred to in Presidential Decree No. 475:

"the map of the Pyramids site which was said to accompany the Presidential Decree no. 475 for the year 1975 allocating the Pyramids land to EGOH was never published in the official Gazette as the law requires . . . Nor did these maps accompany the demand submitted for the registration of the Republic Decree with the Real Estate Registration Department—as law requires—on which ETDC ultimately bases its legal right of usufruct of the land . . ."

But even if such publication and registration was required by Egyptian law, it was the responsibility of the Respondent and not of the Claimants. Moreover, these alleged defects in the administrative registration of the site do not alter the fact that Presidential Decree No. 475 referred expressly to "[t]he lands lying on . . . the plateau of the pyramids."

96. Nor can the Tribunal overlook the fact that, subsequent to the promulgation of Presidential Decree No. 475, the Egyptian authorities repeatedly approved the location of the project on the Plateau. This approval took various forms. For example, the Minister of Tourism signed the contract of November 23, 1975, between EGOH and SPP(ME), incorporating ETDC. This contract referred to maps annexed to it which located the project on the Plateau. The incorporation of ETDC as provided for in this contract was subsequently authorized by the Ministry of Economy and Economic Cooperation in Decree No. 212 of 1975.

97. In February of 1976, four separate Governmental committees—the EGOH Committee, the Pyramids Plateau Committee, the Egyptian Tourist Development Committee and the Committee for Giza Survey Department—participated in the physical demarcation of the initial 4,000 feddan portion of the 10,000 feddan site on the Plateau.

98. Finally, and most importantly, the final master plan required by the Heads of Agreement—after being submitted to and commented upon by various Governmental agencies—placed the project on the Plateau. This definitive master plan was formally approved by both EGOH and the Ministry of Tourism, the two Governmental parties to the Heads of Agreement.

99. In this connection, it should be noted that, even if the parties to the Heads of Agreement had intended when they signed the Heads of Agreement on September 23, 1974 that the project be located on the sites shown on the annexed map, those parties were certainly free to agree to a different site at some subsequent time; and it is clear that on April 1, 1976, when the Ministry of Tourism approved the master plan, all of the parties to the Heads of Agreement were in agreement that the project would be located on the Pyramids Plateau and not in the areas shown on the map annexed to the Heads of Agreement.

The Nature of the Project

100. The Respondent, in its Counter-Memorial and in the oral proceedings, has argued that in reality the project was not a tourist destination project but rather an urban land and housing development project, and thus was in violation of Article 4 of Law No. 43, which provides:

"Housing projects, constructed for the purpose of investment, may be undertaken only by Arab capital; foreign capital may not undertake housing projects even in participation with Egyptian capital."

The Respondent points out that Article 3(iii) of the same law defines "projects for housing and for urban development" as:

"investment in the division of land into parcels and the construction of new buildings together with the public utilities connected therewith."

The Respondent contends that this is precisely what the Claimants did in implementing the Pyramids Oasis Project: their purpose, as revealed in internal memoranda, was to remedy "the acute shortage of quality accommodation" in Cairo and profit from "the demand for recreational and second home accommodation," providing Cairo with "its first, recreational oriented suburb." The Respondent alleges that the Claimants' prime objective was to sell vacant building lots to Egyptians for Egyptian currency in order to obtain cash for their investment. It was asserted in this respect that the Claimants did not have the right to rent or sell vacant lots.

101. The Respondent further argues that the project was "a real estate operation involving the division of land" and was therefore subject to Law No. 52 of 1940 Concerning the Division of Land for the Purpose of Building. The Respondent points out that Article 1 of Law No. 52 defines "division" as:

"every parcelling of a piece of land to a number of pieces with the purpose of offering them for sale, barter, lease or "hekr" in order to construct building on them if one of these pieces is not connected with an existing road.”

and that Article 9 requires that:

“Approval of the division shall be established by a Decree published in the Official Gazette. The publication of the Decree entails the annexation of public roads, squares, gardens and parks to the State’s public property.”

Finally, the Respondent points to Article 10 of Law No. 52, which provides:

“Shall be forbidden the sale of the divided land, its lease or its “takhir” before the issued of Decree referred to in the previous article and before the deposit in the mortgage office of a certified copy of that decree as well as of the list of conditions referred to in Article 7.

Shall also be forbidden the construction of buildings or the execution of work on the divided land before the issuance of the said Decree.”

102. The Respondent contends that the violation of an imperative law such as Law No. 43 of 1974 or Law No. 52 of 1940 renders the violating act null and void and the whole project annulable.

103. The Claimants, on the other hand, maintain that the sale of villa lots by ETDC was an integral part of the tourist destination concept and was fundamental to the proposals that SPP made to the Egyptian Government, since the lot sales were what made the project largely self-financing. The Claimants allege that representatives of the Government were fully advised of the concept and approved it. They also point out that lot sales had been used to finance SPP’s project in Fiji, which the Respondent’s representatives visited and studied prior to approving the Pyramids Oasis Project. In this connection, the Claimants recall that the Heads of Agreement referred to the plan to develop “interlinked residential and tourist destination complexes” and provided that the joint company “will be free to rent, lease, manage or assign any site . . . in both local and foreign markets . . .”, and that the December Agreement provided that “ETDC shall be free to assign its right of usufruct and to rent, lease, manage, promote or assign any site . . . in both local and foreign markets.”

104. The Claimants also draw attention to the November 23, 1975 joint venture contract—the “Preliminary Agreement of Incorporation”—between SPP(ME) and EGOH, which provided that ETDC

and Article 7 of the resolution of the Board of EGOH transferring the right of usufruct to ETDC, which stated:

“ETDC will have full authority and power . . . to transfer sell or lease the right of usufruct of any part of the sites to be developed to a third party without any restriction . . . .”

105. With respect to Law No. 52 of 1940, the Claimants allege that the Egyptian Government assured ETDC that this law was not applicable. In support of this allegation, the Claimants have submitted a letter dated February 9, 1977, from the GIA to ETDC’s attorney, which stated:

“We would like to inform you that said company is not subject to Law 52/1940, concerning the subdivision of lands to be developed, whereas said subdivisions are out of the boundaries of cities and villages included among the resolution of Minister of Housing, but said subdivisions are governed by Law 2/1973, regarding tourist establishments.”

106. In the opinion of the Tribunal, the sale to Cairo residents of villa sites where dwellings for permanent use might subsequently be erected did not detract from or conflict with the “interlinked residential and tourist destination” concept. An integrated tourist complex, which included hotels, apartments and villas as well as recreational facilities, would not lose its tourist nature or become a forbidden housing development simply because Cairo residents might purchase lots for weekend or second home accommodation or even for permanent residence. Indeed, the potential market of buyers described in the master plan approved by the Egyptian authorities included:

“3. The retirement market for foreign and domestic investors.

4. The foreign and domestic residential market including first and second homes (week-end villas, etc.)”

107. The Tribunal also heard uncontroverted testimony that in other resort areas local purchasers are attracted by the potential returns that can be earned from letting their furnished villas to tourists.

108. Moreover, a number of features which further the objective of tourist development differentiated this project from most housing development projects. For example, all purchasers of lots in the Pyramids Oasis Project were obliged to build villas within a limited period in order to contribute to the establishment of tourist facilities. The contract of sale for each lot contained a declaration to the effect

“that the Development covered by the sub-division plan is being developed as an integrated tourist and residential complex and that the covenants, conditions and restrictions herein contained are part of a common plan to benefit each and every lot in the Development.”

Among the “covenants, conditions and restrictions” referred to were obligations to build within a prescribed period of time, to refrain from subdivision of the lot or the erection of temporary buildings, to obtain approval of the seller for any building works, to erect only one private house, to observe the building height prescribed for the particular lot and to refrain from conducting any business or trade on the lot. Some of these restrictions were enacted by decree of the Ministry of Tourism.

109. The evidence also shows that the Ministry of Tourism and other Egyptian authorities such as the GIA not only knew, but agreed, that the financing of the project's infra-structure was to be obtained in large part through the sale of vacant lots. The application to the GIA for the incorporation of ETDC specified that the financing of the project would come from "the sale and rent of the utilisations' right in respect of sites" and that "the profits accruing from the project comes through the utilisation of villa sites." Details of the plan to sell building sites were set forth in three separate reports submitted to the GIA prior to its approval of the project and in the master plan approved by the Minister of Tourism.

110. Various agencies and instrumentalities of the Egyptian Government, including the Giza Committee, the Ministry of Housing and Reconstruction, the Ministry of Tourism, EGOH and the GIA, approved or participated in the project with full knowledge that it would be largely financed by the sale of building sites. There is nothing in the record which indicates that any of these agencies or instrumentalities ever questioned the legality of the lot sales. Unless one assumes that these agencies and instrumentalities knowingly acted in disregard of Egyptian law, it is apparent that none of them considered the lot sales to be illegal or to render the project a "housing" project for purposes of Egyptian law.

111. Finally, the Tribunal notes that two reports prepared by the Respondent's financial experts and placed in evidence by the Respondent appear to acknowledge that the project was in fact a tourist project. The first of these reports, prepared by Peat Marwick McLintock, stated:

"It seems clear that the first stated object of ETDC was to develop international tourism within Egypt. We are not lawyers, but our interpretation as accountants of Article 3 as a whole is that other activities specified were either to facilitate this main aim or were ancillary to it. The stated objectives do not appear to rule out the division and sale of land (see Article 3-6'. . . the sale buying and leasing of property of all kinds within the Arab Republic of Egypt.) provided that any such activity serves the overall objective of tourist development."

The second report, prepared by Hazem Hassan & Co., stated:

"The prime objective of ETDC (as stated in its statutes which was published in the official Gazette in December 4, 1975) was to develop International tourism in both the Pyramids Plateau and Ras El Hekma areas through the establishment of hotels, theatres, restaurants, amusement parks, touristic residential areas, touristic villages, clubs, cafes and other touristic establishments, using the most modern methods in tourism development."

112. In light of the foregoing, the Tribunal cannot accept the contention that the Pyramids Oasis Project was in reality a housing project, the implementation of which would have violated the various imperative laws of the ARE that have been invoked by the Respondent.

The Financial and Technical Capacity of the Claimants

113. The Respondent contends that SPP misrepresented its financial capacity and its tourism expertise when it proposed the Pyramids Oasis Project to the Egyptian Government and that the Claimants in fact lacked the ability to complete the project. In support of these contentions the Respondent has produced reports by financial experts which conclude, inter alia, that during the period 1972-1977 SPP's net assets per share and cover for its interest declined; that SPP had experienced certain financial difficulties with its operations in Fiji and Australia; and that ETDC apparently would have required other forms of finance to facilitate development of the Pyramids Oasis Project, including loan finance and revenues from lot sales.

114. The Claimants, for their part, maintain that SPP's experience and history, and that of its principals, were a matter of public record and were thoroughly investigated by Egyptian authorities prior to approval of the project. They point out that the Respondent even sent representatives to Fiji to study SPP's operation there. They further note that the allegations concerning SPP's financial and technical capacity were raised in February of 1978 in the People's Assembly where they were firmly rebutted by the Government.

115. With respect to the alleged financial difficulties in Fiji and Australia, the Claimants maintain that these were of a transitory character, that the economic crisis precipitated by the oil embargo in November of 1973 had a damaging effect on international tourism worldwide, and that SPP's situation improved subsequently to the point where its South Pacific hotel operation was sold in 1981 to a third party for US $120,500,000.

116. The Tribunal will first note that the reports of financial experts relied upon by the Respondent do not conclude that the Claimants would have been unable to complete the Pyramids Oasis Project; rather, the reports state that SPP had encountered certain financial difficulties and conclude—consistent with what the Claimants have argued—that financing of the project was dependent on lot sales.

117. More importantly, the evidence shows that SPP had obtained at the required times the funds necessary to finance the Pyramids Oasis Project according to the agreements that had been concluded and the method of financing that had been envisaged. Under the December Agreement, SPP was to "arrange for" US $20,000,000 in financing over the first four years and "ensure" that all additional financing for both the Pyramids Oasis and Ras El Hekma Projects (total costs for both projects were estimated to be US $400,000,000) would be provided by short and long term loans. SPP arranged the US $20,000,000 of financing through a US $12,000,000 share issue to Triad Holding Corporation S.A. and sales of SPP(ME) shares to two members of the Saudi Arabian royal family totalling US $8,750,000.

118. Pursuant to the joint venture agreement of November 23, 1975 between EGOH and SPP(ME), the latter was to make capital contributions to ETDC as follows:

Year	Amount
1	$510,000
2	$400,000
3	$400,000
4	$400,000
5	$330,000

The first three payments were made on or before the due date. The project was cancelled before the fourth payment was due.

119. Under the loan agreement of April 15, 1976, SPP(ME) granted ETDC a loan facility of up to US $15,000,000. At the time the project was cancelled, SPP(ME) had advanced ETDC US $1,650,000, plus interest, under the loan agreement.

120. The Claimants engaged various consultants to undertake the design and planning of the project. In June of 1977, a contract was awarded for the initial civil works and construction began on the site the following month. This construction involved roads, sewage systems, water reservoir facilities, artificial lakes and a golf course. In addition, the design work for two hotels had been completed. At the time of cancellation, ETDC had spent over US $9,500,000 on development costs.

121. The evidence shows that the subsequent difficulties encountered by ETDC in obtaining financing for the hotels were due in large part to the failure of the Egyptian authorities to provide certain infrastructure services and to obtain customs clearance for materials and equipment imported for the project. The Heads of Agreement provided that the Ministry of Tourism would "take appropriate measures to ensure the provision of basic infrastructure by Government to the boundaries of the sites."

The December Agreement provided that EGOH would "use its best efforts to ensure that basic suitable infrastructure is provided to the boundaries of the respective areas at no cost to SPP or ETDC, such infrastructure to comprise roads, water supply, power supply, telephone facilities and ancillary public utilities, all of which shall be sufficient for the adequate development of each area."

and that EGOH would

"assist in acquiring permits for obtaining materials and supplies necessary for the projects."

During the months preceding the cancellation of the project, SPP(ME) wrote to EGOH and the Ministry of Tourism repeatedly, stating that the failure of the Government to provide infrastructure to the project's boundary and to clear equipment and materials through customs was jeopardizing the further financing of the project.

122. It is also apparent from the evidence that opposition to the project in Egypt and the resulting uncertainties about its future further contributed to the reluctance of foreign investors to participate in joint ventures for the construction and operation of the hotels.

123. As to the Claimants' financial means, the record shows that the Parties understood and accepted that most of the costs to be incurred for the project would be "self-financed," that is, financed with revenues generated by the project itself. Thus, the infrastructure was to be financed by lot sales, as had been done in the Fiji operation. The self-financing aspect of the project was explained by the Minister of Tourism and the Minister of Economy and Economic Cooperation in statements to the People's Assembly, as follows:

"The finance of the project is based originally on the concept of self-financing to every step, considering that the project is enormous and needs a large amount of financing, and can not be based on the principle of owned capital of the project, otherwise it will need an enormous capital which is not possible for any company to provide. For this reason the finance will follow gradually the implemented portions of the project which its revenue will be re-invested to implement the following stages."

124. It is also evident that the Claimants had substantial experience and expertise in the tourism business prior to becoming involved in the Pyramids Oasis Project. At the hearings held in The Hague on July 10-11, 1985, Mr. Peter Munk, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of SPP, stated that SPP was founded in 1960 for the purpose of developing tourist resorts; that SPP developed only tourist resorts and facilities; that it was the largest hotel owner in Australia, Fiji and New Guinea; that it operated in seven countries and employed over 5,000 people; and that its major shareholders included the P&O Steamship Company and Jardine Matheson.

125. Moreover, the Egyptian Government itself confirmed SPP's experience in the tourist resort business before entering into the December Agreement. In a letter published in Al-Akhabar on September 4, 1977, the Minister of Tourism stated:

"we like to make clear that the General Egyptian Company entered into the contract with S.P.P. only after enquiring about the said company through our Embassy in London and our consulate in Hong Kong and through the relevant security authorities and banks. The company submitted documentary evidence of its capabilities and competence before the Egyptian Company decided to enter into contract. It is important to say that this company is a holding company and has other subsidiaries. Some of the shareholders are companies with international reputations such as the P. V.[sic] O. and the Hotels Company."

And in a written answer to the People's Assembly, the Minister of Tourism stated that the delegation of Egyptian officials which travelled to Fiji "for the purpose of visiting the project which SPP had erected there and to examine its standards of planning, construction, management, marketing and profits," had "certified that the Company has a high degree of expertise, excellent capabilities and the full ability to perform the project."

126. In light of the foregoing, the Tribunal must reject the contention that the Claimants lacked the requisite expertise and experience to properly implement the Pyramids Oasis Project.

The Allegation of Irregular Contacts and Connections

127. The Respondent's pleadings contain repeated allusions to irregular contacts and business connections on the part of the Claimants. The Respondent also alleges that certain individuals upon leaving Government service were employed by the Claimants. Finally, it is alleged that the Claimants bypassed normal Government channels of communication and went "right to the top." On these grounds, the Respondent requests the Tribunal to declare that:

"les demandes de SPP et SPP(ME) sont irrecevables et en tout cas mal fondées en raison des faits de corruption que révèlent les comportements de SPP et SPP(ME)."

128. Nowhere, however, is there any specific allegation of unlawful conduct on the part of the Claimants which could conceivably vitiate the relevant agreements or excuse non-performance of the Respondent's obligations under those agreements. The Respondent, at the end of its Counter-Reply, in effect admits the lack of concrete evidence in this respect when it states:

"Indeed nothing we have said in our Counter-Memorial or Counter-Reply should be construed as an accusation, or allegation of misconduct regarding any particular Egyptian Official referred [to] . . ."

The particular persons whom the Respondent has exempted from any allegation of misconduct are the very same persons who established the initial contacts with the Claimants, who invited the Claimants to visit Egypt for the first time, and who—as high ranking authorities in the Government—were called upon to make important decisions with respect to the project.

129. When the Pyramids Oasis Project was under consideration in the People's Assembly, the Vice Speaker, Dr. Gamal El Oteify, put a number of questions to the Minister of Tourism concerning "the agreement concluded with the foreign company concerning the tourist exploitation of the Pyramids Plateau and the Ras el Hekma site." Among these was the following:

"Was there any intermediary involved in the conclusion of this agreement?"

The Minister answered in writing as follows:

"The Note presented to the Supreme Committee for Economic and Political Planning in its session dated April 27, 1975, is attached herewith. This certifies that there were no intermediaries in this agreement."

130. The Respondent has questioned the English translation of the Minister's answer, asserting that instead of "This certifies that there were no intermediaries in this agreement," the Arabic original should be translated as "It appears from this that there was no intermediation in (for) this agreement." It is not necessary, however, for the Tribunal to resolve this question of translation. Even if the Respondent's translation is accepted, the answer, emanating from the Minister of Tourism and addressed to the People's Assembly, is sufficient to show that the Egyptian authorities at the time were satisfied that no intermediaries had been involved in the making of the agreement.

131. The record also shows that, before entering into any commitments with the Claimants, the Egyptian authorities made a number of inquiries through their embassies in Australia and Hong Kong and "received many letters from international offices which contain many details about this company." It must be concluded that those references satisfied the authorities, since they continued negotiating with the Claimants.

132. Thus, the allegations concerning irregular contacts and connections are not supported by the evidence in the record and are based on suppositions, guilt by association and what the Respondent describes as "commencement de preuve." On such grounds, it is simply not possible to reach the findings of fact and conclusions requested by the Respondent.

The Status of SPP and SPP(ME) Under Law No. 43

133. The Respondent has raised an objection of admissibility against the claims in this case on the ground

"1) Que SPP (ME) ne justifie pas que son Projet ait été régulièrement approuvé par le "Board of Directors" de l'Autorité Générale des Investissements (GIA) conformément à l'article 1 de la loi 43/74 et aux articles 33 et suivants du Règlement 91/1975 portant application de cette loi.

2) Qu' en conséquence, le décret du 4 décembre 1975 du Ministère de l' Economie ne peut pas valoir approbation régulière ni du Projet de SPP (ME), ni de l' incorporation d' ETDC dans le cadre de la loi 43/74."

134. By these submissions the Respondent has raised an objection which in its view goes to the very essence of the case: that SPP(ME) does not have the status of an investor under Law No. 43 because the GIA was never asked to consider SPP(ME) as the entity that would make the investment in the Pyramids Oasis Project, and never agreed to extend or transfer to SPP(ME) the authorization which was granted to the parent company, SPP. The Respondent points out that Decree No. 91 of 1975, which contains the regulations for the establishment of new projects under Law No. 43, requires that information concerning the investor be furnished to the GIA. According to the Respondent, the information provided to the GIA in connection with the Pyramids Oasis Project concerned only SPP, not SPP(ME), and the GIA never authorized or approved the substitution of SPP(ME) for SPP as the investor that was to implement the Pyramids Oasis Project under Law No. 43. For these reasons the Respondent contends that SPP(ME) was not an "approved investor" under Egyptian law and consequently cannot invoke any rights or privileges derived from Law No. 43.

135. The Claimants acknowledge that the transfer of rights from SPP to SPP(ME) was never expressly "authorized" as such in a GIA document. They maintain, however, that the GIA did in fact approve the substitution of SPP(ME) for SPP as the investor who was to implement the Pyramids Oasis Project under Law No. 43. The Claimants point out that Decree No. 212 of 1975, issued by the Ministry of Economy and Economic Cooperation, authorized the incorporation of a joint venture between SPP(ME) and EGOTH "[i]n conformity with . . . [t]he [GIA] Board of Directors' Resolution No. 50/19/1975 at the session of 20th July, 1975; and the memorandum of the Deputy Chairman of the General Authority for Arab Investment dated 1st December 1975."

136. The Claimants also point out that it was SPP(ME) who in fact made the investment and implemented the authorized joint venture under Law No. 43, and that it was SPP(ME) who supplied the capital contributions and loans in accordance with the foreign investment regulations. The Claimants' emphasize that the Respondent accepted SPP(ME)'s performance and that it was SPP(ME)'s rights under the contract and as a shareholder in ETDC that were directly affected by the cancellation of the project. Finally, the Claimants recall that Article 17 of the December Agreement provided that:

"It is understood that SPP will be incorporating a holding company to own its shareholding in ETDC and it is agreed that SPP shall have the right to assign its rights, privileges, duties and obligations under this Agreement to this company in which SPP will have a controlling, but not necessarily majority, interest and in which it controls and directs management, provided the company satisfies EGOTH."

137. The gist of the Respondent's argument is that, for an investment to be protected by Law No. 43, there must be an express and specific decision of the GIA authorizing the company concerned to make the investment, and SPP(ME) cannot produce such an authorization. The Respondent contends that the silence of the GIA with respect to the transfer of rights from SPP to SPP(ME) cannot be deemed a sufficient authorization since the GIA must make an express decision in each case after examining the financial capacity of the party who is to actually make the investment.

138. To decide this issue, it is necessary to examine Decree No. 212 and the circumstances surrounding its promulgation. This decree authorized the incorporation of ETDC as a joint venture between EGOTH and SPP(ME), and consequently recognized SPP(ME) as the foreign investor in the project.

139. As the Respondent points out, Decree No. 212 was issued by the Ministry of Economy and Economic Cooperation, not by the GIA. However, the GIA played a decisive part in the promulgation of Decree No. 212. As noted above, the recitals in the preamble of this decree include a statement that it was issued "In conformity with . . . the memorandum of the Deputy Chairman of the General Authority for Arab Investment dated 1st December, 1975." The full text of this memorandum was requested by the Tribunal during the final hearings in Paris and was produced by the Respondent on November 27, 1990. It is true, as the Respondent has observed, that the first page of this memorandum refers to the creation of joint venture with SPP, without mentioning SPP(ME). It is also true that the memorandum refers to a GIA approval dated July 20, 1975, which did not include SPP(ME). However, on the second page of the memorandum, the Deputy Chairman of the GIA stated:

"Conformément à la loi n° 43 de 1974, l'acte préliminaire et le statut ont été révisés et approuvés par l'Organisme public de l'investissement.

En date du 29/11/1975 n° 11, les deux associés ont homologué les signatures au bureau d'enregistrement des activités d'investissement créé au siège de l'Organisme, et ont présenté la preuve du dépôt à la Banque nationale Egyptienne, du quart du capital en numéraires souscrit pour la première phase.”

There can be no doubt that the corporate documents which, according to the memorandum, were revised and approved by the GIA were those incorporating ETDC, i.e., the Preliminary Agreement of Incorporation (“l’acte préliminaire”) between EGOH and SPP(ME), and ETDC’s articles of incorporation and by-laws. Thus, the substitution of SPP(ME) for SPP was not only known to, but also approved by, the GIA.

140. This conclusion is confirmed by the express reference to the two joint venture partners (“les deux associés”) who—according to the memorandum—on November 20, 1975 deposited their authorized signatures at the GIA offices and submitted proof that SPP(ME) had deposited its capital contribution with the National Bank of Egypt.

141. The memorandum also shows that Decree No. 212 was actually drafted at the GIA and then submitted to the Minister of Economy and Economic Cooperation for his signature. It is legitimate to infer from this document that the GIA not only knew of the transfer of rights from SPP to SPP(ME), but also reviewed and approved such transfer, which included the rights resulting from Law No. 43 of 1974.

142. Finally, if anything more were needed to establish the status of SPP(ME) as an “approved investor” under Law No. 43, the statement of the Deputy Chairman of the GIA that the Preliminary Agreement of Incorporation between SPP(ME) and EGOH of November 23, 1975, as well as ETDC’s articles of incorporation and by-laws, had been revised and approved by the GIA is, in the Tribunal’s view, conclusive.

143. The Respondent argues that the regulations implementing Law No. 43 do not envisage the GIA granting formal approval of an investor by means of a memorandum, and that Decree No. 212, if so interpreted, might be considered null and void. There are, however, no apparent irregularities in this instrument. The memorandum was signed by the Deputy Chairman of the GIA Board because the Minister, who presided over the Board, could not sign a decision addressed to himself. For this reason, the GIA’s decision was communicated by the Deputy Chairman of the GIA in the form of a memorandum addressed to the Minister.

144. Thus, the evidence shows that the GIA knew that it was SPP(ME) who was in fact making the investment and performing the investor’s other obligations under the relevant agreements, and that the GIA, acting pursuant to Law No. 43, approved the joint venture between SPP(ME) and EGOH that was formed to implement the project. In these circumstances, SPP(ME) must be deemed an investor entitled to the protections of Law No. 43.

145. At the hearings, the Claimants took the position that if SPP(ME)’s status as a foreign investor could not be recognized under Egyptian law, then SPP would advance the claim in its own name. This position was based on the fact that the parent company, SPP, joined the present proceedings as a second claimant at the request of the Respondent. It announced its voluntary intervention in the hearings held in The Hague on July 10–11, 1985. This intervention was formally agreed to by the Respondent, whose Counsel subscribed a declaration reading:

“Cette intervention est notée et acceptée par la RAE sous les mêmes réserves quant à l’incompétence du CIRDI que celles invoquées à l’égard de SPP (Middle East) Ltd.”

146. In its decision of November 27, 1985, the Tribunal took notice that:

“On July 23, 1985, the Parties advised the Centre that Southern Pacific Properties Limited (hereinafter called “SPP” or “the Claimant”), the parent Company of SPP(ME) and also a Hong Kong Corporation, had been joined as a claimant in the proceedings, subject to Egypt’s reservation of jurisdictional defenses.”

147. The Respondent’s reservation referred only to the preliminary objections then raised by the Respondent concerning the competence of the Centre. These preliminary objections were dismissed by the Tribunal in its decisions of November 27, 1985 and April 24, 1988.

148. The objection now raised is a different one, and thus is not covered by the reservation. It does not concern jurisdiction but refers instead to the admissibility of the request on a ground pertaining to the merits. The Respondent has contested the argument concerning the validity of SPP’s claims, observing that:

This objection concerns the applicability of Rule 40 of the Centre’s Arbitration Rules, which provides in paragraph 2 that:

"An incidental or additional claim shall be presented not later than in the reply . . . unless the Tribunal, upon justification by the party presenting the ancillary claim and upon considering any objection of the other party, authorizes the presentation of the claim at a later stage in the proceeding."

149. The Tribunal cannot accept the Respondent's contention that a claim by SPP at this point in the proceedings would contravene Rule 40. What is involved here is neither an "incidental" nor an "additional" claim: SPP was voluntarily joined as a claimant in the case at the Respondent's request. As a claimant, SPP must be presumed to be claiming something, and there is nothing in the record which suggests that SPP has ever claimed anything different than what SPP(ME) claims. Rather, SPP(ME) and SPP have claimed jointly against the Respondent ever since SPP was joined in the proceedings.

The UNESCO Convention

150. The Respondent maintains that the entry into force on December 17, 1975 of the UNESCO Convention for the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage made it obligatory, on the international plane, to cancel the Pyramids Oasis Project. In this context, the Respondent relies primarily on Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention. Article 4 provides:

"Each State Party to this Convention recognizes that the duty of ensuring the identification, protection, conservation, presentation and transmission to future generations of the cultural and natural heritage referred to in Articles 1 and 2 and situated on its territory, belongs primarily to that State. It will do all it can to this end, to the utmost of its own resources and, where appropriate, with any international assistance and co-operation, in particular, financial, artistic, scientific and technical, which it may be able to obtain."

and Article 5(d) provides:

"To ensure that effective and active measures are taken for the protection, conservation and presentation of the cultural and natural heritage situated on its territory, each State Party to this Convention shall endeavour, in so far as possible, and as appropriate for each country: . . . to take the appropriate legal, scientific, technical, administrative and financial measures necessary for the identification, protection, conservation, presentation and rehabilitation of this heritage . . ."

151. The Convention established a body called the "World Heritage Committee" to register the property to be protected under the Convention. Article 11 of the Convention provides for such registration as follows:

"Every State Party to this Convention shall, in so far as possible, submit to the World Heritage Committee an inventory of property forming part of the cultural and natural heritage, situated in its territory and suitable for inclusion in the list provided for in paragraph 2 of this Article . . ."

152. Professor Kahn, in a consultation submitted by the Respondent, explained the system of the Convention in the following terms:

"La procédure est divisée en deux phases: tout d'abord une phase qui est à l'initiative de l'Etat de situation qui consiste en une demande d'inscription sur la liste du Patrimoine Mondial des Monuments ou des sites qui répondent aux conditions posées par la Convention; puis une phase d'examen et éventuellement d'inscription par le Comité du Patrimoine Mondial. Cette procédure préserve la souveraineté des Etats (initiative) et évite les inscriptions des biens intéressants mais non irremplaçables et non uniques grâce au contrôle international."

153. For their part, the Claimants maintain that the Respondent's expropriatory acts were not based on the UNESCO Convention and that none of the Convention's provisions required termination of the project. They point out that the Respondent ratified the Convention on February 7, 1974 and thus was aware of its terms when it authorized the Pyramids Oasis Project more than a year later. The Claimants add that the Convention entered into force on December 17, 1975 and final approval of the master plan occurred in 1976. The Claimants contend that even if antiquities existed on the Plateau, nothing in the Convention required the cancellation of the project, and that measures short of cancellation could have been taken in conformity with the Convention to protect such antiquities. They argue further that the Respondent did not rely on the Convention when it cancelled the project, and that the Respondent has only invoked the Convention as a post hoc rationalization for an act of expropriation which in fact had nothing to do with the Convention. In this connection, the Claimants observe that it was only on February 26, 1979—some nine months after the project was cancelled—that the Respondent nominated "the pyramid fields from Giza to Dahshur" for inclusion in the World Heritage list under Article 11 of the UNESCO Convention.

154. In the Tribunal's view, the UNESCO Convention by itself does not justify the measures taken by the Respondent to cancel the project, nor does it exclude the Claimants' right to compensation. According to the system of the Convention, as acknowledged by the Respondent, "le classement est finalement le fait des autorités internationales de l'Unesco (Comité)." Thus, the choice of sites to be protected is not imposed externally, but results instead from the State's own voluntary nomination. Consequently, the date on which the Convention entered into force with respect to the Respondent is not the date on which the Respondent became obligated by the Convention to protect and conserve antiquities on the Pyramids Plateau. It was only in 1979, after the Respondent nominated "the pyramid fields" and the World Heritage Committee accepted that nomination, that the relevant international obligations emanating from the Convention became binding on the Respondent. Consequently, it was only from the date on which the Respondent's nomination of the "pyramid fields" was accepted for inclusion in the inventory of property to be protected in the UNESCO Convention in 1979 that a hypothetical continuation of the Claimants' activities interfering with antiquities in the area could be considered as unlawful from the international point of view.

The Existence of Antiquities in the Area

155. The Respondent has established to the Tribunal's satisfaction that antiquities exist in the project area. This was confirmed by a number of documents that were placed in evidence by the Respondent. The most conclusive of these is a memorandum prepared by the President of the Egyptian Antiquities Authority in May of 1978 which stated:

"The follow-up by the Egyptian Antiquities Authority to the works which were carried out has resulted in the following:

Firstly The presence of Antiquities was confirmed in the Western side of Al Giza Pyramids region which represents the Eastern part of the construction operations carried out. As a result the Egyptian Antiquity Authority has demanded from both the Ministry of Tourism and the Survey Authority to consider this part Public Property (Antiquity) in accordance of the Antiquities Protection Law N° 215 of the year 1951.

Secondly The scientific evidence mentions the probability of Antiquities present in this important Antiquities region in measuring of what were found in other regions."

This memorandum was submitted to the Ministry of Information and Culture, together with the recommendation that a decree be issued declaring certain lands in the vicinity of the project site to be "public property (Antiquity)." The Ministry issued such a decree—Decree No. 90 of 1978—on May 27, 1978, the day before the Pyramids Oasis Project was cancelled.

156. In any event, it is not disputed that in 1979 the World Heritage Committee accepted the Respondent's nomination of "the pyramid fields" for inclusion in the inventory of property to be protected by the UNESCO Convention. The Respondent determined—as it was entitled to do under the Convention—that the Pyramids Oasis Project was not compatible with its obligations under the Convention to protect and conserve antiquities in the areas registered with the World Heritage Committee. Admittedly, the registration of these areas occurred somewhat belatedly in the context of the present dispute. However, other of the Respondent's acts which were contemporaneous with the cancellation of the project indicate the genuineness of the Respondent's concern for the antiquities at the project site and the legitimacy of the registration of that site under the UNESCO Convention. The most important of these acts was Decree No. 90 of 1978, discussed above (paragraph 157). This decree, which declared lands on the project site to be "public property (Antiquity)," was issued pursuant to Law No. 215 of 1951 for the Protection of Monuments and Antiquities, which, as explained more fully below (paragraph 161), authorizes expropriation when necessary to protect antiquities.

157. The Tribunal's determination that the Claimants' activities on the Pyramids Plateau would have become internationally unlawful in 1979, but not before that date, has significant consequences in other respects which are discussed below (paragraphs 192–93).

The Lawfulness of the Measures Taken by the Respondent to Cancel the Project

158. Clearly, as a matter of international law, the Respondent was entitled to cancel a tourist development project situated on its own territory for the purpose of protecting antiquities. This prerogative is an unquestionable attribute of sovereignty. The decision to cancel the project constituted a lawful exercise of the right of eminent domain. The right was exercised for a public purpose, namely, the preservation and protection of antiquities in the area. Nor have the Claimants challenged the Respondent's right to cancel the project. Rather, they claim that the cancellation amounted to an expropriation of their investment for which they are entitled to compensation under both Egyptian law and international law.

159. The rules of Egyptian law and international law governing the exercise of the right of eminent domain impose an obligation to indemnify parties whose legitimate rights are affected by such exercise. Article 34 of the Egyptian Constitution provides:

"Private ownership shall be safeguarded and may not be put under sequestration except in the cases specified in the law and with a judicial decision. It may not be expropriated except for a public purpose and against a fair compensation in accordance with the law. The right of inheritance is guaranteed in it."

The obligation to pay fair compensation in the event of expropriation applies equally where antiquities are involved. Thus, Article 11 of Law No. 215 of 1951 for the Protection of Monuments and Antiquities provides:

"In the case of accidental discovery of an Antiquity by an individual or an entity, the competent department has the duty to take the measures necessary for its protection and this as of the date of declaration of the Discovery; within two months thereafter it is incumbent on said department either to remove the Antiquity found on private property (and) (or else) to take the necessary measures of expropriation of the site of the object discovered, or to keep it in situ subject to the requirements of registration pursuant to the present law.

Compensation for expropriated land shall not take into account the value of the Antiquities.”

The Legal Nature of the Measures Taken by the Respondent

160. The Respondent argues on various grounds that there was no compensable taking of the Claimants' property. The Respondent contends that the cancellation of the project was not a “nationalization” or “confiscation” prohibited by Law No. 43 of 1974. The Respondent argues further that under Egyptian law expropriation does not apply to contractual and other incorporeal rights, but only to real property rights. Thus, according to the Respondent, while the real property rights of EGOH and ETDC may have been expropriated, those interests of the Claimants that were affected by the cancellation of the Pyramids Oasis Project were not the kind of interest that is susceptible of expropriation under Egyptian law. The Respondent further contends that, while the contractual rights of the Claimants may have been diminished in their value, they were not expropriated. Moreover, the Respondent adds, the Ras El Hekma Project was never cancelled and the Claimants were offered a substitute site for that on the Plateau, close to the Sixth of October City. This substitute site, according to the Respondent, offered views and other features similar to those of the Plateau area. Finally, the Respondent argues that an offer of compensation in the amount of US $1,500,000 was made in order that the Claimants might pursue alternative projects, and it was only because of SPP(ME)'s arbitrary refusal to pursue such alternatives that the project was ultimately abandoned and no compensation was paid.

161. The Claimants, for their part, contend that the Respondent's arguments ignore economic reality. They maintain that the cancellation of the Pyramids Oasis Project and the publicity engendered thereby created a climate of opinion which made it impossible for the Claimants to raise additional funds in international financial markets and to undertake further investments.

162. The evidence shows that, following cancellation of the project, the Prime Minister stated that the Claimants would be compensated for their losses, but no adequate offer of compensation was ever made. The alleged offer of US $1,500,000 did not involve a cash payment. Rather, the offer was to credit ETDC with an investment of US $1,500,000 in a new project in which EGOH would have a majority interest. Of this credit, only 60 percent or US $900,000 would have accrued to the Claimants. This amount must be compared with the cash losses suffered by the Claimants as a result of the project's termination. Even if one considers only the Claimants' undisputed loans and capital contributions to ETDC—some US $3,368,000—the offer of a US $900,000 credit, which was conditioned on the Claimants' willingness to proceed as a minority shareholder with an entirely new and different project, did not, in Tribunal's view, constitute fair compensation for what was taken.

163. As to the argument that the cancellation of the project did not involve a nationalization or confiscation, it is the Respondent's contention that there was no nationalization because there was no transfer of the Claimants' rights or of the project to the State, and there was no confiscation because there was not a total deprivation of SPP's rights accompanied by an absence of compensation. The Tribunal cannot accept this contention. As the Tribunal observed in its decision of November 27, 1985:

“it is quite clear that expropriation, the legitimacy of which is not being contested, if not accompanied by fair compensation, amounts to a confiscation, which is prohibited by Law No. 43.” (para. 69.)

164. Nor can the Tribunal accept the argument that the term “expropriation” applies only to jus in rem. The Respondent's cancellation of the project had the effect of taking certain important rights and interests of the Claimants. What was expropriated was not the land nor the right of usufruct, but the rights that SPP(ME), as a shareholder of ETDC, derived from EGOH'S right of usufruct, which had been “irrevocably” transferred to ETDC by the State. Clearly, those rights and interests were of a contractual rather than in rem nature. However, there is considerable authority for the proposition that contractual rights are entitled to the protection of international law and that the taking of such rights involves an obligation to make compensation therefore.

165. Moreover, it has been long been recognized that contractual rights may be indirectly expropriated. In the judgment of the Permanent Court of International Justice concerning Certain German Interests in Polish Upper Silesia, the Court ruled that, by taking possession of a factory, Poland had also “expropriated the contractual rights” of the operating company. (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 7, 1926, at p. 44.)

166. Decisions of international claims tribunals have been to the same effect. Thus, in the Amoco Int'l Finance Corp v Iran case (15 Iran-US CTR, p. 89), the Iran-US Claims Tribunal said:

“Expropriation, which can be defined as a compulsory transfer of property rights, may extend to any right which can be the object of a commercial transaction . . . .” (para. 108.)

167. And in the Phillips Petroleum Co Iran v Iran case (21 Iran-US CTR, p. 79) the Iran-US Claims Tribunal held that expropriation gives rise to liability for compensation

“whether the expropriation is formal or de facto and whether the property is tangible, such as real estate or a factory, or intangible, such as the contractual rights involved in the present Case.” (para. 76.)

168. It follows that the duty to compensate in the event of expropriation cannot be evaded by contending that municipal regulations give a narrow meaning to the term "expropriation" or apply the concept only to certain kinds of property.

169. As to the argument that the Ras El Hekma Project was not included in the cancellation, this contention is not realistic. The affectio societatis, which is the essential basis of any joint venture, had disappeared in the relations between EGOH and SPP(ME) as a result of the measures taken by the Respondent with respect to the Pyramids Oasis Project. In particular, the withdrawal of EGOH's contribution to the joint venture with respect to the Plateau, the blocking by the Central Bank of ETDC accounts, the placing of ETDC in judicial receivership at the request of EGOH, and the sequestration of ETDC's assets rendered impossible and impracticable the continuation of a joint venture between EGOH and SPP(ME) with respect to Ras El Hekma.

170. In these circumstances, it is no answer to say that the Claimants could have proceeded to develop the Ras El Hekma site or a substitute site in the vicinity of the Sixth of October City. In the first place, the Ras El Hekma Project clearly was affected by the cancellation of the Pyramids Oasis Project. Among the obligations assumed by the Respondent in the Heads of Agreement was the obligation to form (through EGOH) and support the joint venture company that would develop both the Pyramids and Ras El Hekma sites. That joint venture company—ETDC—was in effect dissolved as a result of the Respondent's acts. It therefore could not have developed the Ras El Hekma site, even though the Ras El Hekma Project was never formally cancelled in the sense that the Pyramids Oasis Project was.

171. Moreover, even if ETDC had somehow been resurrected, as a matter of commercial and financial reality it is extremely doubtful that ETDC would have been able to attract the capital necessary for the Ras El Hekma project. The evidence shows that the Parties considered Ras El Hekma to be of secondary importance to the overall development plan. The Pyramids Oasis Project received most of the investment and publicity. ETDC's ability to attract capital for that project was due in large part to the enthusiastic endorsement of the project by the Egyptian Government. When that same Government subsequently cancelled the project—the primary part of the development plan envisioned by the Parties' agreements—it clearly impaired ETDC's ability to go back to the world's capital markets and raise financing for another project in Egypt.

172. Finally, as to the substitute site at the Sixth of October City, the Claimants' witnesses gave convincing testimony that the site was totally unsuitable for tourist development. In any event, it is clear that the Parties' agreements provided for development of the Pyramids site, not a substitute site. The Claimants made a substantial investment pursuant to those agreements, and the investment was in effect expropriated as a result of the Respondent's cancellation of the Pyramids Oasis Project. Furthermore, the same commercial and financial considerations which suggest that financing could not have been raised for the Ras El Hekma site after the cancellation of the Pyramids Oasis Project apply to development at the Sixth of October City site. While the Claimants may have been under an obligation to mitigate the damages incurred as a result of the cancellation of the Pyramids Oasis Project, such an obligation is not so broad and all encompassing as to require the Claimants to accept an unsuitable alternative site that was never contemplated by the Parties' agreement.

173. As to any residuary rights with respect to Ras El Hekma in favour of the Claimants as shareholders in ETDC, the Claimants advised the Tribunal in a communication dated July 9, 1991 that

"they seek in these proceedings indemnification for the totality of SPP(ME)'s investment in ETDC which includes its entire shareholding interest in ETDC. Upon the award of such indemnification by the arbitral tribunal, and the actual payment of such award by the ARE, Respondent would be entitled to a release from any further investment claims (including if requested a release or transfer of shareholdings in ETDC). . . ."

For its part, the Respondent, in a communication dated September 20, 1991, commenting on the Claimants' communication of July 9, 1991 stated:

"Très subsidiairement, la RAE rappelle que, si par impossible le Tribunal accueillait en tout ou partie les demandes d'indemnisation des demandereses ou de l'une d'entre elles, il lui plairait constater la renonciation (release) par SPP et/ou SPP (ME), exprimée dans la lettre du 9 juillet 1991, à tous leurs droits découlant des contrats relatifs au projet égyptien, et spécialement aux droits d'actionnaires dans ETDC."

In light of this exchange, the Tribunal has decided that, upon payment of the compensation fixed in this Award, the Respondent shall be released from any further investment claims concerning the Egyptian project as a whole and the Claimants' shareholding in ETDC shall be transferred to the Respondent.

The Mutability of Administrative Contracts

174. The Respondent argues that the Claimants were required to accept the Sixth of October City site as a modification of the contract because the contract under Egyptian law belonged to the special category of contracts known as "administrative contracts." The Respondent adds that it was in the exercise of the powers concerning "the mutability of administrative contracts in response to the requirements of public service" that it decided to allocate to ETDC the usufruct rights over an area of six thousand feddans of land in and around the Sixth of October City, in compensation for the usufruct rights which had been granted to ETDC on the Pyramids Plateau. The Respondent contends that it was the Claimants' refusal to accept this modification of the contract that made them responsible for the total failure of the project.

175. The Claimants answer to this argument is that the alternative site proposed by the Respondent was entirely unsuitable for a tourist destination project, and that they were therefore justified in refusing to proceed with a project on the alternative site.

176. In the Aminoil v Kuwait case, the tribunal referred to the doctrine of administrative contracts "as it was originally developed in French law and subsequently in other legal systems such as those of Egypt and Kuwait." (Lloyds Arb. Rep., 1988, at p. 195.) The French doctrine of administrative law concerning "la mutabilité des contrats administratifs" authorizes the public administration to introduce unilateral modifications to an administrative contract or concession or even put an end to it provided that certain conditions are fulfilled. The first such condition is that the modification be made in the public interest and concern what is called in France a "service public;" the second condition is that the modification be accompanied by adequate compensation designed to preserve what is described as "l'équilibre financier du contrat."

177. The conditions upon which the State may modify or terminate an administrative contract were described by the tribunal in the Aminoil case as follows:

"(i) The public authority can require a variation in the extent of the other party's liabilities (services, payments) under the contract. This must not however go so far as to distort (unbalance) the contract; and the State can never modify the financial clauses of the contract—nor, in particular, disturb the general equilibrium of the rights and obligations of the parties that constitute what is sometimes known as the contract's "financial equation". . . .

(ii) The public authority may proceed to a more radical step in regard to the contract, namely to put an end to it when essential necessities concerning the functioning of the state (operation of public services) are involved. . . ." (op.cit., at pp. 195-96.)

178. The change of the project's site from the Pyramids Plateau to the vicinity of the Sixth of October City would have involved much more than a mere variation of the Claimants' obligations under the contract. As already explained, it would have fundamentally changed the Parties' bargain and the underlying financial assumptions. The Respondent's argument that the Claimants were required to accept an alternative site as a modification of the Parties' contract must therefore be rejected.

The Quantum of Compensation

179. The Tribunal having determined that the cancellation of the project was compensable, there remains the question of the measure of compensation. The Claimants have put forward three alternative claims for compensation. First, they claim the following amounts ("the primary claim") as the value of their investment in ETDC at the time the project was cancelled:

- (1) the value of the investment in ETDC computed at US $41,000,000, or such other sum as the Tribunal may award, on the basis of (i) the DCF methodology and/or (ii) the share sales to the Saudi Princes; and
- (2) the amount of the loan to ETDC, amounting to US $1,650,000; and
- (3) post-cancellation costs for 1978 and 1979, amounting to US $623,000; and
- (4) post-cancellation, legal, audit and arbitration costs from 1980 to 1990, amounting to US $5,108,000;

together with interest to August 31, 1990

- (a) on the value of the investment ((1) herein) at 12.6 percent compounded annually, amounting (on a value of US $41,000,000) to US $125,000,000; and
- (b) on (3) herein at 12.6 percent compounded annually, amounting to US $1,874,000; and
- (c) on the loan to ETDC ((2) herein) at the contractual rate, amounting to US $6,931,000, plus further interest to the date of the Award.

180. Alternatively and subsidiarily, the Claimants submit that they should be awarded the following compensation ("the alternative claim") for the value of their investment in ETDC at the time the project was cancelled:

- (1) the amount of the loans to ETDC, amounting to US $1,650,000; and
- (2) further monies lent at no interest to ETDC, amounting to US $408,000; and
- (3) the capital invested, amounting to US $1,310,000; and
- (4) development costs pre-cancellation, amounting to US $2,254,000; and
- (5) post-cancellation costs for 1978 and 1979, amounting to US $623,000; and
- (6) post-cancellation legal, audit and arbitration costs from 1980 to 1990, amounting to US $5,108,000; and
- (7) such additional amount as shall be fixed by the Tribunal to compensate for the loss of the chance or opportunity of making a commercial success of the project;

together with interest to August 31, 1990

- a. on the loan to ETDC ((1) herein) at the contractual rate, amounting to US $6,931,000; and
- b. on (3) herein at 12.6 percent, compounded annually, amounting to US $4,303,000; and
- c. on (4) herein at 12.6 percent, compounded annually, amounting to US $7,404,000; and
- d. on (5) herein at 12.6 percent, compounded annually, amounting to US $1,874,000, plus further interest to the date of the Award.

181. As a further alternative and subsidiary claim, the Claimants claim only their out-of-pocket expenses ("the further subsidiary claim"). This further subsidiary claim is identical to their alternative claim except that it does not request compensation for the loss of the opportunity to make a commercial success of the project.

182. The Claimants have acknowledged that they do not challenge the Respondent's right to cancel the project. In the Reply they state that:

"SPP(ME) from the outset sought not to challenge the ARE's acts as wrongful or void, but sought compensation rather than physical restoration of its rights . . . ."

While the Claimants maintain that they are entitled to compensation for the "repudiation and taking" of their contract rights, they do not claim damages for breach of contract. Rather, they characterize their claim as follows:

"the claim here by SPP(ME) is not against the ARE for damages for breach of contract. It is for compensation on account of the losses occasioned to it by the ARE's exercise of its sovereign powers, which destroyed its property rights (including its contract rights)."

183. Thus, the Claimants are seeking "compensation" for a lawful expropriation, and not "reparation" for an injury caused by an illegal act such as a breach of contract. The cardinal point to be borne in mind, then, in determining the appropriate compensation is that, while the contracts could no longer be performed, the Claimants are entitled to receive fair compensation for what was expropriated rather than damages for breach of contract.

(i) The DCF Approach

184. The Claimants contend that the measure of compensation for the taking of an ongoing enterprise should be equal to the value of the enterprise at the time of taking, and that such value depends on the revenues that the enterprise would have generated had the taking not occurred. In quantifying this value, the Claimants rely primarily on the so-called "discounted cash flow" ("DCF") method. This method is intended to determine the present value of the future earnings expected to be generated by an investment. In applying the DCF method, the Claimants have first estimated the net revenues that would have been earned over the initial eighteen-year period of development, and then discounted that revenue flow to a present value, which, according to the Claimants, represents the value of SPP(ME)'s rights as of May 28, 1978—the date when the project was cancelled.

185. To project revenues into the future, the Claimants use the actual lot sales made during the project's lifetime. On this basis, they estimate that the project would have generated total net profits after tax of US $312,200,000 over the first eighteen years. Using a 20 percent discount rate, the Claimants then discount the net profits figure to a present value of US $80,100,000, which, the Claimants say, is the present value of the projected total net profits after tax for the first eighteen years of the project. This figure is then adjusted downward to US $68,500,000 to reflect ETDC's other recorded assets and liabilities. Since SPP(ME)'s share of ETDC was 60 percent, the Claimants claim 60 percent of US $68,500,000 or US $41,000,000 as the value of SPP(ME)'s equity in ETDC at the time that the project was terminated.

186. The Respondent contests the applicability of the DCF method on the grounds that it leads to speculative results and takes no account of the real value of the expropriated assets. In particular, the Respondent contends that in the present case the project was not sufficiently developed to yield the data necessary for a meaningful DCF analysis.

187. The Respondent has also submitted an expert opinion to the effect that the DCF method of valuation is unsuitable in this case because of the inherent uncertainties of the project and the fragility of a calculation which depends on forecasting cash flows almost twenty years into the future on the basis of revenues generated over a period of little more than a year. The Respondent has also cited the earlier ICC award in this case, where the tribunal refused to apply the DCF method on the ground that when the project was cancelled "the great majority of the work had still to be done." Finally, the Respondent argues that the DCF method would lead to unjust enrichment of the Claimants.

188. In the Tribunal's view, the DCF method is not appropriate for determining the fair compensation in this case because the project was not in existence for a sufficient period of time to generate the data necessary for a meaningful DCF calculation. At the time the project was cancelled, only 386 lots—or about 6 percent of the total—had been sold. All of the other lot sales underlying the revenue projections in the Claimants' DCF calculations are hypothetical. The project was in its infancy and there is very little history on which to base projected revenues.

189. In these circumstances, the application of the DCF method would, in the Tribunal's view, result in awarding "possible but contingent and undeterminate damage which, in accordance with the jurisprudence of arbitral tribunals, cannot be taken into account." (Chorzow Factory case, Series A, No. 17, 1928, at p. 51). As the tribunal in the Amoco case observed:

"One of the best settled rules of the law on international responsibility of States is that no reparation for speculative or uncertain damage can be awarded." (op. cit., para. 238.)

190. Quite apart from the inadequacy of the underlying data, there is a second reason why the Claimants' DCF approach must be rejected in the present case: the Claimants' DCF approach would in effect award lucrum cessans through the year 1995 on the assumption that lot sales would have continued through that year. Yet lot sales in the areas registered with the World Heritage Committee under the UNESCO Convention would have been illegal under both international law and Egyptian law after 1979, when the registration was made. Obviously, the allowance of lucrum cessans may only involve those profits which are legitimate. As A. de Laubadère has stated:

"le lucrum cessans correspond au "bénéfice légitime" que le co-contractant pouvait normalement escompter." (Traité des Contrats Administratifs, T.II, Paris, 1984, at pp. 556 and 1327.) (Emphasis added.)

191. Thus, even if the Tribunal were disposed to accept the validity of the Claimants' DCF calculations, it could only award lucrum cessans until 1979, when the obligations resulting from the UNESCO Convention with respect to the Pyramids Plateau became binding on the Respondent. From that date forward, the Claimants' activities on the Pyramids Plateau would have been in conflict with the Convention and therefore in violation of international law, and any profits that might have resulted from such activities are consequently non-compensable.

(ii) The Share transactions

192. To confirm the value indicated by their DCF calculations, the Claimants rely on certain transactions in SPP(ME) shares. These transactions include: (1) the sale in 1976 of 12,500 shares (25 percent of SPP(ME)) to two members of the Saudi Arabian royal family at US $700 a share; (2) an offer by a third member of the Saudi Arabian royal family to purchase 7,500 shares at US $850 a share; and (3) the repurchase by SPP(ME) of certain of its shares at prices ranging from US $598 per share to US $630 per share.

193. With respect to the sales at US $700 per share, the Claimants' expert pointed out that if one extrapolates the US $700 per share value over the entire 50,000 outstanding shares, the overall value for SPP(ME) at the time of the share transactions was US $35,000,000. The audited financial statements for SPP(ME) at the relevant time showed that, apart from SPP(ME)'s 60 percent share of ETDC, its other assets and liabilities had a net value of a negative US $3,100,000. If the overall value of SPP(ME) was US $35,000,000 (as indicated by the purchase of 25 percent of SPP(ME)), it follows that SPP(ME)'s 60 percent interest in ETDC had an imputed value of US $38,100,000. The Claimants' expert conducted similar analyses on the basis of the US $850 per share offer and the repurchase of shares by SPP(ME). These analyses indicated values for SPP(ME)'s 60 percent share of ETDC ranging from US $33,000,000 to US $42,500,000.

194. The Claimants argue that these imputed values are, if anything, conservative because (1) the transactions occurred in 1976 when the project was not nearly as far along as it was in 1978 when it was cancelled; (2) the transactions involved minority shareholdings; and (3) certain of the transactions involved non-voting shares.

195. The Claimants' expert testified that the two purchasers of the SPP(ME) shares had undertaken substantial "due diligence" inquiries before making their investments and that they were advised by lawyers and economic consultants.

196. The Respondent's expert, on the other hand, testified that in his opinion the share transactions were not a valid means of estimating the value of SPP(ME)'s share in ETDC because

"The situation was that we had a major project which in 1976 was in the planning stage . . . and it seems to me that we are looking at what should properly be called venture capital. The princes were invited to put up venture capital, that is high risk capital, and to suggest that because they put up that high risk capital that represents the objective value of the enterprise at the date seems to me an exaggeration. I do not think it probable that willing purchasers at that price could have been found in those circumstances."

197. In the Tribunal's view, the purchase and sale of an asset between a willing buyer and a willing seller should, in principle, be the best indication of the value of the asset. This is certainly true in the case of a perfectly competitive market having many buyers and sellers in which there are no external controls or internal monopolistic arrangements. In the present case, however, there was a very limited number of transactions and there was no market as such for the shares that were sold. The price at which the shares were sold was privately negotiated. In these circumstances, the Tribunal does not believe that the share transactions can be used to accurately measure the value of SPP(ME)'s investment in ETDC.

(iii) The Fair Measure of Compensation

198. The Tribunal will turn now to the Claimant's alternative claim for compensation, which is essentially a claim for "out-of-pocket" expenses plus an amount to compensate the Claimants for what they have called "the loss of the opportunity to make a commercial success of the project." There is no question that considerable amounts of time and money were spent on negotiating, planning and implementing the project. SPP(ME) made capital contributions and loans to ETDC, the amounts of which are not disputed by the Respondent. In the Tribunal's opinion, these amounts must be reimbursed as part of the fair compensation to which the Claimants are entitled. In addition, the evidence shows that, when the project was cancelled, construction was under way and considerable marketing activity had been carried out. Most of the detailed engineering design and specifications for the first phase of the infrastructure and golf course had been completed. A construction contract had been concluded for the infrastructure, construction had begun and lot sales had commenced. To the extent that the expenses associated with this activity have been proven, the Tribunal is of the view that reimbursement of such expenses is also part of the fair compensation to which the Claimants are entitled.

199. The Capital Contributions and Loans. From the record it is evident that there is no dispute as to the amounts of the capital contributions and loans made by SPP(ME) to ETDC: the capital contributions, made in three installments, totalled US $1,310,000; and the loans consisted of a US $1,650,000 loan with interest at commercial rates and further loans bearing no interest of US $408,000.

200. Development Costs. The Claimants submit that they are entitled to be reimbursed for pre-cancellation development costs of US $2,254,000 and post-cancellation costs of US $623,000. These costs are disputed by the Respondent. After the final hearings in Paris, the Tribunal, at its meeting in London in February of 1991, reviewed the evidence relating to development costs. It determined that the evidence should be supplemented, and accordingly on February 13th, 1991 it issued a procedural order which directed inter alia that the Claimants produce

"a document indicating the nature, date and amount of the above-referenced development costs, including the names of the recipients of payments in excess of US $20,000 and a confirmation that these sums were legitimately and actually expended for the project and were directly connected with it. The document shall also contain an explanation of why these costs were not charged to or were not directly recovered from ETDC."

The procedural order also asked for the Respondent's comments on the information to be submitted by the Claimants. The Parties responded as described in paragraphs 39-40 above.

201. It cannot be disputed that development costs were incurred by the Claimants. Indeed, the expert report received from the Respondent on June 26, 1991 stated with respect to the development costs reported by the Claimants' auditors that "it is reasonable to accept that the costs were actually incurred."

202. The question that arises from the information submitted by the Parties in response to the procedural order of February 13, 1991 concerns the extent to which the development costs that were allocated to SPP(ME) and not reimbursed by ETDC should be taken into account in fixing the compensation to be awarded to the Claimants. For the most part, the items in question involve the allocation of salaries and costs incurred by executives and employees of SPP such as overhead costs, travel and entertainment expenses, and costs incurred for recruiting and relocation of personnel, consultations concerning marketing and banking, and so forth. These expenses were incurred in connection with the project and in order to implement it. If the project had materialized, these expenses would not have been chargeable to ETDC because the Claimants had agreed to provide all of the technical expertise required for the design, construction, management and marketing of the project. However, because the project was cancelled, the Claimants could not recoup these expenses with future profits, and the expenses thus became irrecoverable losses. The Tribunal finds that it is reasonable and legitimate to take these losses into account in determining the fair measure of compensation in this case.

203. Not all of the costs claimed have been properly documented, however. It was explained in an affidavit of SPP(ME)'s former Financial Director that many documents and financial records could not be found or were destroyed by reason of the very long period which has passed since the expenses were incurred. But as the report of the Respondent's expert points out,

"the origins of this claim date from 1978 and I am surprised that in the circumstances the relevant documents have not been retained. It was foreseeable that they were likely to be required in this action."

This report also points out that the information filed by the Claimants in response to the Tribunal's procedural order of February 13, 1991 identified US $1,719,000 of the claimed costs by payee, but that the recipients of an additional US $1,545,000 of claimed costs were not identified. In the Tribunal's view, it would not be appropriate to award development costs for which the Claimants are unable to identify the payee. Accordingly, the Tribunal has decided to award development costs only in the amount of US $1,719,000.

204. The Respondent also maintains that the information filed by the Claimants in response to the Tribunal's procedural order contains evidence of the Claimants' corruption. Specifically, the Respondent has drawn the Tribunal's attention to a payment of US $16,000 made in May of 1975 to a former employee of the Egyptian Government. It is claimed that, while this individual was employed by the London agency of the Egyptian Ministry of Tourism, he provided information concerning SPP's financial and technical capacity to the Egyptian authorities who were considering the proposed project and who ultimately approved it. After leaving the Government, this individual allegedly assisted SPP in securing agreements with Egyptian authorities relating to the Pyramids Oasis Project. The Tribunal notes, however, that the same document which shows the US $16,000 payment also shows that the total payments made by SPP to this individual after he left the Government amounted for the whole of the year 1975 to less than US $2,000 a month, a figure which does not suggest illicit payments to third parties. Accordingly, the Tribunal cannot accept the Respondent's contention that the information submitted by the Claimants in response to the Procedural Order contains evidence of the Claimants' corruption.

205. Legal, Audit and Arbitration Costs. The Claimants seek reimbursement of US $5,108,000 of "post cancellation legal, audit and arbitration costs from 1980 to 1990." They contend that all of the legal costs they have incurred in order to obtain compensation should be indemnified, including the legal costs resulting from the ICC arbitration and related court proceedings. They argue that all of the legal and related disbursements should be considered as an individual whole, since they were made necessary by the Respondent's wrongful refusal to grant fair compensation. The Claimants add, as a further consideration, that a great deal of the research and preparation involved in the ICC arbitration obviated the need to undertake the same work in the ICSID proceedings.

206. For its part, the Respondent states that the claim for indemnification of costs incurred in other proceedings is absurd from a legal point of view because it infringes the sanctity of res judicata, the awards and judgments in the other cases having already decided the question of costs incurred in those proceedings.

207. In a case such as the present one, where the measure of compensation is determined largely on the basis of the out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the claimant, there is little doubt that the legal costs incurred in obtaining the indemnification must be considered as part and parcel of the compensation, in order to make whole the party who suffered the loss and had to litigate to obtain compensation. This is particularly so when, as in this case, the amount offered as compensation by the Respondent was manifestly insufficient.

208. However, only those legal and accounting fees and expenses that were incurred for work that was relevant and useful to the present ICSID proceedings are to be included in the compensation. This Tribunal cannot award costs for work which was only relevant or useful to the proceedings before the ICC tribunal, whose decision was annulled, or proceedings before national courts to defend the validity of the ICC award or obtain its enforcement.

209. In order to separate the costs that should be allocated to the present proceedings from those that should be allocated to other proceedings, the Tribunal, in its procedural order of February 13, 1991, asked the Parties to submit "an itemized list of the legal and accounting fees relating to the present proceedings, indicating their amount, the respective dates and the phase of the proceedings to which those fees and expenses relate."

210. In response to the Tribunal's procedural order, the Claimants have submitted a detailed list of all payments made for legal, audit and arbitration costs in connection with the ICC proceedings, related court proceedings and the ICSID proceedings. This list includes the amount and the recipient of each payment. It shows that fees and expenses of US $4,242,000 were incurred solely in connection with the ICSID proceedings, and that further fees and expenses of US $1,701,000 were incurred in connection with the ICC arbitration and related court proceedings. However, it is evident from the information submitted by the Claimants that a substantial amount of the work product covered by the US $1,701,000 of fees and expenses, such as the factual development of the case (including the preparation of various studies, reports and affidavits), was also utilized in the ICSID proceedings. On the basis of this information, the Tribunal estimates that approximately one-half of the US $1,701,000 was spent on work product that was utilized directly in the ICSID proceedings.

211. In light of these considerations, the Tribunal concludes that the total costs to be reimbursed to the Claimants for legal and accounting work which has been relevant or useful to the present ICSID proceedings amounts to US $5,092,000. Undoubtedly, this is a high figure, but it is justified by the extraordinary length and complication of the proceedings in this case.

212. Loss of Commercial Opportunity. The final element in the Claimants' alternative claim is:

"such additional amount as shall be fixed by the Tribunal to compensate for the loss of the chance or opportunity of making a commercial success of the project."

This element of the alternative claim is what differentiates that claim from the Claimants' further subsidiary claim, which is simply for out-of-pocket expenses. Here, it is important to note that the alternative claim—like the primary claim which was based on the DCF method and the share transactions—is intended to recover the value of the Claimants' investment. This was made clear during the oral proceedings, and is also explicitly stated in the Claimants' Final Conclusions and Prayer for Relief:

"The Claimants claim secondarily, as an alternative . . . the value of its investment in ETDC on the basis of its out-of-pocket expenses . . . on the view that the project would necessarily have realized, at the very least, the amount invested in it, and an additional amount . . . to compensate for loss of the chance or opportunity of making a commercial success of the project . . . ." (Emphasis added.)

213. In contrast, the Claimants' further subsidiary claim as articulated in their Final Conclusions and Prayer for Relief makes no mention of the value of the investment:

"The Claimants claim as a further, subsidiary alternative . . . the out-of-pocket expenses . . . together with interest . . . ."

The further subsidiary claim gives up any claim for the value of the investment and seeks only to put the Claimants back in the position they were in before they became involved with the Pyramids Oasis Project.

214. During the final hearings on the merits, the Respondent's expert testified that in his opinion, if damages were to be awarded, the measure of damages should be the value of the Claimants' investment in ETDC as of May 1978, when the Pyramids Oasis Project was cancelled. If it were the case that the Claimants' investment in the Pyramids Oasis Project had no value—or had no value greater than the Claimants' out-of-pocket expenses—then the further subsidiary claim might ex hypothesi be the appropriate basis for compensation. In the Tribunal's view, however, it is incontestable that the Claimants' investment had a value that exceeded their out-of-pocket expenses. The record shows that between February of 1977 and May of 1978, ETDC made sales of villa sites and multi-family sites totalling US $10,211,000—more than twice the Claimants' out-of-pocket expenses. Moreover, construction involving roads, water and sewage systems, reservoirs, artificial lakes and a golf course had commenced and the design work for two hotels had been completed. In these circumstances, the Tribunal cannot accept that the project did not have a value in excess of the Claimants' out-of-pocket expenses.

215. It remains, then, for the Tribunal to determine the amount by which the value of the Claimants' investment in ETDC exceeded their out-of-pocket expenses—that part of the alternative claim which the Claimants have called the "opportunity of making a commercial success of the project." This determination necessarily involves an element of subjectivism and, consequently, some uncertainty. However, it is well settled that the fact that damages cannot be assessed with certainty is no reason not to award damages when a loss has been incurred.

216. In determining the amount by which the value of the Claimants' investment in ETDC exceeded their out-of-pocket expenses, the Tribunal will take as a starting point the lot sales actually made during the short life of the project and the revenues to be imputed to those sales. As the Tribunal has already observed, the evidence shows that during the period February 1977 to May 1978, ETDC's actual sales of villa and multi-family sites amounted to US $10,211,000. The lots involved—383 villa sites and 3 multi-family sites—represented only 6 percent of the villa sites and less than 1 percent of the multi-family sites with respect to which ETDC held rights. It is clear, therefore, that the remaining lots were a potential source of very substantial revenues.

217. The Tribunal will next consider what it took in the way of expenditures by the Claimants to generate the revenues imputed to the lot sales. The difference between these expenditures and the portion of imputed revenues corresponding to SPP(ME)'s shareholding in ETDC is, in the Tribunal's view, the minimum measure of the value to be ascribed to the opportunity to make a commercial success of the project.

218. It is not disputed that SPP(ME) made capital contributions to ETDC of US $1,310,000, and the Tribunal has already determined that the Claimants' development costs were US $1,719,000. In addition, loans totalling US $2,058,000 were made to ETDC, but these loans will be disregarded for present purposes because they were intended to be reimbursed—for the most part with interest at commercial rates. The portion of the revenues imputed to the lot sales corresponding to SPP(ME)'s shareholding in ETDC was 60 percent of US $10,211,000, or US $6,127,000. Thus, the portion of the sales revenues corresponding to SPP(ME)'s shareholding in ETDC would have exceeded the Claimants' non-reimbursable out-of-pocket expenses by US $3,098,000. In these circumstances, the Tribunal is of the view that the value of what the Claimants have called the "opportunity of making a commercial success of the project" was not less than US $3,098,000. Stated differently, the value of the Claimants' investment in May of 1978 when the project was cancelled exceeded their out-of-pocket expenses by at least US $3,098,000.

219. Interest. The Claimants maintain that it has long been accepted under international law that appropriate compensation carries with it interest from the date of the wrong, so as to compensate the injured party for not having had the use of the money between the date when it ought to have been paid and the date of the payment. In support of this contention the Claimants invoke decisions of the Permanent Court of International Justice and various international arbitration and claims tribunals. The Claimants further assert that the rate of interest should be a reasonable one, based on the amount that a successful claimant would have been in a position to have earned if it had had the funds available to invest. Accordingly, it claims a rate of 12.6 percent per annum, compounded annually from May 28, 1978 to the date of the Award, observing that this is the rate of interest agreed between SPP(ME) and ETDC in the loan agreement of April 15, 1976.

220. For its part, the Respondent contends that, if compensation is to be awarded, the rate of interest requested by the Claimants, as well as the modalities for its computation, should be rejected as contrary to Egyptian law in accordance with Article 42(1) of the Washington Convention. The Respondent calls attention to Article 226 of the Civil Code of Egypt, which provides for a rate of four percent for civil debts (including administrative contracts) and five percent for commercial debts, and contends that this is a civil matter, since the Heads of Agreement, concluded by a Minister of the Government, could not be qualified as a commercial act. The Respondent also points out that Article 232 of the Civil Code forbids compound interest, or interest on interest, and provides that the interest may in no event exceed the principal amount. As to the date at which interest begins to run, the Respondent contends that under Article 226 it is the date of the initiation of proceedings in case of "liquid debts," so that if the amount is fixed by the award it is only from the date of the award that interest begins to run.

221. The Claimants, on the other hand, point out that the limitation in Egyptian law on the rate of interest applies only—according to the terms of Article 226 of the Civil Code—"when the object of an obligation is the payment of a sum of money of which the amount is known at the time when the claim is made," which, they maintain, is not the case here.

222. In light of these various considerations, the Tribunal reaches the conclusion that, subject to the exception discussed below (paragraphs 225-231), Article 42 (1) of the Washington Convention requires that interest be determined according to Egyptian law because there is no rule of international law that would fix the rate of interest or proscribe the limitations imposed by Egyptian law.

223. With respect to the rate of interest, the Tribunal is of the view that it should be five percent rather than four percent. The argument that the Heads of Agreement was not a commercial contract is not conclusive because the present claim is not an action for a breach of that contract, but rather one seeking compensation for the expropriation of the rights of a commercial enterprise for the development of tourism.

224. The provisions of Egyptian law which prohibit compound interest and require that the interest not exceed the principal are also applicable.

225. The provisions of Egyptian law concerning interest do not apply to the loan of US $1,650,000 from SPP(ME) to ETDC. The underlying loan agreement of April 15, 1976 by its terms is governed by English law. Clause 17 of the loan agreement provides:

"This Agreement shall be governed by and construed in all respects in accordance with the laws of England."

226. With respect to interest, the loan agreement provides in Clause 4 that:

"During the period from the first Date of Drawdown until the final Date of Payment the Borrower shall pay interest on the Borrowing."

and that:

"Interest shall be paid in dollars to the Lender in London or in such other foreign currency and in such other place as may mutually be agreed from time to time and shall be paid on the relevant Interest Date at the relevant Interest Rate for that Interest Period."

227. The term "Interest Rate" is defined as:

"such rate of interest from the first date of Drawdown until repayment of the Borrowing in respect of each period ending on an Interest Date as shall be two per centum above the three months offered quotation for the deposit in Dollars by prime banks to the Lender (as certified by the Lender) in the London Interbank Market at approximately 11.00 a.m. London time two Business Days before the Date of Drawdown or (as the case may be) before each relevant Interest Date."

228. The loan agreement also provides that the interest shall be compounded if interest payments are not made on time:

"If any interest payable hereunder is not paid by noon (London time) on the day on which the same is due then the interest so in arrears shall thenceforth itself bear interest at the relevant Interest Rate computed from the date the same became payable to the date on which it is in fact paid . . . ."

229. Thus, the loan agreement establishes a higher rate of interest than that prescribed by Egyptian law and also provides for compound interest. Moreover, the interest on this loan now amounts to US $8,134,000 and thus exceeds the principal. However, since the loan agreement is governed by the laws of England, which allow compound interest and the accrual of interest in excess of the principal, the Egyptian limitations on interest do not apply. Under the loan agreement, SPP(ME) had a contractual right against ETDC to interest at the rate fixed by the loan agreement when the project was cancelled and the Central Bank blocked the Claimants' funds. This contractual right was in effect expropriated. The Claimants do not ask the Tribunal to award interest on the principal amount as such, but rather to compensate them for the value of the contractual right taken. That value clearly includes the interest provided for in the loan agreement.

230. The Respondent argues that it was not a party to the loan agreement and thus is not bound by the choice of English law. But the Claimants are not asking for damages for a breach of the loan agreement; they are seeking compensation on account of an expropriation. The credit that SPP(ME) had with respect to ETDC was expropriated by the Egyptian authorities when the Central Bank of Egypt, acting on the recommendation of the People's Assembly Committee, ordered "the blockage of funds, papers and documents of EGOH and also the blockage of the foreign partner funds and documents."

Thus, ETDC was prevented from repaying the loan and the interest that it had agreed to. Therefore, this loan is to be reimbursed to the Claimants with all of the interest stipulated in the loan agreement. This is the full and uncontestable value of the expropriated credit.

231. Finally, the five percent interest rate prescribed by Egyptian law does not apply to the loans of US $408,000, since the Parties agreed that these loans would not bear interest.

232. With respect to the date from which interest shall run, the Respondent has invoked Article 226 of the Civil Code of Egypt which provides:

"When the object of an obligation is the payment of the sum of money of which the amount is known at the time when the claim is made, the debtors shall be bound, in case of delay in payment, to pay to the creditor, as damages for the delay, interest at the rate of 4% in civil matters and 5% in commercial matters. Such interest shall run from the date of the claim in Court, unless the contract or commercial usage fixes another date. This article shall apply, unless otherwise provided by law."

233. In the Tribunal's opinion, the dies a quo established in Article 226, "the date of the claim in Court," only applies to "such interest" which is to be paid "in case of delay of payment," that is, to moratory interest or interest on the award. It does not apply to compensatory interest, that is, to interest which is part of the award. Also, Article 226 refers to "the payment of a sum of money of which the amount is known at the time when the claim is made," i.e., a liquidated claim. The present case involves neither moratory interest nor a liquidated claim. Consequently, no provision of the Civil Code or other legislation concerning the dies a quo applies to compensatory interest for a yet to be determined amount of compensation arising out of an act of expropriation.

234. Given this lacunae, it is legitimate to apply the logical and normal principle usually applied in cases of expropriation, namely, that the dies a quo is the date on which the dispossession effectively took place, since it is from that date that the deprivation has been suffered. This principle is supported by the doctrine and the jurisprudence of international tribunals. Moreover, many constitutions and national laws concerning expropriation require that payment be made prior to or simultaneous with the dispossession, thus supporting the dies a quo from the date of the taking, in this case May 28, 1978. To fix the dies a quo from the date of filing the claim or the date of the award, as requested by the Respondent, would encourage parties who have expropriated property to refuse to pay compensation and to delay the proceedings seeking compensation.

235. As to the dies ad quem for the running of interest, there is no Egyptian rule that has been called to the Tribunal's attention. The prevailing jurisprudence in international arbitrations is to the effect that interest runs until the date of effective payment, and this conclusion is supported by doctrinal opinion. This conclusion also seems to result implicitly from Article 226 of the Civil Code of Egypt.

236. Consequently, as requested by the Claimants, post-award interest will commence 30 days after the date on which this Award is notified to the Respondent, and will run until the date of payment. This interest shall be at the rate of five percent per annum and shall not be compounded.

237. Monetary Adjustment for Currency Devaluation. The five percent rate of interest which the Tribunal has determined to be applicable in this case does not fully compensate the Claimants for the losses which they incurred as a consequence of being deprived of money owed them between the time when the project was cancelled and the date of this Award. The reason that the five percent rate does not make the Claimants whole is that, since the project was cancelled in 1978, there has been a significant devaluation of the US dollar.

238. Devaluation is a function of inflation. If the Tribunal had determined that a "commercial" rate of interest were applicable in this case, devaluation would be accounted for automatically because commercial interest rates add an adjustment for inflation to the "real" interest rate. The five percent rate which the Tribunal has determined to be applicable is not a commercial rate, however. The record shows that since June of 1978 rates for US dollar deposits quoted in the London Interbank Market averaged more than 12 percent. Since commercial interest rates are always higher (usually by 2–3 percentage points) than the clearing banks' base rate, it is evident that the five percent rate does not compensate the Claimants for the devaluation of the US dollar that has occurred since 1978.

239. Accordingly, it is the opinion of the Tribunal that certain elements of the compensation based on the Claimants' out-of-pocket expenses should be adjusted upward to take into account the devaluation of the US dollar since 1978. This is required in order that the compensation awarded by the Tribunal give the Claimants the same purchasing power today that they would have had in 1978 with the dollars that they invested in ETDC. Such a correction is necessary if the compensation is to be fair. If it were otherwise, the Claimants would be seriously prejudiced as a consequence of the devaluation of currencies that has occurred during the period in which they have been seeking a remedy for the loss that they have sustained.

240. In making an adjustment to take account of currency devaluation, the Tribunal has followed the approach adopted by the tribunal in the Aminoil case, which included an eminent Egyptian jurist. There, in awarding compensation for an expropriated investment, the tribunal stated that "the proportions assumed by world inflation must lead to appraisals that are more in line with economic realities, and the determination of an indemnification cannot be tied down to the inflexible consequences of a purely monetary designation." (op. cit., at p. 213.)

The tribunal further said that

"if it were thought necessary to arrive at the total figure of the capital invested by Aminoil in its undertaking it would be appropriate to do so without holding the dollars of 1977 to be equivalent to those of 1948." (ibid.)

241. The tribunal referred to "the general principle of the preservation of the value of money" (paragraph 169), and then stated:

"The Tribunal has not overlooked the fact that there may be different ways of assessing the levels of inflation . . . . In the compensation to be paid to Aminoil it would be natural to take account of the progress of inflation generally . . . ." (op. cit., at p. 214.)

The Tribunal then concluded:

"In order to establish what is due in 1982 account must be taken both of a reasonable rate of interest, which could be put at 7.5 per cent, and of a level of inflation which the Tribunal fixes at an overall rate of 10 per cent—that is to say a total annual increase of 17.5 per cent in the amount due, over the amount due for the preceding year." (op. cit., at p. 216.)

242. A monetary adjustment such as that utilized in the Aminoil award also finds support in Egyptian law. Decisions of the Egyptian Cour de Cassation and doctrinal opinions were called to the attention of the Tribunal. These opinions and decisions concluded that "due regard should be given to the increase or decrease of the currency price." These decisions and authoritative opinions confirm that under Egyptian law consideration is given to changes occurring "in the price of currency in which the compensation is to be estimated." (Abdel-Rezzak Ahmed El-Sanhoury, Sources of Obligation, Section 649, at pp. 975–6.)

243. In order to compensate the Claimants for the devaluation of the US dollar that has occurred since the Pyramids Oasis Project was cancelled in 1978, the Tribunal has adjusted certain of the out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the Claimants. These adjustments have been made using a "deflator factor" derived from data published by the International Monetary Fund in International Financial Statistics. This factor is computed on the basis of the United States Consumer Price Index. For the period May 31, 1978 to December 31, 1991—the most recent date for which the data necessary to calculate the deflator factor is available—the deflator factor was 2.2074. In other words, the purchasing power of 100 U.S. dollars in May of 1978 was equivalent to the purchasing power of 220.74 U.S. dollars in December of 1991.

244. As to the elements of compensation to which the deflator factor is to be applied, the Tribunal is of the view that the invested capital of US $1,310,000, the development costs of US $1,719,000 and the interest-free loan of US $408,000 should be adjusted for monetary devaluation. No adjustment is required for the loan of US $1,650,000, since that loan carries commercial interest and thus takes account of inflation and the resulting currency devaluation. Nor, in the Tribunal's view, is adjustment of the legal, audit and arbitration expenses necessary, since the bulk of these expenses was either incurred in—or imputed to proceedings that occurred in—the last several years. Finally, no adjustment of the opportunity cost element of the compensation will be made because of the nature of that particular cost and the method by which it was determined.

Mitigating Factors Invoked by the Respondent

245. The Respondent has drawn the Tribunal's attention to certain circumstances which, it is claimed, are mitigating factors that should be taken into account in the event that any compensation is awarded in this case. First, it is alleged that there has been no enrichment of the State, whereas there has been an enrichment of the Claimants as a result of the sale of shares to the members of the Saudi Arabian royal family.

246. It may be true that the Respondent has not benefited financially from the cancellation of the project. However, the Respondent has obtained certain non-material benefits through the preservation of an area constituting a world cultural heritage, thus becoming entitled to the advantages—including the possibility of outside financial assistance—deriving from the UNESCO Convention.

247. Moreover, although unjust enrichment has on infrequent occasion been used by international tribunals as a basis for awarding compensation, it is generally accepted that the measure of compensation should reflect the claimant's loss rather than the defendant's gain. The question of whether the Respondent was enriched by the cancellation of the Pyramids Oasis Project is not, in the Tribunal's view, relevant to the amount of compensation to be awarded in the present case.

248. As to the alleged enrichment of the Claimants as a result of the share transactions, the Tribunal first notes that it disregarded these transactions in fixing the amount of compensation. If the Tribunal had used the share sales to measure the value of SPP(ME)'s investment in ETDC, the resulting compensation would have been considerably more than that which the Tribunal has determined to be appropriate.

249. Furthermore, the record shows that the proceeds from the share transactions were intended to finance the Pyramids Oasis Project. If some of those proceeds were not ultimately invested in the project, this was presumably due to the Respondent's cancellation of the project rather than to any act attributable to the Claimants.

250. The next factor invoked by the Respondent to mitigate the amount of compensation in the present case is the fact that the reclassification of the land on the Pyramids Plateau was a lawful act. This factor, however, has already been taken into consideration in the Tribunal's decision not to award compensation based on profits that might have accrued to the Claimants after the date on which areas on the Plateau were registered with the World Heritage Committee.

251. Next, the Respondent contends that the project was located in an area where the Claimants should have known there was a risk that antiquities would be discovered. Again, this is a factor that is already reflected in the method used by the Tribunal to value the Claimants' loss, and particularly in the Tribunal's decision and not to base compensation on profits that might have been earned after the Plateau areas were registered with UNESCO.

252. The Respondent also argues that the Claimants' rejection of the Sixth of October City site should be taken into account in fixing the amount of compensation to be awarded. The Tribunal cannot accept this argument. As explained above (paragraph 172), the Claimants' rejection of the substitute site was entirely justified and is therefore irrelevant to the amount of compensation to be awarded the Claimants.

253. Finally, the Respondent maintains that certain dangerous events which occurred in Egypt after 1978, adversely affecting tourism there, should be taken into account in fixing the amount of compensation. These events are also irrelevant, because the Tribunal has excluded any profits which might have been earned after 1978 from the compensation that it has determined to be appropriate.

The Counter-Claim

254. The Respondent has formally requested the Tribunal to:

255. In support of the Counter-Claim, the Respondent invokes certain faults alleged to be attributable to the Claimants, namely:

- i) the transformation of the project into a housing project;
- ii) the absence of touristic elements (hotels, commercial centers and villages) in the project;
- iii) the Claimants' abandonment of the Ras El Hekma Project;
- iv) the financial deficiencies of the Claimants; and
- v) above all, the Claimants' refusal to cooperate, and particularly to consider the solution of an alternative site.

256. It results from what the Tribunal has already said that none of these alleged faults was committed and none of them was imputed to the Claimants by the Egyptian authorities as a ground for the cancellation or in any other form before May 28, 1978. It follows that the Counter-Claim is to be dismissed.

IV. THE OPERATIVE PART (DISPOSITIF)

257. For these reasons,

THE TRIBUNAL, by a majority,

AWARDS to Southern Pacific Properties (Middle East) Limited and Southern Pacific Properties Limited, jointly,

THE SUM OF US $27,661,000, consisting of the following:

1. The amount of US $9,784,000, comprised of the US $1,650,000 loan by SPP(ME) to ETDC, plus interest at the rate and on the terms specified in the loan agreement;

2. The amount of US $901,000, comprised of the US $408,000 loans at no interest, plus an adjustment for monetary devaluation using a deflator factor of 2.2074;
3. The amount of US $3,799,000, comprised of the US $1,310,000 of capital invested by the Claimants, plus (i) an adjustment for monetary devaluation using a deflator factor of 2.2074, and (ii) simple interest at the rate of five percent per annum from May 28, 1978 to the date of this Award on the amount of US $1,310,000;
4. The amount of US $4,986,000, comprised of US $1,719,000 of development costs, plus (i) an adjustment for monetary devaluation using a deflator factor of 2.2074, and (ii) simple interest at the rate of five percent per annum from May 28, 1978 to the date of this Award on the amount of US $1,719,000;
5. The amount of US $5,093,000, for legal, audit and arbitration costs attributable to these proceedings; and
6. The amount of US $3,098,000, which the Tribunal has determined to be the amount by which the value of the Claimants' investment in ETDC exceeded their non-reimbursable out-of-pocket expenses at the time the project was cancelled.

Post-Award Interest

The amount of US $27,661,000 shall earn simple interest of five percent per annum, beginning 30 days after the date on which this Award is notified to the Respondent, until the date of payment.

Decisions on Jurisdiction

The Tribunal's Decision on Preliminary Objections to Jurisdiction of November 27, 1985, and its Decision on Preliminary Objections to Jurisdiction of April 14, 1988, are incorporated in this Award by reference.

The Counter-Claim

The Counter-Claim by the Respondent against the Claimants is dismissed.

Release of Claims

Upon payment of the present Award, the Respondent shall be released from any further investment claims in relation to the Pyramids Oasis Project and the Claimants' shareholding in ETDC shall be considered as released and transferred to the Respondent.

EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GUATEMALA
PROVIDING FOR ARBITRATION OF THE CLAIM.

The American Minister in Guatemala (Arthur H. Geissler) to the Guatemalan Minister for Foreign Affairs (Eduardo Aguirre Velásquez).

GUATEMALA, November 2, 1929.

MR. MINISTER: Referring to previous correspondence between the Legation and the Guatemalan Foreign Office concerning the claim of P. W. Shufeldt against the Government of Guatemala, which claim has been espoused by the Government of the United States, it is agreed by the two Governments that this question shall be submitted to Sir Herbert Sisnett, Chief Justice of British Honduras, as Arbitrator. The question to be submitted to the Arbitrator is as follows:

1. Has P. W. Shufeldt, a citizen of the United States, as cessionary of the rights of Víctor M. Morales I. and Francisco Nájera Andrade, the right to claim a pecuniary indemnification for damages and injuries which may have been caused to him by the promulgation of the Legislative Decree of the Assembly of Guatemala No. 1544, by which it disapproved the contract of February 4, 1922, for the extraction of a minimum of 75,000 quintales of chicle, in a defined area in the Department of the Petén, the cession of Nájera Andrade and Morales in favor of Shufeldt having been made by contract of February 11, 1924 [1922] ?
2. In case the Arbitrator declare that Shufeldt does have the right to having an indemnification paid to him by the Government of Guatemala, what sum should the Government of Guatemala in justice pay to the Government of the United States for the account of Shufeldt?

It is proposed that the following procedure shall govern the presentation and adjudication of the case by the Tribunal, and the payment of the award, if any:

1. The Tribunal shall sit at Belize, residence of the Arbitrator.
2. Each Government shall appoint one or more representatives who shall have the authority necessary to appear before the Arbitrator and to represent it.
3. The first day of February 1930 is fixed as the day on which the representatives of the parties shall present their credentials to the Arbitrator either in person or through their respective consular officers. If they be in good and due form, the Arbitrator shall declare the proceedings open.
4. The representatives of the parties shall submit to the Arbitrator a written statement which shall comprise their respective points of view in the relation of the facts, the statements of the juridic point upon which their cause is based and all the proofs which they may wish to present as basis for their claims. They may be set forth in English or in Spanish.

The term, within which the statement of their cause must be presented by the parties, is that of thirty days counted from the time when the Arbitrator declares the proceedings open.

5. Each party shall deliver to the other party a textual copy of its statements, allegations and proofs when the originals thereof are submitted to the Arbitrator.

6. Within sixty days counted from the day on which the last of the parties presented the statement of its cause, in conformity with article 4, each party shall have the right to present a written reply to the allegations of the other party. A copy of that reply shall be delivered to the other at the time of being presented to the Arbitrator.

7. Within thirty days following the termination of the sixty days' period mentioned in article 6, the parties may present oral or written arguments to the Arbitrator, summarizing the proofs and arguments produced in the statements, but no additional evidence shall be presented except at the request of the Arbitrator.

8. Each Government shall have the right to exhibit all documents pertaining to the subject-matter of the arbitration, and the original documents or copies certified by a notary or public officials, whatever may be their character, and to request the production of such documents by the other party.

9. The Arbitrator shall have authority to establish such rules of procedure as he may deem opportune and conducive to the success of the arbitral proceeding, always provided that they do not contradict the bases laid down in the protocol of arbitration.

10. The Tribunal shall keep a record of its proceedings. The two Governments shall assign to the Tribunal such amanuenses, interpreters and employees as may be necessary. The Tribunal is authorized to administer oaths to witnesses and to take evidence on oath.

11. The decision of the Tribunal shall be given within a period of sixty days following the termination of the thirty days' period mentioned in article 7. The decision, when made, shall be forthwith communicated to the Governments at Guatemala and Washington. It shall be accepted as final and binding upon the two Governments.

12. Each Government shall pay its own expenses and one half of the common expenses of the arbitration.

13. The amount granted by the award, if any, shall be payable in gold coin of the United States at the Department of State, Washington, within one year after the rendition of the decision by the Tribunal, with interest at six per centum per annum, beginning to run one month after the rendition of the decision.

14. The honorarium and emoluments of the Arbitrator shall be as agreed upon in previous correspondence.

I avail myself [etc.].

DECISION OF THE ARBITRATOR, JULY 24, 1930.

The questions submitted by the protocol of arbitration, dated 2nd November 1929 (and referred to in the record as marked 1), for the decision of the Arbitrator are—

1. Has P. W. Shufeldt, a citizen of the United States, as cessionary of the rights of Víctor M. Morales I. and Francisco Nájera Andrade, the right to claim a pecuniary indemnification for damages and injuries which may have been caused to him by the promulgation of the Legislative Decree of the Assembly of Guatemala No. 1544, by which it disapproved the contract of February 4, 1922, for the extraction of a minimum of seventy-five thousand quintales of chicle in a defined area in the Department of Petén. the cession of Nájera [Andrade] and Morales in favor of Shufeldt having been made by contract of 11th February 1922?

2. In case the Arbitrator declare that Shufeldt does have the right to have an indemnification paid to him by the Government of Guatemala, what sum should the Government of Guatemala in justice pay to the Government of the United States for the account of Shufeldt?

Two questions only have been referred for arbitration, and I shall endeavor to confine myself to them only and the points raised by the United States Government and the Guatemala Government bearing on these questions.

Where any point raised is not dealt with, it must be taken that I did not consider it necessary or material or of sufficient importance.

I fully appreciate the honor which has been done me by the United States and Guatemala Governments in appointing me Arbitrator in this case, and I have given all the evidence put before me and all the points raised my most careful consideration with the hope of arriving at a just, fair and impartial decision.

I do not propose to review all the cases quoted but will give my decision on any point in accordance with what I consider to be the law based on recognized authority.

On the question of evidence over which there was some argument, I may point out that in considering the cases quoted on both sides it is clear that international courts are by no means as strict as municipal courts and can not be bound by municipal rules in the receipt and admission of evidence. The evidential value of any evidence produced is for the international tribunal to decide under all the circumstances of the case.

The evidence acted upon in this case conforms with paragraph 8 of the protocol of arbitration and is such as brings moral conviction to my mind.

The foundation of this claim is the contract dated the 4th February 1922 made between David Pivaral B. as Secretary of Agriculture in the name of and in representation of the Government of the Republic of Guatemala and Messrs. Francisco Nájera A. and Víctor M. Morales I.

The provisions of this contract are shortly and where material as follows:

1. Permission was granted to Nájera and Morales to extract chicle in a section of the public lands situate in the Department of Petén in Guatemala.

2. The period of the concession was ten years from the date it was signed, which period could be extended for five years more by mutual agreement.

11. The employees, station masters, chicle inspectors designated by Nájera and Morales by agreement with the authorities of the Department shall have the character of auxiliary authorities for the purpose of preventing and prosecuting fraudulent exploitation and for maintaining order in the contracted zone and prosecuting offenders.

12. Exemption from military service &c.

13. Nájera and Morales obligate themselves to maintain in good condition the natural products of the zone as are not in a condition to be exploited and that they shall effect the extraction of resin in such a manner that it shall not harm or destroy the life of the trees.

14. This chicle negotiation is subjected to the supervision of the respective authorities and to the laws and fiscal by-laws now in force.

15. At expiration of contract or any extension of same, the construction and improvements constructed in the area contracted, such as dwellings, warehouses, roads, telegraph, telephone and railroad lines, railroads, tramways, artesian wells, or any other constructions whatever will pass over to the benefit or possession of the Government.

16. It is expressly agreed between both contracting parties that on entering the fifth year that the contract is in force, they will proceed to make an inventory of all the improvements, constructions, implements, working material &c., which the company may have introduced into the area for the business undertaken and that this inventory will serve as a basis for the delivery of the improvements specified in preceding paragraph upon the expiration of the contract or extension of same. This inventory may be repeated or amplified as many times as the Government may deem advisable.

17. It is also agreed upon that in case of any question arising from failure of fulfilment or misinterpretation of any of the clauses of this contract the subject will not be taken by any means to the courts of justice nor shall the case be referred to diplomatic channels but that any question which may arise will be submitted to two arbitrators, appointed one by each party, and in case of disagreement between both arbitrators they will appoint a third arbitrator whose action or finding on the subject will be deemed final or just without appeal.

18. The Government may dispose of the sum of five thousand dollars deposited as guarantee of this contract as per clause 9 (a) which amount in case of revocation or cancellation of the contract can not be claimed or refunded to them. This five thousand dollars American gold shall be repaid by export duties which correspond to the last lots upon which duties should be paid to the customs.

19. This contract only grants the right to Nájera and Morales to extract and export the chicle from this area and the uses and services which have been mentioned, but the Government expressly reserves to itself the right of absolute dominion and possession of the section or area mentioned; therefore the above-mentioned gentlemen can not withhold its delivery upon expiration of the contract or extension of the same, or upon declaration of the cancellation of the rights under the contract for the reasons specified in same.

This contract was approved of by the President of the Republic of Guatemala on the same day it was signed, and the contract with the President's

3. Nájera and Morales bound themselves to extract and export a minimum quantity of seventy-five thousand quintales of chicle during the ten-year term of contract.

4. Nájera and Morales bound themselves to export one thousand quintales of chicle as a minimum during the first year contract in force, five thousand in the second year and eight thousand five hundred in the next following years.

5. Five dollars American gold was to be paid to Guatemala Government for every quintal of chicle exported—a quintal to be considered as 46 kilos net. This payment was to include the extraction and export duties, the municipal taxes and whatever taxes may be imposed in the future.

6. Payments to be made to the Government, to be made to National Treasury at Guatemala City or any other place designated by the Government of Guatemala.

7. One year from date of signing contract Nájera and Morales obligated themselves to form a company under existing laws of Guatemala, the same period being allowed for beginning the works of the installation of the business.

8. The rights granted to Nájera and Morales by the Government of Guatemala under contract were—

- (a) To introduce free of import duty machinery, implements and tools needed for the extraction and export of chicle.
- (b) To make free use of the natural resources of contracted zone, &c.
- (c) To use rivers, lakes &c., for conveyance of their products.
- (d) To introduce laborers and employees of other nationalities except negro and yellow races.
- (e) To make plantations of grain within the area ceded for exploitation, but in such case to pay Government of Guatemala two thousand dollars annually and in advance as rental duties for the area contracted.

9. Nájera and Morales bind themselves—

- (a) To deposit in National Treasury five thousand dollars American gold within fifteen days from the date contract approved as guarantee of the obligations assumed.
- (b) To prevent fraudulent exploitation of forests within area.
- (c) Within five years to demark and clean limits of area.
- (d) To give preference of employment to Guatemalan citizens.
- (e) To render monthly statement to authorities &c.

10. The rights ceded by this contract will be cancelled:

- (a) For failure to deposit at the proper time the five thousand dollars, which deposit Nájera and Morales bind themselves to make in accordance with clause 9 paragraph (a) of contract.
- (b) For failure to extract and fabricate the annual amounts of chicle referred to in clause 3.
- (c) For infraction of the privileges granted to introduce implements &c., exempted from duties.

approval was published in El Guatemalteco, the official newspaper of the Government of Guatemala, in its issue of the 18th February 1922 (see annex 2 of United States Case).

On the 11th February 1922 the five thousand dollars American gold was paid into National Treasury as provided for in paragraph 9 (a) of the contract and a receipt given therefor signed by the National Treasurer, E. Hernandez, and sealed with the seal of the National Treasury (see annex[es] 1 A and 1 B of United States Case).

On the 1st March 1922 in the Acting President's message to the National Legislative Assembly at the opening of its ordinary sessions, it is stated that "the respective Secretaries of State will give you a detailed account in their [printed] 'memorial,s]' which they will present to you of each and every account of the work which has been accomplished by their respective offices during the year just passed" (see annex 8, United States Case).

In El Guatemalteco of the 15 April 1922 (annex 11 of United States Case) in the report of the proceedings of the National Assembly of 14th March 1922 it appears that the Minister of Agriculture presented, with accompanying documents, a report or memorial of the work verified by that Department during the past fiscal year. This report and accompanying documents were referred to the National Assembly's Commission on Agriculture, who in reporting thereon submitted the following resolution:

The Legislative Assembly is now informed of the work consigned in the memorial rendered by the Secretary of State in the despatch of agriculture for the year 1922.

On the 25th April 1922 the report of the Commission of Agriculture was approved (see annex 12, United States Case).

This memorial is required to be submitted to the National Assembly by article 75 of Constitution of Guatemala and must in the absence of proof to the contrary be presumed to have contained copies of all the contracts made, including the one in question, or some reference to them.

The Legislative session closed on 29th May 1922, and in June was printed and published at the National Printing Office of the Republic a document purporting to be "the memorial of the Minister of Agriculture presented to the National Legislative Assembly at its ordinary session of 1922" and bearing in print the official seal or stamp of Guatemala. This forms annex 10 of the United States Case and is put in by them as the memorial of the Minister of Agriculture, and this document contains a copy of the contract and other mention thereof.

The Guatemala Government contend that this document is not the memorial of the Minister of Agriculture and that the memorial contained no mention of the contract and that the contract was never submitted to the Legislative Assembly, but would appear to have been deliberately and wilfully withheld from them.

This would seem to be a charge against the then Government of Guatemala, but I do not see how it can discredit Shufeldt, unless he was in league with the Guatemala Government against his own interests and then one would be as bad as the other. I place no value on this statement.

The Guatemala Government put in a photostat copy of a typewritten document (exhibit 25) which they contend is the memorial of the Minister of Agriculture and which contains no mention of the contract. They also put in as exhibit 27 a similar document to annex 10 of United States Case, apparently to show that as it had not been printed till June it could not have been the "printed memorial" which the United States Government stated was laid before the Legislature which closed in May. The United States Government did state in their Case that the printed memorial was laid before the Legislature, but this was clearly a mistake as will be seen later; the memorial must have been laid in type and printed after. No further use was made of this exhibit 27 by the Guatemala Government.

This document (exhibit 25) is word for word the same as the first and signed portion of annex 10, but without the accompanying documents contained in annex 10. On a perusal of this exhibit 25 it is quite clear that it is not the whole memorial, in fact exhibit 25 would seem to be only the Minister of Agriculture's report on the memorial of his Department for he says on page 9 of exhibit 25 (translation):

The memorial of the General Board accompanying this report, will give you an idea of what that important office has done towards the development of their program.

It is clear therefore that there were other documents submitted with the report and together forming what is called the memorial, and this is borne out by references in this report (exhibit 25) to other parts of memorial which are not included in exhibit 25 but are in annex 10 of the United States Case and exhibit 27 of the Guatemala Government Reply; e.g., on page 17 of the translation of exhibit 25 the Minister of Agriculture says: "If these matters do not appear to you as deserving of your attention, I beg to request your glancing at the initiative exposed at the end of this memorial (appendix A)." Appendix A is included in annex 10 and exhibit 27. Again on page 20 of exhibit 25 he says: "The statistical tables shown in another part of this memorial are a part and give an idea of the work done by that important dependency of the Ministry."

On page 21 of the translation of exhibit 25 he states: "In order to bring that idea into practice, I have dared to formulate a complementary project to our immigration law of 1909, which, marked with the letter B, in the appendix to this memorial" (contained in United States annex 10, p. 175, and in Guatemala exhibit 27).

On page 22 he says: "These ideas receive a more ample development in the initiative I permit myself to submit in the appendix of the memorial marked with the letter C, which deals with the repopulation of the forest [of forests] and to which I request your benevolent attention" (United States annex 10, p. 182, and Guatemala exhibit 27).

All these references are found in the printed copy of the memorial (United States annex 10 and Guatemala exhibit 27) but not in Guatemala exhibit 25 which the Guatemala Government claim to be the memorial.

The Guatemala Government in further support of their contention that the contract was not submitted to Assembly and [that] no mention was made of the contract in the memorial, contend that the report (exhibit 29 of the Guatemala Government) of the Agricultural Commission of the Assembly on the memorial does not mention the contract. This report however does mention certain contracts which they say are not included in the memorial. Had the contract of the 4th February 1922 not been included it must be presumed that it would have been mentioned. As a matter of fact the contract is given in full with the President's approval just as published in El Guatemalteco at pages 145-49 of annex 10 and is also mentioned in the list of Executive orders (acuerdos) on page 167 as having been approved; that the Commission considered this list is clear from the following passage therein at bottom of page 3 of the translation of the report: "Of the lecture of the resolutions passed during the year, we make a résumé &c."

In further support of this contention the Government of Guatemala submitted a certificate from Raf. Castellanos A. and Ramón Calderón, Secretaries of the Legislative Assembly of Guatemala, dated 18th February 1930 to the effect that in the text of the memorial presented by the Ministry of Agriculture in the year 1922 to the Legislative Assembly, relative to the work undertaken by said Ministry from March 15, 1921, to March 15, 1922, no mention was made to the contract celebrated on February 4th 1922 between Ministry of Agriculture and Messrs. Francisco Nájera Andrade and Víctor M. Morales I.

What is the exact meaning of the word text in this certificate I am not prepared to say. In view of the fact that the Guatemala Government contend that the report portion of the memorial is the memorial, it may mean text of the report part of the memorial only or the text of the part other than the report or the whole memorial. It is too indefinite for me to act on in any case, particularly in face of evidence before recited and other evidence which I have not cited.

In the face of the facts already related, exhibit 25 of the Guatemala Government is certainly not the whole memorial, and those facts and others to be mentioned later lead me irresistibly to the conclusion that the contract was submitted to the Legislative Assembly in the memorial and that that body were fully cognizant thereof, and I so find.

I will now consider the question of the legality of the contract, apart from the question of its submission to the Legislative Assembly.

Where a contract has been made by the Executive and duly reported to the Assembly and approved—and where a document is laid before the Assembly in accordance with the law and no objection taken, it must be taken to be approved—it is difficult to see what more is wanted to make it legal, and the fact of my having found that the contract was submitted to the Legislative Assembly settles most of the grounds of illegality urged by the Guatemala Government, and it is not really necessary for me to discuss further the legality of the contract. I will however discuss the points on which the Guatemala Government contend the contract is illegal, and they are eight in number, as given in their Case (p. 16).

- (a) The Minister for Agriculture had no authority to make same.
- (b) The President had no authority to approve of the same.

I will deal with these two together.

In support of these contentions the Guatemala Government tender a certificate from Raf. Castellanos A. and Ramón Calderón, Secretaries of the Legislative Assembly of Guatemala, to the effect that in the month of February 1922 the Executive Power was not authorized by the Assembly to celebrate contracts as prescribed in paragraph 6th of Article 54 of the Constitution, which gives among the attributes of the Assembly the power to authorize the Executive to make contracts, and to approve or disapprove of contracts made under such authority, and in exhibit 6 of the Guatemala Case Mr. J. A. Mandujano, a Guatemalan lawyer, gives it as his opinion that the Government was not authorized by Congress to enter into any contract under the provisions of article 54, paragraph 6.

The American Government, however, refer me to article 650 of chapter 6 of title XIII of the Fiscal Code of Guatemala, which is to the following effect: "The authorization to exploit national forests will be conceded by means of contracts which will be celebrated with the Executive or by leases which will be celebrated with the Jefe Político."

As to this the Guatemala Government contend that the contract is one of lease and therefore not within article 650. This would imply that if the contract is one of exploitation and not of lease article 650 would apply. The question of lease will be dealt with later.

The United States Government also submitted that under Decree No. 12 of the Legislature dated the 20th December 1921 the Executive Power was authorized to make such contract.

This decree is published in El Guatemalteco vol. C, no. 83 of the 24th December 1921 and is as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The Executive Power is amply empowered to enact all dispositions in respect to regulating the economic condition of the State.

ARTICLE 2. Executive Power shall report to the Assembly during its ordinary sessions of 1922 such acts as he may dictate.

The Guatemala Government contend that this does not empower the Executive to make contracts, and in support of this rely on the opinion of J. A. Mandujano and Marcial Salas, Guatemalan lawyers, to this effect: "The Legislative Decree No. 12, second series of December 20 [th], 1921, did not confer powers to the Executive to celebrate contracts; said faculties can only be granted by the Assembly under a clear and categorical form." The Guatemala Government in their Reply, section 81, say: "In order to further show that Decree No. 12 . . . does not grant any power to the Executive to execute contracts, the Republic [of Guatemala] exhibits Decrees 1199, 1312, and 1500 made subsequently thereto, by which it will be seen that the Legislative Assembly granted the Executive the power to execute contracts specifically. A comparison of these last-mentioned decrees with the former (annex 7) will be conclusive in this point."

These three Decrees 1199, 1312, and 1500 (exhibits 43, 44, and 45 of Guatemala) were passed by the Assembly on the 27th May 1922, 5th May 1924, and 3rd May 1927 all after the contract had been made, and could not in justice be allowed to affect acts done and rights acquired under a previous decree of the Assembly. I can see no grounds for doubting that the Executive had the power to contract. The President must have known whether he had the power to contract or not, and the publication of the contract is certainly not in accord with his trying to get away with something he was not legally entitled to.

(c) The period of duration thereof was contrary to the law of the Republic of Guatemala.

(d) The lease or rental of the territory in question without previous public auction was contrary to [the] law [of the Republic of Guatemala].

In support of these contentions the Guatemala Government refers to the opinion of Mr. J. A. Mandujano, a Guatemalan lawyer (exhibit 6, sec. 11), who says: "In consequence of articles 1439, 1440, 1443, 1444, 1447, 1459 of the Fiscal Code and 1645 and 1668 of the Civil Code, no property belonging to the Republic can be sold or rented if the sales are not submitted to public auction, and even in those cases the maximum period of rental can not exceed 5 years."

The contract in question is not one of sale or rental of Guatemalan property and this is clear from a perusal thereof particularly section 19; it merely gives the right to extract chicle, with certain privileges in connection therewith among which is the one to make plantings of grain which if exercised was to be paid for by annual payments. This privilege in my opinion can not change the whole character of the contract from a concession to extract chicle to that of a lease of the land, this would be a case of the lesser containing the greater; nor can the use of the terms "tenant", "lease", "lessee", &c., in documents or papers unconnected with the contract as referred to in certain parts of the case.

The protocol refers to Shufeldt as cessionary and I can not but presume that the Governments who signed the protocol carefully weighed the significance of the terms they used.

(e) The duties payable thereunder were less than those required to be collected by the said law.

The contract having been approved by the Assembly, any variations in the rate of duty then in existence would be made good even if the Executive had no previous authority to make such change. It is not therefore necessary for me to comment further on the matter, but the Guatemala Government in support of their contention do not refer me to the law on the subject but submit (1) the opinion of Mr. J. A. Mandujano, as follows: "According to the customs-house tariff which is a law of Guatemala the exportation of each quintal of chicle is impose [sic] a tax of $7.00 American gold be it the product of public or private lands. These exportation duties were in force on the 4th February 1922 and only Congress has power, as per article 54 of the Constitution to modify or abrogate them", and (2) a certificate from F. Fuentes Dias, Under Secretary of State in the Department of Finance and Public Credit, to the effect that the export duty on chicle in February 1922 was seven dollars per quintal. Supposing however that these two statements be correct from a general point of view, they do not show that the tax may not be altered under certain special circumstances.

Article 54 of the Constitution, referred to in Mr. Mandujano's opinion, provides in section 12 for the giving by the Legislative Assembly to the Executive extraordinary power when demanded by necessity or the interest of the State; and in the El Guatemalteco of the 17th January 1922 it is reported that at the eighteenth session of the Assembly on 2nd January 1922 as follows: "After being read, the report of the Combined Committee on Legislation and Finance was put to a discussion for once only and that point of the resolution which read as follows was approved:"

By virtue of the decree issued by the Assembly during the present extraordinary session under date of the 20th of last month (Decree No. 12, Second Series) the Executive is fully empowered to legislate upon fiscal matters included in the economic adjustment and in consequence the Department of the Treasury and Public Credit may enact whatever tax law it may deem adequate, or modify the one now in force (Decree 1153) as it sees fit and to enact any other laws on the economic order which in its judgment may promote the well-known interests of the State.

It would seem therefore that the Executive had full powers to reduce the tax as was done in the contract, if considered advisable.

In this connection I will mention that in a bulletin issued by the Director General of Customs purporting to be printed at the Government Printing Office and bearing the official stamp or seal of the Department, put in by the United States as annex B to their Reply, I see that "Chicle pays 7 cents American gold per lb. (order of October 31, 1914) and pays by contract 5 cents American Gold per pound (vol. 101 nos. 30, 31 & 56 of El Guatemalteco)". (The Guatemala Government objects to this annex as not being "certified, not official and incomplete"—but make use of it as evidence for themselves: p. 5 of their Final Argument.) I can not avoid the conclusion that the Executive had the power to do what they did. I may point out that in a volume of the laws of Guatemala entitled "Recompilation of the Laws of the Republic of Guatemala 1921-22", published at the Government Printing Office in 1927 and bearing the official stamp or arms, I find copy of a contract made between the Minister of Forests, on instructions of the President, with the Chicle Development Company for the extraction of chicle approved by the President on the 2nd February 1922. In this contract the duty payable on chicle is five dollars per quintal. The contract in this case is also contained in this same volume. This would point to the fact that the contract was deemed and treated as legal up to the time of this publication.

(f) The authority to import free of duty purported to be given under clause 8 of the said agreement was contrary to the said law.

In view of the powers of the Executive as shown above it is hardly necessary to discuss this point.

(g) The authority to constitute the employees of P. W. Shufeldt & Company to be government officials purported to be given in clause 11 of the said agreement is contrary to law.

Clause 11 of the contract as I read it can not be held to confer authority on the concessionaires to constitute their employees government officials, it only provides that the employees by agreement with the authorities shall have the character of auxiliary authorities. The government authorities must sanction the assumption of any such character and there is no general power given to concessionaires to sanction the assumption of such character without the approval of the authorities. The Guatemala Government refer me to the opinion of Mr. J. A. Mandujano (exhibit 6, translation) who says: "The appointment of any person having official authority corresponds to the Government of the Republic, but the authority to effect these appointments can not be delegated or bestowed on any person", but why or on what authority he does not say.

(h) The said agreement was not submitted for nor received the approval of the National Assembly.

This point has already been dealt with.

I will now deal with events subsequent to the making of the contract and giving rise to Shufeldt's interest in the contract and to the present proceedings.

On the 11th February 1922 or about seven days after the making of the contract the concessionaires assigned all their rights and obligations without reservation whatever to Shufeldt on the following terms: (1) Shufeldt to pay on the day of assignment five thousand dollars American gold and continue to pay during life of contract five thousand yearly on same date "of this instrument being drawn" and in addition three dollars American gold for each hundredweight of chicle extracted; (2) Shufeldt to make all payments the concessionaires are under the contract bound to pay to the Government (United States annex to Case, No. 3).

On 1st July 1922 Nájera and Morales notified the Minister of Agriculture of the transfer to Shufeldt and asked that Shufeldt be considered as concessionaire under contract and that the authorities in Petén be so informed.

On the 7th July 1922 Shufeldt also reported the transfer and made a similar request, and on the 10th July the Minister of Agriculture instructed that Shufeldt be so recognized.

On 25th April 1922 Deputy Franco in a motion in the National Assembly proposed the following decree—that the constitutive law of the Republic empowers the Executive to grant concessions for a term of 10 years to those introducing or establishing new industries in the Republic; that without character of novelty some persons under pretended contracts with the Government have succeeded in obtaining true monopolies for the exploitation of well-known industries in the country and that with it not only are the collective rights hurt, but it violates the dispositions in article 20 of the Constitution of the Republic.

CONSIDERING

THEREFORE

the National Legislative Assembly decrees:

ARTICLE 1. Under no circumstances or whatsoever pretence nor in any form may concessions be granted for the introduction or exploitation of industries already known in the country.

ARTICLE 2. The concessions granted prior to the decree are declared null with no value or effect and in fact lapsed even though in its granting the form employed was that of a contract.

This motion was referred to the Commission of Legislation and Constitutional Points who reported against it saying as to article 2, that the decree "would establish a disposition of retroactive effects contrary to the general principles of right" and on the 17th April 1923 Mr. Franco's motion was rejected.

During the debate on this motion it was proposed that a special study be made of all the contracts made during the year, but this was rejected. The present contract was clearly one of the contracts made during the constitutional year in which the motion was made, it had been published in the gazette before the motion was made and also purported to have been laid before the Assembly in the usual way, in the Minister of Agriculture's memorial. If therefore further evidence of approval of the contract was needed here we have it. In negating the resolution we also have approval or sanction of the monopoly which it is contended the contract created, and which was one of the grounds of disapproval stated in the proposed decree submitted by the Commission on Agriculture to the Legislative Assembly in their report which led to passing of the decree disapproving of contract on the 22nd May 1928—but not mentioned in the decree as eventually passed.

On the 16th January 1923 in accordance with the provisions of section 7 of the contract Shufeldt and one Don Clodoveo Berges entered into partnership for the purpose of exploiting and exporting chicle from Department of Petén in complete conformity with the requirements of the contract, on the following terms, so far as material to this case:

1. The name of the firm will be P. W. Shufeldt & Co. and the partner Shufeldt shall have exclusive use of it, (2) society to exist ten years, Mr. Berges to have right to withdraw from the company at any time, in which case he shall have the right to collect his capital with six per cent, (3) the partner Shufeldt contributes as capital the concession of which he is grantee, (4) the partner Berges will contribute the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars American gold and is obligated to put the same sum in the funds of the company as soon as the business demands it, (5) the partner Berges has no right to share in profits until his contribution is made, (6) in case the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars gold as contribution of partner Berges is not handed over within thirty days after a demand made in writing this deed of partnership will be non-existent.

Mr. Berges never paid up the twenty-five thousand dollars and died in 1924 having no claim whatever on the partnership. On 29th March 1928 Shufeldt entered into partnership with David Davidson on similar terms to previous partnership, except that Shufeldt contributed as capital the right of exploiting and extracting chicle but will remain the only owner of the concession. In the articles of incorporation is recited the death of Berges without his having contributed his twenty-five thousand dollars. Davidson has never contributed his twenty-five thousand dollars, and he therefore has no claim or interest whatsoever in the partnership or concession (annex 11 to United States Reply). The question raised on this partnership will be dealt with later.

On 24th April 1923 a petition by the Peteneros was presented to the Legislative Assembly, asking for a revision of the contracts with the Chicle Development Co., with Nájera and Morales, and with Attorney Leonardo Lara and stating that the Nájera and Morales contract had been transferred to Shufeldt. This petition was referred to the Agriculture Commission, and the Minister of Agriculture forwarded to the Legislative Assembly certified copies of those contracts on the 30th April 1923, about one year after the signing of the contract in question (see exhibit 7 of Guatemala Government). This petition, judging from exhibit 7, is still with the Commission on Agriculture—but here is further evidence of the contract being brought to the notice of the Legislature. From these facts the Legislature knew of the contract in April 1923, and did nothing for about five years. It was no doubt difficult to do anything in face of their previous action, but it was up to the Legislative Assembly to move, and do their duty (if any), and on what grounds it is stated that influence was brought to bear on the Commission on behalf of parties interested I fail to see.

Certainly Shufeldt would not seem to have tried to use any influence with Assembly as he wrote to the President on the subject of this petition and the President replied assuring him that he need have no fear that the procedure of the aforementioned persons (the petitioners) will injure the legitimately acquired rights. Being thus assured by the Head of the Government why should Shufeldt try to influence the Commission? Had Shufeldt addressed the Assembly as the Guatemala Government in section 35 of their Answer seem to think he ought to have, there might have been more reason for thinking he was trying to influence the Assembly.

The contract continued in force up to the 22nd May 1928, when Decree No. 1544 was passed by the Legislative Assembly disapproving the contract. During all these six years Shufeldt had been carrying out his contract, expending money on it and paying what the contract called for to the Government. Relying on the good faith of the Government he expended large sums in providing the necessary appliances, roads &c., for facilitating and expediting the extraction and export of chicle in the hope of recouping his expenditure by the time the contract expired (see annex 14 A of United States Case, p. 189).

During these six years the Government—and in speaking of the Government I mean the Executive who must be presumed to be acting in accordance with law and whose acts, those dealing with the Government are justified in treating as acts of the Government—recognized and treated the contract as a legal contract, as for instance—

(1) The Government received the five dollars a quintal on all the chicle exported and gave receipts therefor, and the two thousand dollars a year in respect of plantings in the area.

(2) On 28th February 1928 the President wrote to Shufeldt about ceding "part of the land which you have contracted" (see annex No. 28, United States Case).

(3) On the 2nd May 1927 the Minister of Agriculture wrote to Shufeldt, acknowledging receipt of "a copy of the detailed report of the improvements made by you in the zone of Petén, which you are working as grantee in accordance with the respective contract". This inventory is required by section 16 of the contract.

The Guatemala Government, in section 37 of their Answer, point out that this inventory was overdue and had to be asked for. This may be so, but the Guatemala Government accepted the inventory without protest and took no action; and it was certainly not a ground on which the contract was cancelled, and whatever cause of complaint there may have been was waived.

In view of my finding that the contract was laid before the Legislature and approved by them, it is not necessary for me to deal with the second point raised by the United States Case, viz., that the Guatemala Government having recognized the validity of the contract for six years and received all the benefits to which they were entitled under the contract and allowed Shufeldt to go on spending money on the concession, is precluded from denying its validity, even if the approval of the Legislature had not been given to it.

I may however state on this point that in all the circumstances I have related and the whole case submitted to me, I have no doubt that this contention of the United States is sound and in keeping with the principles of international law and I so find.

I will now pass on to a consideration of the decree which put an end to the contract, and the points raised in connection therewith.

It is not necessary for me to go into what led up to the enactment of the decree, or the influencing causes, suffice it to say that as shown in the decree itself it was not due to any action of Shufeldt's. On 22nd May 1928 the Legislative Assembly of Guatemala passed Decree No. 1544 which is as follows:

The Legislative Assembly of the Republic of Guatemala consider that the contract celebrated on the 4th February 1922, by the Secretary of State in charge of the Ministry of Agriculture and Messrs. Francisco Nájera Andrade and Víctor M. Morales I. by virtue of which these latter are given permission for the extraction of chicle in a zone of the public lands situate in the Department of Petén and defined in that said contract, is harmful to the national interests, in violation of dispositions and prohibitions defined under the laws of the Republic and especially those contained in articles 653, 1458, 1459 of the Fiscal Code, and that it is within legislative attributions to approve or disapprove contracts of the nature of that in question—

Therefore, be it decreed:

ONLY ARTICLE: The contract in question is disapproved. The Executive should take such measures and emit such dispositions as the case demands, to the effect that the zone of public lands be returned to the power of the State. Passed to the Executive for publication and compliance.

This decree was approved of by the President and published in the El Guatemalteco of 7th July 1928. This brought the contract summarily to an end, thus depriving Shufeldt of all his rights under the contract.

The grounds on which the decree is based are three:

- (1) harmful to national interests,
- (2) in violation of dispositions and prohibitions defined under the laws of the Republic and especially those contained in articles 653, 1458, 1459 of the Fiscal Code,
- (3) that it is within legislative attributes to approve or disapprove of such contracts.

As to (1) and (3), it is perfectly competent for the Government of Guatemala to enact any decree they like and for any reasons they see fit, and such reasons are no concern of this Tribunal. But this Tribunal is only concerned where such a decree, passed even on the best of grounds, works injustice to an alien subject, in which case the Government ought to make compensation for the injury inflicted and can not invoke any municipal law to justify their refusal to do so.

As to (2), the provisions of the Fiscal Code referred to relate solely to leases of national forests and leases of national real property. Article 653 is found in title 6 of the Fiscal Code in the same title and chapter that article 650 referred to before is found, and on a consideration of the two articles under same title and chapter I come to the conclusion that article 653 refers to leases by the Jefe Político and not to contracts celebrated by the Executive for the exploitation of national forests as provided by article 650. Articles 1458 and 1459 deal with the alienation of national property.

It is significant that the grounds of disapproval are inherent in the contract and not due to any breach of the contract. According to the Guatemala Government the contract was null and void ab initio and never had any existence, to set up a breach of the contract is to admit a legal contract. I will however consider the points raised.

The Guatemala Government in section 34 of their Case contend that this decree establishes the fact that the contract was null and void ab initio. I can not agree with this contention, but as I have already found that the contract was a valid contract made by the Executive and approved by the Legislature, it is not necessary therefore to discuss this point.

In sections 38 and 39 of their Case the Guatemala Government contend that the contract provides for its own automatic cancellation, in the event of the minimum quantity of chicle specified not being exported and that such minimum was not exported in 1924 and 1925. In section 3 of their contentions at the end of their Case, they contend that the said agreement of the 4th February 1922 was abrogated, cancelled and avoided under the terms thereof, by reason of the grantee's failing to comply therewith "as set out in paragraphs 39 and 40 hereof".

There is however no provision in the contract for automatic cancellation, the contract says "will be cancelled" and contemplates a declaration of cancellation before actual cancellation, as section 19 of the contract says that the Government expressly reserves to itself the right of absolute dominion and possession of the section or area mentioned, therefore the concessionaires can not "withhold its delivery upon expiration of the contract or extension of same, or upon declaration of the cancellation of the rights under the contract for the reasons specified".

If there was a contravention of the agreement as alleged, it is clear from the evidence that the Government took no steps to cancel the contract and did not refer the matter to arbitration under the terms of section 17 of the contract, and that the Government continued to recognize the validity of the contract and receive the benefits accruing to it thereunder up to the time of the passing of the decree—a matter of about three years after the alleged breach—thereby in my opinion waiving such breach (if any).

But was there a contravention? The chicle business year runs from about July one year to July next year, and from annex 64 of United States Case and the receipts of the Guatemala Government referred to therein, which I have inspected, there was less chicle extracted in seasons 1923-24, 1925-26, 1926-27 and 1927-28 than called for by section four of the contract, but in the seasons 1922-23 and 1924-25 enough was extracted to cover all deficiencies in the other years and leave a balance over and above the proportionate part for six years of the seventy-five thousand quintales required for the whole period (ten years) of the contract.

Again, section 3 of the contract provides for the extraction and export of a minimum of seventy-five thousand quintales of chicle during the ten years of the contract, while section 4 gives the quantities to be exported each year, but section 10 states that on a failure to comply with section 3, not section 4, the contract will be cancelled. Section 3 has been more than complied with and section 4 would seem to be subsidiary and merely directory to section 3.

In any case the Guatemala Government can not set up this alleged breach as the cause of the cancellation in face of the provisions of the decree.

The Guatemala Government also contend that the contract was "abrogated, cancelled and avoided" by the using of machetes for bleeding the trees instead of a scratcher contrary to law and fiscal regulations, and support this by an affidavit of one Franco J. Perez (exhibit 14) who states that he was employed at Plancha de Piedra in 1925, 1926 and that during that period chicle was bled in the zone in question by the use of machetes.

The contract makes no provisions for the use of machetes, but provides, section 13, that the resin shall be extracted in "such a manner that it will not harm or destroy the life of the trees" and also that (section 14) "this chicle negotiation is subjected to the supervision of the respective authorities and to the laws and fiscal by-laws now in force". If therefore the law had been broken in this way the authorities could have proceeded under the law; but the Government never having taken any steps to put a stop to this practice which they must have known existed either under the law or by arbitration under the contract, and never having declared the contract cancelled therefor, and having recognized the contract all through, and thus making themselves particeps criminis in such breach (if any) of the law, can not now in my opinion avail themselves of this contention.

I may also point out that the use of the machete is not a ground given in the decree for the disapproval of the contract, nor is there any evidence of the trees having been in any way damaged or destroyed by such use.

Having found that the contract was a valid contract and that there was no breach thereof by Shufeldt, the question arises did Shufeldt acquire any rights of property under the contract.

There can not be any doubt that property rights are created under and by virtue of a contract, and the Guatemala Government admit this in section 103 of their Answer as follows: "The Republic of Guatemala does not deny that the grantee or assignee of a legal and binding contract acquires property rights subject to the terms and conditions of the [such] contract." There is therefore no need to discuss this question further. Shufeldt did, in view of my findings, possess the rights of property given to him under the contract.

The Guatemala Government however contended (in their Reply, sections 105-107) that notwithstanding that Shufeldt may have acquired rights under the contract in the first instance, yet by forming the company required to be formed under the contract (section 7), and assigning to such company all his rights under the contract, he has divested himself of all his rights and vested them in the company Shufeldt & Company, and that Shufeldt "has no rights under the contract which he could either enforce by action in courts of law or by invoking the aid of the United States as an American citizen".

There was considerable argument on both sides as to whether a partnership was a juridical entity in Guatemalan law and whether the Shufeldt-Berges or the Shufeldt-Davidson partnership was in existence at the date of the decree depriving Shufeldt of the concession, but in the view I take it is not necessary for me to consider those questions. The Guatemala Government contend that the Shufeldt-Berges partnership was in existence, and the United States that the Shufeldt-Davidson partnership was in existence, but it makes no difference which was in existence, or whether any partnership was in existence, as it is not the rights of the partnership that are in question but the personal interest of Shufeldt in the partnership. Had Shufeldt not formed a partnership, the terms of the contract to that effect would not have been carried out, but this could not affect the present question; the Guatemala Government did not take any action in the matter, the contract was being carried out, no injury was done to the Guatemala Government, and if the reason for the provision as to the formation of a company in the contract was what is suggested in section 105 of the Guatemala Government's Reply, viz., to prevent the possibility of the grantee's rights under the said contract falling into the "hands of an alien with the subsequent risk of international claim such as the one that has actually arisen in this present case", then the Guatemala Government was trying to do what it could not do in the eyes of international law. International law will not be bound by municipal law or by anything but natural justice, and will look behind the legal person to the real interests involved.

The Guatemala Government, by way of showing that Clodoveo Berges had an interest in the partnership, states in sections 26 and 27 of their Reply that Francisco Nájera assigned to Berges for the sum of ten thousand dollars his right to receive under the contract one hundred and fifty dollars per quintal for chicle exported and that there was due to Berges fifty-nine thousand seven hundred and fifty-six dollars and ninety-nine cents on this account, and that this more than covered the twenty-five thousand dollars capital to be brought into the partnership by Berges. This assignment is given as exhibit 31 of the Guatemala Government's Reply, and it is dated the 12th October 1923. On that same day, however, and in the presence of the same parties, Berges assigned to Shufeldt the same rights assigned to him by Nájera for the sum of ten thousand dollars (see annex 50, p. 358, of the United States Case), and I have seen a certified copy of such assignment of the 12th October 1923 furnished me by the United States consul at my request.

I am perfectly satisfied that Berges had no pecuniary interest in the partnership either before or after his death, nor had Davidson at the date of the decree, and that all the rights conferred under the contract to the concessionaires were vested in Shufeldt and he was the only sufferer by the decree terminating the concession and in effect confiscating all his rights and interests therein.

Any other view with regard to this question of partnership would be contrary to the provisions of the protocol of arbitration, which submits this question: "Has P. W. Shufeldt . . . the right to claim pecuniary indemnification . . .?" What does the word "right" in this question mean? It can only mean an equitable right of which international law takes cognizance. It can not mean legal right enforceable only in keeping with Guatemalan law, for if that was so this case never would have been referred to an international tribunal which does not administer municipal law.

If this point raised by the Guatemala Government was sound why should they have consented to arbitration? They referred to arbitration not the rights of Shufeldt & Co. but those of Shufeldt and this notwithstanding the provision in the contract requiring the formation of a partnership, put therein for the purpose of preventing such an arbitration. No international tribunals will allow municipal legal fictions of this sort to prevent them doing strict justice.

The Guatemala Government contend further that the decree of the 22nd May 1928 was the constitutional act of a sovereign State exercised by the National Assembly in due form according to the Constitution of the Republic and that such decree has the form and power of law and is not subject to review by any judicial authority. This may be quite true from a national point of view but not from an international point of view, for "it is a settled principle of international law that a sovereign can not be permitted to set up one of his own municipal laws as a bar to a claim by a sovereign for a wrong done to the latter's subject".

Having dealt with all the points of any importance urged for and against the right of Shufeldt to claim pecuniary indemnification I come to the conclusion and find that he has such a right.

I will now consider the question of damages and will, to begin with, quote the words of the Arbitrator in the claim of R. H. May vs. Guatemala and Guatemala vs. May, reported in Foreign Relations of the United States, 1900 (p. 673): "I can not pretend to lay down the law concerning damages in clearer words than those of the advocate of the Guatemala Government who uses the following language in the counter-claim: 'The law of Guatemala says Don Jorge Munoz (to which the claimant is subject in this case) establishes, like those of all civilized nations of the earth, that contracts produce reciprocal rights and obligations between the contracting parties; that whoever concludes a contract is bound not only to fulfil it but also to recoup or compensate (the other party) for damages and prejudice which result directly or indirectly from the nonfulfilment or infringement by default or fraud of the party concerned and that such compensation includes both damage suffered and profits lost: damnum emergens et lucrum cessans.'"

The damnum emergens is always recoverable, but the lucrum cessans must be the direct fruit of the contract and not too remote or speculative.

I will deal with the profits lost first and it seems to me that this is essentially a case where such profits are the direct fruit of the contract and may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties as the probable result of a breach of it.

The contract at the date of its cancellation or abrogation had been in existence for six years, and the extraction and exportation of chicle was carried on as a going business which was producing substantial profits, and there is nothing to show that these profits would not have continued to the expiration of the contract. The amount of profits earned during this period is shown by the extract from Shufeldt's books, duly certified by his bookkeeper Mr. Julio Urquiola to be one hundred and fifty-six thousand four hundred and eighty-seven dollars and forty-seven cents ($156,487.47) but deducting four thousand dollars interest on mortgage on Ixlu—Mr. Shufeldt's own property—which I can not hold as properly included, the sum becomes $152,487.47 which gives a yearly profit of $25,415 for the six years, and this multiplied by four gives the profits at say $101,660 which Shufeldt would be entitled to for the four remaining years of the contract. The United States Government in their case claimed $400,000 as prospective profits, and it was urged by the United States Government that the improved means of transportation carried out by Shufeldt and the fact that he was free from his contract with Wrigley & Co. and could get a better price for his chicle, should be considered in fixing the amount of profit; but taking into consideration Mr. Shufeldt's memorial to the President of the Republic, dated the 30th May 1928 (annex 39 to United States Case), in which he gives details of cost of a quintal of chicle and price obtained showing an "apparent" (?) profit of $5.00 from which must be paid bagging, freight from Plancha de Piedra to Belize, overhead, interest on money and losses inherent to all business, and states that the profit is very questionable; and also that the largest profits made during the six years were made in the season 1924-25 before the effects of improved transportation had been experienced, I can not see my way to extend the amount of the profits beyond those based on the profits actually obtained during the period of six years.

Dealing with the damnum emergens the Guatemala [United States?] Government make certain claims—twenty-one in number—which I will consider in the order in which they are given in the United States Case:

1. Deposit in the Guatemalan National Treasury, under section 9 (a) of the contract, which was in accordance with section 18 of the contract to "be repaid by export duties which correspond to the last lots upon which duties should be paid to the customs". The abrogation of the contract prevented Mr. Shufeldt from exporting these last lots of chicle, therefore Mr. Shufeldt who acquired all the concessionaire rights under the contract is entitled to the refund of this amount—$5,000.00.

2. Laborers' accounts due on account of advances, $612.92. Most of these are old accounts the nonpayment of which can not be ascribed to the cancellation of the contract. I allow one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents ($137.50).

3. Chicleros' accounts due on account of advances, $7,600.91. These are also old accounts the nonpayment of which can not be put down to the cancellation of the contract. I allow one thousand three hundred and nine dollars and ninety-six cents ($1309.96).

4. Contractors' accounts due on account of advances, $5,391.59. This amount I allow.

5. Current accounts due, $5,539.98 less $3,747.66 paid, leaving $1,792.23, which I allow.

6. Employees' accounts due on account of advances, $584.59. I allow this amount.

The amounts set out in numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 could reasonably have been expected to have been repaid, had the contract continued in existence to the end of its period, the canceling of the contract renders it impossible that they or any portion of them will now be paid. I think these items ought to be allowed.

7. Cost of Finca Ixlu and improvements $28,790.37. The property was bought by Shufeldt as his own private property and still is his own private property. He states however that it was bought purely for the purposes of his concession and is now no use to him. I can not see my way to allowing this item.

8. Cost of mules and horses on hand, $9,976.50.

9. Cost of work cattle (oxen), $619.10.

10. Cost of tools and equipment, $7,978.70.

11. Cost of boats and equipment, $4,742.90.

12. Cost of office furniture, equipment &c., $3,009.10.

13. Cost of general merchandise, $8,593.24.

All these items, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 of expenditure were incurred on the strength of the contract lasting ten years at least, and now they are useless; it must be remembered that the concession covered a very wide area and many offices and large number of employees. There was recovered a sum of $4,430.00 on sale of equipment making the total amount of items 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, $30,489.54, which I allow.

14. Cost of insurance premiums paid, $13,510.00, less surrender value $6,700.00 equalling $6,810.00. This was an insurance on Shufeldt's own life for the purpose of liquidating, in the case of his death, any liabilities arising from his business, which were not covered by other assets. This item I can not allow.

15. Care of live stock, July 4th 1928 to 31st March 1929, $2,013.24.

16. General expenses 4th July to March 31, 1929, $17,058.28.

17. Cash expenditures Belize, March 31, 1929, to 31st December 1929 $4,512.81.

18. Cash expenditures Belize, March 31 1929 to November 6 1929, $1,377.02.

These are all expenses incurred in consequence of the cancellation of the contract, in closing down the business. They are not impugned in themselves by the Guatemala Government but are stated to be included in damages given in the case of Shufeldt vs. Wrigley decided in March 1928. There is however no sufficient evidence to satisfy me on that point and I therefore allow them $24,961.35.

19. Loss of salary and living expenses March 31 1929 to date of award, $8,261.20.

This Mr. Shufeldt is certainly entitled to as part of his damages, for the prospective profits allowed are calculated on a net basis and do not include his salary or living expenses.

20. Additional commitments. March 31 1929 to date of award, $25,968.42.

This item is objected to by the Guatemala Government to the extent of $20,000.00, which is included to satisfy any judgment that Nájera and Morales may recover against Shufeldt in respect of the annual sum agreed to be paid by Shufeldt to them for the purchase of the concession, on the ground of its remoteness. This objection I uphold and allow only $5,968.42.

21. Rental of pit-pan wharf in Belize, $660.00, less rental received for boats $323.00, leaving $337.00. This wharf was necessary in connection with the business and the rent due after the cancellation of the contract forms a proper claim. I allow $337.00.

The United States Government also claim the sum of $50,000.00 in respect of loss of time, injury to credit, and grave anxiety of mind on account of the cancellation of the contract. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, that Shufeldt was suddenly thrown out of business and the time and expense incurred in endeavoring to come to a settlement with the Government of Guatemala and then in trying to get the United States Government to espouse his cause, I think it just and not excessive to allow $35,000.00 on this head.

Interest is also claimed by the United States Government. Shufeldt has been deprived of the use of his property—the income on his investment—for two years. This income or property I have assessed at $25,415.00 per annum, and I think he is entitled in justice to compensation for the loss of such use. I therefore award an amount equal to six per cent on such income for two years, that is $4,575.100.

The United States Government also claims an award in respect of legal services obtained by Shufeldt in Guatemala and Washington, first in his endeavors to prevent the cancellation of the contract, second, in his efforts to come to a settlement with Guatemala and third, in preparation of this case for presentation before the Arbitrator.

I can not allow legal expenses on the first ground, being expenses incurred before the cancellation of the contract, nor can I allow them on the third, as the protocol of arbitration provides in article 12 that each Government shall pay its own expenses and half the common expenses of the arbitration.

As to the second ground, the expenses in this connection are included in the $35,000.00 awarded as general damages.

In answer therefore to the two questions submitted by the protocol of arbitration, I find :

1. That P. W. Shufeldt has the right to claim pecuniary indemnification from the Government of Guatemala, and
2. That the Government of Guatemala should in justice pay to the Government of the United States $225,468.38 for the account of P. W. Shufeldt.

In conclusion I desire to express my appreciation of the very full and able manner in which the Representatives of both Governments placed their cases before me, and for their courtesy and consideration on all occasions that they appeared before me.

Antoine Biloune, Marine Drive Complex Ltd. v Ghana Investments Centre, the Government of Ghana, Awards, 27 October 1989

These awards have been made public in court proceedings in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, Case No. 90-2109.

Facts

This dispute arises out of the business activities in Ghana of the claimants, Antoine Biloune and Marine Drive Complex Ltd. (MDCL). MDCL is a Ghanaian corporation in which Mr. Biloune is the principal shareholder, and Mr. Michigan the minority shareholder.

On 5 November 1985, MDCL and Ghana Tourist Development Company (GTDC) concluded a Lease Agreement (GTDC Lease Agreement). The GTDC Lease Agreement provided for a ten-year lease to MDCL of a 2.95 acre parcel of land and a restaurant complex, with a five-year renewal option, at a rate of 30,000 cedis per month. Under the GTDC Lease Agreement, MDCL was to renovate and manage the restaurant. The claimants alleged that prior even to the conclusion of the formal lease, GTDC issued a letter of intent, granting MDCL permission to enter the premises and begin renovation work.

At some point of time, the nature of the parties' relationship was modified. The claimants asserted that in place of the lease/operation contract, the parties to the lease negotiated the terms of a joint venture. MDCL's share of the venture was to be fixed at 49%, GTDC's at 51%; and MDCL was designated manager of the venture.

In early 1986, MDCL commissioned a feasibility study for the expansion of the facilities by the firm of Lambrise Industrial and Commercial Management. This study was completed in April 1986. It contemplated an expansion of the original scope of the project from simply renovating the existing restaurant to the construction of an extensive new 4-star hotel resort complex.

In April 1986, MDCL applied to Ghana Investment Centre (GIC) to obtain for the expanded project certain benefits available to joint ventures between foreign and Ghanaian partners under the Ghana Investments Code of 1985. MDCL submitted the April 1986 Lambrise study as part of the application process. On 16 July 1986, GIC reported favorably on the project and approved the investment. An arrangement, including the requested investment concessions, was realized in the GIC Agreement of 18 November 1986. The agreement contained the following arbitration clause:

"Where any dispute arises between the foreign investor and the Government in respect of the enterprise, all efforts shall be made through mutual discussions to reach an amicable settlement.

Any dispute between the foreign investor and the Government in respect of an approved enterprise which is not amicably settled through mutual discussions may be submitted to arbitration; in accordance with the rules of procedure for arbitration of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law..." page "12"

Moreover Art. 22 provided:

"Subject to the provisions of the Code:

no enterprise approved under the Code shall be expropriated by the Government.

no person who owns, whether wholly or in part, the

At the outset of the project MDCL hired an architectural firm and an engineer to oversee the planned operations to the facilities. The same firm was retained to prepare plans and get Accra city planning approval for construction of the additional buildings. The claimants maintain that, before the building permit was obtained, GTDC obtained the Accra City Council's assurances that approval would be forthcoming and instructed MDCL to proceed with the work without the permit. The respondents denied that any such assurances or instructions were or could be given.

On 28 August 1987, the Accra City Council (ACC) caused a Stop Work notice to be issued, as no building permit had been issued. The notice, addressed to GTDC as “Owner or Developer”, required GTDC, “on or before 4 September 1987”, to “show cause” why the construction in progress “should not be stopped & demolished”. On 3 September, the Accra City Council ordered demolition of the project, which in some measure was carried out. MDCL immediately informed GTDC of the demolition. Several letters were written by Lt. Col. Yaache of GTDC to the ACC and to P.V. Obeng, who was “Chairman of the Committee of PNDC Secretaries” - apparently effectively the Prime Minister of Ghana - and who was also Chairman of the Board of GIC. Lt. Col. Yaache noted that the “project is 51% owned by the Government and not a privately owned venture”. He requested that Mr. Obeng “take the necessary action to save the project from destruction and enable us [to] proceed with the construction works.”

On 3 September 1987, an announcement was made in the People's Daily Graphic that persons who had connection with MDCL were to report to the National Investigations Committee (NIC). Mr. Biloune and other named MDCL officers reported to the NIC where they were given “assets declaration forms” and ordered to fill them out within fourteen days.

On 19 October 1987, NIC referred the MDCL case to the Office of Revenue Commission. After Mr. Biloune or his accountants requested and obtained a number of extensions of the deadline to file his assets declaration form he was arrested on 11 December 1987 and held in custody for thirteen days without charge. On 15 December 1987 a deportation notice was issued, stating that Mr. Biloune's presence in Ghana “is not conducive to the public good” and Biloune had to leave Ghana the same day. On 24 December 1987 Mr. Biloune was deported from Ghana to Togo.

In the ensuing arbitration, the claimants invoked the arbitration clause of the GIC Agreement. Mr. Biloune alleged that the GIC and the Government of Ghana interfered with his investment in MDCL and that by various means, including Mr. Biloune's arrest and deportation from Ghana, the respondents effectively expropriated the assets of MDCL. Mr. Biloune claimed damages for expropriation, denial of justice and violation of human rights. The respondents denied that they expropriated or unreasonably interfered in Mr. Biloune's investment in MDCL. They asserted that Mr. Biloune's detention and deportation were for reasons unrelated to the investment and were justified under the law of Ghana. Moreover, the respondents maintained that the question of denial of justice had been mooted by their participation in the arbitration and that the claim of violation of human rights was beyond the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.

In its Award on Jurisdiction and Liability of 27 October 1989, the Tribunal found that it had jurisdiction and held that the Government of Ghana expropriated MDCL's assets and Mr. Biloune's interest in MDCL. In view of the provision in the GIC Agreement which bound the Government not to expropriate such interests, the Tribunal concluded that the Government of Ghana was under an obligation, under the law of Ghana and international law, to compensate Mr. Biloune.

In its Award on Damages and Costs of 30 June 1990, the Tribunal gave its final calculation of damages and the compensation to be paid to Mr. Biloune.

that it has jurisdiction to hear the dispute placed before it and that it has the power to adjudicate the rights and obligations of the parties before it. That is, the Tribunal must find that the dispute falls within a valid and binding arbitration clause.”

A. Prerequisite of Efforts at Amicable Settlement

[2] “The respondents’ initial communication to the Tribunal raised the preliminary objection that the arbitral proceedings were instituted before page “14” opportunity for reconciliation or consultation. This assertedly is in violation of the arbitration clause at Art. 15 of the GICAgreement, which requires that before arbitration is commenced, ‘all efforts shall be made through mutual discussions to reach an amicable settlement’. The Tribunal previously deferred this issue to the merits phase of the proceedings, and it is now addressed.

[3] “The Tribunal believes that the claimants have made a clear showing of their efforts to reach an amicable settlement. On more than one occasion the claimants invited negotiations with the respondents on this matter. GIC failed to make any response to those invitations. GIC and the Government were fully informed by the claimants, by the Designating Authority under the UNCITRAL Rules, Mr. Varekamp, by the Appointing Authority, Dr. Shihata, and by this Tribunal of the establishment and composition of the Tribunal. The respondents had ample opportunity to negotiate an amicable settlement. GIC did not respond to the claimants’ request for an inquiry into the situation. Nor did the respondents object to the establishment of the Tribunal until well after proceedings had begun and the claimants had already prepared and served their Statement of Claim and their evidence concerning the Claim to the respondents. Although the minutes of GIC board meetings submitted in evidence show that extensive consideration was given to the MDCL problem, including requests for its settlement or arbitration, the fact and content of those deliberations were not communicated to the claimants until the pleadings were filed in these proceedings.

[4] “In light of these findings, the Tribunal holds that the legal and contractual prerequisite to arbitration - failure of attempts at amicable settlement - was satisfied by the claimants’ efforts and the respondents’ inaction.”

B. Jurisdiction over the Dispute

[5] “The arbitration clause contained at Art. 15 of the GICAgreement is broad, providing for arbitration of ‘[a]ny dispute between the foreign investor and the Government in respect of an approved enterprise.’ The Agreement contains an explicit guarantee against expropriation by the Government. There can be no question that a claim that the Government has interfered with and expropriated the claimants’ interest in the venture with GTDC gives rise to a dispute ‘in respect of an approved enterprise’ under the Agreement.

[6] “The same cannot be concluded as to the other causes of action alleged, that is, the claim for denial of justice and the claim for violation of Mr. Biloune’s human rights. As to the first, the claimants based their claim on the initial failure of the respondents to submit to arbitration under Art. 15 of the Agreement. The Tribunal need not decide whether such a claim could page “15” form the basis of a separate claim under the arbitration clause, because that claim is moot. While the respondents did not participate in the constitution of the Tribunal, and for some time left unclear the question of their participation in the arbitration, they eventually did obtain counsel and took part fully in the proceedings, filing briefs and documentary evidence, appearing at the Hearing, and providing their share of the expenses of the Tribunal. Thus no continuing ‘dispute’ between the parties, over which the Tribunal could exercise its jurisdiction, exists as to the alleged denial of justice for failure of the respondents to participate in the arbitration.

[7] “In the final cause of action asserted, the claimants seek recovery for alleged violation by the Government of Ghana of Mr. Biloune’s human rights. The claimants assert that the Government’s allegedly arbitrary detention and expulsion of Mr. Biloune and violation of his property and contractual rights constitute an actionable human rights violation for which compensation may be required in a commercial arbitration pursuant to the GICAgreement. They assert that the Tribunal should consider this portion of the claim because this is the only forum in which redress for these alleged injuries may be sought.

[8] “Long-established customary international law requires that a State accord foreign nationals within its territory a standard of treatment no less than that prescribed by international law. Moreover, contemporary international law recognizes that all individuals, regardless of nationality, are entitled to fundamental human rights (which, in the view of the Tribunal, include property as well as personal rights), which no government may violate. Nevertheless, it does not follow that this Tribunal is competent to pass upon every type of departure from the minimum standard to which nationals are entitled, or that this Tribunal is authorized to deal with allegations of violations of fundamental human rights.

[9] "This Tribunal's competence is limited to commercial disputes arising under a contract entered into the context of Ghana's Investment Code. As noted, the Government agreed to arbitrate only disputes 'in respect of the foreign investment. Thus, other matters - however compelling the claim or wrongful the alleged act - are outside this Tribunal's jurisdiction. Under the facts of this case it must be concluded that, while the acts alleged to violate the international human rights of Mr. Biloune may be relevant in considering the investment dispute under arbitration, this Tribunal lacks jurisdiction to address, as an independent cause of action, a claim of violation of human rights."

C. Jurisdiction over the Parties

[10] "The Tribunal must also establish that each claimant before it has a right, under the arbitration clause, to assert a claim and, likewise, that each page "16" respondent against which a claim is asserted is a person bound by and subject to the arbitration clause.

[11] "MDCL was the foreign investor that entered the Agreement with Ghana Investments Centre seeking investment concessions from GIC. Mr. Biloune was and is the majority shareholder and Chairman of MDCL. The respondents have not disputed the right of either MDCL or Mr. Biloune to appear as claimants. The Tribunal finds that MDCL is entitled to invoke arbitration under the GIC Agreement and that Mr. Biloune, as MDCL's Chairman and principal shareholder, may assert MDCL's claims. The Tribunal also finds that, in the circumstances of this case, and particularly having regard to GIC's knowledge of Mr. Biloune's role of financing and directing the project, Mr. Biloune, though not a party to the GIC Agreement, may assert his own claims arising out of his investment in MDCL. The respondents have not disputed this conclusion, which finds support in Art. 22 of the GIC Agreement. The first paragraph of that Article prohibits expropriation of an approved enterprise, and the second expressly protects a 'person who owns, whether wholly or in part, the capital' of such an enterprise.

[12] "GIC is the entity originally named as the respondent in this arbitration. As signatory to the GIC Agreement, GIC is clearly bound by it and its arbitration clause.

[13] "As noted above, the Government of Ghana was not originally named a respondent in the Statement of Claim. The claimants sought to add the Government by an amendment in their Additional Comments submitted to the Tribunal on 15 June 1989. Counsel for the respondents objected to the amendment at the beginning of the Hearing.

[14] "Under the UNCITRAL Rules, Art. 20, a claimant may amend his claim at any time, unless such factors as undue delay or prejudice suggest that such amendment is inappropriate or the amended claim would fall outside the arbitration clause. In the present case, the amendment was made in the claimants' first submission on the merits following the Statement of Claim, and in any case confirmed the obvious conclusion. From the outset of these proceedings, it was clear to all concerned that the claim was addressed in large part to alleged acts and omissions of the Government of Ghana. Indeed, several responses to the Tribunal's communications and Orders were submitted not by GIC itself (although some were) but by the Solicitor General of the Government of Ghana. Moreover, the first communication of the respondents' Washington's counsel to the Tribunal introduced counsel as representing both GIC and the Government. Given these clear indications of the Government's awareness of and participation in the proceedings prior to the claimants' amendment, no prejudice appears.

[15] "Of course, in order to be subject to the Tribunal's jurisdiction, the Government must have consented to the arbitration, either now or previously. We need not consider the possibility that the Government's page "17" participation in the proceedings might constitute consent, despite counsel's later objection to the Government's inclusion as a party. This is because the Agreement with GIC, an agency of the Government of Ghana, clearly binds the Government; indeed, the Agreement speaks explicitly of disputes between the investor 'and the Government', and the expropriation clause expressly prohibits expropriation 'by the Government'. Thus the relevant clauses both engage the Government of Ghana, and contemplate claims against it.

[16] "The claimants also sought to add GTDC as a respondent. They refer in addition to the acts of a number of entities, such as the ACC and its subdivisions, alleged to be controlled by or part of the Government. The parties differed as to whether, under the current governing law of Ghana, such entities are legally and factually independent of the Government, or whether they should instead be considered as subdivisions or agents of the Government. The Tribunal decides that it need not determine whether these entities, because of their alleged relationship to the Government, could be considered party to the arbitration. No relief is sought against these entities and they need not be parties to this arbitration for their acts to be relevant and considered by this Tribunal in determining the obligations of those entities which are parties to the arbitration."

D. Validity of the GIC Agreement

[17] "The final jurisdictional issue is whether the GIC Agreement, which contains the operative arbitration clause, remains in effect and is binding on the parties. The respondents have asserted that the GIC Agreement should be held inapplicable because MDCL and Mr. Biloune do not qualify as foreign investors as required by the GIC Agreement. They allege that GIC approved the Marine Drive venture for investment concessions on the basis of a 60%-40% shareholding between Mr. Biloune and Mr. Michigan in MDCL. According to the respondents, the fact that over 99% of the financing for the venture was in fact provided by Mr. Biloune constituted a misrepresentation which, under Art. 20 of the GIC Agreement, permits GIC to cancel its approval.

[18] "The respondents argue in addition that because MDCL obtained GIC approval as a foreign/Ghanaian joint venture, it was required to make a minimum $60,000 foreign currency investment in MDCL, in cash or in capital goods. They point out further that if MDCL had sought approval as a venture wholly owned by Mr. Biloune, as a foreign national he would have been required to invest $100,000. The respondents assert that the foreign currency investment advanced by the claimants as satisfying this requirement - largely a shipment of building materials needed for the construction work worth £47,000 - was too little to satisfy the minimum required for an enterprise page "18" wholly owned by a foreign investor. The respondents argue in the alternative that the investment was not registered with the appropriate governmental office, as allegedly required to prove foreign investment in any amount.

[19] "The Tribunal does not find these objections sufficient to deprive the GIC Agreement of validity. As to the alleged misrepresentation in describing the capital basis of MDCL, the Tribunal notes that the application submitted to GIC clearly states both that the shares would be split 60%-40% between Mr. Biloune and Mr. Michigan and that Mr. Biloune would provide 24.7 million cedis of MDCL's capital compared to only 150,000 cedis for Mr. Michigan. This disclosure of the proposed capital arrangements eliminates any basis for the defense of misrepresentation as now alleged. Thus, in fact such an arrangement is not normally contemplated by GIC, GIC's approval of the application must be considered a waiver of this defense and an acceptance of a modification of the norm. Moreover, it may also be relevant to note that the project at issue was carried forward by what Lt. Col. Yaache described as a partnership between GTDC (whose shares are wholly owned by the Ghanaian Government) and MDCL.

[20] "Much the same can be said about the allegation of insufficient foreign currency investment. The respondents' defense is deficient in two respects. First, it does not appear that any time limit was imposed within which full foreign currency contributions must be in place. Second, there is no indication in the record that GIC was concerned at the time that MDCL's foreign currency requirement were being implemented too slowly, or that, if it was, that the Agreement was voided as a result. On the contrary, the parties consistently acted in accordance with the terms of the GIC Agreement, treating it as in force. During the difficulties experienced by Mr. Biloune at the end of 1987, it was never suggested that the Agreement was invalid. Accordingly, the Tribunal determines that the respondents have failed to establish their contention that the GIC Agreement should be considered invalid. This does not mean that issues as to the amounts actually invested in, and paid out by, the enterprise, may not be relevant to the ultimate determinations of this Tribunal.

GICAgreement, it need not decide whether, if the Agreement were adjudged invalid, the arbitration clause would nevertheless be separable and provide sufficient basis for this Tribunal's jurisdiction. Nor need it decide whether there is an independent basis for arbitration under Art. 20 of the Ghana Investment Code of 1985.

[22] "The respondents have also argued that the expropriation clause in the contract does not apply to a constructive expropriation such as that alleged here, but only to expropriation by act of positive law. There is no basis for such a distinction in the contract, and certainly one cannot reasonably read the Agreement - or customary international law - to permit the Government page "19" to expropriate indirectly what it has undertaken not to expropriate directly.

[23] "For all the above reasons, the Tribunal holds that it has jurisdiction to decide the claim of expropriation as here presented."

II. Applicable Law

[24] "The rights and obligations of the parties to the GICAgreement are governed by the provisions of that Agreement. Art. 24 of the Agreement requires the Tribunal to 'constru[e]' the Agreement 'according to the laws of Ghana'. The provisions of Ghanaian law which have been brought to the Tribunal's attention do not relate to the construction of the Agreement. Neither party pleaded the particulars of the legal principles or provisions of the law of Ghana that should guide the Tribunal's decision on the main contractual issues and, in particular, it was not argued how any provision of the Agreement should be construed in accordance with the law of Ghana. Specifically, neither party brought to the attention of the Tribunal any interpretation of the GICAgreement, or of the parties' rights and obligations under the Agreement, including the prohibition of expropriation, peculiar to the law of Ghana. Moreover, there is no indication that Ghanaian law diverges on the central issue of expropriation from customary principles of international law. On the contrary, both parties explicitly treated those principles as governing the issue of expropriation."

III. The Tribunal's Decisions

[25] "The fundamental outlines of the relevant events are clear. Where differences between the parties on the facts remain, the Tribunal has had recourse to the principle recorded in the UNCITRALRules that each party has the burden of proving the facts upon which it relies for its claim or defense. UNCITRALRules, Art. 24.

[26] "This Tribunal must determine whether the above facts constitute, as the claimants charge, a constructive expropriation of MDCL's assets and Mr. Biloune's interest in MDCL. The motivations for the actions and omissions of Ghanaian governmental authorities are not clear. But the Tribunal need not establish those motivations to come to a conclusion in the case. What is clear is that the conjunction of the stop work order, the demolition, the summons, the arrest, the requirement of filing assets declaration forms, and the deportation of Mr. Biloune without possibility of re-entry had the effect of causing the irreparable cessation of work on the project. Given the central role of Mr. Biloune in promoting, financing and managing MDCL, his expulsion from the country effectively prevented MDCL page "20" from further pursuing the project. In the view of the Tribunal, such prevention of MDCL from pursuing its approved project would constitute constructive expropriation of MDCL's contractual rights in the project and, accordingly, the expropriation of the value of Mr. Biloune's interest in MDCL, unless the respondents can establish by persuasive evidence sufficient for these events.

[27] "The respondents' defenses on this point are that the various events described above are independent and unrelated, and that their conjunction is coincidental. The respondents maintain that the independent and unrelated reasons for Mr. Biloune's detention and deportation essentially were that in 1985 he was found guilty of selling kerosene stoves above the price-regulated price; that he had been accused by a private Ghanaian party of involvement in a bank fraud scheme; and that the sources of his investment in MDCL had not been shown to the satisfaction of the National Investigations Commission to be in accordance with the currency regulations of Ghana.

[28] "The evidence submitted in support of these alternative explanations is not convincing for the following reasons. First, while Mr. Biloune admits that he was fined for an apparently minor price-control infraction in respect of kerosene stoves, that case was apparently closed in 1985. The allegation of bank fraud is made only in a letter of a private individual which resulted in no indictment or other action by Ghanaian authorities. The sources of all of Mr. Biloune's investment in MDCL, on the basis of the record now before the Tribunal, are unclear. But by the same token it is not established that they were in violation of whatever may be the governing regulations of Ghana. The Tribunal therefore finds that the Government has not succeeded in establishing that there were reasons for the NIC investigation and the arrest and deportation of Mr. Biloune that were not connected to the MDCL project.

[29] "As for the failure to issue a building permit, and the partial demolition of the project (whether or not it was prompted by the lack of a building permit), the respondents have not adequately explained these actions, in view of the history of the site, the time elapsed between the application and the issuance of the stop work order, the work actually carried out by MDCL, and the claimants' justifiable reliance on GIC and GTDC as liaison with the relevant Governmental agencies. In particular, the Tribunal does not find credible that the authorities in Accra were ignorant of the existence for well over a year of construction activity on one of the most prominent sites in the city, and one which adjoins the seat of the Government of Ghana.

[30] "The Tribunal therefore holds that the Government of Ghana, by its actions and omissions culminating with Mr. Biloune's deportation, constructively expropriated MDCL's assets, and Mr. Biloune's interest therein, not later than 24 December 1987. The claimants are therefore entitled to compensation. page "21"

[31] "In view of the Tribunal's holding that the Government of Ghana expropriated MDCL's assets and Mr. Biloune's interest in MDCL, and in view of provision in the GIC Agreement which binds the Government not to expropriate such interests, the Tribunal has concluded that the Government of Ghana is under an obligation, under the law of Ghana and international law, to compensate Mr. Biloune. The Tribunal is satisfied that Mr. Biloune suffered significant damage from the expropriation.

Award on damages and costs

I. The Tribunal's Decision

A. Reconsideration or Annulment of Award

[32] "As provided in Art. 32(2) of the UNCITRAL Rules, the award on jurisdiction and liability which this Tribunal issued on 27 October 1989 was and is 'final and binding on the parties'. The UNCITRAL Rules make no provision for reconsidering an award. Arts. 35, 36 and 37 provide that within thirty days of an award a party may request 'interpretation' of an award, may request correction of clerical or typographical errors, or may request an additional award covering issues omitted from the award. The present request for reconsideration was not made pursuant to any of these articles, and (apart from the fact that the request was first made more than thirty days after the original award) none of these articles would seem to support the kind of reconsideration that has been requested.

[33] "Nevertheless, a court or Tribunal, including this international arbitral Tribunal, has an inherent power to take cognizance of credible evidence, timely placed before it, that its previous determinations were the product of false testimony, forged documents or other egregious 'fraud on the Tribunal'. See United States on behalf of Lehigh Valley Ry. v. Germany, (Sabotage Claims), Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, Opinions and Decisions from 1 October 1926 to 31 December 1932 (1933) at 967; id., Report of the American Commissioner (30 December 1933) at 7-8; id., Opinions and Decisions in the Sabotage Claims (15 June 1939 and 30 October 1939). Certainly if such corruption or fraud in the evidence would justify an international or a national court in voiding or refusing to enforce the award, this Tribunal also, so long as it still has jurisdiction over the dispute, can take necessary corrective action. See the Statute of the International Court of Justice, Art. 61 (permitting revision of an award upon the subsequent page "22" discovery of a new decisive fact);<sup>(1)</sup>

[34] “The present Tribunal would not hesitate to reconsider and modify its earlier award were it shown by credible evidence that it had been the victim of fraud and that its determinations in the previous award were the product of false testimony. However, no such evidence has been adduced. As in many complex cases, this Tribunal has been required to weigh and resolve occasional inconsistencies in the evidence of both sides in this arbitration, and to come to its best determination of the relevant facts. Nevertheless, the Tribunal is satisfied that the material facts on which it based its previous award on jurisdiction and liability, as well as the present award on damages and costs, are sufficiently explained and proved by credible evidence.

[35] “The Tribunal has thus weighed the charges of untruthfulness and exaggeration made by the respondents in their request for reconsideration. It is the opinion of the Tribunal that, while there are factual issues on which the parties differ, there is no indication that any material determination regarding the establishment and existence of the claimants’ investment or the respondents’ subsequent constructive expropriation of it was based on or the product of false testimony, fraudulent evidence, or otherwise of such a nature as to undermine the authority and finality of the previous award. Accordingly, the respondents’ request for reconsideration is denied.”  page "23"

B. Standards of Proof

[36] “Under the UNCITRAL Rules, ‘Each party shall have the burden of proving the facts relied on to support his claim or defense’. This Tribunal, governed by the UNCITRAL Rules, has proceeded in accordance with this principle. The Tribunal has reviewed the accounting records submitted to it, as well as the reports analyzing those records by both the claimants’ and the respondents’ accountants. The Tribunal holds that, in general, the contemporaneous books and records of a company regularly kept in the normal course of business should be accorded substantial evidentiary weight. In the present case, it appears that a firm of Ghanaian chartered accountants, licensed to pursue their profession by the Government of Ghana, designed MDCL’s accounting system and controls and periodically performed audits. This same firm has provided its opinion to this Tribunal that the company’s books in fact accurately reflect MDCL’s financial status. MDCL’s records are thus accepted by the Tribunal as presumptively accurate, subject to proof to the contrary by the respondents.

[37] “The respondents and their accountants, also professional Ghanaian chartered accountants, have alleged certain shortcomings and irregularities in the design of MDCL’s accounting system and the companies’ bookkeeping practice. They argue that a higher verification or confirmation standard should have been used by an auditor who was fully independent of the company’s affairs, and they assert that many of the book entries could not be verified by their accountants’ recent review of the records submitted to the Tribunal.

[38] “The Tribunal is not convinced, however, that difficulties in verifying every entry in books from admittedly incomplete files necessarily render the books unreliable and fundamentally erroneous. The respondents have not demonstrated any instances of wrong recording (the few instances which they mentioned were satisfactorily explained by the claimants and their accountants). In general, it appears to the Tribunal that the backup documents submitted adequately support the book entries.”

C. Foreign Currency Denominated Investments

[39] “The claimants’ calculation of the foreign currency investments in the project is based on evidence in MDCL’s accounting books of in-kind inputs in the form of building materials and certain communication and travel expenses. While the respondents question whether all of the travel expenses claimed were incurred on behalf of the project, the minutes submitted, in the Tribunal’s view, provide sufficient indication that the travel, in question was related to Mr. Biloune’s efforts to secure foreign financing for the project.  page "24" Without more, the fact that Mr. Biloune had other business interests in Europe is not sufficient to induce the Tribunal to regard the expenses as unrelated to the project. These travel and communication expenses are accepted in the amounts claimed.

[40] “The controversy over the building materials involves a dispute as to whether the materials admittedly imported from MDCL were actually sold in Ghana to other users, and whether, if so, the proceeds of such sales were diverted to the Trader Vic Company or to Mr. Biloune himself.

[41] "The respondents have presented the statement of Mr. Michigan purporting to show that by September 1986 a substantial portion of the building materials had been sold, but the notations on the original import invoice produced in evidence of such sales do not indicate in any way when, to whom, at what cost, or even whether such alleged sales were made. The respondents also obtained from one of MDCL's administrators in Ghana (the Osei-Wiredu firm) 'waybills' showing the quantities of materials that were removed from the Marine Drive premises to warehouse in early 1988 after Mr. Biloune's expulsion. The respondents also submitted a survey of the remaining items in the Trader Vic warehouse as of February 1990 performed by the respondents' accountants, purporting to show additional reductions in inventory. None of these documents proves that any items of MDCL's inventory were sold, however.

[42] "The only direct evidence adduced purporting to prove that MDCL sold some of its construction materials is the request to MDCL from the Public Works Department for 500 gallons of white masonry paint on 26 August 1986. This is submitted together with an undated handwritten notation which is said to show payment of 1,555,000 cedis for paint as well as several other items, and PWD payment vouchers.

[43] "On the basis of these documents, the respondents allege that Mr. Biloune was selling materials imported for the project. They just allege that the materials cannot form part of Mr. Biloune's investment.

[44] "As noted above, the claimants counter that no improper diversion was made of any MDCL construction materials. They assert that at the time of the alleged sale of 500 gallons of paint in 1986, the paint imported for the project was still in customs warehouse. They provide board of directors minutes stating that in August 1987, efforts were still underway to 'secure the release of the paints' by GTDC.

[45] "They describe the sale of paint to PWD in August 1986 as an unrelated transaction of Trader Vic out of its own separate inventory. The respondents' evidence shows that the request from PWD for 500 gallons of 'white stoneface cementone Masonry Paint' was dated 26 August 1986. The claimants' evidence shows that on that same day 500 gallons of 'caring for masonry (white)' were delivered to Public Works Department from Trader Vic. They also provided shipping and import documents showing that page "25" Trader Vic had imported in October 1985 a shipment of paints, including 1785 'tins each 5 litres' of 'caring paints' for masonry. (5 litres equals, roughly, one (imperial) gallon.) Finally, the evidence includes payment vouchers showing the sale of paint as part of other goods sold by Trader Vic to PWD in August and September 1986. The amount paid to Trader Vic for the paint and 'rendatex' equals the 1,555,000 cedis amount shown on the undated list of payments submitted by the respondents.

[46] "In the light of the analysis in the preceding four paragraphs, it is reasonable to conclude that the request for masonry paint had nothing to do with MDCL (except, perhaps to the extent PWD knew of Mr. Biloune's relationship with both Trader Vic and MDCL) and that the order was filled entirely out of separate Trader Vic inventory. The Tribunal is therefore not prepared to assume that the sale was out of MDCL's inventory, rather than Trader Vic's, especially given the clear markings that the claimants state (without contradiction) limited their use to a GTDC-authorized project.

[47] "Moreover, even if it could be shown that MDCL did sell some or most of the materials it originally imported for its own project, this does not necessarily result in the deduction of the value of those materials from the total investment by Mr. Biloune. Unless the proceeds of such sales were wrongfully diverted from MDCL to third parties, the value of the goods at the time of their original importation would still constitute sums invested by Mr. Biloune in MDCL. There is no evidence of such a diversion.

[48] "If, as the claimants' accountants maintain, the remaining materials now in warehouse have deteriorated and are valueless, this loss of value does not negate the fact that the materials constituted a valuable material input when originally invested. However, it is possible that these materials or some of them still have value. Since the Tribunal has determined that all the assets of MDCL were constructively expropriated by the respondents, it follows that title to these assets passed to the respondents in December 1987. Accordingly, there is no ground for deducting the residual value, if any, of these assets from the Award.

[49] "The respondents also argue that in any case the imported materials cannot be considered as investments because they were not registered as investments in kind. The respondents state that under Sect. 42 of the Ghana companies law,<sup>(3)</sup> all foreign goods invested in kind in Ghanaian entities page "26" require registration. Claimants deny that the companies law requires registration, but they discuss a different provision of the law.

[50] "The Tribunal is of the opinion that in the present circumstance this issue does not determine the claimants' recovery. Whether registered or not, Mr. Biloune did in fact provide the materials as an in-kind investment. There is certainly no indication that failure to register works a forfeiture, even if there were a requirement of registration. Accordingly, the Tribunal finds the value of the materials imported for the MDCL project to constitute a foreign currency investment of Mr. Biloune."

D. Cedi Denominated Investments

[51] "As noted above, the Tribunal is satisfied that MDCL's regular accounting books adequately identify the amounts of cedi investments made by Mr. Biloune in MDCL. The respondents' objection is that the investments should have been more formally receipted and documented, and that the source of the funds is not established.

[52] "The Tribunal believes that, while more sophisticated accounting controls might have been useful, the entries in the company's cash book, which was kept current in the ordinary course of business, adequately evidence the investments by Mr. Biloune, especially since it is apparently conceded by the respondents that Mr. Biloune was the sole financier of the company.

[53] "It is true, as the respondents contend, that the source of the funds Mr. Biloune invested in MDCL is never shown with precision. The claimants assert, as they did at the Hearing, that Mr. Biloune raised the funds largely through imports of goods financed by his outside trading companies and sold for Ghanaian currency within Ghana. Whether these imports usually or always involved Mrs. Biloune's Ghanaian companies is not shown, however, and the respondents object that the transfers of earnings from these companies to Mr. Biloune are not documented.

[54] "The Tribunal accepts the explanation of the claimants that to the extent Mrs. Biloune's companies were involved, the funds were made available to Mr. Biloune informally by his wife. In any event, the Tribunal does not find it necessary to determine the ultimate source of the cedi funds invested in MDCL. The issue is whether the funds were actually invested in page "27" MDCL by Mr. Biloune, and on that issue the company's books are explicit. Thus, the Tribunal finds that Mr. Biloune invested cedis in MDCL in the amounts and on the dates shown in the company's books."

E. Application of Invested Funds to the Project

[55] "The Tribunal is satisfied, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the funds invested in MDCL were used in furtherance of the project. Indeed, in most cases, the investment was made immediately as needed to cover an expenditure for project-related goods or services. The Tribunal has no reason to doubt that the sums invested by Mr. Biloune were directed toward and incorporated in the Marine Drive project."

F. Basis for Calculating Damages

[56] "Having determined the amounts Mr. Biloune invested in the Marine Drive project, the Tribunal must now determine the basis for calculating the damages due the claimants from the respondents' constructive expropriation of that project. The claimants have proposed two alternative methods for calculating damages: historical investment value or lost profits.

[57] "The standard for compensation in cases of expropriation is restoration of the claimant to the position he would have enjoyed but for the expropriation. This principle of customary international law is stated in many recent awards on international arbitral tribunals. See, e.g., Texaco Overseas Petroleum v. Libya (TOPCO) (Dupuy, arb.), paras. 40-105, 17 I.L.M. 28-35 (1977);<sup>(4)</sup> Sedco, Inc. and National Iranian Oil Co., Award No. ITL 59-129-3, 10 Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal Rep. 180, 184-189 (1986), 25 I.L.M. 629, and separate opinion of Judge Brower in id.; Amoco International Finance Corp and Islamic Republic of Iran (Khemco), Award No. 310-56-3, 15 Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal Rep. 189, paras 183-209 (1987), 27 I.L.M. 1320, 1391. This standard is also reflected in hundreds of bilateral investment treaties. The respondents in this case have not challenged this principle, and indeed have explicitly 'recognize[d] that there exists a generally accepted principle of international law that prompt, adequate and effective compensation be paid in case of expropriation'.

[58] "Normally, in cases of expropriation of a going concern, the most accurate measure of the value of the expropriated property is its fair market value, which in its nature takes into account future profits. The discounted cash flow method of valuation is often used to calculate the worth of the enterprise at the time of the taking. Starrett Housing Corp. and Islamic page "28" Republic of Iran, Award No. 314-24-1, 16 Iran-U.S. Claims Tribunal Rep. 112, paras. 279-280 (1987).<sup>(5)</sup>

[59] "The claimants have made a compensation claim based on the future lost profits of MDCL. While the Tribunal accepts the validity of the principle that lost profits should be compensated it is not possible to make an award on that basis in this case. The claimants have not provided any realistic proof of the future profits of the company. The Lambrise Report purports to project profits, but the Tribunal agrees with the respondents that this report was not an economic forecast of profits, but a projection intended to encourage potential investors. Moreover, at the time of the project's suspension and effective expropriation, the project remained uncompleted and inoperative. It was generating no revenue, still less profits. Thus, with no basis on which to calculate future profits, the Tribunal is required to consider an alternative methodology.

[60] "The claimants have also requested that Mr. Biloune be awarded the historical investment value of the project. Given the nature of the project, and its early interruption by the respondents, the Tribunal has concluded that the most appropriate method for valuing the damages to be paid will be to return to Mr. Biloune the amounts he invested in MDCL, i.e., restitution.

[61] "Thus, respondents are obligated to pay Mr. Biloune the amounts shown to have been invested by him, i.e., £ Sterling 50,765.85; DM600.00; and U.S. $8,115.66 for the foreign currency investment, and 46,790,982.85 cedis. (The claimants set forth various totals for the total cedi investments with slight variations. Since the variations were not explained, the Tribunal has selected the lowest total claimed.)

[62] "Since this Award is based on amounts actually invested by Mr. Biloune, no apportionment to allow for the interests of GTDCor Mr. Michigan is appropriate. Thus, the Tribunal need not address allocation questions and other issues that might arise if the award were based on the going concern value of MDCL or of the Marine Drive project as a whole."

G. Currency of the Award

[63] "...The claimants have asserted that the principle of 'prompt, adequate and effective' compensation requires that all sums be awarded in U.S. dollars, converted from other currencies at the time of investment. The Tribunal does not wholly agree with this claim.

[64] "It certainly is right, as the respondents have acknowledged, that amounts awarded must be paid promptly in a freely convertible currency and made available to the claimants outside Ghana. The respondents have indeed page "29" undertaken to permit the conversion and transfer required:

'Once the amount of the damages [is] determined and awarded in cedis, the requirement of promptness and effectiveness would operate to ensure that the damages denominated in cedis be paid promptly, be freely convertible into foreign currencies and be transferable to claimants outside Ghana.'

[65] "The Tribunal holds that, under the applicable norms of international law, the respondents were obligated to pay the amounts awarded in freely convertible, transferable currency on the date of the expropriation. The applicable cedi-dollar rate on that date was 175.43 (IMF International Financial Statistics (March 1988)). Accordingly, on this basis, the 46,790,982.85 cedis awarded are equivalent to $266,721.67. This latter amount, payable in dollars, shall be awarded.

[66] "The Tribunal notes that the claimants maintain that they are entitled to a larger sum of $599,928.44 on the theory that cedis must be converted into dollars on the various dates on which cedis were invested in the project. The Tribunal cannot accept this contention. It agrees with the respondents that they did not insure foreign investors against depreciation of the cedi between the date of investment and the date of expropriation.

[67] “The amounts invested in Pounds Sterling, Deutschmarks and U.S. dollars will be awarded in those currencies.”

II. Costs and Interest

A. Costs

[68] “Under the UNCITRAL Rules, Art. 38,<sup>(6)</sup> the fees and costs of the arbitration are to be separately stated in the award. The total costs of this arbitration are $84,781.14. This figure has been calculated as follows: The page "30" arbitrators have been compensated at a rate based on the current rate applied by the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID). This rate was chosen as appropriate for a case with a modest amount at stake. It is the more appropriate in light of the designation of Mr. Ibrahim Shihata, Secretary-General of ICSID, as the appointing authority in this arbitration. On an actual hourly basis, the fee of each of the three arbitrators totals $15,610.00. The President of the Tribunal has not found it appropriate to accept fees higher than those of the other arbitrators.

[69] “In addition, other costs of the arbitration, including out-of-pocket expenses, secretarial and office expenses, hearing expenses, and the time of the registrar total $37,951.14

[70] “The Tribunal has assessed and received $20,000 from each side as a deposit against the costs of arbitration. The difference between the deposit of $20,000 already made by the respondents and the costs and fees of the arbitration is $64,781.14. This amount is assessed against the respondents, to be paid directly to the Tribunal's registrar. Upon receipt of this payment, the Tribunal will transmit the deposit of $20,000 advanced by the claimants to their counsel.”

B. Interest

[71] “Interest is required to be awarded in order fully to compensate the victim of an expropriation for the delay in payment of the value of the expropriated property, calculated from the time of taking to the time of payment of the award. The Tribunal considers the London Interbank Offered Rate (LIBOR) to be the appropriate rate upon which to calculate interest. The average 6-month LIBOR rate between 24 December 1987 and 30 June 1990 was 8.6512%. Applying this rate over the 918 days between 24 December 1987 and 30 June 1990 to the sums awarded yields, on a simple interest basis, an additional $59,800.16, £11,045.82 and DM130.55, which will be included in the Award.

[72] “This Award shall be paid within thirty days of the date on which this award is delivered to the respondents' counsel (Delivery Date). Any amounts of the award (including the above interest) that remain unpaid thirty days after the Delivery Date will bear interest at the current 6-month LIBOR rate until the Award is paid in full.

[73] “The claimants have also requested counsel fees in an amount no less than $100,000. Particularly given the respondents' request for an identical amount had they prevailed, the Tribunal deems that amount to be reasonable. The respondents shall pay such amount directly to counsel for the claimants, and that amount shall be deducted from any gross sum of counsel fees chargeable by the claimants' counsel to the claimants.”

“1. An application for revision of a judgment may be made only when it is based upon the discovery of some fact of such nature as to be a decisive factor, which fact was, when the judgment was given, unknown to the Court and also to the party claiming revision, always provided that such ignorance was not due to negligence.

“(1) Either party may request revision of the award by an application in writing addressed to the Secretary-General on the ground of discovery of some fact of such a nature as decisively to affect the award, provided that when the award was rendered that fact was unknown to the Tribunal and to the applicant and that the applicant’s ignorance of that fact was not due to negligence.

(1) “Except on a capitalization issue pursuant to subsection (1) of section 74 of this Code, shares shall not be issued otherwise than for valuable consideration paid or payable to the company and unless otherwise agreed shares shall be paid for in cash.

(2) If a company shall have agreed to accept payment for any shares otherwise than wholly in cash the company shall, within 28 days after the allotment of such shares, deliver to the Registrar for registration a contract in writing duly stamped evidencing the terms of such agreement and the true value of the consideration or, if such agreement shall not have been reduced to writing, particulars in the prescribed form of such agreement duly stamped, as if it were a written agreement.

The arbitral tribunal shall fix the costs of arbitration in its award. The term ‘costs’ includes only:

- (a) The fees of the arbitral tribunal to be stated separately as to each arbitrator and to be fixed by the tribunal itself in accordance with article 39;
- (b) The travel and other expenses incurred by the arbitrators;
- (c) The costs of expert advice and of other assistance required by the arbitral tribunal;
- (d) The travel and other expenses of witnesses to the extent such expenses are approved by the arbitral tribunal;
- (e) The costs for legal representation and assistance of the successful party if such costs were claimed during the arbitral proceedings, and only to the extent that the arbitral tribunal determines that the amount of such costs is reasonable;
- (f) Any fees and expenses of the appointing authority as well as the expenses of the Secretary-General of the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague.”

THE ECJ

20. The Commission... contends that the Member States were empowered to adopt measures such as the Sea Fish Order 1982 by Article 6(1) of Regulation 170/83 of 25 January 1983 which authorises retroactively, as from 1 January 1983, the retention of the derogation regime defined in Article 100 of the 1972 Act of Accession for a further ten years, and which extends the coastal zones from six to twelve nautical miles. ...

21. Without embarking upon an examination of the general legality of the retroactivity of Article 6(1) of that Regulation, it is sufficient to point out that such retroactivity may not, in any event, have the effect of validating ex post facto national measures of a penal nature which impose penalties for an act which, in fact, was not punishable at the time at which it was committed. That would be the case where at the time of the act entailing a criminal penalty, the national measure was invalid because it was incompatible with Community law.

22. The principle that penal provisions may not have retroactive effect is one which is common to all the legal orders of the Member States and is enshrined in Article 7 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms as a fundamental right; it takes its place among the general principles of law whose observance is ensured by the Court of Justice.

23. Consequently the retroactivity provided for in Article 6(1) of Regulation 170/83 cannot be regarded as validating ex post facto national measures which imposed criminal penalties, at the time of the conduct at issue, if those measures were not valid.

Where there is a pressing Union objective and where the legitimate expectations of those concerned are duly respected, then retroactivity may, exceptionally, be accepted in a non-criminal context. This is exemplified by Fedesa.<sup>90</sup> The applicants argued that the Directive was in breach of the principle of non-retroactivity because it was adopted on 7 March 1988 and stipulated that it was to be implemented by 1 January 1988 at the latest. The Court drew a distinction between the retroactive effect of penal provisions and retroactive effect outside the criminal sphere. As to the former, the Court affirmed Kent Kirk, but held that the Directive in Fedesa did not impose any criminal liability as such. As to the latter, the Court ruled that the Directive did not contravene the principle of non-retroactivity. It had been adopted to replace an earlier Directive that had been annulled. The time frame of the challenged Directive was necessary to avoid a temporary legal vacuum where there would be no Community legislation to back up the Member States' existing implementing provisions. It was for this reason that the Council had maintained the date of the earlier Directive when it passed the later Directive.<sup>91</sup>

(ii) Legal Certainty, Legitimate Expectations, and Apparent Retroactivity

Apparent retroactivity covers the situation where legislative acts are applied to events which occurred in the past, but which have not yet been definitively concluded. The moral arguments against allowing laws to have actual retroactive effect are powerful. Cases involving apparent retroactivity are more problematic, because the administration must have the power to alter policy for the future, even though this may have implications for the conduct of private parties, which was planned on the basis of the pre-existing legal regime.<sup>92</sup> The law in this area is complex and only an outline can be provided here. The key elements in the Court's approach are as follows.

<sup>91</sup> The Court held that there was no infringement of the legitimate expectations, because the earlier dir was only annulled because of a procedural defect, and those affected by the national implementing legislation could not expect the Council to change its attitude on the substance of the matter in the dir during the short time between the annulment of the first dir and the notification of the second dir: ibid [47].

First, the protection of legitimate expectations developed initially in relation to the revocation of administrative decisions. The general principle is that favourable decisions bind the administration,<sup>93</sup> although this principle is subject to a number of exceptions.<sup>94</sup>

Secondly, the protection of legitimate expectations also applies to representations.<sup>95</sup> The general principle is that the protection of legitimate expectations extends to any individual who is in a situation from which it is clear that, in giving precise and specific assurances,<sup>96</sup> the Union institutions caused that person to entertain justified hopes.<sup>97</sup> This depends on the nature and wording of the representation.<sup>98</sup> In CIRFS<sup>99</sup> the ECJ was willing to accept that the Commission was bound by the terms of its policy framework, and in IJssel-Vliet<sup>100</sup> it held that Commission guidelines that had been built into a Dutch aid scheme were binding upon the Dutch Government. Moreover, in Vlaams Gewest<sup>101</sup> the CFI held that the guidelines adopted by the Commission had to be applied in accordance with the principle of equal treatment, with the implication that like cases, as defined in the guidelines, had to be treated alike.

Thirdly, the claim will fail where the Court adjudges that the applicant's expectations were not legitimate. This will be so where: the challenged EU activity was designed to close a legal gap to prevent traders from making a speculative profit;<sup>102</sup> the expectations were not reasonable, because the contested measure should have been foreseen;<sup>103</sup> or the applicant had not met the conditions attached to a grant of funding.<sup>104</sup>

Fourthly, the mere fact that a trader is disadvantaged by a change in the law will not give cause for complaint based upon disappointment of legitimate expectations. A trader will not be held to have a legitimate expectation that an existing situation, which is capable of being altered by decisions taken by the institutions within the limits of their discretionary powers, will be maintained.<sup>105</sup> This is particularly so in the context of the CAP, where constant adjustments to meet new market circumstances

David Bigman, Applicant

v.

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development,
Respondent

1. The World Bank Administrative Tribunal, composed of Robert A. Gorman, President, Francisco Orrego Vicuña and Thio Su Mien, Vice Presidents, and A. Kamal Abul-Magd, Bola A. Ajibola, Elizabeth Evatt and Jan Paulsson, Judges, has been seized of an application, received on May 12, 1998, by David Bigman against the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The usual exchange of pleadings took place. The case was listed on February 17, 1999.

2. This case concerns a complaint by the Applicant that the conditions under which he was recruited by the Bank on a fixed-term appointment were not honored and that, as a result, his appointment was neither regularized nor extended. Issues relating to breach of promise and breach of contract have been raised in this connection, together with allegations of arbitrariness and abuse of discretion.

3. The Applicant joined the Bank in 1994 as a Senior Economist in the Human Resources Division of the Africa Technical Department (AFTHR) on a three-year fixed-term appointment. At the time of his recruitment by the Bank, the Applicant was on a two-year contract as a Senior Economist with the International Monetary Fund (IMF), a position he had held since 1992. He was also at that time on sabbatical leave from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. The Applicant maintains that this sabbatical leave had prevented him from accepting a regular staff appointment when he joined the IMF.

4. In order to accept the offer made by the Bank, the Applicant had to take two important steps in the pursuance of his professional career. The Applicant explained that he had first to inform the pertinent Department at the IMF that he would not seek extension or regularization of his appointment. The second, and more important, step was to take early retirement from the Hebrew University. The Applicant further explains that he took these steps and accepted the Bank's offer of employment because of the nature of the work offered by the Bank and the conditions discussed for his appointment. An examination of the circumstances of the Applicant's appointment and of the conditions that might have intervened are, therefore, crucial aspects that need to be considered by the Tribunal.

5. The Applicant was interviewed and recruited by Mr. X – a senior officer and technical specialist who served as supervisor of the Poverty Unit in AFTHR – and was assigned to Mr. X's Unit when he joined the Bank. During the process of his recruitment, he was also interviewed by the Division Chief of AFTHR and the supervisor of the Food Security Unit in that Division. The Applicant contends that during the recruitment process he was given assurances by Mr. X that his appointment would be regularized after one year if his performance was satisfactory. The Bank is of the view, however, that the Applicant only accepted an offer of a three-year fixed-term appointment and that, in accordance with the letter of appointment, such fixed-term appointment was not subject to automatic regularization or extension. The Bank further argues that Mr. X had only offered an opinion and not a promise of any kind and that, in any event, Mr. X had no managerial authority to make promises.

6. The first question that the Tribunal must address is whether there was in fact a promise made by Mr. X relating to the Applicant's appointment, and if so the nature of the promise. The record is abundantly clear that such a promise was in fact made. In an electronic message addressed to the Technical Manager of the Africa Technical Department, Institutional and Social Policy Division, regarding discussions about the Applicant's confirmation, dated September 29, 1996, Mr. X stated: "My dilemma is that I assured David almost two and a half years ago when he joined the Bank that he would be confirmed given my assumption that his work would be good." In the Report of the Appeals Committee on the Applicant's appeal, dated February 19, 1998, it was further recorded that "Mr. [X] testified that he recalls 'assuring' Appellant, based on his understanding of common practice at the Bank, that if all went well, Appellant could expect to be regularized toward the end of his contract term." In yet more unequivocal terms, Mr. X signed a written statement on September 10, 1998, confirming that

[a]s the person in charge of the Poverty Unit and responsible for recruiting for this position, I assured David that under normal conditions he would be made regular staff if his performance was satisfactory .... I expected the regularization to take place within one to two years after his entry on duty and certainly well before the end of his contract.

7. Contrary to the Respondent's assertions in its pleadings, the Bank itself acknowledged that a promise of regularization was in fact made to the Applicant, conditioned upon his satisfactory performance. In particular, the Acting Vice President for the Africa Region, in his administrative review of July 30, 1997, stated: "It is regrettable that you were promised regularization in one year. This was an unauthorized promise and this matter was clarified with you after you accepted the appointment." In the light of the above, it is well established that Mr. X made a promise to the Applicant with respect to the terms and conditions of the Applicant's appointment, beyond and in addition to what was included in the letter of appointment. Mr. X's authority to make a promise of regularization will be discussed further below.

8. The question that follows is whether such terms and conditions were decisive in the Applicant's acceptance of employment with the Bank. Again on this point, the Tribunal finds that this was so. It is hardly conceivable that a well-established professional such as the Applicant would forego a possibility of regular employment with the IMF or take early retirement from the Hebrew University in order to accept a limited three-year fixed-term appointment with the Bank. The assurances about his regularization made a crucial difference for his acceptance of employment with the Bank. This conclusion is based not only on the Applicant's statement of events, but also on the opinion of Mr. X. Indeed, Mr. X, in his written statement of September 10, 1998, confirmed that:

I encouraged David to apply for the position in the Africa Region's Poverty Unit, which matched his qualifications and experience. I knew that David would have to make important career decisions in accepting the position in the Bank on the basis of a fixed term contract since he had a position in the IMF that could be regularized, and he was still a tenured professor at the Hebrew University. Therefore, he relied on my assurances about the nature of the position and the good prospects for regularization given sound performance.

9. The Tribunal must now turn to the question of Mr. X's authority to make a promise of the kind discussed above. In the Bank's view, Mr. X did not have such authority since he "was not a 'Senior Staff Member with management responsibilities,' a 'recruiter,' or in any other position which would authorize him to offer or promise terms of appointment or conditions of employment, as Applicant has portrayed." (Respondent's Answer at para. 56.) As was stated in the administrative review of July 30, 1997, "[t]his was an unauthorized promise...." In the Applicant's view, however, Mr. X was the officer responsible for the Poverty Unit, supervised its work and recruited for it, and was relied on by the Division Chief for this and other administrative tasks relating to the Division. Mr. X himself indicated in his statement of September 10, 1998 that he was "the person in charge of the Poverty Unit and responsible for recruiting for this position...."

10. There can be no doubt that Mr. X was the Applicant's main contact with respect to recruitment for, and discussions about, the offered position. Furthermore, it appears that Mr. X was in charge of a number of administrative aspects relating to the work of the unit concerned, a matter on which his advice was followed by the Division Chief. The Applicant, therefore, had every reason to rely on the terms discussed with Mr. X and no reason whatsoever to doubt Mr. X's authority or clearance to this effect. However, even assuming that Mr. X acted without authority or that he exceeded his competence, this does not relieve the Bank of its responsibility vis-à-vis the Applicant. It is a well-established principle of many legal systems, as well as of international law, that the act of an official who is acting within the scope of his or her actual or apparent authority will be attributable to the relevant entity. It follows that also the act of a Bank official who is acting within his or her apparent authority will be attributable to the institution, particularly if this act was relied upon in good faith. Whether the question of Mr. X's authority was explained to the Applicant and discussed with him after his acceptance of the letter of appointment, a matter which the Bank affirms and the Applicant denies, does not change the fact that the Applicant relied on the conditions offered for accepting his employment with the Bank.

11. The promise made to the Applicant was, however, expressly conditional on his performance being satisfactory. In the interim performance evaluation of January 25, 1995, the Applicant's Division Chief concluded that the Applicant "has demonstrated that he has the required technical knowledge, analytical capability to work under pressure and initiative to perform well in this Division." A similar evaluation was recorded in the Applicant's Performance Review Record (PRR) for the period of June 1994 to June 1995, that is, covering the first full year of his association with the Bank. In both evaluations, it was noted that the Applicant needed to improve his interpersonal skills with other members of the Division; in the PRR, it was also observed that the Applicant needed to adapt more readily to "the operational focus and requirements." These comments did not involve any negative criticism of the Applicant's performance and it was precisely because his "performance [had] been very good" during this first year that the Applicant's original probationary appointment was confirmed by the Management Review Team on recommendation of the manager, as was provided for under Staff Rule 4.02, paragraph 3.02(a). Such a recommendation is made if the "staff member is considered suitable for continued employment with the Bank Group," as provided under Staff Rule 4.02, paragraph 3.01(a), as then in force.

12. On the basis of the Applicant's satisfactory performance, Mr. X – who was of the opinion that the Applicant's performance had been "excellent" – recommended that the Applicant be given a regular appointment, just as he had promised during the recruitment process. It was at this point, however, that problems associated with the regularization of the Applicant's contract began to emerge.

13. In the PRR for the period of February 1995 to December 1995, it was again concluded that the Applicant's performance had been satisfactory. In this PRR, it was indicated that the Applicant brought "analytical rigor in operational and own-managed work" and that there had been "considerable improvement" in the Applicant's "interpersonal skills and in team collaboration." On this basis, the Applicant was given a full satisfactory merit increase rating of "3" for that year, a rating given to most of the staff in the Division. Notwithstanding its agreement with this evaluation, the Management Review Team decided to reserve its recommendation regarding regularization on the ground that it "could not find a rationale for early regularization." It was expressly stated by the Management Review Team that "[t]his is not a negative comment on Mr. Bigman's performance, which was satisfactory." The practical result of this decision was that the Applicant was not regularized after his various evaluations, even though his performance was satisfactory.

14. After efforts by both the Applicant and Mr. X to have the issue of regularization addressed, the Vice President for the Africa Region informed the Applicant, by memorandum of June 28, 1996, that the issue would be determined "through the regular process and procedures applicable to such cases" and that a decision would be taken at least six months before the end of his contract in June 1997.

15. The PRR for 1996 also reflected satisfactory performance by the Applicant, but the question of his teamwork effectiveness was again raised. On this basis, and having also considered the Applicant's technical work, the Management Review Team decided in March 1997 that there "was not an adequate case to regularize Mr. Bigman, nor to extend his fixed-term contract for a multi-year period." This language was changed in the final version of the Management Review Record after the Ombudsman intervened. In the final version, it was stated that the Management Review Team "had high regard for Mr. Bigman's technical skills and capacities," but that it did not see a possibility of extending the contract "since there has not been a sufficient match between the experience that Mr. Bigman offered and the operational needs of the Africa Region." A six-month extension of the contract was recommended instead. At this point it should be noted that – according to the terms of the application – a two-year extension of the Applicant's contract could have been acceptable to him as an alternative fulfillment of the promise made. An administrative review did not change the conclusions of the Management Review Team, and the Applicant's ability to work as part of a team was invoked as a reason. Neither was relief obtained by the Applicant from the Appeals Committee, in the findings of which it was indicated that the decision not to regularize the Applicant "resulted from a shifting of the priorities in the Region, that took place during Appellant's tenure in the Bank." The various evaluations of the Applicant support the conclusion that the Applicant's performance was satisfactory throughout his term of service.

16. Some criticisms relating to the Applicant's interpersonal relations and to the need to demonstrate his effectiveness in operational work were made, but these criticisms did not change the overall evaluations. Moreover, the criticisms made were not consistent. In fact, early references to interpersonal problems were followed later by an observation that there had been "considerable" improvement in this respect. The Applicant's interpersonal skills were then again criticized and were initially listed as one of two reasons for not regularizing or extending his contract. The Applicant's technical work was mentioned as the other reason even though his evaluations were unanimous in commending his skills and experience. In fact, the final version of the Management Review Record was changed to reflect the Management Review Team's "high regard" for such skills. Concerns about the Applicant's operational work were also raised, but, again, such concerns were not important aspects of his evaluations. A change of priorities in the Africa Region and a mismatch between experience and operational needs have also been invoked, aspects that are entirely unrelated to interpersonal relations or professional skills. From these contradictions, it follows that there was no clarity at all with respect to the reasons that led to the decision not to regularize or extend the Applicant's employment. However, it is clear enough that such a decision was not related to the Applicant's performance but to new priorities in the region.

17. A professional controversy between the Applicant and the Research Department about a Special Program of Assistance for Africa appears to have had some influence on the decisions taken. Differing views were expressed about the orientation of this program and the matter was discussed with a group of the Bank's donors at a meeting held in Bern in September 1996. Criticism of the Applicant's approach was made by staff of the Research Department and concerns were expressed about the implications that this discussion could have outside the Bank. This situation was not fully addressed until after regularization had already been turned down. While the Applicant argues that his contribution was ultimately approved, the Tribunal need not address this question as it is reasonable to conclude that non-approval of his contribution would not have affected his overall performance or the evaluations of his many other tasks, which occupied more than two-thirds of his time.

18. As noted above, the Appeals Committee found that the decision not to regularize the Applicant's contract resulted from a shifting of the priorities in the Africa Region. In fact, following a reorganization of that Region in mid-1996 the Applicant was transferred to the Institutional and Social Policy (ISP) Unit, the supervisors and managers of which participated in the Management Review Team that decided against regularization or extension of his contract. The question of research capability versus operational needs was again brought to the fore during the Applicant's stay in ISP. This was indicated in the Appeals Committee Report, where it was concluded that the "Appellant's managers in the reorganized ISP unit were interested in hiring outside consultants to perform the type of work that Appellant had been doing, and they did not foresee demand for Appellant's services as a staff member."

19. This last conclusion confirms that the decision not to regularize the Applicant's contract was unrelated to his performance and responded to the change of priorities mentioned above. Not only was the Applicant's contract not regularized or extended despite his overall continuing satisfactory performance, but it is quite evident that the Applicant's interpersonal problems, teamwork performance and professional skills were not, in fact, the main reason for the final decision not to convert or extend his contract. Rather, it appears that the main reason for the decision was the shifting of priorities that took place during the third and last year of the Applicant's employment. The operational needs of the ISP Unit and the managers' preferences for hiring consultants were absent from all of the Applicant's evaluations. Until the late shifting of priorities took place, the Applicant had satisfied the condition (i.e., satisfactory performance) that had been attached to the promise of conversion of his fixed-term appointment.

20. As rightly argued by the Respondent, and as often held by the Tribunal, there is no absolute right to conversion or extension of a fixed-term appointment. (Mr. X, Decision No. 16 [1984].) But this is so in ordinary circumstances, which are not present in this case. The Applicant accepted employment with the Bank in the light of specific conditions offered to him. This offer constituted a legally valid promise as it was made by an official with at least the apparent authority to do so and is, therefore, attributable to the Bank. The Applicant relied in good faith on this promise to accept the Bank's offer of employment and passed up other opportunities outside the Bank.

21. The promise was conditional on the Applicant's satisfactory performance. His performance was not only satisfactory but commended throughout the period of his appointment, as is clearly evidenced by the record. The reasons invoked for the decision not to convert or extend the Applicant's contract were not adequately reflected in the Applicant's evaluations, nor were they meaningful in the context of such evaluations. Only a change of priorities and a different preference by the managers, unrelated to the Applicant's performance, appear to have been at the very heart of the decision taken.

22. As the Tribunal held in another case involving the question of a promise, "[t]he discretion exercised by the Respondent as to whether the Applicant met the requirements of the position must, therefore, be scrutinized by the Tribunal in order to ensure that it is not vitiated by an abuse of discretion..." (Matthew, Decision No. 103 [1991], para. 29.) While evaluations of the Applicant were in the present case fair and reasonable, such evaluations were not duly taken into account in reaching the final decision, which was based on considerations different from his performance. The process of reaching a decision was, therefore, vitiated by an abuse of discretion. This led to the breach of a legally valid promise, the conditions of which had been properly met.

23. The Tribunal must now consider the question of remedies. While normally a vitiated decision would be quashed by the Tribunal, this has not been requested by the Applicant. It follows that the Tribunal shall award compensation for the damage that the Applicant has suffered as a result of the breach of the promise made by the Respondent.

Decision

For the above reasons, the Tribunal unanimously decides that:

- (i) the Respondent shall pay the Applicant compensation for the breach of promise in the amount equivalent to eighteen months' net salary;
- (ii) the Respondent shall remove from the Applicant's file all the documents relating to the Management Review Record dated May 8, 1997, in the event that this has not already been done; and
- (iii) the Respondent shall pay costs to the Applicant in the amount of $9,974.48.

Chapter 3. Directors and Management (Refs & Annos)

West's Ann.Cal.Corp.Code § 309

§ 309. Performance of duties by director; liability

Currentness

(a) A director shall perform the duties of a director, including duties as a member of any committee of the board upon which the director may serve, in good faith, in a manner such director believes to be in the best interests of the corporation and its shareholders and with such care, including reasonable inquiry, as an ordinarily prudent person in a like position would use under similar circumstances.

(b) In performing the duties of a director, a director shall be entitled to rely on information, opinions, reports or statements, including financial statements and other financial data, in each case prepared or presented by any of the following:

(1) One or more officers or employees of the corporation whom the director believes to be reliable and competent in the matters presented.

(2) Counsel, independent accountants or other persons as to matters which the director believes to be within such person's professional or expert competence.

(3) A committee of the board upon which the director does not serve, as to matters within its designated authority, which committee the director believes to merit confidence, so long as, in any such case, the director acts in good faith, after reasonable inquiry when the need therefor is indicated by the circumstances and without knowledge that would cause such reliance to be unwarranted.

(c) A person who performs the duties of a director in accordance with subdivisions (a) and (b) shall have no liability based upon any alleged failure to discharge the person's obligations as a director. In addition, the liability of a director for monetary damages may be eliminated or limited in a corporation's articles to the extent provided in paragraph (10) of subdivision \(a\) of Section 204.

Editors' Notes

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE COMMENTS--ASSEMBLY

1975 [Corrected]

Source: ABA § 35 (proposed revision). The duties of a director are specified in subdivision \(a\) of § 300. The purpose of this section is to establish a standard by which the performance of a director in the exercise of his duties shall be judged. It is intended that a person who performs his duties as a director in accordance with this standard shall have no liability by reason of being or having been a director.

(a) This subdivision provides a standard of care applicable to directors. Comments to the proposed revision of ABA § 35 indicate that it is the intent of the draftsmen of this provision, by combining the requirement of good faith within the standard of care, to incorporate “the familiar concept that, these criteria being satisfied, a director should not be liable for an honest mistake of business judgment” [Committee on Corporate Laws, Changes in the Model Business Corporation Act, 29 Bus. Lawyer 951 (1974)].

The Committee on Corporate Laws of the Section of Corporation, Banking and Business Law of the American Bar Association arrived at a number of decisions in formulating the standard of care:

(1) The reference to “ordinarily prudent person” emphasizes long traditions of the common law, in contrast to standards that might call for some undefined degree of expertise, like “ordinarily prudent business man”; the phrase is not intended to establish the preservation of assets as a priority for the corporate director, but, rather, to recognize the need for innovation as an essential of profit orientation and, in short, to focus on the basic director attributes of common sense, practical wisdom and informed judgment.

(2) The phrase “under similar circumstances” is intended both to recognize that the nature and extent of oversight will vary, depending upon such factors as the size, complexity and location of activities carried on by the particular corporation and to limit the critical assessment of a director's performance to the time of action or nonaction and thus prevent the harsher judgments which can invariably be made with the benefit of hindsight ...

(3) The phrase “in a like position” simply recognizes that the “care” under consideration is that which would be used by the “ordinarily prudent person” if he were director of the particular corporation [Committee on Corporate Laws, Changes in the Model Business Corporation Act, 29 Bus. Lawyer 954 (1974)].

While the new law adopted in general the language of ABA § 35, in subdivision (a) of Section 309 of the new law the words “including reasonable inquiry” were inserted in the phrase “with such care, including reasonable inquiry, as an ordinarily prudent person in a like position would use under similar circumstances.”

This change was made because some members of the State Bar Committee desired to make explicit what the majority of members considered to be implicit in the original language, i.e., that reasonable care under some circumstances could include a duty of inquiry. In other words, a director may not close his eyes to what is going on about him in the conduct of the corporate business and, if he is put on notice by the presence of suspicious circumstances, he may be required to make such “reasonable inquiry” as an ordinarily prudent person in his position would make under similar circumstances. There was no intention of imposing upon any director a duty to make an inquiry regardless of the circumstances, such as the duty imposed by Section 11 of the United States Securities Act of 1933 in connection with a public offering of securities, or to add a separate requirement of inquiry apart from a director's general duty of care.

Also, in subdivision (b) of this same section, the word “reasonably” was deleted in three places where it appeared in the ABA § 35 language before the word “believes.” The reason for this deletion was the concern expressed by some members of the State Bar Committee that the phrase “reasonably believes” to be competent or reliable would impose upon each director the duty in all cases of making an investigation or inquiry regarding the competence and reliability of the employees and advisers of the company. In lieu of the phrase “reasonably believes”, there was inserted in this subdivision (b) the language towards the end: “after reasonable inquiry when the need therefor is indicated by the circumstances.”

The phrase “including reasonable inquiry” in subdivision (a) was intended to mean precisely the same thing as the language substituted in subdivision (b), i.e., that the duty of inquiry only arises if the circumstances indicate the need therefor.

The standard of care does not include officers. The Committee on Corporate Laws concluded that:

... it was not appropriate in connection with a revision of Section 35 to deal with those officers who were not also directors of the corporation. Although a non-director officer may have a duty of care similar to that of a director as set forth in Section 35, his ability to rely on factual information, reports or statements may, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case, be more limited than in the case of a director in view of the greater obligation he may have to be familiar with the affairs of the corporation [Committee on Corporate Laws, Changes in the Model Business Corporation Act, 29 Bus. Lawyer 953 (1974)].

Section 300 (also derived from the proposed revision of ABA § 35) provides that the business and affairs of the corporations shall be exercised by or under the direction of the board. In formulating a proper standard of care for a director in the performance of his duties, the Committee on Corporate Laws considered the nature of the duties of a director.

It is generally recognized that the board of directors may delegate to appropriate officers of the corporation the authority to exercise those powers not required by law to be exercised by the board itself. While such a delegation will not serve to relieve the board from its responsibilities of oversight, it is believed appropriate that the directors not be held personally responsible for actions or omissions of officers, employees or agents of the corporation so long as the directors, complying with the enunciated standard of care, have relied reasonably upon such officers, employees or agents [Committee on Corporate Laws, Changes in the Model Business Corporation Act, 29 Bus. Lawyer 952 (1974)].

(b) Under prior law, a director has the right to rely in limited situations upon certain materials [Cal. § 829]. This subdivision, due to the number and complexity of the matters considered by directors, enlarges the right of reliance to encompass all matters for which the board is responsible and broadens the range of materials upon which a director may rely. The statutory right of reliance is not intended to be exclusive.

The purpose of these provisions were the subject of comment by the Committee on Corporate Laws. A director will be entitled to rely:

... upon factual information, opinions, reports or statements, including financial statements and other financial data, in each case prepared or presented by (a) one or more officers or employees of the corporation whom he reasonably believes to be reliable and competent in the matters presented, (b) counsel, public accountants or other persons as to matters which he reasonably believes to be within such person's professional or expert competence, or (c) a board committee (upon which he does not serve), provided that he reasonably believes confidence therein is merited, so long as in any such case he shall be without knowledge concerning the matter in question which would cause such reliance to be unwarranted. Inherent in the good faith standard is the requirement that, in order to be entitled to rely on such reports, statements, opinions and other matters, the director must have read, or been present at the meeting at which is orally presented, the report or statement in question and must not have any pertinent knowledge which would cause him to conclude that he should not rely thereon [Committee on Corporate Laws, Changes in the Model Business Corporation Act, 29 Bus. Lawyer supra 954 (1974)].

The provision permitting reliance upon a committee of the board is intended to permit reliance upon the work product of a board committee resulting from a more detailed investigation undertaken by that committee and which forms the basis for action by the board [Committee on Corporate Laws, Changes in the Model Business Corporation Act, 29 Bus. Lawyer 955 (1974)]. Additionally, the provisions contemplate reliance upon a committee where only a supervisory responsibility is exercised (e.g. a corporate audit committee with respect to its role of oversight concerning accounting and audit functions) [Committee Corporate Laws, Changes in the Model Business Corporation Act, 29 Bus. Lawyer 955 (1974)].

See the discussion above regarding the changes made in this subdivision from the language in ABA § 35 to make crystal clear that no duty of inquiry comparable to that contained in Section 11 of the United States Securities Act of 1933 was intended to be imposed upon directors in judging the competence and reliability of the persons on whom they rely, unless there are circumstances which would cause any reasonable man in a like position to make such an inquiry. As Lord Halsbury stated in Dovey v. Cory [(1901) A.C. 477]:

“I cannot think that it can be expected of a director that he should be watching either the inferior officers of the bank or verifying the calculations of the auditors himself. The business of life could not go on if people could not trust those who are put into a position of trust for the express purpose of attending to details of management.”

(c) The purpose of this subdivision is to relieve a person from any liability by reason of being or having been a director of a corporation, if that person has exercised his duties in the manner contemplated by this section.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (FIRST CHAMBER)
30 JANUARY 1974<sup>1</sup>

Raymond Louwage and Marie-Thérèse Louwage, née Moriame v Commission of the European Communities

Case 148/73

S u m m a r y

1. Acts of an institution — Internal directive — Binding nature
2. Officials — Reimbursement of expenses — Daily subsistence allowance — Conditions of grant
(Staff Regulations, Annex VII, Article 10)

1. Although an internal directive has not the character of a rule of law which the administration is bound to observe, it nevertheless sets forth a rule of conduct indicating the practice to be followed, from which the administration may not depart without giving reasons which have led it to do so, since otherwise the principles of equality of treatment would be infringed.
2. Daily subsistence allowance is due to an official who, to comply with the obligation to reside in the place where he is employed, must remove to a residence other than that which he occupied previously, without however being able to give up this latter.

In Case 148/73

JUDGMENT

Issues of fact and of law

The facts of the case, the subject matter of the applications and the views of the parties may be summarized as follows:

I — Facts and procedure

1. The husband and wife applicants, at present officials of the Commission of the European Communities in Brussels, formerly lived in Luxembourg where Mrs Louwage had been engaged on 15 July 1958 on the auxiliary staff of the secretariat of the Councils and on 1 November 1958 as an established official with the European Parliament.

Mr Louwage was at first engaged in an independent profession in Luxembourg, but after having applied for a position with the Commission of the EEC in Brussels, he was engaged on 20 July 1965 on the auxiliary staff. On 1 October 1968 he was appointed probationary official with the single Commission, and established on 1 April 1969. From Brussels he visited his family each weekend in Luxembourg.

Wishing to 're-establish a true family home', Mrs Louwage was seconded at her request from the European Parliament to the Commission in Brussels for a period of six months as from April 1971, which was renewed until she was established in April 1972.

As soon as his wife arrived in Brussels, Mr Louwage left the small flat which he previously occupied and moved with her into another small flat while waiting for the house which they were having built at Overijse to be finished.

On 11 November 1971 without waiting for her transfer to be confirmed, but assured that it would be done so speedily, Mrs Louwage requested permission to move. She received no reply to her letter in which she pointed out that neither her husband nor herself had as yet started to move in and that they had not received either the installation allowance or the daily subsistence allowance. And yet they were not 'able to live in the family home still maintained in Luxembourg' where they returned each weekend as did their son (a student in Liège) for whom they had no facilities in Brussels.

The removal however took place on 27 January 1972 and the removal bill was settled on 22 August 1972.

2. On 25 October 1972 Mrs Louwage received a note from the Directorate of Social Affairs, signed by the Head of the 'Individual Rights and Privileges' Division, in reply to the steps which she had taken to recover the removal expenses, the payment of the daily subsistence allowance and the installation allowance due to her husband and herself. In this note:

- the administration refused any reimbursement of removal expenses until the remover had given an explanation of the error in the invoice (he had in fact submitted an invoice for 40 600 BF which was settled in the sum of 24 600 BF);
- Mrs Louwage was recognized as being entitled to an installation allowance equal to the amount of her monthly basic salary at the date of her transfer and Mr Louwage as similarly entitled subject to a reduction of 20 % of the amount of the daily subsistence allowance which he had received during the fifth and sixth months which he had lived in Brussels;

— as regards the daily subsistence allowance it would be recovered from the salary of Mr Louwage in respect of the period from 1 April to 27 September 1969 for which he had wrongfully received it as 'notional removal expenses'; as for Mrs Louwage she was not entitled, since in establishing herself in Brussels, she had 'rejoined' her husband.

3. On 30 November 1972 the applicants submitted a complaint under Article 90 of the Staff Regulations to the Director-General of Administration seeking the annulment of the decisions contained in the note of 25 October, the reimbursement of the removal expenses (24 600 BF) and the payment of the daily subsistence allowance to Mrs Louwage, for whom Brussels had always been an uncertain residence, since the family home had in fact remained established in Luxembourg.

The complaint was also directed 'against the decision to recover the daily subsistence allowance from Mr Louwage which had been paid for a notional removal'.

Finally since the Commission did not object to payment of the installation allowance, it appeared equitable to the applicants that it should be paid to each of them at the rate for a 'single person'.

4. Since there was no reply to this complaint, the applicants lodged the present appeal on 28 June 1973.

The written procedure followed the normal course. On the report of the Judge-Rapporteur, after hearing the Advocate-General, the Court (First Chamber) decided to proceed without a preparatory inquiry.

II — Conclusions of the parties

The applicants claim that the Court should:

1. annul the note of 25 October 1972;

2. order the Commission
  - (a) to pay to Mrs Louwage a sum of 24 600 BF — with interest at 4 % as from 22 August 1972 to date of payment — as removal expenses (the applicants subsequently did not pursue their claim to interest for delay);
  - (b) to pay to Mr Louwage the amount of two months basic salary as installation allowance (the applicant subsequently abandoned the claim to the second month);
  - (c) to pay to Mrs Louwage as daily subsistence allowance for the period from 5 April 1971, the date of her taking up employment with the Commission in Brussels, to 27 January 1972, the date of her removal, the amounts provided in the table in Article 10 of Annex VII;
3. declare that Mr Louwage rightfully received the daily subsistence allowance between 1 April and 27 September 1969, that the administration is not entitled to require reimbursement from him of the said allowance, nor to recover it by deductions from his salary, and that the conditions for recovery of undue payment provided for in Article 85 of the Staff Regulations are not fulfilled (the applicant subsequently accepted the undertaking on the part of the appointing authority to abandon all claim to reimbursement);
4. order the Commission to pay the costs.

The defendant contends that the Court should:

1. reject as otiose and inadmissible the application by Mr Louwage for annulment of the decision of 25 October 1972 relating to the recovery of part of the daily subsistence allowance paid to him prior to 27 September 1969 (the applicant has accepted this);

2. reject as inadmissible and in any case unfounded the claim by Mr Louwage to an installation allowance equal to two months basic salary (the applicant has abandoned this claim);
3. reject as unfounded the claim by Mrs Louwage to complete reimbursement of the actual cost of removal from the common home as well as the claim to daily subsistence allowance for the period from 5 April 1971 to 27 January 1972;
4. reject as otiose and therefore inadmissible the application to which she is entitled, but which the defendant will show has recently been effected and in any case before judgment;
5. order the applicants to pay the costs (in the rejoinder, the defendant leaves this to the discretion of the Court).

III — Submissions and arguments of the parties

The defendant makes no objection to the admissibility of the application.

Substance

First submission: infringement of Article 9 of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations

The second applicant submits that the decision contained in the note dated 25 October 1972 does not satisfy the provisions of Article 9 of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations and that the removal expenses ought to be reimbursed her.

The defendant replies that it was Mr Louwage who settled the amount of 24 600 BF and that the applicants could claim only the difference between the amount paid to the remover (24 600 BF) and the notional removal expenses which Mr Louwage had received in 1968 as daily subsistence allowance (14 650 BF), i.e. 9 950 BF.

A decision of the Commission dated 17 March 1971, taking effect as from 5 March 1968, stipulated that 'where an official has been authorized to move but has not done so during the year following his establishment... he shall be entitled to daily subsistence allowance for an initial period of six months and thereafter from the seventh month for a minimum period of a further six months to the extent of his notional removal expenses. Any over-payment shall be recovered'. This wording is to be compared with the former Article 10 (3) of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations in force when Mr Louwage was established, which, as regards the official who did not effect his removal within the year of his being established, limited the amount of his daily subsistence allowance to 'the total amount of payments to which he would have been entitled in the event of removal'.

The defendant considers that the daily subsistence allowance paid to Mr Louwage from 1 April 1969 to 27 September 1969, i.e., as from the seventh month of the period during which he benefited from it, necessarily comprised a not insignificant amount of 'notional removal expenses'. The amount of the notional expenses, relating to a removal from Luxembourg to Overijse (from 201 to 250 km) made by a head of household official in grade C, is 12 650 BF according to the scale annexed to the abovementioned directives, to which must be added 2 000 BF in respect of the son dependent on Mr Louwage. Thus in receiving from 1 April 1969 to 27 September 1969 a total daily subsistence allowance amounting to 36 000 BF, Mr Louwage had received a preliminary instalment of 14 650 BF towards 'the extent of his notional removal expenses' as a result of the requirement in the Staff Regulations that he had to be reimbursed at a flat rate and in advance for future removal expenses that were not incurred during the year following his establishment. This sum, once having gone into the conjugal community for a very good reason (since it related to the defendant's responsibility for removal expenses not yet incurred) could not be taken into account until the spouses, having effected their common removal and thereby incurred a debt to the removal firm on behalf of their conjugal community, sought to obtain from the defendant reimbursement of the common funds paid to the removal firm in discharge of the common debt.

In view of the payment already made in 1969 to Mr Louwage, the legal administrator of the conjugal community, it appears to the defendant that only 9 950 BF remains payable.

The second applicant replies that the defendant has no obligation to the conjugal community constituted by the applicants, but towards its agents. It is to Mrs Louwage that Article 9 of Annex VII must be applied. Moreover the defendant could not recover against the community of property a sum which it declared it would forgo as regards Mr Louwage (letter of 31 July 1973).

The defendant does not think that there ought to be a refund to Mrs Louwage of the whole 24 600 BF, disregarding the prior lumpsum refund granted for the same reasons to the spouses. Such would create an unjustifiable enrichment of the family. No ill-feeling dictated the decision, the grounds of which had nothing to do with the question of 'penalizing the woman' by reason of her sex.

Moreover, contrary to the second applicant's view, it does not follow from the decision of 31 July 1973 that 'the notional removal expenses allowed to the husband could not be taken into account on the removal of Mrs Louwage at the end of January 1972'. The defendant has expressly abandoned the claim to recover, on the footing of undue payment, the excess paid, i.e., the difference of 21 350 BF between the daily subsistence allowance between 1 April 1969 and 27 September 1969 (36 000 BF) and the notional removal expenses (14 650 BF). On the other hand it has not abandoned the claim to deduct from the amount of the real costs of removal, the amount of the notional expenses (14 650 BF), not because they had been wrongly paid, but to avoid a reimbursement greater in value than the liability arising from the same facts and cause, on the basis of which there had already been a prior reimbursement in the form of a fixed sum paid in advance.

Second submission: infringement of Article 10 of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations

The second applicant observes that she fulfilled the conditions of the former Article 10 (1) of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations, since she had not been able to continue to reside in her home and had not been able, for a period of nine months, to effect her removal (the nine months were calculated from the date of her provisional posting to Brussels and that of her removal).

The defendant recalls the terms of the decision of 31 July 1973: 'as from your secondment to the Commission on 5 April 1971 you have rejoined your husband who has been living for several years in Brussels and, by reason of this, your home has been re-established. One of the conditions referred to in the former Article 10 (1) of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations, i.e., not being able to continue to live at home, is not therefore fulfilled in your case'. The defendant disputes the claim by the second applicant that the family had lived until the day of the removal in Luxembourg. A home cannot be constituted by a flat used as a secondary weekend residence and for the rest of the time simply as a furniture store. Defined primarily by the cohabitation of the spouses, the matrimonial home was reestablished as from April 1971 in Brussels, which had become the place where they worked and the place where they cohabitated five out of seven days. This view does not seem to contradict that of the second applicant, according to whom a transfer to Brussels was requested 'in order to re-establish a true family home'.

The second applicant replies that the defendant has admitted that until April 1971 the matrimonial home was in Luxembourg. To satisfy the requirements of Article 20 of the Staff Regulations the second applicant had left the said home and had shown that she was no longer able to live there. The second applicant disputes that the matrimonial home was re-established in Brussels on her arrival there. Even if this were so it would have no effect on the application of Article 10 since the daily subsistence allowance was paid on condition that the employee had left his home and that he had not been able to effect his removal. These two conditions were fulfilled. Moreover, a removal on the basis of a secondment, as was the applicant's case, would not have been possible.

The former Article 10 of Annex VII, in force at the time the rights arose, would resolve the question in the second applicant's favour, even if the argument that the matrimonial home had been re-established in Brussels had to be accepted. Indeed the first sentence of the said Article adopts the criterion of interruption in the continuity of residence and not that of change of residence. The official was entitled to the daily subsistence allowance when he was able to prove that there had been a break in the continuity of residence in his home. Since the defendant admitted that the home prior to 5 April 1971 was in Luxembourg, the small flat in Brussels was a different home from that in Luxembourg and there was a change of home and a break in continuity within the meaning of Article 10 of the Annex VII in force in April 1972.

The defendant disputes that in April 1971 the second applicant had 'left her home'. Such would have been the case had the home remained in Luxembourg. But it is not possible to leave a home if it remained in the same place. There was, at the same time as the change of residence of a person who came to live in another town with her husband, a simultaneous transfer of the home. Since home is the principal place of cohabitation, there can be only one. The second applicant began in April 1971 and thereafter continued to live in her home, which was the couple's small flat in Brussels, for the former flat in Luxembourg simultaneously lost the character of a home and became a secondary residence.

The object of Article 10 of Annex VII is to enable the administration to accept liability for necessary but temporary expenses of double residence arising for an official from the fact that he is temporarily obliged to live alone in a hotel or in a second flat at the place of his new post, whereas the rest of his family (wife and children) continue to live in the place where he previously had his post. It is clear that in this case the official could show 'that he cannot continue to reside in his own home'.

But this is not the present case. Since April 1971 the home of the applicants was no longer in Luxembourg. They preferred to live for some months in a small flat and to retain in addition their former flat in Luxembourg as a weekend residence. If they had been able as from April 1971 to establish their matrimonial home in the house at Overijse, in the event that it had been finished, and to move their furniture, the second applicant would not have thought she had a case to claim the daily subsistence allowance under Article 10 of Annex VII, by reason of the fact that the removal of the common furniture would already have taken place.

The present claim for the second applicant amounts to making the defendant responsible for the fact that the house in Overijse was not habitable as from April 1971.

The oral hearing took place on 15 November 1973.

The applicants were represented by Victor Biel, advocate at the Cour Supérieure de Justice of the Grand-Duché of Luxembourg, and the Commission of the European Communities by its Legal Adviser, Joseph Griesmar, acting as agent.

The Advocate-General delivered his opinion at the hearing on 5 December 1973.

Grounds of judgment

- 1 By an application filed on 29 June 1973, the applicants have asked the Court to annul the decisions contained in a note from the Head of the 'Individual Rights and Privileges' Division of 25 October 1972, refusing to apply for their benefit the provisions of Articles 5, 9 and 10 of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations.
- 2 During the course of the proceedings the applicants abandoned certain claims and others have been satisfied.

- 3 The two points remaining in dispute concern the claims of the second applicant to obtain on the one hand a refund of the removal expenses involved in her transfer from the European Parliament in Luxembourg to the Commission in Brussels and on the other hand the payment of subsistence allowance for the period from 5 April 1971, the date of her first provisional secondment to the Commission, to 27 January 1972, date of her removal.

The first claim

- 4 The second applicant claims reimbursement of the whole of the expenses of removal of the common furniture, amounting to 24 600 BF.
- 5 The defendant relies on the principle that, while reimbursement of the removal expenses is due to the two spouses, they are not each entitled to the whole, and therefore admits liability only for an amount equal to the difference between the actual cost of the removal and the daily subsistence allowance that the first applicant received as a fixed payment in advance made because he had not moved within a year after taking up his duties.
- 6 The first applicant received, as daily subsistence allowance, from 1 April 1969, date from which his establishment took effect, to 27 September 1969, a sum of 36 000 BF, 14 650 BF of which the defendant regards as representing the notional removal expenses.
- 7 In support of this argument the defendant refers to the terms of an internal directive of the Commission of 17 March 1971 according to which as from 5 March 1968 'where an official has been authorized to move but has not done so during the year following his establishment . . . he shall be entitled to daily subsistence allowance for an initial period of six months and thereafter from the seventh month for a maximum period of a further six months to the extent of the notional removal expenses'.
- 8 By a note dated 14 May 1969 the administration authorized the first applicant to effect his removal within a period of one year as from the date his establishment took effect, i.e., before 1 April 1970.

- 9 The daily subsistence allowance referred to in Article 10 of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations is paid to an official who is head of household for a period of 180 days.
- 10 The said note of 14 May 1969 limited this allowance in the case of the first applicant to four months from the notification of the authorization to move, i. e., to 27 September 1969.
- 11 The afore-mentioned terms of the internal directive of the Commission imply that the first plaintiff was entitled to daily subsistence allowance for a period of six months, i.e., from 1 April 1969 to 1 October 1969, then as from the seventh month, 'to the extent of the amount of the notional removal expenses'.
- 12 Although an internal directive has not the character of a rule of law which the administration is always bound to observe, it nevertheless sets forth a rule of conduct indicating the practice to be followed, from which the administration may not depart without giving the reasons which have led it to do so, since otherwise the principles of equality of treatment would be infringed.
- 13 The date from which the calculation of the first period of six months must be made is that of the establishment of the official.
- 14 The first plaintiff was established with effect from 1 April 1969.
- 15 The daily subsistence allowance must therefore be calculated from this date.
- 16 It is only from 1 October 1969 that it would have been paid 'to the extent of the notional removal expenses'.
- 17 However it is not disputed that it has not been paid to the first applicant since 27 September 1969.

- 18 It is established therefore that the first applicant has never received any payment whatsoever as notional removal expenses.
- 19 As regards this claim the appeal succeeds.

The second claim

- 20 The second applicant maintains that under Article 10 of Annex VII to the Staff Regulations, as it stood at the time, she is entitled to the benefit of daily subsistence allowance for the period between the date of her first secondment to Brussels and that of her removal.
- 21 This Article provides that 'where an official furnishes evidence that he cannot continue to reside in his own home and has not removed to the place where he is employed, he shall be entitled for not more than twelve months to a daily subsistence allowance . . .?'
- 22 The administration disputes that in the case in question the second applicant could not continue to reside in her home, which, as from her arrival in Brussels, was re-established in the small flat into which she moved with her husband.
- 23 The second applicant replied that the matrimonial home remained in Luxembourg, since a removal of the common furniture to Brussels could not be envisaged so long as her position remained that of a secondment.
- 24 Moreover, in not granting the second applicant the authorization to remove which she had requested, the administration had confirmed that it had not yet taken a decision regarding her.
- 25 The basis for daily subsistence allowance lies inter alia in the obligation on the part of the official to remove to a residence other than that which he occupied previously, without however being able to give up this latter.

- 26 The defendant has not established that such was not the case.
- 27 The fact that this official at the place of her secondment rejoined her husband, himself an official, in a provisional residence is not decisive, since it is established that their matrimonial home remained in Luxembourg.
- 28 So long, therefore, as the removal had not taken place, i.e., before 27 January 1972, the second applicant ought to have received the daily subsistence allowance within the limits provided for by the Staff Regulations.
- 29 Thus the appeal succeeds on the second claim.

C o s t s

- 30 Under the terms of Article 69 (2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party shall be ordered to pay the costs.
- 31 The defendant has failed in its submissions and must therefore pay the costs.

On those grounds,

Upon reading the pleadings;
Upon hearing the report of the Judge-Rapporteur;
Upon hearing the oral observations of the parties;
Upon hearing the opinion of the Advocate-General;
Having regard to the Staff Regulations, especially Articles 9 and 10 of Annex VII;
Having regard to the Protocols on the Statute of the Court of Justice;
Having regard to the Rules of Procedure of the Court of Justice of the European Communities, especially Article 69;

THE COURT (First Chamber)

hereby:

1. Annuls the decision by which the Commission refused the applicants reimbursement of removal expenses amounting to 24 600 BF.
2. Annuls the decision by which the Commission refused to pay the second applicant daily subsistence allowance for the period between 5 April 1971 and 27 January 1972.
3. Orders the Commission to bear the whole of the costs of the proceedings.

OPINION OF MR ADVOCATE-GENERAL REISCHL
DELIVERED ON 5 DECEMBER 1973 <sup>1</sup>

*Mr President,
Members of the Court,*

The proceedings which I am considering today are concerned with claims under Annex VII to the Staff Regulations, arising when officials of the Communities fulfil the duty under Article 20 of the Staff Regulations on taking up their appointment or on transfer, i.e. take up residence at the place where they are employed.

I will briefly mention the following facts. Mr and Mrs Louwage, the applicants in the proceedings, have had their matrimonial home in Luxembourg since 1956. Mr Louwage was at first employed outside the Communities. From 20 July 1964 he was employed as auxiliary with the Commission in Brussels. He was appointed a probationer there with effect from 1 October 1968 and an established official (Salary grade C 4) with effect from 1 April 1969. Mrs Louwage was

v.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF BARTON

MEMORIAL HOSPITAL, Defendant and Appellant.

Civ. No. 18455.

Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Apr 15, 1980.

SUMMARY

The trial court granted the petition of a physician for a writ of administrative mandate compelling a private hospital to restore plaintiff's obstetrical staff privileges. Complaints about plaintiff's delivery techniques from nurses had been transmitted to the hospital chief of staff by a certified obstetrics specialist on the staff. An ad hoc committee composed of physician members of the obstetrics department was appointed to investigate. The majority of that committee recommended suspension and the executive committee of the hospital agreed. After a review requested by plaintiff, a medical staff appeal committee agreed with the recommendation of suspension and the executive committee ratified that decision. (Superior Court of El Dorado County, No. 30698, William E. Byrne, Judge.)

The Court of Appeal affirmed, holding that, apart from any question of actual bias on the part of any of the physicians involved and from the merits of the charges, the procedure followed by the hospital violated plaintiff's fair procedure rights to an impartial tribunal by virtue of a practical probability of unfairness. In so holding, the court pointed out that the charges were brought by one of the two specialists on whom members of the ad hoc committee were accustomed and required to rely for obstetrics expertise, that his associate supported the charges, that five members of the ad hoc committee were also on the twelve-member executive committee and that, though the appeal committee did hear testimony from an obstetrical specialist in plaintiff's defense, half of the hospital's obstetric department and another specialist testified adversely. In conclusion, the court held that the trial court's order of reinstatement did not usurp the hospital's discretion to determine whether plaintiff should retain his obstetrical privileges, since reinstatement pending a proper administrative hearing did not preclude exercise of the hospital's legally vested discretion to exclude from its facilities physicians it properly concluded did not meet its standards. (Opinion by Reynoso, J., with Evans, Acting P. J., and Blease, J., concurring.)

HEADNOTES

Classified to California Digest of Official Reports

(1)

Healing Arts and Institutions § 5--Hospitals, Mental Institutions, and Nursing Homes--Officers and Employees--Private Hospitals--Right of Fair Procedure.

The common law right to fair procedure protects individuals from arbitrary exclusion or expulsion from private organizations which control important economic interests. Such rights apply when the organization involved is one affected with a public interest, such as a private hospital. The essence of the concept of fair procedure, like that of due process, is fairness. Adequate notice of charges and a reasonable opportunity to respond are basic to both sets of rights.

Healing Arts and Institutions § 5--Hospitals, Mental Institutions, and Nursing Homes--Officers and Employees--Private Hospitals--Right of Fair Procedure--Staff Members.

In an administrative mandamus proceeding, the trial court properly concluded that the procedure employed by a private hospital in suspending the obstetrical privileges of a staff member was impermissibly unfair. Apart from any question of actual bias on the part of any of the physicians involved and from the merits of the charges, the procedure violated the member's fair procedure rights to an impartial tribunal by virtue of a practical probability of unfairness, where general practitioner and pediatric specialist members of an ad hoc committee appointed by the hospital chief of staff to investigate charges against the physician were accustomed, and required, to rely for obstetrics expertise on the specialist who brought the charges or his associate who supported them, where review of the committee decision was by a 12-member executive committee on which 5 members of the ad hoc committee sat, and where, though an appeal committee composed of doctors from other departments of the hospital did hear testimony from an obstetrical specialist in the physician's defense, half of the hospital's obstetrics department and another specialist testified adversely.

Healing Arts and Institutions § 5--Hospitals, Mental Institutions, and Nursing Homes--Officers and Employees--Private Hospitals--Right of Fair Procedure--Scope of Judicial Review and Relief.

In an administrative mandamus proceeding against a private hospital by a staff member whose obstetrical privileges had been suspended, the trial court's order of reinstatement, based on its finding of a denial of fair procedure, did not usurp the hospital's discretion to determine whether plaintiff should retain his obstetrical privileges. Reinstatement pending a proper administrative hearing did not preclude exercise of the hospital's legally vested discretion to exclude from its facilities physicians it properly concluded did not meet its standards.

COUNSEL

Wilke, Fleury, Hoffelt & Gray, Joe S. Gray and Alan G. Perkins for Defendant and Appellant.

Horan, Lloyd & Karachale and Charles G. Warner for Plaintiff and Respondent.

REYNOSO, J.

A private hospital board (hereinafter Hospital) appeals from a judgment granting a doctor's petition for a writ of administrative mandamus (Code Civ. Proc., § 1094.5) compelling restoration of his obstetrical staff privileges. The hospital asserts the vitality of the peer review concept. Its principal argument is that the trial court erred in its conclusion that the hospital procedures are impermissibly unfair. We affirm the judgment.

I

Plaintiff is a licensed physician and a board certified family practitioner. He began private practice in the South Lake Tahoe area in 1976, became an associate staff member at the hospital in May of that year, and was accepted as an active staff member a year later.

The hospital is a private, nonprofit institution with an open medical staff. In January of 1978, there were 14 general and family practitioners *651 on the staff. Five doctors, including plaintiff, had obstetrical privileges at the hospital. Two of the five, Drs. Furman and Hembrow, were board certified specialists in obstetrics; they were also associated in their practice. Two general practitioners and plaintiff had privileges for uncomplicated deliveries only; they were expected to consult with specialists in nonroutine cases. There were also two pediatricians on the department staff.

A. Hospital Proceedings

The present controversy began when the head nurse and the night supervisor in obstetrics expressed concern about plaintiff's delivery techniques to the hospital administrator and to Dr. Furman. Furman wrote to the hospital's chief of staff transmitting the nurses' complaints and requesting an investigation pursuant to the hospital's bylaws. As grounds for his request, Furman listed incompetence in the performance of deliveries and care of the newborn, unauthorized use of experimental drugs, falsification of medical records, improper conduct of labor, and the performance of procedures exceeding granted privileges.

The matter was discussed at a meeting of the executive committee of the hospital on September 29, 1977. Both Furman, as chief of surgery, and Hembrow, as chief of obstetrics, were members of the committee. Furman refrained from voting on decisions concerning plaintiff's privileges at all stages of hospital proceedings. An ad hoc committee, composed of the six physician members of the obstetrics department, including Furman and Hembrow, was appointed by the chief of staff to investigate the charges against plaintiff. Furman was asked to chair the committee but he declined to act in that capacity.

The ad hoc committee met on October 3. Dr. Furman presented his letter and those from the nurses. He also discussed eight patient records in which he found problems with plaintiff's treatment. Drs. Auerback and McFarren, pediatricians, commented unfavorably on five patient records and Auerback expressed his feeling that plaintiff at times treated cases which were beyond his expertise as a family practitioner. Dr. Hembrow commented that he had seen plaintiff perform some procedures in a way he felt showed "gross inexperience in most instances."

When plaintiff appeared before the committee, he objected to the charges in Furman's letter as vague and to the failure of the bylaws to *652 allow him representation at the meeting. He also claimed the presence of Furman and Hembrow on the committee destroyed its impartiality because their feelings were adverse to him. Dr. Furman then led the committee's questioning of plaintiff concerning his use of drugs not approved by the Federal Drug Administration, lack of consultation with other doctors on some problems and delivery of breech babies. Plaintiff told the committee that he used the non-FDA approved drugs only on two patients who had been placed on the medication previously by Sacramento obstetricians and on one patient after a telephone consultation with Sacramento Medical Center personnel. He also commented on the difficulties of obtaining consultations from Dr. Hembrow on patients receiving Medi-Cal benefits and on Dr. Furman's criticism of his handling of case in which he had asked Furman to assist. Plaintiff had previously (Aug. 18, 1977) written a letter to the executive committee pointing out the lack of adequate consultation from obstetricians for Medi-Cal patients. At the conclusion of the meeting plaintiff indicated his willingness to follow more detailed guidelines for obstetrics and to undergo a trial period provided consultation was made available to him.

The ad hoc committee agreed plaintiff had shown evidence of poor medical judgment and incompetence in the performance of deliveries and care of the newborn in that he had used experimental drugs without proper authorization and mismanaged labor by excessive use of drugs and improper combinations of drugs. It found plaintiff performed contraindicated procedures, procedures in excess of his privileges for uncomplicated deliveries, and failed to obtain proper consultation. A majority of the ad hoc committee recommended to the executive committee that plaintiff's obstetrical privileges be suspended after he had completed the care of patients presently at 32 weeks' gestation and delivered them under the supervision of other physicians in the obstetrics department.

The ad hoc committee's report was submitted to a meeting of the executive committee on November 22 after the members of the executive committee had been given time to review the transcript of the ad hoc committee hearing. Five of the members of the ad hoc committee (all but Dr. McFarren) attended the executive committee meeting; six other physicians and the hospital administrator were also present. The executive committee interviewed plaintiff and discussed possible recommendations limiting his staff privileges in obstetrics. It reconvened on November 29, and after further discussion decided that *653 plaintiff should perform all deliveries until January 1, 1978, with another member of the obstetrics staff and place the newborns under the supervision of the pediatrics service, and that after January 1, 1980, plaintiff's obstetrical privileges would be suspended until he had completed further training satisfactory to the executive committee and served a probationary period in which he would transfer primary care of any nonroutine delivery to another member of the obstetrics staff.

On December 6, 1977, the hospital administrator wrote to plaintiff informing him of the executive committee's recommendation and summarily suspending him in accordance with the terms of the recommendation. The letter included the executive committee's findings that plaintiff had failed to obtain pediatric consultations in thirteen specified cases, failed to obtain obstetrical consultations in thirty-four cases, demonstrated incompetent techniques in delivery and resuscitation in two cases, used improper drugs inappropriately in three cases, exceeded his privileges by using a vacuum extractor in two cases, and used dangerous combinations of high doses of narcotics and narcotic antagonists in three cases. Patient record numbers were given for each of the charges. The executive committee later deferred the January 1 suspension until a recommendation from the medical staff appeal committee was received.

Plaintiff then requested review of the executive committee's decision by a medical staff appeal committee pursuant to the hospital bylaws. Members of the appeal committee were three physicians not previously involved in the dispute. The committee held formal hearings on January 11 and January 28, 1978; it heard testimony from the hospital administrator, plaintiff, Dr. Furman, the two general practitioner members of the obstetrics staff, an expert for the hospital, and one for plaintiff.

On January 19, 1978, between the two appeal committee meetings, Dr. Furman wrote to plaintiff informing him he would no longer do consultations. Furman's letter was presented to the appeal committee as an exhibit.

After the lunch break at the second meeting of the appeal committee, counsel for the hospital asked that the record reflect the composition of the executive committee had changed after the appeal committee was appointed and asked the two appeal committee members who were now also serving on the executive committee to indicate they would refrain *654 from taking part in the executive committee's future consideration of plaintiff's hospital privileges. The two members agreed. Counsel indicated the question of overlapping membership had been raised by plaintiff in an unsuccessful attempt to obtain a writ of mandate from the superior court the day before the second appeal committee meeting.

Counsel for plaintiff told the committee that one basis for the writ application was his concern that the members on the appeal committee may have been influenced by discussions about plaintiff at the January 24 meeting of the executive committee. Plaintiff had attempted to obtain a tape recording of the meeting but had not been able to do so. None of the committee members made any comment on this information and the hearing proceeded.

The appeal committee voted agreement with the recommendation that plaintiff's obstetrical staff privileges be suspended and the executive committee ratified the decision on January 30, 1978.

B. Superior Court Proceedings

Plaintiff filed his writ petition in superior court on February 1, 1978, contending that the hospital proceedings violated due process of law because both the ad hoc committee and the appeal committee were prejudiced against him, the former by the presence of the complaining physician and the latter by disparaging remarks about his character and personality made at the January 24 executive committee meeting in the presence of two of the three appeal committee members. In a declaration attached to the petition, plaintiff asserted Drs. Furman and Hembrow had shown increasing reluctance to consult on Medi-Cal patients before October of 1977. He claimed 40 percent of his income was derived from obstetrical practice and a substantial portion of his obstetrical patients were Medi-Cal patients. He also claimed disparaging and untrue remarks about him had been made during a discussion of his case at the executive committee meeting on January 24 in the presence of two appeal committee members while the appeal committee hearings were in recess and that before the appeal committee began deliberations counsel for the hospital had informed his counsel that an adverse decision would be served on plaintiff within two days.

The court issued an alternative writ on February 7, 1978. The parties later stipulated that plaintiff had exhausted his administrative remedies, *655 the appeal committee decision had been accepted by all relevant hospital authorities, and all proceedings following the appeal committee hearings were fair and provided adequate due process.

The hospital's answer to plaintiff's petition denied the allegations of unfairness in any of the proceedings and admitted only that the appeal committee members were "sometimes present" at the January 24 executive committee meeting.

A hearing was held in superior court on April 13, 1978. Counsel for plaintiff argued that the evidence was insufficient to support suspension of obstetrical privileges, and that due process had been violated in the hospital proceedings. On the other hand, counsel for the hospital argued that the record would support an independent judgment that the privileges were properly suspended and plaintiff's rights to fair procedure had been protected at all stages of the proceedings.

On August 24, 1978, the court issued a memorandum decision in which it concluded: (1) independent review of the record showed the main areas of contention about plaintiff's obstetrical procedures revolved around professional differences, (2) the guidelines under which plaintiff made the questioned decisions defined very broadly the complications requiring consultations, (3) due process was initially violated by the presence of Dr. Furman on the ad hoc committee, and (4) further due process violations occurred when appeal committee members heard disparaging comments about plaintiff. The court also found the testimony at the ad hoc and appeal committee proceedings did not establish malpractice by plaintiff but did demonstrate that he was not capable of dealing with all the complications of delivery, had difficulty obtaining proper consultations and failed to keep adequate records of treatment and consultation. The court speculated that the lack of complete records resulted in some of the ad hoc committee's adverse findings and that petitioner would voluntarily further his education through continued training.

The hospital requested findings of fact and conclusions of law which it later contested at a hearing on October 23, 1978. Judgment for plaintiff was entered on October 24, 1978, and the final findings were filed November 17, 1978. The findings of fact reflected the opinions of the court given in the memorandum decision. The court reached three legal conclusions: (1) Dr. Furman's role in the ad hoc committee proceedings *656 violated due process of law, (2) due process was again violated when appeal committee members heard disparaging comments about plaintiff at the executive committee meeting, and (3) independent review of the record showed the evidence was insufficient to support the hospital's action.

The hospital then moved for a new trial, contending the proceedings met applicable standards of due process, the use of plaintiff's declaration to support the factual finding that prejudicial derogatory remarks were made was improper, and the evidence was insufficient to support the court's conclusion. A 1978 amendment of the Code of Civil Procedure section 1094.5, subdivision (d) to provide for a substantial evidence standard of review for claims of abuse of discretion by private hospital boards was called to the court's attention by a letter from the hospital on January 17, 1979, after the new trial motion was heard and submitted.

The new trial motion was denied on January 26, 1979. The court concluded the statute was not retroactive and had no effect in the present case. It also noted that it considered Dr. Furman's participation in the initiation, investigation and initial adjudication of the charges against plaintiff a violation of minimal guarantees of due process. The hospital then appealed.

II

A. Fairness Lacking in Hospital Procedure

We first consider the trial court's conclusion that the hospital proceedings were impermissibly tainted by the role of plaintiff's accuser, Dr. Furman, in the adjudicatory process. The issue appears to be a novel one in this setting. ([1])Although California courts have long recognized a common law right to fair procedure protecting individuals from arbitrary exclusion or expulsion from private organizations which control important economic interests (James v. Marinship Corp. (1944) 25 Cal.2d 721 [155 P.2d 329, 160 A.L.R. 900]; Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists (1974) 12 Cal.3d 541 [116 Cal.Rptr. 245, 526 P.2d 253]; Westlake Community Hosp. v. Superior Court (1976) 17 Cal.3d 465 [131 Cal.Rptr. 90, 551 P.2d 410]), review of private hospital staff decisions has only recently been accomplished via administrative mandamus proceedings. (Anton v. San Antonio Community Hosp. (1977) 19 Cal.3d 802 [140 Cal.Rptr. 442, 567 P.2d 1162].) *657 Since the actions of a private institution are not necessarily those of the state, the controlling concept in such cases is fair procedure and not due process. Fair procedure rights apply when the organization involved is one affected with a public interest, such as a private hospital. (See Sloss & Becker, The Organization Affected With A Public Interest and Its Members-Justice Tobriner's Contribution to Evolving Common Law Doctrine (1977) 29 Hastings L.J. 99.)

The distinction between fair procedure and due process rights appears to be one of origin and not of the extent of protection afforded an individual; the essence of both rights is fairness. Adequate notice of charges and a reasonable opportunity to respond are basic to both sets of rights. (Ezekial v. Winkley (1977) 20 Cal.3d 267 [142 Cal.Rptr. 418, 572 P.2d 32]; People v. Ramirez (1979) 25 Cal.3d 260 [158 Cal.Rptr. 316, 599 P.2d 622].)

Specific requirements for procedural due process vary depending upon the situation under consideration and the interests involved. (People v. Ramirez, supra., at p. 264; Mathews v. Eldridge (1976) 424 U.S. 319, 335 [47 L.Ed.2d 18, 33, 96 S.Ct. 893].) Where due process requires an administrative hearing, an individual has the right to a tribunal "which meets at least currently prevailing standards of impartiality." (Wong Yang Sung v. McGrath (1950) 339 U.S. 33, 50 [94 L.Ed. 616, 628, 70 S.Ct. 445].) Biased decision makers are constitutionally impermissible and even the probability of unfairness is to be avoided. (Withrow v. Larkin (1975) 421 U.S. 35, 47 [43 L.Ed.2d 712, 723, 95 S.Ct. 1456]; In re Murchison (1955) 349 U.S. 133, 136 [99 L.Ed. 942, 946, 75 S.Ct. 623].) The factor most often considered destructive of administrative board impartiality is bias arising from pecuniary interests of board members. (See American Motors Sales Corp. v. New Motor Vehicle Bd. (1977) 69 Cal.App.3d 983 [138 Cal.Rptr. 594], and cases cited therein.) Personal embroilment in the dispute will also void the administrative decision (Mennig v. City Council (1978) 86 Cal.App.3d 341 [150 Cal.Rptr. 207]), although neither prior knowledge of the factual background which bears on a decision nor prehearing expressions of opinions on the result disqualifies an administrative body from acting on a matter before it. (City of Fairfield v. Superior Court (1975) 14 Cal.3d 768, 782 [122 Cal.Rptr. 543, 537 P.2d 375].)

Due process questions are raised when the administrative agency's initial view of the facts based on evidence derived from nonadversarial *658 processes as a practical or legal matter forecloses fair and effective consideration of the merits at an adversary hearing leading to the ultimate decision. (Withrow v. Larkin, supra., 421 U.S. at p. 58 [43 L.Ed.2d at p. 730].) This is exactly the claim that plaintiff made to the trial court and the basis for the judgment below. We see no impediment to an analysis of the situation using the precedents established under the due process concept. Our

Supreme Court has declined to fix rigid procedures for the protection of fair procedure rights (Ezekial v. Winkley, supra., 20 Cal.3d at p. 278), but it is inconceivable to us that such rights would not include impartiality of the adjudicators.

Before proceeding along these lines, however, we pause to note another apparently unique feature of this case. The hospital's action did not completely eliminate plaintiff's staff privileges or remove him from staff membership. There is no indication in the record that his use of hospital facilities other than those in the obstetrical department was affected by the investigation and adjudication. Since plaintiff testified that about 40 percent of his income was derived from his obstetrical practice, his interest in obstetrical privileges was substantial and we do not find that a partial exclusion of this magnitude merits any less procedural protection than revocation of full staff membership. Neither party argues otherwise.

Plaintiff's position before the trial court is a familiar one in the context of administrative law. Without using the term, he contended the ad hoc committee proceedings constituted an impermissible combination of investigatory, prosecutorial and adjudicatory functions in that body.

The combination of functions argument often arises in the context of professional licensing revocation cases when an administrative board adjudicates competence issues after its agents have instigated and investigated charges against a licensee. Since the situation before us is in many ways analogous to a license revocation, we will examine the precedents in that area. The federal position on the issue is that due process is not violated by the combination of investigative and adjudicative functions unless the facts of a case show foreclosure of fairness as a practical or legal matter. (Withrow v. Larkin, supra., 421 U.S. 35.) Most states, including California, have taken the same approach to combination of functions argument. (See Davis, Case Commentary: Withrow v. Larkin and the "Separation of Functions" Concept in State Administrative Proceedings (1975) 27 Admin.L.Rev. 407; *659 Winning v. Board of Dental Examiners (1931) 114 Cal.App. 658 [300 P. 866]; Griggs v. Board of Trustees (1964) 61 Cal.2d 93 [37 Cal.Rptr. 194, 389 P.2d 722]. But see Abrams v. Jones (1922) 35 Idaho 532 [207 P. 724]; State v. Kelly (1960) 145 W.Va. 70 [112 S.E.2d 641].)

California law requires that disciplinary hearings of designated state agencies be conducted by administrative law

judges from the state Office of Administrative Hearings. (Gov. Code, § 11502.) The administrative law judge prepares and submits a proposed decision for the agency's consideration. (Gov. Code, § 11517, subd. (c).) Although the agency need not adopt the decision, it is required to review the record of the hearing before arriving at a different conclusion. (Ibid.) These statutory requirements reflect legislative concern with due process and fair hearings in administrative proceedings. (Clarkson, Practice Before California Licensing Agencies (1956) 44 Cal.L.Rev. 197.) Legislation in at least two other states (Maine and Missouri) goes further and makes the findings of hearing officers binding on the agency unless the agency succeeds in a later court proceeding. (See Sandberg et al., Fair Treatment For the Licensed Professional: The Missouri Administrative Hearing Commission (1972) 37 Mo.L.Rev. 410; Sawyer, The Quest For Justice In Maine Administrative Procedure: The Administrative Code in Application and Theory (1966) 18 Me.L.Rev. 218.)

In the case before us, of course, there was no administrative law judge or other third party involved in the factual determinations which resulted in revocation of plaintiff's obstetrical privileges. The investigation was not conducted by state employees insulated from the adjudicatory body by layers of public bureaucracy; it was done by a group which included the instigator of the charges, had overlapping membership in the body (executive committee) which reviewed both the initial and final decisions and to which the majority of the formal adjudicators later belonged. ([2])The question before us is whether this situation, completely apart from any question of actual bias on the part of any of the physicians involved and from the merits of the charges, presents a violation of fair procedure rights to an impartial tribunal by virtue of a practical probability of unfairness. We hold that it does.

As a practical matter and without in any way impugning their good faith, the general practitioner and pediatric specialist members of the ad hoc committee were in an extremely difficult position. The charges were brought by one of the two specialists on whom they were accustomed *660 and, indeed, required to rely for obstetrical expertise and with whom they were in frequent and intimate professional contact. His associate supported the charges and the committee was thus presented with a solid front of the only special expertise available to it. To presume impartiality of the ad hoc committee in such circumstances goes beyond what can reasonably be expected of human beings in this professional setting. In this situation a realistic appraisal of psychological tendencies and human weakness compels the conclusion that the risk of prejudgment or bias was too high to maintain the guarantee of fair procedure. (See Withrow v. Larkin, supra., 421 U.S. 35.)

We recognize that the ad hoc committee's function under the hospital bylaws was nominally investigatory, not adjudicative. Nevertheless, the chances of a contradictory conclusion by another body within the hospital were virtually nil. The bylaws mandated review of the ad hoc committee's decision by the executive committee, an apparently twelve-member body upon which five members of the ad hoc committee sat. Having made an adverse decision, the five could hardly be expected not to support it before the executive committee. The appeal committee, later also connected to the executive committee, was composed of doctors from other departments within the hospital. Although the appeal committee did hear testimony from an obstetrical specialist in plaintiff's defense, half of the hospital's obstetrics department and another specialist testified adversely. To some extent, at least, the same psychological factors which impugned the impartiality of the ad hoc committee were at work on the appeal committee members. At the very least, they would be tempted to consider extraneous matters, such as the personal collegial preferences of the obstetrics department members, in addition to the merits of the charges. We paraphrase Justice Taft's remarks in Tumey v. Ohio (1927) 273 U.S. 510, 532 [71 L.Ed. 749, 758, 47 S.Ct. 437, 50 A.L.R. 1243]: Every procedure which would offer a possible temptation to the average man as a judge which might lead him not to hold the balance nice, clear and true between the accused and accuser denies the former due process of law. The procedure at issue here, given the circumstances in which it was accomplished, violated this standard of fairness. The fatal flaw in the proceedings before us was the lack of impartiality in the fact-finding process.

B. Trial Court Reinstatement Order Proper

([3]) Since we affirm the judgment on the basis of fair procedure defects in the administrative process, we need address only one more of *661 the hospital's arguments. The hospital claims the order of reinstatement somehow usurped its discretion to determine whether plaintiff should retain his obstetrical privileges and a proper order would have been a remand for additional proceedings. There is no merit in this contention; fair hearings are not a matter of discretion but are required by law. Reinstatement pending a proper administrative hearing does not preclude exercise of the hospital's legally vested discretion to exclude from its facilities physicians it properly concludes do not meet its standards. ( Hackethal v. Loma Linda Community Hospital Corp. (1979) 91 Cal.App.3d 59, 67 [153 Cal.Rptr. 783].) The trial court properly restored the status quo.

The judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA DENTAL ASSOCIATION
et al., Defendants and Respondents.

No. G001275.

Court of Appeal, Fourth District, Division 3, California.
Jan 24, 1986.

SUMMARY

In an action by an orthodontist who was publicly censured by two related private professional organizations of dentists to which he belonged, seeking to overturn the censure and to require a new hearing of the charges against him on the ground he had been denied due process, the trial court denied the petition for mandamus, ruling that judicial review of disciplinary procedures of private professional organizations is, as a matter of law, only available when the punishment is expulsion or exclusion from membership. (Superior Court of Orange County, No. 388316, Judith M. Ryan, Judge.)

The Court of Appeal reversed with directions to overrule defendants' demurrer and undertake further proceedings, holding that a private organization if tinged with public stature or purpose may not expel or discipline a member adversely affecting substantial property, contract or other economic rights, except as a result of fair proceedings. It held plaintiff's petition was sufficient to put the above elements in issue and that he sought the appropriate remedy. (Opinion by Crosby, J., with Trotter, P. J., and Wallin, J., concurring.)

(1)
Constitutional Law § 107--Procedural Due Process--Components--Quasi-public Organizations.
In the context of disciplinary action by quasi-public organizations against their members, procedural due process requires adequate notice of charges and a reasonable opportunity to respond, an opportunity to confront and cross-examine the accusers and to examine and refute the evidence, and the opportunity to present a defense.

Associations and Clubs § 6--Unincorporated--Actions--Dental Societies--Censure of Member--Judicial Review.
In an action by an orthodontist who was publicly censured by two related private professional organizations of dentists to which he belonged, seeking to overturn the censure and to require a new hearing of the charges against him on the ground he had been denied due process, the trial court erred in denying the petition and ruling that judicial review of disciplinary procedures by private professional organizations is, as a matter of law, only available when the punishment is expulsion or exclusion from membership. A private organization, if tinged with public stature or purpose, may not expel or discipline a member adversely affecting substantial property, contract or other economic rights, except as a result of fair proceedings which may be provided for in organization by-laws, carried forward in an atmosphere of good faith and fair play.

CROSBY, J.

May a petition in mandate alleging a member of a private professional association was denied procedural due process in a disciplinary proceeding state a cognizable cause of action where the punishment imposed is less than expulsion? Yes.

I

Orthodontist Edward S. Salkin was publicly censured by two related private professional organizations of dentists of which he is a member, the California and American Dental Associations. His petition, alleging he was denied due process in violation of the bylaws and suffered damage to his dental practice and professional reputation as a result, sought to overturn *1120 the censure and to require a new hearing of the charges against him. Both organizations demurred. They argued, and the superior court agreed, judicial review of the disciplinary procedures of private professional organizations is, as a matter of law, only available where the punishment imposed is expulsion or exclusion from membership.

The California Dental Association is a constituent organization of the American Dental Association, and Salkin belongs to both. Each organization is voluntary; and membership is not required in order to practice dentistry or any dental specialty in this state, although Salkin's last amended petition alleges CDA "exercises a degree of control and discipline over all licensed dentists of California." (But see Bus. & Prof. Code, § 1611, which subjects dentists to licensing and regulation by the State Board of Dental Examiners.) CDA's disciplinary authority over its members is delineated in the ADA bylaws. Salkin pleads, "Respondent has a clear and present duty to deal fairly and equitably with all of its members in all of its functions, and specifically has those obligations as it affects its members' rights to fair hearings, appeals and disciplinary proceedings under its by-laws."

The petition goes on to allege Salkin was informed by CDA on September 3, 1982, he would be expelled unless he returned $1,675 in fees collected from the parents of two juvenile patients. The discipline was based on an August 17, 1978 recommendation of the peer review committee of its member organization, the Orange County Dental Association. It read in part as follows: "The orthodontic specialty Peer Review Committee of the California State Society of Orthodontists was called upon to evaluate the patients and the records. They reviewed the diagnostic records taken prior to treatment, and those taken at the time of transfer. The patients were also examined clinically. ¶ Their findings showed that there had been no progress in correcting James' malocclusion during the year of treatment, and that Jill's malocclusion had worsened during the eight months she was under orthodontic care. They felt the original treatment plans were in error and the mechanotherapy used could not produce an improvement in either esthetics or occlusion."

Salkin was advised he could appeal the decision based on the sufficiency of the evidence or any defects in the procedure followed by the local committee. His attorney then requested the right to review the evidence offered at the hearing, which neither he nor his client was permitted to attend, and any transcript or record of the proceedings. CDA declined: "In [an] effort to provide further clarification for you on CDA's position with regard to this and similar requests, Section

1157 of the California Evidence Code is cited. Specifically it states ... 'neither the proceedings nor the records of ... dental review committees ... shall be subject to discovery.'" *1121

Salkin next appealed to the ADA. On June 2, 1983, the Council on Bylaws and Judicial Affairs of the ADA reduced the proposed penalty from expulsion to censure and issued a six-page opinion, which is attached as an exhibit to the petition. The opinion, in so many words, appears to concede Salkin's case was not handled fairly or in accordance with the bylaws. Excerpts appear in the margin.<sup>1</sup>

1 "The Council is troubled ... by ... the inadequacies of the hearing before the peer review committee. The Appellant appeared in person, with counsel, before this Council and again commented upon the extremely brief hearing which he was afforded by the OCDS peer review committee. The Appellant stated that he had elected a conservative course of treatment because he was concerned about the level of the patient's cooperation. He therefore elected to commence treatment without any tooth removal. However, affording the Appellant less than five minutes to state his case did not give an opportunity to adequately present this position. Nor did the time granted afford an opportunity for the peer review panel to confront the Appellant with the [California State Society of Orthodontics] advisory opinion and permit him to confront the issues it raised. The confusion as to the amount in question to be refunded is an indication that the limited time afforded the Appellant did not allow a full examination of all the facts and issues involved. ¶ It is especially notable that at the time the limited hearing was afforded to the Appellant, the OCDS peer review committee had already reached a prior determination adverse to the Appellant in a prior proceeding. The hearing was afforded only after the Appellant on appeal had asserted the validity [sic] of the proceedings because of his denial of a hearing. Under such circumstances, it would appear incumbent upon the OCDS to afford the Appellant ample time to state his position. The Council sees nothing in the California Evidence Code [provision] in question [section 1157] which would have prevented the OCDS peer review committee from discussing various aspects of the specialist's committee opinion with the Appellant so the Appellant could be apprised of the facts which the committee was considering. This would have afforded the Appellant an opportunity to meet the issues. This was not done. ¶ The preface of the Peer Review Procedure Manual of the Council on Dental Care Programs of the American Dental Association provides 'It is not only essential that justice be done; it must be perceived to have been done.' This admonition does not appear to have been followed in this case. The Council notes that in the majority of the constituent dental societies, peer review is a voluntary proceeding. California [sic], however, by Section 3 of its Code of Ethics, requiring compliance with the mandates of peer review committees as a matter of professional ethics, renders cooperation with peer review committees mandatory. In doing such, it is incumbent upon the California Dental Association to assure that due process is provided to the participants in such proceedings. Cf. Hackethal v. California Medical [Assn.] (1982) 138 Cal.App.3d 435] (outlining principles of fair procedures for disciplinary hearings) ... [¶] The Council believes that the penalty of expulsion is too harsh to impose .... In view of the age of this case, a remand would not serve the interests of either party. Therefore, the Council affirms the decision of the CDA Judicial Council, but believes that justice requires reducing the penalty imposed from expulsion to censure.”

II

(1) If the discipline imposed had amounted to expulsion or exclusion from membership, the associations concede Salkin would have been entitled to procedural due process as that concept has been defined in our law: “Adequate notice of charges and a reasonable opportunity to respond are basic to both due process and fair procedure. ( Applebaum v. Board of Directors [1980] 104 Cal.App.3d [648,] 657 [163 Cal.Rptr. 831].) ... [¶] *1122 There must be an opportunity to confront and cross-examine the accusers and to examine and refute the evidence. ( Cason v. Glass Bottle Blowers Assn. (1951) 37 Cal.2d 134, 144 [231 P.2d 6, 21 A.L.R.2d 1387].) ” [¶] The individual must have the opportunity to present a defense. ( Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists [1974] 12 Cal.3d [541,] 555 [116 Cal.Rptr. 245, 526 P.2d 253].)“ ( Hackethal v. California Medical Assn. (1982) 138 Cal.App.3d 435, 442 [187 Cal.Rptr. 811].)

(2) Nonetheless, the associations claim the reduction of the discipline imposed from expulsion to censure eliminates Salkin's right to petition for relief. There is some backhanded support for that notion. For example, the Hackethal case, cited by the ADA Council itself, does view the problem of judicial interference with the membership relations of private associations in that context (which is not surprising since only expulsion was involved there): “Fair procedure is a developing concept in California. It is applicable when an organization makes a decision to exclude or expel an individual. It is a common law principle under which a private organization is legally required to refrain from arbitrary action. The action to exclude or expel must be substantively rational and procedurally fair.“ ( Id., at p. 441.) Although discipline short of expulsion was not at issue there, defendants insist the import of Hackethal is that judicial review of professional disciplinary proceedings is precluded where a lesser sanction is imposed. We decline to endorse the inference, however: It is supported neither in logic nor, as we shall see, law.

Defendants' reliance on Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists (1974) 12 Cal.3d 541 [116 Cal.Rptr. 245, 526 P.2d 253] is also misplaced. Pinsker is an exclusion case. The Society of Orthodontists argued against judicial scrutiny of a decision to exclude an individual from membership based on the significant difference between exclusion of a nonmember and expulsion of a member. There is no doubt that the membership contract, particularly as evidenced in the bylaws, is an important justification offered for judicial intervention in many of the cases. (See, e.g., Bernstein v. Alameda etc. Med. Assn. (1956) 139 Cal.App.2d 241, 253 [293 P.2d 862].) Thus, to the extent judicial intervention might be justified on contract principles and an organization's duty to its members, the society's position was reasonable enough. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court rejected the contention and extended procedural due process protections to excluded nonmembers of professional organizations. This holding hardly seems helpful to the present defendants.

Moreover, dictum in Pinsker is not supportive of the conclusion urged by the associations; for at one point in its opinion the court approves judicial intervention in cases involving discipline less than expulsion: “In this state *1123 “a member of an unincorporated association may not be suspended or expelled ... without charges, notice and a hearing, even though the rules of the association make no provision therefor.” ( Swital v. Real Estate Commissioner [1953] 116 Cal.App.2d 677, 679 [254 P.2d 587]; Cason v. Glass Bottle Blowers Assn., supra., 37 Cal.2d 134, 143-144.) This requirement of procedural fairness has been an established part of the California common law since before the turn of the century. (See, e.g., Von Arx v. San Francisco G. Verein [1896] 113 Cal. 377 [45 P. 685]; Otto v. Tailors P. & B. Union [1896] 75 Cal. 308, 314-315 [17 P. 217].) “ (Id., at p. 553, italics added.)

Defendants have produced exactly no case authority directly supporting their claim that judicial enforcement of procedural due process in disciplinary proceedings of private professional organizations will be reserved to expulsion or exclusion cases. But our research has yielded several cases in which the courts have squarely held, in accordance with the Pinsker dictum, that suspension cases will be afforded the same scrutiny accorded those involving expulsion. In Ellis v. American Federation of Labor (1941) 48 Cal.App.2d 440 [120 P.2d 79], a prehearing suspension of three unincorporated labor unions from the national association was overturned in these words: "It is settled however in this state and elsewhere that a member of an unincorporated association may not be suspended or expelled, nor a subordinate body suspended or its charter revoked, without charges, notice and a hearing, even though the rules of the association make no provision therefor." ( Id., at pp. 443-444.)

And the notion was not new in Ellis. Grand Grove A. O. of D. v. Duchein (1894) 105 Cal. 219<sup>2</sup> [38 P. 947] and Knights of Ku Klux Klan v. Francis (1926) 79 Cal.App. 383 [249 P. 539] reached the same conclusion years earlier: "It is well settled that a member of a benevolent association cannot be expelled without being given a hearing, and that a by-law which authorizes such a course is unreasonable and without effect [citations]; and the same rules are applicable whether the action of the body is an absolute severing of the relations or a suspension by which the rights of the suspended party are destroyed or impaired. There is no distinction in principle between expelling a member from a subordinate [organization] and revoking the charter of the [member] itself or suspending its charter." ( Grand Grove A. O. of D. v. Duchein, supra., at p. 225.)

<sup>2</sup> The full title of the case is worth remembering every century or so: The Grand Grove of the United Ancient Order of Druids of California v. The Garibaldi Grove, No. 71, of the United Ancient Order of Druids and C. Duchein.

Nor is the concept that the courts will interfere in appropriate cases where the discipline falls short of expulsion outdated. In *1124 California State University, Hayward v. National Collegiate Athletic Assn. (1975) 47 Cal.App.3d 533 [121 Cal.Rptr. 85], the Court of Appeal held an NCAA suspension of a college football team from postseason play for alleged violations of eligibility rules was subject to judicial review. The court observed, "Defendant NCAA contends that the trial court erred in failing to follow the doctrine of judicial abstention from interference in the affairs of a private voluntary association. However, courts will intervene in the internal affairs of associations where the action by the association is in violation of its own bylaws or constitution. It is true that courts will not interfere with the disciplining or expelling of members of such associations where the action is taken in good faith and in accordance with its adopted laws and rules. But if the decision of the tribunal is contrary to its laws or rules, or it is not authorized by the by-laws of the association, a court may review the ruling of the board and direct the reinstatement of the member.' [Citations.]" ( Id., at p. 539.) Thus, according to the Hayward court, "disciplining" is sufficient to invoke judicial protection of due process rights.

Courts in other jurisdictions have agreed. For example, in Gashgai v. Maine Medical Association (Me. 1976) 350 A.2d 571, which relies in part on the Hayward decision, a doctor sought and obtained an injunction to prevent circulation by a private voluntary medical association of an investigative report concerning his billing practices. The report recommended plaintiff be "severely reprimanded." ( Id., at p. 573.) The Supreme Judicial Court of Maine upheld the injunction because the document "imminently threatened ... injury which was irreparable because it tended to impair Dr. Gashgai's opportunity to earn a livelihood through the practice of his chosen profession and, therefore, required the injunctive relief ordered." ( Id., at p. 574.) Public censure, the discipline imposed in this case, is virtually identical in its nature and possible consequences.

The Supreme Court of Florida reached a similar conclusion in McCune v. Wilson (Fla. 1970) 237 So.2d 169. In approving an injunction against a disciplinary proceeding involving a member of the South Florida chapter of the American Institute of Real Estate Appraisers, the court explained its departure from the usual rule of judicial abstention in cases involving the dealings of private associations: "Professional organizations, although voluntary in nature, often attain a quasi-public significance. In public view, membership in such organizations may appear to be a tangible demonstration of professional competence and skill, professional responsibility, and acceptance by one's professional peers. The fact that an individual member expelled from membership may not be prohibited from practicing his chosen occupation or profession is not a sufficient test to determine whether he needs and is entitled to judicial protection from unfair proceedings or arbitrary *1125 actions. When a voluntary association achieves this quasi-public status, due process considerations come into play ..." ( Id., at p. 172.)

Here, both defendant associations are of "quasi-public significance." Even if they were not, however, the discipline imposed was public censure; and the associations could be seen to have created their own exception.

Nor, as we have previously concluded above, is expulsion required as a prerequisite to judicial intervention: "Disciplinary action against a member of a professional organization, although falling short of expulsion from occupation, may have an import which transcends the organization itself because it conveys to the community that the disciplined member was found lacking by his peers. For this reason, it is suitable and proper that an organization, whether a domestic or foreign nonprofit corporation, or a nonchartered nonprofit association, be held to reasonable standards of due process and fairness, especially those inherent in its own by-laws, rules or customs." (Ibid.)

Then, in words which could have been written for this case, the court adds, " While the courts should be [loath] to intervene in purely private organizational matters, nonintervention is not justified where a quasi-public organization takes action and imposes penalties which carry the odor of public sanctions. It is clear that not all private associations must observe due process standards. However, such standards must be observed when a private association becomes quasi-public, assumes a public purpose of its own, incorporates and seeks the tax shelters and other protections of public law, or otherwise assumes a larger purpose or stature than pleasant, friendly and congenial social relationships." (Ibid.)

For the guidance of the court in the further disposition of this case on remand, we adopt these final words of the Florida Supreme Court: "We hold that a private organization, ... if tinged with public stature or purpose, may not expel or discipline a member adversely affecting substantial property, contract or other economic rights, except as a result of fair proceedings which may be provided for in organization by-laws, carried forward in an atmosphere of good faith and fair play." (Id., at p. 173.) Salkin's petition was sufficient to put each of the above elements in issue; and he did seek the appropriate remedy, a writ of mandate. (Westlake Community Hosp. v. Superior Court (1976) 17 Cal.3d 465, 482-485 [131 Cal.Rptr. 90, 551 P.2d 410].) *1126

The judgment is reversed with directions to overrule the demurrer and proceed in accordance with the views expressed above. Salkin is entitled to costs on appeal.

Trotter, P. J., and Wallin, J., concurred.

A petition for a rehearing was denied February 19, 1986, and the petition of respondent California Dental Association for review by the Supreme Court was denied May 1, 1986. *1127

Prior History: Superior Court of Los Angeles County, No. So C 3876, John F. McCarthy, Judge.

Disposition: The judgment is reversed and the case is remanded to the trial court with instructions to issue an injunction compelling defendant associations to set aside the rejection of plaintiff's application and to reconsider such application pursuant to a fair procedure as provided herein.

Case Summary

Procedural Posture

Plaintiff, a licensed dentist, sought review of a judgment from the Superior Court of Los Angeles County (California), which upheld defendant orthodontist societies' rejection of plaintiff's application for membership. The judgment was premised on a holding that defendants were not required to afford plaintiff an opportunity to respond to the rejection.

Overview

Plaintiff, a licensed dentist, sought review of a judgment that upheld defendant orthodontist societies' rejection of plaintiff's application for membership under their rules. The superior court had accepted defendants' interpretation of their own rules and determined that defendants were not required to afford plaintiff an opportunity to respond to the rejection. On appeal, the court held that in light of defendants' important public role, they could not reject plaintiff's membership application without affording him a fair opportunity to respond to the charges against him, and because of the unique position in the field of orthodontics occupied by defendants, they had a fiduciary responsibility with respect to the acceptance or rejection of membership applications. Accordingly, the judgment was reversed, and the case was remanded with instructions to issue an injunction compelling defendants to reconsider plaintiff's application in a fair proceeding.

Outcome

The court reversed the superior court judgment because defendants' unique position in the field of orthodontics created a fiduciary responsibility with respect to the acceptance or rejection of membership applications, such that defendants could not reject plaintiff's application without affording him a fair opportunity to challenge his rejection.

If a society has refused membership through the application of a reasonable standard -- one which comports with the legitimate goals of the society and the rights of the individual and the public -- then judicial inquiry should end. Only when a society rule is contrary to established public policy, or is so patently arbitrary and unreasonable as to be beyond the pale of the law should a court prohibit its enforcement.

Summary

CALIFORNIA OFFICIAL REPORTS SUMMARY

An orthodontists' society denied a dentist's application for membership without giving him an opportunity to present his position with respect to the society's contention that he violated a society rule which, as interpreted by the society, prohibited delegation of orthodontic services to a dentist not educationally qualified for membership in the society. In the dentist's action challenging the denial, the trial court gave judgment against him. (Superior Court of Los Angeles County, No. C 3876, John F. McCarthy, Judge.)

The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case to the trial court with instructions to issue an injunction compelling defendants to set aside the rejection of plaintiff's application and to reconsider the application pursuant to a fair procedure as provided in the reviewing court's opinion. The court rested its decision on the common law requirement of "fair procedure," after emphasizing the distinction between such requirement and technical "due process" requirements attributable to constitutional provisions. In a prior review, the Supreme Court had determined that the society is affected with a public interest and has a fiduciary responsibility with respect to the resolution of membership applications. Thus, it was held in the present review that the dentist's application was subject to the common law fair procedure requirement under which the applicant is to be notified of the reason for a proposed rejection and given a fair opportunity to defend himself. It was concluded that the rule precluding delegation is not arbitrary nor contrary to public policy and constitutes a permissible basis for rejection of an application for membership. But it was held that before rejecting plaintiff's application, defendants must give him an opportunity to refute the contention that he is violating the rule. (Opinion by Tobriner, J., expressing the unanimous view of the court.)

CALIFORNIA OFFICIAL REPORTS HEADNOTES

Classified to McKinney's Digest

CA(1) (1)

Associations § 1 > Unincorporated Associations > Fair Procedure Requirements.

-- Whenever a private association is required under common law principles of fair procedure to refrain from arbitrary action, its action must be both substantively rational and procedurally fair.

CA(2) (2)

Associations § 11 > Unincorporated Associations > Membership > Suspension or Expulsion.

-- A member of an unincorporated association may not be suspended or expelled without charges, notice and a hearing, even though the association's rules make no provision for such matters. Furthermore, an expulsion from such an association cannot properly rest on a rule which is substantively capricious or contrary to public policy.

CA(3) (3)

Associations § 7 > Unincorporated Associations > Membership.

-- Under common law principles, a fair procedure requires that before an application for membership in a society subject to the requirements of such procedure may be denied, the applicant must be notified of the reason for the proposed rejection and given a fair opportunity to defend himself.

CA(4) (4)

Associations § 7 > Unincorporated Associations > Membership > Fair Procedure.

-- A basic ingredient of the fair procedure required under common law is that an individual who will be adversely affected by a decision be afforded some meaningful opportunity to be heard in his defense. However, this fair procedure requirement does not compel formal proceedings with all the embellishments of a court trial nor adherence to a single mode of process. Thus, with respect to denial of an application for membership in an association subject to that requirement, it may be satisfied by any one of a variety of procedures which afford the applicant an opportunity to present his position.

CA(5) (5)

Physicians § 7.6 > Orthodontists > Professional Organizations > Application for Membership.

-- Minimal common law standards of fair procedure were not met in denying a dentist's application for membership in an orthodontists' society which was subject to such standards without affording him an opportunity to present his position with respect to the society's contention that he violated its rule prohibiting an orthodontist from "delegating to a person less qualified any service or operation which requires the professional competence of an orthodontist," under its interpretation that the expression "person less qualified" included a licensed dentist without the requisite educational qualifications to be eligible for membership.

CA(6) (6)

Associations § 7 > Unincorporated Associations > Membership > Determination of Qualifications.

-- As a matter of policy, a private unincorporated association which is under a duty to satisfy the common law requirement of fair procedure in connection with denial of applications for membership should, itself, in the first instance, pass on the merits of an individual's application, rather than shift the burden to the courts.

CA(7) (7)

Associations § 7 > Orthodontists' Society > Validity of Membership Requirement.

-- A rule prescribed by orthodontists' associations prohibiting delegation of orthodontic services to a dentist not educationally qualified for membership is neither arbitrary nor contrary to public policy. And an applicant's knowing violation of such rule serves as a permissible basis for rejection of his application for membership.

CA(8) (8)

Associations § 12 > Unincorporated Associations > Intervention of Courts.

-- In adjudicating a challenge to a professional society's rule as arbitrary, a court exercises only a limited role of review. Only where the rule is contrary to established public policy or is so patently arbitrary and unreasonable as to be beyond the pale of the law should a court prohibit enforcement of the rule.

Opinion

[*543] [**255] [***247] Dr. Leon Pinsker, a licensed dentist specializing in orthodontics, commenced this action in August 1962, contending that the defendant [*544] orthodontist societies<sup>1</sup> had arbitrarily rejected his application for membership. In the initial phase of these proceedings, defendants contended that because membership in their association was not an "economic necessity" for Dr. Pinsker, the organizations' admission decisions were not properly subject to judicial review even if Pinsker had been arbitrarily or capriciously excluded. The trial court granted judgment for defendants, but on appeal our court reversed, concluding that "[because] of the unique position in the field of orthodontics occupied by defendant . . . organizations . . . a public interest is shown, and the associations must be viewed as having a fiduciary responsibility with respect to the acceptance or rejection of membership applications." ( [Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Soc. of Orthodontists \(1969\) 1 Cal.3d 160, 166 \[81 Cal.Rptr. 623, 460 P.2d 495\]](#).)

We held that "an applicant for membership has a judicially enforceable right to have his application considered in a manner comporting with the fundamentals of due process, including the showing of cause for rejection." (Id.) We remanded the matter to the trial court to afford defendants an opportunity to demonstrate that they had met these requirements in rejecting [**256] [***248] Dr. Pinsker's membership application.

On remand, defendants based their exclusion of Dr. Pinsker on the ground of his continuing violation of one of the societies' "Principles of Ethics," a provision prohibiting an orthodontist from "delegating to a person less qualified any services or operation which requires the professional competence of an orthodontist." Dr. Pinsker challenged the defendants' position on three grounds: first, he contended that under any reasonable interpretation of the rule his conduct did not violate it; second, that even under the societies' interpretation of the rule he committed no violation; and third, that in any event the societies rejected his application arbitrarily because they did not give him an opportunity to respond to the charges against him.

The trial court ruled in favor of defendants, upholding the societies' interpretation of the rule, and concluding that on the basis of the evidence Dr. Pinsker had indeed violated it. Although the court recognized that the societies had not afforded Dr. Pinsker an opportunity to respond to [*545] the charges or a hearing of any sort, the court held that precedent called for no such opportunity.

As discussed below, we have decided that in rejecting Dr. Pinsker's application, defendant societies failed to comply with the minimal requisites of a fair procedure required by established common law principles. As our past cases recognize, HN1 an organization's decision to exclude or expel an individual may be "arbitrary" either because the reason for the exclusion or expulsion is itself irrational or because, in applying a given rule in a particular case, the society has proceeded in an unfair manner. Although the fair procedure required in this setting clearly need not include the formal embellishments of a court trial, an affected individual must at least be provided with some meaningful opportunity to respond to the "charges" against him.

We have further concluded that in reconsidering Dr. Pinsker's application, defendants may validly impose the nondelegation rule and may properly reject his application if he has in fact continued to share patients with a dentist who lacks the requisite educational qualifications for membership in defendant societies.

1. The facts.

<sup>1</sup> Three related organizations are joined as defendants: the American Association of Orthodontists (hereafter referred to as the national society or organization), the Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists ( the regional society or organization) and the Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists, Southern Component (the local society or organization). The local society is primarily responsible for passing on membership applications; acceptance by the local society apparently automatically qualifies one as a member of both the regional and national societies.

Dr. Pinsker obtained a general license to practice dentistry in California in 1953 and began his practice in this state the following year. In 1956, Pinsker formed a partnership in the City of Long Beach with Dr. Max Schleimer, a dentist who since 1954 had limited his practice to orthodontics; thereafter, both Pinsker and Schleimer practiced only orthodontics. California does not provide for the separate licensing of specialists in the field of orthodontics and thus all licensed dentists can legally practice this specialty.

In 1958, Pinsker enrolled in a 16-month post-graduate course at Columbia University Division of Orthodontics in New York City. He successfully completed the course in January 1960, and received a Certificate of Training in Orthodontics, the rough equivalent of a master's degree. In May 1959, while still at Columbia, Pinsker submitted an application for membership to the local society.<sup>2</sup> In the fall of 1959, before Pinsker returned [*546] from New York, a member of the local society, Dr. Spears, visited the offices of Pinsker and Schleimer at the request of the chairman of the local society's membership committee, and wrote a brief note to the chairman [**257] [***249] listing the personnel employed at the offices.<sup>3</sup>

Several months thereafter, in April 1960, Spears discussed his visit to Pinsker's office at a meeting of the local society's membership committee, reporting that Pinsker had a partnership arrangement with Dr. Schleimer, who was not a member of defendant organizations and who did not possess the requisite post-graduate course work then required for eligibility. Dr. Cottingham, the chairman of the local membership committee, testified that at approximately the same time he received information from another society member, Dr. Donaldson, indicating that Pinsker and Schleimer "shared" patients, that is, each worked on all the patients who came into the office.

At trial Dr. Cottingham explained that the committee members felt that if Pinsker were permitting Schleimer to perform orthodontic work on Pinsker's patients, Pinsker would probably be in violation of section 3 of the association's "Principles of Ethics," which provided in part: "The orthodontist has an obligation to protect the health of his patient by not delegating to a person less qualified any service or operation which requires the professional competence of an orthodontist." The members interpreted the phrase "person less qualified" to include a licensed dentist who did not have the requisite education qualifications to be eligible for membership in their societies; thus, if Pinsker were sharing patients with Schleimer, they believed that he would be improperly delegating work to a "person less qualified."

As a result of the questions raised at the meeting, Dr. Cottingham wrote a letter to Pinsker on May 2, requesting a clarification of his partnership practice. This letter, however, did not specify the society's particular concern but simply requested, in general terms, that Pinsker "give a description [*547] of your practice, the number and status of your partners or associates and copies of your office stationery."<sup>4</sup> Pinsker responded on May 9, 1960, disclosing that he had "been engaged in the exclusive practice of orthodontics since January of 1957, with my partner Dr. Max Schleimer."

<sup>2</sup> In our opinion, we discussed the interrelationship of the defendant organizations, their various professional functions and their prestigious position in the field of orthodontics. We need not repeat that discussion here but note simply that the national society and its constituent bodies are widely recognized as the sole professional organizations in this country which set standards for, and certify proficiency in, the practice of orthodontics. (See Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Soc. of Orthodontists, supra, 1 Cal.3d 160, 163, 166.)

<sup>3</sup> Dr. Spears' note to the committee chairman stated: "Pinsker in Lakewood is a bit questionable. He is back at Columbia now finishing his course. Has a couple of New York boys [original italics] running his office. Three nurses, a lab. man and the two dentists. [para. ] I will call on him when he returns in January. I see no hurry in processing him until he finishes his course at least."

The note's reference to "New York boys" remains unexplained. Testimony at trial established that neither Schleimer nor the other dentist present at the time of Spears' visit (Pinsker's temporary replacement) were from New York and that neither was particularly young for a practicing dentist. In addition, although the note indicated that Spears intended to call on Pinsker when he returned from Columbia, the record shows that Spears never made another visit to Pinsker's offices nor contacted him in any way.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Cottingham's May 2 letter to Pinsker reads in pertinent part: "Doctor Robert Lee, Chairman of the Southern Component of the Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists, has informed me that you have completed your graduate [work] at Columbia University and wish to have your application for associate membership reprocessed."

On May 11, 1960, the local membership committee again met and formally took up Pinsker's application for association membership. Pinsker was given no indication that he might be in violation of the societies' nondelegation rule and no opportunity either in writing or in person to present his side of the story. On the basis of the limited information before it, the membership committee voted unanimously to reject Pinsker's application on the ground that he was engaged in a patient-sharing practice which constituted a violation of the non-delegation rule.

[**258] [***250] Shortly thereafter, Dr. Neff, the secretary of the local society, informed Pinsker that his membership application had been denied. Pinsker at first unsuccessfully sought an explanation of the reason for the society's denial but ultimately found it lay in his alleged sharing of patients with Dr. Schleimer. Pinsker testified that he discontinued this practice in late July 1960.

In June 1960, after Pinsker had questioned the basis for his rejection, the local society rescinded its initial rejection of Pinsker and notified him that his application had been reinstated and that he would "hear the outcome . . . in the near future." Months later, on January 9, 1961, the local society, after some communication with the regional and national societies, considered Pinsker's application for a final time. Pinsker was not afforded an opportunity either to appear in person or submit a written statement on his own behalf for consideration at the meeting.

Aside from the information which had been related eight months earlier by Dr. Spears and Dr. Donaldson, the only information before the committee on January 9 consisted of a report by Dr. Neff on a conversation that he had had with two orthodontists "while waiting for lunch "earlier that same day. In his deposition<sup>5</sup> Dr. Neff recalled the conversation as follows: [*548] "I asked Dr. Shannon and Dr. Jensen, both of whom practice in Long Beach, if they still knew whether Dr. Pinsker still employed these two dentists.<sup>6</sup> Both replied that they were certain that at least one was still there." This statement, of course, indicates only that Pinsker and Schleimer were still in practice together in January 1961, and does not establish that Dr. Shannon or Dr. Jensen knew whether the dentists' "patient-sharing" procedure had continued. Nevertheless, on the basis of the foregoing matter, the local society decided to reject Pinsker's application for membership,

On January 23, 1961, Dr. Pinsker was notified that his application for membership had been denied; no reason was given for the decision. Pinsker commenced the present action on August 2, 1962.

At the trial defendants contended that since Pinsker had violated the society's non-delegation rule, they did not arbitrarily reject Pinsker's application. In support of this contention, defendants called as a witness an officer of the national association who testified that the "common understanding" within the national association was that the proscription on delegation of orthodontic operations applied to all persons not qualified for membership in defendant societies, including licensed dentists. Because it was conceded that Dr. Schleimer lacked the requisite educational qualifications for membership, at least under 1960 standards, defendants maintained that so long as Pinsker continued to share patients with Schleimer, the societies were justified in rejecting his application.

Defendants also called a number of former patients of Pinsker and Schleimer, who testified that the patient-sharing procedure continued well after July 1960, when Pinsker testified that he had fully

"The membership committee is proceeding with your application. Will you send me a brief description of your course, the number of clock hours involved and the nature of the degree that you received. Also will you please give a description of your practice, the number and status of your partners or associates and copies of your office stationery."

<sup>5</sup> Plaintiff objected to the admission of Dr. Neff's deposition on the ground that defendants had not shown that Neff was currently unavailable to testify. At the earlier phase of the trial, prior to this court's first opinion, the defendants had produced medical evidence that Neff could not testify in person because of a heart condition. Although that medical evidence was somewhat stale by the time the trial was resumed after appeal, plaintiff did not produce any evidence to suggest that Neff's physical condition had improved and the trial court admitted the evidence. Plaintiff now complains that the admission of this matter was reversible error, but since we have determined that plaintiff is entitled to reconsideration of his application on other grounds, we need not pass on the propriety of the trial court's ruling.

implemented his patient segregation system. Although this evidence had not been presented to the local society when it rejected Pinsker in January 1961, and, for [*259] [***251] the most part involved incidents occurring well after such rejection, the trial court considered that testimony.

In response, Pinsker posited the arbitrariness of his rejection on three [*549] separate grounds. First, the society had failed to afford him a fair opportunity to be heard. Second, he had in fact segregated his patients as soon as he had been advised to do so by defendants; he testified that thereafter Dr. Schleimer only worked on his patients in "emergencies." Finally, even if his "patient-sharing" had continued, the society's non-delegation rule could not reasonably be construed to prohibit the delegation of work to a licensed dentist.

The trial court rejected all of Pinsker's contentions and awarded judgment for defendants. Although it acknowledged that the societies had afforded Pinsker no opportunity to be heard, the court concluded that since the defendants had conducted some investigation into the matter and since the application had not been "summarily denied," the requirements of procedural fairness had been satisfied. On the factual question of whether Pinsker had actually segregated his patients in July 1960, the court resolved the conflicting testimony against Pinsker and found that the sharing of patients had continued well after his rejection in January 1961. Finally, the court concluded that defendants' interpretation of the non-delegation rule was not arbitrary.

2. In light of defendants' important public role, the societies could not reject plaintiff's membership application without affording him a fair opportunity to respond to the charges against him.

a. Under established common law precedents, HN2 the proscription of "arbitrary" rejections prohibits rejection pursuant to an unfair procedure as well as rejection based on an improper reason.

In our initial Pinsker opinion we held that in light of the HN3 special position occupied by defendant organizations in the professional field of orthodontics "an applicant for membership has a judicially enforceable right to have his application considered in a manner comporting with the fundamentals of due process, including the showing of cause for rejection." (Italics added; Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Soc. of Orthodontists, supra, 1 Cal.3d 160, 166 [hereafter Pinsker I].) Defendants contend that under this holding judicial review is limited to determining whether there was "cause" for rejection, that is, whether the applicant was rejected for an accepted noncapricious reason. Because Pinsker I did not explicitly elaborate a requirement of a fair decision-making procedure, defendants claim that they need only demonstrate that as a substantive matter the reason for Pinsker's rejection was not irrational. In other words, defendants initially claim that they were under no legal constraints to follow a fair procedure in determining whether or not to exclude Pinsker from their organizations.

[*550] This attempt to confine our prior holding to matters of "substantive" nonarbitrariness, however, ignores the entire body of common law precedents<sup>7</sup> upon which Pinsker I rests. As we shall explain, these authorities recognize that HN4 an organization's decision to expel or exclude an individual may be arbitrary either because the reason underlying the rejection is irrational or because the organization has proceeded in an unfair manner. CA(1) (1) Taken together, these decisions establish the [*260] [***252] common law principle that whenever a private association is legally required to refrain from arbitrary action, the association's action must be both substantively rational and procedurally fair. A review of the cases makes this overriding principle abundantly clear.

In [Falcone v. Middlesex County Medical Soc. \(1961\) 34 N.J. 582 \[170 A.2d 791, 89 A.L.R. 952\]](#), the seminal decision in this country granting judicial review of a professional association's rejection of an application for membership, the court canvassed the historical development of judicial decisions in this entire field. The Falcone court observed that while courts in general "have been understandably reluctant to interfere with the internal affairs of membership associations . . . in particular situations, where the considerations of policy and justice were sufficiently compelling judicial scrutiny and relief were not found wanting." (170 A.2d at p. 796.) As the Falcone court noted, the earliest common law response came in "situations [involving] improper expulsions from pre-existing membership which called forth judicial directions for reinstatement or other suitable relief." (Italics added; id.)<sup>8</sup>

<sup>7</sup> It is important to note that the legal duties imposed on defendant organizations arise from the common law rather than from the Constitution as such; although Pinsker I utilized "due process" terminology in describing defendant associations' obligations, the "due process" concept is applicable only in its broadest, nonconstitutional connotation. (See Selznick, Law, Society and Industrial Justice (1969) p. 257.) In an attempt to avoid confusing the common law doctrine involved in the instant case with constitutional principles, we shall refrain from using "due process" language and shall simply refer instead to a requirement of a "fair procedure."

[*551] The Falcone court proceeded to explain that the common law principle of judicial review of expulsions from membership associations had developed, in more recent years, to encompass a comparable judicial scrutiny of exclusions from membership in a special, limited category of private associations such as labor unions or professional and trade associations. Because of their monopolistic position in a given field of employment, such organizations wield enormous power, and for an individual seeking to make a living in a given trade or profession, membership in such organizations is frequently "an economic necessity."

As Falcone recognized, one of the earliest and most influential decisions applying common law principles to a private association's exclusion from membership was Chief Justice Gibson's celebrated opinion for this court in [James v. Marinship Corp. \(1944\) 25 Cal.2d 721 \[155 P.2d 329, 160 A.L.R. 900\]](#), invalidating a labor union's policy of excluding blacks from full membership. In Marinship our court declared: "Where a union has . . . attained a monopoly of the supply of labor . . . such a union occupies a quasi public position similar to that of a public service business and it has certain corresponding obligations. It may no longer claim the same freedom from legal restraint enjoyed by golf clubs or fraternal associations. Its asserted right to choose its own members does not merely relate to social relations; it affects the fundamental right to work for a living. [Citation.] [**261] [***253] " (25 Cal.2d at p. 731.)<sup>9</sup>

Finding the underlying rationale of Marinship applicable to a medical society that enjoyed a virtual monopoly over the use of local hospital facilities, the Falcone court upheld the propriety of judicial review of the medical society's rejection of the application of a physician for membership. After undertaking such review, the court decided that the society's [*552] ground for exclusion "must be viewed as patently arbitrary and unreasonable and beyond the pale of the law." (170 A.2d at p. 800.)

Our decision in Pinsker I represents our most recent application of the general common law principles which originated in the association expulsion cases and which through Marinship, Falcone and similar authorities,<sup>10</sup> have been applied to the exclusion of members by "public service" organizations. (See Tobriner & Grodin,

<sup>8</sup> In Dawkins v. Antrobus [1881] 17 Ch.D. 615, an English court of appeal established that HN5 a court would provide relief to any individual expelled from a private association who could demonstrate (1) that the society's rule or proceedings were contrary to "natural justice," (2) that the society had not followed its own procedures or (3) that the expulsion was maliciously motivated. The English common law concept of "natural justice" includes the basic principle "that a man may not be condemned unheard." (See Wade, Administrative Law (Oxford 1967) p. 154. See generally, Chafee, The Internal Affairs of Associations Not for Profit (1930) 43 Harv.L.Rev. 993, 1014-1020; Grodin, Union Government and the Law: British and American Experiences (1961) p. 101.)

This common law principle authorizing judicial review of association expulsions became a part of California law as early as 1888 ([Otto v. Tailors' P. & B. Union, 75 Cal. 308 \[17 P. 217\]](#)). Since then, this common law principle has been reiterated in a long and unbroken line of California decisions. (See [Von Arx v. San Francisco G. Verein \(1896\) 113 Cal. 377 \[45 P. 685\]](#); [Taboada v. Sociedad Espanola etc. \(1923\) 191 Cal. 187, 191-192 \[215 P. 673, 27 A.L.R. 1508\]](#); [Ellis v. American Federation of Labor \(1941\) 48 Cal.App.2d 440, 443-444 \[120 P.2d 79\]](#); [Cason v. Glass Bottle Blowers Assn. \(1951\) 37 Cal.2d 134, 143-144 \[231 P.2d 6, 21 A.L.R.2d 1387\]](#); [Swital v. Real Estate Commissioner \(1953\) 116 Cal.App.2d 677, 679 \[254 P.2d 587\]](#); [Cunningham v. Burbank Bd. of Realtors \(1968\) 262 Cal.App.2d 211, 214 \[68 Cal.Rptr. 653\]](#); [Ascherman v. San Francisco Medical Soc. \(1974\) 39 Cal.App.3d 623 \[114 Cal.Rptr. 681\]](#).)

<sup>9</sup> Quoting from an earlier New Jersey decision, Chief Justice Gibson explained the common law basis of the obligations imposed on such an organization: "[A] monopoly raises duties which may be enforced against the possessors of the monopoly. This has been recognized from the earliest times. The rule that one who pursued a common calling was obliged to serve all comers on reasonable terms seems to have been based on the fact that innkeepers, carriers, farriers, and the like, were few, and each had a virtual monopoly in his neighborhood. . . . [The] HN6 holders of the monopoly must not exercise their power in an arbitrary, unreasonable manner so as to bring injury to others." (25 Cal.2d at p. 732, quoting [Wilson v. Newspaper & Mail Deliverers' Union \(1938\) 123 N.J. Eq. 347 \[197 A. 720\]](#).)

The Individual and the Public Service Enterprise in the New Industrial State (1967) 55 Cal.L.Rev. 1247, 1256-1260.) In Pinsker I we concluded that although membership in defendant orthodontic associations could not be said to be "an economic necessity," the associations still wielded monopoly power and affected sufficiently significant economic and professional concerns so as to clothe the societies with a "public interest."<sup>11</sup>

Thus, Pinsker I constitutes only the latest development in a century-old progression of common law decisions establishing the proper role which courts should play with respect to membership decisions reached by private associations. Throughout this progression, the authorities indicate that HN7 once it is determined that judicial scrutiny of a particular decision is justified to protect against arbitrary action, such overview includes an evaluation of both the substantive and procedural aspects of the association's decision. (See generally Chafee, The Internal Affairs of Associations Not for Profit (1930) 43 Harv.L.Rev. 993, 1014-1020.) California decisions clearly illustrate the dual nature of this review.

[**262] [***254] HN8 In situations involving the expulsion of members from a society, the [*553] courts have long held that procedural fairness is an indispensable prerequisite. CA(2) (2) "In this state 'a member of an unincorporated association may not be suspended or expelled . . . without charges, notice and a hearing, even though the rules of the association make no provision therefor.'" ( Swital v. Real Estate Commissioner, supra, 116 Cal.App.2d 677, 679; Cason v. Glass Bottle Blowers Assn., supra, 37 Cal.2d 134, 143-144.) This requirement of procedural fairness has been an established part of the California common law since before the turn of the century. (See, e.g., Von Arx v. San Francisco G. Verein, supra, 113 Cal. 377; Otto v. Tailors P. & B. Union, supra, 75 Cal. 308, 314-315.)

In addition to requiring a fair procedure, the common law decisions establish that HN9 an expulsion from an association cannot properly rest upon a rule which is substantively capricious or contrary to public policy. Thus, for example in Bernstein v. Alameda etc. Med. Assn. (1956) 139 Cal.App.2d 241 [293 P.2d 862], the court held that the defendant medical society could not lawfully expel a doctor for making disparaging statements about another doctor's professional work in the course of legal proceedings. (See also Higgins v. American Society of Clinical Pathologists (1968) 51 N.J. 191 [238 A.2d 665, 671]; Spayd v. Ringing Rock Lodge No. 665 (1921) 270 Pa. 67 [113 A. 70, 14 A.L.R. 1443]; Hurwitz v. Directors Guild of America, Inc. (2d Cir. 1966) 364 F.2d 67, 73-77.)

Defendants concede that courts have applied this dual-pronged analysis in reviewing expulsion decisions but contend that in the exclusion area courts have confined their review of arbitrariness to substantive matters, and have not required compliance with procedural fairness. Defendants apparently rely on the fact that in both the Marinship and Falcone cases the arbitrariness issue arose in a substantive context.

The authorities, however, belie the defendants' claim that the requirement of procedural fairness adheres only in expulsion cases. In Wyatt v. Tahoe Forest Hospital Dist., supra, 174 Cal.App.2d 709, for example, the court invalidated the rejection of a doctor's application for membership on a hospital staff because the hospital had failed to afford the applicant any opportunity to be heard. And in Martino v. Concord Community Hosp. Dist., supra, 233 Cal.App.2d 51, 56-57, the court reiterated the Wyatt holding and extended its requirement of procedural fairness to a situation in which an application for staff membership had simply been deferred rather than rejected. Although the Wyatt and Martino cases involve rejections of membership for a hospital staff rather than for a professional association,

<sup>11</sup> Our holding in Pinsker I that a strict showing of "economic necessity" is not an indispensable prerequisite to judicial review was presaged by the court's decision in Directors' Guild of America, Inc. v. Superior Court, supra, 64 Cal.2d 42, 52-54. In Directors' Guild we recognized that although membership in a labor union that did not have a union shop contract might not be an "economic necessity" for an employee in the trade, in practical terms his exclusion from membership worked significant economic and professional hardship. Consequently we declared: "The . . . grounds for condemnation of arbitrary rejection from membership apply as forcefully to the situation in which the union does not have a union shop contract as to that in which it does. The need of the worker for union participation is not reduced because the union does not enjoy a union shop; the basis for membership lies in the right and desirability of representation, not in the union's economic control of the job." (64 Cal.2d at pp. 53-54; see also Kronen v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists, supra, 237 Cal.App.2d 289, 304.)

in view of the fiduciary responsibilities imposed on the defendant [*554] associations because of their "public service" functions, the prior cases are not distinguishable from the present matter. In each instance, the HN10 courts uphold judicial review because denial of membership would effectively impair the applicant's right "to fully practice his profession." (174 Cal.App.2d at p. 715. Cf. Rosner v. Eden Township Hospital Dist. (1962) 58 Cal.2d 592, 598 [25 Cal.Rptr. 551, 375 P.2d 431].)<sup>12</sup>

[**263] [***255] Moreover, several recent out-of-state authorities provide additional support for the conclusion that defendants' membership decisions must be rendered pursuant to fair procedures. In Blende v. Maricopa County Medical Society (1964) 96 Ariz. 240 [393 P.2d 926], for example, the Arizona Supreme Court held that if a medical society's denial of a doctor's application for membership would impair the physician's practice of his profession "then his membership application may not be denied arbitrarily, but only on a showing of just cause established by the Society under proceedings embodying the elements of due process." (Italics added; 393 P.2d at p. 930; see also Sussman v. Overlook Hospital Assn., supra, 95 N.J. Super. 418; Silver v. Castle Memorial Hospital, supra, 53 Hawaii 475.)

Our decision in Pinsker I drew upon the foregoing authority in concluding that HN11 "an applicant for membership [in defendant organizations] has a judicially enforceable right to have his application considered in a manner comporting with the fundamentals of due process, including the showing of cause for rejection." (Italics added; 1 Cal.3d at p. 166.) The development of the common law, reviewed above, buttresses the proposition evident from the very language of Pinsker I: a showing of "cause" for rejection is but one of the requirements of a nonarbitrary decision. In addition, an applicant for membership in defendant societies is entitled to have his application decided pursuant to a fair procedure. (See generally Sloss, Procedural Due Process in Voluntary Associations (1973) 48 State Bar J. 138.)

of an application, an applicant be notified of the reason for the proposed rejection and given a fair opportunity to defend himself.

Defendants further contend that even if they were legally required to utilize a "fair procedure" in passing on Dr. Pinsker's application, as we have said, they satisfied their obligation by conducting an investigation into Pinsker's case and by resting their rejection of his application on the information disclosed by that investigation. Although the trial court apparently agreed with this contention, we conclude that the procedure followed in the instant case does not meet minimal common law standards.

In Cason v. Glass Bottle Blowers Assn., supra, 37 Cal.2d 134, 143, this court declared: "It is a fundamental principle of justice that no man may be condemned or prejudiced in his rights without an opportunity to make his defense, and this principle is applicable not only to courts but also to labor unions and similar organizations." CA(4) (4) We thus recognize that HN13 a basic ingredient of the "fair procedure" required under the common law is that an individual who will be adversely affected by a decision be afforded some meaningful opportunity to be heard in his defense. Every one of the numerous common law precedents in the area establishes that this element is indispensable to a fair procedure. (See, e.g., Von Arx v. San Francisco G. Verein, supra, 113 Cal. 377, 379-380; Taboada v. Sociedad Espanola, etc., supra, 191 Cal. 187, 191; Cunningham v. Burbank Bd. of Realtors, supra, 262 Cal.App.2d 211, 214.)

HN14 The common law requirement of a fair procedure does not compel formal proceedings with all the embellishments of a court trial (see, e.g., Cason v. Glass Bottle Blowers Assn., supra, 37 Cal.2d pp. 137, 143), nor adherence to a single mode of process. It may be satisfied by any one of a variety of procedures which afford a fair opportunity for an applicant to present his position. As such, this court should not attempt to fix a rigid procedure that must invariably be observed. Instead, the associations themselves should retain the initial and primary responsibility for devising a method which provides an applicant adequate notice of the "charges" against him and a reasonable opportunity [**264] [***256] to respond.<sup>13</sup> In drafting such [**556] procedure, and determining, for example, whether an applicant is to be given an opportunity to respond in writing or by personal appearance, the organization should consider the nature of the tendered issue and should fashion its procedure to insure a fair opportunity for an applicant to present his position. Although the association retains discretion in formalizing such procedures, the courts remain available to afford relief in the event of the abuse of such discretion.

<sup>12</sup> Although the defendants in both Wyatt and Martino were public entities, neither decision relied on this factor in reaching the conclusion that procedural fairness was required in the admission process. Moreover, in Willis v. Santa Ana etc. Hospital Assn. (1962) 58 Cal.2d 806, 810 [26 Cal.Rptr. 640, 376 P.2d 568], our court explicitly held that private hospitals are under similar constraints to protect against arbitrary exclusion from membership. (See also Sussman v. Overlook Hospital Assn. (1967) 95 N.J. Super. 418 [231 A.2d 389]; Silver v. Castle Memorial Hospital (1972) 53 Hawaii 475 [497 P.2d 564]; Bricker v. Sceva Speare Memorial Hospital (1971) 111 N.H. 276 [281 A.2d 589, 592-593]; Davidson v. Youngstown Hospital Association (1969) 19 Ohio App.2d 246 [48 Ohio Ops.2d 371, 250 N.E.2d 892].)

CA(5) (5) In the instant case defendants concede that Pinsker was not afforded any opportunity to respond to the charges raised against him. Although Pinsker contends that he had terminated "patient sharing" nearly six months prior to the January 1961 meeting, he was given no chance to demonstrate such termination, and, indeed, was apparently unaware that anyone still questioned his qualifications. Under these circumstances, we conclude that the procedure followed by the defendant association did not meet the minimum standards required under the common law.<sup>14</sup>

The case of Wyatt v. Tahoe Forest Hospital Dist., supra, 174 Cal.App.2d 709, directly supports this conclusion. In Wyatt, as in the instant case, the defendant's ex parte investigation of an applicant's qualifications uncovered information which defendant contended warranted the rejection of plaintiff's application.<sup>15</sup> Despite the thoroughness of the investigation and the apparent reliability of the information gathered, the Wyatt court held that the applicant was still entitled to be accorded an opportunity to be heard in his own defense. (See also Sussman v. Overlook Hospital Assn., supra, [95 N.J. Super. 418 \[231 A.2d 389, 393\]](#).)

Defendants suggest, however, that even if they did act improperly in denying Pinsker's application without affording him an opportunity to present his position, the error has been fully cured because Pinsker was afforded [**557] a full hearing on the merits at the trial of this action. Dr. Pinsker was entitled, however, to a ruling on his membership application by the defendant associations pursuant to a fair procedure; the trial judge possessed neither the professional expertise nor the discretionary latitude of such associations, and consequently his decision is not an adequate substitute for a determination by such bodies. CA(6) (6) Moreover, we believe as a matter of policy that the HN15 association itself should in the first instance pass on the merits of an individual's application rather than shift this burden to the courts. For courts to undertake the task "routinely in every such case constitutes [**265] [***257] both an intrusion into the internal affairs of [private associations] and an unwise burden on judicial administration of the courts." (Ferguson v. Thomas (5th Cir. 1970) 430 F.2d 852, 858.)

The case of Ellis v. American Federation of Labor, supra, 48 Cal.App.2d 440, confirms this approach. In Ellis, after concluding that the defendant labor association had improperly suspended plaintiff without a hearing, the court declared through Justice Dooling: "This court will not undertake to inquire at this time whether the [plaintiff] committed any breach of its obligations . . . or was guilty of any conduct which would justify the suspension or revocation . . . after proper notice and a hearing. The very purpose of such hearing <sup>13</sup> Of course, if an unsuccessful applicant does not care to know the reason for his rejection or does not wish to contest his exclusion, there is no necessity for an association to conduct a meaningless procedure. Accordingly, it is permissible for an association to initially reject an applicant without explanation, so long as the association clearly indicates to the applicant that, if he desires, the association will inform him of the reason for the rejection and will afford him an opportunity to respond.

<sup>14</sup> Because we have determined that the failure to provide Pinsker an opportunity to present his position invalidates the associations' decision, we need not pass on plaintiff's additional contention that the hearsay evidence relied on by defendants was so insubstantial as to render the rejection arbitrary or capricious. (Cf. Tesoriero v. Miller (1949) [274 App.Div. 670 \[88 N.Y.S.2d 87\]](#).) The authorities do make clear, however, that in this context the hearsay nature of the evidence would not in itself render the information insufficient. (See Sussman v. Overlook Hospital Assn., supra, [95 N.J. Super. 418 \[231 A.2d 389, 393\]](#); Silver v. Castle Memorial Hospital, supra, [53 Hawaii 475 \[497 P.2d 564, 571\]](#).) The case of Martin v. State Personnel Board (1972) [26 Cal.App.3d 573 \[103 Cal.Rptr. 306\]](#), relied on by plaintiff, involved an administrative hearing governed by Government Code section 11513, and is not applicable here.

<sup>15</sup> Indeed, the information uncovered by the investigation in Wyatt was of an entirely different magnitude than the matters disclosed in the instant case. In Wyatt, defendants learned that plaintiff had had his medical license revoked on two occasions, had been charged several times with procuring an illegal abortion, and had been fined for removing public property. (174 Cal.App.2d at pp. 711-712.)

would be to determine those facts. Having determined that [plaintiff] may not legally be suspended or revoked without a hearing, it would be improper to substitute a hearing in this or the trial court for the hearing that [plaintiff] is entitled to have within the federation to which it belongs." (48 Cal.App.2d at p. 445. See also Sussman v. Overlook Hospital Assn., supra, 95 N.J. Super. 418.)<sup>16</sup>

Thus, we conclude that defendants should reconsider plaintiff's application for membership pursuant to a fair procedure.<sup>17</sup>

[*558] 3. CA(7) (7) Defendant associations' rule prohibiting the delegation of orthodontic services to a dentist not educationally qualified for membership in their associations is neither arbitrary nor contrary to public policy, and an applicant's knowing violation of such rule serves as a permissible basis for the rejection of his application for membership.

At the further proceedings, which we have outlined above, the applicability and validity of defendants' nondelegation regulation will inevitably be questioned and, because the issue has been fully briefed in this court, we address the matter.

The rule at issue here provides in full: "Use of Auxiliary Personnel. -- The orthodontist has an obligation to protect the health of his patient by not delegating to a person less qualified any service or operation which requires the professional competence of an orthodontist. The orthodontist has a further obligation of supervising the work of all auxiliary personnel in the interests of rendering the best service to the patient." Pinsker concedes the validity of this rule as applied to "auxiliary personnel" not licensed to practice dentistry, but he attacks defendants' interpretation of this section as proscribing the sharing of patients with his partner, a licensed dentist.

CA(8) (8) As an initial matter we note that HN16 in adjudicating a challenge to the society's [**266] [***258] rule as arbitrary a court properly exercises only a limited role of review. As the Arizona Supreme Court observed in Blende v. Maricopa County Medical Society, supra, 96 Ariz. 240 [393 P.2d 926, 930]: "In making such an inquiry, the court must guard against unduly interfering with the Society's autonomy by substituting judicial judgment for that of the Society in an area where the competence of the court does not equal that of the Society . . . If the society has refused membership . . . through the application of a reasonable standard -- one which comports with the legitimate goals of the Society and the rights of the individual and the public -- then judicial inquiry should end." Only when a society rule is contrary to established public policy (see, e.g., Rosner v. Eden Township Hospital Dist., supra, 58 Cal.2d 592; Bernstein v. Alamedaetc. Med. Assn., supra, 139 Cal.App.2d 241; Higgins v. American Society of Clinical Pathologists, supra, 238 A.2d 665), or is so "patently arbitrary and unreasonable" as to be "beyond the pale of the law" (see Falcone v. Middlesex County Medical Soc., supra, 34 N.J. 582 [170 A.2d 791, 800]), should a court prohibit its enforcement.

On its face, the rule at issue appears quite reasonable, promoting high quality patient care by prohibiting orthodontists from delegating to less qualified personnel "any service or operation which requires the professional [*559] competence of an orthodontist." As noted, Dr. Pinsker does not challenge the general application of this provision but urges the arbitrariness only of defendants' interpretation of the section.

Defendants interpret the rule to preclude an orthodontist from delegating an orthodontic "service or operation" to any person who is not a "qualified" orthodontist: defendants, in turn, define a "qualified" orthodontist as one who meets the current educational and professional eligibility requirements for membership in their societies. Because Dr. Schleimer did not satisfy the educational requirements prevailing in 1959 and 1960,<sup>18</sup> defendants concluded that Pinsker's alleged sharing of patients with Schleimer constituted a violation of the rule.

<sup>16</sup> Although the argument is not explicitly articulated, defendants also appear to contend that plaintiff "waived" his right to a hearing before the association because he never took the initiative to request one. Under the society's by-laws, however, it was clear that no right to a hearing existed, and under similar circumstances California courts have uniformly held that an applicant's failure to seek a hearing is no bar to judicial relief. (See, e.g., Martino v. Concord Community Hospital Dist., supra, 233 Cal.App.2d 51, 56; Swital v. Real Estate Commissioner, supra, 116 Cal.App.2d 677, 680; Ellis v. American Federation of Labor, supra, 48 Cal.App.2d 440, 444.)

<sup>17</sup> Although plaintiff claims that the improper denial of a hearing entitled him to an order compelling the societies to admit him immediately into membership, we find no precedent for such an order in a situation in which a rejection is defective because of the failure to provide a hearing. (Cf. Rosner v. Eden Township Hospital Dist., supra, 58 Cal.2d 592, 599 (admission to hospital staff compelled when grounds for rejection invalidated).) In all prior cases in which a hearing has been improperly denied, the courts have simply ordered that a hearing be afforded. (See, e.g., Wyatt v. Tahoe Forest Hospital Dist., supra, 174 Cal.App.2d 709, 716; Martino v. Concord Community Hospital Dist., supra, 233 Cal.App.2d 51, 60.)

Pinsker attacks this construction of the provision on several grounds. First, he contends that nothing in the section indicates that the principle of nondelegation applies to licensed dentists as well as to more traditional "auxiliary personnel," e.g., nurses, dental hygienists, and laboratory technicians. Second, he claims that since Dr. Schleimer's general dentistry license permits him to practice orthodontics defendants cannot properly categorize him as an "unqualified" orthodontist simply because he has not taken all the post-graduate courses currently required of an applicant for membership in their societies. Finally, Pinsker points out that in 1957 Dr. Schleimer did meet all the requirements for membership in defendant associations and thus possesses the same educational qualifications as many society members who joined the associations in 1957 or earlier; since defendants conceded at trial that all members of their society are considered "qualified" orthodontists, Pinsker claims it is arbitrary for defendants to treat Dr. Schleimer differently from other dentists who have comparable educational backgrounds. As discussed below, we conclude that none of these contentions is sufficient to invalidate defendants' interpretation of the rule in question.

First, although the wording of the rule is somewhat ambiguous, Pinsker has conceded that in June 1960 defendants informed [**267] [***259] him of the interpretation which they placed on the section. Under these circumstances, legal doctrines calling for the construction of ambiguous documents against their draftsmen have little place; HN17 in the private association context such rules are often drawn by laymen and so long as the society provides an [*560] adequate and timely explanation an applicant should not be permitted to dispute the society's official interpretation.<sup>19</sup>

Second, the fact that California law designates Dr. Schleimer as "qualified" to practice orthodontics by virtue of his general dentistry license does not preclude defendant societies from establishing a higher standard of qualification for their own purposes. Judicial authorities have made it clear that HN18 one perfectly legitimate objective of professional associations is to attempt to elevate professional standards in order to attain quality medical and dental care. (See [Falcone v. Middlesex County Medical Soc., supra, 34 N.J. 582 \[170 A.2d 791, 800\]](#); [Salter v. New York State Psycho. Ass'n \(1964\) 14 N.Y.2d 100 \[248 N.Y.S.2d 867, 870-871, 198 N.E.2d 250\]](#).) The imposition of additional educational requirements above those required for a state license certainly composes one permissible means of attaining such a goal. Moreover, with the continuing advances in medical science, a professional society may well conclude that "qualification" in a given specialty such as orthodontics calls for completion of some courses which concentrate on that specialty. Such additional educational requirements are precisely the kind of regulations which courts are usually ill-equipped to evaluate: the expert judgment of the professional association in these matters must generally prevail.

Finally, defendant societies may properly place Dr. Schleimer in a different category than individuals who may have comparable formal educational backgrounds but who have previously been admitted into the societies. "Grandfather clauses" in statutory eligibility schemes have long been accepted (see, e.g., [Ex parte Whitley \(1904\) 144 Cal. 167 \[77 P. 879\]](#); [Watson v. Maryland \(1910\) 218 U.S. 173 \[54 L.Ed. 987, 30 S.Ct. 644\]](#); Annot. 136 A.L.R. 207, 219-223). We cannot reasonably impose more rigid requirements on eligibility rules devised by nongovernmental bodies. Moreover, defendants could properly conclude that through participation in the associations' numerous professional activities, society members have been exposed to new professional developments not generally available to non-members.

<sup>18</sup> At the time Dr. Pinsker applied for membership, an applicant was required to have been in the exclusive practice of orthodontics and to have completed an orthodontics course of a minimum of 1,500 hours at an approved dental school. These requirements were more stringent than in earlier years. Thus, for example, in 1957, a dentist was apparently eligible for membership if he had simply been in the exclusive practice of orthodontics for two years.

<sup>19</sup> Our reaction would be entirely different, however, if defendants had rejected Pinsker's application without giving him any fair warning as to the actual meaning of the rule; under such circumstances, the ambiguity of the rule could well render an immediate rejection arbitrary. Although defendants' initial denial of Pinsker's application in May 1960 appears vulnerable to such criticism, defendants apparently recognized the unfairness of the procedure and thereafter reinstated Pinsker's application and afforded him an explanation of the rule at issue.

In sum, we conclude that defendants have not acted arbitrarily in interpreting their "auxiliary personnel" rule as prohibiting Pinsker from [*561] sharing patients with Schleimer. In reaching this conclusion, however, we intimate no opinion as to whether Pinsker has in fact continued "patient-sharing" subsequent to having been informed that such practice violated defendants' rules. We hold only that if defendants properly conclude on the basis of fair proceedings that Pinsker has in fact continued sharing patients with Schleimer, such a practice would provide a nonarbitrary ground for rejecting his application.

4. Conclusion.

In our initial decision we held that "[because] of the unique position in the field of orthodontics occupied by defendant . . . organizations . . ., the associations must be viewed as having a fiduciary responsibility with respect to the acceptance or rejection of membership applications." ( Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Soc. of Orthodontics, supra, 1 Cal.3d 160, 166.) [**268] [***260] In our present decision we have explained that under the common law, one obligation flowing from this "public service" status is that defendant organizations may not reject an application without affording the applicant a fair opportunity to answer the charges against him. Because defendants failed to afford Dr. Pinsker such an opportunity, we have concluded that he is entitled to an injunctive order requiring defendants to reconsider his application pursuant to a fair procedure.

The judgment is reversed and the case is remanded to the trial court with instructions to issue an injunction compelling defendant associations to set aside the rejection of plaintiff's application and to reconsider such application pursuant to a fair procedure as provided herein.

PACIFIC COAST SOCIETY OF ORTHODONTISTS
 et al., Defendants and Respondents.

L.A. 29658. | Nov. 12, 1969.

Action by dentist seeking injunction to require orthodontics associations to admit him as a member. The Superior Court, Los Angeles County, John F. McCarthy, J., granted judgment to defendants at close of plaintiff's evidence, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court, McComb, J., held that in view of fact that membership in orthodontics associations was a practical necessity for a dentist who wished not only to make a good living as an orthodontist but also to realize maximum potential achievement and recognition in such specialty, applicant for membership had a judicially enforceable right to have his application considered in a manner comporting with fundamentals of due process, including showing of cause for rejection.

Opinion

McCOMB, Justice.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment granted to defendants pursuant to section 631.8 of the Code of Civil Procedure at the close of plaintiff's evidence, insofar as the judgment is based on the view that, in the absence of a showing of 'economic necessity' for membership in defendant organizations, plaintiff is not entitled to judicial review of their denial of his application for membership. Defendants are American Association of Orthodontists (AAO), Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists (PCSO), *163 Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists, Southern Component (PCSOS), and various officers and committee members thereof.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Defendant AAO is a Pennsylvania nonprofit corporation. Defendants PCSO and PCSOS are likewise nonprofit corporations, the former being one of at least eight regional constituent societies of the AAO, and the latter being a component of the PCSO in a certain geographical area.

Facts: Plaintiff is a member of the American Dental Association (ADA) and obtained a license in 1953 to practice general dentistry in this state, granted pursuant to the Dental Practice Act. (Bus. & Prof.Code, s 1600 et seq.) He began to practice here in 1954, and two years later formed a partnership in Long Beach with Dr. Max Schleimer. Plaintiff and Dr. Schleimer, as partners, practiced orthodontics, one of eight dental specialties recognized by the ADA, which sets the standards for the dental profession in the United States.

The Dental Practice Act does not provide for the separate licensing of specialist<sup>497</sup> in the field of orthodontics. The only recognized certification therein is the 'Diplomate' certificate conferred by the American Board of Orthodontics (ABO), which is recognized by the ADA as the sole certifying board within this specialty. Membership in the AAO is apparently, if not absolutely essential, at least extremely helpful in obtaining ABO certification. It may also be a prerequisite to attaining membership in certain foundations dedicated to special orthodontics techniques and being admitted to certain advanced educational programs. In order to attain membership in the AAO, a dentist practicing in plaintiff's area must first become a member of the PCSOS, membership in which would, in turn, qualify him as a member of the PCSO, as well as the AAO.

After formation of the partnership with Dr. Schleimer, plaintiff, who had taken certain postgraduate courses in mouth rehabilitation before coming to California, enrolled at Columbia University Division of Orthodontics. There he completed a 17-months' postgraduate course and received a Certificate of Training in Orthodontics, the rough equivalent of a master's degree. In this way, plaintiff obtained more than 1500 clock hours of course work in orthodontia at a dental school certified by the ADA Council on Dental Education, one of the requirements for membership in defendant organizations.

While he was still at Columbia, plaintiff applied for membership in PCSOS, with the understanding that his application would be passed upon after completion of his course work. After returning to California, plaintiff was notified by letter that his application had been denied, but no reason was stated for his rejection.

After plaintiff requested that the Secretary of PCSOS give him some *164 reason for the rejection, he was contacted by Dr. Lee, a Long Beach member of PCSOS, at the secretary's request. According to plaintiff's testimony, Dr. Lee told him that ordinarily the reason for rejection is confidential, but that he felt he could divulge it 'off the record,' and stated: 'Aren't you in there (practicing in partnership with) Dr. Schleimer, who is a non-member of the Association, and aren't you working on each other's patients? * * * (If you can change that relationship, I would think that your application might be favorably reconsidered.' Plaintiff allegedly promised to take immediate steps to segregate his patients from those of Dr. Schleimer. He reapplied for membership and claims that the separation of patients was completed within a few weeks after his conversation with Dr. Lee. Defendants offer to prove, on a resumption of trial sought by them, that this is not so. A few months after plaintiff's second application was filed, he received a notice of 'final rejection,' which, like the first notice, contained no reasons.

Thereafter, plaintiff filed the present action seeking an injunction to require defendants to admit him as a member of AAO and PCSOS.<sup>2</sup> In granting defendants' motion under section 631.8 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon the close of plaintiff's case, the trial court concluded that 'There is no economic or other necessity for membership in defendant associations justifying judicial intervention. * * * Plaintiff has no right to judicially compel defendants to admit him to membership.' Thus, the trial court followed the rule urged by defendants that a voluntary association's refusal of membership to an applicant does not give rise to a legal remedy, no matter how arbitrary or unfair the refusal, unless the applicant can show that the refusal infringes a contractual or property right of his or that the organization effectively controls his right and ability to earn a living. (See James v. Marinship Corp., 25 Cal.2d 721, 155 P.2d 329, 160 A.L.R. 900; Smith v. Kern County Medical Assn., 19 Cal.2d 263, 120 P.2d 874; ***626 **498 Tatkin

v. Superior Court, In and For Los Angeles County, 160 Cal.App.2d 745, 755, 326 P.2d 201; Falcone v. Middlesex County Medical Society, 34 N.J. 582, 170 A.2d 791, 89 A.L.R.2d 952; compare Kronen v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists, 237 Cal.App.2d 289, 46 Cal.Rptr. 808; Blende v. County Medical Society, 96 Ariz. 240, 245, 393 P.2d 926, 930 (applicant's general right to due process).

<sup>2</sup> Plaintiff further sought damages for infringement of advantageous relationships, malicious misconduct, and restraint of trade, but he does not appeal from the trial court's finding that he failed to prove any such damage.

At the trial, it was stipulated, and the trial court found, that plaintiff had fulfilled all the requirements for membership as stated in the constitution and bylaws of defendant organizations except that he had not been elected to membership by the board of directors.

<sup>[1]</sup> Questions: First. Can plaintiff, by showing that exclusion from *165 membership in defendant associations deprives him of substantial economic advantages, establish a right to judicial intervention with respect to the denial of his application for membership?

Yes. Membership in AAO and its constituent organizations is not essential for a dentist desiring to specialize in orthodontics. Plaintiff's specialization in orthodontics is proper under both the Dental Practice Act and the ADA's code of ethics, and his earnings therefrom are substantial. However, although any licensed practitioner has a right to hold himself out as a qualified specialist, evidence of membership in a specialty group acknowledged by the ADA is the only available sanction of specialized professional qualification; and the trial court found that membership in defendant associations would be economically advantageous to plaintiff and that he had suffered financial loss by reason of their refusal to elect him to membership. Plaintiff contends that he has therefore established an enforceable right to compel defendant associations to admit him.

Plaintiff argues that by being excluded from defendant associations he has been deprived of educational, financial, and professional advantages. He alleges that had he been granted membership, he could anticipate an increase in the number of dentist referrals received, could charge substantially larger fees than he does, and would be eligible to take certain courses not open to him now because he lacks membership in defendant associations.

In cases involving exclusion from membership in trade and professional organizations, the emphasis has been upon the economic necessity, as opposed to the mere social utility, of membership. As stated in Falcone v. Middlesex County Medical Soc., 34 N.J. 582, 170 A.2d 791, 799: 'When courts originally declined to scrutinize admission practices of membership associations they were dealing with social clubs, religious organizations and fraternal associations. Here the policies against judicial intervention were strong and there were no significant countervailing policies. When the courts were later called upon to deal with trade and professional associations exercising virtually monopolistic control, different factors were involved. The intimate personal relationships which pervaded the social, religious and fraternal organizations were hardly in evidence and the individual's opportunity of earning a livelihood and serving society in his chosen trade or profession appeared as the controlling policy consideration. * * * Public policy strongly dictates that this power (of exclusion) should not be unbridled but should be viewed judicially as a fiduciary power to be exercised in reasonable and lawful manner for the advancement of the interests of the medical profession and the public generally * * *.'

In *166 Kronen v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists, 237 Cal.App.2d 289, 46 Cal.Rptr. 808, the Court of Appeal determined preliminarily that a dentist whose application for membership in defendant associations had been rejected was entitled to judicial review of the circumstances surrounding the rejection to determine whether the rejection was an arbitrary or unlawful exercise of the power to exclude him. In that case, the rejection of the plaintiff's ***627 **499 application was found to be proper, because he failed to meet the requirement that he be recommended by two active members of the constituent society. In the present case, on the other hand, plaintiff had met all the requirements except election to membership. Nevertheless, statements of the Courts of Appeal in its discussion of the right to judicial review are pertinent here. It was there said, at page 304(3) 46 Cal.Rptr. at p. 819: 'It is common knowledge that in this day of specialization, the doctor or dentist limiting his practice to a specialty enjoys a prestigious position with attendant economic advantages. It appears to us on this record that as a practical matter, an orthodontist like plaintiff cannot successfully limit his practice to orthodontics unless he becomes an active member of defendant organizations.'

<sup>[2]</sup> Because of the unique position in the field of orthodontics occupied by defendant AAO and its constituent organizations, membership therein, although not economically necessary in the strict sense of the word (as was the case in Falcone), would appear to be a practical necessity for a dentist who wishes not only to make a good living as an orthodontist but also to realize maximum potential achievement and recognition in such specialty. Defendant associations hold themselves out to the public and the dental profession generally as the sole organizations recognized by the ADA, which is itself a virtual monopoly, to determine standards, both ethical and educational, for the practice and certification of orthodontics. Thus, a public interest is shown, and the associations must be viewed as having a fiduciary responsibility with respect to the acceptance or rejection of membership applications. (See Tobriner and Grodin. The Individual and the Public Service Enterprise in the New Industrial State (1967) 55 Cal.L.Rev. 1247.) Under the circumstances, an applicant for membership has a judicially enforceable right to have his application considered in a manner comporting with the fundamentals of due process, including the showing of cause for rejection.

Second. Are defendants entitled to offer evidence upon a retrial to show that their reason for excluding plaintiff was not an arbitrary or capricious one?

Yes. Section 631.8 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, in pertinent part, as follows: ‘After a party has completed his presentation of evidence in a trial by the court, the other party, Without waiving his right to offer *167 evidence in support of his defense or in rebuttal in the event the motion is not granted, may move for a judgment. (Italics added.)

<sup>[3]</sup> In the present case, the motion was granted, but since the judgment is being reversed on appeal, the situation is the same as if the motion had not been granted. (Columbia Engineering Co. v. Joiner, 231 Cal.App.2d 837, 858(17), 42 Cal.Rptr. 241; see also Greening v. General Air-Conditioning Corp., 233 Cal.App.2d 545, 43 Cal.Rptr. 662.) Accordingly, defendants are entitled to present evidence in support of their defense or in rebuttal.

A contention has been made that defendants did not claim in the trial court that plaintiff’s application was rejected for cause and that they should therefore be foreclosed from presenting evidence on such issue. An examination of the record reveals, however, that in their answer defendants denied the allegation of plaintiff’s complaint that his application was denied ‘arbitrarily, capriciously and without cause’ and stated in their proposed findings of fact that the denial of plaintiff’s application ‘was not arbitrary, capricious or without cause as alleged, or otherwise.’ Although defendants’ counsel agreed that ‘for the purpose of this proceeding’ plaintiff had met all requirements except election to membership, defendants never maintained that there was not, in fact, a cause for the rejection of his application; and statements made by counsel **500 ***628 for both plaintiff and defendants, as well as by the trial court, show that the understanding of all concerned was that if defendants’ motion was denied, they would have an opportunity to present evidence that plaintiff’s application was not arbitrarily rejected. Under the circumstances, defendants should be afforded an opportunity to show the truth or falsity of their assertion that their reason for excluding plaintiffs from membership was not an arbitrary or capricious one.

That portion of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

TRAYNOR, C.J., and PETERS, TOBRINER, MOSK, BURKE and SULLIVAN, JJ., concur.

DECLARATION

I. INTRODUCTION

1. This Declaration is issued in the context of an Independent Review Process (“IRP”) as provided for in Article IV, Section 3 of the Bylaws of the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (“ICANN”; “ICANN Bylaws” or “Bylaws”). In accordance with those Bylaws, the conduct of this IRP is governed by the International Arbitration Rules of the International Centre for Dispute Resolution as amended and in effect June 1, 2009 (“ICDR”; “ICDR Rules”) as supplemented by the Supplementary Procedures for Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN) Independent Review Process (“Supplementary Procedures”).
2. The subject matter of the dispute here concerns alleged conduct by the ICANN Board in relation to one particular facet of the process by which new generic top-level domains (“gTLDs”, also known as gTLD “strings”) are applied for, reviewed and delegated into the Internet’s domain name system (“DNS”) root zone.
3. As explained in this Declaration, the Applicant, Booking.com, alleges that, in establishing and overseeing the process by which so-called string similarity reviews are conducted, and in refusing to reconsider and overturn a decision to place Booking.com’s applied-for gTLD string .hotels in a so-called string contention set, the Board acted in a manner inconsistent with applicable policies, procedures and rules as set out in ICANN’s Articles of Incorporation, Bylaws and gTLD Applicant Guidebook (“Guidebook”).
4. Reading between the lines of the parties’ submissions, the Panel senses that both sides would welcome the opportunity to contribute to an exchange that might result in enabling disputants in future cases to avoid having to resort to an IRP to resolve issues such as have arisen here. Certainly the Panel considers that the present matter would ideally have been resolved amicably by the parties. This is particularly true given that the matter here concerns two of ICANN’s guiding principles – transparency and fairness – as applied to one of ICANN’s most essential activities – the delegation of new gTLDs<sup>2</sup> – in circumstances in which various members of the Internet community, including certain members of the ICANN Board’s New gTLD Program Committee, have expressed their own concerns regarding the string similarity review process. That being the case, though, the Panel does not shy away from the duty imposed by the Bylaws to address the questions before it and to render the present Declaration, in accordance with, and within the constraints of the Bylaws, the ICDR Rules and the Supplementary Procedures.

<sup>1</sup> As requested by the ICDR, the Declaration was provided to the ICDR in draft form on 26 January 2015 for non-substantive comments on the text (if any). It was returned to the Panel on 2 March 2015.

<sup>2</sup> As stated in the very first sentence of the Guidebook: “New gTLDs have been in the forefront of ICANN’s agenda since its creation.”

II. THE PARTIES

A. The Applicant: Booking.com

5. The Applicant, Booking.com, is a limited liability company established under the law of the Netherlands. Booking.com describes itself as “the number one online hotel reservation service in the world, offering over 435,605 hotels and accommodations.”<sup>3</sup> Booking.com’s primary focus is on the U.S. and other English-language markets.
6. Booking.com is represented in this IRP by Mr. Flip Petillion and Mr. Jan Janssen of the law firm Crowell & Moring in Brussels, Belgium.

B. The Respondent: ICANN

7. The Respondent, ICANN, is a California not-for-profit public benefit corporation, formed in 1998. As set forth in Article I, Section 1 of its Bylaws, ICANN’s mission is “to coordinate, at the overall level, the global Internet’s system of unique identifiers, and in particular to ensure the stable and secure operation of the Internet’s unique identifier systems.” ICANN describes itself as “a complex organization that facilitates input from a wide variety of Internet stakeholders. ICANN has a Board of Directors and staff members from around the globe, as well as an Ombudsman. ICANN, however, is much more than just the corporation—it is a community of participants.”<sup>4</sup>
8. ICANN is represented in this IRP by Mr. Jeffrey A. LeVee, Esq. and Ms. Kate Wallace, Esq. of the law firm Jones Day in Los Angeles, California, USA.

III. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND – IN BRIEF

9. We recount here certain uncontested elements of the factual and procedural background to the present IRP. Other facts are addressed in subsequent parts of the Declaration, where the parties’ respective claims and the Panel’s analysis are discussed.

A. ICANN’s Adoption of the New gTLD Program and the Applicant Guidebook

10. Even before the introduction of ICANN’s New gTLD Program (“Program”), in 2011, ICANN had, over time, gradually expanded the DNS from the original six gTLDs (.com; .edu; .gov; .mil; .net; .org) to 22 gTLDs and over 250 two-letter country-code TLDs.<sup>5</sup> Indeed, as noted above, the introduction of new gTLDs has been “in the forefront of ICANN’s agenda” for as long as ICANN has existed.

11. The Program has its origins in what the Guidebook refers to as “carefully deliberated policy development work” by the ICANN community.<sup>6</sup>
12. In 2005, ICANN’s Generic Names Supporting Organization (“GNSO”), one of the groups that coordinates global Internet policy at ICANN, commenced a policy development process to consider the introduction of new gTLDs.<sup>7</sup> As noted in the Guidebook:

Representatives from a wide variety of stakeholder groups – governments, individuals, civil society, business and intellectual property constituencies, and the technology community – were engaged in discussions for more than 18 months on such questions as the demand, benefits and risks of new gTLDs, the selection criteria that should be applied, how gTLDs should be allocated, and the contractual conditions that should be required for new gTLD registries going forward.
13. In October 2007, the GNSO formally completed its policy development work on new gTLDs and approved a set of 19 policy recommendations.
14. In June 2008, the ICANN Board decided to adopt the policies recommended by the GNSO.<sup>8</sup> As explained in the Guidebook, ICANN’s work next focused on implementation of these recommendations, which it saw as “creating an application and evaluation process for new gTLDs that is aligned with the policy recommendations and provides a clear roadmap for applicants to reach delegation, including Board approval.”<sup>9</sup>
15. This process concluded with the decision by the ICANN Board in June 2011 to implement the New gTLD Program and its foundational instrument, the Guidebook.<sup>10</sup>
16. As described by ICANN in these proceedings, the Program “constitutes by far ICANN’s most ambitious expansion of the Internet’s naming system. The Program’s goals include

See also Guidebook, Preamble. Booking.com refers to the GNSO as “ICANN’s main policy-making body for generic top-level domains”. Article X of ICANN’s Articles of Incorporation provides: “There shall be a policy-development body known as the Generic Names Supporting Organization (GNSO), which shall be responsible for developing and recommending to the ICANN Board substantive policies relating to generic top-level domains” (Section 1); the GNSO shall consist of “a number of Constituencies” and “four Stakeholder Groups” (Section 2).

<sup>8</sup> Guidebook, Preamble. A review of this policy process can be found at <http://qns0.icann.org/issues/new-gtlds> (last accessed on January 15, 2015).

<sup>9</sup> Guidebook, Preamble: “This implementation work is reflected in the drafts of the applicant guidebook that were released for public comment, and in the explanatory papers giving insight into rationale behind some of the conclusions reached on specific topics. Meaningful community input has led to revisions of the draft applicant guidebook.”

<sup>10</sup> RM 10 (ICANN resolution). The Guidebook (in its 30 May 2011 version) is one of seven “elements” of the Program implemented in 2011. The other elements were: a draft communications plan; “operational readiness activities”; a program to ensure support for applicants from developing countries; “a process for handling requests for removal of cross-ownership restrictions on operators of existing gTLDs who want to participate in the [Program]”; budgeted expenditures; and a timetable.

enhancing competition and consumer choice, and enabling the benefits of innovation via the introduction of new gTLDs ...”<sup>11</sup>

17. The Guidebook is “continuously iterated and revised”, and “provides details to gTLD applicants and forms the basis for ICANN’s evaluation of new gTLD applications.”<sup>12</sup> As noted by Booking.com, the Guidebook “is the crystallization of Board-approved consensus policy concerning the introduction of new gTLDs.”<sup>13</sup>

B. Booking.com’s Application for .hotels, and the Outcome

18. In accordance with the process set out in the Guidebook, Booking.com filed an application (Application ID 1-1016-75482) for the gTLD string .hotels.
19. At the same time, Despegar Online SRL (“Despegar”), a corporation established under the law of Uruguay, applied (Application ID 1-1249-87712) for the string .hoteis.
20. “Hoteis” is the Portuguese word for “hotels”.
21. According to Booking.com, Despegar is “a competitor of Booking.com”.<sup>14</sup> Booking.com claims that it intends “to operate .hotels as a secure Internet environment providing hotel reservation services for consumers, hotels, and other stakeholders,”<sup>15</sup> while Despegar similarly intends .hoteis to be dedicated primarily to “individuals that are interested in, and businesses that offer, hotel- and travel-related content.”<sup>16</sup> That being said, a key difference between the two applications, as Booking.com acknowledges, is that Booking.com intends to focus the services it will offer under its proposed gTLD “on the U.S. (with its strongly Anglo-Saxon traditions) and other English-language markets,”<sup>17</sup> whereas Despegar intends to target “Portuguese-speaking” markets.<sup>18</sup>
22. As part of the Initial Evaluation to which all applied-for gTLDs were subject, .hotels and .hoteis were each required to undergo so-called string review in accordance with the Guidebook, the first component of which is a process known as string similarity review. As provided by the Guidebook, the string similarity review was conducted by an independent

The resolution (RM 10) adopting the Guidebook explicitly “authorizes staff to make further updates and changes to the Applicant Guidebook as necessary and appropriate, including as the possible result of new technical standards, reference documents, or policies that might be adopted during the course of the application process, and to prominently publish notice of such changes.”

String Similarity Panel (“SSP”) selected and engaged by ICANN for this purpose. (Extracts of the relevant provisions of the Guidebook can be found below, at Part IV of this Declaration.) ICANN engaged InterConnect Communications Ltd. (“ICC”), a company registered under the law of England and Wales, specializing in communications sector strategy, policy and associated regulatory frameworks,<sup>19</sup> in cooperation with University College London, to act as the SSP.

23. On 26 February 2013 ICANN published the results of all of the string similarity reviews for all of the applications for new gTLDs submitted as part of the Program. The announcement revealed, among other things, that two “non-exact match” contention sets had been created: .hotels & .hoteis; and .unicorn & .unicom.<sup>20</sup> Booking.com’s applied for string .hotels (as well as the .hoteis, .uncorn and .unicom strings) had thus failed the string similarity review.
24. The results of the string similarity review were notified to Booking.com by ICANN that same day. In its letter of 26 February 2013 ICANN wrote:

After careful consideration and extensive review performed against the criteria in Section 2.2.1.1 of the Applicant Guidebook, the String Similarity Panel has found that the applied-for string (.hotels) is visually similar to another applied-for string (.hoteis), creating a probability of user confusion.

Due to this finding, the ... two strings have been placed in a contention set.<sup>21</sup>

25. The impact of being put into a contention set is that the proposed strings in the set will not be delegated in the root zone unless and until the applicants reach agreement on which single string should proceed (with the other proposed string therefore rejected), or until after an auction is conducted, with the highest bidder being given the right to proceed to the next step in the review process.

C. DIDP Request and Request for Reconsideration

26. On 28 March 2013 Booking.com submitted a request for information under ICANN’s Documentary Information Disclosure Policy (“DIDP Request”) asking for “all documents directly and indirectly relating to (1) the standard used to determine whether gTLD strings are confusingly similar, and (2) the specific determination that .hotels and .hoteis are confusingly similar.”<sup>22</sup>
27. On the same date, Booking.com also filed a formal Request for Reconsideration (“Request for Reconsideration”). The “specific action(s)” that Booking.com asked to be reconsidered were: the decision to place .hotels and .hoteis in a contention set; and the decision not to

provide a “detailed analysis or a reasoned basis” for the decision to place .hotels in contention.<sup>23</sup>

28. ICANN responded to the DIDP Request on 27 April 2013. Although ICANN provided certain information regarding the review process, in its response to the DIDP Request, ICANN also noted:

The SSP is responsible for the development of its own process documentation and methodology for performing the string similarity review, and is also responsible for the maintenance of its own work papers. Many of the items that are sought from ICANN within the [DIDP] Request are therefore not in existence within ICANN and cannot be provided in response to the DIDP Request. ICANN will, however, shortly be posting the SSP’s String Similarity Process and Workflow on the New gTLD microsite ...<sup>24</sup>

29. By letter dated 9 May 2013 Booking.com replied to ICANN, writing that “ICANN’s response fails to provide any additional information or address any of Booking.com’s concerns as conveyed in its DIDP Request or Request for Reconsideration.”<sup>25</sup> On 14 May 2013, ICANN answered that it “intends to post the string similarity process documentation on or before ... 17 May 2013.”<sup>26</sup> ICANN further informed Booking.com that “ICANN will afford you 30 days from the posting of the process document for the submission of a revised Request for Reconsideration.”<sup>27</sup>
30. On 7 June 2013, ICANN published the “String Similarity New gTLD Evaluation Panel [i.e., the SSP] – Process Description” (“SSP Process Description”).<sup>28</sup>
31. On 26 June 2013 Booking.com wrote to ICANN regarding both its DIDP Request and its 28 March 2013 Request for Reconsideration. In its letter, Booking.com noted among other things that “the generalized information ICANN thus far has provided does not explain a rationale for or analysis for the decision to put .hotels and .hoteis in a contention set and therefore does not allow Booking.com to appropriately amend its Request for Reconsideration.” The letter concluded by stating: “Considering ICANN’s obligations of transparency and accountability, there cannot be any ‘compelling reason for confidentiality’.

<sup>23</sup> Request, Annex 12, §3. The Request for Reconsideration (which appears to be in the form of a template) expressly states at §2 that it is a “Request for Reconsideration of ... Staff [vs. Board] action/inaction.” The cover letter attaching the Request states that, “[d]espite the fact that the origin of the decisions is unclear, this Reconsideration Request is being submitted as a reconsideration of a ‘Staff action’. In the event that the decisions referenced above are determined to be a ‘Board action’, this request may be amended.” As explained below, the Request for Reconsideration was amended on 7 July 2013. That amendment did not alter the stated nature of the request in §2 or the description of the specific actions that Booking.com sought to have reconsidered (§3). Unless otherwise indicated, all further references in this Declaration to the Request for Reconsideration are understood to be the amended Request for Reconsideration.

32. ICANN responded on 25 July 2013, explaining among other things that “the evaluation of the .hotels string by the SSP panel was performed according to the [SSP Process Description] ...” and “[t]he SSP’s work was subjected to quality review, as has been publicly discussed.”<sup>30</sup> Approximately six months later, on 9 January 2014, ICANN posted a letter dated 18 December 2013 addressed to ICANN by the SSP Manager at ICC (Mr. Mark McFadden) providing a further “summary of the process, quality control mechanisms and some considerations surrounding the non-exact contention sets for the string similarity evaluation ...” (“SSP Manager’s Letter”).<sup>31</sup> According to that Letter:

When ALL of the following features of a pairwise comparison [of non-exact match strings] are evident the evaluators found the string pair to be confusingly similar:

- Strings of similar visual length on the page;
- Strings within +/- 1 character of each other;
- Strings where the majority of characters are the same and in the same position in each string; and
- The two strings possess letter combinations that visually appear similar to other letters in the same position in each string

o For example m~m & l~i

33. Meanwhile, on 7 July 2013 Booking.com had submitted its amended Request for Reconsideration. In its letter attaching the amended Request for Reconsideration, Booking.com stated: “Booking.com reserves the right to further amend its Request for Reconsideration upon receipt of the information it previously requested and urges ICANN to publish the requested information as specified in our letter of 26 June 2013.”<sup>32</sup>
34. By virtue of Article IV, Section 3 of the Bylaws, ICANN’s Board Governance Committee (“BGC”) is charged with evaluating and making recommendation to the Board with respect to requests for reconsideration. The Board’s New gTLD Program Committee (“NGPC”) receives and acts on such recommendations on behalf of the ICANN Board. In accordance with this procedure, Booking.com’s Request for Reconsideration was evaluated by the BGC. In a detailed analysis dated 1 August 2013, the BGC “conclude[d] that Booking.com has not stated proper grounds for reconsideration and we therefor recommend that Booking.com's request be denied" ("BGC Recommendation").<sup>33</sup>

35. At a telephone meeting held on 10 September 2013 the NGPC, "bestowed with the powers of the Board", considered, discussed and accepted the BGC Recommendation. Booking.com's Request for Reconsideration was denied.<sup>34</sup>

D. The Cooperative Engagement Process

36. Booking.com thereafter filed a request for a Cooperative Engagement Process ("CEP") on 25 September 2013, with a view to attempting to reach an amicable resolution of its dispute with ICANN. In its CEP request, Booking.com wrote:

Booking.com is of the opinion that Resolution 2013.09.10.NG02 [the Board resolution denying its Request for Reconsideration] violates various provisions of ICANN's Bylaws and Articles of Incorporation. In particular Booking.com considers that ICANN's adoption of [the Resolution] is in violation of Articles I, II(3), II and IV of the ICANN Bylaws as well as Article 4 of ICANN's Articles of Incorporation. In addition, Booking.com considers that ICANN has acted in violation of Articles 3, 5, 7 and 9 of ICANN's Affirmation of Commitment ...<sup>35</sup>

37. The CEP ultimately did not result in a resolution, and Booking.com duly commenced the present IRP.
38. One further point should be made, here, prior to describing the commencement and conduct of the present IRP proceedings: The determination by the SSP that .hotels and .hoteis are so visually similar as to give rise to the probability of user confusion, and the resulting placement of those applied-for strings into a contention set, does not mean that Booking.com's application for .hotels has been denied or that .hotels will not proceed to delegation to the root zone. Rather, as noted above and explained in the extracts from the Guidebook reproduced below, the Guidebook establishes a process for resolving such contention, under which the applicants for the contending strings in the set – here, Booking.com and Despegar – may resolve the contention by negotiation, failing which the matter will proceed to auction. Ultimately, no matter the outcome of these IRP proceedings, Booking.com may yet be successful and .hotels may yet be delegated into the Internet root zone. However, the fact that .hotels has been put into a contention set does raise the risk that .hotels may never be delegated into the root zone, or that it may be more costly for Booking.com to obtain approval of its proposed string. It also has caused a significant delay in the potential delegation of the string into the root zone (which could prove to be detrimental to the ultimate success of Booking.com's proposed string if other applicants

E. The IRP Proceedings

39. On 19 March 2014, Booking.com submitted a Notice of Independent Review, dated 18 March 2014, as well as a Request for Independent Review Process (“Request”) accompanied by numerous supporting documents and reference materials.
40. In accordance with Article IV, Section 3(9) of the ICANN Bylaws, Booking.com requested that a three-member IRP panel be constituted to consider and determine the Request. As the omnibus standing panel referred to in Article IV, Section 3(6) of the ICANN Bylaws had yet to be established, Booking.com further proposed, in accordance with Article 6 of the ICDR Rules, that each party appoint one panelist, with the third (the Chair of the panel) to be appointed by the two party-appointed panelists.
41. On 25 April 2014, ICANN submitted a Response to ICANN’s Request with supporting documents (“Response”).
42. The parties having thereafter agreed on the number of panelists and the method of their appointment, David H. Bernstein, Esq. was duly appointed as panelist by Booking.com on 1 May 2014, and the Hon. A Howard Matz was duly appointed as panelist by ICANN on 30 May 2014.
43. On 17 July 2014, the ICDR notified the parties that Mr. Stephen L. Drymer had been duly nominated by the two party-appointed panelists as Chair of the Panel. Mr. Drymer’s appointment became effective and the Panel was duly constituted as of 1 August 2014.
44. On 21 August 2014, further to consultations among the panelists and between the Panel and the parties, the Panel convened a preparatory conference with the parties (by telephone) for the purpose of discussing organizational matters, including a timetable for any further written statements or oral argument. Both parties requested the opportunity to make supplemental submissions and to present oral argument.
45. On 22 August 2014 the Panel issued Procedural Order No. 1 in which, among other things, it established a Procedural Timetable for the IRP. As specifically requested by the parties, the Procedural Order and Timetable provided for the submission of additional written statements by the parties as well as for a brief oral hearing to take place by telephone, all on dates proposed by and agreed between the parties.<sup>36</sup>
46. In accordance with the Procedural Timetable, on 6 October 2014 Booking.com submitted its Reply to ICANN’s Response, accompanied by additional documents (“Reply”).

<sup>36</sup> Paragraph 6 of Procedural Order No. 1 provided that, in its forthcoming Reply to ICANN’s Response, “Booking.com shall only address two issues raised in Respondent’s Response: (1) the nature and scope of the IRP requested; (2) the nature of the relief sought by Claimant.” Paragraph 7 of Procedural Order No. 1 provided that “Respondent’s Sur-Reply ... shall address only the issues raised in the Reply.”

47. In accordance with the Procedural Timetable, ICANN submitted a Sur-Reply on 20 November 2014 (“Sur-Reply”).

F. The Hearing

48. As provided by Procedural Order No. 1 and the Procedural Timetable, a hearing was held (by telephone) on 10 December 2011, commencing at 9:00 PST/18:00 CET.
49. In the light of the significance of the issues raised by the parties, and given the many questions prompted by those issues and by the parties’ extensive written submissions and supporting materials, the Panel indicated that it would allow the hearing to continue beyond the approximately one hour originally envisaged. The hearing ultimately lasted two and one-half hours. Counsel for each party made extensive oral submissions, including rebuttal and sur-rebuttal submissions, and responded to the panelists’ questions.
50. Prior to the close of the hearing each party declared that it had no objection concerning the conduct of the proceedings, that it had no further oral submissions that it wished to make, and that it considered that it had had a full opportunity to present its case and to be heard.
51. As agreed and ordered prior to the close of the hearing, the parties were provided the opportunity to file limited additional materials post-hearing, in relation to a certain question asked of them by the Panel. This was done, and, on 13 December 2014, the proceedings were declared closed.

IV. ICANN ARTICLES, BYLAWS AND POLICIES – KEY ELEMENTS

52. We set out here the key elements of ICANN’s Articles of Association, Bylaws and policies on which the parties rely in their submissions and to which the Panel will refer later in this Declaration.

A. Articles of Association

4. The Corporation shall operate for the benefit of the Internet community as a whole, carrying out its activities in conformity with relevant principles of international law and applicable international conventions and local law and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with these Articles and its Bylaws, through open and transparent processes that enable competition and open entry in Internet-related markets. To this effect, the Corporation shall cooperate as appropriate with relevant international organizations.

[Underlining added]

B. Bylaws

ARTICLE I: MISSION AND CORE VALUES

Section 1. MISSION

The mission of The Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (“ICANN”) is to coordinate, at the overall level, the global Internet’s systems of unique identifiers, and in particular to ensure the stable and secure operation of the Internet's unique identifier systems.

[..]

Section 2. CORE VALUES

In performing its mission, the following core values should guide the decisions and actions of ICANN:

- 1. Preserving and enhancing the operational stability, reliability, security, and global interoperability of the Internet.*
- 2. Respecting the creativity, innovation, and flow of information made possible by the Internet by limiting ICANN's activities to those matters within ICANN's mission requiring or significantly benefiting from global coordination.*
- 3. To the extent feasible and appropriate, delegating coordination functions to or recognizing the policy role of other responsible entities that reflect the interests of affected parties.*
- 4. Seeking and supporting broad, informed participation reflecting the functional, geographic, and cultural diversity of the Internet at all levels of policy development and decision-making.*
- 5. Where feasible and appropriate, depending on market mechanisms to promote and sustain a competitive environment.*
- 6. Introducing and promoting competition in the registration of domain names where practicable and beneficial in the public interest.*
- 7. Employing open and transparent policy development mechanisms that (i) promote well-informed decisions based on expert advice, and (ii) ensure that those entities most affected can assist in the policy development process.*
- 8. Making decisions by applying documented policies neutrally and objectively, with integrity and fairness.*
- 9. Acting with a speed that is responsive to the needs of the Internet while, as part of the decision-making process, obtaining informed input from those entities most affected.*
- 10. Remaining accountable to the Internet community through mechanisms that enhance ICANN's effectiveness.*
- 11. While remaining rooted in the private sector, recognizing that governments and public authorities are responsible for public policy and duly taking into account governments' or public authorities' recommendations.*

These core values are deliberately expressed in very general terms, so that they may provide useful and relevant guidance in the broadest possible range of circumstances. Because they are not narrowly prescriptive, the specific way in which they apply, individually and collectively, to each new situation will necessarily depend on many factors that cannot be fully anticipated or enumerated; and because they are statements of principle rather than practice, situations will inevitably arise in which perfect fidelity to all eleven core values simultaneously is not possible. Any ICANN body making a recommendation or decision shall exercise its judgment to determine which core values are most relevant and how they apply to the specific circumstances of the case at hand, and to determine, if necessary, an appropriate and defensible balance among competing values.

ARTICLE III: TRANSPARENCY

Section 1. PURPOSE

ICANN and its constituent bodies shall operate to the maximum extent feasible in an open and transparent manner and consistent with procedures designed to ensure fairness.

[...]

ARTICLE IV: ACCOUNTABILITY AND REVIEW

Section 1. PURPOSE

In carrying out its mission as set out in these Bylaws, ICANN should be accountable to the community for operating in a manner that is consistent with these Bylaws, and with due regard for the core values set forth in Article I of these Bylaws. The provisions of this Article, creating processes for reconsideration and independent review of ICANN actions and periodic review of ICANN's structure and procedures, are intended to reinforce the various accountability mechanisms otherwise set forth in these Bylaws, including the transparency provisions of Article III and the Board and other selection mechanisms set forth throughout these Bylaws.

Section 2. RECONSIDERATION

1. ICANN shall have in place a process by which any person or entity materially affected by an action of ICANN may request review or reconsideration of that action by the Board.

2. Any person or entity may submit a request for reconsideration or review of an ICANN action or inaction ("Reconsideration Request") to the extent that he, she, or it have been adversely affected by:

a. one or more staff actions or inactions that contradict established ICANN policy(ies); or

b. one or more actions or inactions of the ICANN Board that have been taken or refused to be taken without consideration of material information, except where the party submitting the request could have submitted, but did not submit, the information for the Board's consideration at the time of action or refusal to act; or

c. one or more actions or inactions of the ICANN Board that are taken as a result of the Board's reliance on false or inaccurate material information.

3. The Board has designated the Board Governance Committee to review and consider any such Reconsideration Requests. The Board Governance Committee shall have the authority to:

a. evaluate requests for review or reconsideration;

- b. summarily dismiss insufficient requests;
- c. evaluate requests for urgent consideration;
- d. conduct whatever factual investigation is deemed appropriate;
- e. request additional written submissions from the affected party, or from other parties;
- f. make a final determination on Reconsideration Requests regarding staff action or inaction, without reference to the Board of Directors; and
- g. make a recommendation to the Board of Directors on the merits of the request, as necessary.

Section 3. INDEPENDENT REVIEW OF BOARD ACTIONS

1. In addition to the reconsideration process described in Section 2 of this Article, ICANN shall have in place a separate process for independent third-party review of Board actions alleged by an affected party to be inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws.

2. Any person materially affected by a decision or action by the Board that he or she asserts is inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws may submit a request for independent review of that decision or action. In order to be materially affected, the person must suffer injury or harm that is directly and causally connected to the Board's alleged violation of the Bylaws or the Articles of Incorporation, and not as a result of third parties acting in line with the Board's action.

3. A request for independent review must be filed within thirty days of the posting of the minutes of the Board meeting (and the accompanying Board Briefing Materials, if available) that the requesting party contends demonstrates that ICANN violated its Bylaws or Articles of Incorporation. Consolidated requests may be appropriate when the causal connection between the circumstances of the requests and the harm is the same for each of the requesting parties.

4. Requests for such independent review shall be referred to an Independent Review Process Panel ("IRP Panel"), which shall be charged with comparing contested actions of the Board to the Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws, and with declaring whether the Board has acted consistently with the provisions of those Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws. The IRP Panel must apply a defined standard of review to the IRP request, focusing on:

- a. did the Board act without conflict of interest in taking its decision?;
- b. did the Board exercise due diligence and care in having a reasonable amount of facts in front of them?; and
- c. did the Board members exercise independent judgment in taking the decision, believed to be in the best interests of the company [ICANN]?

[...]

11. The IRP Panel shall have the authority to:

- a. summarily dismiss requests brought without standing, lacking in substance, or that are frivolous or vexatious;
- b. request additional written submissions from the party seeking review, the Board, the Supporting Organizations, or from other parties;
- c. declare whether an action or inaction of the Board was inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws; and
- d. recommend that the Board stay any action or decision, or that the Board take any interim action, until such time as the Board reviews and acts upon the opinion of the IRP;
- e. consolidate requests for independent review if the facts and circumstances are sufficiently similar; and
- f. determine the timing for each proceeding.

14. Prior to initiating a request for independent review, the complainant is urged to enter into a period of cooperative engagement with ICANN for the purpose of resolving or narrowing the issues that are contemplated to be brought to the IRP. [...]

15. Upon the filing of a request for an independent review, the parties are urged to participate in a conciliation period for the purpose of narrowing the issues that are stated within the request for independent review. A conciliator will be appointed from the members of the omnibus standing panel by the Chair of that panel. [...]

16. Cooperative engagement and conciliation are both voluntary. However, if the party requesting the independent review does not participate in good faith in the cooperative engagement and the conciliation processes, if applicable, and ICANN is the prevailing party in the request for independent review, the IRP Panel must award to ICANN all reasonable fees and costs incurred by ICANN in the proceeding, including legal fees.

18. The IRP Panel should strive to issue its written declaration no later than six months after the filing of the request for independent review. The IRP Panel shall make its declaration based solely on the documentation, supporting materials, and arguments submitted by the parties, and in its declaration shall specifically designate the prevailing party. The party not prevailing shall ordinarily be responsible for bearing all costs of the IRP Provider, but in an extraordinary case the IRP Panel may in its declaration allocate up to half of the costs of the IRP Provider to the prevailing party based upon the circumstances, including a consideration of the reasonableness of the parties' positions and their contribution to the public interest. Each party to the IRP proceedings shall bear its own expenses.

[Underlining added]

53. Lest there be any misunderstanding as regards the proper subject matter of IRP proceedings or the role of the Panel, we note that, as was clearly established during the hearing, it is common ground between the parties that the term "action" (or "actions") as used in Article IV, Section 3 of the Bylaws is to be understood as action(s) or inaction(s) by the ICANN Board. The Panel observes that this understanding comports not only with the provisions of Article

IV, Section 2 of the Bylaws concerning “Reconsideration”, which expressly refer to “actions or inactions of the ICANN Board”, but with the clear intent of Section 3 itself, which stipulates at sub-section 11 that “[t]he IRP Panel shall have the authority to: ... (c) declare whether an action or inaction of the Board was inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws.”

C. The gTLD Applicant Guidebook

54. As noted above and as understood by all, the Guidebook is (to borrow Booking.com’s phrase) “the crystallization of Board-approved consensus policy concerning the introduction of new gTLDs.”<sup>37</sup>
55. The Guidebook is divided into “Modules”, each of which contains various sections and sub-sections. The three Modules of primary relevance here are Modules 1, 2 and 4. Module 1, titled “Introduction to the gTLD Application Process,” provides an “overview of the process for applying for a new generic top-level domains.”<sup>38</sup> Module 2, titled “Evaluation Procedures,” describes the “evaluation procedures and criteria used to determine whether applied-for gTLDs are approved for delegation.”<sup>39</sup> Module 4, titled “String Contention Procedures,” concerns “situations in which contention over applied-for gTLD strings occurs, and the methods available to applicants for resolving such contention cases.”

(i) Initial Evaluation

56. As explained in Module 1, “[i]mmediately following the close of the application submission period, ICANN will begin checking all applications for completeness.”<sup>40</sup> Initial Evaluation begins “immediately after the administrative completeness check concludes. All complete applications will be reviewed during Initial Evaluation.”<sup>41</sup>
57. Initial Evaluation is comprised of two main elements or types of review: string review, which concerns the applied-for gTLD string; and applicant review, which concerns the entity applying for the gTLD and its proposed registry services. It is the first of these – string review, including more specifically the component known as string similarity review – that is particularly relevant.

(ii) String Review, including String Similarity Review

58. String review is itself comprised of several components, each of which constitutes a separate assessment or review of the applied-for gTLD string, conducted by a separate reviewing body or panel. As explained in Module 2:

The following assessments are performed in the Initial Evaluation:

<sup>41</sup> Guidebook, §1.1.2.5: “Initial Evaluation”, Module 1-8 (underlining added).

- String Reviews
  - String similarity
  - Reserved names
  - DNS stability
  - Geographic names

[...]

An application must pass all these reviews to pass the Initial Evaluation. Failure to pass any one of these reviews will result in a failure to pass the Initial Evaluation.<sup>42</sup>

59. As indicated, all complete applications are subject to Initial Evaluation, which means that all applied-for gTLD strings are subject to string review. String review is further described in Module 2 as follows:

[String review] focuses on the applied-for gTLD string to test:

- Whether the applied-for gTLD string is so similar to other strings that it would create a probability of user confusion;
- Whether the applied-for gTLD string might adversely affect DNS security or stability; and
- Whether evidence of requisite government approval is provided in the case of certain geographic names.<sup>43</sup>

60. The various assessments or reviews (i.e., string similarity, reserved names, DNS stability, etc.) that comprise string review are elaborated at Section 2.2.1 of Module 2. As mentioned, the most relevant of these reviews for our purposes is string similarity review, which is described in detail at Section 2.2.1.1. Because of the central importance of the string similarity review process in the context of the present dispute, this section of the Guidebook is reproduced here at some length:

2.2.1.1 String Similarity Review

This review involves a preliminary comparison of each applied-for gTLD string against existing TLDs, Reserved Names (see subsection 2.2.1.2), and other applied-for strings. The objective of this review is to prevent user confusion and loss of confidence in the DNS resulting from delegation of many similar strings.

Note: In this Applicant Guidebook, “similar” means strings so similar that they create a probability of user confusion if more than one of the strings is delegated into the root zone.

<sup>42</sup> Module 2-2. The same is true of applicant review, which is also comprised of various assessments concerning the applicant entity.

<sup>43</sup> Guidebook, §2.2: “Initial Evaluation”, Module 2-4 (underlining added). See also Module 1-9: “String reviews include a determination that the applied-for gTLD string is not likely to cause security or stability problems in the DNS ...”

The visual similarity check that occurs during Initial Evaluation is intended to augment the objection and dispute resolution process (see Module 3, Dispute Resolution Procedures) that addresses all types of similarity.

This similarity review will be conducted by an independent String Similarity Panel.

2.2.1.1.1 Reviews Performed

The String Similarity Panel's task is to identify visual string similarities that would create a probability of user confusion.

The panel performs this task of assessing similarities that would lead to user confusion in four sets of circumstances, when comparing:

[...]

- Applied-for gTLD strings against other applied-for gTLD strings;

[...]

Similarity to Other Applied-for gTLD Strings (String Contention Sets) – All applied-for gTLD strings will be reviewed against one another to identify any similar strings. In performing this review, the String Similarity Panel will create contention sets that may be used in later stages of evaluation.

A contention set contains at least two applied-for strings identical or similar to one another. Refer to Module 4, String Contention Procedures, for more information on contention sets and contention resolution.

2.2.1.1.2 Review Methodology

The String Similarity Panel is informed in part by an algorithmic score for the visual similarity between each applied-for string and each of other existing and applied-for TLDs and reserved names. The score will provide one objective measure for consideration by the panel, as part of the process of identifying strings likely to result in user confusion. In general, applicants should expect that a higher visual similarity score suggests a higher probability that the application will not pass the String Similarity review. However, it should be noted that the score is only indicative and that the final determination of similarity is entirely up to the Panel's judgment.

The algorithm, user guidelines, and additional background information are available to applicants for testing and informational purposes. [footnote in the original: See <http://icann.sword-group.com/algorithm/>] Applicants will have the ability to test their strings and obtain algorithmic results through the application system prior to submission of an application.

The panel will examine all the algorithm data and perform its own review of similarities between strings and whether they rise to the level of string confusion. In cases of strings in scripts not yet supported by the algorithm, the panel's assessment process is entirely manual.

The panel will use a common standard to test for whether string confusion exists, as follows:

Standard for String Confusion – String confusion exists where a string so nearly resembles another visually that it is likely to deceive or cause confusion. For the likelihood of confusion to exist, it must be probable, not merely possible that confusion will arise in the mind of the average, reasonable Internet user. Mere association, in the sense that the string brings another string to mind, is insufficient to find a likelihood of confusion.

2.2.1.1.3 Outcomes of the String Similarity Review

An application that fails the String Similarity review due to similarity to an existing TLD will not pass the Initial Evaluation, and no further reviews will be available. Where an application does not pass the String Similarity review, the applicant will be notified as soon as the review is completed.

An application for a string that is found too similar to another applied-for gTLD string will be placed in a contention set.<sup>44</sup>

[Underlining added]

61. Module 4 of the Guidebook, as mentioned, concerns “situations in which contention over applied-for gTLD strings occurs, and the methods available to applicants for resolving such contention cases.” As explained in Module 4:

4.1 String Contention

String contention occurs when either:

1. Two or more applicants for an identical gTLD string successfully complete all previous stages of the evaluation and dispute resolution processes; or
2. Two or more applicants for similar gTLD strings successfully complete all previous stages of the evaluation and dispute resolution processes, and the similarity of the strings is identified as creating a probability of user confusion if more than one of the strings is delegated.

ICANN will not approve applications for proposed gTLD strings that are identical or that would result in user confusion, called contending strings. If either situation above occurs, such applications will proceed to contention resolution through either community priority evaluation, in certain cases, or through an auction. Both processes are described in this module. A group of applications for contending strings is referred to as a contention set.

<sup>44</sup> Module 2-5 to 2-9. As regards the concept of string contention, see also Guidebook, §1.1.2.10: “String Contention”, Module 1-13: “String contention applies only when there is more than one qualified application for the same or similar gTLD strings. String contention refers to the scenario in which there is more than one qualified application for the identical gTLD string or for similar gTLD strings. In this Applicant Guidebook, “similar” means strings so similar that they create a probability of user confusion if more than one of the strings is delegated into the root zone.”

(In this Applicant Guidebook, “similar” means strings so similar that they create a probability of user confusion if more than one of the strings is delegated into the root zone.)

4.1.1 Identification of Contention Sets

Contention sets are groups of applications containing identical or similar applied-for gTLD strings. Contention sets are identified during Initial Evaluation, following review of all applied-for gTLD strings. ICANN will publish preliminary contention sets once the String Similarity review is completed, and will update the contention sets as necessary during the evaluation and dispute resolution stages.

Applications for identical gTLD strings will be automatically assigned to a contention set.

[...]

The String Similarity Panel will also review the entire pool of applied-for strings to determine whether the strings proposed in any two or more applications are so similar that they would create a probability of user confusion if allowed to coexist in the DNS. The panel will make such a determination for each pair of applied-for gTLD strings. The outcome of the String Similarity review described in Module 2 is the identification of contention sets ...

[...]

As described elsewhere in this guidebook, cases of contention might be resolved by community priority evaluation [NB: community priority evaluation applies only to so-called “community” applications; it is not relevant here] or an agreement among the parties. Absent that, the last-resort contention resolution mechanism will be an auction.

[...]

62. As provided in Module 4, the two methods relevant to resolving a contention such as between .hotels and .hoteis are self-resolution (i.e., an agreement between the two applicants for the contending strings) and auction:

4.1.3 Self-Resolution of String Contention

Applicants that are identified as being in contention are encouraged to reach a settlement or agreement among themselves that resolves the contention. This may occur at any stage of the process, once ICANN publicly posts the applications received and the preliminary contention sets on its website.

Applicants may resolve string contention in a manner whereby one or more applicants withdraw their applications.

4.3 Auction: Mechanism of Last Resort

It is expected that most cases of contention will be resolved by the community priority evaluation, or through voluntary agreement among the involved applicants. Auction is a tie-breaker method for resolving string contention among the applications within a contention set, if the contention has not been resolved by other means.

63. Module 5 of the Guidebook, titled Transition to Delegation, describes “the final steps required of an applicant for completion of the process, including execution of a registry agreement with ICANN and preparing for delegation of the new gTLD into the root zone.”<sup>45</sup> Section 5.1 states:

ICANN's Board of Directors has ultimate responsibility for the New gTLD Program. The Board reserves the right to individually consider an application for a new gTLD to determine whether approval would be in the best interest of the Internet community. Under exceptional circumstances, the Board may individually consider a gTLD application. For example, the Board might individually consider an application as a result of GAC Advice on New gTLDs or of the use of an ICANN accountability mechanism.<sup>46</sup>

V. SUMMARY OF THE PARTIES' POSITIONS

64. The following brief summary of the parties' respective positions is provided with a view solely to assisting the reader to understand the present Declaration. It is not intended to recapitulate – and it does not recapitulate – the entirety of the parties' allegations and arguments. Additional references to the parties' positions, including submissions made by them in the course of the proceedings, are contained in the discussion at Part VI below.

A. Booking.com's position

(i) The Panel's Authority

65. Booking.com submits that the mandate of the Panel is “to determine whether the contested actions of the ICANN Board are consistent with applicable rules”.<sup>47</sup> According to Booking.com:

The set of rules against which the actions of the ICANN Board must be assessed includes: (i) ICANN's Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws – both of which must be interpreted in light of ICANN's Affirmation of Commitments, and both of which require compliance with inter alia International law and generally accepted good governance principles – and (ii) secondary rules created by ICANN, such as the Applicant Guidebook. In setting up, implementing and supervising its policies and processes, the Board must comply with the fundamental principles embodied in these rules. That obligation includes a duty to ensure compliance with its obligations to act in good faith, transparently, fairly, and in a manner that is non-discriminatory and ensures due process.<sup>48</sup>

66. Booking.com submits that IRP panels have broad authority to evaluate actions of the ICANN Board. An overly restrictive interpretation of the standard of review, such as proposed by ICANN in these proceedings, would, says Booking.com, “fail to ensure accountability on the part of ICANN and would be incompatible with ICANN’s commitment to maintain (and improve) robust mechanisms for accountability, as required by Article 9.1 of ICANN’s Affirmation of Commitments and ICANN’s core values.”<sup>49</sup>

(ii) Booking.com’s Claims

67. The purpose of the IRP initiated by Booking.com is, in its own words, “to challenge the ICANN Board’s handling of Booking.com’s application for the new gTLD .hotels.”<sup>50</sup> This includes the determination of the SSP to place .hotels and .hoteis in contention and the refusal of the Board (and its committees) to revise that determination. Elsewhere in its submissions, Booking.com makes an even broader claim; it asserts that it challenges the conduct of the ICANN Board in relation to what Booking.com refers to as the setting up, implementation, supervision and review of the entire of string similarity review process, and the Board’s alleged failure “to ensure due process and to respect its fundamental obligations to ensure good faith, transparency, fairness and non-discrimination” throughout.<sup>51</sup>
68. In effect, Booking.com’s specific claims can be divided into two broad categories: claims related to the string similarity review process generally; and claims related to the particular case of .hotels.
69. Booking.com professes that this case “is not about challenging a decision on the merits [i.e., the decision to place .hotels in contention]”; it is about “ICANN’s failure to respect fundamental [procedural] rights and principles in handling New gTLD applications, in particular in the context of String Similarity Review.”<sup>52</sup>
70. Booking.com also repeatedly emphasizes – and this is crucial – that it does not challenge the validity or fairness of the process as set out in the Guidebook. Rather, as indicated, it contests “the way in which that process was established, implemented and supervised by (or under the authority of) the ICANN Board.”<sup>53</sup> Equally crucial, as will be seen, is Booking.com’s acknowledgment that the established process was followed in the case of the review of .hotels.

a. The string similarity review process

71. According to Booking.com, the problem began when the ICANN Board failed to “provide transparency in the SSP selection process,” in particular by failing “to make clear how [ICANN] would evaluate candidate responses or how it ultimately did so.”<sup>54</sup> The problem was compounded by the selection of ICC/University College London to perform string similarity reviews as the independent SSP. In Booking.com’s words:

[T]he identities of the unsuccessful candidates (if any) to perform the String Similarity Review remain unknown. Applicants have never been given any information in relation to the candidate responses that were submitted. ... There is no indication that any other candidate expressed an interest in performing the String Similarity Review. No information has been provided as to the steps (if any) taken by ICANN to reach out to other potential candidates. Numerous questions remain: How did ICANN deal with the situation if there was only one (or only a very few) respondent(s) wishing to perform the String Similarity Review? How did this impact on the discussions with InterConnect Communications? What are the terms of ICANN’s contract with InterConnect Communications?<sup>55</sup>

72. Booking.com also faults ICANN for “allowing the appointed SSP to develop and perform an unfair and arbitrary review process”, specifically, by allowing the SSP “to perform the String Similarity Review (i) without any (documented) plan or methodology ... (ii) without providing any transparency regarding the evaluators or the evaluation criteria ... and (iii) without informing applicants of its reasoning ...”.<sup>56</sup>
73. Among other things, Booking.com takes ICANN to task for establishing and posting the SSP Process Description and the SSP Manager’s Letter (see Part III.C above) only long after the string similarity review process had ended.<sup>57</sup>
74. It also alleges that the factors identified in the SSP Manager’s Letter are “arbitrary and baseless ... not supported by any methodology capable of producing compelling and defensible conclusions ... [which] has allowed applications with at least equally serious visual string similarity concerns – such as .parts/.paris, .maif/.mail, .srt/.srl, .vote/.voto and .date/.data ... – to proceed while singling out .hotels/.hoteis.”<sup>58</sup> According to Booking.com: “The failure to take actual human performance into account is at odds with the standard for assessment, i.e., the likelihood of confusion on the part of the average Internet user. Hence, the approach is directly contrary to ICANN’s own policy.”<sup>59</sup>
75. Booking.com further contends that the SSP process is unfair and non-transparent due to the fact that the identity of SSP members has never been publicly disclosed.<sup>60</sup>
76. Further, Booking.com argues that the process is unfair, non-transparent and arbitrary – and thus violates ICANN policy – for failing to provide for a “well-documented rationale” for each

SSP determination. In the absence of reasons for each string similarity determination, says Booking.com, “there is no basis on which decisions can be evaluated and, where appropriate, challenged.”<sup>61</sup>

77. Another ground for Booking.com’s challenge is the alleged failure by the ICANN Board to providing “effective supervision or quality control” of the SSP: “If nobody but the evaluator has any insight into how the evaluation was carried out, no effective quality control can be performed.”<sup>62</sup> Nor, according to Booking.com, does the quality review of the SSP’s work supposedly performed by JAS Advisers (the independent consultant engaged by ICANN for this purpose) overcome the problem of a lack of transparency:

Booking.com is not aware that any selection process was put in place in relation to the appointment of JAS Advisors to perform the String Similarity Review quality control. No criteria for performing the quality control were published. When ICANN was looking for evaluators, no call for expressions of interest or similar document was issued for the selection of quality controllers.<sup>63</sup>

78. In any case, says Booking.com, the “quality control review over a random sampling of applications to, among other things, test whether the process [set out in the Guidebook] was followed,” which ICANN claims was performed on the SSP’s work,<sup>64</sup> could not provide adequate quality control of the string similarity review process.<sup>65</sup> Finally, Booking.com argues that the arbitrary and unfair result of the string similarity review concerning .hotels – i.e., the decision to place .hotels and .hoteis in contention – demonstrates that, “whatever quality control review ICANN may have engaged in ... must therefore have been deficient.”<sup>66</sup>

b. The case of .hotels

79. Booking.com argues, in part on the basis of expert evidence which it adduces in this IRP proceeding,<sup>67</sup> that “[t]here is no probability of user confusion if both .hotels and .hoteis were delegated as gTLD strings into the Internet root zone ... The SSP could not have reasonably found that the average reasonable Internet user is likely to be confused between the two strings.”<sup>68</sup> It continues:

Since .hotels and .hoteis are not confusingly similar, the determination that they are is contradictory to ICANN policy as established in the Applicant Guidebook. Acceptance of the determination, and repeated failure to remedy the wrongful determination, is a failure to act with due diligence and independent judgment, and a failure to neutrally and fairly apply established policies as required by Bylaws and Articles of Incorporation.<sup>69</sup>

80. According to Booking.com, the Board should have acted to overturn the determination of the SSP either in the context of the Request for Reconsideration or under the authority accorded it by Module 5-4 of the Guidebook to “individually consider a gTLD application”.<sup>70</sup>
81. Booking.com claims that its DIDP Request alerted the Board to the need to intervene to “correct the errors in the process” related to .hotels, and that its Request for Reconsideration of the SSP determination further informed the Board of the many errors in the SSP’s review of .hotels, “giving the Board ample opportunity to correct those errors.”<sup>71</sup> Booking.com claims that the Board’s failure, when responding to the DIDP Request, “to offer any insight into the SSP’s reasoning”, its refusal to reconsider and overturn the SSP determination regarding .hotels on the sole ground (says Booking.com) that “the Reconsideration process ‘is not available as a mechanism to re-try the decisions of evaluation panels’”, and its failure to investigate Booking.com’s complaints of a lack of fairness and transparency in the SSP process, constitute violations of ICANN’s governing rules regarding string similarity review.<sup>72</sup>
82. According to Booking.com, among the most compelling evidence of ICANN’s failure in this regard are the statements made on the record by several members of the NGPC during its 10 September 2013 meeting at which Booking.com’s Request for Reconsideration was denied.<sup>73</sup> Given the importance that the Panel attaches to these statements, they are addressed in some detail in the Analysis in Part VI, below.
83. In its written submissions Booking.com asks the Panel to grant the following relief:

Finding that ICANN breached its Articles of Incorporation, its Bylaws, and the gTLD Applicant Guidebook;

Requiring that ICANN reject the determination that .hotels and .hoteis are confusingly similar and disregard the resulting contention set;

Awarding Booking.com its costs in this proceeding; and <sup>72</sup> Reply, ¶ 41. In the passage of Booking.com’s submissions referred to here (as elsewhere), Booking.com speaks of violations of ICANN’s obligations of “due process”, which, it says, comprise concepts such as the right to be heard, the right to receive reasons for decisions, publicity, etc. For reasons explained in Part VI, below, the Panel prefers to use the terms fairness and transparency to connote the essence of ICANN’s obligations under review in this IRP.

Awarding such other relief as the Panel may find appropriate or Booking.com may request.

84. At the hearing Booking.com further requested that the Panel not only require ICANN to disregard the SSP determination regarding .hotels/.hoteis, but also order ICANN to “delegate both .hotels and .hoteis.”

B. ICANN's position

85. ICANN's position is best summed up by ICANN itself:

Booking.com's IRP Request is really about Booking.com's disagreement with the merits of the String Similarity Panel's conclusion that .hotels and .hoteis are confusingly similar. But the Panel's determination does not constitute Board action, and the Independent Review Process is not available as a mechanism to re-try the decisions of an independent evaluation panel. The IRP Panel is tasked only with comparing contested actions of the ICANN Board to ICANN's Bylaws and Articles of Incorporation; it is not within the IRP Panel's mandate to evaluate whether the String Similarity Panel's conclusion that .hotels and .hoteis are confusingly similar was wrong.<sup>74</sup>

86. According to ICANN, the Board “did exactly what it was supposed to do under its Bylaws, its Articles of Incorporation, and the Guidebook.”<sup>75</sup>

(i) *The Panel's Authority

87. Throughout its submissions ICANN repeatedly stresses what it says is the very limited authority enjoyed by IRP panels.
88. As provided in Article IV, Section 3(4) of ICANN's Bylaws, ICANN observes that this Panel (as all IRP panels) is charged only with “comparing contested actions of the Board to the Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws, and with declaring whether the Board has acted consistently with the provisions of those Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws.”<sup>76</sup>
89. ICANN notes that, in undertaking this compare-and-declare mission, the Panel is further constrained to apply the very specific “standard of review” set out in Bylaw Article IV, Section 3(4), which requires the Panel to focus on three particular questions: “did the Board act without conflict of interest in taking its decision?”; “did the Board exercise due diligence and care in having a reasonable amount of facts in front of them?”; and “did the Board members exercise independent judgment in taking the decision, believed to be in the best interests of the company [ICANN]?”<sup>77</sup>

<sup>75</sup> Response, ¶ 8. Both parties agree that, as submitted by Booking.com, the “rules” at issue, against which the conduct of the ICANN Board is to be assessed, include the relevant provisions of the Guidebook.

90. ICANN further asserts that the IRP process “is not available as a mechanism to challenge the actions or inactions of ICANN staff or third parties that may be involved in ICANN activities,”<sup>78</sup> such as the action of the SSP which resulted in .hotels and .hoteis being placed in contention. Nor, says ICANN, may the IRP process be used as an “appeal mechanism” by which to overturn substantive decisions – such as the determination that .hotels and .hoteis are confusingly visually similar – with which an applicant may disagree.<sup>79</sup>
91. In this regard ICANN states that the affirmative relief sought by Booking.com – specifically, a declaration requiring that ICANN “reject the determination that .hotels and .hoteis are confusingly similar and disregard the resulting contention set” and (as requested at the hearing) that ICANN “delegate both .hotels and .hoteis” – exceeds the authority of the Panel.<sup>80</sup>

(ii) ICANN's Response to Booking.com's Claims

a. The string similarity review process

92. According to ICANN, “[e]arly on in the iterations of the Guidebook, it was determined that, in the initial evaluation stage, the String Similarity Panel would only examine strings for visual confusion;” and “[i]f applied-for strings are determined to so nearly resemble each other visually that it is likely to deceive or cause confusion, the string will be placed in a contention set, which is then resolved pursuant to the contention set resolution processes in Module 4 of the Guidebook.”<sup>81</sup>
93. According to ICANN, it was also determined early on that, as stated in Section 2.2.1.1 of the Guidebook, “[t]his similarity review will be conducted by an independent String Similarity Panel,” not by ICANN itself. ICC was duly selected to perform the string similarity review further to “an open and public request for proposals,” pursuant to which, as the successful bidder, “ICC was responsible for the development of its own process documents and methodology for performing the String Similarity Review consistent with the provisions of the Guidebook.”<sup>82</sup> ICANN emphasizes that “the Guidebook does not provide for any process by which ICANN (or anyone else) may conduct a substantive review of ICC’s results.”<sup>83</sup>
94. In ICANN’s submission, the alternative proposed by Booking.com, that “the ICANN Board – and the ICANN Board alone – was obligated to perform the String Similarity Review for the more than 1,900 new gTLD applications submitted,” is “untenable and is not supported by ICANN’s Bylaws or Articles.”<sup>84</sup> As noted by ICANN, the Guidebook defines six distinct review processes that every gTLD application is required to go through, including string similarity review; each of those review processes was conducted by independent experts specifically engaged by ICANN staff for the purpose.

95. ICANN submits that “there simply is no requirement – under ICANN’s governing documents or imposed by law – that would mandate that the ICANN Board inject itself into the day-to-day affairs of the evaluation process in the manner Booking.com proposes.”<sup>85</sup> It asserts that, consistent with well-settled legal principles, “neither ICANN’s Bylaws, nor the Articles, nor the Guidebook requires the ICANN Board to conduct any analysis of the decisions of third party experts retained to evaluate string similarity.”<sup>86</sup>
96. Moreover, ICANN asserts that “[s]imply because the ICANN Board has the discretion [under Section 5.1 (Module 5-4) of the Guidebook] to consider individual applications does not mean it is required to do so or that it should do so, particularly at an initial evaluation stage.”<sup>87</sup>
97. ICANN claims that that Booking.com’s repeated invocation of the Board’s so-called obligation to ensure “due process” in the administration of the New gTLD Program is misplaced. First, neither applicable California law nor any provision of the Bylaws, Articles of Incorporation or Guidebook “specifically affords any gTLD applicant a right to procedural ‘due process’ similar to that which is afforded in courts of law.”<sup>88</sup> Second, because ICANN conducts its activities in the public interest it nevertheless provides “more opportunity for parties to be heard and to dispute actions taken”<sup>89</sup> than most private corporate entities. Third, the “decision to proceed with the New gTLD Program followed many years of discussion, debate and deliberation within the ICANN community, including participation from end users, civil society, technical experts, business groups, governments and others.”<sup>90</sup> Fourth, and perhaps most importantly, “ICANN adhered to the policies and procedures articulated in its Bylaws, Articles of Incorporation, and the Guidebook, the latter of which was adopted only after being publicly vetted with ICANN’s stakeholders and the broader Internet community.”<sup>91</sup>
98. ICANN’s response to Booking.com’s various allegations regarding particular elements of the string similarity review process – including for example the selection of the SSP, the publication of the SSP’s methodology, the anonymity of the individuals SSP members, the supposed lack of quality control – is essentially three-fold: first, the actions challenged by Booking.com are not Board actions, but actions of ICANN staff or third parties, which cannot be challenged by means of IRP proceedings; second, in any case, Booking.com's claims are factually incorrect, and there has been no violation of the Bylaws, Articles of Incorporation or Guidebook; third, Booking.com's claims are time-barred given that Article IV, Section 3(3) of the Bylaws requires that IRP requests "must be filed within thirty days of the posting of the minutes of the Board meeting ... that the requesting party contends demonstrates that ICANN violated its Bylaws or Articles of Incorporation."<sup>92</sup>

99. ICANN's position as regards the determination to place .hotels and .hoteis in contention is similar in many respects to its position regarding the string similarity review process generally. ICANN argues that the Board played no role whatsoever in performing the review of .hotels; that the SSP's determination was in any event well supported and there was no violation of applicable rules; and that the Guidebook does not provide for any process by which ICANN (or any other body, including an IRP panel) may conduct a substantive review of a string similarity determination.
100. In any event, ICANN asserts that .hotels and .hoteis in fact meet every one of the visual similarity criteria applied by the SSP, as set out in the SSP Manager's Letter. Moreover, .hotels and .hoteis scored a stunning 99% for visual similarity under the publicly available SWORD algorithm which, as provided by Section 2.2.1.1.2 (Module 2-7) of the Guidebook, establishes "one objective measure for consideration by the [SSP]". According to ICANN (in response to a question posed by the Panel during the hearing), this was the highest algorithmic score among the comparison of all non-identical pairs within the 1917 new gTLD applications received by ICANN;<sup>93</sup> the only other pair of non-exact match strings found to be confusingly visually similar – .unicorn and .unicom – scored only 94%.<sup>94</sup>
101. According to ICANN, "it was not clearly 'wrong,' as Booking.com argues, for the [SSP] to find that .hotels/.hoteis are confusingly similar."<sup>95</sup>
102. In conclusion, ICANN states that its conduct with respect to Booking.com's application for .hotels, including in evaluating Booking.com's Request for Reconsideration, was fully consistent with ICANN's Articles of Incorporation, its Bylaws and the procedures established in the Guidebook; and the fact that Booking.com disagrees with the SSP's determination to put .hotels and .hoteis in a contention set does not give rise to an IRP.
103. ICANN asks the Panel to deny Booking.com's IRP Request.

104. The jurisdiction and authority of an IRP panel is expressly prescribed – and expressly limited – by the ICANN Bylaws. To recap, Article IV, Section 3 of the Bylaws provides:

4. [The IRP Panel] shall be charged with comparing contested actions of the Board to the Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws, and with declaring whether the Board has acted consistently with the provisions of those Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws. The IRP Panel must apply a defined standard of review to the IRP request, focusing on:

- a. did the Board act without conflict of interest in taking its decision?;*
- b. did the Board exercise due diligence and care in having a reasonable amount of facts in front of them?; and*
- c. did the Board members exercise independent judgment in taking the decision, believed to be in the best interests of the company [ICANN]?*

[...]

- 11. The IRP Panel shall have the authority to:*

[...]

c. declare whether an action or inaction of the Board was inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws; and

d. recommend that the Board stay any action or decision, or that the Board take any interim action, until such time as the Board reviews and acts upon the opinion of the IRP;

[...]

18. [...] The IRP Panel shall make its declaration based solely on the documentation, supporting materials, and arguments submitted by the parties [...]

[Underlining added]

105. Similarly, Article 8 of the Supplementary Procedures reads:

8. Standard of Review

The IRP is subject to the following standard of review: (i) did the ICANN Board act without conflict of interest in taking its decision; (ii) did the ICANN Board exercise due diligence and care in having sufficient facts in front of them; (iii) did the ICANN Board members exercise independent judgment in taking the decision, believed to be in the best interests of the company?

If a requestor demonstrates that the ICANN Board did not make a reasonable inquiry to determine it had sufficient facts available, ICANN Board members had a conflict of interest in participating in the decision, or the decision was not an exercise in independent judgment, believed by the ICANN Board to be in the best interests of the company, after taking account of the Internet community and the global public interest, the requestor will have established proper grounds for review.

106. There is no dispute as regards the Panel's duty to compare the actions of the Board to ICANN's Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws (and, in this case, Guidebook) with a view to declaring whether those actions are inconsistent with applicable policies. Where the parties disagree is with respect to the standard of review to be applied by the Panel in assessing Board conduct.

107. ICANN submits that its Bylaws “specify that a deferential standard of review be applied when evaluating the actions of the ICANN Board ... the rules are clear that the appointed IRP Panel is neither asked to, nor allowed to, substitute its judgment for that of the Board.”<sup>96</sup> Booking.com argues that this “is simply wrong. No such specification is made in ICANN’s Bylaws or elsewhere, and a restrictive interpretation of the standard of review would ... fail to ensure accountability on the part of ICANN and would be incompatible with ICANN’s commitment to maintain (and improve) robust mechanisms for accountability.”<sup>97</sup>
108. In the opinion of the Panel, there can be no question but that the provisions of the ICANN Bylaws establishing the Independent Review Process and defining the role of an IRP panel specify that the ICANN Board enjoys a large degree of discretion in its decisions and actions. So long as the Board acts without conflict of interest and with due care, it is entitled – indeed, required – to exercise its independent judgment in acting in what it believes to be the best interests of ICANN. The only substantive check on the conduct of the ICANN Board is that such conduct may not be inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws – or, the parties agree, with the Guidebook. In that connection, the Panel notes that Article 1, Section 2 of the Bylaws also clearly states that in exercising its judgment, the Board (indeed “[a]ny ICANN body making a recommendation or decision”) shall itself “determine which core values are most relevant and how they apply to the specific circumstances of the case at hand.”
109. In other words, in making decisions the Board is required to conduct itself reasonably in what it considers to be ICANN’s best interests; where it does so, the only question is whether its actions are or are not consistent with the Articles, Bylaws and, in this case, with the policies and procedures established in the Guidebook.
110. There is also no question but that the authority of an IRP panel to compare contested actions of the Board to the Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws, and to declare whether the Board has acted consistently with the Articles and Bylaws, does not extend to opining on the nature of those instruments. Nor, in this case, does our authority extend to opining on the nature of the policies or procedures established in the Guidebook. In this regard it is recalled that Booking.com itself repeatedly stresses that it does not contest the validity or fairness of the string similarity review process as set out in the Guidebook, but merely whether ICANN’s actions were consistent with various elements of that process. Stated differently, our role in this IRP includes assessing whether the applicable rules – in this case, the rules regarding string similarity review – were followed, not whether such rules are appropriate or advisable.
111. Nevertheless, this does not mean that the IRP Panel may only review ICANN Board actions or inactions under the deferential standard advocated by ICANN in these proceedings. Rather, as explained below, the IRP Panel is charged with “objectively” determining whether or not the Board's actions are in fact consistent with the Articles, Bylaws and Guidebook, which the Panel understands as requiring that the Board's conduct be appraised independently, and without any presumption of correctness.

112. In the only other IRP of which the Panel is aware in which such questions were addressed in a published decision, the distinguished members of the IRP panel had this to say about the role of an IRP panel, and the applicable standard of review, in appraising Board action:

The Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers is a not-for profit corporation established under the law of the State of California. That law embodies the 'business judgment rule'. Section 309 of the California Corporations Code provides that a director must act 'in good faith, in a manner such director believes to be in the best interests of the corporation and its shareholders...' and shields from liability directors who follow its provisions. However ICANN is no ordinary non-profit California corporation. The Government of the United States vested regulatory authority of vast dimension and pervasive global reach in ICANN. In 'recognition of the fact that the Internet is an international network of networks, owned by no single nation, individual or organization' – including ICANN -- ICANN is charged with 'promoting the global public interest in the operational stability of the Internet...' ICANN 'shall operate for the benefit of the Internet community as a whole, carrying out its activities in conformity with relevant principles of international law and applicable international conventions and local law...' Thus, while a California corporation, it is governed particularly by the terms of its Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws, as the law of California allows. Those Articles and Bylaws, which require ICANN to carry out its activities in conformity with relevant principles of international law, do not specify or imply that the International [sic] Review Process provided for shall (or shall not) accord deference to the decisions of the ICANN Board. The fact that the Board is empowered to exercise its judgment in the application of ICANN's sometimes competing core values does not necessarily import that that judgment must be treated deferentially by the IRP. In the view of the Panel, the judgments of the ICANN Board are to be reviewed and appraised by the Panel objectively, not deferentially. The business judgment rule of the law of California, applicable to directors of California corporations, profit and nonprofit, in the case of ICANN is to be treated as a default rule that might be called upon in the absence of relevant provisions of ICANN's Articles and Bylaws and of specific representations of ICANN ... that bear on the propriety of its conduct. In the instant case, it is those Articles and Bylaws, and those representations, measured against the facts as the Panel finds them, which are determinative.<sup>98</sup>

[Underlining added.]

113. While on no way bound by that decision, we agree with its conclusions in this respect.
114. At the end of the day we fail to see any significant difference between the parties' positions in this regard. The process is clear, and both parties acknowledge, that the Panel is tasked with determining whether or not the Board's actions are consistent with ICANN's Articles of Incorporation, Bylaws and the Guidebook. Such a determination calls for what the panel in the ICM Registry matter called an “objective” appraisal of Board conduct as measured against the policies and rules set out in those instruments; all agree that it is the Articles, Bylaws and Guidebook which are determinative.

115. That being said, we also agree with ICANN to the extent that, in determining the consistency of Board action with the Articles, Bylaws and Guidebook, an “IRP Panel is neither asked to, nor allowed to, substitute its judgment for that of the Board.” In other words, it is not for the Panel to opine on whether the Board could have acted differently than it did; rather, our role is to assess whether the Board’s action was consistent with applicable rules found in the Articles, Bylaws and Guidebook. Nor, as stated, is it for us to purport to appraise the policies and procedures established by ICANN in the Guidebook (since, again, this IRP is not a challenge to those policies and procedures themselves<sup>99</sup>), but merely to apply them to the facts.
116. With the foregoing firmly in mind, the Panel turns now to the issues to be determined in order to resolve the present dispute.

B. The String Similarity Review Process

117. The Panel is not unsympathetic to Booking.com’s complaints regarding the string similarity review process as established by the Guidebook. There is no question but that that process lacks certain elements of transparency and certain practices that are widely associated with requirements of fairness. For example, the Guidebook provides no means for applicants to provide evidence or make submissions to the SSP (or any other ICANN body) and so be fully “heard” on the substantive question of the similarity of their applied-for gTLD strings to others.
118. Indeed, as stated at the outset of this Declaration, these observations and the concerns that they engender were voiced by several members of the ICANN Board’s New gTLD Program Committee which voted to accept the BGC’s Recommendation to deny Booking.com’s Request for Reconsideration. The Panel can do no better than reproduce the statements made by the NGPC members in this respect, as recorded in the minutes of the NGPC’s 10 September 2013 meeting.<sup>100</sup>

<sup>99</sup> As discussed in more detail in the following section (at para. 117 and following) and again at Part IV of this Declaration, the important questions that Booking.com highlights in its pleadings, as to whether the string similarity review process is consistent with ICANN’s guiding principles of transparency and fairness, and regarding the published views of various members of ICANN’s NGPC in this respect, are matters which the ICANN Board, in its discretion, may wish to consider on its own motion in the context of the present case, in accordance with its authority under Section 5.1 (Module 5-4) of the Guidebook, or when it issues the Guidebook for round two of the New gTLD Program. Those questions include a lack of clarity surrounding the way in which the string similarity review is conducted by the SSP, and the absence of any means for applicants to be heard in the string similarity review process where they may have evidence to adduce or arguments to make (such as the evidence and arguments presented by Booking.com to this Panel), which could in fact be relevant to the SSP’s determination.

- Mr. George Sadowski stated his intention to abstain from the vote because, although “he understood that the BGC did the right thing, [he] thought the end result that was contrary to ICANN’s ... and the user’s best interests.”
  - Ms. Olga Madruga-Forti also stated her intention to abstain from voting on the BGC recommendation “because there was not sufficient rationale provided for why the string similarity review panel made its determination.”
  - In response to a comment by the Chair that the Request for Reconsideration deserved to be denied “[b]ecause the process was followed,” Mr. Ray Plzak “agreed that the process was followed, but noted that the process needs to be reviewed to potentially add a mechanism that would allow persons who don’t agree with the outcome to make an objection, other than using a Reconsideration Request.”
  - Mr. Plzak “recommended the Committee send a strong signal to the BGC, or adopt a resolution recommending that the BGC consider development of a different mechanism to provide an avenue for the community to appeal the outcome of a decision based on the merits.”
  - Ms. Madruga-Forti agreed and “recommended that in the future, a remand or appeals mechanism may help alleviate the concerns noted.”
  - Mr. Bill Graham also agreed with Mr. Plzak’s suggestion, and noted that “generally, there is a considerable level of discomfort and dissatisfaction with the process as expressed by Committee members.”
  - The Chair “agreed with [Mr. Graham’s] sentiment.”
  - The General Counsel and Secretary noted that ICANN ... “has tried to encourage more use of the ombudsman, or other accountability mechanisms for these types of concerns.”
119. Ultimately, five members of the NGPC voted in favour of the resolution accepting the BGC’s Recommendation; two members were unavailable to vote; and four members abstained. The abstaining members offered the following voting statements:
- Mr. Plzak stated that he abstained from voting “because he is disappointed in what is being done to remedy the situation. [He] would like to see more resolve to fix the process.”
  - Ms. Madruga-Forti stated that:

[T]he BGC has done an appropriate job of applying a limited review standard to the application for reconsideration, but unfortunately, in this circumstance, to apply that limited review accompanied by a lack of information regarding the rationale of the string similarity review panel is not possible in a logical and fair manner. The public interest would not be served by applying the limited review standard without proper information on the basis and reasoning for the decision of the panel. In my opinion, the public interest would be better served by abstaining and continuing to explore ways to establish a better record of the rationale of the string similarity review panel in circumstances such as this.

- Mr. Kuo-Wei Wu agreed with Ms. Madruga-Forti's and Mr. Plzak's voting statements.
- Mr. Sadowsky provided the following detailed statement:

I have a strong concern regarding the ratification of the BGC recommendation to deny the reconsideration request regarding string contention between .hoteis and .hotels, and I therefore have therefore abstained when the vote on this issue was taken.

The reconsideration process is a very narrowly focused instrument, relying solely upon investigating deviations from established and agreed upon process. As such, it can be useful, but it is limited in scope. In particular, it does not address situations where process has in fact been followed, but the results of such process have been regarded, sometimes quite widely, as being contrary to what might be best for significant or all segments of the ... community and/or Internet users in general.

The rationale underlying the rejection of the reconsideration claim is essentially that the string similarity process found that there was likely to be substantial confusion between the two, and that therefore they belonged in a contention set. Furthermore, no process has been identified as having been violated and therefore there is nothing to reconsider. As a Board member who is aware of ICANN's ... Bylaws, I cannot vote against the motion to deny reconsideration. The motion appears to be correct based upon the criteria in the Bylaws that define the reconsideration process and the facts in this particular case. However, I am increasingly disturbed by the growing sequence of decisions that are based upon a criterion for user confusion that, in my opinion, is not only both incomplete and flawed, but appears to work directly against the concept that users should not be confused. I am persuaded by the argument made by the proponents of reconsideration in this case that users will in fact not be confused by .hoteis and .hotels, since if they enter the wrong name, they are very likely to be immediately confronted by information in a language that they did not anticipate.

Confusion is a perceptual issue. String similarity is only one consideration in thinking about perceptual confusion and in fact it is not always an issue. In my opinion, much more perceptual confusion will arise between .hotel and .hotels than between .hotels and .hoteis. Yet if we adhere strictly to the Guidebook and whatever instructions have or have not been given to string similarity experts, it is my position that we work against implementing decisions that assist in avoiding user confusion, and we work in favor of decisions that are based upon an incorrect, incomplete and flawed ex ante analysis of the ICANN Network real issues with respect to user confusion.

The goal of the string similarity process is the minimization of user confusion and ensuring user trust in using the DNS ... The string similarity exercise is one of the means in the new gTLD ... process to minimize such confusion and to strengthen user trust. In placing our emphasis, and in fact our decisions, on string similarity only, we are unwittingly substituting the means for the goal, and making decisions regarding the goal on the basis of a means test. This is a disservice to the Internet user community.

I cannot and will not vote in favor of a motion that reflects, directly or indirectly, an unwillingness to depart from what I see as such a flawed position and which does not reflect in my opinion an understanding of the current reality of the situation.

120. These statements reflect to an important degree the Panel's own analysis.
121. The elements of the string similarity review process were established and widely published several years ago, after extensive consultation and debate among ICANN stakeholders and the Internet community. Booking.com correctly describes the process established (or "crystallized") in the Guidebook as a component of "a consensus policy" concerning the introduction of new gTLDs.<sup>101</sup>
122. The Guidebook makes clear that, as part of the initial evaluation to which all applied-for gTLDs are subject, each string would be reviewed for a number of factors, one of which is "string similarity", which involves a determination of "whether the applied-for gTLD string is so similar to other strings that it would create a probability of user confusion"<sup>102</sup>. The term "user" is elaborated elsewhere in the Guidebook, which speaks of confusion arising "in the mind of the average, reasonable Internet user."<sup>103</sup>
123. The Guidebook explains that string similarity review comprises merely a "visual similarity check",<sup>104</sup> with a view to identifying only "visual string similarities that would create a probability of user confusion."<sup>105</sup>
124. The Guidebook makes clear that string similarity reviews would be conducted by an independent third party – the SSP – that would have wide (though not complete) discretion both in formulating its methodology and in determining string similarity on the basis of that methodology.
125. Section 2.2.1.1.2 of the Guidebook, titled "Review Methodology", provides that the SSP "is informed in part by an algorithmic score for ... visual similarity," which "will provide one objective measure for consideration by the [SSP]." Section 2.2.1.1.2 further states that, in addition to "examin[ing] all the algorithm data," the SSP will "perform its own review of similarities between strings and whether they rise to the level of string confusion." It is noted that the objective algorithmic score is to be treated as "only indicative". Crucially, "the final determination of similarity is entirely up to the [SSP's] judgment." (Underlining added)
126. In sum, the Guidebook calls for the SSP to determine whether two strings are so "visually similar" as to create a "probability of confusion" in the mind of an "average, reasonable Internet user." In making this determination, the SSP is informed by an "algorithmic score", to ensure that the process comprises at least one "objective measure". However, the algorithmic score is not determinative. The SSP also develops and performs "its own review". At the end of the day, the determination is entirely a matter of "the [SSP's] judgment."

127. By its very nature this process is highly discretionary. It is also, to an important degree, subjective. The Guidebook provides no definition of “visual similarity”, nor any indication of how such similarity is to be objectively measured other than by means of the SWORD algorithm. The Guidebook provides no definition of “confusion,” nor any definition or description of an “average, reasonable Internet user.” As Mr. Sadowski of the NGPC put it: “Confusion is a perceptual issue.” (Mr. Sadowski further noted: “String similarity is only one consideration in thinking about perceptual confusion, and in fact it is not always an issue.) The Guidebook mandates the SSP to develop and apply “its own review” of visual similarity and “whether similarities rise to the level of user confusion”, in addition to SWORD algorithm, which is intended to be merely “indicative”, yet provides no substantive guidelines in this respect.
128. Nor does the process as it exists provide for gTLD applicants to benefit from the sort of procedural mechanisms – for example, to inform the SSP’s review, to receive reasoned determinations from the SSP, or to appeal the merits of those determinations – which Booking.com claims are required under the applicable rules. Clearly, certain ICANN NGPC members themselves consider that such input would be desirable and that changes to the process are required in order for the string similarity review process to attain its true goal, which Mr. Sadowski referred to as “the minimization of user confusion and ensuring user trust in using the DNS”. However, as even the abstaining members of the NGPC conceded, the fact is that the sort of mechanisms that Booking.com asserts are required (and which those NGPC members believe should be required) are simply not part of the string similarity review process as currently established. As to whether they should be, it is not our place to express an opinion, though we note that such additional mechanisms surely would be consistent with the principles of transparency and fairness.
129. We add that we agree with ICANN that the time has long since passed for Booking.com or any other interested party to ask an IRP panel to review the actions of the ICANN Board in relation to the establishment of the string similarity review process, including Booking.com’s claims that specific elements of the process and the Board decisions to implement those elements are inconsistent with ICANN’s Articles and Bylaws. Any such claims, even if they had any merit, are long since time-barred by the 30-day limitation period set out in Article IV, Section 3(3) of the Bylaws. As ICANN expressed during the hearing, if Booking.com believed that there were problems with the Guidebook, it should have objected at the time the Guidebook was first implemented.
130. When asked during the hearing about its failure to object timely, Booking.com argued that it could not have known how the Board’s actions – that is, how the process established in the Guidebook – would affect it prior to the submission of its application for .hotels. However, that is not a persuasive or meritorious answer. As did all stakeholders, Booking.com had the opportunity to challenge the Board’s adoption of the Guidebook, at the time, if it considered any of its elements to be inconsistent with ICANN’s Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws.

C. The Case of .hotels

131. In the light of the preceding analysis of Booking.com’s challenge concerning the ICANN Board’s actions in relation to the string similarity review process generally, the Panel is not persuaded by its challenge concerning the Board's conduct in relation to the review of .hotels specifically.

132. There are two principal elements to this part of Booking.com's case: a challenge in relation to the process followed by the SSP; and a challenge in relation to the Board's handling of Booking.com's Request for Reconsideration of the SSP's determination. However, the fundamental obstacle to Booking.com's case is that the established process was followed in all respects.
133. Booking.com itself acknowledges that "the process was followed" by the SSP, which determined that .hotels and .hoteis were so visually similar as to warrant being placed in a contention set. So too did all of the NGPC members who commented on the matter recognize that "the process was followed" – for all their stated misgivings concerning the outcome of the process.
134. The same is true of the Request for Reconsideration. The Panel is struck by the extent and thoughtfulness not only of the NGPC's consideration of the issue, certain aspects of which are discussed above, but of the BGC's detailed analysis and its Recommendation to the NGPC, on the basis of which Booking.com's Request for Reconsideration was denied. Contrary to Booking.com's allegations, in neither instance was this merely a blind acceptance of a decision of a subordinate body. In fact, the reconsideration process itself, however limited and perhaps imperfect it may be, is inconsistent with Booking.com's claims of lack of "due process".
135. Although not addressed in great detail by the parties, the Panel considers several observations made by the BGC in its 1 August 2013 Recommendation to be particularly apposite:
  - These standing requirements [for Requests for Reconsideration] are intended to protect the reconsideration process from abuse and to ensure that it is not used as a mechanism simply to challenge an action with which someone disagrees, but that it is limited to situations where the staff [for the Board] acted in contravention of established policies.<sup>106</sup>
  - Although the String Similarity Review was performed by a third party, ICANN has determined that the Reconsideration process can properly be invoked for challenges of the third party's decisions where it can be stated that either the vendor failed to follow its process in reaching the decision, or that ICANN staff failed to follow its process in accepting that decision.<sup>107</sup>
  - Booking.com does not suggest that the process for String Similarity Review set out in the Applicant Guidebook was not followed, or that ICANN staff violated any established ICANN policy in accepting the [SSP] decision on placing .hotels and .hoteis in contention sets. Instead, Booking.com is supplanting what it believes the review

<sup>107</sup> BGC Recommendation, p. 4. The BGC explains that "Because the basis for the Request is not Board conduct, regardless of whether the 20 December 2012 version, or the 11 April 2013 version, of the Reconsideration Bylaws is operative, the BGC's analysis and recommendation below would not change."

methodology for assessing visual similarity should have been, as opposed to the methodology set out at Section 2.2.1.1.2 of the Applicant Guidebook. In asserting a new review methodology, Booking.com is asking the BGC (and the Board through the New gTLD Program Committee (NGPC)) to make a substantive evaluation of the confusability of the strings and to reverse the decision. In the context of the New gTLD Program, the Reconsideration process is not however intended for the Board to perform a substantive review of [SSP] decisions. While Booking.com may have multiple reasons as to why it believes that its application for .hotels should not be in contention set with .hoteis, Reconsideration is not available as a mechanism to re-try the decisions of the evaluation panels.<sup>108</sup>

▪ Booking.com also claims that its assertions regarding the non-confusability of the .hotels and .hoteis strings demonstrate that “it is contrary to ICANN policy to put them in a contention set.” (Request, pages 6-7.) This is just a differently worded attempt to reverse the decision of the [SSP]. No actual policy or process is cited by Booking.com, only the suggestion that – according to Booking.com – the standards within the Applicant Guidebook on visual similarity should have resulted in a different outcome for the .hotels string. This is not enough for Reconsideration.<sup>109</sup>

▪ Booking.com argues that the contention set decision was taken without material information, including Booking.com’s linguistic expert’s opinion, or other “information that would refute the mistaken contention that there is likely to be consumer confusion between ‘.hotels’ and ‘.hoteis.’” (Request, page 7.) However, there is no process point in the String Similarity Review for applicants to submit additional information. This is in stark contrast to the reviews set out in Section 2.2.2 of the Applicant Guidebook, including the Technical/Operational review and the Financial Review, which allow for the evaluators to seek clarification or additional information through the issuance of clarifying questions. (AGB, Section 2.2.2.3 (Evaluation Methodology).)<sup>110</sup>

▪ Just as the process does not call for additional applicant inputs into the visual similarity review, Booking.com’s call for further information on the decision to place .hotels and .hoteis in a contention set ... is similarly not rooted in any established ICANN process at issue.[...] While applicants may avail themselves of accountability mechanism to challenge decisions, the use of an accountability mechanism when there is no proper ground to bring a request for review under the selected mechanism does not then provide opportunity for additional substantive review of decisions already taken.<sup>111</sup>

▪ [W]hile we understand the impact that Booking.com faces by being put in a contention set, and that it wishes for more narrative information regarding the [SSP’s] decision, no such narrative is called for in the process.<sup>112</sup>

▪ The Applicant Guidebook sets out the methodology used when evaluating visual similarity of strings. The process documentation provided by the String Similarity Review Panel describes the steps followed by the [SSP] in applying the methodology

set out in the Applicant Guidebook. ICANN then coordinates a quality assurance review over a random selection of [SSP's] reviews to gain confidence that the methodology and process were followed. That is the process used for a making and assessing a determination of visual similarity. Booking.com's disagreement as to whether the methodology should have resulted in a finding of visual similarity does not mean that ICANN (including the third party vendors performing String Similarity Review) violated any policy in reaching the decision (nor does it support a conclusion that the decision was actually wrong).<sup>113</sup>

▪ The [SSP] reviewed all applied for strings according to the standards and methodology of the visual string similarity review set out in the Applicant Guidebook. The Guidebook clarifies that once contention sets are formed by the [SSP], ICANN will notify the applicants and will publish results on its website. (AGB, Section 2.2.1.1.1.) That the [SSP] considered its output as "advice" to ICANN (as stated in its process documentation) is not the end of the story. Whether the results are transmitted as "advice" or "outcomes" or "reports", the important query is what ICANN was expected to do with that advice once it was received. ICANN had always made clear that it would rely on the advice of its evaluators in the initial evaluation stage of the New gTLD Program, subject to quality assurance measures. Therefore, Booking.com is actually proposing a new and different process when it suggests that ICANN should perform substantive review (instead of process testing) over the results of the String Similarity Review Panel's outcomes prior to the finalization of contention sets.<sup>114</sup>

▪ As there is no indication that either the [SSP] or ICANN staff violated any established ICANN policy in reaching or accepting the decision on the placement of .hotels and .hoteis in a non-exact contention set, this Request should not proceed.<sup>115</sup>

136. These excerpts of the BGC Recommendation not only illustrate the seriousness with which Booking.com's Request for Reconsideration was heard, they mirror considerations to which we fully subscribe and which we find apply as well, with equal force and effect, in the context of Booking.com's IRP Request.
137. It simply cannot be said – indeed, it is not even alleged by Booking.com – that the established process was not followed by the ICANN Board or any third party either in the initial string similarity review of .hotels or in the reconsideration process.
138. Booking.com was asked at the hearing to identify with particularity the ICANN Board's actions (including inactions) in this case that it claims are inconsistent with ICANN's Articles of Incorporation, Bylaws or the Guidebook and regarding which it asks the Panel to render a declaration. It identified four:
- The Board's adoption of certain provisions of the Guidebook, including the allegedly ill-defined, unfair and non-transparent procedures for selecting the SSP and supervising the SSP's performance of the string similarity review process. As discussed, any claims in this regard are time-barred.

- The Board’s acceptance of the SSP determination. As ICANN argues, there was no action (or inaction) by the Board here, no decision made (or not made) by the Board or any other body to accept the SSP’s determination. The Guidebook provides that applied-for strings “will be placed in contention set” where the SSP determines the existence of visual similarity likely to give rise to user confusion. Simply put, under the Guidebook the Board is neither required nor entitled to intervene at this stage to accept or not accept the SSP’s determination. Booking.com is correct that the Board could nevertheless have stepped in and reversed the SSP determination under Section 5.1 (Module 5-4) of the Guidebook, but did not do so; that inaction is addressed below.
  - The Board’s denial of Booking.com’s Request for Reconsideration. As discussed above, there is nothing in the evidence that even remotely suggests that ICANN’s conduct in this regard was inconsistent with its Articles, Bylaws or the Guidebook. On the contrary, we have already stated that the detailed analysis performed by the BGC and the extensive consideration of the BGC Recommendation by the NGCP undermine any claim that ICANN failed to exercise due care and independent judgment, or that its handling of the Request for Reconsideration was inconsistent with applicable rules or policy. As discussed above, just as in the present IRP, the question in the reconsideration process is whether the established process was followed. This was the question that the BGC and NGPC asked themselves in considering Booking.com’s Request for Reconsideration, and which they properly answered in the affirmative in denying Booking.com’s request.
  - The Board’s refusal to “step in” and exercise its authority under Section 5.1 (Module 5-4) of the Guidebook to “individually consider an application for a new gTLD to determine whether approval would be in the best interest of the Internet community.” As pointed out by ICANN during the hearing, the fact that the ICANN Board enjoys such discretion and may choose to exercise it any time does not mean that it is bound to exercise it, let alone at the time and in the manner demanded by Booking.com. In any case, the Panel does not believe that the Board’s inaction in this respect was inconsistent with ICANN’s Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws or indeed with ICANN’s guiding principles of transparency and fairness, given (1) Booking.com’s concession that the string similarity review process was followed; (2) the indisputable conclusion that any challenge to the adoption of the SSP process itself is time-barred; (3) the manifestly thoughtful consideration given to Booking.com’s Request for Reconsideration by the BGC; and (4), the fact that, notwithstanding its protestations to the contrary, Booking.com’s real dispute seems to be with the process itself rather than how the process was applied in this case (given that, as noted, Booking.com concedes that the process was indeed followed).
139. The Panel further considers that these – in addition to any and all other potential (and allegedly reviewable) actions identified by Booking.com during the course of these proceedings – fail on the basis of Booking.com’s dual acknowledgement that it does not challenge the validity or fairness of the string similarity review process, and that that process was duly followed in this case.

140. Finally, the panel notes that Booking.com’s claim – largely muted during the hearing – regarding alleged “discrimination” as regards the treatment of its application for .hotels also founders on the same ground. Booking.com acknowledges that the established string similarity review process was followed; and there is absolutely no evidence whatsoever that .hotels was treated any differently than any other applied-for gTLD string in this respect. The mere fact that the result of the string similarity review of .hotels differed from the results of the reviews of the vast majority of other applied-for strings does not suggest discriminatory treatment. In any event, the Panel cannot but note the obvious, which is that .hotels is not alone in having been placed in contention by the SSP. So too was .hoteis; and so too were .unicom and .unicorn. Moreover, and once again, it is recalled that Booking.com does not claim to challenge the merits of the string similarity review, that is, the determination that .hotels and .hoteis are so visually similar as to warrant placement in a contention set.

D. Conclusion

141. In launching this IRP, Booking.com no doubt realized that it faced an uphill battle. The very limited nature of IRP proceedings is such that any IRP applicant will face significant obstacles in establishing that the ICANN Board acted inconsistently with ICANN’s Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws. In fact, Booking.com acknowledges those obstacles, albeit inconsistently and at times indirectly.
142. Booking.com purports to challenge “the way in which the [string similarity review] process was established, implemented and supervised by (or under the authority of) the ICANN Board”; yet it also claims that it does not challenge the validity or fairness of the string similarity review process as set out in the Guidebook. It asks the Panel to overturn the SSP’s determination in this case and to substitute an alternate result, in part on the basis of its own “expert evidence” regarding similarity and the probability of user confusion as between .hotels and .hoteis; yet it claims that it does not challenge the merits of the SSP determination and it acknowledges that the process set out in the Guidebook was duly followed in the case of its application for .hotels.
143. In sum, Booking.com has failed to overcome the very obstacles that it recognizes exist.
144. The Panel finds that Booking.com has failed to identify any instance of Board action or inaction, including any action or inaction of ICANN staff or a third party (such as ICC, acting as the SSP), that could be considered to be inconsistent with ICANN’s Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws or with the policies and procedures established in the Guidebook. This includes the challenged actions of the Board (or any staff or third party) in relation to what Booking.com calls the implementation and supervision of the string similarity review process generally, as well as the challenged actions of the Board (or any staff or third party) in relation to the string similarity review of .hotels in particular.
145. More particularly, the Panel finds that the string similarity review performed in the case of .hotels was not inconsistent with the Articles or Bylaws or with what Booking.com refers to as the “applicable rules” as set out in the Guidebook.
146. To the extent that the Board’s adoption and implementation of specific elements of the new gTLD Program and Guidebook, including the string similarity review process, could potentially be said to be inconsistent with the principles of transparency or fairness that underlie ICANN's Articles and Incorporation and Bylaws (which the Panel does not say is the case), the time to challenge such action has long since passed.

147. Booking.com's IRP Request must be denied.

VII. THE PREVAILING PARTY; COSTS

148. Article IV, Section 3(18) of the Bylaws requires that the Panel "specifically designate the prevailing party." This designation is germane to the allocation of costs, given that Article IV, Section 3(18) provides that the "party not prevailing shall ordinarily be responsible for bearing all costs of the IRP Provider."
149. The same provision of the Bylaws also states that "in an extraordinary case the IRP Panel may in its declaration allocate up to half of the costs of the IRP Provider to the prevailing party based upon the circumstances, including a consideration of the reasonableness of the parties' positions and their contribution to the public interest. Each party to the IRP proceedings shall bear its own expenses."
150. Similarly, the Supplementary Procedures state, at Article 11:

The IRP PANEL shall fix costs in its DECLARATION. The party not prevailing in an IRP shall ordinarily be responsible for bearing all costs of the proceedings, but under extraordinary circumstances the IRP PANEL may allocate up to half of the costs to the prevailing party, taking into account the circumstances of the case, including the reasonableness of the parties' positions and their contribution to the public interest.

In the event the Requestor has not availed itself, in good faith, of the cooperative engagement or conciliation process, and the requestor is not successful in the Independent Review, the IRP PANEL must award ICANN all reasonable fees and costs incurred by ICANN in the IRP, including legal fees.

151. The "IRP Provider" is the ICDR, and, in accordance with the ICDR Rules, the costs to be allocated between the parties – what the Bylaws call the "costs of the IRP Provider", and the Supplementary Procedures call the "costs of the proceedings" – include the fees and expenses of the Panel members and of the ICDR (we refer to all of these costs as "IRP costs").
152. ICANN is undoubtedly the prevailing party in this case. That being said, the Panel considers that the nature and significance of the issues raised by Booking.com, and the contribution to the "public interest" of its submissions, are such that it is appropriate and reasonable that the IRP costs be shared equally by the parties. We consider that the extraordinary circumstances of case – in which some members of ICANN's New gTLD Program Committee have publicly declared that, in their view, the rules on the basis of which Booking.com's claims fail should be reconsidered by ICANN – warrants such a holding.
153. The Panel cannot grant Booking.com the relief that it seeks. A panel such as ours can only declare whether, on the facts as we find them, the challenged actions of ICANN are or are not inconsistent with ICANN's Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws. We have found that the actions in question are not inconsistent with those instruments. The process established by ICANN under its Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws and set out in the Guidebook was followed, and the time to challenge that process (which Booking.com asserts is not its intention in these proceedings in any event) has long passed.

154. However, we can – and we do – acknowledge certain legitimate concerns regarding the string similarity review process raised by Booking.com, discussed above, which are evidently shared by a number of prominent and experienced ICANN NGPC members. And we can, and do, encourage ICANN to consider whether it wishes to address these issues in an appropriate manner and forum, for example, when drafting the Guidebook for round two of the New gTLD Program or, more immediately, in the exercise of its authority under Section 5.1 (Module 5-4) of the Guidebook (which it may choose to exercise at any time, in its discretion) to consider whether, notwithstanding the result of the string similarity review of .hotels and .hoteis, approval of both of Booking.com's and Despegar's proposed strings would be in the best interest of the Internet community.

FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS, the Panel hereby declares:

- (1) Booking.com's IRP Request is denied;
- (2) ICANN is the prevailing party;
- (3) In view of the circumstances, each party shall bear one-half of the costs of the IRP Provider, including the fees and expenses of the Panel members and the fees and expenses of the ICDR. As a result, the administrative fees and expenses of the ICDR, totaling US$4,600.00, as well as the compensation and expenses of the Panelists totaling US$163,010.05 are to be borne equally. Therefore, ICANN shall pay to Booking.com the amount of US$2,300.00 representing that portion of said fees and expenses in excess of the apportioned costs previously incurred by Booking.com
- (4) This Final Declaration may be executed in any number of counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original, and all of which together shall constitute the Final Declaration of this IRP Panel.

CORPORATIONS CODE

SECTION 5210-5215

5210. Each corporation shall have a board of directors. Subject to the provisions of this part and any limitations in the articles or bylaws relating to action required to be approved by the members (Section 5034), or by a majority of all members (Section 5033), the activities and affairs of a corporation shall be conducted and all corporate powers shall be exercised by or under the direction of the board. The board may delegate the management of the activities of the corporation to any person or persons, management company, or committee however composed, provided that the activities and affairs of the corporation shall be managed and all corporate powers shall be exercised under the ultimate direction of the board.

5211. (a) Unless otherwise provided in the articles or in the bylaws, all of the following apply:

(1) Meetings of the board may be called by the chair of the board or the president or any vice president or the secretary or any two directors.

(2) Regular meetings of the board may be held without notice if the time and place of the meetings are fixed by the bylaws or the board. Special meetings of the board shall be held upon four days' notice by first-class mail or 48 hours' notice delivered personally or by telephone, including a voice messaging system or by electronic transmission by the corporation (Section 20). The articles or bylaws may not dispense with notice of a special meeting. A notice, or waiver of notice, need not specify the purpose of any regular or special meeting of the board.

(3) Notice of a meeting need not be given to a director who provides a waiver of notice or consent to holding the meeting or an approval of the minutes thereof in writing, whether before or after the meeting, or who attends the meeting without protesting, prior thereto or at its commencement, the lack of notice to that director. These waivers, consents and approvals shall be filed with the corporate records or made a part of the minutes of the meetings.

(4) A majority of the directors present, whether or not a quorum is present, may adjourn any meeting to another time and place. If the meeting is adjourned for more than 24 hours, notice of an adjournment to another time or place shall be given prior to the time of the adjourned meeting to the directors who were not present at the time of the adjournment.

(5) Meetings of the board may be held at a place within or without the state that has been designated in the notice of the meeting or, if not stated in the notice or there is no notice, designated in the bylaws or by resolution of the board.

(6) Directors may participate in a meeting through use of conference telephone, electronic video screen communication or electronic transmission by and to the corporation (Sections 20 and 21). Participation in a meeting through use of conference telephone or electronic video screen communication pursuant to this subdivision constitutes presence in person at that meeting as long as all directors participating in the meeting are able to hear one another. Participation in a meeting through use of electronic transmission by and to the corporation, other than conference telephone and electronic video screen communication, pursuant to this subdivision constitutes presence in person at that meeting if both of the following apply:

(A) Each director participating in the meeting can communicate with all of the other directors concurrently.

(B) Each director is provided the means of participating in all matters before the board, including, without limitation, the capacity to propose, or to interpose an objection to, a specific action to be taken by the corporation.

(7) A majority of the number of directors authorized in or pursuant to the articles or bylaws constitutes a quorum of the board for the transaction of business. The articles or bylaws may require the presence of one or more specified directors in order to constitute a quorum of the board to transact business, as long as the death or nonexistence of a specified director or the death or nonexistence of the person or persons otherwise authorized to appoint or designate that director does not prevent the corporation from transacting business in the normal course of events. The articles or bylaws may not provide that a quorum shall be less than one-fifth the number of directors authorized in or pursuant to the articles or bylaws, or less than two, whichever is larger, unless the number of directors authorized in or pursuant to the articles or bylaws is one, in which case one director constitutes a quorum.

(8) Subject to the provisions of Sections 5212, 5233, 5234, 5235, and subdivision (e) of Section 5238, an act or decision done or made by a majority of the directors present at a meeting duly held at which a quorum is present is the act of the board. The articles or bylaws may not provide that a lesser vote than a majority of the directors present at a meeting is the act of the board. A meeting at which a quorum is initially present may continue to transact business notwithstanding the withdrawal of directors, if any action taken is approved by at least a majority of the required quorum for that meeting, or a greater number required by this division, the articles or the bylaws.

(b) An action required or permitted to be taken by the board may be taken without a meeting if all directors individually or collectively consent in writing to that action and if, subject to subdivision (a) of Section 5224, the number of directors then in office constitutes a quorum. The written consent or consents shall be filed with the minutes of the proceedings of the board. The action by written consent shall have the same force and effect as a unanimous vote of the directors. For purposes of this subdivision only, "all directors" does not include an "interested director" as defined in subdivision (a) of Section 5233 or a "common director" as described in subdivision (b) of Section 5234 who abstains in writing from providing consent, where (1) the facts described in paragraph (2) or (3) of subdivision (d) of Section 5233 are established or the provisions of paragraph (1) or (2) of subdivision (a) of Section 5234 are satisfied, as appropriate, at or prior to execution of the written consent or consents; (2) the establishment of those facts or satisfaction of those provisions, as applicable, is included in the written consent or consents executed by the noninterested or noncommon directors or in other records of the corporation; and (3) the noninterested or noncommon directors, as applicable, approve the action by a vote that is sufficient without counting the votes of the interested directors or common directors.

(c) Each director shall have one vote on each matter presented to the board of directors for action. No director may vote by proxy.

(d) The provisions of this section apply also to incorporators, to committees of the board, and to action by those incorporators or committees mutatis mutandis.

5212. (a) The board may, by resolution adopted by a majority of the number of directors then in office, provided that a quorum is present, create one or more committees, each consisting of two or more directors, to serve at the pleasure of the board. Appointments to such committees shall be by a majority vote of the directors then in office, unless the articles or bylaws require a majority vote of the number of directors authorized in or pursuant to the articles or bylaws. The bylaws may authorize one or more such committees, each consisting of two or more directors, and may provide that a specified officer or officers who are also directors of the corporation shall be a member or members of such committee or committees. The board may appoint one or more directors as alternate members of such committee, who may replace any absent member at any meeting of the committee. Such committee, to the extent provided in the resolution of the board or in the bylaws, shall have all the authority of the board, except with respect to:

(1) The approval of any action for which this part also requires approval of the members (Section 5034) or approval of a majority of all members (Section 5033), regardless of whether the corporation has members.

(2) The filling of vacancies on the board or in any committee which has the authority of the board.

(3) The fixing of compensation of the directors for serving on the board or on any committee.

(4) The amendment or repeal of bylaws or the adoption of new bylaws.

(5) The amendment or repeal of any resolution of the board which by its express terms is not so amendable or repealable.

(6) The appointment of committees of the board or the members thereof.

(7) The expenditure of corporate funds to support a nominee for director after there are more people nominated for director than can be elected.

(8) The approval of any self-dealing transaction except as provided in paragraph (3) of subdivision (d) of Section 5233.

(b) A committee exercising the authority of the board shall not include as members persons who are not directors. However, the board may create other committees that do not exercise the authority of the board and these other committees may include persons regardless of whether they are directors.

(c) Unless the bylaws otherwise provide, the board may delegate to any committee powers as authorized by Section 5210, but may not delegate the powers set forth in paragraphs (1) to (8), inclusive, of subdivision (a).

(d) If required by subdivision (e) of Section 12586 of the Government Code, the board shall appoint an audit committee in accordance with that subdivision and for the purposes set forth therein.

5213. (a) A corporation shall have a chair of the board, who may be given the title chair of the board, chairperson of the board, chairman of the board, or chairwoman of the board, or a president or both, a secretary, a treasurer or a chief financial officer or both, and any other officers with any titles and duties as shall be stated in the bylaws or determined by the board and as may be necessary to enable it to sign instruments. The president, or if there is no president the chair of the board, is the general manager and chief executive officer of the corporation, unless otherwise provided in the articles or bylaws. Unless otherwise specified in the articles or the bylaws, if there is no chief financial officer, the treasurer is the chief financial officer of the corporation. Any number of offices may be held by the same person unless the articles or bylaws provide otherwise, except that no person serving as the secretary, the treasurer, or the chief financial officer may serve concurrently as the president or chair of the board. Any compensation of the president or chief executive officer and the chief financial officer or treasurer shall be determined in accordance with subdivision (g) of Section 12586 of the Government Code, if applicable.

(b) Except as otherwise provided by the articles or bylaws, officers shall be chosen by the board and serve at the pleasure of the board, subject to the rights, if any, of an officer under any contract of employment. Any officer may resign at any time upon written notice to the corporation without prejudice to the rights, if any, of the corporation under any contract to which the officer is a party.

(c) If the articles or bylaws provide for the election of any officers by the members, the term of office of the elected officer shall be one year unless the articles or bylaws provide for a different term which shall not exceed three years.

5214. Subject to the provisions of subdivision (a) of Section 5141 and Section 5142, any note, mortgage, evidence of indebtedness, contract, conveyance or other instrument in writing, and any assignment or endorsement thereof, executed or entered into between any corporation and any other person, when signed by any one of the chairman of the board, the president or any vice president and by any one of the secretary, any assistant secretary, the chief financial officer or any assistant treasurer of such corporation, is not invalidated as to the corporation by any lack of authority of the signing officers in the absence of actual knowledge on the part of the other person that the signing officers had no authority to execute the same.

5215. The original or a copy in writing or in any other form capable of being converted into clearly legible tangible form of the bylaws or of the minutes of any incorporators', members', directors', committee or other meeting or of any resolution adopted by the board or a committee thereof, or members, certified to be a true copy by a person purporting to be the secretary or an assistant secretary of the corporation, is prima facie evidence of the adoption of such bylaws or resolution or of the due holding of such meeting and of the matters stated therein.

I. BACKGROUND

- 1) DCA Trust is a non-profit organization established under the laws of the Republic of Mauritius on 15 July 2010 with its registry operation – DCA Registry Services (Kenya) Limited – as its principal place of business in Nairobi, Kenya. DCA Trust was formed with the charitable purpose of, among other things, advancing information technology education in Africa and providing a continental Internet domain name to provide access to internet services for the people of Africa and for the public good.
- 2) In March 2012, DCA Trust applied to ICANN for the delegation of the .AFRICA top-level domain name in its 2012 General Top-Level Domains (“gTLD”) Internet Expansion Program (the “New gTLD Program”), an internet resource available for delegation under that program.
- 3) ICANN is a non-profit corporation established under the laws of the State of California, U.S.A., on 30 September 1998 and headquartered in Marina del Rey, California. According to its Articles of Incorporation, ICANN was established for the benefit of the Internet community as a whole and is tasked with carrying out its activities in conformity with relevant principles of international law, international conventions, and local law.
- 4) On 4 June 2013, the ICANN Board New gTLD Program Committee (“NGPC”) posted a notice that it had decided not to accept DCA Trust’s application.
- 5) On 19 June 2013, DCA Trust filed a request for reconsideration by the ICANN Board Governance Committee (“BGC”), which denied the request on 1 August 2013.
- 6) On 19 August 2013, DCA Trust informed ICANN of its intention to seek relief before an Independent Review Panel under ICANN’s Bylaws. Between August and October 2013, DCA Trust and ICANN participated in a Cooperative Engagement Process (“CEP”) to try and resolve the issues relating to DCA Trust’s application. Despite several meetings, no resolution was reached.
- 7) On 24 October 2013, DCA Trust filed a Notice of Independent Review Process with the ICDR in accordance with Article IV, Section 3, of ICANN’s Bylaws.

II. SUMMARY OF THE PARTIES’ POSITIONS ON THE MERITS

- 8) According to DCA Trust, the central dispute between it and ICANN in the Independent Review Process (“IRP”) invoked by DCA Trust in October 2013 and described in its Amended Notice of Independent Review Process submitted to ICANN on 10 January 2014 arises out of:

“(1) ICANN’s breaches of its Articles of Incorporation, Bylaws, international and local law, and other applicable rules in the administration of applications for the .AFRICA top-level domain name in its 2012 General Top-Level Domains (“gTLD”) Internet Expansion Program (the “New gTLD Program”); and (2) ICANN’s wrongful decision that DCA’s application for .AFRICA should not proceed [...]”<sup>1</sup>

- 9) According to DCA Trust, “ICANN’s administration of the New gTLD Program and its decision on DCA’s application were unfair, discriminatory, and lacked appropriate due diligence and care, in breach of ICANN’s Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws.”<sup>2</sup> DCA Trust also advanced that “ICANN’s violations materially affected DCA’s right to have its application processed in accordance with the rules and procedures laid out by ICANN for the New gTLD Program.”<sup>3</sup>
- 10) In its 10 February 2014 [sic]<sup>4</sup> Response to DCA Trust’s Amended Notice, ICANN submitted that in these proceedings, “DCA challenges the 4 June 2013 decision of the ICANN Board New gTLD Program Committee (“NGPC”), which has delegated authority from the ICANN Board to make decisions regarding the New gTLD. In that decision, the NGPC unanimously accepted advice from ICANN’s Governmental Advisory Committee (“GAC”) that DCA’s application for .AFRICA should not proceed. DCA argues that the NGPC should not have accepted the GAC’s advice. DCA also argues that ICANN’s subsequent decision to reject DCA’s Request for Reconsideration was improper.”<sup>5</sup>
- 11) ICANN argued that the challenged decisions of ICANN’s Board “were well within the Board’s discretion” and the Board “did exactly what it was supposed to do under its Bylaws, its Articles of Incorporation, and the Applicant Guidebook (“Guidebook”) that the Board adopted for implementing the New gTLD Program.”<sup>6</sup>
- 12) Specifically, ICANN also advanced that “ICANN properly investigated and rejected DCA’s assertion that two of ICANN’s Board members had conflicts of interest with regard to the .AFRICA applications, [...] numerous African countries issued “warnings” to ICANN regarding DCA’s application, a signal from those governments that they had serious concerns regarding DCA’s application; following the issuance of those warnings, the GAC issued “consensus advice” against DCA’s application; ICANN then accepted the GAC’s advice, which was entirely consistent with ICANN’s Bylaws and the

Guidebook; [and] ICANN properly denied DCA's Request for Reconsideration."<sup>7</sup>

13) In short, ICANN argued that in these proceedings, "the evidence establishes that the process worked exactly as it was supposed to work."<sup>8</sup>

14) In the merits part of these proceedings, the Panel will decide the above and other related issues raised by the Parties in their submissions.

III. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND LEADING TO THIS DECISION

15) On 24 April 2013, 12 May, 27 May and 4 June 2014 respectively, the Panel issued a Procedural Order No. 1, a Decision on Interim Measures of Protection, a list of questions for the Parties to brief in their 20 May 2014 memorials on the procedural and substantive issues identified in Procedural Order No. 1 ("12 May List of Questions"), a Procedural Order No. 2 and a Decision on ICANN's Request for Partial Reconsideration of certain portions of its Decision on Interim Measures of Protection. The Decision on Interim Measures of Protection and the Decision on ICANN's Request for Partial Reconsideration of certain portions of the Decision on Interim Measures of Protection have no bearing on this Declaration. Consequently, they do not require any particular consideration by the Panel in this Declaration.

16) In Procedural Order No. 1 and the 12 May List of Questions, based on the Parties' submissions, the Panel identified a number of questions relating to the future conduct of these proceedings, including the method of hearing of the merits of DCA Trust's amended Notice of Independent Review Process that required further briefing by the Parties. In Procedural Order No. 1, the Panel identified some of these issues as follows:

B. Future conduct of the IRP proceedings, including the hearing of the merits of Claimant's Amended Notice of Independent Review Process, if required.

Issues:

- a) Interpretation of the provisions of ICANN's Bylaws, the International Dispute Resolution Procedures of the ICDR, and the Supplementary Procedures for ICANN Independent Review Process (together the "IRP Procedure"), including whether or not there should be viva voce testimony permitted.
- b) Document request and exchange.
- c) Additional filings, including any memoranda and hearing exhibits (if needed and appropriate).

---

- d) Consideration of method of hearing of the Parties, i.e., telephone, video or in-person and determination of a location for such a hearing, if necessary or appropriate, and consideration of any administrative issues relating to the hearing.

17) In that same Order, in light of: (a) the exceptional circumstances of this case; (b) the fact that some of the questions raised by the Parties implicated important issues of fairness, due process and equal treatment of the parties (“Outstanding Procedural Issues”); and (c) certain primaie impressionis or first impression issues that arose in relation to the IRP Procedure, the Panel requested the Parties to file two rounds of written memorials, including one that followed the 12 May List of Questions.

18) On 5 and 20 May 2014, the Parties filed their submissions with supporting material for consideration by the Panel.

IV. ISSUES TO BE DECIDED BY THE PANEL

19) Having read the Parties’ submissions and supporting material, and listened to their respective arguments by telephone, the Panel answers the following questions in this Declaration:

- 1) Does the Panel have the power to interpret and determine the IRP Procedure as it relates to the future conduct of these proceedings?
- 2) If so, what directions does the Panel give the Parties with respect to the Outstanding Procedural Issues?
- 3) Is the Panel's decision concerning the IRP Procedure and its future Declaration on the Merits in this proceeding binding?

Summary of the Panel’s findings

20) The Panel is of the view that it has the power to interpret and determine the IRP Procedure as it relates to the future conduct of these proceedings and consequently, it issues the procedural directions set out in paragraphs 58 to 61, 68 to 71 and 82 to 87 (below), which directions may be supplemented in a future procedural order. The Panel also concludes that this Declaration and its future Declaration on the Merits of this case are binding on the Parties.

V. ANALYSIS OF THE ISSUES AND REASONS FOR THE DECISION

1) Can the Panel interpret and determine the IRP Procedure as it relates to the future conduct of these proceedings?

Interpretation and Future Conduct of the IRP Proceedings

DCA Trusts' Submissions

21) In its 5 May 2014 Submission on Procedural Issues ("DCA Trust First Memorial"), DCA Trust submitted, inter alia, that:

"[Under] California law and applicable federal law, this IRP qualifies as an arbitration. It has all the characteristics that California courts look to in order to determine whether a proceeding is an arbitration: 1) a third-party decision-maker; 2) a decision-maker selected by the parties; 3) a mechanism for assuring the neutrality of the decision-maker; 4) an opportunity for both parties to be heard; and 5) a binding decision[...]. Thus, the mere fact that ICANN has labeled this proceeding an independent review process rather than an arbitration (and the adjudicator of the dispute is called a Panel rather than a Tribunal) does not change the fact that the IRP – insofar as its procedural framework and the legal effects of its outcome are concerned – is an arbitration."<sup>9</sup>

22) According to DCA Trust, the IRP Panel is a neutral body appointed by the parties and the ICDR to hear disputes involving ICANN. Therefore, it "qualifies as a third-party decision-maker for the purposes of defining the IRP as an arbitration."<sup>10</sup> DCA Trust submits that, "ICANN's Bylaws contain its standing offer to arbitrate, through the IRP administered by the ICDR, disputes concerning Board actions alleged to be inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or the Bylaws."<sup>11</sup>

23) DCA Trust submits that, it "accepted ICANN's standing offer to arbitrate by submitting its Notice of Independent Review [...] to the ICDR on 24 October 2013 [...] when the two party-appointed panelists were unable to agree on a chairperson, the ICDR made the appointment pursuant to Article 6 of the ICDR Rules, amended and effective 1 June 2009. The Parties thus chose to submit their dispute to the IRP Panel for resolution, as with any other arbitration."<sup>12</sup>

24) According to DCA Trust, "the Supplementary Procedures provide that the IRP is to be comprised of 'neutral' [individuals] and provide that the panel shall be comprised of members of a standing IRP Panel or as selected by the parties under the ICDR Rules. The ICDR Rules [...] provide that panelists serving under the rules, ‘shall be impartial and independent’, and require them to disclose any circumstances giving rise to ‘justifiable doubts’ as to their impartiality and independence [...] The IRP therefore contains a mechanism for ensuring the neutrality of the decision-maker, just like any other arbitration.”<sup>13</sup>

25) DCA Trust further submitted that the “IRP affords both parties an opportunity to be heard, both in writing and orally” and the “governing instruments of the IRP – i.e., the Bylaws, the ICDR Rules, and the Supplementary Procedures – confirm that the IRP is final and binding.” According to DCA Trust, the “IRP is the final accountability and review mechanism available to the parties materially affected by ICANN Board decisions. The IRP is also the only ICANN accountability mechanism conducted by an independent third-party decision-maker with the power to render a decision resolving the dispute and naming a prevailing party [...] The IRP represents a fundamentally different stage of review from those that precede it. Unlike reconsideration or cooperative engagement, the IRP is conducted pursuant to a set of independently developed international arbitration rules (as minimally modified) and administered by a provider of international arbitration services, not ICANN itself.”<sup>14</sup>

26) As explained in its 20 May 2014 Response to the Panel’s Questions on Procedural Issues (“DCA Trust Second Memorial”), according to DCA Trust, “the IRP is the sole forum in which an applicant for a new gTLD can seek independent, third-party review of Board actions. Remarkably, ICANN makes no reciprocal waivers and instead retains all of its rights against applicants in law and equity. ICANN cannot be correct that the IRP is a mere ‘corporate accountability mechanism’. Such a result would make ICANN – the caretaker of an immensely important (and valuable) global resource – effectively judgment-proof.”<sup>15</sup>

27) Finally DCA Trust submitted that:

“[It] is [...] critical to understand that ICANN created the IRP as an alternative to allowing disputes to be resolved by courts. By submitting its application for a gTLD, DCA agreed to eight pages of terms and conditions, including a nearly page-long string of waivers and releases. Among those conditions was the waiver of all of its rights to challenge ICANN’s decision on DCA’s application in court. For DCA and other gTLD applicants, the IRP is their only recourse; no other legal remedy is available. The very design of this process is evidence that the IRP is fundamentally unlike the forms of administrative review that precede it and is meant to provide a final and binding resolution of disputes between ICANN and persons affected by its decisions.”<sup>16</sup>

ICANN’s Submissions

28) In response, in its first memorial entitled ICANN’s Memorandum Regarding Procedural Issues filed on 5 May 2014 (“ICANN First Memorial”), ICANN argued, inter alia, that:

“[This] proceeding is not an arbitration. Rather, an IRP is a truly unique ‘Independent Review’ process established in ICANN’s Bylaws with the specific purpose of providing for ‘independent third-party review of Board actions alleged by an affected party to be inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws’. Although ICANN is using the International Center [sic] for Dispute Resolution (‘ICDR’) to administer these proceedings, nothing in the Bylaws can be construed as converting these proceedings into an ‘arbitration’, and the Bylaws make clear that these proceedings are not to be deemed as the equivalent of an ‘international arbitration.’ Indeed, the word ‘arbitration’ does not appear in the relevant portion of the Bylaws, and as discussed below, the ICANN Board retains full authority to accept or reject the declaration of all IRP Panels [...] ICANN’s Board had the authority to, and did, adopt Bylaws establishing internal accountability mechanisms and defining the scope and form of those mechanisms. Cal. Corp. Code § 5150(a) (authorizing the board of a non-profit public benefit corporation to adopt and amend the corporation’s bylaws).”<sup>17</sup>

29) In its 20 May 2014 Further Memorandum Regarding Procedural Issues (“ICANN Second Memorial”), ICANN submitted that many of the questions that the Panel posed “are outside the scope of this Independent Review Proceeding [...] and the Panel’s mandate.”<sup>18</sup> According to ICANN:

“The Panel’s mandate is set forth in ICANN’s Bylaws, which limit the Panel to ‘comparing contested actions of the Board to the Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws, and [...] declaring whether the Board has acted consistently with the provisions of those Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws.’”<sup>19</sup>

The Panel’s Decision on its power to interpret and determine the IRP Procedure

(i) Mission and Core Values of ICANN

30) ICANN is not an ordinary California non-profit organization. Rather, ICANN has a large international purpose and responsibility, to coordinate, at the overall level, the global Internet’s systems of unique identifiers, and in particular, to ensure the stable and secure operation of the Internet’s unique identifier systems.

31) ICANN coordinates the allocation and assignment of the three sets of unique identifiers for the Internet. ICANN's special and important mission is reflected in the following provisions of its Articles of Incorporation:

3. This Corporation is a [non-profit] public benefit corporation and is not organized for the private gain of any person. It is organized under the California [Non-profit] Public Benefit Corporation Law for charitable and public purposes. The Corporation is organized, and will be operated, exclusively for charitable, educational, and scientific purposes ... In furtherance of the foregoing purposes, and in recognition of the fact that the Internet is an international network of networks, owned by no single nation, individual or organization, the Corporation shall, except as limited by Article 5 hereof, pursue the charitable and public purposes of lessening the burdens of government and promoting the global public interest in the operational stability of the Internet by (i) coordinating the assignment of Internet technical parameters as needed to maintain universal connectivity on the Internet; (ii) performing and overseeing functions related to the coordination of the Internet Protocol ("IP") address space; (iii) performing and overseeing functions related to the coordination of the Internet domain name system ("DNS"), including the development of policies for determining the circumstances under which new top-level domains are added to the DNS root system; (iv) overseeing operation of the authoritative Internet DNS root server system; and (v) engaging in any other related lawful activity in furtherance of items (i) through (iv).

4. The Corporation shall operate for the benefit of the Internet community as a whole, carrying out its activities in conformity with relevant principles of international law and applicable international conventions and local law and, to the extent appropriate and consistent with these Articles and its Bylaws, through open and transparent processes that enable competition and open entry in Internet-related markets. To this effect, the Corporation shall cooperate as appropriate with relevant international organizations. [Emphasis by way of italics is added]

32) In carrying out its mission, ICANN must be accountable to the global internet community for operating in a manner that is consistent with its Bylaws, and with due regard for its core values.

33) In performing its mission, among others, the following core values must guide the decisions and actions of ICANN: preserve and enhance the operational stability, security and global interoperability of the internet, employ open and transparent policy development mechanisms, make decisions by applying documented policies neutrally and objectively, with integrity and fairness and remain accountable to the internet community through mechanisms that enhance ICANN's effectiveness.

34) The core values of ICANN as described in its Bylaws are deliberately expressed in general terms, so as to provide useful and relevant guidance in the broadest possible range of circumstances. Because they are not narrowly prescriptive, the specific way in which they apply, individually and collectively, to each situation will necessarily depend on many factors that cannot be fully anticipated or enumerated.

(ii) Accountability of ICANN

35) Consistent with its large and important international responsibilities, ICANN's Bylaws acknowledge a responsibility to the community and a need for a means of holding ICANN accountable for compliance with its mission and "core values." Thus, Article IV of ICANN's Bylaws, entitled "Accountability and Review," states:

"In carrying out its mission as set out in these Bylaws, ICANN should be accountable to the community for operating in a manner that is consistent with these Bylaws, and with due regard for the core values set forth in Article I of these Bylaws."

36) ICANN's Bylaws establish three accountability mechanisms: the Independent Review Process and two other avenues: Reconsideration Requests and the Ombudsman.

37) ICANN's BGC is the body designated to review and consider Reconsideration Requests. The Committee is empowered to make final decisions on certain matters, and recommendations to the Board of Directors on others. ICANN's Bylaws expressly provide that the Board of Directors "shall not be bound to follow the recommendations of the BGC."

38) ICANN's Bylaws provide that the "charter of the Ombudsman shall be to act as a neutral dispute resolution practitioner for those matters for which the provisions of the Reconsideration Policy [...] or the Independent Review Policy have not been invoked." The Ombudsman's powers appear to be limited to "clarifying issues" and "using conflict resolution tools such as negotiation, facilitation, and 'shuttle diplomacy.'" The Ombudsman is specifically barred from "instituting, joining, or supporting in any way any legal actions challenging ICANN's structure, procedures, processes, or any conduct by the ICANN Board, staff, or constituent bodies."

39) The avenues of accountability for applicants that have disputes with ICANN do not include resort to the courts. Applications for gTLD delegations are governed by ICANN's Guidebook, which provides that applicants waive all right to resort to the courts:

"Applicant hereby releases ICANN [...] from any and all claims that arise out of, are based upon, or are in any way related to, any action or failure to act by ICANN [...] in connection with ICANN's review of this application, investigation, or verification, any characterization or description of applicant or the information in this application, any withdrawal of this application or the decision by ICANN to recommend or not to recommend, the approval of applicant's gTLD application. APPLICANT AGREES NOT TO CHALLENGE, IN COURT OR ANY OTHER JUDICIAL FORA, ANY FINAL DECISION MADE BY ICANN WITH RESPECT TO THE APPLICATION, AND IRREVOCABLY WAIVES ANY RIGHT TO SUE OR PROCEED IN COURT OR ANY OTHER JUDICIAL FORA ON THE BASIS

OF ANY OTHER LEGAL CLAIM AGAINST ICANN ON THE BASIS OF ANY OTHER LEGAL CLAIM.”<sup>20</sup>

40) Thus, assuming that the foregoing waiver of any and all judicial remedies is valid and enforceable, the ultimate “accountability” remedy for applicants is the IRP.

(iii) IRP Procedures

41) The Bylaws of ICANN as amended on 11 April 2013, in Article IV (Accountability and Review), Section 3 (Independent Review of Board Actions), paragraph 1, require ICANN to put in place, in addition to the reconsideration process identified in Section 2, a separate process for independent third-party review of Board actions alleged by an affected party to be inconsistent with ICANN’s Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws.

42) Paragraphs 7 and 8 of Section 2 of the Bylaws, require all IRP proceedings to be administered by an international dispute resolution provider appointed by ICANN, and for that IRP Provider (“IRPP”) to, with the approval of the ICANN’s Board, establish operating rules and procedures, which shall implement and be consistent with Section 3.

43) In accordance with the above provisions, ICANN selected the ICDR, the international division of the American Arbitration Association, to be the IRPP.

44) With the input of the ICDR, ICANN prepared a set of Supplementary Procedures for ICANN IRP (“Supplementary Procedures”), to “supplement the [ICDR’s] International Arbitration Rules in accordance with the independent review procedures set forth in Article IV, Section 3 of the ICANN Bylaws.”

45) According to the Definitions part of the Supplementary Procedures, “Independent Review or IRP” refers to “the procedure that takes place upon filing of a request to review ICANN Board actions or inactions alleged to be inconsistent with ICANN’s Bylaws or Articles of Incorporation”, and “International Dispute Resolution Procedures or Rules” refers to the ICDR’s International Arbitration Rules (“ICDR Rules”) that will govern the process in combination with the Supplementary Rules.

46) The Preamble of the Supplementary Rules indicates that these “procedures supplement the [ICDR] Rules in accordance with the independent review procedures set forth in Article IV, Section 3 of the ICANN Bylaws” and Article

2 of the Supplementary Procedures requires the ICDR to apply the Supplementary Procedures, in addition to the ICDR Rules, in all cases submitted to it in connection with Article IV, Section 3(4) of ICANN's Bylaws. In the event there is any inconsistency between the Supplementary Procedures and the ICDR Rules, ICANN requires the Supplementary Procedures to govern.

- 47)The online Oxford English Dictionary defines the word “supplement” as “a thing added to something else in order to complete or enhance it”. Supplement, therefore, means to complete, add to, extend or supply a deficiency. In this case, according to ICANN’s desire, the Supplementary Rules were designed to “add to” the ICDR Rules.
- 48)A key provision of the ICDR Rules, Article 16, under the heading “Conduct of Arbitration” confers upon the Panel the power to “conduct [proceedings] in whatever manner [the Panel] considers appropriate, provided that the parties are treated with equality and that each party has the right to be heard and is given a fair opportunity to present its case.”
- 49)Another key provision, Article 36 of the ICDR Rules, directs the Panel to “interpret and apply these Rules insofar as they relate to its powers and duties”. Like in all other ICDR proceedings, the details of exercise of such powers are left to the discretion of the Panel itself.
- 50)Nothing in the Supplementary Procedures either expressly or implicitly conflicts with or overrides the general and broad powers that Articles 16 and 36 of the ICDR Rules confer upon the Panel to interpret and determine the manner in which the IRP proceedings are to be conducted and to assure that each party is given a fair opportunity to present its case.
- 51)To the contrary, the Panel finds support in the “Independent Review Process Recommendations” filed by ICANN, which indicates that the Panel has the discretion to run the IRP proceedings in the manner it thinks appropriate. [Emphasis added].
- 52)Therefore, the Panel is of the view that it has the power to interpret and determine the IRP Procedure as it relates to the future conduct of these proceedings, and it does so here, with specificity in relation to the issues raised by the Parties as set out below.

2) What directions does the Panel give the Parties with respect to the Outstanding Procedural Issues?

a) Document request and exchange

Parties' Submissions

- 53) In the DCA Trust First Memorial, DCA Trust seeks document production, since according to it, "information potentially dispositive of the outcome of these proceedings is in ICANN's possession, custody or control."<sup>21</sup> According to DCA Trust, in this case, "ICANN has submitted witness testimony that, among other things, purports to rely on secret documents that have not been provided." Given that these proceedings may be "DCA's only opportunity to present and have its claims decided by an independent decision-maker", DCA Trust argues "that further briefing on the merits should be allowed following any and all document production in these proceedings."<sup>22</sup>
- 54) According to DCA Trust, "by choosing the ICDR Rules, the Parties also chose the associated ICDR guidelines including the Guidelines for Arbitrators Concerning Exchanges of Information ("ICDR Guidelines"). The ICDR Guidelines provide that 'parties shall exchange, in advance of the hearing, all documents upon which each intends to rely' [...]"<sup>23</sup> DCA Trust submits that, "nothing in the Bylaws or Supplementary Procedures excludes such document production, leaving the ICDR Rules to cover the field."<sup>24</sup>
- 55) DCA Trust therefore, requests that the Panel issue a procedural order providing the Parties with an opportunity to request documents from one another, and to seek an order from the Panel compelling production of documents if necessary.
- 56) ICANN agrees with DCA Trust, that pursuant to the ICDR Guidelines, which it refers to as "Discovery Rules", "a party must request that a panel order the production of documents."<sup>25</sup> According to ICANN, "those documents must be 'reasonably believed to exist and to be relevant and material to the outcomes of the case,' and requests must contain 'a description of specific documents or classes of documents, along with an explanation of their materiality to the outcome of the case."<sup>26</sup> ICANN argues, however, that despite the requirement by the Supplementary Rules that, 'all necessary evidence to demonstrate the requestor's claims that ICANN violated its Bylaws or Articles of Incorporation should be part of the [initial written] submission’, DCA Trust has not to date “provided any indication as to what information it believes the documents it may request may contain and has made no showing that those documents could affect the outcome of the case.”<sup>27</sup>

57) ICANN further submits that, “while ICANN recognizes that the Panel may order the production of documents within the parameters set forth in the Discovery Rules, ICANN will object to any attempts by DCA to propound broad discovery of the sort permitted in American civil litigation.”<sup>28</sup> In support of its contention, ICANN refers to the ICDR Guidelines and states that those Guidelines have made it ‘clear that its Discovery Rules do not contemplate such broad discovery. The introduction of these rules states that their purpose is to promote ‘the goal of providing a simpler, less expensive and more expeditious form of dispute resolution than resort to national courts.’ According to ICANN, the ICDR Guidelines note that:

“One of the factors contributing to complexity, expense and delay in recent years has been the migration from court systems into arbitration of procedural devices that allow one party to a court proceeding access to information in the possession of the other, without full consideration of the differences between arbitration and litigation. The purpose of these guidelines is to make it clear to arbitrators that they have the authority, the responsibility and, in certain jurisdictions, the mandatory duty to manage arbitration proceedings so as to achieve the goal of providing a simpler, less expensive, and more expeditious process.”<sup>29</sup>

The Panel’s directions concerning document request and exchange

58) Seeing that the Parties are both in agreement that some form of documentary exchange is permitted under the IRP Procedure, and considering that Articles 16 and 19 of the ICDR Rules respectively specify, inter alia, that, “[s]ubject to these Rules the [Panel] may conduct [these proceedings] in whatever manner it considers appropriate, provided that the parties are treated with equality and that each party has the right to be heard and is given a fair opportunity to present its case” and “at any time during the proceedings, the tribunal may order parties to produce other documents, exhibits or other evidence it deems necessary or appropriate”, the Panel concludes that some document production is necessary to allow DCA Trust to present its case.

59) The Panel is not aware of any international dispute resolution rules, which prevent the parties to benefit from some form of document production. Denying document production would be especially unfair in the circumstances of this case given ICANN’s reliance on internal confidential documents, as advanced by DCA Trust. In any event, ICANN’s espoused goals of accountability and transparency would be disserved by a regime that truncates the usual and traditional means of developing and presenting a claim.

60)The Panel, therefore, orders a reasonable documentary exchange in these proceedings with a view to maintaining efficiency and economy, and invites the Parties to agree by or before 29 August 2014, on a form, method and schedule of exchange of documents between them. If the Parties are unable to agree on such a documentary exchange process, the Panel will intervene and, with the input of the Parties, provide further guidance.

61)In this last regard, the Panel directs the Parties attention to paragraph 6 of the ICDR Guidelines, and advises, that it is very “receptive to creative solutions for achieving exchanges of information in ways that avoid costs and delay, consistent with the principles of due process expressed in these Guidelines.”

b) Additional filings, including memoranda and hearing exhibits

Parties’ Submissions

62)In the DCA Trust First Memorial, DCA Trust submits that:

“[The] plain language of the Supplementary Procedures pertaining to written submissions clearly demonstrates that claimants in IRPs are not limited to a single written submission incorporating all evidence, as argued by ICANN. Section 5 of the Supplementary Procedures states that ‘initial written submissions of the parties shall not exceed 25 pages.’ The word ‘initial’ confirms that there may be subsequent submissions, subject to the discretion of the Panel as to how many additional written submissions and what page limits should apply.”<sup>30</sup>

63)DCA Trust also submits that, “Section 5 of the Supplementary Procedures [...] provides that ‘[a]ll necessary evidence to demonstrate the requestor’s claims that ICANN violated its Bylaws or Articles of Incorporation should be part of the submission.’ Use of the word ‘should’—and not ‘shall’—confirms that it is desirable, but not required that all necessary evidence be included with the Notice of Independent Review. Plainly, the Supplementary Procedures do not preclude a claimant from adducing additional evidence nor would it make any sense if they did given that claimants may, subject to the Panel’s discretion, submit document requests.”<sup>31</sup>

64)According to DCA Trust, in addition, “section 5 of the Supplementary Procedures provides that ‘the Panel may request additional written submissions from the party seeking review, the Board, the Supporting

Organizations, or from other parties.’ Thus, the Supplementary Procedures clearly contemplate that additional written submissions may be necessary to give each party a fair opportunity to present its case.”<sup>32</sup>

65) In response, ICANN submits that, DCA Trust “has no automatic right to additional briefing under the Supplementary Procedures.”<sup>33</sup> According to ICANN, “paragraph 5 of the Supplementary Procedures, which governs written statements, provides:

The initial written submissions of the parties shall not exceed 25 pages each in argument, double-spaced and in 12-point font. All necessary evidence to demonstrate the requestor’s claims that ICANN violated its Bylaws or Articles of Incorporation should be part of the submission. Evidence will not be included when calculating the page limit. The parties may submit expert evidence in writing, and there shall be one right of reply to that expert evidence. The IRP Panel may request additional written submissions from the party seeking review, the Board, the Supporting Organizations, or from other parties.” [Bold and italics are ICANN’s]

ICANN adds:

“This section clearly provides that DCA [Trust’s] opportunity to provide briefing and evidence in this matter has concluded, subject only to a request for additional briefing from the Panel. DCA has emphasized that the rule references the ‘initial’ written submission, but the word ‘initial’ refers to the fact that the Panel ‘may request additional written submissions,’ not that DCA [Trust] has some ‘right’ to a second submission. There is no Supplementary Rule that even suggests the possibility of a second submission as a matter of right. The fact that DCA [Trust] has twice failed to submit evidence in support of its claims is not justification for allowing DCA [Trust] a third attempt.”<sup>34</sup>

66) ICANN further notes, that in its 20 April 2014 letter to the Panel, ICANN already submitted that, “DCA [Trust’s] argument that it submitted its papers ‘on the understanding that opportunities would be available to make further submissions’ is false. ICANN stated in an email to DCA [Trust’s] counsel on 9 January 2014—prior to the submission of DCA [Trust’s] Amended Notice—that the Supplementary [Procedures] bar the filing of supplemental submissions absent a request from the Panel.”<sup>35</sup>

67) According to ICANN:

“[The] decision as to whether to allow supplemental briefing is within the Panel’s discretion, and ICANN urges the Panel to decline to permit supplemental briefing for two reasons. First, despite having months to consider how DCA [Trust] might respond to ICANN’s presentation on the merits, DCA [Trust] has never even attempted to explain

what it could say in additional briefing that would refute the materials in ICANN's presentation. [...] The fact that DCA is unable to identify supplemental witnesses six months after filing its Notice of IRP is strong indication that further briefing would not be helpful in this case. Second, as ICANN has explained on multiple occasions, DCA [Trust] has delayed these proceedings substantially, and further briefing would compound that delay [...] as ICANN noted in its letter of 20 April 2014, despite DCA [Trust's] attempts to frame this case as implicating issues 'reach[ing] far beyond the respective rights of the parties as concerns the delegation of .AFRICA,' the issues in this case are in fact extremely limited in scope. This Panel is authorized only to address whether ICANN violated its Bylaws or Articles of Incorporation in its handling of DCA's Application for .AFRICA. The parties have had the opportunity to submit briefs and evidence regarding that issue. DCA [Trust] has given no indication that it has further dispositive arguments to make or evidence to present. The Panel should resist DCA's attempt to delay these proceedings even further via additional briefing."<sup>36</sup>

The Panel's directions concerning additional filings

- 68) As with document production, in the face of Article 16 of the ICDR Rules, the Panel is of the view that both Parties ought to benefit from additional filings. In this instance again, while it is possible as ICANN explains, that the drafters of the Supplementary Procedures may have desired to preclude the introduction of additional evidence not submitted with an initial statement of claim, the Panel is of the view that such a result would be inconsistent with ICANN's core values and the Panel's obligation to treat the parties fairly and afford both sides a reasonable opportunity to present their case.
- 69) Again, every set of dispute resolution rules, and every court process that the Panel is aware of, allows a claimant to supplement its presentation as its case proceeds to a hearing. The goal of a fair opportunity to present one's case is in harmony with ICANN's goals of accountability, transparency, and fairness.
- 70) The Panel is aware of and fully embraces the fact that ICANN tried to curtail unnecessary time and costs in the IRP process. However, this may not be done at the cost of a fair process for both parties, particularly in light of the fact that the IRP is the exclusive dispute resolution mechanism provided to applicants.
- 71) Therefore, the Panel will allow the Parties to benefit from additional filings and supplemental briefing going forward. The Panel invites the Parties in this regard to agree on a reasonable exchange timetable. If the Parties are unable to agree on the scope and length of such additional filings and supplemental briefing, the Panel will intervene and, with the input of the Parties, provide further guidance.

c) Method of Hearing and Testimony

Parties' Submissions

72) In the DCA Trust First Memorial, DCA Trust submitted that:

“[The] parties agree that a hearing on the merits is appropriate in this IRP. DCA [Trust] respectfully requests that the Panel schedule a hearing on the merits after document discovery has concluded and the parties have had the opportunity to file memorials on the merits. Although the Panel clearly has the authority to conduct a hearing in-person, in the interest of saving time and minimizing costs, DCA [Trust] would agree to a video hearing, as stated during the April 22 hearing on procedural matters.”<sup>37</sup>

73) In response, ICANN submitted that, “during the 22 April 2014 Call, ICANN agreed that this IRP is one in which a telephonic or video conference would be helpful and offered to facilitate a video conference.”<sup>38</sup> In addition, in the ICANN First Memorial, ICANN argued that according to Article IV, Section 3.12 of the Bylaws and paragraph 4 of the Supplementary Procedures, the IRP should conduct its proceedings by email and otherwise via Internet to the maximum extent feasible and in the extraordinary event that an in-person hearing is deemed necessary by the panel, the in-person hearing shall be limited to argument only.

74) ICANN also advanced, that:

“[It] does not believe [...] that this IRP is sufficiently ‘extraordinary’ so as to justify an in-person hearing, which would dramatically increase the costs for the parties. As discussed above, the issues in this IRP are straightforward – limited to whether ICANN’s Board acted consistent with its Bylaws and Articles of Incorporation in relation to DCA’s application for. AFRICA. – and can, easily [...], be resolved following a telephonic oral argument with counsel and the Panel.”<sup>39</sup>

75) In the DCA Trust First Memorial, DCA Trust also argued that, in “April 2013, ICANN amended its Bylaws to limit telephonic or in-person hearings to ‘argument only.’ At some point after the ICM Panel’s 2009 decision in ICM v. ICANN, ICANN also revised the Supplementary Procedures to limit hearings to ‘argument only.’ Accordingly, and as ICANN argued at the procedural hearing, ICANN’s revised Bylaws and Supplementary Procedures suggest that there is to be no cross-examination of witnesses at the hearing. However, insofar as neither the Supplementary Procedures nor the Bylaws expressly exclude cross-examination, this provision remains ambiguous.”<sup>40</sup>

76)DCA Trust submitted that:

“[Regardless] of whether the parties themselves may examine witnesses at the hearing, it is clear that the Panel may do so. Article 16(1) provides that the Panel ‘may conduct the arbitration in whatever manner it considers appropriate, provided that the parties are treated with equality and that each party has the right to be heard and is given a fair opportunity to present its case.’ It is, moreover, customary in international arbitration for tribunal members to question witnesses themselves – often extensively – in order to test their evidence or clarify facts that are in dispute. In this case, ICANN has submitted witness testimony that, among other things, purports to rely on secret documents that have not been provided. As long as those documents are withheld from DCA [Trust], it is particularly important for that witness testimony to be fully tested by the Panel, if not by the parties. Particularly in light of the important issues at stake in this matter and the general due process concerns raised when parties cannot test the evidence presented against them, DCA [Trust] strongly urges the Panel to take full advantage of its opportunity to question witnesses. Such questioning will in no way slow down the proceedings, which DCA [Trust] agrees are to be expedited – but not at the cost of the parties’ right to be heard, and the Panel’s right to obtain the information it needs to render its decision.”<sup>41</sup>

77)In response, ICANN submitted that:

“[Both] the Supplementary Procedures and ICANN’s Bylaws unequivocally and unambiguously prohibit live witness testimony in conjunction with any IRP.” Paragraph 4 of the Supplementary Procedures, which according to ICANN governs the “Conduct of the Independent Review”, demonstrates this point. According to ICANN, “indeed, two separate phrases of Paragraph 4 explicitly prohibit live testimony: (1) the phrase limiting the in-person hearing (and similarly telephonic hearings) to ‘argument only,’ and (2) the phrase stating that ‘all evidence, including witness statements, must be submitted in advance.’ The former explicitly limits hearings to the argument of counsel, excluding the presentation of any evidence, including any witness testimony. The latter reiterates the point that all evidence, including witness testimony, is to be presented in writing and prior to the hearing. Each phrase unambiguously excludes live testimony from IRP hearings. Taken together, the phrases constitute irrefutable evidence that the Supplementary Procedures establish a truncated hearing procedure.”<sup>42</sup>

78)ICANN added:

“[Paragraph] 4 of the Supplementary Procedures is based on the exact same and unambiguous language in Article IV, Section 3.12 of the Bylaws, which provides that ‘[i]n the unlikely event that a telephonic or in-person hearing is convened, the hearing shall be limited to argument only; all evidence, including witness statements, must be submitted in writing in advance.’” [...] While DCA [Trust] may prefer a different procedure, the Bylaws and the Supplementary Procedures could not be any clearer in this regard. Despite the Bylaws’ and Supplementary Procedures’ clear and unambiguous prohibition of live witness testimony, DCA [Trust] attempts to argue that the Panel should instead be guided by Article 16 of the ICDR Rules, which states that subject to the ICDR Rules, ‘the tribunal may conduct the arbitration in whatever manner it considers appropriate, provided that the parties are treated with equality and that each party has the right to be heard and is given a fair opportunity to present its case.’ However, as discussed above, the Supplementary Procedures provide that ‘[i]n the event there is any inconsistency between these Supplementary Procedures and [ICDR’s International Arbitration Rules], these Supplementary Procedures will govern,’ and the Bylaws require that the ICDR Rules ‘be consistent’ with the Bylaws. As such, the Panel does not have discretion to order live witness testimony in the face of the Bylaws’ and Supplementary Procedures’ clear and unambiguous prohibition of such testimony.”<sup>43</sup>

79) ICANN further submitted:

“[During] the 22 April Call, DCA vaguely alluded to ‘due process’ and ‘constitutional’ concerns with prohibiting cross-examination. As ICANN did after public consultation, and after the ICM IRP, ICANN has the right to establish the rules for these procedures, rules that DCA agreed to abide by when it filed its Request for IRP. First, ‘constitutional’ protections do not apply with respect to a corporate accountability mechanism. Second, ‘due process’ considerations (though inapplicable to corporate accountability mechanisms) were already considered as part of the design of the revised IRP. And the United States Supreme Court has repeatedly affirmed the right of parties to tailor unique rules for dispute resolution processes, including even binding arbitration proceedings (which an IRP is not). The Supreme Court has specifically noted that ‘[t]he point of affording parties discretion in designing arbitration processes is to allow for efficient, streamlined procedures tailored to the type of dispute. . . . And the informality of arbitral proceedings is itself desirable, reducing the cost and increasing the speed of dispute resolution’.”<sup>44</sup>

80) According to ICANN:

“[The] U.S. Supreme Court has explicitly held that the right to tailor unique procedural rules includes the right to dispense with certain procedures common in civil trials, including the right to cross-examine witnesses [...] Similarly, international arbitration norms recognize the right of parties to tailor their own, unique arbitral procedures. ‘Party autonomy is the guiding principle in determining the procedure to be followed in international arbitration.’ It is a principle that is endorsed not only in national laws, but by international arbitral institutions worldwide, as well as by international instruments such as the New York Convention and the Model Law.”<sup>45</sup>

81) In short, ICANN advanced that:

“[Even] if this were a formal ‘arbitration’, ICANN would be entitled to limit the nature of these proceedings so as to preclude live witness testimony. The fact that this proceeding is not an arbitration further reconfirms ICANN’s right to establish the rules that govern these proceedings [...] DCA [Trust] argues that it will be prejudiced if cross-examination of witnesses is not permitted. However, the procedures give both parties equal opportunity to present their evidence—the inability of either party to examine witnesses at the hearing would affect both the Claimant and ICANN equally. In this instance, DCA [Trust] did not submit witness testimony with its Amended Notice (as clearly it should have). However, were DCA [Trust] to present any written witness statements in support of its position, ICANN would not be entitled to cross examine those witnesses, just as DCA [Trust] is not entitled to cross examine ICANN's witnesses. Of course, the parties are free to argue to the IRP Panel that witness testimony should be viewed in light of the fact that the rules do not permit cross-examination."<sup>46</sup>

The Panel's directions on method of hearing and testimony

- 82) The considerations and discussions under the prior headings addressing document exchange and additional filings apply to the hearing and testimony issues raised in this IRP proceeding as well.
- 83) At this juncture, the Panel is of the preliminary view that at a minimum a video hearing should be held. The Parties appear to be in agreement. However, the Panel does not wish to close the door to the possibility of an in-person hearing and live examination of witnesses, should the Panel consider that such a method is more appropriate under the particular circumstances of this case after the Parties have completed their document exchange and the filing of any additional materials.
- 84) While the Supplementary Procedures appear to limit both telephonic and in-person hearings to "argument only", the Panel is of the view that this approach is fundamentally inconsistent with the requirements in ICANN's Bylaws for accountability and for decision making with objectivity and fairness.
- 85) Analysis of the propriety of ICANN's decisions in this case will depend at least in part on evidence about the intentions and conduct of ICANN's top personnel. ICANN should not be allowed to rely on written statements of these officers and employees attesting to the propriety of their actions without an appropriate opportunity in the IRP process for DCA Trust to challenge and test the veracity of such statements.
- 86) The Panel, therefore, reserves its decision to order an in-person hearing and live testimony pending a further examination of the representations that will be proffered by each side, including the filing of any additional evidence which this Decision permits. The Panel also permits both Parties at the hearing to challenge and test the veracity of statements made by witnesses.
- 87) Having said this, the Panel acknowledges the Parties' desire that the IRP proceedings be as efficient and economical as feasible, consistent with the overall objectives of a fair and independent proceeding. The Panel will certainly bear this desire and goal in mind as these proceedings advance further.

3) Is the Panel's Decision on the IRP Procedure and its future Declaration on the Merits in this proceeding binding?

DCA Trust's Submissions

88) In addition to the submissions set out in the earlier part of this Decision, DCA Trust argues that, the language used in the Bylaws to describe the IRP process is demonstrative that it is intended to be a binding process. When the language in the Bylaws for reconsideration is compared to that describing the IRP, DCA Trust explains:

“[It] is clear that the declaration of an IRP is intended to be final and binding [...] For example, the Bylaws provide that the [ICANN] [Board Governance Committee] BGC ‘shall act on a Reconsideration Request on the basis of the written public record’ and ‘shall make a final determination or recommendation.’ The Bylaws even expressly state that ‘the Board shall not be bound to follow the recommendations’ of the BGC. By contrast, the IRP Panel makes ‘declarations’ — defined by ICANN in its Supplementary Procedures as ‘decisions/opinions’— that ‘are final and have precedential value.’ The IRP Panel ‘shall specifically designate the prevailing party’ and may allocate the costs of the IRP Provider to one or both parties. Moreover, nowhere in ICANN’s Bylaws or the Supplementary Procedures does ICANN state that the Board shall not be bound by the declaration of the IRP. If that is what ICANN intended, then it certainly could have stated it plainly in the Bylaws, as it did with reconsideration. The fact that it did not do so is telling.”<sup>47</sup>

89) In light of the foregoing, DCA Trust advances:

“[The] IRP process is an arbitration in all but name. It is a dispute resolution procedure administered by an international arbitration service provider, in which the decision-makers are neutral third parties chosen by the parties to the dispute. There are mechanisms in place to assure the neutrality of the decision-makers and the right of each party to be heard. The IRP Panel is vested with adjudicative authority that is equivalent to that of any other arbitral tribunal: it renders decisions on the dispute based on the evidence and arguments submitted by the parties, and its decisions are binding and have res judicata and precedential value. The procedures appropriate and customary in international arbitration are thus equally appropriate in this IRP. But in any event, and as discussed below, the applicable rules authorize the Panel to conduct this IRP in the manner it deems appropriate regardless of whether it determines that the IRP qualifies as an arbitration.”<sup>48</sup>

ICANN's Submissions

90) In response, ICANN submits that:

“[The] provisions of Article IV, Section 3 of the ICANN Bylaws, which govern the Independent Review process and these proceedings, make clear that the declaration of the Panel will not be binding on ICANN. Section 3.11 gives the IRP panels the authority to ‘declare whether an action or inaction of the Board was inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or Bylaws’ and ‘recommend that the Board stay any action or decision, or that the Board take any interim action, until such time as the Board reviews and acts upon the opinion of the IRP.’ Section 3.21 provides that ‘[w]here feasible, the Board shall consider the IRP Panel declaration at the Board’s next meeting.’ Section 3 never refers to the IRP panel’s declaration as a ‘decision’ or ‘determination.’ It does refer to the ‘Board’s subsequent action on [the IRP panel’s] declaration [...]’ That language makes clear that the IRP’s declarations are advisory and not binding on the Board. Pursuant to the Bylaws, the Board has the discretion to consider an IRP panel’s declaration and take whatever action it deems appropriate.”<sup>49</sup>

---

91) According to ICANN:

“[This] issue was addressed extensively in the ICM IRP, a decision that has precedential value to this Panel. The ICM Panel specifically considered the argument that the IRP proceedings were ‘arbitral and not advisory in character,’ and unanimously concluded that its declaration was ‘not binding, but rather advisory in effect.’ At the time that the ICM Panel rendered its declaration, Article IV, Section 3 of ICANN’s Bylaws provided that ‘IRP shall be operated by an international arbitration provider appointed from time to time by ICANN...using arbitrators . . . nominated by that provider.’ ICM unsuccessfully attempted to rely on that language in arguing that the IRP constituted an arbitration, and that the IRP panel’s declaration was binding on ICANN. Following that IRP, that language was removed from the Bylaws with the April 2013 Bylaws amendments, further confirming that, under the Bylaws, an IRP panel’s declaration is not binding on the Board.”<sup>50</sup>

92) ICANN also submits that:

“[The] lengthy drafting history of ICANN’s independent review process confirms that IRP panel declarations are not binding. Specifically, the Draft Principles for Independent Review, drafted in 1999, state that ‘the ICANN Board should retain ultimate authority over ICANN’s affairs – after all, it is the Board ... that will be chosen by (and is directly accountable to) the membership and supporting organizations.’ And when, in 2001, the Committee on ICANN Evolution and Reform (‘ERC’) recommended the creation of an independent review process, it called for the creation of ‘a process to require non-binding arbitration by an international arbitration body to review any allegation that the Board has acted in conflict with ICANN’s Bylaws.’ The individuals who actively participated in the process also agreed that the review process would not be binding. As one participant stated: IRP ‘decisions will be nonbinding, because the Board will retain final decision-making authority’.”<sup>51</sup>

93) According to ICANN:

“[The] only IRP Panel ever to issue a declaration, the ICM IRP Panel, unanimously rejected the assertion that IRP Panel declarations are binding and recognized that an IRP panel’s declaration ‘is not binding, but rather advisory in effect.’ Nothing has occurred since the issuance of the ICM IRP Panel’s declaration that changes the fact that IRP Panel declarations are not binding. To the contrary, in April 2013, following the

---

ICM IRP, in order to clarify even further that IRPs are not binding, all references in the Bylaws to the term ‘arbitration’ were removed as part of the Bylaws revisions. ICM had argued in the IRP that the use of the word ‘arbitration’ in the portion of the Bylaws related to Independent Review indicated that IRPs were binding, and while the ICM IRP Panel rejected that argument, to avoid any lingering doubt, ICANN removed the word ‘arbitration’ in conjunction with the amendments to the Bylaws.”<sup>52</sup>

94) ICANN further submits that:

“[The] amendments to the Bylaws, which occurred following a community process on the proposed IRP revisions, added, among other things, a sentence stating that ‘declarations of the IRP Panel, and the Board’s subsequent action on those declarations, are final and have precedential value.’ DCA argues that this new language, which does not actually use the word ‘binding,’ nevertheless provides that IRP Panel declarations are binding, trumping years of drafting history, the sworn testimony of those who participated in the drafting process, the plain text of the Bylaws, and the reasoned declaration of a prior IRP panel. DCA is wrong.”<sup>53</sup>

95) According to ICANN:

“[The] language DCA references was added to ICANN’s Bylaws to meet recommendations made by ICANN’s Accountability Structures Expert Panel (‘ASEP’). The ASEP was comprised of three world-renowned experts on issues of corporate governance, accountability, and international dispute resolution, and was charged with evaluating ICANN’s accountability mechanisms, including the Independent Review process. The ASEP recommended, inter alia, that an IRP should not be permitted to proceed on the same issues as presented in a prior IRP. The ASEP’s recommendations in this regard were raised in light of the second IRP constituted under ICANN’s Bylaws, where the claimant presented claims that would have required the IRP Panel to [re-evaluate] the declaration of the IRP Panel in the ICM IRP. To prevent claimants from challenging a prior IRP Panel declaration, the ASEP recommended that ‘[t]he declarations of the IRP, and ICANN’s subsequent actions on those declarations, should have precedential value.’ The ASEP’s recommendations in this regard did not convert IRP Panel declarations into binding decisions.”<sup>54</sup>

96) Moreover, ICANN argues:

“[One] of the important considerations underlying the ASEP’s work was the fact that ICANN, while it operates internationally, is a California non-profit public benefit corporation subject to the statutory law of California as determined by United States courts. That law requires that ICANN’s Board retain the ultimate responsibility for decision-making. As a result, the ASEP’s recommendations were premised on the understanding that the declaration of the IRP Panel is not ‘binding’ on the Board. In any event, a declaration clearly can be both non-binding and precedential.”<sup>55</sup>

97) In short, ICANN argues that the IRP is not binding. According to ICANN, “not only is there no language in the Bylaws stating that IRP Panel declarations

are binding on ICANN, there is no language stating that an IRP Panel even may determine if its advisory Declarations are binding.”<sup>56</sup> According to ICANN, words such as “arbitration” and “arbitrator” were removed from the Bylaws to ensure that the IRP Panel’s declarations do not have the force of normal commercial arbitration. ICANN also argues that DCA Trust, “fails to point to a single piece of evidence in all of the drafting history of the Bylaws or any of the amendments to indicate that ICANN intended, through its 2013 amendments, to convert a non-binding procedure into a binding one.”<sup>57</sup> Finally, ICANN submits that “it is not within the scope of this Panel’s authority to declare whether IRP Panel declarations are binding on ICANN’s Board...the Panel does not have the authority to re-write ICANN’s Bylaws or the rules applicable to this proceeding. The Panel’s mandate is strictly limited to ‘comparing contested actions of the Board [and whether it] has acted consistently with the provisions of those Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws, and [...] declaring whether the Board has acted consistently with the provisions of those Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws’.”<sup>58</sup>

The Panel’s Decision on Binding or Advisory nature of IRP decisions, opinions and declarations

98) Various provisions of ICANN’s Bylaws and the Supplementary Procedures support the conclusion that the Panel’s decisions, opinions and declarations are binding. There is certainly nothing in the Supplementary Rules that renders the decisions, opinions and declarations of the Panel either advisory or non-binding.<sup>59</sup>

99) In paragraph 1, the Supplementary Procedures define “Declaration” as the “decisions and/or opinions of the IRP Panel”. In paragraph 9, the Supplementary Procedures require any Declaration of a three-member IRP Panel to be signed by the majority and in paragraph 10, under the heading “Form and Effect of an IRP Declaration”, they require Declarations to be in writing, based on documentation, supporting materials and arguments submitted by the parties. The Supplementary Procedures also require the Declaration to “specifically designate the prevailing party”.<sup>60</sup>

<sup>59</sup> The Reconsideration process established in the Bylaws expressly provides that ICANN’s “Board shall not be bound to follow the recommendations” of the BGC for action on requests for reconsideration. No similar language in the Bylaws or Supplementary Procedures limits the effect of the Panel’s IRP decisions, opinions and declarations to an advisory or non-binding effect. It would have been easy for ICANN to clearly state somewhere that the IRP’s decisions, opinions or declarations are “advisory”—this word appears in the Reconsideration Process.

<sup>60</sup> Moreover, the word “Declaration” in the common law legal tradition is often synonymous with a binding decision. According to Black’s Law Dictionary (7th Edition 1999) at page 846, a “declaratory

- 100) Section 10 of the Supplementary Procedures, resembles Article 27 of the ICDR Rules. Whereas Article 27 refers to “Awards”, section 10 refers to “Declarations”. Section 10 of the Supplementary Procedures, however, is silent on whether Declarations made by the IRP Panel are “final and binding” on the parties.
- 101) As explained earlier, as per Article IV, Section 3, paragraph 8 of the Bylaws, the Board of Directors of ICANN has given its approval to the ICDR to establish a set of operating rules and procedures for the conduct of the IRP set out in section 3. The operating rules and procedures established by the ICDR are the ICDR Rules as referred to in the preamble of the Supplementary Procedures. These Rules have been supplemented<sup>61</sup> with the Supplementary Procedures.
- 102) This is clear from two different parts of the Supplementary Procedures. First, in the preamble, where the Supplementary Procedures state that: “These procedures supplement the International Centre for Dispute Resolution’s International Arbitration Rules in accordance with the independent review procedures set forth in Article IV, Section 3 of the ICANN Bylaws”.
- 103) And second, under section 2 entitled (Scope), that states that the “ICDR will apply these Supplementary Procedures, in addition to the INTERNATIONAL DISPUTE RESOLUTION PROCEDURES, in all cases submitted to the ICDR in connection with the Article IV, Section 3(4) of the ICANN Bylaws”. It is therefore clear that ICANN intended the operating rules and procedures for the independent review to be an international set of arbitration rules supplemented by a particular set of additional rules.
- 104) There is also nothing inconsistent between section 10 of the Supplementary Procedures and Article 27 of the ICDR Rules.
- 105) One of the hallmarks of international arbitration is the binding and final nature of the decisions made by the adjudicators. Binding arbitration is the essence of what the ICDR Rules, the ICDR itself and its parent, the American Arbitration Association, offer. The selection of the ICDR Rules as the baseline judgment” is, “a binding adjudication that establishes the rights and other legal obligations of the parties without providing for or ordering enforcement”.

<sup>61</sup> As explained by the Panel before, the word “supplement” means to complete, add to, extend or supply a deficiency. The Supplementary Procedures, therefore, supplement (not replace or supersede) the ICDR Rules. As also indicated by the Panel before, in the event there is any inconsistency between the Supplementary Procedures and the ICDR Rules, ICANN requires the Supplementary Procedures to govern.

set of procedures for IRP's, therefore, points to a binding adjudicative process.

106) Furthermore, the process adopted in the Supplementary Procedures is an adversarial one where counsel for the parties present competing evidence and arguments, and a panel decides who prevails, when and in what circumstances. The panelists who adjudicate the parties' claims are also selected from among experienced arbitrators, whose usual charter is to make binding decisions.

107) The above is further supported by the language and spirit of section 11 of ICANN's Bylaws. Pursuant to that section, the IRP Panel has the authority to summarily dismiss requests brought without standing, lacking in substance, or that are frivolous or vexatious. Surely, such a decision, opinion or declaration on the part of the Panel would not be considered advisory.

108) Moreover, even if it could be argued that ICANN's Bylaws and Supplementary Procedures are ambiguous on the question of whether or not a decision, opinion or declaration of the IRP Panel is binding, in the Panel's view, this ambiguity would weigh against ICANN's position. The relationship between ICANN and the applicant is clearly an adhesive one. There is no evidence that the terms of the application are negotiable, or that applicants are able to negotiate changes in the IRP.

109) In such a situation, the rule of contra proferentem applies. As the drafter and architect of the IRP Procedure, it was open to ICANN and clearly within its power to adopt a procedure that expressly and clearly announced that the decisions, opinions and declarations of IRP Panels were advisory only. ICANN did not adopt such a procedure.

110) ICANN points to the extensive public and expert input that preceded the formulation of the Supplementary Procedures. The Panel would have expected, were a mere advisory decision, opinion or declaration the objective of the IRP, that this intent be clearly articulated somewhere in the Bylaws or the Supplementary Procedures. In the Panel's view, this could have easily been done.

111) The force of the foregoing textual and construction considerations as pointing to the binding effect of the Panel's decisions and declarations are reinforced by two factors: 1) the exclusive nature of the IRP whereby the non-binding argument would be clearly in contradiction with such a factor<sup>62</sup>;

<sup>62</sup> If the waiver of judicial remedies ICANN obtains from applicants is enforceable, and the IRP process is non-binding, as ICANN contends, then that process leaves TLD applicants and the Internet community with no compulsory remedy of any kind. This is, to put it mildly, a highly watered down notion of "accountability". Nor is such a process "independent", as the ultimate decision maker, and, 2) the special, unique, and publicly important function of ICANN. As explained before, ICANN is not an ordinary private non-profit entity deciding for its own sake who it wishes to conduct business with, and who it does not. ICANN rather, is the steward of a highly valuable and important international resource.

112) Even in ordinary private transactions, with no international or public interest at stake, contractual waivers that purport to give up all remedies are forbidden. Typically, this discussion is found in the Uniform Commercial Code Official Comment to section 2719, which deals with “Contractual modification or limitation of remedy.” That Comment states:

“Under this section parties are left free to shape their remedies to their particular requirements and reasonable agreements limiting or modifying remedies are to be given effect. However, it is the very essence of a sales contract that at least minimum adequate remedies be available. If the parties intend to conclude a contract for sale within this Article they must accept the legal consequence that there be at least a fair quantum of remedy for breach of the obligations or duties outlined in the contract.” [Panel’s emphasis by way of italics added]

113) The need for a minimum adequate remedy is indisputably more important where, as in this case, the party arguing that there is no compulsory remedy is the party entrusted with a special, internationally important and valuable operation.

114) The need for a compulsory remedy is concretely shown by ICANN’s longstanding failure to implement the provision of the Bylaws and Supplementary Procedures requiring the creation of a standing panel. ICANN has offered no explanation for this failure, which evidences that a self-policing regime at ICANN is insufficient. The failure to create a standing panel has consequences, as this case shows, delaying the processing of DCA Trust’s claim, and also prejudicing the interest of a competing .AFRICA applicant.

115) Moreover, assuming for the sake of argument that it is acceptable for ICANN to adopt a remedial scheme with no teeth, the Panel is of the opinion that, at a minimum, the IRP should forthrightly explain and acknowledge that the process is merely advisory. This would at least let parties know before embarking on a potentially expensive process that a victory before the IRP panel may be ignored by ICANN. And, a straightforward acknowledgment that the IRP process is intended to be merely advisory might lead to a legislative or executive initiative to create a truly independent compulsory process. The Panel seriously doubts that the Senators questioning former ICANN President Stuart Lynn in 2002 would have been satisfied had they

ICANN, is also a party to the dispute and directly interested in the outcome. Nor is the process “neutral,” as ICANN’s “core values” call for in its Bylaws.

understood that a) ICANN had imposed on all applicants a waiver of all judicial remedies, and b) the IRP process touted by ICANN as the “ultimate guarantor” of ICANN accountability was only an advisory process, the benefit of which accrued only to ICANN.<sup>63</sup>

ICM Case

116)The Parties in their submissions have discussed the impact on this Decision of the conclusions reached by the IRP panel in the matter of ICM v. ICANN (“ICM Case”). Although this Panel is of the opinion that the decision in the ICM Case should have no influence on the present proceedings, it discusses that matter for the sake of completeness.

117)In the ICM Case, another IRP panel examined the question centrally addressed in this part of this Decision: whether declarations and/or decisions by an IRP panel are binding, or merely advisory. The ICM Case panel concluded that its decision was advisory.<sup>64</sup> 118)In doing so, the ICM Case panel noted that the IRP used an “international arbitration provider” and “arbitrators nominated by that provider,” that the ICDR Rules were to “govern the arbitration”, and that “arbitration connotes a binding process.” These aspects of the IRP, the panel observed, were “suggestive of an arbitral process that produces a binding award.”<sup>65</sup> But, the panel continued, “there are other indicia that cut the other way, and more deeply.” The panel pointed to language in the Interim Measures section of the Supplementary Procedures empowering the panel to “recommend” rather than order interim measures, and to language requiring the ICANN Board to “consider” the IRP declaration at its next meeting, indicating, in the panel’s view, the lack of binding effect of the Declaration.

119)The ICM Case panel specifically observed that “the relaxed temporal proviso to do no more than ‘consider’ the IRP declaration, and to do so at the next meeting of the Board ‘where feasible’, emphasized that it is not binding. If the IRP’s declaration were binding, there would be nothing to consider but rather a determination or decision to implement in a timely manner. The Supplementary Procedures adopted for IRP, in the article on ‘Form and Effect of an IRP Declaration’, significantly omit provision of Article 27 of the ICDR Rules specifying that an award ‘shall be final and binding on the parties’. Moreover, the preparatory work of the IRP provisions...confirms that the intention of the drafters of the IRP process was to put in place a process that produced declarations that would not be binding and that left ultimate decision-making authority in the hands of the Board.”<sup>66</sup>

120) Following the issuance of the ICM Case Declaration, ICANN amended its Bylaws, and related Supplementary Procedures governing IRPs, removing most, but not all, references to “arbitration”, and adding that the “declarations of the IRP Panel, and the Board’s subsequent action on those declarations, are final and have precedential value.”

Difference between this IRP and the ICM Case

121) According to DCA Trust, the panel in the ICM Matter, “based its decision that its declaration would not be binding, ‘but rather advisory in effect,’ on specific language in both a different set of Bylaws and a different set of Supplementary Procedures than those that apply in this dispute...one crucial difference in the Bylaws applicable during the ICM was the absence of the language describing panel declarations as ‘final and precedential’.”<sup>67</sup> The Panel agrees.

122) Section 3(21) of the 11 April 2013 ICANN Bylaws now provides: “Where feasible, the Board shall consider the IRP Panel declaration at the Board’s next meeting. The declarations of the IRP Panel, and the Board’s subsequent action on those declarations, are final and have precedential value.” At the time the ICM Matter was decided, section 3(15) of Article IV of ICANN’s Bylaws did not contain the second sentence of section 3(21).

123) As explained in the DCA Trust First Memorial:

“[In] finding that the IRP was advisory, the ICM Panel also relied on the fact that the Bylaws gave the IRP [panel] the authority to ‘declare,’ rather than ‘decide’ or ‘determine,’ whether an action or inaction of the Board was inconsistent with the Articles of Incorporation or the Bylaws. However, the ICM Panel did not address the fact that the Supplementary Procedures, which govern the process in combination with the ICDR Rules, defined ‘declaration’ as ‘decisions/opinions of the IRP’. If a ‘declaration’ is a ‘decision’, then surely a panel with the authority to ‘declare’ has the authority to ‘decide’.”<sup>68</sup>

The Panel agrees with DCA Trust.

124) Moreover, as explained by DCA Trust:

“[The] ICM Panel [...] found it significant that the Supplementary Procedures adopted for the IRP omitted Article 27 of the ICDR Rules – which specifies that an award ‘shall be final and binding on the parties.’ On that basis, the ICM Panel concluded that Article 27 did not apply. ICANN’s Supplementary Rules, however, were – and continue to be – silent on the effect of an award. In the event there is inconsistency between the Supplementary Procedures and the ICDR Rules, then the Supplementary Procedures govern; but there is nothing in the applicable rules suggesting that an omission of an ICDR Rule means that it does not apply. Indeed, the very same Supplementary Procedures provide that ‘the ICDR’s International Arbitration Rules [...] will govern the process in combination with these Supplementary Procedures. Furthermore, it is only in the event there is ‘any inconsistency’ between the Supplementary Procedures and the ICDR Rules that the Supplementary Procedures govern.”<sup>69</sup>

Again, the Panel agrees with DCA Trust.

125) With respect, therefore, this Panel disagrees with the panel in the ICM Case that the decisions and declarations of the IRP panel are not binding. In reaching that conclusion, in addition to failing to make the observations set out above, the ICM panel did not address the issue of the applicant’s waiver of all judicial remedies, it did not examine the application of the contra proferentem doctrine, and it did not examine ICANN’s commitment to accountability and fair and transparent processes in its Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws.

126) ICANN argues that the panel’s decision in the ICM Case that declarations are not binding is dispositive of the question. ICANN relies on the provision in the Bylaws, quoted above, (3(21)) to the effect that declarations “have precedential value.” Like certain other terms in the IRP and Supplementary Procedures, the Panel is of the view that this phrase is ambiguous. Legal precedent may be either binding or persuasive.<sup>70</sup> The Bylaws do not indicate which kind of precedent is intended.

127) Stare decisis is the legal doctrine, which gives binding precedential effect, typically to earlier decisions on a settled point of law, decided by a higher court. The doctrine is not mandatory, as illustrated by the practice in common law jurisdictions of overruling earlier precedents deemed unwise or unworkable. In the present case, there is no “settled” law in the usual sense of a body of cases approved by a court of ultimate resort, but instead, a single decision by one panel on a controversial point, which this Panel, with respect, considers to be unconvincing.

128) Therefore, the Panel is of the view that the ruling in the ICM Case is not persuasive and binding upon it.

VI. DECLARATION OF THE PANEL

129)Based on the foregoing and the language and content of the IRP Procedure, the Panel is of the view that it has the power to interpret and determine the IRP Procedure as it relates to the future conduct of these proceedings.

130)Based on the foregoing and the language and content of the IRP Procedure, the Panel issues the following procedural directions:

(i) The Panel orders a reasonable documentary exchange in these proceedings with a view to maintaining efficacy and economy, and invites the Parties to agree by or before 29 August 2014, on a form, method and schedule of exchange of documents between them;

(ii) The Panel permits the Parties to benefit from additional filings and supplemental briefing going forward and invites the Parties to agree on a reasonable exchange timetable going forward;

(iii) The Panel allows a video hearing as per the agreement of the Parties, but reserves its decision to order an in-person hearing and live testimony pending a further examination of the representations that will be proffered by each side, including the filing of any additional evidence which this Decision permits; and

(iv) The Panel permits both Parties at the hearing to challenge and test the veracity of statements made by witnesses.

If the Parties are unable to agree on a reasonable documentary exchange process or to agree on the scope and length of additional filings and supplemental briefing, the Panel will intervene and, with the input of the Parties, provide further guidance.

131)Based on the foregoing and the language and content of the IRP Procedure, the Panel concludes that this Declaration and its future Declaration on the Merits of this case are binding on the Parties.

132)The Panel reserves its views with respect to any other issues raised by the Parties for determination at the next stage of these proceedings. At that time, the Panel will consider the Parties' respective arguments in those regards.

133)The Panel reserves its decision on the issue of costs relating to this stage of the proceeding until the hearing of the merits.

This Declaration may be executed in any number of counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original, and all of which together shall constitute the Declaration of this Panel.

This Declaration on the IRP Procedure has thirty-three (33) pages.

CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE

SECTION 1297.311-1297.318

1297.311. An arbitral award shall be made in writing and shall be signed by the members of the arbitral tribunal.

1297.312. For the purposes of Section 1297.311, in arbitral proceedings with more than one arbitrator, the signatures of the majority of all the members of the arbitral tribunal shall be sufficient so long as the reason for any omitted signature is stated.

1297.313. The arbitral award shall state the reasons upon which it is based, unless the parties have agreed that no reasons are to be given, or the award is an arbitral award on agreed terms under Article 3 (commencing with Section 1297.301) of this chapter.

1297.314. The arbitral award shall state its date and the place of arbitration as determined in accordance with Article 3 (commencing with Section 1297.201) of Chapter 5 and the award shall be deemed to have been made at that place.

1297.315. After the arbitral award is made, a signed copy shall be delivered to each party.

1297.316. The arbitral tribunal may, at any time during the arbitral proceedings, make an interim arbitral award on any matter with respect to which it may make a final arbitral award. The interim award may be enforced in the same manner as a final arbitral award.

1297.317. Unless otherwise agreed by the parties, the arbitral tribunal may award interest.

1297.318. (a) Unless otherwise agreed by the parties, the costs of an arbitration shall be at the discretion of the arbitral tribunal.

(b) In making an order for costs, the arbitral tribunal may include as costs any of the following:

- (1) The fees and expenses of the arbitrators and expert witnesses.
- (2) Legal fees and expenses.
- (3) Any administration fees of the institution supervising the arbitration, if any.

(4) Any other expenses incurred in connection with the arbitral proceedings.

(c) In making an order for costs, the arbitral tribunal may specify any of the following:

- (1) The party entitled to costs.
  - (2) The party who shall pay the costs.
  - (3) The amount of costs or method of determining that amount.
  - (4) The manner in which the costs shall be paid.

Chapter 2

Procedural Protection of Legitimate Expectations

1 Introduction

It was argued in Chapter 1 that public law should, primarily for reasons of fairness and trust in administration, protect legitimate expectations created by administrative decisions, representations, and conduct. In this chapter I will examine how principles of administrative procedure contribute towards meeting those requirements. The connection between procedures and expectations may be explained as follows.

First, procedures may reduce the risk that expectations will actually be disappointed in a way which causes unfairness or mistrust in government, because they affect the outcomes of administrative decision-making processes.<sup>1</sup> If persons affected by administrative action are given advance notice, they may adapt their expectations and act so as to avoid or limit loss caused by reliance upon previous administrative representations and conduct. If affected persons are consulted or heard, their expectations and reliance can be brought to the administration's attention, and arguments against action which will disappoint those expectations may be presented. If decisions which affect expectations are followed by reasons, the administration will be forced to consider the justification for disappointing those expectations.

Second, procedures may reduce the feeling of unfairness and mistrust which a person whose expectations are disappointed often experiences. For if the holder of an expectation is granted a notification, a say in the process, and a justification for why his expectation cannot be upheld, the administration acknowledges that its action affects his autonomy and personal dignity.<sup>2</sup>

It will now, with these general comments in mind, be considered to what extent legitimate expectations are subject to procedural protection in English,<sup>3</sup>

French,<sup>4</sup> and EC law.<sup>5</sup> The discussion will be structured as follows. First, a comparative overview of administrative procedures in English, French, and EC law will be given. Second, I will analyse the procedural protections which apply when administrative authorities revoke decisions or go back on informal representations (Situations 1–4). Due to the limited space available only the most important aspects of fair procedures will be discussed (namely notice, hearing, and reasons).<sup>6</sup> Finally, the results of the comparative survey will be summed up and proposals for reform of English law will be presented.

2 Procedural Fairness in English, French, and EC Law: A Comparative Overview

Administrative procedure has traditionally played a more important role in the common law than in Continental legal systems. While the British courts had by the seventeenth century devised principles of 'natural justice' to control administrative power, the French courts have traditionally relied more upon substantive principles of judicial review and damages liability for this purpose.<sup>7</sup> A number of historical, ideological, and socio-legal factors may explain this difference. Two explanations are particularly important for our purposes.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>6</sup> Thus, the right to be granted adequate time to prepare answers, access to files, opportunity to make oral representations, opportunity to call and cross-examine witnesses and opponents, legal representation, and the right to have a decision decided without bias will not be discussed.

<sup>7</sup> It is debated in France to what extent French procedural principles differ from their English counterparts. See Waline, above n. 4, J. Lemasurier, 'Vers une démocratie administrative: du refus d'informer au droit d'être informé', RDP 1980, 1239, 1245. Compare Barthelemy in JC Fasc. 590–1 nos. 20–2; G. Vedel and P. Delvolvé, Droit Administratif, 12th edn. (Paris, 1992), 472.

<sup>8</sup> See also Tridimas, above n. 5, 245 noting the connection between the Diceyan ultra vires doctrine and the preference for procedural rather than substantive judicial control of administrative action.

First, administrative procedures are largely the product of case law. In England, to a large extent, they have been developed by analogy with the principle which has since ancient times a strong adversarial, formal, and technically exacting degree, viewed as an ideal for administrative procedures. These principles were less influential in France. France's system of the separate division of administrative and judicial courts, traced back to the seventeenth century, with administrative courts, headed by the Conseil d'État, operating on a contradictoire,<sup>9</sup> which encapsulates the principle, but it is overall more inquisitorial, in contrast to English judicial procedures<sup>13</sup> (and administrative procedures).<sup>14</sup> This difference between the two systems is the result of the development of different administrative procedures.

Second, the rationale for procedural protection is different in practice.<sup>15</sup> In France, the value of procedural protection is seen as a contribution to correct outcomes. That is, procedural protection is seen as instrumental.<sup>16</sup> Thus, a decision will be annulled only by a reviewing court if there is a difference to the substantive decision.

English, French, and EC Law:

Overview

English law played a more important role in the development of administrative law systems. While the British courts had by the late 19th century developed a sense of 'natural justice' to control administrative action, they have traditionally relied more upon common law principles of tort and damages liability for this purpose.<sup>7</sup> The socio-legal factors may explain this difference. The following are particularly important for our purposes.<sup>8</sup>

First, administrative procedures reflect judicial procedures because they are largely the product of case law. In Britain, administrative procedures have to a large extent been developed by analogies from the audi alterem partem principle which has since ancient times applied in ordinary court proceedings.<sup>9</sup> This adversarial, formal, and technically elaborate procedure was, and is still to some degree, viewed as an ideal for administrative decision-making.<sup>10</sup> Similar analogies were less influential in France. French administrative law is largely the work of the separate division of administrative courts, the origins of which may be traced back to the seventeenth century.<sup>11</sup> The procedure in the administrative courts, headed by the Conseil d'État, is subject to a principle of 'contradiction' (contradictoire),<sup>12</sup> which encapsulates the basic idea of audi alterem partem, but it is overall more inquisitorial, informal, and based on written evidence than English judicial procedures<sup>13</sup> (and also more so than French private law court procedures).<sup>14</sup> This difference between judicial procedures may explain the development of different administrative procedures in Britain and in France.

Second, the rationale for procedural rights affects their scope and content in practice.<sup>15</sup> In France, the value of procedures is generally seen to be their contribution to correct outcomes. That is, their rationale is almost exclusively seen as instrumental.<sup>16</sup> Thus, a decision vitiated by a procedural error will in France only be annulled by a reviewing court if it appears that the error made an actual difference to the substantive decision made.<sup>17</sup> By contrast, legal writers<sup>18</sup>—and increasingly also the courts—in common law countries have adopted non-instrumental rationales for procedures.<sup>19</sup> Procedures are seen to promote democratic participation, dignity, and autonomy as well as legally correct outcomes. Consequently, decisions vitiated by a procedural error will normally be quashed in judicial review proceedings without it being necessary to show a causal link between procedure and substance.<sup>20</sup> The recognition of non-instrumental rationales in Britain may explain why the scope of procedural rights is still wider than in France.<sup>21</sup>

The difference between the English and the French courts' approach to judicial control of administration has diminished somewhat over the last twenty years. The British courts have begun to develop more refined and searching substantive principles of review, and procedural protection has since 1978 been extended in France by legislative codes concerning hearings, reasons, and access to files.<sup>22</sup> However, important differences remain both in the conceptualization and substance of procedural rights. To understand these differences, and their significance for the protection of legitimate expectations, it is necessary to be clear about three basic features of English, French, and EC law: what are the sources, the scope, and the content of such rights?

(A) The Sources of Procedural Protection

The sources of procedural protection are largely similar in English, French, and EC law, although the practical importance of different sources vary.<sup>23</sup> General principles based on case law remain, in all three systems, the primary source. In English law, procedural protection derives from the two pillars of natural justice (audi alteram partem and nemo iudex in re sua)<sup>24</sup> now known simply as the principle of procedural fairness.<sup>25</sup> In French and EC law, the functionally equiv-

<sup>21</sup> It remains somewhat unclear to what extent the CFI and ECJ see the right to be heard as serving non-instrumental values. Decisions are only annulled if the failure to grant a procedural entitlement 'might have influenced' the outcome. See Cases C-142/87 Belgium v Commission [1990] ECR I-959; T-30/91 Solvay v Commission [1995] ECR II-1775 para 68; T-290/97 Dordtselaan v Commission, 18/1–2000 para 47; Nehl, above n. 5, 97–8; Tridimas, above n. 5, 244–5, 259–62.

alent principles are known as the rights of the defence (droits de la défense)<sup>26</sup> and impartiality (impartialité).<sup>27</sup> The French principle of droits de la défense originates in nineteenth-century legislation and case law concerning disciplinary measures against public employees.<sup>28</sup> Procedural rules developed in this area were from the 1930s<sup>29</sup> broadened into a general unwritten principle established finally in 1944 by the famous case of Ms Trompier-Gravier.<sup>30</sup> The EC law principle of defence rights also emerged in employment cases,<sup>31</sup> but in the TMPA case from 1974 the ECJ confirmed its status as a generally applicable norm which is binding upon all the EC institutions and valid at a higher level than all secondary measures.<sup>32</sup>

General principles of procedural fairness are supplemented by specific statutory procedures in areas such as immigration, social welfare, planning, and licensing. The growing practical importance of such procedures has been noted both in England and France.<sup>33</sup> A survey of EC legislation reveals a similar picture; some form of hearing provisions apply in many,<sup>34</sup> but not all of the areas in which the community institutions exercise direct administrative authority.<sup>35</sup> Legislative provisions of more general application are also important sources of procedural protection. The EC Treaty contains a few references to the right to a hearing<sup>36</sup> and a general rule in Art 253 that all the Community institutions must give reasons for legally binding measures.<sup>37</sup> In Britain and in France, statutory procedural requirements apply to appeal tribunals and public

<sup>26</sup> This principle is in French law supplemented by the principle of parallélisme des formes et procédures. The latter principle is subject to numerous exceptions and its practical relevance is limited. See M. Basset, 'Le principe dit de "l'acte contraire" en droit administratif français', Doctoral thesis (Paris, 1967), 217-45; Chapus 1040-2.

(B) The Scope of General Principles of Procedural Fairness

Different legal systems delineate the scope of procedural fairness or 'defence rights' by reference to criteria, which differ widely both in linguistic and conceptual terms. Despite these differences, it is clear that three questions arise in all legal systems. First, what types of interests deserve procedural protection? Second, how intensively must such interests be affected to attract protection? Third, what additional conditions must be fulfilled for protections to apply? The answers to these questions in English, French, and EC law may be set out as follows.

I What Types of Interests?

The first question is what types of interests are protected by procedural principles. There are similarities, but also important differences, between English, French, and EC law in this respect. The English courts distinguish between rights and interests. Traditionally, it was assumed that a decision which takes away a legal right must comply with procedural fairness.<sup>42</sup> However, the concept of rights was never clearly defined,<sup>43</sup> and it is now accepted that a decision which affects an interest of a substantial, as opposed to trivial, kind must also comply with procedural fairness.<sup>44</sup> The French courts never distinguished between rights and other interests in the context of administrative procedures, and French writers do not attempt to discern precisely what interests are actually protected. A decision which affects the situation of a person adversely <sup>38</sup> Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1992, s 10; Decree of 23/11-58; Decree of 14/5-76; Law of 12/7-83 completed by Decree of 25/4-85. See L. N. Brown, 'Tribunal Adjudication in Britain: Model Rules of Procedure' (1993) ERPL, special edn. 287; J.-C. Helin and R. Hostiou, Droit des enquêtes publiques (Paris, 1993).

<sup>40</sup> French administrative rule-making takes a number of forms, such as décret, règlement, and ordonnance. Following Brown and Bell 11 this book uses the term 'decree' as a shorthand way of referring to all of these.

<sup>41</sup> Art 8, Decree (Ordonnance) no 83-1025, 28/11-83, JO 1983, 3492. This provision is shortly to be codified by primary legislation. must, it is said, comply with the principle, but not distinguish between rights and interests on the ground that the EC rights of the individual are 'the interests of a person adversely'.<sup>45</sup>

A reading of case law and secondly, the rights protected by the French and the EC principles are significantly different from the 'rights of procedural fairness' in Britain.<sup>46</sup> There is a certain overlap under all of the different concepts, but they include, in particular, property,<sup>47</sup> livelihood,<sup>50</sup> and reputation.<sup>51</sup> Thus, a decision which affects interests with a certain intensity (see below) and some form of hearing under English law is a growing recognition that procedural fairness has serious financial implications, although not for the addressee.<sup>52</sup> So far, the scope of the principles is quite similar.

There is, however, one very important difference between English and EC law. The English courts accept that legitimate expectations must comply with procedural fairness, but are distinct from rights and interests. As discussed below, based on some administrative law principles, representation rather than the expectation

v.

SAINT FRANCIS MEMORIAL HOSPITAL et al.,
 Defendants and Respondents

Civ. No. 32791.

Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.
 February 24, 1975.

SUMMARY

The trial court denied the petition of a licensed physician for a writ of mandate that would have compelled a private hospital to consider his application for staff privileges. The court upheld a hospital by-law permitting summary rejection of such an application, without a right to hearing, solely on the basis of failure of the applicant to include three letters of reference from active members of the hospital staff. Though the hospital received 22 letters of reference from physicians who were not on its staff, it returned the doctor's application without consideration for the sole reason that it did not have the three letters from staff members. (Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, No. 625990, Ira A. Brown, Jr., Judge.)

The Court of Appeal reversed with directions to the trial court to issue an injunction compelling the hospital to reconsider the physician's application pursuant to fair procedure standards. The court noted recent decisions to the effect that private hospitals are to be governed by the same criteria as public hospitals, and it held that the by-law precluding consideration of the application violated the minimal common law standards of a fair procedure. It was pointed out that the by-law, in preventing the application from being considered and rejected, denied the applicant the benefit of another by-law providing for hearing procedures for rejected applications. (Opinion by Taylor, P. J., with Rouse, J., concurring. Separate concurring and dissenting opinion by Kane, J.)

Healing Arts and Institutions § 5--Hospitals--Applications for Staff Membership.

In a proceeding in mandamus by a licensed practicing physician who sought to compel a private hospital to consider his application for staff privileges, the trial court erred in upholding a hospital by-law permitting summary rejection of such an application, without a right to hearing, solely on the basis of failure of the applicant to include three letters of reference from active members of the hospital staff. Denial of staff membership effectively impairs a physician's right to practice his profession whether or not any economic hardship results, and, while there may be a rational connection between endorsement by staff members and the assurance of professional and ethical qualifications of physicians for the common good of the hospital and its patients, it is not sufficient to permit rejection of an application for staff membership solely for failure to procure such endorsements, without a concurrent right in the applicant to challenge such summary action by an appropriate consideration and hearing as to his actual qualifications.

TAYLOR, P. J.

Plaintiff, a licensed and practicing physician, appeals from a judgment denying his petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, Saint Francis Memorial Hospital, to consider his application for staff privileges. He contends that the trial court erred in upholding a by-law which permits summary rejection of an application *509 for staff membership, without a right to hearing, solely on the basis that such application fails to include three letters of reference from active members of the hospital staff. On the basis of Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists (1974) 12 Cal.3d 541 [116 Cal.Rptr. 245, 526 P.2d 253], and Ascherman v. San Francisco Medical Society, 39 Cal.App.3d 623 [114 Cal.Rptr. 681], we have concluded that his contention is well taken and that the judgment must be reversed.

The court found the pertinent facts as follows: The hospital is a privately owned medical hospital and not a public entity but is the recipient of funds made available under the Hill-Burton Act.<sup>1</sup> On August 20, 1970, the physician submitted an application for admission to the medical staff. His application was returned without consideration for the sole reason that it did not have three letters<sup>2</sup> from members of the hospital's active staff as required by its applicable by-law (set forth in full below).<sup>3</sup>

- 1 Pursuant to the Hill-Burton Act, 42 United States Code Annotated section 291, the federal government makes grants to public and private hospitals for construction costs.
- 2 The hospital received 22 letters of reference from physicians who were not on its staff.
- 3 Article III, section 4(a) of the hospital's by-laws provides: "Application for original membership on the Medical Staff shall be presented to the Medical Advisory Board in writing, on the prescribed form which shall state the qualifications and references of the applicant, and shall recite facts to show that the applicant possesses the qualifications specified in Section 2 of Article III hereof, and such other information as may be required from time to time by the Medical Advisory Board. The applicant shall also signify his agreement to abide by the By-Laws, Rules and Regulations of the medical Staff, and to the California Medical Association Guiding Principles for Physician-Hospital Relationships. The application shall be signed by the applicant. Three members of the Active Staff must submit letters of reference on behalf of the applicant. No member of the Board of Trustees shall sponsor an applicant for Medical Staff membership. If acceptable for membership, the applicant shall show evidence that he has obtained malpractice insurance in amounts sufficient to meet the minimum requirements of the Board of Trustees." (Italics supplied.)

The physician has been practicing in San Francisco since 1959 and has a busy practice, with about 50 percent of his patients treated in hospitals in San Mateo County. He enjoys full staff privileges at one hospital in San Francisco, and three others located respectively in Redwood City, Burlingame and San Mateo. He was formerly a staff member of the recently closed Callison Memorial Hospital in San Francisco, and currently has an application pending for admittance to another San Francisco hospital. He estimated that in 1970, his gross annual income was $80,000-$90,000 and made no showing of a substantial, significant or irreparable injury to his practice as the result of his inability to use the hospital. On the contrary, he admitted that his purpose in making the application was to find a hospital a little closer to his home office in order to make life a bit easier for himself. *510

As to the by-law here in question, the court found in accord with the allegations of the answer that the hospital reasonably relies upon the authors of the letters of reference submitted pursuant to the by-law provision in question for vital information concerning an applicant, including but not limited to information regarding his character, reputation, skill and ability to work with others. The hospital does not have a power of subpoena over persons writing letters of reference regarding an applicant, nor any other such similar power, and must rely upon the candor of the authors of the letters of reference for information vital to consideration of an applicant. Members of the active medical staff of the hospital may be expected to and will exercise much more care and exhibit far more concern than nonmembers over applicants for membership to the medical staff. These active staff members may be expected to be and will be more candid and cooperative than nonmembers as to applicants since sensitive topics are at issue in the consideration of applications.

The court also found that the purpose and intent of the by-law provision and the purpose and intent of the hospital in adopting it was reasonable for the protection of the hospital, its medical staff and patients, as well as specifically to ensure and obtain vital information regarding applicants for membership to the medical staff. The hospital had a valid and substantial interest in acquiring knowledge concerning the background of an applicant, and specifically information regarding his character, reputation, skill, and ability to work with others.

The court concluded that as a private institution, the hospital was free to establish its own rules, regulations and qualifications for medical staff membership, so long as these were not unreasonable or applied in a discriminatory manner, and that the by-law in question was not unreasonable and had not been applied in a discriminatory manner.

The physician's main contention on appeal is that respondent is a "public" institution and, therefore, cannot have a by-law like the one in issue that arbitrarily and unreasonably restricts staff memberships. Neither the parties nor the court below had the benefit of our state Supreme Court's recent decision in Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists, supra, hereafter Pinsker II.

Pinsker II flowed from the court's earlier holding that an applicant for membership in a professional society had a judicially enforceable right to have his application considered in a manner comporting with the *511 fundamentals of due process (Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Soc. of Orthodontists, 1 Cal.3d 160, 166 [81 Cal.Rptr. 623, 460 P.2d 495], hereafter Pinsker I).

In Pinsker II, the state Supreme Court cited Martino v. Concord Community Hosp. Dist., 233 Cal.App.2d 51 [43 Cal.Rptr. 255], and Wyatt v. Tahoe Forest Hospital Dist., 174 Cal.App.2d 709 [345 P.2d 93], to hold (at p. 554) that because of the fiduciary responsibilities arising out of "public service" functions, membership decisions of professional associations, like those of the hospital staffs involved in Martino and Wyatt, supra, must be rendered pursuant to minimal requisites of fair procedures required by established common law principles.<sup>4</sup> The court specifically noted (fn. 12, p. 554) that while the defendants in both Wyatt and Martino were public entities, neither decision relied on this factor but on the fact that denial of membership would effectively impair the applicant's right "to fully practice his profession," citing Wyatt and Rosner v. Eden Township Hospital Dist., 58 Cal.2d 592, 598 [25 Cal.Rptr. 551, 375 P.2d 431].

4 The court indicated (fn. 7, p. 550) that since the decision was based on common law rather than constitutional principles, the appropriate language was "fair procedure" rather than "due process."

<sup>[11]</sup> Before applying the test of Pinsker II to the instant case, we must deal with the question of whether here, as in Pinsker, denial of membership would effectively impair the physician's right "to fully practice his profession." Although the trial court found that the physician had made no showing of "economic necessity" here, Pinsker I indicates that "economic necessity" for membership is not the criterion. As to the trial court's finding that other San Francisco hospitals were available, this court (Division One) recently indicated in Ascherman v. San Francisco Medical Society, 39 Cal.App.3d 623, footnote 9 at page 650 [114 Cal.Rptr. 681], (approved in Pinsker II, fn. 8, pp. 550-551), the mere existence of other hospitals may not be a sufficient safety valve to prevent deprivation of substantial economic advantage with the advent of comprehensive health planning. We conclude, therefore, that denial of staff membership would effectively impair the physician's right to fully practice his profession. In Pinsker II, the court also relied on its decision in Willis v. Santa Ana etc. Hospital Assn., 58 Cal.2d 806, 810 [26 Cal.Rptr. 640, 376 P.2d 568], which held that private hospitals are under the same constraints as public ones to protect against arbitrary exclusion from membership. The court said at page 550: "... whenever a private association is legally required to refrain from arbitrary action, the association's action must be both substantively rational and procedurally *512 fair." The court then rejected an argument that procedural fairness was restricted to expulsion cases and concluded that a fair procedure requires that before the denial of an application, an applicant be notified of the reason for the rejection and given a fair opportunity to defend himself.

We turn, therefore, to the question of whether the by-law here in question was substantially rational and procedurally fair. Article II, section 1 of the hospital by-laws provided that its purpose was: "To insure that all patients admitted to the hospital or treated in the out-patient department, receive the best possible care."

The trial court found that, because of the greater frankness to be expected from staff members than nonmembers, there was a rational connection between the endorsement by staff members and the assurance of professional and ethical qualifications of the physicians for the common good of the hospital and its patients. While we may not quarrel with that proposition in the abstract, we do not agree that such "rational connection" is sufficient to permit rejection of one's application for staff membership solely because of his failure to procure such endorsements without a concurrent right in the applicant to challenge such summary action by an appropriate consideration and hearing as to his actual qualifications. For one thing, there is too great a danger that the necessary endorsements may be arbitrarily and discriminatorily withheld. Precisely because of this threshold exclusion effect of the by-law, we think the instant situation requires criteria analogous to the constitutional ones used for "public hospitals." We are supported in this conclusion by the federal cases holding that, when a private hospital accepts federal funds for construction or operation, discrimination against physicians may constitute a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment (see Sams v. Ohio Valley General Hospital Association (4th Cir. 1969) 413 F.2d 826, 828-830; and Citta v. Delaware Valley Hospital (E.D. Pa. 1970) 313 F.Supp. 301, 306-310; and note, Eaton v. Grubbs (4th Cir. 1964) 329 F.2d 710, 713-715; and Simkins v. Moses H. Cone Memorial Hospital (4th Cir. 1963) 323 F.2d 959-969, cert. den. (1964) 376 U.S. 938 [11 L.Ed.2d 659, 84 S.Ct. 793]). In addition, our Supreme Court's holding in Pinsker II approved the elimination of the public/private distinction along the lines used by this court in Ascherman v. San Francisco Medical Society, 39 Cal.App.3d 623, 645 [114 Cal.Rptr. 681], quoted with approval from Silver v. Castle Memorial Hospital (1972) 53 Hawaii 475 [497 P.2d 564] (cert. den. (1972) 409 U.S. 1048 [34 L.Ed.2d 500, 93 S.Ct. 517], and reh. den. (1973) 409 U.S. 1131 [35 L.Ed.2d 264, 93 S.Ct. 936]) as follows: “There the court, although acknowledging that the hospital involved had more than a nominal governmental involvement in *513 the form of funding, noted: ‘... if the proposition that any hospital occupies a fiduciary trust relationship between itself, its staff and the public it seeks to serve is accepted, then the rationale for any distinction between public, “quasi public” and truly private breaks down and becomes meaningless, especially if the hospital’s patients are considered to be of primary concern.’ (53 Hawaii at p. 482 [497 P.2d at p. 570].)”

In Ascherman, supra, this court (Division One) also reviewed the criteria established by the Legislature, pursuant to the Local Hospital District Law (Health & Saf. Code, div. 23, § 32000 et seq.), as well as the recent additions to the Business and Professions Code, and concluded that “... the Legislature intended private hospitals to be governed by the same criteria as public hospitals.” (Italics added.)

By-law provisions, substantially identical to that here in issue, were rejected in Foster v. Mobile County Hospital Board, 398 F.2d 227, and Hamilton County Hospital v. Andrews (1949) 227 Ind. 217 [84 N.E.2d 469]. The Indiana court said at page 472: “The present rules, however, provide that the hospital can appoint new members to its staff only upon recommendation of its staff. It would seem by this rule, recommendation to membership may be rejected by the board, but that no one shall be made a member of the staff without such recommendation. This is an unreasonable requirement, ...”

The trial court’s reasoning overlooked this aspect of the by-law as its conclusion of rationality was based on the potential use of the letters from staff members in relation to an application considered on its merits, “regarding his character, reputation, skill and ability to work with others.”<sup>5</sup>

5 As to this finding, we note that in Rosner v. Eden Township Hospital Dist., 58 Cal.2d 592, at page 599 [25 Cal.Rptr. 551, 375 P.2d 431], our Supreme Court held that inability to get along with some doctors or hospital personnel was not a sufficient ground for exclusion as to a “public” hospital.

The by-law has the inherent grave danger that members of the active staff may seek to exclude certain applicants because they are of a certain race, religion, ancestry, because they have testified against them in malpractice suits, or simply because they do not like them; or what if an applicant simply does not know three members of the staff of a particular hospital whose facilities he needs to practice his profession?

The hospital relies on Kronen v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists, 237 Cal.App.2d 289 [46 Cal.Rptr. 808], decided by this court (Division *514 One) in 1965. In that case, two sponsors of the plaintiff, who had originally recommended him for membership in a professional society, for reasons set forth in the record, withdrew their recommendations from this second application. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to judicial review as to whether this withdrawal was arbitrary or wrongfully accomplished, and on the basis of the evidence in the record, affirmed the trial court’s conclusion that there had been no wrongful or arbitrary withdrawal. Kronen was subsequently cited with approval, as a basis for the decision in Pinsker I. Kronen, however, unlike the instant case, did not involve a threshold rejection without a consideration of the application on its merits.

Even assuming substantive rationality here, the effect of the by-law was to prevent the physician’s application from being considered and rejected. Thus, he never had the benefit of article III, section 7 of the by-laws which provides for hearing procedures for rejected applications.<sup>6</sup> While the physician was notified of the reason for the hospital’s refusal to consider his application (the failure to have the requisite number of letters from staff members), he was not given a fair opportunity to defend himself. The fact that the physician was able to obtain a large number of letters from physicians not on the active staff of the hospital would indicate that he might well have met the required professional qualifications for staff membership.

6 Respondents’ attorney conceded, and in fact adamantly contended at oral argument, that article III, section 7 was inapplicable where an application was never received for processing because of the physician’s failure to obtain the three required letters from staff members pursuant to article III, section 4(a). We agree that a reading of the entirety of article III clearly confirms the propriety of this contention.

We conclude that the by-law in the instant case that served to preclude consideration of the physician’s application also violated the minimal common law standards of a fair procedure.

The judgment is reversed and the trial court is directed to issue an injunction compelling the hospital to reconsider the application pursuant to a fair procedure, as outlined in Pinsker II.

Concurring and Dissenting.

For reasons which shall appear, I agree that a remand to the trial court is appropriate. I cannot, however, subscribe to the conclusion that the questioned by-law is either unreasonable per se or violative of “minimal common law standards of a fair *515 procedure.” On the contrary, in my opinion the requirement of obtaining letters of reference from three members of the active staff is entirely reasonable and sensible, is rationally connected to the essential and critical purposes of a professional and ethical private hospital and does no violence whatever to standards of fair procedure. I therefore respectfully dissent.

The majority bootstraps its contrary conclusion by means of indulging in rank speculation, viz: “There is too great a danger that the necessary endorsements may be arbitrarily and discriminatorily withheld.” And later: “The by-law has the inherent grave danger that members of the active staff may seek to exclude certain applicants because they are of a certain race, religion, ancestry, because they have testified against them in malpractice suits, or simply because they do not like them;” (italics added).

There is absolutely no evidence whatever in this record to suggest that any such “inherent grave danger” has actually occurred, or that it is reasonably likely to occur. Indeed, plaintiff makes no allegation that his claimed inability to obtain the necessary recommendations is due to any such arbitrary or discriminatory motivation.

Bearing in mind that we are dealing with common law - not constitutional - standards of “fair procedure” (Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists (1974) 12 Cal.3d 541, 550, fn. 7 [116 Cal.Rptr. 245, 526 P.2d 253]), we should not allow our decision to be formulated by “due process” considerations which are not only inapplicable (Pinsker II, p. 550, fn. 7, supra) but, in my opinion, inappropriate to the situation and the parties at bench.

First of all there can be no dispute with the fact that a private hospital, the purpose of which is to insure that all patients admitted - or treated - receive the best possible care, is free to establish its own rules, regulations and qualifications for medical staff membership, so long as they are not unreasonable or applied in a discriminatory manner. Here, defendants’ own by-laws contained such an expression of purpose, and the trial court found that a rational connection exists between the endorsement of staff members and the insurance of professional and ethical qualifications of the physicians for the common good of the hospital and its patients. That finding, in my view, is conclusively persuasive. *516

At a time when the standards of professional conduct and service are subject to aggressive consumer assault and when hospitals and physicians are exposed to increasing horizons of liability - often predicated upon principles of vicarious or imputed liability - courts should not unduly interfere with the legitimate and ostensible good-faith efforts of private hospitals and physicians to protect themselves.

No enterprise is more important than one which undertakes the responsibility of rendering medical care to the sick, sore, lame, and disabled members of society. It seems to me to be patently elementary that in order to discharge such an onerous and awesome duty, the hospital should be clothed with broad discretionary authority to establish reasonable standards for staff admission.

The majority’s concern that the necessary endorsements may be withheld is premised on the erroneous assumption that an applicant such as appellant is left entirely without a remedy in the event he is unable to obtain the three letters of recommendation.

Thus, the majority asserts that “he was not given a fair opportunity to defend himself.” But the record shows without contradiction that the by-laws of defendants do provide for a hearing.<sup>1</sup>

1 In addition, and independently of the by-laws, appellant is now entitled to a hearing under the holding of Pinsker II, a case which the majority correctly notes was decided after the proceedings in the court below. It is clear to me, therefore, that respondent’s by-laws providing for a hearing procedure in all cases is simply an express recognition of the procedural right later articulated by the court in Pinsker II.

Thus, article III, section 7 (a), in pertinent part provides: “In all cases in which any applicant has been denied membership, the applicant shall be notified promptly by registered or certified mail. He may, within 30 days of receipt of notice of such denial, request in writing a hearing by the Medical Advisory Board and such hearing shall be held within 60 days after receipt of the request. ... Failure to request a hearing after the prescribed time constitutes a waiver of the applicant's right to a hearing."

Admittedly, defendants failed to give written notice that plaintiff was entitled to request a hearing. In my opinion it should have done so. At the same time, the concept of common law standards of fair procedure should not be traveled on a one-way street. Plaintiff makes no showing - not even an allegation - that he ever requested a hearing of any kind. In my opinion, he should have done so.

Although it may be argued that since the application here was *517 "returned" rather than "denied," that the hearing by-law quoted above does not apply, I find such a contention to be altogether technical, substituting form for substance. The gravamen of plaintiff's dispute is (as was conceded at oral argument before this court) simply that plaintiff has been denied the right to staff privileges at defendant hospital. As can be seen from even a cursory reading of article III, section 7(a), the provision for a hearing is all inclusive and applies "In all cases ..." (italics added).

In my view, the solution to the instant controversy is a simple one and the facts of this case do not warrant the far-reaching consequences of the majority's holding, i.e., that a by-law requirement such as here contested is violative of minimal common law standards of fair procedure.

If, in fact, plaintiff's inability to obtain the necessary three signatures of active staff members is due to some discriminatory factor, such evidence can be acquired and established in the hearing permitted by defendants' by-laws. If plaintiff's application is then denied, he has the clear right of judicial review (Kronen v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists (1965) 237 Cal.App.2d 289 [46 Cal.Rptr. 808]).

In a further effort to support its position that the by-law provision is unlawful per se, the majority pose this question: "what if an applicant simply does not know three members of the staff ...?"

The short answer is that he should take steps to get acquainted with those physicians. One would be hopelessly naive to conclude that this would be an onerous or unreasonable burden for a physician to bear. In the case at bench, for example, as the majority points out, plaintiff has been practicing in San Francisco since 1959, and did submit a large number of letters from other physicians. To suggest that Doctor Ascherman will be unable to comply with the by-law because he does not know - and cannot reasonably be expected to arrange to meet - the active staff members simply overlooks the realities and practicalities of professional life which are matters of such common knowledge that a court should not hesitate to acknowledge them promptly.

Finally, I do not believe that either Pinsker II or Ascherman v. San Francisco Medical Society (1974) 39 Cal.App.3d 623 [114 Cal.Rptr. 681] compel the conclusion that the by-law in question is unreasonable on its face. *518

Each of these cases is distinguishable from the case at bench. Pinsker II, for example, involved membership in a professional association, as contrasted with admission to hospital staff privileges. The core of the holding in Pinsker II, as I read it, is that Dr. Pinsker was denied membership (1) without being notified of the reason for the rejection and (2) without being given a fair hearing "to defend himself." In the case at bench Dr. Ascherman was notified of the reason for his rejection. Thus, the only defect in the procedure below is the absence of a hearing neither requested by plaintiff nor offered by defendants.

Ascherman v. San Francisco Medical Society, supra, does not stand for the proposition that a hospital by-law requiring recommendation by active staff members is inherently violative of due process, or even of common law principles of fair procedure. In that case, the trial court instructed the jury that hospitals were not required to afford the plaintiff a hearing at all in connection with a denial of, or expulsion from, staff privileges. Needless to say, that is clearly contrary to established law. In addition, as I have pointed out before, not only is plaintiff entitled to such a hearing in this case by operation of law, but defendants' own by-laws explicitly provide for it.

I would therefore reverse the judgment with directions to the trial court to issue an injunction ordering defendants to advise plaintiff of his right to request a hearing in accordance with article III, section 7 (a), of defendants' by-laws and, upon receipt of a timely request for such hearing from plaintiff, to consider the matter pursuant to a fair procedure as described in Pinsker II. *519

LAGUNA ROYALE OWNERS ASSOCIATION,
 Plaintiff and Respondent,

v.

STANFORD P. DARGER et al., Defendants and Appellants.

Civ. No. 21950.

Court of Appeal, Fourth District, Division 2, California.
 May 28, 1981.

SUMMARY

The owners of a leasehold condominium in a community apartment complex purported to assign three one quarter undivided interests in the property to three other couples without the approval of the owners' association. The association instituted an action to obtain a declaration that the assignments were invalid because they were made in violation of a provision of the instrument by which the owners acquired the property prohibiting assignment or transfer of interests in the property without the consent and approval of the association's predecessor in interest. Following a court trial judgment was rendered in favor of the association invalidating the assignments. (Superior Court of Orange County, No. 252781, James F. Judge, Judge.)

The Court of Appeal reversed with directions to enter judgment for defendants. The court rejected the association's contention that its right to give or withhold approval or consent was absolute, and also rejected defendants' contention that the association's claimed right to approve or disapprove transfers was an invalid restraint on alienation. The court held that in exercising its power to approve or disapprove transfers or assignments the association must act reasonably, exercising its power in a fair and nondiscriminatory manner and withholding approval only for a reason or reasons rationally related to the protection, preservation and proper operation of the property and the purposes of the association as set forth in its operating instruments. The court held the restriction on transfers, thus limited, did not violate defendants' constitutional rights of association and was not invalid as an unreasonable restraint on alienation. Moreover, the court held that in view of provisions of the association's bylaws which permitted rental of an apartment unit for a period of time more than 90 days, under which the owners could effect the same use of the property as proposed by the assignment, the association's refusal to consent to the transfers was unreasonable as a matter of law. (Opinion by Kaufman, J., with McDaniel, J., concurring. Separate dissenting opinion by Gardner, P. J.)

Condominiums and Cooperative Apartments § 2--
 Condominiums--Restrictions on Transfers--Validity.

A provision in a condominium agreement prohibiting an owner of a unit from assigning or transferring an interest in the property without the consent and approval of the condominium owner's association did not give the association the absolute right to withhold approval or consent. Neither was the right to approve or disapprove transfers an invalid restraint on alienation as being repugnant to the conveyance of a fee. In exercising its power to approve or disapprove transfers or assignments, the association was required to act reasonably, exercising its power in a fair and nondiscriminatory manner and withholding approval only for a reason or reasons rationally related to the protection, preservation and proper operation of the property and the purposes of the association as set forth in its governing instruments. Civ. Code, § 1355, pertaining to condominiums, expressly authorizes the recordation of a declaration of project restrictions, and reasonable restrictions on the alienation of condominiums are consistent with Civ. Code, § 711. The right of the association reasonably to restrict assignments or transfers does not violate the constitutional rights of owners to associate freely with persons of their own choosing.

Condominiums and Cooperative Apartments §
 2--Condominiums-- Restrictions on Transfers--Reasonableness.

Under a provision in a condominium agreement prohibiting an owner of a unit from assigning or transferring any interest in the property without the consent and approval of the condominium owners' association, the association's refusal to consent to an owner's assignment of three one quarter undivided interests in the property to three other couples was unreasonable as a matter of law, where the association's bylaws permitted the rental of an apartment unit for a period of more than 90 days and the owners therefore could effect the same use of the property as contemplated by the assignment by simply leasing to each couple for a period of 90 days each year.

<sup>(3)</sup>
Constitutional Law § 54--First Amendment and Other Fundamental Rights of Citizens--Scope and Nature--Freedom of Association and Assembly--Restrictions.

The constitutionally guaranteed right of freedom of association, like most other constitutionally protected rights, is not absolute but is subject to reasonable restriction in the interests of the general welfare.

Constitutional Law § 67--Property--Restrictions.
Property rights are subject to reasonable regulation to promote the general welfare.

<sup>(5)</sup>
Condominiums and Cooperative Apartments § 2--Condominiums--Agreement--Terms--Construction.

As used in a provision of a condominium agreement restricting the use of units to residential purposes, any ambiguity or uncertainty in the meaning of the term "single family residential use" was required to be resolved most favorably to free alienation.

KAUFMAN, J.

Defendants Stanford P. Darger and Darlene B. Darger (the Dargers) were the owners of a leasehold condominium<sup>1</sup> in Laguna Royale, a 78-unit community apartment complex on the ocean front in South Laguna Beach. The Dargers purported to assign three one-quarter undivided interests in the property to three other couples: Wendell P. Paxton and Daila D. Paxton, Keith I.

Gustaveson and Elsie Gustaveson, and Keith C. Brown and Geneva B. Brown (collectively the other defendants) without the approval of Laguna Royale Owners Association (Association). Association instituted this action to obtain a declaration that the assignments from the Dargers to defendants were invalid because they were made in violation of a provision of the instrument by which the Dargers acquired the property, prohibiting assignment or transfer of interests in the property without the consent and approval of Association's predecessor in interest. Following trial to the court judgment was rendered in favor of Association invalidating the assignments from the Dargers to the other defendants. Defendants appeal.

1 A "condominium" is defined in Civil Code section 783, which reads in part as follows: "A condominium is an estate in real property consisting of an undivided interest in common in a portion of a parcel of real property together with a separate interest in space in a residential, industrial or commercial building on such real property, such as an apartment, office or store ... [¶] Such estate may, with respect to the duration of its enjoyment, be either (1) an estate of inheritance or perpetual estate, (2) an estate for life, or (3) an estate for years, such as a leasehold or a subleasehold." (For a general discussion of condominiums, see Hanna, Cal. Condominium Handbook (1975); Comment, Community Apartments: Condominium or Stock Cooperative? (1962) 50 Cal.L.Rev. 299; Comment, Fee in Condominium (1964) 37 So.Cal.L.Rev. 82.)

Facts

The Laguna Royale development is built on land leased by the developer from the landowner in a 99-year ground lease executed in 1961. As the units were completed, the developer sold each one by executing a subassignment and occupancy agreement with the purchaser. This document conveyed an undivided 1/78 interest in the leasehold estate for a term of 99 years, a right to exclusive use of a designated unit and one or more garage spaces and a right to joint use of common areas and facilities; it also contained certain restrictions. The restriction pertinent to this action is paragraph 7, which provides in relevant part: "7. Subassignee [the purchaser] shall not assign or otherwise transfer this agreement, *674 ... nor shall subassignee sublet ... without the consent of and approval of Lessee ...."<sup>2</sup>

2 In full, paragraph 7 reads: "Subassignee shall not assign or otherwise transfer this agreement, or any right or interest herein, or in or to any of the buildings and improvements on the leased premises nor shall subassignee sublet said premises or any part thereof without the consent and approval of Lessee, and no assignment or transfer, whether voluntary or involuntary, by operation of law, under legal process or proceedings, by assignment for benefit of creditors, by receivership, in bankruptcy, or otherwise, and no such subletting shall be valid or effective without such consent and approval. Should Lessee consent to any such assignment, transfer or subletting, none of the restrictions of this article shall be thereby waived and the same shall apply to each successive encumbrance, assignment, transfer or subletting hereunder and shall be severally binding upon each and every assignee, transferee, subtenant and other successor in interest of subassignee. [¶] The death of subassignee shall not be deemed to effect a transfer of this agreement within the meaning of this paragraph, but the right of the successors in interest of subassignee to use and occupy the subject premises shall be subject to approval of lessee as in the case of a voluntary assignment by subassignee."

Upon the sale of all units and completion of the project, the developer entered into an "Assignment Agreement" with the Association, transferring and assigning to the Association all the developer's rights, powers and duties under the subassignment and occupancy agreements, including inter alia the "right to approve or disapprove assignments or transfers of interests in Laguna Royale pursuant to Paragraph 7 of the Subassignment and Occupancy Agreements."

In 1965, Ramona G. Sutton acquired unit 41, consisting of some 3,000 square feet, by a subassignment and occupancy agreement with the developer. In 1973 the Dargers purchased unit 41 from the executrix of Mrs. Sutton's estate.<sup>3</sup> As owner of a unit in the project, the Dargers automatically became members of the Association and were bound by the Association's bylaws.<sup>4</sup>

3 The transfer was accomplished through an assignment and assumption agreement, not disputed by the parties or in issue on appeal.

4 Article II, section 2 of the bylaws provides: "Section 2. Ownership. [¶] A person shall be considered to become an owner of a unit for purposes of membership in the Association upon recordation of a Subassignment and Occupancy Agreement that has been approved by the Board of Governors, by which the person acquires an undivided 1/78th interest in the leasehold covering Laguna Royale, plus the exclusive right to use and occupy an apartment to be used as a residence.

Article VII of the bylaws provides: "Section 1. By-Laws a contract. [¶] These By-Laws shall constitute a binding contract among the owners of units in Laguna Royale .... Section 2. Assigns. [¶] These By-Laws shall inure to the benefit of and be binding upon the heirs, grantees, successors, assigns, ... who agree to be bound by these By-Laws."

The Dargers reside in Salt Lake City, Utah, where Mr. Darger became a vice president of a large banking chain not long after the Dargers acquired their unit at Laguna Royale. The responsibilities of Mr. Darger's new position made it difficult for them to get away, and they attempted unsuccessfully to lease their unit through real estate agents in Laguna Beach. On October 30, 1973, Mr. Darger wrote to Mr. Yount, then chairman of the board of governors of the Association, in which he stated in part: "It has been suggested that we might sell shares in our apartment to two or three other couples here. These associates would be aware of the restrictions regarding children under 16 living there, as well as the restrictions regarding pets, and would submit themselves to the regular investigation of the Board given prospective purchasers and lessees. I would expect that the apartment will remain vacant most of the time, as now, and not more than one of the families will occupy the apartment at one time."

By letter dated November 12, 1973, Mr. Yount responded in relevant part: "Following receipt of your letter of October 30, 1973 regarding the possibility of selling shares in your apartment #41, we discussed the matter at the regular meeting of the Board of Governors held on November 10, 1973. [¶] Prior to the meeting we had referred the letter to our attorney, Mr. James Ralston Smith, for Laguna Royale Owner's Association for his opinion. We received his opinion prior to the meeting and this is quoted as follows: 'As to the request of Mr. Darger, as owner of apartment #41, to sell undivided interests in that apartment to other parties, it is my opinion that if such other parties otherwise qualified and indicate no intended use of the apartment other than single family owner's use, there would be no legal basis to refuse such transfers. However, State law restricts more than four (4) transfers of undivided interests, without qualifying as a subdivision.'"

The letter then indicated that a number of members of the board of governors had voiced some objections to multiple ownership of a unit and then stated: "The Board of Governors is quite sympathetic with your problem of being unable to lease your apartment; however, because of the reasons given above, it is our opinion that the multiple ownership would not be beneficial to the other unit owners. We believe that our opinion is shared by the majority of the unit owners of Laguna Royale. [¶] Even in view of the Boards' [sic] opinion, we would have no alternative except to approve the transfer which you suggested, providing you would comply with the legal opinion of Mr. Smith." *676

Thereafter Mr. Darger discussed the possibility of joint ownership with some of his associates in Salt Lake City and in late 1974 or early 1975 he reached a point where he believed he was ready to proceed. He made an appointment with John Russell Henry, then chairman of the board of governors of the Association, and met with him for the purpose of going over the agreement that Mr. Darger's Salt Lake City attorney had prepared, to make sure that everything that the board might want to be in the agreement was included from the beginning. Mr. Darger agreed in writing to pay the fees incurred by the board in having the board's attorney review the instrument.

The document prepared by Mr. Darger's attorney contemplated five owners,<sup>5</sup> and the board's attorney indicated both to the board and Mr. Darger personally that, in his opinion, ownership of undivided interests in the unit by more than four persons would violate California subdivision laws. Thereafter, in a letter dated November 25, 1975, to Mr. Henry, Mr. Darger stated that because of a possible violation of the subdivision laws and for other reasons, "we plan for a total of four shares, including my own."

5 Apparently title to the unit would have been transferred to a trustee for the benefit of the five beneficial owners.

Subsequently Mr. Darger received from Mr. Henry a letter dated January 12, 1976, which read in part: "The matter of multiple ownership of Apt. 41 has been studied in depth and detail with our own attorney, and the ultimate decision being that to do so would be contrary to recorded Lease, Subassignment and Occupancy agreement. In this connection you are respectfully requested to refer to Paragraphs 4<sup>6</sup> and 7 of such Agreement which limit use of units solely to residential purposes, without exception, and require written consent by your Board of Governors for any assignment thereof."

6 Paragraph 4 of the subassignment and occupancy agreement reads: "The premises covered hereby shall be used solely for residential purposes, and no sign of any kind shall be displayed in or upon any portions of said building. Subassignee shall not use or suffer or permit any person to use said premises, or any portion thereof, for any purpose tending to injure the reputation thereof, or to disturb the neighborhood or occupants of adjoining property, or to constitute a nuisance, or in violation of any public law, ordinance or regulation."

A few days later Mr. Darger received from Mr. Henry another letter dated January 16, 1976, that read in part: "The Board has determined *677 that the transfer as you requested would create and impose an undue, unreasonable burden and disadvantage on the other owners' and residents' enjoyment of their apartments and the common facilities. Further, your requested transfer would be contrary to and in conflict with the close community living nature of Laguna Royale and would be contrary to the single family character of the private residential purpose to which all apartments are restricted under the recorded Master Lease and the Subassignment and Occupancy Agreement, as well as the By-Laws and House Rules, by which all owners are bound."

On February 23, 1976, Mr. Darger sent a formal letter request for approval to transfer unit 41 from the Dargers to themselves and the other defendants on condition that "the three new couples subsequently receiv[e] individual approvals after a 'Request For Approval Of Sale Or Lease' form has been filed with the Board for each, and each has submitted to a personal interview by the Board for its consideration." The letter further requested that if approval was not given, "the Board specify its reasons for denial and indicate how the request made herein differs from the situation of the owners of at least two other units where there is multiple ownership between more than one party who have no family or corporate relationship, [and] in light of the written and verbal approvals for such a transfer of apartment #41 that have been extended by the Board to us over the past two and one half years."

By a letter from its attorney to the Dargers dated March 16, 1976, Association advised the Dargers that it would not consent to the requested transfer. It was denied that written and verbal approvals had been given the Dargers in the past, and it was stated in relevant part: "The reason the Association will not consent to your requested transfer is that the Board feels it is obligated to protect and preserve the private single family residential character of Laguna Royale, together with the use and quiet enjoyment of all apartment owners of their respective apartments and the common facilities, taking into consideration the close community living circumstances of Laguna Royale. [¶] The Board feels strongly about its power of consent to assignments and other transfers of leasehold interests and considers the protection and preservation of that power to be critical in maintaining the character of Laguna Royale for the benefit of all owners as a whole. A four family ownership of a single apartment, with the guests of each owner potentially involved, would compound the use of the apartment and common facilities well beyond the normal and usual private single family residential character to the detriment of other owners and would frustrate effective *678 controls over general security, guest occupants and rule compliance, as has been the case in the past. [¶] Provision 7 of the Subassignment and Occupancy Agreement, under which all apartment leasehold interests are held, requires the unqualified consent to any transfer. Provision 10 of said agreement provides for the termination of the leasehold interest in the event of a violation of Provision 7, or other breach .... [¶] No apartments in Laguna Royale are held by multiple families in the manner that you have requested. In any event, any consents given by the Association to transfers in the past cannot be regarded as setting any precedent or in any way limiting or impairing the power of the Association to refuse its consent to any present or future transfer. In this regard, the language of Provision 7 of the Subassignment and Occupancy Agreement provides that consent given to any particular transfer shall not operate as a waiver for any other transfer.“

After consultation with legal counsel the Dargers proceeded nevertheless, and on June 11 they executed instruments purporting to assign undivided one-fourth interests in the property to themselves and the other three couples. The instruments were recorded on June 30, and on July 3, 1976, the Dargers informed Association by letter of the transfers inclosing on Association's forms a separate "Request For Approval Of Sale Or Lease" and financial statement prepared and executed by each of the other couples. These papers show that the other defendants all reside in Salt Lake City, Utah. Each executed request form contains a warranty by the purchaser that if the application is approved no child under 16 years of age "will make residency at this property" and an agreement that the purchaser "will abide by and conform to the terms and conditions of the master lease, ... all amendments described in the Subassignment and Occupancy Agreement ... and the By-Laws of the Laguna Royale Owners ... Association.“

After unsuccessfully demanding that the other defendants retransfer their purported interests to the Dargers, the Association filed this action.

At trial the testimony confirmed that no more than one family of defendants used the property at a time and, although the matter was not examined in detail, answers to questions by one or more defendants indicated that thirteen-week periods had been agreed upon for exclusive use by each of the four families. It was also indicated that for substantial periods during the year, no use at all was being made of the unit. The evidence also showed that a number of Laguna Royale units were *679 owned by several unrelated persons, but that in each case the owners used the unit "as a family.“

No formal findings were made. However, in its notice of intended decision the court stated in relevant part: "The Court concludes that the Subassignment and Occupancy Agreement, ... is in law a sublease. ... Therefore, Civil Code Section 711 does not apply to void the requirement that consent be given to the transfer of defendant Darger's interest. The provisions of Title 10 of the Administrative Code, Section 2792.25, as cited in Ritchey v. Villa Nueva Condominiums [(1978)] 81 CA \(3\) 688, only govern the restrictions of condominiums by laws, and not restrictions that may exist because of leasehold interests. The plaintiff association had the right to approve any transfer of defendant Darger's interest. The Court finds that the plaintiff association acted reasonably in refusing to grant consent to the proposed transfer by Darger to the other defendants. Plaintiff is entitled to a declaration that the assignments by Darger to the other defendants are invalid. Plaintiff is awarded attorney fees in the amount of $2500.“

Judgment was entered accordingly.

Contentions, Issues and Discussion

Defendants contend paragraph 7 of the subassignment and occupancy agreement prohibiting assignments or transfers without the consent of Association is invalid because it is in violation of their constitutional rights to associate with persons of their choosing (U.S. Const., 1st Amend.; Cal. Const., art. I, § 1), because it constitutes an unlawful restraint on alienation (Civ. Code, § 711), and because it does not comply with a regulation of the Real Estate Commissioner (Cal. Admin. Code, tit. 10, § 2792.25). Failing those, defendants contend finally that if by its finding that Association acted reasonably in refusing to approve the transfers, the court meant to indicate that Association had the duty to act reasonably in withholding consent and did so, that determination is not supported by substantial evidence and is contrary to law.

Association contends that the prohibition against transfer or assignment without its consent is not invalid on any of the bases urged by defendants. It argues primarily that its right to withhold approval or consent is absolute, that in exercising its power it is not required to adhere to a standard of reasonableness but may withhold approval or consent for any reason or for no reason at all. Secondly, it argues *680 that the evidence supports the finding it acted reasonably in disapproving the transfers to the other defendants.

<sup>(1a)</sup>We reject Association's contention that its right to give or withhold approval or consent is absolute. We likewise reject defendants' contention that the claimed right to approve or disapprove transfers is an invalid restraint on alienation because it is repugnant to the conveyance of a fee. We hold that in exercising its power to approve or disapprove transfers or assignments Association must act reasonably, exercising its power in a fair and nondiscriminatory manner and withholding approval only for a reason or reasons rationally related to the protection, preservation and proper operation of the property and the purposes of Association as set forth in its governing instruments. We hold that the restriction on transfer contained in paragraph 7 of the subassignment and occupancy agreement (hereafter simply paragraph 7), thus limited, does not violate defendants' constitutional rights of association and is not invalid as an unreasonable restraint on alienation. <sup>(2a)</sup>However, we conclude that in view of the present provisions of Association's bylaws, its refusal to consent to the transfers to defendants was unreasonable as a matter of law. Accordingly, we reverse the judgment with directions to enter judgment for defendants. Having so concluded and disposed of the appeal it is unnecessary for us to decide whether the Real Estate Commissioner's regulation, which was not in effect when the subassignment and occupancy agreement here involved was executed, could validly be applied to paragraph 7 or whether, if applied, it would invalidate the provisions of paragraph 7.

As indicated, the initial positions of the parties are at opposite extremes. Association contends that the subassignment and occupancy agreement constitutes a sublease and that under the law applicable to leasehold interests, when a lease contains a provision permitting subletting only upon consent of the lessor, the lessor is under no obligation to give consent and, in fact, may withhold consent arbitrarily. (See, e.g., Richard v. Degen & Brody, Inc. (1960) 181 Cal.App.2d 289, 298-299 [5 Cal.Rptr. 263]; 4 Miller & Starr, Current Law of Cal. Real Estate, § 27:92, pp. 415-416; see also cases cited in Annot. (1953), 31 A.L.R.2d 831.) Defendants on the other hand contend that the subassignment and occupancy agreement conveys, in essence, a fee,<sup>7</sup> and that *681 under California law when a fee simple interest is granted, any restriction on the subsequent conveyance of the grantee's interest contained in the original grant is repugnant to the interest conveyed and is therefore void. (See, e.g., Murray v. Green (1883) 64 Cal. 363, 367 [28 P. 118]; Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Garrett (1919) 42 Cal.App. 152, 155 [183 P. 470]; see also 3 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (8th ed. 1973) Real Property, § 314, p. 2023.)

7 It is unclear to us how the subassignment and occupancy agreement could convey a fee interest when the entire interest in the land underlying the development is only a 99-year ground lease. It would appear that defendants' argument more appropriately ought to be that once consent was given pursuant to the subassignment and occupancy agreement to the transfer from the estate of Ramona Sutton to the Dargers, the rule in Dumpor's Case (1578) 76 Eng.Rep. 1110, became applicable and that thereafter no consent to any further assignment was required. (See 3 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (8th ed. 1973) Real Property, § 491, p. 2170.)

<sup>(1b)</sup>We reject the extreme contentions of both parties; the rules of law they propose, borrowed from the law of landlord and tenant developed during the feudal period in English history (see Green v. Superior Court (1974) 10 Cal.3d 616, 622 [111 Cal.Rptr. 704, 517 P.2d 1168]), are entirely inappropriate tools for use in affecting an accommodation of the competing interests involved in the use and transfer of a condominium. Even assuming the continued vitality of the rule that a lessor may arbitrarily withhold consent to a sublease (but see Note, Effect of Leasehold Provision Requiring the Lessor's Consent to Assignment (1970) 21 Hastings L.J. 516), there is little or no similarity in the relationship between a condominium owner and his fellow owners and that between lessor and lessee or sublessor and sublessee. Even when the right to the underlying land is no more than an undivided interest in a ground lease or sublease, ownership of a condominium constitutes a statutorily recognized estate in real property (see Civ. Code, § 783 [see fn. 1, ante]), and in our society the right freely to use and dispose of one's property is a valued and protected right. (U.S. Const., Amends. 5 and 14; Cal. Const., art. I, § 7, subd. (a); see 5 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (8th ed. 1974) Constitutional Law, § 273, p. 3563.) Ownership and use of condominiums is an increasingly significant form of "home ownership" which has evolved in recent years to meet the desire of our people to own their own dwelling place, in the face of heavy concentrations of population in urban areas, the limited availability of housing, and, thus, the impossibly inflated cost of individual homes in such areas.

On the other hand condominium living involves a certain closeness to and with one's neighbors, and, as stated in Hidden Harbour Estates, Inc. v. Norman (Fla.App. 1975) 309 So.2d 180, 181-182: "[I]nherent in the condominium concept is the principle that to promote the health, *682 happiness, and peace of mind of the majority of the unit owners since they are living in such close proximity and using facilities in common, each unit owner must give up a certain degree of freedom of choice which he might otherwise enjoy in separate, privately owned property.“ (See also White Egret Condominium v. Franklin (Fla. 1979) 379 So.2d 346, 350; Seagate Condominium Association, Inc. v. Duffy (Fla.App. 1976) 330 So.2d 484, 486.) Thus, it is essential to successful condominium living and the maintenance of the value of these increasingly significant property interests that the owners as a group have the authority to regulate reasonably the use and alienation of the condominiums.

Happily, there is no impediment to our adoption of such a rule; indeed, the existing law suggests such a rule. In the only California appellate decision of which we are aware dealing with the problem of restraints on alienation of a condominium, Ritchey v. Villa Nueva Condominium Assn., supra., 81 Cal.App.3d 688, 695 [146 Cal.Rptr. 695], the court upheld as a reasonable restriction on an owner’s right to sell his unit to families with children, a duly adopted amendment to the condominium bylaws restricting occupancy to persons 18 years and over. And, of course, Civil Code section 1355 pertaining to condominiums expressly authorizes the recordation of a declaration of project restrictions and subsequent amendments thereto, ”which restrictions shall be enforceable equitable servitudes where reasonable, and shall inure to and bind all owners of condominiums in the project.“

Reasonable restrictions on the alienation of condominiums are entirely consistent with Civil Code section 711 in which the California law on unlawful restraints on alienation has its origins.<sup>8</sup> The day has long since passed when the rule in California was that all restraints on alienation were unlawful under the statute; it is now the settled law in this jurisdiction that only unreasonable restraints on alienation are invalid. ( Wellenkamp v. Bank of America (1978) 21 Cal.3d 943, 948-949 [148 Cal.Rptr. 379, 582 P.2d 970]; La Sala v. American Sav. & Loan Assn. (1971) 5 Cal.3d 864, 878-879 [97 Cal.Rptr. 849, 489 P.2d 1113]; Coast Bank v. Minderhout (1964) 61 Cal.2d 311, 316 [38 Cal.Rptr. 505, 392 P.2d 265], overruled to the extent inconsistent in Wellenkamp v. Bank of America, supra., 21 Cal.3d at p. 953.) *683

8 Civil Code section 711 reads: ”Conditions restraining alienation, when repugnant to the interest created, are void.“

Nor does the right of Association reasonably to approve or disapprove the assignment or transfer of the Dargers’ ownership interest violate defendants’ constitutional right to associate freely with persons of their choosing. Preliminarily, there is considerable doubt of whether the actions of Association constitute state action so as to bring into play the constitutional guarantees. (Cf. Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis (1972) 407 U.S. 163, 173 [32 L.Ed.2d 627, 637, 92 S.Ct. 1965]; Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal.App.3d 288, 293-295 [131 Cal.Rptr. 547]; see generally 5 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (8th ed. 1974) Constitutional Law, § 338, pp. 3631-3632.) <sup>(3)</sup>In any event, however, the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of association, like most other constitutionally protected rights, is not absolute but is subject to reasonable restriction in the interests of the general welfare. ( Village of Belle Terre v. Boraas (1974) 416 U.S. 1, 9 [39 L.Ed.2d 797, 804, 94 S.Ct. 1536, 1541]; White Egret Condominium v. Franklin, supra., 379 So.2d at pp. 349-351.) Moreover, it may be persuasively argued that if any constitutional right is at issue it is the due process right of an owner of property to use and dispose of it as he chooses. (See generally 5 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (8th ed. 1974) Constitutional Law, § 273, p. 3563.) <sup>(4)</sup> And, of course, property rights are subject to reasonable regulation to promote the general welfare. ( Home Building & Loan Assn. v. Blaisdell (1934) 290 U.S. 398, 428, 434-436 [78 L.Ed. 413, 423, 426-428, 54 S.Ct. 231]; Sonoma County Organization of Public Employees v. County of Sonoma (1979) 23 Cal.3d 296, 305 [152 Cal.Rptr. 903, 591 P.2d 1]; In re Marriage of Bouquet (1976) 16 Cal.3d 583, 592 [128 Cal.Rptr. 427, 546 P.2d 1371].) Finally, any determination of the validity or invalidity of Association’s right to approve or disapprove assignments or transfers of the Dargers’ interest will of necessity impinge upon someone’s constitutional freedom of association. A determination that the power granted the Association is invalid would adversely affect the constitutional right of association of the remaining owners at least as much as a contrary determination would affect the same right of the Dargers. (Cf. Presbytery of Riverside v. Community Church of Palm Springs (1979) 89 Cal.App.3d 910, 925 [152 Cal.Rptr. 854].)

Having concluded that a reasonable restriction on the right of alienation of a condominium is lawful, we must now determine whether Association’s refusal to approve the transfer of the Dargers’ interest to the other defendants was reasonable in the circumstances of the case at bench. <sup>(1c)</sup>The criteria for testing the reasonableness of an exercise of such a power by an owners’ association are (1) whether the reason *684 for withholding approval is rationally related to the protection, preservation or proper operation of the property and the purposes of the Association as set forth in its governing instruments and (2) whether the power was exercised in a fair and nondiscriminatory manner. (Cf. Pinsker v. Pacific Coast Society of Orthodontists (1974) 12 Cal.3d 541, 550 [116 Cal.Rptr. 245, 526 P.2d 253]; Lewin v. St. Joseph Hospital of Orange (1978) 82 Cal.App.3d 368, 388 [146 Cal.Rptr. 892]; Ascherman v. Saint Francis Memorial Hosp. (1975) 45 Cal.App.3d 507, 511-512 [119 Cal.Rptr.507].) Another consideration might be the nature and severity of the consequences of application of the restriction (e.g., transfer declared void, estate forfeited, action for damages). (See 3 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (8th ed. 1974) Real Property, § 315, p. 2025; Rest. Property, §§ 404-406.)

As to the last observation, a potential problem in the case at bench was avoided by the nature of the relief granted in the court below. Although in its complaint Association asserted a right to terminate the Dargers' ownership interest because of their assignments without board approval and although there is some reference in the briefs to a "forfeiture," the judgment of the trial court simply invalidated the transfers to the other defendants, leaving the Dargers as the owners of the unit as they were at the outset. If Association's disapproval of the transfers were otherwise reasonable, we would find nothing unreasonable in the invalidation of the transfers.

To determine whether or not Association's disapproval of the transfers to the other defendants was reasonable it is necessary to isolate the reason or reasons approval was withheld. Aside from the assertion that it had the power to withhold approval arbitrarily, essentially three reasons were given by the Association for its refusal to approve the transfers: (1) the multiple ownership of undivided interests; (2) the use the defendants proposed to make of the unit would violate a bylaw restricting use of all apartments to "single family residential use"; and (3) the use proposed would be inconsistent with "the private single family residential character of Laguna Royale, together with the use and quiet enjoyment of all apartment owners of their respective apartments and the common facilities, taking into consideration the close community living circumstances of Laguna Royale." As to (3) Association asserted: "A four family ownership of a single apartment, with the guests of each owner potentially involved, would compound the use of the apartment and common facilities well beyond the normal and usual private single *685 family residential character to the detriment of other owners and would frustrate effective controls over general security, guest occupants and rule compliance, ..." We examine each of these reasons in light of the indicia of reasonableness referred to above.

Insofar as approval was withheld based on multiple ownership alone, Association's action was clearly unreasonable. In the first place, multiple ownership has no necessary connection to intensive use. Twenty, yea a hundred, persons could own undivided interests in a condominium for investment purposes and lease the condominium on a long-term basis to a single occupant whose use of the premises would probably be less intense in every respect than that considered "normal and usual." Secondly, the Association bylaws specifically contemplate multiple ownership; in section 7 of article III, dealing with voting at meetings, it is stated: "Where there is more than one record owner of a unit, any or all of the record owners may attend [the meeting] but only one vote will be permitted for said unit. In the event of disagreement among the record owners of a unit, the vote for that unit shall be cast by a majority of the record owners." Finally, the evidence is uncontroverted that a number of units are owned by several unrelated persons. Although those owners at the time of trial used their units "as a family," there is nothing in the governing instruments as they presently exist that would prevent them from changing the character of their use.

We turn to the assertion that the use of the premises proposed by defendants would be in violation of section 1 of article VIII of the bylaws which provides: "All apartment unit uses are restricted and limited to single family residential use and shall not be used or occupied for any other purpose" and paragraph 4 of the subassignment and occupation agreement which provides: "The premises covered hereby shall be used solely for residential purposes, ... " <sup>(15)</sup>The term "single family residential use" is not otherwise defined, and if there is any ambiguity or uncertainty in the meaning of the term it must be resolved most favorably to free alienation. (Randol v. Scott (1895) 110 Cal. 590, 595-596 [42 P. 976]; Burns v. McGraw (1946) 75 Cal.App.2d 481, 485-486 [171 P.2d 148]; Riley v. Stoves (1974) 22 Ariz.App. 223 [526 P.2d 747, 749].) Actually, there is no evidence that defendants proposed to use the property other than for single family residential purposes. It is uncontroverted that they planned to and did use the property one family at a time for residential purposes. Thus, the proposed use was not in *686 violation of the restriction to single family residential use.<sup>9</sup> (White Egret Condominium v. Franklin, supra., 379 So.2d at p. 352.)

9 In the trial court counsel for Association argued that "single family residential use" meant the same thing as "single family residential" customarily found in zoning ordinances, typically in connection with the zoning designation R-1. We cannot conceive a decision that the ownership of a private dwelling in an R-1 zone by four families to be used by each family 13 weeks each with no use being made by more than 1 family at any time would be a use in violation of the R-1 zoning. We note also that our conclusion is in accord with the opinion originally expressed by the attorney for the Association that under the existing governing instruments there was nothing the board could do legally to prevent multiple ownership if the interests were no smaller than quarter interests.

(<sup>12b</sup>)The reasonableness of Association's disapproval of the transfers from the Dargers to the other defendants must stand or fall in the final analysis on the third reason offered by the Association for its action: the prospect that defendants' proposed use of the apartment and common facilities would be so greatly in excess of that considered "usual and normal" as to be inconsistent with the quiet enjoyment of the premises by the other occupants and the maintenance of security.<sup>10</sup>

10 It is probable that this was the principal reason Association refused to approve the transfers. Defendants' proposed use of the unit has been characterized from time to time during these proceedings as "time sharing."

There can be no doubt that the reason given is rationally related to the proper operation of the property and the purposes of the Association as set forth in its governing instruments. The bylaws provide that "[t]he purpose of the Association is to manage and maintain the community apartment project ... on a non-profit basis for the benefit of all owners of Laguna Royale." By subdivision (M)(6) of section 2 of article V of the bylaws the board is empowered to "prescribe reasonable regulations pertaining to ... [r]egulating the purchase and/or lease of an apartment to a buyer or sublessee who has no children under 16 years of age that will occupy the apartment temporarily or full time as a resident." This power is said by the bylaws to be given the board in recognition of "the prime importance of both security and quiet enjoyment of the Apartments owned by each member, and of the common recreational areas ...."

We reject defendants' contention that the Association had established a practice of approving or disapproving transfers solely on the basis of factors relating to the character, reputation and financial responsibility of the proposed transferee. There was testimony that during personal *687 interviews with proposed transferees, the board always inquired into the use proposed to be made of the premises.

The difficulty with upholding the Association's disapproval of the transfers by the Dargers to the other defendants is twofold. First, no evidence was introduced to establish that the intensity or nature of the use proposed by defendants would in fact be inconsistent with the peaceful enjoyment of the premises by the other occupants or impair security. We may take judicial notice as a matter of common knowledge that the use of a single apartment by four families for thirteen weeks each during the year would create some problems not presented by the use of a single, permanent resident family. The moving in and out would, of course, be more frequent, and it might be that some temporary residents would not be as considerate of their fellow occupants as more permanent residents. However, we are not prepared to take judicial notice that the consecutive use of unit 41 by these four families, one at a time, would be so intense or disruptive as to interfere substantially with the peaceful enjoyment of the premises by the other occupants or the maintenance of building security.

Secondly, and most persuasive, a provision of the bylaws, subdivision (A) of section 1 of article VIII, provides: "Residential use and purpose, as used herein and as referred to in the lease, sub-assignment and occupancy agreement pertaining to and affecting each apartment unit in Laguna Royale shall be and is hereby deemed to exclude and prohibit the rental of any apartment unit for a period of time of less than ninety (90) days, as it is deemed and agreed that rentals of apartment units for less than ninety (90) day periods of time are contrary to the close community apartment character of Laguna Royale; interfere with and complicate the orderly administration and process of the security system and program and maintenance program of Laguna Royale, and interfere with the orderly management and administration of the common areas and facilities of Laguna Royale. Accordingly, no owner shall rent an apartment unit for a period of time of less than ninety (90) days."

The point is self-evident: under the present bylaws the Dargers could effect the same use of the property as is proposed by defendants by simply leasing to each couple for a period of 90 days each year.<sup>11</sup> *688

11 We note that on the form supplied by the board to be filled in and executed by proposed purchasers or lessees, it is indicated that no lease less than six months in duration will be approved. While the board is authorized by the bylaws to promulgate regulations concerning sales and leases of the units, its regulations must be consistent with the bylaws and cannot supersede or, in effect, amend a provision of the bylaws. The bylaws provide that they may be amended only by majority vote of the owners.

Under these circumstances we are constrained to hold that board's refusal to approve the transfers to the other defendants on the basis of the prospect of intensified use was unreasonable as a matter of law.

Our conclusion that Association's disapproval of the transfers by the Dargers to the other defendants must be characterized as unreasonable as a matter of law disposes of the appeal, and it is unnecessary for us to deal with the applicability of the regulation of the Real Estate Commissioner which provides that bylaw restrictions on sale or lease of a condominium must include uniform, objective standards not based upon "the race, color, religion, sex, marital status, national origin or ancestry of the vendee or lessee," and which, in effect, requires an owners' association to buy out the owner's interest on the terms of the proposed sale if the Association disapproves "a bona fide offer by a person who does not meet the prescribed standards." (Cal. Admin. Code, tit. 10, § 2792.25, subds. (a), (b); see Richey v. Villa Nueva Condominium Assn., supra., 81 Cal.App.3d at pp. 694-695.) We do observe that the transfers from the Dargers were not disapproved on the basis that the other defendants are not "person[s] who [do] not meet the prescribed standards." We further observe that the regulation in question was apparently first filed in January 1976 whereas the subassignment and occupancy agreement involved in the case at bench was executed by the defendants' predecessor in interest in 1965 and assigned to the Dargers in 1973. Finally, we observe that insofar as the necessity of exercising the right to approve or disapprove sales or leases on the basis of uniform, objective standards is concerned, our decision is substantially in accord with the commissioner's regulation.

Disposition

End of Document

The judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the defendants.

McDaniel, J., concurred.

GARDNER, P. J.

I dissent.

Stripped to its essentials, this is a case in which the other owners of a condominium are attempting to stop the owner of one unit from embarking *689 on a time sharing enterprise. The majority properly conclude that the owners as a group have the authority to regulate reasonably the use and alienation of the units. The majority then conclude that the board's refusal to approve this transfer was unreasonable as a matter of law. To the contrary, I would find it to be entirely reasonable and would affirm the judgment of the trial court.

The use of a unit on a time sharing basis is inconsistent with the quiet enjoyment of the premises by the other occupants. Time sharing is a remarkable gimmick. P. T. Barnum would have loved it. It ordinarily brings enormous profits to the seller and in this case would bring chaos to the other residents. Here we have only 4 occupants but if this transfer is permitted there is nothing to stop a more greedy occupant of a unit from conveying to 52 or 365 other occupants.

If as an occupant of a condominium I must anticipate that my neighbors are going to change with clocklike regularity I might just as well move into a hotel-and get room service.

SUMMARY:

CALIFORNIA OFFICIAL REPORTS SUMMARY

The owners of a condominium brought an action against the condominium owners association, alleging that the association unreasonably interfered with their right to use the recreational facilities of the condominium project by classifying them as nonresidents once they moved out, leaving the mother of one of the plaintiffs in residence. The mother joined in the suit, alleging violation of her rights under the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code, § 51 et seq.). Plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction. The trial court, finding that the owners were nonresidents under a condominium rule, and that the condominium rules relating to the use of recreational facilities by nonresidents were reasonable, denied the motion. (Superior Court of Los Angeles County, No. LASC SWC 110873, J. Gary Hastings, Judge.)

The Court of Appeal reversed the order denying the preliminary injunction, remanded the matter, and dismissed the mother's appeal as moot. The court held that the mother's appeal was moot for two reasons: she had suffered a stroke and moved out of the condominium project, and, while the appeal was pending, the trial court sustained a demurrer to her cause of action under the Unruh Civil Rights Act without leave to amend. The court further held that the trial court erred in denying plaintiffs a preliminary injunction. The association acted without authority in restricting the use of common areas by members who were not residents; the effect of this rule was to terminate a right originally granted by the covenants, conditions, and restrictions to all members whether resident or not. The court held that where an association exceeds the scope of its authority, any rule or decision resulting from such an ultra vires act is invalid whether or not it is a "reasonable" response to a particular circumstance. The court further held that it was reasonably probable that plaintiffs would prevail on the merits, and that they would suffer a greater harm from denial of the injunction than would the association from its grant. (1a) (1b) Appellate Review § 120--Dismissal--Grounds--Mootness--What Constitutes--Appeal of Denial of Preliminary Injunction--Sustaining of Demurrer in Underlying Action. -- --An appeal from the denial of a preliminary injunction restraining a condominium home-owners association from enforcing certain rules was moot as to one plaintiff, where that plaintiff had suffered a stroke and moved out of the condominium project, and where, while the appeal was pending, the trial court sustained a demurrer to that plaintiff's cause of action under the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code, § 51 et seq.) without leave to amend. Since that plaintiff was no longer a resident, there was no longer any discriminatory action on the part of defendants to be enjoined. Further, her Unruh Civil Rights Act claim was her only basis for a preliminary injunction, and she had already requested a stay of proceedings and writ review of the order sustaining the demurrer to that cause of action, both of which requests were denied.

(2) Injunctions § 21--Temporary Restraining Orders and Preliminary Injunctions--Appeal--Effect of Failure to State Cause of Action. -- --A preliminary injunction is an interim remedy designed to maintain the status quo pending a decision on the merits. It is not, in itself, a cause of action. Thus, a cause of action must exist before injunctive relief may be granted. Accordingly, where the complaint fails to state a cause of action, an order granting a preliminary injunction must be reversed.

(3) Injunctions § 21--Temporary Restraining Orders and Preliminary Injunctions--Appeal--Effect on Trial Court's Jurisdiction. -- --An appeal from an order denying a preliminary injunction does not deprive the trial court of jurisdiction to proceed to try the case on the merits. If the court can try the case on the merits, then a fortiori it can determine the case has no merit by sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend.

(5) Injunctions § 15--Temporary Restraining Orders and Preliminary Injunctions--Preliminary Injunctions--Discretion of Trial Court. -- --It is within the trial court's sound discretion to grant or deny a preliminary injunction. However, a trial court abuses that discretion by denying a preliminary injunction where the plaintiffs establish a "reasonable probability" of success on the merits and that they will suffer more harm from its denial than the defendant will from its grant.

(6a) (6b) Condominiums and Cooperative Apartments § 2--Condominiums--Restriction of Right to Use Common Areas to Residents--Preliminary Injunction. -- --In an action by owners of a condominium against the condominium owners association, alleging that the association unreasonably interfered with their right to use the recreational facilities of the condominium project by classifying them as nonresidents once they moved out, leaving the mother of one of the plaintiffs in residence, the trial court erred in denying plaintiffs a preliminary injunction. The association acted without authority in restricting the use of common areas by members who were not residents; the effect of this rule was to terminate a right originally granted by the covenants, conditions, and restrictions to all members whether resident or not. Where an association exceeds the scope of its authority, any rule or decision resulting from such an ultra vires act is invalid whether or not it is a "reasonable" response to a particular circumstance. ## OPINION

[*621] [*238] Plaintiffs sought a preliminary injunction restraining a condominium homeowners association from enforcing certain rules plaintiffs contended unreasonably interfered with their right to use the recreational facilities of the condominium project. The trial court denied an injunction. We reverse the denial of injunctive relief as to the Rasmussens. The appeal of [*2] Ms. MaJor is dismissed as moot.

STATEMENT OF FACTS AND PROCEEDINGS BELOW

John and Donna Rasmussen, husband and wife, own a condominium unit in the [*239] Miraverde condominium project. The project is managed by the Miraverde Homeowners Association, Inc. (Association).

The Rasmussens purchased the condominium pursuant to a "Declaration of Covenants, Conditions and Restrictions" (CC&R's) whose provisions are discussed below. The unit was originally occupied by the Rasmussens and their sons, Keith and Kyle. Ms. Rasmussen's mother, Ethel MaJor, subsequently moved into the unit. A few years later, the Rasmussens moved into a new residence and Ms. MaJor remained in the Miraverde condominium.

The dispute in this case centers on the right of the Rasmussens to continue using the recreational facilities of Miraverde, principally the tennis court, even though they are no longer residents of the condominium. Miraverde has only one tennis court. After moving from Miraverde, Ms. Rasmussen and Keith continued to use the court occasionally, while Kyle played regularly. Ms. MaJor is 82 years old and senile. She does not play tennis.

In July 1989, the Association made new rules regarding the use [*3] of the tennis court and other common facilities by the Miraverde residents and others. Rule 1.7 states "non-resident" homeowners are not entitled to use any Miraverde facilities except as guests of an authorized resident. Rule 6.4.2 provides only "registered residents" over 18 years of age may reserve the tennis court and rule 6.4.5 requires a "registered resident" to be present whenever a guest plays tennis.

The day after it adopted these rules, the Association informed the Rasmussens they were nonresident homeowners and only entitled to use the tennis court as guests of an authorized resident. As a result, Ethel MaJor, whom the Association considered the authorized resident, would have to personally sign up the Rasmussens and be present during their use of the tennis court. There was evidence Ms. MaJor, because of her physical disabilities, could [*622] not go to the guard building to sign up the Rasmussens to play tennis or be present while they played. The Rasmussens failed to follow the new rules and were denied use of the tennis court. The Association also imposed fines on the Rasmussens for using the tennis court in violation of the new rules.

The Rasmussens and [*4] Ms. MaJor filed a complaint against the Association and its directors alleging, inter alia, violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act, slander of title, and breach of fiduciary duty and seeking injunctive and declaratory relief. The Rasmussens and Ms. MaJor requested a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction against enforcement of the rules restricting use of the recreational facilities by nonresident homeowners. The trial court issued a temporary restraining order against the assessment of fines against the Rasmussens and set a hearing on the motion for a preliminary injunction.

At the hearing on the preliminary injunction, the parties introduced the following evidence. The Rasmussens purchased their condominium in 1975. The Miraverde condominium project contains one tennis court, two swimming pools, one basketball court, one paddle tennis court, barbecue facilities, recreation room, and some green belt parking all of which the CC&R's refer to as common areas. The board of directors approved the disputed rules effective July 1989. The Association fined the Rasmussens for using the tennis court in violation of the disputed rules. The CC&R's, articles of incorporation, [***5] and bylaws were also admitted into evidence.

At the conclusion of the hearing, the trial court made the following findings: that the term "resident" means someone who primarily resides at Miraverde whether they are an owner or a nonowner or a lessee; the Rasmussens are nonresidents; the rules relating to the use of the tennis court and other facilities by "nonresidents" are reasonable. The trial court denied the motion for preliminary injunction and vacated the temporary restraining order.

The Rasmussens and Ms. MaJor appealed the denial of the preliminary injunction.

DISCUSSION

I. The Appeal of Ethel MaJor Is Moot.

The complaint of Ethel MaJor alleges, in relevant part, the rules adopted by [**240] the Association with respect to guests' use of the tennis facilities discriminate against her in the use and enjoyment of her property on the basis of her [*623] age and physical disabilities in violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. (Civ. Code, § 51 et seq.) The complaint seeks a preliminary and permanent injunction against further enforcement of those rules. (Civ. Code, § 52 subd. (c)(3), 52.1, subd. (b).) As noted, the trial court denied a preliminary injunction and Ms. MaJor [***6] appealed.

(1a) While this appeal was pending, two events rendered the appeal moot: Ms. MaJor suffered a stroke and moved out of Miraverde and the trial court sustained a demurrer to her Unruh Civil Rights Act cause of action without leave to amend.

Because Ms. MaJor is no longer a resident of Miraverde there is no longer any discriminatory action on the part of defendants to be enjoined. (Cf. Old National Financial Services, Inc. v. Seibert (1987) 194 Cal.App.3d 460, 467 [239 Cal.Rptr. 728].) We recognize Ms. MaJor might recover from her stroke and might move back into Miraverde thus raising the possibility the alleged discrimination might be repeated. However, we need not consider these possibilities because the appeal is moot for a second reason.

As previously noted, while this appeal was pending the trial court sustained a demurrer to Ms. MaJor's Unruh Civil Rights Act cause of action. Because the Unruh Civil Rights Act claim was her only basis for a preliminary injunction, Ms. MaJor's appeal from denial of an injunction is now moot.

(2) A preliminary injunction is an interim remedy designed to maintain the status quo pending a decision [***7] on the merits. (Gray v. Bybee (1943) 60 Cal.App.2d 564, 571 [141 P.2d 32].) It is not, in itself, a cause of action. Thus, a cause of action must exist before injunctive relief may be granted. (Shell Oil Co. v. Richter (1942) 52 Cal.App.2d 164, 168 [125 P.2d 930].) Accordingly, where the complaint fails to state a cause of action an order granting a preliminary injunction must be reversed. (Watson v. Santa Carmenita etc. Co. (1943) 58 Cal.App.2d 709, 719 [137 P.2d 757].)

(3) An appeal from an order denying a preliminary injunction does not deprive the trial court of jurisdiction to proceed to try the case on the merits. (Gray v. Bybee, supra, 60 Cal.App.2d at p. 571.) If the court can try the case on the merits then a fortiori it can determine the case has no merit by sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend. In the present case, the trial court having sustained a demurrer without leave to amend to the only cause of action which might have supported a preliminary injunction in favor of Ms. MaJor, [***8] her appeal from the denial of a preliminary injunction is moot.

In order to avoid this result the plaintiff may request a stay of trial court proceedings while the appeal from denial of the preliminary injunction is [*624] pending. (4) Furthermore, although an order sustaining a demurrer is not appealable (Cohen v. Equitable Life Assurance Society (1987) 196 Cal.App.3d 669, 671 [242 Cal.Rptr. 84]), it is reviewable by petition for writ of mandate (Coulter v. Superior Court (1978) 21 Cal.3d 144, 148 [145 Cal.Rptr. 534, 577 P.2d 669]). We see no reason why such review could not also encompass the denial of preliminary relief. (1b) In the present case, plaintiffs, including Ms. MaJor, requested a stay of proceedings and writ review of the order sustaining the demurrer to the Unruh Civil Rights Act cause of action. Both requests were denied.

II. The Trial Court Erred in Denying the Plaintiffs a Preliminary Injunction Against an Ultra Vires Rule Which Prevented the Homeowners' Use and Enjoyment of the Common Areas of Their Condominium.

7 Cal. App. 4th 618, *624; 9 Cal. Rptr. 2d 237, **240;
1992 Cal. App. LEXIS 790, ***8; 92 Cal. Daily Op. Service 5491

(5) It is within the trial court's sound discretion [***9] to grant or deny a preliminary injunction (IT Corp. v. County of Imperial (1983) 35 Cal.3d 63, 69 [196 Cal.Rptr. 715, 672 P.2d 121].) However, a trial court abuses that discretion by denying a preliminary injunction where the plaintiffs establish a [**241] "reasonable probability" of success on the merits and that they will suffer more harm from its denial than the defendant will from its grant. (Friends of Westwood, Inc. v. City of Los Angeles (1987) 191 Cal.App.3d 259, 264 [235 Cal.Rptr. 788].)

Civil Code section 1353 requires the owner of a project, prior to the conveyance of any condominium, to record a declaration of restrictions relating to such project. Under Civil Code section 1354, those restrictions, where reasonable, are enforceable equitable servitudes and inure to and bind all condominium owners in the project. (See Ritchey v. Villa Nueva Condominium Assn. (1978) 81 Cal.App.3d 688, 693-694 [146 Cal.Rptr. 695, 100 A.L.R.3d 231].) The Association and the Rasmussens do not dispute the validity of the Miraverde [***10] condominium's CC&R's. The CC&R's provide in relevant part:

"Article IV, Section 1.

"Every person or entity who is a record owner of a condominium in the project... shall be a member of the Association. ... Ownership of such condominium shall be the sole qualification for membership.

"Article IV, Section 2.

"The membership held by any owner of any Condominium shall not be transferred, pledged or alienated in any way, except upon the sale or [*625] encumbrance of such Condominium, and then only to the purchaser or mortgagee of such Condominium. Any attempt to make a prohibited transfer is void.

"Article VI, Section 2.

"Every member shall have a right and easement of enjoyment in and to the common area within the properties, and such easement shall be appurtenant to and shall pass with the title to every assessed Condominium, subject to the following provisions: ... (b) The right of the Association to establish uniform rules and regulations pertaining to the use of the common area and recreational facilities.

"Article VI, Section 3.

"Any member may delegate, ..., his right of enjoyment to the common area and facilities to the members of his family, his tenants, or contract [***11] purchasers who reside on the property."

As record owners of a Miraverde condominium, the Rasmussens are members of the Association. This membership is not transferable unless the Rasmussens were to sell the condominium. There is no evidence in the record the Rasmussens ever delegated their right to use the common areas to Ms. MaJor or anyone else.

(6a) The principal issue in this case is whether the Association is authorized to discriminate between members who reside at Miraverde and nonresident members, such as the Rasmussens, in the use and enjoyment of common areas including recreational facilities. The CC&R's grant every member of the Association a right and easement of enjoyment in and to the common areas within the property. (Art. VI, § 2.) These rights are subject only to the right of the Association to establish uniform rules and regulations pertaining to a member's use of the common areas and recreational facilities (Ibid.) The Rasmussens assert the Association acted without authority in restricting the use of common areas, including recreational facilities, by members who are not residents of Miraverde. We agree.

The Association's bylaws, article IV, section 1, grant [***12] the Association's board of directors the power to manage and maintain the common areas and to make such rules and regulations therefore not inconsistent with law, the Association's articles of incorporation and its bylaws. The Association's articles of incorporation, article IV, section 2(a), require the Association to perform the duties and obligations as set forth in the CC&R's. The CC&R's [*626] state that "every member shall have a right and easement of enjoyment in and to the common area." The legal effect of the CC&R's is to grant "every member" the right to use the common areas subject to uniform rules and regulations.<sup>1</sup> By classifying [**242] members into two categories, residents and nonresidents, the Association created rules that are not uniform as to all members. Under the Association's rules, a resident member of the Association is entitled to use the common areas subject only to reasonable restrictions on time and manner. A nonresident member is not entitled to use the common areas unless he or she is an authorized guest of a registered resident. Hence, the Rasmussens are not entitled to use the common areas, including recreational facilities, unless Ethel Major, the [***13] authorized registered resident, reserves the recreational facility and is personally present during its use. The evidence was undisputed Ethel Major's physical handicap prevented her from reasonably complying with this rule. Thus, the Rasmussens were denied the use and enjoyment of the recreational facilities on an equal footing with resident members of Miraverde, and the trial court so found. The Association's rule became a de facto termination of the Rasmussens' use of the common areas. The effect of the Association's rule was to terminate a right originally granted by the CC&R's to all members whether resident or not.

1 The CC&R's grant any member the right to delegate his right of enjoyment to the common areas to the members of his family, tenants, or contract purchasers who reside on the property (art. of incorp., art. VI, § 3.) Here we do not address the issue whether the member's right and easement to the common areas is extinguished upon delegation to a third party.

Furthermore, the Association's rules [***14] exclude the Rasmussens from the common areas while simultaneously charging them a fee for the common areas' use and improvements. (Art. VII, § 1.) If the Rasmussens were to fail to pay their annual or special assessments, the Association would have the right to charge interest, bring an action at law, or foreclose the lien upon the condominium. (Art. VIII, § 1.) In return for the annual or special assessment fees, the Rasmussens, as nonresident members, would receive nothing. To de facto terminate the Rasmussens' right would impose a substantial obligation upon the Rasmussens while imposing no obligation at all on the Association. Such an illusory agreement would be not enforceable. (See Farnsworth, Contracts (2d. ed. 1990) § 2.13, p. 106 et seq.)

The Association relies on Sunrise Country Club Assn. v. Proud (1987) 190 Cal.App.3d 377, 381-382 [235 Cal.Rptr. 404] for the proposition ownership of a condominium has no necessary relationship to its use. We do not find this case persuasive in the matter at hand. In Sunrise Country Club Assn., the court refused to uphold the prohibition on sale of a condominium designated for "adults [***15] only" to persons having children. The court recognized an owner [*627] with children could comply with the "adults only" restriction because the owner may own the condominium for investment purposes or for use by less than all family members (190 Cal.App.3d at p. 383.) It was in that context the court remarked ownership of a condominium has no necessary relationship to its use. (Ibid.) This case is distinguishable from the Rasmussens' case. Whether, in general, there is no necessary connection between ownership and use, there is a specific connection between ownership and use in our case. The terms of the CC&R's link ownership with the use of the common areas. The Rasmussens' right to use the common areas comes from being owners of a Miraverde condominium.

(7) When disputes arise between the homeowners and the homeowners association, the courts will look to the governing instruments for guidance in determining whether the association has acted within its authority. (Thomas & Grogan, Cal. Condominium and Planned Development Practice (Cont.Ed.Bar 1984) State Regulation of Common Interest Subdivision Sales, p. 236.) Actions taken in excess of [***16] the association's power are unenforceable and courts have granted injunctive relief against associations which have exceeded the scope of their authority.

For example, in Spitser v. Kentwood Home Guardians (1972) 24 Cal.App.3d 215, 218 [100 Cal.Rptr. 798], the association assessed the homeowners' fees to correct a nuisance emanating from the local airport. The CC&R's expressly prohibited the use of homeowners' lots in a manner which [**243] constituted a nuisance to the neighborhood and allowed the use of assessment funds to enforce this restriction. In upholding the lower court's injunctive relief against the association's assessment of the homeowners, the court held the association was not authorized or required to protect Kentwood from nuisances emanating from outside the area. In Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. Rancho Santa Fe Assn. (1986) 177 Cal.App.3d 726 [223 Cal.Rptr. 175], the appellant challenged the association's action changing setback restrictions set forth in the CC&R's. The association was authorized to adopt rules and regulations for the general welfare of the community. However, [***17] the CC&R's specifically set forth setback restrictions for the community and provided any change required approval by two-thirds of the owners. The association proceeded to change the setback requirements on its own. The court held the association's actions were invalid because it was not authorized to enact setback regulations different from those contained in the CC&R's.

Florida courts have adopted a similar approach to challenges directed at rules adopted by the homeowners association:

"When a court is called upon to assess the validity of a rule enacted by a board of directors, it first determines whether the board acted within its [*628] scope of authority and, second, whether the rule reflects reasoned or arbitrary and capricious decision making." (Beachwood Villas Condominium v. Poor (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1984) 448 So.2d 1143, 1144; see also Note, Judicial Review of Condominium Rulemaking (1981) 94 Harv. L. Rev. 647, 652-653.)

(6b) In view of the foregoing authorities, we conclude an association may not exceed the authority granted to it by the CC&R's. Where the association exceeds its scope of authority, any rule [***18] or decision resulting from such an ultra vires act is invalid whether or not it is a "reasonable" response to a particular circumstance. Where a circumstance arises which is not adequately covered by the CC&R's, the remedy is to amend the CC&R's. The courts have held homeowners are subject to any reasonable amendment of the CC&R's properly adopted (See, e.g., Ritchey v. Villa Nueva Condominium Assn., supra, 81 Cal.App.3d at p. 697.)

For the reasons set forth above, we conclude it is reasonably probable the Rasmussens will prevail on the merits in establishing the Association exceeded its authority by excluding nonresident members from the common areas.

We further find the Rasmussens would suffer a greater harm from denial of the injunction than the Association would from its grant. Civil Code section 783 recognizes that ownership of a condominium constitutes a statutory estate in real property. (See Laguna Royale Owners Assn. v. Darger (1981) 119 Cal.App.3d 670, 673, fn. 1 [174 Cal.Rptr. 136].) The Rasmussens' purchase of the condominium vested in them the right to the physical [***19] unit as well as a right to use the common area. To exclude the Rasmussens from the common area would prevent them from enjoying a significant part of their estate.

The Association asserts the restrictions regarding the use of the common areas are necessary in order to prevent overcrowding. In view of the condominium's CC&R's, the owners of the condominiums were well aware of the limited facilities available at the Miraverde condominium project. The owners of the condominiums should not expect anything more than they bargained for. Furthermore, the Association should be able to cure any inconvenience or overcrowding with proper rules and regulations, consistent with the CC&R's, governing the reasonable time and manner of use of the recreational facilities.<sup>2</sup>

2 Our decision, of course, is based on the record before us. We note, for example, the Rasmussens were not seeking to both use the tennis court themselves and have a tenant or other delegatee use the court. Consequently the Rasmussens' unit was placing no greater burden on the Association's facilities than it did when the Rasmussens occupied that unit and no greater burden than if they still did. As mentioned earlier (see fn. 1, ante), we need not reach the question whether, under the CC&R's, a delegation to a tenant or contract owner of the owner's right to enjoy common facilities would have the effect of terminating (or suspending) the owner's personal rights to use those facilities. We leave this question to the trial court for resolution in the first instance should new facts be developed on remand.

[***20] [*629] [**244] DISPOSITION

The order denying the preliminary injunction is reversed as to the Rasmussens, and the matter is remanded to the trial court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views expressed herein. The appeal of Ethel Major is dismissed as moot. Each party is to bear its own costs on appeal.

Lillie, P. J., concurred.

CONCUR

I concur in the judgment only since the majority opinion, in my view, reaches the correct result but unnecessarily adverts to and inadequately treats the issue of delegation. By its brevity the approach of the majority may create confusion for trial courts and litigants in future cases involving related issues.
